A. Well, as I said, when I saw General Walker the first time out in the circle, there was a lull at that point in the sense that the tear gas was pretty heavy up around the Lyceum. The crowd had moved back and was—a number of them were concentrated around the monument and even to the east of the monument so that at that point, there was—we could call that a lull, a lull presumably brought about by the tear gas.

Q. Well, and when the Highway Patrol left, too, that caused somewhat of a lull in the activity next to the Marshals, didn't it?

A. I was not aware of it, sir. I saw the Highway Patrol pulling out University Circle in front of the Engineering Building. They were at that point a long way from the Marshals.

Q. Did you see in your press or learn of the United Press report that during a lull in the rioting, General Walker mounted the Confederate statue and begged the troops (sic) to avoid their violence and was met by one massive jeer; did you see that United Press report?

A. I don't recall having done so, sir.

[fol. 1574] Q. You have heard about it many times, haven't you?

A. About being greeted with a massive jeer?

Q. About Mr. Al Kuettner's report that during a lull in the rioting, General Walker mounted the Confederate statue and begged the students to avoid their violence and he was met by one massive jeer; haven't you heard of that news report?

A. No, sir, I really haven't.

Q. Well—

A. Haven't saw that.

Q. Wasn't there actually a lull in the rioting just about the time the Highway Patrol left?

A. I don't tie this to the departure of the Highway Patrol. Certainly when General Walker was making his speech at the monument, the crowd, most of the crowd was gathered back at the monument.

Q. Uh-huh.

A. Listening to him. But—and if that had been a lull, yes, they had withdrawn from the circle—not all of them necessarily but a large number had moved back to the monument at the time General Walker spoke to them.

Q. In other words, at all times during that evening, there were groups of students in contact with the Marshals; that is, they would gather together, get their rocks and their bottles and things and run up and throw them.

[fol. 1575] Now that went on continuously, even during the speech, didn't it?

A. That I don't know, sir, because I was down at the monument with the crowd and looking at General Walker and standing there. I wasn't watching the Lyceum. This is a long ways from the Lyceum. I didn't—couldn't tell what was going on at the Lyceum right at that point.

Q. You didn't see the Lyceum then from where you were near the monument?

A. Well, certainly, you could see the lights of the Lyceum from the monument because it was lighted very well.

But the point I was making is, I was not looking at the lights—at the Lyceum. The Lyceum stood east; I was coming from the "Y", which is north of the monument. I was looking at General Walker and the crowd that was gathered at the monument and then moving through the crowd.

I could not describe to you what was going on at the Lyceum while the speech was going on because I was—I was watching—I was looking in another direction. I was looking at General Walker.

Q. Could you hear tear gas still being fired up near the Lyceum before, during and after the speech?

A. I don't recall tear gas being fired during the speech but I couldn't be absolutely certain of that.

Again, I was pre-occupied with what was going on right [fol. 1576] in front of me. I certainly remember tear gas being fired in great quantities after we, after the—after the speech, when the crowd moved toward the Lyceum, certainly the tear gas had been fired in quantity just prior to the time that I saw General Walker, because this is what had seemingly cleared out the circle, that so many had moved back.

Q. Did you hear General Walker state this or this in substance: "No one came here for violence. Violence is not the answer. Your real enemy is in Cuba, that way," and he pointed toward Cuba?

A. No, sir, I didn't hear that. I testified to what I did hear. I remember a reference to Cuba but it was more in the nature of, "This is the long way around to Cuba. The Marshals ought to be in Cuba, not here."

Q. Did he say, "the Marshals", or "the troops"?

A. Marshals and troops.

Q. Or do you remember?

A. Of course, the troops were not on the campus at that point. They were—

Q. They were where?

A. Presumably still in Memphis and around about but, I mean they had not come onto the campus at that point.

Q. But actually you knew, didn't you, by that time they were in a staging area about 15 miles north of town?

A. I knew there—I knew they were—I didn't know they [fol. 1577] were that close, no—except, of course, I knew the local National Guard Unit, they were down—

Q. Of course, when you saw General Walker over there between the monument and flagpole, you went over, had this talk with General Walker.

Now at that time you had been in there remonstrating with students and walking back and forth through that tear ga for a considerable period of time, hadn't you—at least 20 or 30 minutes, maybe 40?

A. Yes, off and on.

Q. And weren't you somewhat excited at that time yourself by all of these events and violence that was going on?

A. I was certainly worried, yes, sir.

Q. And didn't you come up and catch General Walker by the arm, or do you remember, or take his arm?

A. Not that I recall, no, sir. Not that I recall. I walked up to him and addressed him as General Walker.

Q. Did you stick out your hand and shake hands with him?

A. Not that I recall.

Q. You didn't like him very well, did you, Doctor, or Reverend?

A. That had nothing to do with it at this point. I just went up and asked him to help us because I knew that he could be of help. I knew the students would listen to him. [fol. 1578] Q. Well, you had read quite a bit about him?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Had he represented a concept that you bitterly disapproved of, didn't he?

Mr. Gooch: If the Court please, I object to the form of that question. We are not talking about integration in this case.

The Court: Sustained.

Mr. Watts: I wasn't talking about integration at all.

Mr. Gooch: All right, it has that implication and I move the jury be instructed not to consider that question for any purpose.

The Court: The jury is—

Mr. Andress: I would like to say something on it. We can ask things of this sort to show bias and prejudice. It certainly would go to bias and prejudice of the witness.

The Court: Overruled. Ladies and Gentlemen, you are instructed not to consider the last question and answer of the witness.

Mr. Watts: Anyhow, Reverend Gray, you didn't go up and stick out your hand and shake hands with him?

A. Not that I recall.

By Mr. Watts:

Q. Well, if you had, you probably would recall it, don't [fol. 1579] you think?

A. I should think so.

Q. And did I understand you to say that General Walker said at that time, "You are the kind of an Episcopal minister that makes me ashamed of being an Episcopalian"?

A. Yes, sir, that was toward the end of our conversation.

Q. That's right. That's right.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. In other words, you went up to him at that point between the flagpole and the monument, and you asked him to stop, and he said, "I can't. I'm just an observer," or something to that effect.

Q. And then you talked with him a little more and he said, "You are the kind of Episcopal minister that makes me ashamed of being an Episcopalian"?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. All right. Now, at that time, as a matter of fact, there is—there are two very definite schools of thought in the Episcopal Church—let me finish the question—the so-called liberal and the so-called conservative groups and there is considerable conflict between them, isn't there?

Mr. Gooch: If the Court please—

The Court: We are not going to get into that. I'm not going to permit anything like that at all.

[fol. 1580] Mr. Andress: May we have our Bill on that?

The Court: Yes.

By Mr. Watts:

Q. Now then Reverend Gray, what was the meaning to you when he said, "The kind of Episcopal minister," what did that mean to you?

A. Well, since I had just been telling him why I was out there, I said I was there to do whatever I could to stop the violence, to get the students to go home and quit what they were doing, and when I—I had just finished describing what my purpose of being there was, which was to do everything I could to calm the students and to curtail the violence, and it was in that context immediately after my having said that that he said, "You are the kind of minister that makes me ashamed of being an Episcopalian."

My interpretation was that, as he had said, the students had a right to protest and that we ought to let them protest and keep going and that I shouldn't be out there trying to stop them.

Q. That was your impression. In other words, that was the impact it had on you, what he said?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now what was your impression of the fact that he said he was there only as an observer and couldn't stop it if he wanted to?

A. Well, my impression, I, of course, continued to urge [fol. 1581] him to speak to them because I thought he could be very helpful in this respect.

Q. You saw him doing nothing at any time other than observing, did you?

A. He made a speech, of course, to the students. I saw him make that.

Q. How did that speech affect you? Did that speech indicate to you that he was trying to lead the crowd in adverse action toward the Marshals?

A. Well, it certainly impressed me that it was further inflaming or inciting the students, telling them, congratulating them on what they were doing. He was encouraging them, telling them to stand fast, be firm, that there were thousands behind them.

This certainly had the effect of encouraging what already amounted to rioting. It was a riot.

Certainly, to tell them that they had been sold out by the man who led the Marshals onto the campus. This was, also,—this would serve also to further inflame or incite them.

Q. But the point is, you got no impression and have so testified, have you not, that Walker was going to lead the students in any kind of activities against the Marshals?

A. I did not hear that, sir. Remember, I was pulled down from the monument some time before the incident at the [fol. 1582] monument was completed so that I was—there may have been many things said after I was pulled down from the monument, I don't know about that, and taken away.

Q. Now refreshing your recollection a little from your deposition which was taken on May 11, 1964—

A. I beg your pardon, sir. It was taken in February, I believe.

Q. That's what I thought. Oh, this is the wrong one. No wonder I couldn't find it. I couldn't find where Mr. Kuettner said what I thought you said. Thank you, sir, for helping me out there.

Your deposition was taken on February the 4th, 1964?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Watts: Do you have a copy of that, Mr. Gooch?

Mr. Gooch: Yes.

Mr. Watts: Might he have it, please, to save me running back and forth?

Mr. Gooch: What page?

Mr. Watts: Page 59.

By Mr. Watts:

Q. Now, Reverend Gray, refreshing your recollection from your deposition, I'll ask you if this wasn't your recollection on February the 4th:

"Question: After the speech was finished, did you heaf General Walker say or did you get the impression that he [fol. 1583] had advised the students that he did not intend to lead them in any actual violence?

"Answer: No, sir, I didn't.

"Well, you certainly did not have the impression that he was going to lead them in acts of violence such as a charge on the Marshals, did you?

"No, sir, I didn't have the idea that he was going to lead them."

Now, that was your impression at that time, was it not? Yes or no.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. All right, sir. Now would you turn, please, to Page 41. "Did you see a rather heavy-set man around him at that time?

"Yes, sir.

"How far was he from General Walker?

"I don't know, he was right with him, standing right beside him. I recall seeing him right in the group.

"Now then Reverend Gray, was there any change in the character of these charges by the students from before General Walker's speech and after?

"Yes, sir.

"What was that change?

"Well, after the speech, why, the charges involved far more people, and before the speech, it was just an action by [fol. 1584] groups of people, they were not all working together.

"Question: You mean there was no concerted action at all before General Walker's speech, in other words, it was just a group of people that would move forward at one time, is that right?

"Yes, sir."

Would you prefer to read that? Go ahead and read that.

A. (Reading) I am not sure about the last, though, that there was no concerted action at any one time, I'll say this, if you would compare what happened before—" Before that. I think that means before the speech.

Q. Yeah.

A. "With what happened after the speech there at the monument and what happened before, certainly what happened after the speech at the monument involved more people moving in the charge toward the Lyceum than had been before the speech." Is that—

Q. No, go ahead and finish it.

A. "But before the speech, there was those groups moving as a group, not as the entire crowd, they would, some of them would move there and some here and advance to where they could throw their weapons and then run back to form again, but I did not have the feeling, as many people [fol. 1585] moved all at once together before the speech as they did after the speech. There is no question about that." [fol. 1586] Q. "You mean after the speech?"

Answer: "After the speech."

A. Yes, sir, after the speech.

Q. I will just read it for a while.

Question: "Would the term 'sporadic' be accurate as to the activity before the speech?"

Answer: "Perhaps, though I would say this was not as if it might have been a charge, it was just a few people then because there was quite a number of charges. It was just a continuing thing, but by small groups and individual people and their action depended on the intensity of the tear gas as to whether they moved right straight close to the Lyceum or whether they would fall back. But I think after the General's speech, we had a continuing thing but it was all of the crowd moving forward together. It might have been just the same number of people moving altogether, but it was quite different from the various groups moving separately. Now, that happened after the speech at the monument."

Now, that was your testimony at that time?

A. Yes, sir. The inflection there—it might have been just the same number of people, but moving altogether. After the speech is what I mean.

Q. Well, you read that and we will get to the inflection. [fol. 1587] A. I say it might have been just the same number of people in the whole crowd, but after the speech they were moving—after the speech they were moving altogether.

Q. Well, let's see now, let's start reading.

A. All right.

Q. I'll tell you what, let's go back so we will get your inflection, and I will read my question.

"Would the term sporadic be accurate as to the activity before the speech?"

Now, read your answer.

A. "Perhaps, though I would say this was not as if it might have been a charge, it was just a few people then because there was quite a number of charges. It was just a continuing thing but by small groups and individual people, and their action depended on the intensity of the tear gas as to whether they moved right straight close to the Lyceum or whether they would fall back. But I think after the General's speech we had a continuing thing but it was all of the crowd moving forward together. It might have been just the same number of people moving altogether, but it was quite different from the various groups moving separately. Now, that happened after the speech at the monument.

Q. "Did you at any time prior to the speech see a movement of substantially the entire group with only one or [fol. 1588] two in line, one or two groups, I mean?"

A. "No, sir, I didn't notice it. Not the whole group, I mean. Not the whole crowd. It was after. The crowd was circling the Circle pretty well. I mean the east end of the Circle. They were all—I mean, from the Fine Arts Building, around the Engineering Building, with concentration, so much of the time, being down in the east end around the monument and in that general area."

Q. By circling, you don't mean they were moving around?

A. No, sir.

Q. They were just standing in a position—

A. That's right.

Q. That would encircle it?

A. Well, of course, up to a point. I would say about halfway, but not close to the Lyceum.

Q. What I am getting straight—what I am trying to get straight, you don't mean that they were circling like a demonstration?

A. No, sir, I don't mean that.

Q. Now, Rev. Gray, turn over to page 45, please, sir. The question about the middle of the page.

"Then during this period before the speech, did you at that time ever see a charge that could be compared to the participation of the entire crowd on both sides of this east-[fol. 1589] west sidewalk?"

A. Wait just a minute. I believe I have lost you. What page?

Q. Page 45.

A. Page 45. Which question?

Q. I will read it again: "Then during this period before the speech, did you at that time ever see a charge that could be compared to the participation of the entire crowd on both sides of this east-west sidewalk?"

A. "No, I never saw one that did involve everybody that night. People came from all around. A group would come up from one direction and some from another, but I never saw a charge such as you have described."

Q. "Did you ever see that night a charge of all the people in fairly close proximity to the Lyceum?"

A. "If you are asking if the whole crowd moved at one time, no, sir."

That needs to be clarified. I mean, there were plenty of people standing out there, that I would say were observers. I wouldn't say everybody who was standing on the edges was actually participating in the riot itself. In fact, I know of several who were simply there standing and not participating at all. That is the point of the question, that it didn't involve everybody out there that night.

[fol. 1590] Q. In fact, General Walker told you he was an observer, didn't he?

A. Yes, sir, he did. Most of the observers were on the edge of the crowd. I mean, sitting or standing around the Y Building, or in that area.

Q. You never did see General Walker with anything in his hand, did you?

A. No, sir.

Q. And you were an observer also, were you not? Well, you were a little more than an observer?

A. I was trying—

Q. You were actually a counter rioter, weren't you?

A. I was trying to do what I could to stop it, yes, sir.

Q. Bottom of page 45, the last question:

"Now, Rev. Gray, with reference to these so-called charges that you saw and described them as to the area and the size of the crowd and the activities anytime before the Walker speech on the monument, I will ask you to now please just draw us a word picture of it."

A. "I don't recall these charges to where I could describe one of them at a particular given time. It is a dynamic thing, it wasn't something that just happened and it would be hard to draw a word picture of it."

[fol. 1591] Are you asking me about—

Q. Now, just wait. Let's just read it.

A. All right, excuse me.

Q. Then we will get to the conversation after a while.

A. All right.

Q. The inflection is what I am trying to get at, the word picture, just what you saw.

A. I'll say this, there was a movement at all times in the area. There were people on the ground, you see, just moving aimlessly about, it seemed. Some were going some way and some the other. They would go up toward the Marshals, a big crowd of them, and then they would fall back and that went on all during this period of time, advance and fall back.

Q. "And there would be a large crowd doing that?"

A. "Yes, sir, there would be, but the whole crowd didn't do the same thing at the same time. There was a whole crowd but there was a number of groups."

Q. Now, Rev. Gray, what was your official position as far as your relationship with the students were concerned? Weren't you an assistant Chaplain, or had some kind of relationship with the University?

A. When I first moved to Oxford in September, 1957, I was Rector of St. Peters Episcopal Church and also Chap- [fol. 1592] lain for the Episcopal students at the University.

In January, 1961, the Reverend Mr. Smith came there as Chaplain and I was Rector, so actually he was Chaplain of the students at that time.

Of course, many members of the University faculty are —and some students as well, are actually parishioners of St. Peters Church in Oxford, so that I had no official connection with the University, no, sir, but many of my members were on the faculty staff.

Q. You were very familiar with the students, of course, and their reaction and how to handle students, weren't you?

A. Hopefully. I wouldn't begin to judge my competence in that respect, but I had worked with students, yes, sir.

Q. Rev. Gray, in fairness, don't you think if Mr. Meredith had been brought on the campus area Monday morning when most of the students had come back from the football game—

The Court: Mr. Watts, I am not going to even permit you to go any further with that question. That is highly speculative.

Mr. Watts: I was trying to qualify him as an expert, but I guess nobody is quite that expert. I will withdraw it. [fol. 1593] The Court: All right.

Q. Finally, Rev. Gray, after the speech at the monument you had no impression at all that Walker had either told the students he would or that he intended to lead them in any violent activity against the Marshals, did you?

A. I had no impression he was going to lead them in a charge, that he personally would do it. I did not hear anything to this effect.

Q. And how far away from the monument, going to the westward, was he when you lost sight of him?

A. Now, I beg your pardon, here, this is after the speech?

Q. After the speech, yes.

A. He—the last time I remember seeing him was as he stepped down, or out of sight, when I was still fairly close to the Y, and as best I could tell he moved around on the south side of the monument, but I can't be certain of that. I didn't see him again.

Q. But it was your impression, was it not, from where you were standing over toward the YMCA, that General Walker, having faced the east making his speech, turned to his right and went around the south side of the monument, and then proceeded toward the flagpole?

A. That was my assumption, sir, since I didn't see him. [fol. 1594] Q. At that time you didn't see any people run over to where he was from the area of the YMCA, did you?

A. From the area of the YMCA?

Q. Yes, where you were.

A. Well, I, myself, was moving in that direction. I think there were one or two with me. The students had come and asked me to go back and try to talk to the crowd again.

But as—when we got there, as I say, after the crowd had moved around, the monument, I moved out into the Circle.

Q. But the point is, after you saw General Walker step down from the monument, turn to his right, and then move toward the flagpole, along in this direction, there was no large movement from this area (indicating) where you were, down toward the flagpole, was there?

A. There was a movement, but I think most of these people were coming from around here. Now, this is where

I had actually encountered the crowd. This was where I was spending my time, in this northeast quadrant, after the speech. On my way from the Y. The crowd moved in and came more or less engulfed me, and I was giving ground in this general area over here, so that the crowd was coming this way, and coming on this side of the monument too.

[fol. 1595] Q. Did you then, after you had moved away from the YMCA and gotten down here, did you see General Walker any more?

A. No, sir, I didn't see General Walker. I was in this area pretty much with my back to the Lyceum, giving ground, trying to stop whoever would stop, and get some of them to go back, and the crowd more or less passed me by, but there were still others coming on up, and I would stop them as best I could, and give ground with them.

Q. Now, let's draw this Jury, please, sir, a word picture. First, where you were, where you were when you last saw General Walker?

A. Somewhere between the Y Building and the monument.

Q. That is from here to here (indicating)?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. That is flat terrain there?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. There is a street light off over here somewhere on the south?

A. I am not sure of that. There was some light.

Q. So, from where you were you couldn't see General Walker step down and start off?

A. I saw him disappear. And I am assuming he stepped down from the elevated spot he was on.

Q. Now, could you take this pen and put a little X with [fol. 1596] a circle around it where you saw him disappear.

A. Well, at the monument. I mean, at the base of the monument. I mean, he presumably stepped down and he disappeared to my sight in the crowd. My assumption—

Q. Don't give your assumption.

A. All right.

Q. Then you did not see him after the speech, move one yard to the west of the monument?

A. No, sir, I didn't see General Walker again.

Q. And all you saw after the speech a crowd moving toward the monument, toward the flagpole?

A. Toward the Lyceum, yes, sir, and I was in the crowd. I mean, out in it with my back pretty much to the Lyceum most of the time, trying to talk to those headed toward the Lyceum.

Q. Prior to that time as you were standing at the YMCA, wasn't there still tear gas being fired up here, and activity up in this area (indicating)?

A. I don't recall being aware of any heavy—any tear gas barrage, actually. Now, whether there was sporadic firing, I couldn't say, but no, sir, certainly there was not a heavy firing of tear gas at that point, because again my attention and my interest was concentrated down here.

Q. Sure. Where Walker's speech was.

[fol. 1597] A. I couldn't say exactly what was going on up there, but I think if a lot of tear gas was being fired, I would have known it.

Q. Can you fairly or accurately say to this Jury that you did or did not ever see General Walker lead a charge?

A. I did not see him lead a charge.

Mr. Watts: That is all.

Mr. Gooch: Nothing further.

The Court: I am going to excuse the witness.

Mr. Andress: May we make our Bill during the recess?

The Court: Yes, wait out in the hall.

Mr. Gooch: It is nearly recess time now, I don't want to break into another witness.

The Court: Ladies and Gentlemen, let's recess until twenty-five minutes until 11:00.

* * * * * * *

[fol. 1604]

JOHN CHARLES HILL, called as a witness by the Defendant, having been first duly sworn, testified as follows, to-wit:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Please state your name.

A. John Charles Hill.

Q. And where do you live, Mr. Hill?

A. When I am not attending the University of Mississippi, I live with my parents in Dover, Delaware.

Q. How long have you lived in Dover, Delaware?

A. My family just moved to Dover this March, this past March, from Chicago.

Q. And prior to living in Chicago, where did your par[fol. 1605] ents live?

A. In Jackson, Mississippi.

Q. How long did you reside in Jackson, Mississippi?

A. For two years.

Q. Where were you born?

A. Fort Worth, Texas.

Q. What's your father's name?

A. John Lee Hill.

Q. Was he formerly the manager of Swift & Company here in Fort Worth?

A. I believe he worked as—on the sales force with the cheese end of it.

Q. All right. Now on September, 1962, September the 30th, 1962, were you a student at Ole Miss at Oxford?

A. Yes, sir, I was.

Q. And in what year were you there?

A. As far as—

Q. Scholastic.

A. Sophomore.

Q. Yes, sir. And how old are you now?

A. Twenty-two.

Q. You would have been roughly 21 at that time—20 or 21?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Directing your attention to September 30, 1962, can [fol. 1606] you give us your whereabouts on that day?

A. Yes, sir, I was in Jackson Sunday morning. Of course, we had had a football game and played Kentucky, the previous night and I went to church with mom and dad and then spent the early afternoon with my parents and then continued to Oxford that afternoon, a little later in the afternoon.

Q. Do you know about what time you arrived in Oxford?

A. I would say approximately around 4:30, 5:00, in there, in that area in the afternoon.

Q. All right. Where did you go when you got to Oxford that afternoon?

A. Well, I went to my dormitory room, which was Baxter No. 4, and I unloaded my suitcase and whatnot.

Q. And then what did you do?

A. And then I proceeded back to the Ole Miss Motel to see Dan Rather, who was a CBS correspondent out of Dallas, covering the problem we had.

Q. Did you have any connection at that time with CBS news?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What were you?

A. Well, I was a stringer. This is a type of individual who carries film, sets up interviews, just helps out in any way, shape or form that he could, drive cars, just help out. [fol. 1607] Q. All right. Now, do you know about what time you went back to the hotel to see the man from CBS?

A. It was directly after I got on campus, approximately 5:00, 5:30 or 4:30, in there, in that area.

Q. All right, did you thereafter return to the campus?

A. Yes, sir, I did.

Q. And about what time?

A. Well, first of all, Mr. Katzenbach with the Justice Department was to give a talk to the newspapermen at the Ole Miss Motel and this was going to be scheduled for I guess, 6:30.

And my first duty was to find our cameraman. I forget what his name was. I think it was Dick Perez. And get him back to the motel for this interview.

Well, after I found Mr. Perez and whatnot, I went back to the motel and it was getting on towards 7:30 after we got this all straightened out, at which time a man by the name of Gordon Yoder, who works for the, one of the Movietone Motion Picture News-theatre type affair, had come back to the motel and told the story where he had been beaten up, his car had been demolished, all of his equipment, his cameras, his briefcases, all of his notes were still on campus and that, he just went on to tell the story of what had happened to him.

At that time I suggested perhaps I could go back on [fol. 1608] campus and retrieve some of his papers and documents, which was his lifework.

And so Dan said it was all right, so I continued, I went back up on campus around 7:30.

I drove my own car and I parked on the circle and I went then up to Mr. Yoder's car and I got as much camera equipment and whatnot as I could and loaded it in my, back in my car, and came back to the Ole Miss Motel.

When I was at—when I was going around trying to get this equipment, I had noticed that the students that were spectators were getting very restless, cat-calls, a lot of swearing, and I saw a couple of missiles thrown.

There was a, some type of a fire bomb which was thrown on what they call a deuce and a half, the National Guard. It's a two and a half ton truck. And it landed on top of the canvas and then I went, as I say, left and just as I was leaving the back part of the campus, I noticed where the crowd broke and started running in all directions.

Now I don't know why. I presume—and I say it's only presumption—that tear gas had been thrown at that time.

Q. You didn't see the tear gas?

A. No, sir, I did not.

Q. All right, you left the campus then, say, sometime before the tear gas was fired?

[fol. 1609] A. Yes, sir.

Q. And then where did you go?

A. I went back to the Ole Miss Motel, gave Mr. Yoder the briefcases, spiders, tripods, camera, whatnot.

And then I proceeded to see Mr. Neal Straucer who is, also, a CBS correspondent, who was at the motel at this time, and I told him what I had seen, as far as the crowd, what was happening, the fire bomb, or whatever it was.

And then the reports started coming in that the riot had started—

Mr. Watts: If Your Honor please, just a minute. The reports would clearly be hearsay.

Mr. Gooch: That's right.

The Court: Sustained.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. All right. Now how long did you stay there at the Ole Miss Motel before you went back to the campus, if you went back to the campus?

A. Maybe 30 minutes; 15-30 minutes.

Q. Well, after you had carried Yoder, his equipment, such as you could retrieve, back to the motel, did you then return to the campus?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Would you have any idea about what time you got to the campus?

A. Well, I would say it was approximately 8:00—8:30, [fol. 1610] although I don't—I really have no way of knowing.

Q. Well, will you describe what you saw when you returned to the campus at that time?

A. Well, the reason why I returned to the campus was that when I understood that the riot was going on, I knew that a man, another newspaperman, had a portable tape recorder and I asked if I could take the tape recorder on my person and go up on campus and just record noises of the riot.

And this I did. And I went back on campus and just milled around in the crowd and took recordings.

Q. All right. How long would that tape play?

A. Well, the tape, as far as, if it had been rewound all of the way, it would have lasted approximately an hour. However, the man who loaned me the tape recorder only rewound it for 15 or 20 minutes.

Q. All right. When you got back to the campus there with your tape recorder, what did you do?

A. Well, I just milled around in the crowd and for a time—of course, once I got on campus, I turned the tape recorder on and adjusted it and just left it alone because I didn't want to play with it.

I had the microphone in this hand (indicating), with the cord running up my sleeve and I had the actual recorder under my belt and I carried it sort of to conceal it because it's—it wasn't exactly an intelligent thing to be doing, run-[fol. 1611] ning around that campus as a newspaperman or stringer or what-have-you.

I just got noises, tear gas bombs exploding, people screaming, conversations, what-not, that were irrelevant.

Then after a time went by I noticed over on my left—let's see, do you have any kind of display?

Q. Let's take a look at this map down here, if you will. That's Plaintiff's Exhibit 11. And there is a pointer there if you want to detail where you were and what you saw, just try and give the jury a graphic picture.

A. Thank you. Well, I was right in this area right here. I had been milling up and around back over in here and I was right, oh, right about here when I heard an awful lot of people to my left saying, "Let him through. Let him through. Make way," and what-not.

And as I came over to see what was going on, people said, "Here is General Walker. General Walker is here. Here is our leader. What should we do?"

And so General Walker continued on to right in front of the monument. There is this statue of a rebel soldier at the beginning of the monument or which I refer to as the monument. And he stood there for a moment. He didn't say anything.

And then people continually said, "What shall we do? Tell us what to do." Of course, the riot was going on all [fol. 1612] the time, all up in through here (indicating), the tear gas bombs and what-not.

Behind me on my right somebody screamed out, "General Walker, we got a movie," or "a newspaperman and we tore up all of his movie equipment and we beat him up," and General Walker said, "Good. Good."

And then again Mr. Walker didn't say anything and people started, "What shall we do? Tell us what to do." And there were other comments made but the one that really sticks out in my mind was that General Walker said, "How long has this been going on?"

And again back from my right a voice came out and said, "About an hour."

And he said, "Well, keep it up all night. We have got more people coming."

Q. Then what happened?

A. Then there were some other comments, sort of vague in my mind and I won't refer to them.

But General Walker then started walking in a northwest manner at a steady pace, going up towards the Lyceum Building.

Now by this time there was, well, I tried to stay as close to him as possible with this tape recorder because I figured that I was getting a recording and what-not, which, as it turned out, I wasn't, but, at any rate, we continued on [fol. 1613] up the circle at a steady pace and got up to about here, I would say (indicating), right where the "H" is.

Q. You have indicated a position west of the crosswalk that runs north and south through the circle?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. All right. Now as he went in that direction, what happened to the people that had been down around the monument?

A. Well, they sort of fell in behind him. It was, oh, possibly from, oh, here to the crosswalk (indicating) was the main body of people.

Of course, all the time there was still people running all around in this whole area and as they walked up to about where the "H" is, the Marshals fired a heavy barrage of tear gas.

Well, at this point, General Walker turned to the south and started cutting across, going over to here (indicating).

Now when this barrage broke loose, most of the people that were behind us broke off and ran back over here and back here.

Well General Walker at this point—well, let's see, there was—we got over here and it was sort of as if he were reconnoitering, just looking around, and another heavy barrage of tear gas came and I figured, well, this is time for [fol. 1614] me to come—go home, so I just—I left General Walker in this area, came back and got my car and went back to the Ole Miss Motel.

Q. As General Walker, as you have described, walked west there, was anybody around him?

A. You mean walked over here (indicating)?

Q. No, as he started from the monument?

A. Oh, yes, sir—oh, you mean directly next to him?

Q. Yes, sir.

A. Yes, sir, there was a heavy-set man which I believe is the Sheriff in one of the Mississippi counties, he was a very heavy-set man..

Q. Anybody else?

A. Well, I only remember the, this one individual.

Q. How close were they together?

A. Well, right, as they just started walking off, it looked as if General Walker may had of gone over to say something to him, just leaned over and possibly said something and just sort of like a little conference, and they just took a few steps and then General Walker headed back off in that area.

Q. Now when General Walker and the Sheriff or Deputy Sheriff took off, what happened to this crowd that was behind him?

A. Well, it just followed—just everybody fell in behind [fol. 1615] him. I don't know, everybody had been screaming, "Tell us what to do. Show us what to do. You are our leader. Follow— Let's go."

And, well, when he started walking off, everybody just fell in behind him and went with him.

Q. Would you estimate the size of that crowd that went up there behind General Walker at that time?

A. Oh, I'm not very good at estimating figures, but it would, I would say several—several hundred people.

Q. Take your seat, please, sir, unless you want to mark something else.

After you decided it was time to go home, what did you do?

A. I continued back and got in my car and continued back to the Ole Miss Motel. I ran over a piece of glass or something which slit one of my back tires and it blew out, so I had to park my car and continue at a half walk, half run affair. And when I got back to the motel, I immediately handed the film, or the recording to Dan and told him what I thought was on it and he seemed very, very pleased—

Mr. Watts: Now, if Your Honor please, this is getting out of the realm—

Mr. Gooch: That's right, just what you did.

The Court: Just what you did.

A. Well, all right. At any rate, I handed him the tape [fol. 1616] recorder and then we sat and we played it back and there were sounds and what-not and then it just went blank and I didn't know why it stopped recording until Cecil said that—

Mr. Watts: Just a minute.

Mr. Gooch: Never mind.

A. All right.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. In other words, you didn't have any of the conversation with General Walker on there?

A. No, sir, I did not.

Q. All right. Now did you return to the campus later?

A. No, sir—well, just to go back to my room and go over—just go to bed.

Q. Do you remember about what time you went back to the campus that night?

A. Well, there had been reports that several people had been—

Mr. Andress: That's not responsive.

The Court: He asked you what time you went back.

A. That's what I'm trying to think. Let's see, it would be 11:00 o'clock, I would say I went back.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Did you see General Walker at the time you went back?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you see him any more after you saw—

A. No, sir.

[fol. 1617] Q. —after you saw him going ahead of that group up towards the Lyceum?

A. No, sir.

Mr. Gooch: Your witness.

Cross examination.

By Mr. Watts:

Q. You are a member of the so-called news media, are you?

A. If—I work with CBS, which is a member of the news media, yes, sir.

Q. Did you study journalism at the University of Mississippi?

A. No, sir, I am taking—I am majoring in advertising—and as, through advertising, we are studying the medias of newspapers, magazines, radio, television, direct mail and what-not.

Q. Are you still in Mississippi University?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Live in Delaware, I understand?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you know this young lad Van Savell, or Savell, I think he calls himself, with the Associated Press?

A. Yes, sir, I did not—I do not.

Q. Sir?

A. I do not.

[fol. 1618] Q. Have you ever seen him or talked to him at all?

A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Have you ever talked to anyone who purports to know him or is a friend of his?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Friends of his you have talked to—

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And have they briefed you on Savell's testimony by deposition in this case?

A. No, sir.

Q. You haven't heard a word of his testimony?

A. Well, I—not of his testimony, no, sir.

Q. Have you heard a word of what his story purports to be?

A. Just what he read or what he wrote in the, in his—I haven't heard. I read the article, that's all.

Q. I see. You have then read that Savell wrote that utilizing his youth to the fullest extent, and so forth, and so on, he participated in a crowd of a few students and many outsiders as they charged the Federal Marshals, Walker first appeared in the riot area at 8:45 Sunday, nattily dressed, the crowd welcomed Walker, one unidentified man queried Walker as he approached the group, "General, will you lead us to the steps?"

That, "I observed Walker as he loosened his tie and shirt [fol. 1619] and nodded yes, without speaking. He then conferred with a group of about 15 persons who appeared to be the riot leaders.

"Walker assumed command of the crowd which I estimated to be at a thousand but it was delayed for several minutes when a neatly dressed, portly man of about 45 approached the group. He conferred with Walker for several minutes.

"Two men took Walker by the arms as they headed for the Lyceum and Federal Marshals.

"Throughout this time I was less than six feet from Walker.

"This march toward tear gas and some 200 Marshals was more effective than the previous attempts. The crowd was unarmed but the crowd said this was the moral support they needed.

"We were met with a heavy barrage of tear gas about 75 yards from the Lyceum steps and went back a few feet further before we had to turn back.

"Before doing so, many rioters hurled their weapons, bricks, bottles, rocks, sticks. We fled the tear gas and charging Marshals.

"I went to a telephone. A few minutes later I returned and found Walker talking with several students. Shortly thereafter, Walker climbed half-way up the Confederate monument and addressed the crowd."

[fol. 1620] You have read that news account, haven't you?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that substantially is what you say you saw when General Walker first came to the campus?

A. Yes, sir, I did not see the last part of it when he addressed the—when he climbed up on the statue.

Q. But everything that you have related to this Court and jury, young man—and will you step down here, please?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. —took place before General Walker mounted the statue?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. In other words, you never did see him get on the statue at all at the time you were there?

A. Not get on the statue, no, sir, he didn't.

Q. You have seen Reverend Duncan Gray out in the hall, haven't you?

A. I saw him.

Q. As you moved or allegedly moved across this quadrant of the circle, the northeast quadrant of the circle with General Walker in front of you and a neatly dressed, portly man by his side and a group of people behind you, did you encounter the Reverend Duncan Gray out in here?

[fol. 1621] A. I did not recognize him or see him to my—

Q. Now, were there only one or two men that had General Walker by the arm?

A. Well, there may have been two. I only remember seeing the one. There were people running all around the place and I do distinctly remember seeing one. There may have been two.

Q. And how far in front of the crowd was this one man that was holding General Walker by the arms?

A. Well, he was right next to the General—General Walker.

Q. Did he have hold of his left arm like this (indicating), or his right arm?

A. Well, let's say I was General Walker.

Q. You are General Walker and sort of be—

A. Sort of be like this.

Q. Like this (indicating)?

A. Yeah, and I came over and possibly said something to you or something like that.

Q. And did the portly man lock arms with General Walker like this?

A. No, it was more like this (indicating).

Q. Like this? I see. As they marched towards the Marshals, were they in step (indicating)?

A. Well, I don't know if they were in step together. In [fol. 1622] fact they—to me, as I recall, they had just walked along and you went—we got apart and then continued.

[fol. 1623] Q. Were they strolling, or were they moving rapidly?

A. Well, they were just going at a steady pace.

Q. And how far behind General Walker and this portly man walking toward the monument, the Lyceum, were you?

A. Well, I was trying to stay out close to them, as possibly as I could.

Q. The question is: How far behind them were you?

A. I would say approximately ten feet. Ten feet to the immediate rear.

Q. Were people in front of you and General Walker—in between you and him?

A. Yes, sir, they were around, all around him, but I tried to stay to the front.

Q. Now, at the time you tried to stay to the front of this crowd, how large was the crowd?

A. As I say, it was approximately several hundred. I am not very good at estimating how big, but it was—the crowd was all back in through here (indicating).

Q. Were they lined up pretty much abreast behind General Walker?

A. You mean in file and block formation, military manner? No. It was just a mass mob.

[fol. 1624] Q. Well, was the front relatively straight?

A. Well, it was just—in a manner of speaking, yes. Not as a straight line.

Q. And how far from the front of the group was General Walker and this portly man?

A. Oh, it would be—I would be in the very front of the crowd, be about here (indicating).

Q. How far did the right flank extend toward the north side?

A. I would say approximately almost to the—to the road, because you had people, you had the main body, and you had people over to the right, more or less, and a lot of people on the left carrying on the attack against the Marshals.

Q. By the left, you mean down at the southwest quadrant?

A. Well, of course, the main body was here (indicating).

Q. All right.

A. Then we had people over here and people over here, and people all over the place.

Q. Now, as General Walker and the portly man advanced toward the Lyceum with you ten feet behind him, in this vast crowd of people, how far was the left flank of this group extending to the south?

[fol. 1625] A. Speaking of the left flank as a separate bunch?

Q. No, the flank is the left end.

A. The left side?

Q. Yes.

A. It is not as if it was a Military formation where you have a direct—direct line to make. They had the—he had a mob, a group of people that were hysterical, or something was wrong with their minds, then over on the west you had people running up and down all over in this area, you had people continuously throwing broken bottles and what not.

Q. Now, just a minute right there. When you saw General Walker and this man across the northeast quadrant of the intersection, were there still people running out and throwing bottles up ahead of you?

A. No.

Q. They were behind?

A. Well, this is something I noticed. There was no one ahead.

Q. In other words, the people nearest the Marshals as General Walker and this man marched out across that quadrant were General Walker and this man, is that right?

A. Yes, sir, he was in front.

Q. And nobody was between him and the Marshals?

A. Oh, there may have been one or two people. May have [fol. 1626] been more than that, but not many.

Q. But as far as you saw, and what you are trying to tell this Jury, or what you are telling this Jury, is that in front of this crowd of which you were a part, that General Walker and the man, and in front of that were the Marshals?

A. Basically, yes. Sidewalk up here.

Q. What did they do.

A. Well, they continued walking up to approximately the point here.

Q. Would you measure down here on this scale and tell us how far that is?

A. Approximately seventy-five feet.

Q. About seventy-five feet in front of the sidewalk?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. All right. Now, then, tell us what happened.

The Court: Talk a little louder. The Reporter can't hear you when your back is toward him.

The Witness: Yes, sir.

Q. Tell us what happened as Walker and this Marshal—and the portly man—strike that.

Did you see whether this portly man had a badge on?

A. When General Walker approached I seem to remember he did flash a badge. I don't know whether he had it on [fol. 1627] his tie or inside his jacket.

Q. How big was the man?

A. He was a big individual. I would say he would probably wear a 46 coat.

Q. Was he still hanging onto General Walker's arm as he tried to cross this sidewalk?

A. No, sir, I don't believe he was.

Q. When did he turn loose?

A. Back over here (indicating).

Q. Did he stay then some eight or ten feet ahead of the crowd?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. As they crossed the north-south sidewalk, what did they do?

A. As they got up there they just continued walking.

Q. As they got up to this point you pointed out seventy-five feet from the sidewalk, what did they do?

A. Well, when they were getting to the Marshals at the Lyceum the tear gas—they started throwing their bricks and bottles and ran, and then there was the tear gas fired, and then General Walker went to the left and went south, at which point there was another round of tear gas fired.

Q. Did he walk or run?

A. He was walking.

[fol. 1628] Q. Did he ever run?

A. No, sir.

Q. Never ran at all?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did he walk casually, slowly, or how?

A. He just walked—he kept a steady pace the whole time.

Q. And how far did you observe him walk toward the south?

A. He walked to approximately right here (indicating).

Q. Did he stop?

A. Just—well, I don't remember if he stopped or not. I remember we had a second barrage, a big barrage of tear gas, and there was a Marshal coming towards him from the Lyceum, and that was when I retreated to the rear.

Q. You were following very closely, then, General Walker all this time?

A. Yes, sir, when I got into this area I was within a very few feet of him.

Q. Do you remember seeing, or identifying one Van Savell, a rather plump, rather short individual, along closely observing and watching General Walker?

A. No, I was watching General Walker and I was trying to watch the Marshals because they had clubs and I didn't want to get caught.

[fol. 1629] Q. And did you stay on with General Walker after this point here?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And where did he go from there?

A. I don't know. That is where I left him.

Q. At no time you saw him run?

A. No, sir. Well, you couldn't actually run because when you run into tear gas you quickly discover your eyes become extremely tender and you can't really see where you are going.

Q. From the time tear gas was fired, would you say that Walker raced back toward the monument?

A. I don't know what Walker did from this point on.

Q. If he did any racing at all it was after you and he walked slowly from this point some seventy-five feet southeast of the walk to where the missiles were thrown?

A. He didn't walk slowly.

Q. How did he walk? Walk out across there and show us about how he walked?

A. (Witness demonstrates.)

Q. All right. Now walk back.

A. (Witness demonstrates.)

Q. And did that gait continue all across this northeast quadrant of the Circle and the northwest quadrant of the [fol. 1630] Circle?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And did that same gait continue from the northwest quadrant of the Circle into the southwest quadrant of the Circle, after the gas was fired?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that was the last you saw of him?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. All right. Sit down. Did General Walker assume command of this crowd as stated by that article read you, down by the flagpole?

A. General Walker was—you could say he assumed command. He continued going forward in front of the leaders, leading the mob, yes, sir.

Q. And did you see down in that mob one of the leaders waving a big Confederate flag as General Walker appeared at the monument?

A. I don't remember seeing it. I know what—I know there were some big Confederate flags being waved down there. I don't remember seeing any—

Q. Well, would you say one of the lads who came up to General Walker may or may not have—and may or may not have taken him by the arm, was waving a big Confederate flag?

A. Would you repeat that?

[fol. 1631] Mr. Watts: Repeat the question, please.

(Question read.)

A. I don't remember seeing anything like that.

Q. Now, after you left where did you go?

A. After I left General Walker, I went back to my car.

Q. Then what?

A. Then I continued in my car back to a point, and blew out a tire, and then I went back to the Ole Miss Motel, and gave my tape to Dan Rather.

Q. Dan who?

A. Rather.

Q. How do you spell that?

A. R-a-t-h-e-r (spelling).

Q. And what was his official position with CBS.

A. He is CBS—at that time he was a CBS correspondent, and out of the Dallas Bureau, and Bureau Chief.

Q. He was the Chief CBS correspondent in the area at the time?

A. He was not in this area, but as far as the—

Q. Excuse me, I mean in the Oxford area.

A. In the Oxford area they had people coming in and going out. I don't know who would have control of this CBS Bureau. It is more—I couldn't say that.

[fol. 1632] Q. To whom did you look for orders and directions?

A. Well, mainly from Dan.

Q. And when you got back there did you report to Dan—

A. Rather.

Q. Rather. Did you report to him that you had seen General Walker come up University Boulevard, confer with the leaders of the mob, issue—assume command of them and then march in front of a group of several hundred people, as you have outlined to us?

A. Well, as I think about it, Dan was in Memphis, or he wasn't—I remember talking to Neil Strauser. He was on the telephone.

Q. Well, to whom did you repeat this?

A. Well, this is what—well, I started to—

Q. Let's back up and start over again, son. You got in your car going to the Ole Miss Hotel?

A. Right.

Q. You are sure you were in your car?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You are sure you had a flat tire?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. From that point on let's go on. What else are you sure of?

A. Yes, sir.

[fol. 1633] Q. Do you remember arriving at the hotel?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you remember seeing Strauser?

A. Yes, sir. It was Neil Strauser.

Q. What did you tell him?

A. I told him General Walker was on campus and that I had a tape recording and that the riot was going on and I had recordings of General Walker and I had some recordings of the sounds of the riot.

Q. And who was this gentleman Neil—Rouser was it?

A. Strauser, another CBS correspondent.

Q. How do you spell that?

A. S-t-r-a-u-s-e-r (spelling) or f-e-r, I am not sure.

Q. All right. Go ahead.

A. Now, you see these newspaper, or these correspondents—there must have been seven Bureau Chiefs in from all over the country, from out of New York, and it is difficult to remember exactly who you see, but I did most of my dealings with them, really, and that is why I imagine the name pops up in my mind, but I gave—or we found Cecil—I am sorry, I don't have his last name. He was the man whose tape recorder this was. Then we played the tape back and we heard what was on it and we—I don't [fol. 1634] know what happened after that.

Q. Did you by any chance report this story, or relate this story to anyone associated with Associated Press?

A. No, sir.

Q. You are sure of that?

A. Positive.

Q. Go ahead. You were going to tell us what you told the gentleman at the Ole Miss. You handed him back the tape recording?

A. Yes, sir, and I said—

Q. Go ahead.

A. "General Walker is on campus and I have got recordings here, let's hear them." As much as said, "Let's find out what I have got."

So, then, we proceeding to play the tape back.

Q. Is that all you said to him?

A. Well, I was anxious to hear what was on the tape, yes, sir.

Q. And how long did your conference with him last?

A. Just a few minutes until we started playing the tape back.

Q. Well, now, as you—or did you at that time tell any person connected with the Associated Press this story you just outlined from the witness stand?

[fol. 1635] A. No, sir.

Q. Did you ever tell anyone connected with CBS?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Well, who?

A. Well, Neil Strauser and these people I had been talking to, all of these CBS people.

Q. When did you tell them that?

A. When I took the tape back.

Q. I thought you said when you took the tape back you just returned it.

A. No, I said, "I have a recording."

Q. Well, I asked you, young man, to tell us exactly what you told the CBS representative when you got back to the Ole Miss Hotel? Tell us.

A. Oh, I am sorry, I thought I had.

When I went back to the Ole Miss Hotel, I went to room—the CBS room where I knew these individuals were, and I took the tape recording with me, and handed it to them, and I said, "General Walker is on campus. I have a recording here of the sound of the riot, and I think I have a recording with General Walker on it."

And then we proceeded to listen to the tape.

Q. All right. What did you say in addition to what you testified to? Tell us what was said, what your report was.

[fol. 1636] A. Well, I don't remember what all went on, what all went on at that particular meeting. I haven't given it much thought.

Q. Well, you remembered all of these other things. Tell us what you told the CBS personnel there at the motel, or anywhere else.

A. I really—I told them, well, last night we listened to the tape.

Q. All right, go ahead.

A. All right. We listened to the tape, and we discovered that the tape had malfunctioned, something happened, which it turned out later it had not been re-wound to that extent, and then I said, "Well, what happened is General Walker came on campus, and then I related to them exactly what I related here, except perhaps not in as much detail.

Q. Who is "them"?

A. CBS.

Q. Who is CBS?

A. Neil Strauser.

Q. Who else?

A. I believe Nelson Benton had come in by this time. I think Dan Rather had gotten back. I don't remember what all was going on.

Q. Do you know what they did with that report?

[fol. 1637] A. Yes, sir. You mean the recording?

Q. No, the report you had made to them.

A. No, I don't know what they did with it.

Q. Do you know if your reports were secondhandly turned over by them to the AP?

A. No, sir, I do not. I don't know.

Q. Did you ever discuss that with them?

A. No, sir.

Q. And that is all you know about this?

A. Well, yes, sir. My tape—the tape was—the tape that was good was put out on CBS news on some of the broadcasts.

Q. Where is that tape now?

A. I understand—well, my copy was destroyed by accident. The Justice Department, I believe, has a copy and CBS is supposed to have a copy.

Q. Did you also appear before the Grand Jury in Mississippi?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. When was that?

A. I don't remember.

Q. January of '63, perhaps?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you subpoenaed to come here today?

A. Yes, sir.

[fol. 1638] Q. When did you get the subpoena, before you left or after you got here?

A. After I got here.

Q. Who arranged for you to come?

A. The Associated Press, or—Mr. Smith, I believe, or Mr. Leon Pearl.

Q. Is that Mr. Leon Pearl from New York?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You personally discussed this, then, with Mr. Leon Pearl?

A. No, sir.

Q. Who have you discussed it with?

A. Mr. Gooch, Mr. Smith and the other lawyers.

Q. What other lawyers? When and where?

A. You mean from the Grand Jury to today?

Q. Well, don't—

The Court: You can't tell about the Grand Jury.

The Witness: I know I can't. Just to Mr. Gooch and Mr. Smith.

Q. How soon after the incident?

A. After what incident?

Q. After the riot of September 30th.

A. After the riot? Well, I was just contacted by them the last part of school, which would be in June.

[fol. 1639] Q. Oh, yes, speaking now of riots, how long did you hear General Walker talk to these lads in the vicinity of the monument when he first came out?

A. I would say he talked to the group approximately four or five minutes.

Q. Well, he also talked to the individuals, didn't he? Didn't people come up and shake hands with him and say, "General Walker, I am so and so,"?

A. I don't remember anyone coming up like that.

Q. He just talked generally to the group?

A. Yes, sir. He stood in front of the monument, and then the group gathered sort of around him, people just in a semi-circle.

Q. And various individuals would come up and report to him things that had happened, didn't they?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you ever hear him in answer to any of those reports say, "Riot, riot"?

A. I don't remember. He may have.

Mr. Watts: That is all.

Mr. Gooch: Stand aside. Thank you.

The Court: Going to release this witness?

Mr. Gooch: Yes, sir.

The Court: I will let you go back home.

Mr. Gooch: Call Mr. Proehl.

[fol. 1640] DONALD JAMES PROEHL, called as a witness by the Defendant, having been first duly sworn, testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Please state your name?

A. My name is Donald James Proehl.

Q. Where do you live, Mr. Proehl?

A. I live on the University of Mississippi campus, in the back of the campus, the Village Apartments they are called.

Q. Have to speak out a little louder.

A. I live on the campus of the University of Mississippi, in the back of the University grounds, called Village. And my wife and child and I live there.

Q. How old are you, Mr. Proehl?

A. I am twenty-nine years old.

Q. Are you or have you been a student at the University of Mississippi?

A. Yes, sir, I have.

Q. When were you first enrolled as a student in the University of Mississippi?

A. I started to school in 1953. I stayed down there a year and I left and went into the Army and spent three [fol. 1641] years in the Army over in Okinawa and Japan, came back to school on the GI Bill. I stayed at Ole Miss for one year, and after that I went up North to work. I went to work for the Western Electric Company for four years in the engineering department and then came back to Ole Miss to finish up on the GI Bill.

I have gotten my undergraduate degree in education, a school teacher in history, and I received my Master's Degree in Guidance Counseling in September.

Q. All right. Are you working now, Mr. Proehl?

A. Yes, sir, I do various and sundry odd jobs. My wife and I are putting ourselves through school. I work in a factory on the night shift from 7:00 at night until 5:00 in the morning and I go to classes during the day, and previous to this job I worked as a bouncer at fraternity and sorority parties, and I referee athletic events on the campus, work with the physical education department, take tickets at the theatre up town, and you name it, I have done it.

Q. When do you sleep?

A. In class.

Mr. Watts: I think that's immaterial.

[fol. 1642] Q. Directing your attention to September the 30th, 1962, were you on the campus of the University of Mississippi on that date, Mr. Proehl?

A. Yes, I was.

Q. Had you been away from the campus that weekend?

A. No. My wife and I had stayed there. We didn't go to the football game in Jackson.

Q. All right. Directing your time down to around mid-afternoon, 4:00 or 5:00 o'clock, did you have occasion to be up near the Lyceum Building or in the circle?

A. Yes, we had gone to church and come home and eaten dinner and I had gone up town to the drugstore, I had driven up town and didn't go by way of the circle going up town but coming back I did and when I came back, I saw the Marshals and I went over and told my wife and she—

Q. You can't tell what you told your wife.

A. I told my wife—

Q. I say, you cannot tell what you told your wife.

A. Oh, I cannot? I am sorry.

Q. That would be hearsay. You went home and then what did you do?

A. I got my wife and we went—brought the baby and my neighbor across the hall and we came back to the circle.

Q. And when you got back to the circle, what did you see?

[fol. 1643] A. I saw Marshals surrounding the Lyceum Building and a crowd of students and adults in the front.

Q. All right. How long did you remain there in front of the Lyceum Building when you came back with your wife and baby?

A. I brought my camera with me. I wanted to take some pictures. And we stayed there, oh, I would say about an hour and 45 minutes, maybe two hours.

Q. What was occurring, if anything, between the people and the Marshals and the Highway Patrolmen, if anything?

A. Oh, the Marshals were surrounding the building and the students were laughing and calling them names. The Marshals were laughing and joking right back with them and they called—am I allowed to recite some of the names they called?

Q. I guess you'd better not.

A. Oh, not curse words, I mean, just—

Q. All right.

A. I put my little girl up on my shoulders and went up to the front of the crowd. The wife stayed behind on the grass and I watched for a while and I saw a boy with a Confederate flag on a long pole waving it up there and the students were actually just, to me it looked just like good-natured fun, to start with, and then it started getting [fol. 1644] rougher as time wore on.

Q. All right. When it started getting rougher, how did it get rough?

A. Oh, things were thrown. I couldn't say exactly what. Two, three army duce and a half, Army trucks came in with more Marshals on them.

I took some pictures of those, also, and some of the students started flipping, and grown-ups, flipping lighted cigarette butts up on top.

In fact, the Marshals were laughing and joking about it. I have one picture where the Marshal is bending down, joking with the students.

Like I said, I looked like—it was actually good-natured fun there for a while.

Q. After it—did it ever quit being good-natured fun?

A. Oh, yes, I started—as I said, I had my camera there and I saw some of the photographers start having their cameras taken away from them, tape recorder, and being smashed, and things starting to get rougher and so I told the wife and child to go home and I gave my wife my camera so mine wouldn't be destroyed and I sent them on home.

Q. Did you remain there?

A. Yes, sir, I did.

Q. Were you there when the tear gas was fired?

[fol. 1645] A. No, sir, I wasn't.

Q. Where were you when the tear gas was fired?

A. About 10 minutes before President Kennedy was to come on TV, the YMCA is located kitty-corner on the circle there and I had actually stayed there because I wanted to hear Kennedy on television and I had left with another band of students who I cannot place who they were, just a small group of students, we had gone, we went over to the "Y", and—early to get a seat because we knew the place would be packed and I was not present when the tear gas was fired.

First thing I knew was my eyes started smarting.

Q. All right. Now you did listen to President Kennedy's speech over in the "Y"?

A. Yes, sir, I did.

Q. After the speech, where did you go and what did you do?

A. After the speech, we had—oh, I remember explicitedly two boys came in. One of them had been shot with bird-shot, you know, "Boy's been shot. Boy's been shot," and pulled up his shirt and we saw a lot of the pellets or little red marks on his back.

After Kennedy's speech, I tried to look out the window. It was pretty hard to see with the tear gas and all. And at times I would go to the door and try to look out the doors. I was worried—I wanted to get back to the apart[fol. 1646] ment but I didn't know how to get back.

I saw some Marshals and students actually fighting out in the grove, maybe one Marshal and one student or two Marshals and a student.

And so I stayed in the safest place. I stayed in the "Y". At times, as I said, I would go out and look out the door and that's all.

Q. All right. Now after you came out of the "Y", let's get down to it, did you ever see Walker that night?

A. I heard in the "Y" that General Walker was—

Mr. Andress: We are going to object to that.

The Court: No, sir, he asked you if you saw him.

A. If I saw General Walker? Yes, I did.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Where was General Walker when you saw him?

A. He was standing on an elevated portion of the Confederate statue, on the front of the statue.

Q. Now you had not seen him prior to the time you saw him standing on that campus?

A. No, I hadn't.

Q. On that monument?

A. No, sir; I hadn't.

Q. Did you hear or were you able to hear—well, now where were you when you saw him standing on that statue? [fol. 1647] A. You could make an outline, a sideview outline of a man—

Mr. Andress: If the Court please, this is not responsive.

The Court: Overruled. You may proceed.

A. You could see the side profile, let's say, of a man standing up there. I couldn't distinguish who it was until I got up there and I pushed right to the front, pushed right up.

I was within, oh, maybe three or four feet from him, stood right up, could look right up at him, and I saw General Walker with his white hat on.

Q. All right, did you hear any of the statements that General Walker made there in his speech there that night?

A. Yes, sir, I did.

Q. Will you detail as best you can your recollection of what you heard General Walker say on the monument there that night?

A. I heard him tell the students that they had a right to protest under the Constitution; that they were doing the right thing, and that he would lead them in this protest.

Q. Do you remember anything else he might have said?

A. There were things I am not sure about. I wouldn't [fol. 1648] want to say. I am sure I did hear this, though.

Q. All right. Did you see Reverend Duncan Gray there while General Walker was on that monument?

A. Yes, Duncan—Reverend Duncan Gray and myself and a man I don't know, the three of us met actually on the steps of the Y and walked over to hear him talk, hear General Walker speak and Gray went right up there with me and I was there when somehow Gray was pulled off the monument. I don't know who did it but I was there and I helped pick him up and get him over to the trees and then take him back to the Y.

Q. Did you hear General Walker say anything to Reverend Gray there that night?

A. Yes, he said that we have—he says, put his hand (indicating), "We have an Episcopalian minister here." He said, "I am an Episcopalian but when we have ministers like this in our church, it makes me ashamed to admit that I am an Episcopalian."

Q. Then what happened to Reverend Gray?

A. Somehow he was down on the ground. The events were so hurried, the crowd had been yelling, "Kill him, kill him," pertaining to Duncan Gray.

The crowd was worked up and . . . just for Duncan Gray's life, actually, and got him over to the tree, I mean and got him back to the Y, the steps on the Y.

Q. Did you see General Walker after you had assisted [fol. 1649] Reverend Duncan Gray away from there?

A. I did not see General Walker at—when I took the Reverend over to the—when we went over to the trees, the crowd started to surge forward and I could not see General Walker then at all.

Now when we went across the street, I stood up on the steps of the Y and I was able to see General Walker up at the head—not at the very front because you had stragglers of people out there in advance, one or two people out in advance, but I saw General Walker right up near the front, yes.

Q. All right. What direction was General Walker and this crowd moving?

A. They were moving towards the Lyceum Building.

Q. And how far did you see them get?

A. I saw them get, I would say, midway between the flagpole and the front of the Lyceum Building.

Q. Then what happened?

A. Tear gas was fired and they all turned around and ran.

Q. Now did you see General Walker after that that night?

A. No, sir, I didn't. I didn't see him any more.

Mr. Gooch: Your witness.

[fol. 1650] Cross examination.

By Mr. Andress:

Q. How do you spell your name, Mr. Proehl?

A. P-r-o-e-h-l.

Q. h-l?

A. Yes.

Q. German name, I take it then?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now what time was it that you decided this was no place for the—for your wife and baby?

A. It was approximately—now I would say it was approximately 5:30. Now I had taken these colored slides and one of the slides showed the time on the clock as 10 minutes after 5:00. It was just about 20 minutes, or so, after I took these that I sent them home.

Q. Well, then you must have gotten there on the campus about 2:30, at the circle?

A. Well, no, I came back from the drugstore, I think it was about 3:30, quarter to 4:00, or so.

I didn't have occasion really to look at my watch then but I went home and Rose, my wife, dressed the baby and everything and she got some clothes on and we went back. I would say it was about, oh, a little after 4:00, maybe 4:30, closer to 4:30.

Q. And then when did you finally go home that night?

[fol. 1651] A. I don't know the exact time, sir. It wasn't too long after the last charge that they made, the large group that went up there. I wanted to go home. I didn't know how I could get back. We had expected company that night and I knew the company was already there.

Q. Well, now wait just a minute. When was the last time you remember looking at your watch before you started for home?

A. The last time I remember looking at my wife?

Q. At your watch?

A. At my watch?

Q. Yes.

A. I don't remember looking at my watch.

Q. In other words, then, you can't—you say it was about —you went to the Y just before the President made his speech?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. But from that point on you don't have any memory as to time?

A. I don't even remember if I had a watch on. There was a large clock up on the top of the Lyceum Building and I saw the time from that when President Kennedy was going to speak.

Q. And how long did you stay in the Y, as being the safest place, after the President's speech?

[fol. 1652] A. I wouldn't be able to say, sir. I—oh, may have been an hour, may have been two hours. Things, events that night happened so fast and everything, it's pretty hard to place the time.

Q. Well, you said you tried to look out of the window and the door there in the Y and you couldn't see very much?

A. No, sir, you couldn't. Gas and many people crowding there and you couldn't get to the phone. It seemed as though everybody was waiting in line for a telephone.

Q. You couldn't even see much out of the door of the Y?

A. You could if you went out and you stood on the steps but there were maybe one or two Marshals would come by and students were running out from in back of the Y and running across the grove and throwing things and the Marshals would come forward with tear gas and when your eyes would start to smart and burn, you would go inside.

Q. How much light was there out there on the campus that night?

A. There was quite a bit of light coming from the front of the Lyceum Building which would shine into the grove and there were lights in the grove for quite a while until they were broken out.

Q. And what other lights were there around?

[fol. 1653] A. I couldn't say right off.

Q. Now you said that after the General finished his speech on the monument and stepped down, that you couldn't see him there for a while?

A. No.

Q. Which direction was he standing at when he stood on the steps of the monument?

A. When he stood on the steps of the monument, he was facing towards University Avenue, which is east.

Q. And then when he got down from the monument, which way did he go?

A. I do not know, sir, because I was with Duncan Gray. We got him over to the trees.

The next time I saw General Walker—in fact, I could not see General Walker's face. I saw a man with a tall hat, unless—unless General Walker put his hat on somebody else, it was him. But I saw him up at the head of the large mass of crowd—

Q. I didn't ask you that.

A. You asked me the last time, or the next time I saw him, and that's when I saw him.

Mr. Gooch: Just wait a minute.

By Mr. Andress:

Q. I asked when he stepped down, which way did he go around the monument?

A. I don't know.

[fol. 1654] Q. Now you then said after you crossed the street and moved away from there with the Reverend Gray, that you got up on some steps?

A. Yes, sir, I did.

Q. What steps did you get up on?

A. The steps of the YMCA building.

Q. Now you didn't see the General then from the time that you got off of the monument until you had walked back to get on the steps of the YMCA and that is where you had come from to begin with, wasn't it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And I believe that you said that when you came out of the YMCA there with the Reverend Gray, you could just see a figure down on the monument but you couldn't identify it?

A. You could see part—you could see that a person was standing up there but you couldn't tell—you couldn't tell if it was a man or a woman. You couldn't see until you got up close because—

Q. When you were there at the YMCA and starting down towards the monument, you could just see that there was somebody at the monument but you couldn't identify them?

A. Yes, sir, that's right.

Q. And you said that you couldn't identify them—who it was until you got up close and crowded in there into the [fol. 1655] first two or three feet?

A. That's right. I had never seen General Walker before.

Q. And then after you turned around and left and went back up to this same YMCA, from that point you could identify a white hat?

A. I could see a tall man in the front with a white hat, yes, sir.

Q. And outside of that, that was still just as difficult from the YMCA to identify people at a distance as it had been before, wasn't it, outside of the distinction of the white hat?

A. No, I am saying it was difficult to identify General Walker at the statue because the way the statue was standing and he was standing in front and you could only see part of—well, the state was in the way. You can see part of a man's arm, part of a man's legs standing but you couldn't see who the man was.

But when I was looking across the grove, I could see that white hat distinctly right out in front there. I couldn't miss that.

Q. Was that the only white hat on the campus, Mr. Proehl?

A. The only man I saw. There may have been—

Q. You, of course, don't really know whether or not [fol. 1656] there were a lot of white hats there or not, do you?

A. I didn't see any other white hats in that crowd, where the people were standing out there, sir.

Q. You mean there weren't any other white hats that came up there by the YMCA where you spent most of the evening?

A. Pardon?

Q. There wasn't any other white hats that came up by the YMCA where you spent most of the evening?

A. I don't remember.

Q. Actually then from the time you sent your wife and baby home and just a few minutes before Kennedy's speech before you went to the YMCA, you never left the YMCA to get around anywhere except the one time that you walked down to the monument and then right back to the YMCA?

A. That is right, I did not leave the Y to go anywhere else. I met Duncan Gray right on the steps of the Y and another man and we walked down to hear the man speak.

Q. Is Duncan Gray a pretty good friend of yours?

A. No, sir, I don't—the first time I met Duncan Gray was that night. I have never been to his church. I am not of his denomination.

Q. At the time you first came out on the steps of the YMCA there with Duncan Gray, there was already a figure up on the monument, wasn't there?

A. Yes, sir, a figure was on the monument.

[fol. 1657] Q. So that how long did it take you to walk—I guess it must be what? 200 feet from the Y down there?

A. A hundred fifty, 200 feet. At a normal pace, I wouldn't know how long it took me to walk. Just at a normal pace.

Q. Were you hurrying down to hear his speech?

A. I didn't run, no. I didn't run. We walked. We didn't run over there.

Q. Strolled down?

A. Strolled down, that's right.

Q. And when you got there the speech was already in progress, is that right?

A. Yes, sir, it was.

Q. And all you say that you heard is the couple of things that you have mentioned here?

A. There were a few more things that I heard. I heard him say that—first, he said, your Governor had sold you out and I heard 'em say, no, no, and then he bent down and he talked to a man with a suit on in front of the crowd there and he raised up and said, "Birdsong has sold you out," I remember that.

Q. Was that about the time the Reverend Duncan Gray tried to climb up on the monument?

A. I don't remember if that was exactly at the time or not. I distinctly remember him saying that, though.

[fol. 1658] Q. And was it after that that his attention was attracted to the Reverend Gray?

A. It was after that his attention was attracted—

Q. What was Reverend Gray doing to attract his attention?

A. Well, the Reverend Gray was standing alongside of me up against the statue here and he said, he said, "You can stop this if you will.

"You can stop this." And that's when the General said. . . .

Q. Now then you left there with the Reverend Gray at that time and was the General still on the monument?

A. I do not remember if the General was on the monument or not.

Like I said, we went over to help Duncan Gray. The crowd had started to surge forward and I heard people yell, "Kill him, kill him, kill him," and from what I—the noise and tumult and everything that night, I didn't know what was to happen and, to me, a member of the church is a member of the church, no matter what—I mean you don't want to see a man done bodily harm and from the way the crowd was worked up there, I didn't know what was going to happen.

Q. Did the Reverend Gray ever say anything to you about hearing the crowd say, "Kill him, kill him, kill him"?

A. I don't remember Reverend Gray saying that to me [fol. 1659] but I heard the crowd say, "Kill him, kill him, kill him."

Q. Where did you all take back to?

A. Back to the Y, and that's the last I saw of Reverend Gray. Got him up to the steps. I don't know if he went inside or not. I stood on the steps.

Q. You were one of the people who took him?

A. Yes, sir, I was one of the people who took him over there.

Q. Was the Deputy Sheriff there, one of the people that helped you?

A. I remember the Deputy Sheriff going over with us towards the small trees, I believe—I'm not sure but I believe he was the one that said somebody take care of him, help him. But I don't remember the Deputy Sheriff—I don't think but I'm not positive that he went back to the Y. He wasn't with me.

Q. Well, did you say to the Deputy Sheriff, "Well, I know this man. We'll take care of him."?

A. I don't recall saying that.

Q. Did somebody there in your little group that took Reverend Gray back to the Y?

A. Somebody may have. I'm not sure. I don't recall that.

Q. But you were taking over the protection of the Reverend Gray from the Sheriff?

[fol. 1660] A. I was helping. I was helping, yes.

Q. Was the crowd around the Marshals still indulging in good-natured fun at the time that you went to the Y to listen to the President's speech?

A. No, it had turned a little bit more than fun. In fact, I saw one student, I don't know who it was, there was some more Army trucks pulled up and I saw a student say, "There is a nigger in there," the truck driver, Corporal. And they broke the truck window and they grabbed a fire extinguisher off the side of the truck and they squirted it in the window and the colored boy got out the other door. I heard tires hissing. I didn't actually see any slashing of tires but you could hear air escaping from tires so I assumed that tires were being—

Q. You don't know whether they were just letting the air out of the tires or cutting them?

A. Well, they weren't letting air out; otherwise they would have been chased away by the police, sir.

Q. At that time the Highway Patrol was between the Marshals and the crowd, weren't they?

A. I remember seeing some of the Highway Patrol, yes, sir.

Q. And mostly the crowd was back across the drive from the Lyceum?

A. They were pushed back, they were pushed back across [fol. 1661] and then it would lax, the Marshals or so would lax their attention there and the crowd would come back and cross and then they would be pushed back again.

Q. And there was nothing else that you can think of that you saw there that night about the circumstances? Just more of the same?

A. Yes. Now when I—I didn't know how to get back home. I was thinking about cutting around the back of the campus but I had heard or I had seen some Marshals being in conflict, let's say, with students or with people out in the grove and I didn't want to take a chance so I raised my hands like this (indicating) and I said, "I haven't had a thing to do with it. I have been in here, I have got a wife and child at home and I want to get home to my family."

The Marshals said, "Come on. It's okay." They had their masks on. And the one took it off and said, "Come on." I didn't know what they were doing—what they were going to do with me but I wanted to get home and I was tired of all of it and I walked right through and the Marshals didn't do a single thing to me. In fact, one of them took off his mask, and said, "What's the matter? Those kids nuts or something?" And I said, "I guess so."

I kept on walking and I cut—

Mr. Watts: If Your Honor please, I don't believe this is responsive to the question and some place it has got to [fol. 1662] stop and I would object to it as hearsay.

The Court: Mr. Watts, Mr. Andress asked what else happened out there that night.

Mr. Watts: He's telling what the Marshals said not in the presence of any of the parties.

The Court: Well, I'm going to permit the witness to answer the question.

By Mr. Andress:

Q. Now tell me—

A. I am not done, sir. Pardon me.

The Court: Will you go ahead and finish.

A. After the Marshal made the remark to me, not a thing was done and I walked between the library and this other building and went home. That was it.

By Mr. Andress:

Q. Now you teach physical ed, you say, or work in Physical ed?

A. No, I assist in the Physical Education Department but I am going to be a Guidance Counselor.

Q. Well, you are in pretty good shape, aren't you, pretty good physical shape, now, aren't you?

A. Oh, well, for 29 years old, I think I am. I don't indulge too much in athletics.

Q. How long do you reckon it would take you to run from the monument back around the Fine Arts Building and into LeBuve Hall?

A. How long do I think it would take me to run from [fol. 1663] the monument to the Fine Arts Building?

Q. Around behind the Fine Arts Building, behind—Peabody. Peabody in through there?

A. Peabody and into LeBuve? I wouldn't—it all depended who was after me and why I was running, sir. I really couldn't say.

Q. You reckon you could run that far without stopping for a breath or something?

A. Yeah, I could run a lot further than that if I had to.

Q. Would you be out of breath by the time you made a roundtrip run in there and telephone and run back to the monument?

A. Well, I might have been but—but I might not have been.

Q. Do you think you would be able to do it eight or nine times?

A. I don't see the point—yeah, I probably could do it eight or nine times. I don't see your point in it but I probably could.

Mr. Andress: All right, that's all.

Mr. Gooch: Stand aside.

The Court: I'm going to release this witness, Gentlemen. I will let you go ahead and release you and you can [fol. 1664] go back.

Mr. Gooch: Do you want to start another witness?

The Court: No, it's too close to 12:00.

Ladies and Gentlemen, we will recess until 2:00 o'clock.

(Thereupon, at 11:50, a recess was taken until 2:00 o'clock, p.m., of the same day.)

[fol. 1665] Afternoon Session.

Doy L. Gorton, called as a witness by the Defendant, having been first duly sworn, testified as follows, to-wit:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Please state your name?
A. Doy L. Gorton.
Q. Where do you live?
A. Greenville, Mississippi.
Q. How old are you, Mr. Gorton?
A. Twenty-two.
Q. Are you now or have you been a student at the University of Mississippi at Oxford?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Were you on campus at any time during the day of September 30, 1962?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know about what time you got on campus that day?
A. Well, a little bit after 7:00 o'clock.
Q. Where had you come from that day?
A. From Greenville.
Q. Had you been home for the week-end?
A. No, I was working at Greenville.
[fol. 1666] Q. All right. Now, what attracted your—did anything attract your attention when you got on the campus that evening?
A. Yes, sir, as I got on the campus I drove in past the gym with some friends and I saw tear gas and I saw some police, Highway Patrolmen running away from the vicinity of the Lyceum Building.
Q. All right. At any time during that day, did you—or night—did you see General Edwin A. Walker?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Where was he when you first saw him?

A. He was right beside the Confederate monument near University Avenue.

Q. Did you go down where he was, or were you in the vicinity?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where had you been before, do you remember?

A. The Y Building, the YMCA.

Q. All right. Do you know how long you had been over in the YCMA Building, in that vicinity?

A. Been there about thirty, or maybe forty-five minutes.

Q. Had you been inside the YMCA, or not?

A. Yes, sir, I had.

Q. Do you say you saw him at or near the monument? [fol. 1667] Did you go in that direction?

A. Yes, sir, I did.

Q. Then what did you see him do, if anything?

A. Well, when I got to the monument, General Walker was standing on the base on one of these ledges of the monument, and there was a crowd all jammed up around him, and I stayed about ten or twenty feet back, and General Walker started speaking.

Q. What did he say that you heard?

A. Well, he told the students that they had a right to protest, that it was their constitutional right to protest like this, and that their constitutional rights were being infringed upon. He spoke for a few minutes about that and then he looked down and to his left and he saw a man standing there. I guess it was a man I recognized as a man named Duncan Gray, and he said, "This is an Episcopalian minister here and that makes me ashamed to be an Episcopalian." And people started yelling and screaming at this man, and they took him away, the minister. And after that he mentioned that we had been sold out. I think his exact words used were, "You have been sold out."

And everybody asked, "Who sold us out, who sold us out?" And he said—well, I don't think he remembered there for a minute, and he said,—asked somebody beside him, and he came back up and mentioned this Col. T. B. [fol. 1668] Birdsong, of the Mississippi Highway Patrol.

Q. Do you recall anything else he might have said?

A. He talked about Birdsong there for a minute and then seems like he looked straight ahead toward the University Avenue, and then he said a few more things about—most of these things were the kind of things like constitutional infringement and, keep up the protest, and then people started asking if anybody was going to help, if anybody was going to help the students at Ole Miss, and I didn't exactly hear what General Walker said, but I know he made them understand—

Mr. Andress: I object to what he made them understand, Judge.

The Court: You can't give your conclusion. Just tell what he said and what he did.

A. Well, he nodded and said something like this, yes, or at least in the affirmative.

Q. Then what, if anything, did he do, or was that the conclusion of his speech, Mr. Gorton?

A. He said some more things after that, mostly about the Constitution, and mostly about the troops being there, and something about Cuba and the "... troops should be in Cuba and shouldn't be," there at Ole Miss, and told—then he looked straight ahead toward University Avenue [fol. 1669] and started stepping down from the monument.

Q. Then what happened?

A. Then he—it seemed like he had a bunch—the crowd was very, very tight around the monument and they pushed around to the front of the monument, and then to the right of the monument as you look down University Avenue, then came back this way toward the Lyceum Building.

Q. Then what happened?

A. Then when I saw him, he was walking at what you would call sort of a brisk—not a real fast pace, toward the Lyceum Building.

Q. And what did the crowd that was there with him at the monument?

A. Well, when General Walker did this it seemed like he was responding to the crowd.

Mr. Andress: Just a minute.

The Witness: Is that a mistake?

Q. Strike that. Tell exactly what you saw.

A. The crowd let up a great big yell, a big whoop, and they started yelling for General Walker, and that attracted the attention of the people over here near the YMCA Building and Hume Hall, the Science Building being put up there, and the people to the left over here and the people to the right. They seemed to know it was General Walker, or at least that is what this crowd was doing. And General [fol. 1670] Walker went straight toward the Lyceum Building, maybe off to the right a little bit on the grass, I guess it was, and the students and everybody around them started moving in behind General Walker, or being drawn to this group here that was making all the noise and yelling rebel yells and cursing and screaming.

And I stood there for a minute and I saw students runing from as far away as Hume, and that area, trotting by me and running by me to catch up with the main body, or main crowd gathered around the General.

Q. Where did this crowd go that you said Walker was at the head of?

A. It headed toward the Lyceum Building, and they—when they got to that area, and the last time I saw General Walker was about three-fourths of the way to the flagpole from the statue. However, the Marshals, when they heard this big whoop—

Mr. Andress: Now, just a minute, if Your Honor please.

Q. Just tell what happened as they were proceeding toward the flagpole. What did the Marshals do?

A. Well, the Marshals shot off a tremendous volley of tear gas, which partially obscured the crowd, and then the people who were in the crowd, you could see them running up and throwing rocks and whatever they had in their [fol. 1671] hands, brick and running toward the Lyceum Building.

Q. What did you do?

A. I walked over toward the YMCA. I didn't go with the crowd.

Q. Did you see General Walker any more that night?

A. No, sir, I didn't.

Mr. Gooch: Your witness.

Cross examination.

By Mr. Watts:

Q. Where had you come from, Greenville?

A. Greenville, Mississippi, yes, sir.

Q. How did you come on the campus?

A. I came on in a car with some friends.

Q. Alone or with someone, when you approached the monument?

A. Oh, in the monument area? I was alone.

Q. Where was you going?

A. I was coming from the YMCA toward the monument.

Q. You were traveling, then, southeastward?

A. I am sorry, I think I am confused. You mean when I first came on the campus?

Q. No, when you saw Walker.

A. When I first saw Walker?

Q. Right.

[fol. 1672] A. Was at the memorial, the monument.

Q. Where were you coming from then?

A. From the YMCA.

Q. Step down to the plat there. That is Exhibit 11. Will you take the pointer.

Mr. Gooch: Right there on the base.

Q. Do you know which way is north?

A. North would be this way (indicating).

Q. Will you put your pointer on the YMCA?
A. Be right here (indicating).

The Court: Have to talk a little bit louder, you are facing away from the Reporter.

A. Yes, sir, the YMCA Building is right here.
Q. And the monument?
A. Right there (indicating).
Q. From which direction did you approach the YMCA?
A. I am sorry, sir, I didn't approach the YMCA. I approached the monument, is what your question was.
Q. When you came on campus, did you go to the YMCA, or not?
A. No, sir, when I first came on campus I was over here at the Union Curve, near the Library, near the Gymnasium, and as the night went on, I came through here and back through here to the Y.
Q. Now, you saw—you say you saw tear gas fired, there [fol. 1673] about 7:00?
A. No, sir, it was after 7:00 o'clock.
Q. Now, then, with respect to when the tear gas was fired, when did you make that trip you pointed out on the map?
A. The trip to the Y or the monument?
Q. No, sir, the trip from around behind the Lyceum.
A. Right through here and all through here?
Q. Right.
A. It took me thirty or forty-five minutes, all through this area, right in through here. Then I gradually wandered over in this part of the Circle here, where I could see the people running around.
Q. And did you go from there to the YMCA?
A. Yes, sir, I went from, I guess that is the northeast section of the Circle there over to the YMCA.
Q. You went from the YMCA directly to the monument where you saw General Walker?
A. Yes, sir, I was beside the Y for a while, and inside, then I heard this noise over there, and then I went over to the monument.

Q. How long were you inside the YMCA?

A. I was probably in there about twenty minutes or thirty minutes.

[fol. 1674] Q. Did you hear any noise while you were in there?

A. Yes, sir, there was firing going on the whole time I was inside.

Q. And when you came out, you walked from there down to where Walker was?

A. Yes, sir. He was at the monument here (indicating).

[fol. 1675] Q. Did you hear all of his speech on the monument?

A. No, sir, I didn't hear all of the speech.

Q. I believe you said the first you heard—you may take your seat now. Walker told the students they had a right to protest?

A. Yes.

Q. They had a Constitutional right to protest?

A. Yes.

Q. Then the next thing you saw that occurred, Reverend Gray tried to get on the monument?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And was pulled down?

A. Somebody seemed to knock him down from there, yes, sir.

Q. Oh, he was knocked down?

A. Pulled down or knocked down, yes, sir.

Q. Did you notice a big heavy-set Sheriff there with a badge on?

A. No, sir, I didn't.

Q. You don't know whether he helped him get down or not?

A. No, sir, I don't.

Q. And then Reverend Gray was taken away?

A. I assume so, yes, sir.

Q. So it would have been impossible then for Reverend [fol. 1676] Gray to have heard the things that you have testified to after these two statements that you have a right to protest under the Constitution—

Mr. Gooch: If the Court please, I object to that as improper cross examination.

Mr. Watts: I will change the terms of that question.

The Court: Don't answer that question.

By Mr. Watts:

Q. Was Reverend Gray in a position to where, with normal human hearing, he could have heard the things and statements you have related which occurred after he was pulled down from the monument?

The Court: Mr. Watts, I won't permit this witness to testify as to whether somebody else could have heard it.

Mr. Watts: I understand.

The Court: The only point, what he heard and saw.

By Mr. Watts:

Q. Going back to the point when Reverend Gray was taken away, all of the things you have testified to that were said except that they had a right to protest and had that right under the Constitution, were said after Reverend Gray was taken away, is that right?

A. I'm sorry, sir, would you repeat that, please, sir.

Mr. Watts: Would you read it?

(Record read.)

[fol. 1677] A. After Reverend Gray was taken away, the things that I remember was the thing about Col. Birdsong and then the thing about Cuba, I believe and the—

Q. Did or did not General Walker say that Governor Barnett had betrayed the people of Mississippi, did you hear that?

A. No, sir, I'm sorry, I didn't.

Q. Did or did not you hear General Walker say, "But don't let up now"?

A. I don't remember hearing that, sir.

Q. "You may lose this battle but you will have been heard," did he say anything like that that you heard?

A. There is some doubt about that, I'd be afraid to answer it. Something about being heard around the world or, keep up the protest because you will be heard around the world."

Q. Well, you have not testified that you heard him say anything about being prepared for possible death, did you?

A. No, sir, I didn't hear anything like that.

Q. Now that, to you, would be a very dramatic statement, wouldn't it?

A. Yes, sir, I think it would be.

Q. And you heard nothing like that at all?

A. I didn't hear it, no, sir.

[fol. 1678] Q. Did you hear then the remainder of this alleged statement, "You must be prepared for possible death. If you are not, go home now?"

A. No, sir, I didn't hear that statement.

Q. Would you say he did or did not say that?

A. I'm sorry. I really couldn't say.

Q. Did you read the Savell report of this that came out on the 3rd of October, 1962?

A. I really couldn't say. I don't know what the Savell report—is that the AP report?

Q. Right.

A. I don't know if it was in the paper or not, which paper I read.

Q. Have you at any time since that and prior to the trial of this lawsuit seen that alleged report?

A. No, sir, I haven't.

Q. Well, anyhow, you didn't hear Savell say anything like that?

A. Savell?

Q. As you were. Walker say anything like that?

A. No, sir, I didn't.

Q. All right. Now when Walker finished his speech, as I understand, he got down from the monument?

A. Yes, sir, he did.

Q. Will you please step back up to the chart, take your [fol. 1679] pointer? Would you point out to the jury please, sir, what direction he went after he got down from the monument?

A. The monument's here and when he got down, he went this direction (indicating).

Q. About how far?

A. About maybe 10 feet.

Q. You are sure?

A. Five to ten feet, in that area.

Q. You are sure of that?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Positive?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. All right, sir. And what did he do when he got five or ten feet to the southeastward of the monument?

A. Five feet here, and then he would—then he turned back toward the Lyceum.

Q. Did he stop and talk to anyone before he turned toward the Lyceum?

A. The crowd was there so I would say he may have talked to somebody, he may have talked to people to his left and to his right, then he started walking directly toward the Lyceum Building.

Q. How closer to him were you at that time?

A. Within about 10 feet.

Q. Did you follow him to the westward?

[fol. 1680] A. To the what, sir?

Q. To the westward?

A. I followed him—you mean did I follow him this way (indicating)?

Q. What way is that?

A. I guess that's west. Is that what you mean, yes, sir. I followed him about six or eight feet here and then cut over towards the YMCA.

Q. Now from the time he stepped down and went southward until he passed the point you have marked and you left, did you see him stop and talk to anyone?

A. No, sir, I didn't.

Q. He just kept right on moving?

A. It seemed like he was walking with sort of a brisk pace there, kind of a military pace.

Q. Was he, do you know—have you ever had military training?

A. ROTC, yes, sir.

Q. You know what a cadence is, don't you?

A. Yes, sir, I do.

Q. Was he in cadence?

A. It was pretty much, pretty close to that.

Q. So, marching along there in cadence, General Walker would not have had time to stop and talk to anyone from the time he got down from the monument until you last [fol. 1681] saw him, would he?

A. Probably not. I just couldn't say.

Q. All right, sir. Take the stand. Did anyone ask him during that interval between the time he got down and the time you last saw him to, "Lead us in a charge"?

A. Yes, sir, people were screaming all over the place for him to lead them.

Q. Was that the big whoop that you heard?

A. That was one of the whoops that I heard, yes, sir.

Q. Repeat that whoop to us, what kind of noise it was?

A. A Rebel yell.

Q. Was it a Rebel yell?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Well, you can repeat it in a very low voice?

A. No, sir, I really don't think you can repeat it in a very low voice.

Q. In other words, a Rebel yell is a Rebel yell?

A. I'm afraid so, yes, sir.

Q. And that stuck out heavily in your memory, that there was a regulation Rebel yell after the speech on the monument?

A. On there of the best I ever heard, sir.

Q. And that started off the charge?

A. Yes, sir.

[fol. 1682] Q. And from that time on, nobody was thinking about talking to anybody else, were they?

A. I don't believe so.

Q. Did you hear anyone walk up to General Walker and say, "General, will you lead us in a charge?"

And the General said in a low voice, "Yes, I will"?

A. No, sir.

Q. That didn't happen, did it?

A. I just couldn't say, sir.

Q. Well, you would have heard it, as close as you were?

A. With the Rebel yell, sir?

Q. After the Rebel yell?

A. They were going on all the time.

Q. Oh, a constant Rebel yell?

A. A roar.

Q. Were you yelling any?

A. No, sir.

Q. Had you yelled any at all that night?

A. No, sir.

Q. You hadn't participated in any way?

A. No, sir.

Q. The operation didn't have your sympathy then?

A. No, sir.

Q. What organizations do you belong to, son?

[fol. 1683] A. None, sir.

Q. None at all?

A. No, sir.

Q. Have you ever received any money for activities in connection with your work on the campus?

A. What work, sir?
Q. Any work?
A. No, sir.
Q. You have received no money or no contributions from anyone?
A. No, sir.
Q. On the campus. Do you know one Van H. Savell?
A. No, sir, I don't.
Q. Do you know who he is?
A. You said something about the Savell report. I believe that's the AP newsman, is that correct?
Q. Right. You have never seen him?
A. No, sir, I haven't.
Q. Do you know anyone who purports to know him?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who?
A. I believe some of the lawyers that I have spoken to know Van Savell.
Q. Which ones?
A. Mr. Smith, I believe.
[fol. 1684] Q. That is, the lawyers in this case?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What did they tell you about Van Savell?
A. We never discussed Van Savell.
Q. Did you discuss the fact that Van Savell made a report that General Walker arrived on the campus, met the leaders of the mob, assumed command and led a charge before his speech on the monument?
A. I'm sorry, would you repeat that?

Mr. Watts: Sure. Repeat it to him.

(Record read.)

A. Before his speech?

By Mr. Watts:

Q. Right.
A. No, sir.

Q. If such a charge had been led and had occurred prior to the speech on the monument, from the position you were, you would undoubtedly seen or heard something of it, wouldn't you?

A. No, sir, I was—I don't really know when it happened but I was outside the Lyceum there for quite sometime.

Q. How long were you outside?

A. I am sorry, I meant the YMCA. I didn't mean the Lyceum.

Q. How long were you outside the YMCA before you saw [fol. 1685] General Walker on the monument?

A. About 10 minutes, 15 minutes, perhaps.

Q. Tell the jury exactly where you were, what direction you were looking and what you saw during that 15-minute interval before you saw General Walker.

Stand up there at the board with your pointer and brief the jury.

A. Before I saw General Walker, before I saw General Walker, sir?

Q. Right.

A. After I walked out of the YMCA?

Q. Right.

A. Well, I was standing right here in this area right here beside the YMCA and I was looking over mostly in this area through here (indicating).

There seemed to be like there was a lot of people coming on the campus that weren't students at that time and I wanted to know who they were, what they were doing there and then there was a lot of noise over in this area right through here, too, right in through there, there was a constant charge, people running up there and you could see them if you looked through here, you could probably see a few people running up there every once in a while or maybe large groups run up and there was a constant din of a battle going on plus the people over in this area [fol. 1686] right through here, is pretty much what I saw (indicating).

Q. Was Walker standing or moving when you first saw him?

A. When I first saw him, he was just getting up on the monument.

Q. You don't know then where he had come from?

A. No, sir, I don't.

Q. Do you know where LeBuve Hall is?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know where LeBuve Hall is?

A. LeBuve is a men's dormitory. It's down here, I believe.

Q. Within the period that you were standing at the YMCA, would a man have time to run from LeBuve Dormitory over to the flagpole, if you know?

Mr. Gooch: Just a minute. If the Court please—

Mr. Watts: Well—

The Court: Mr. Watts, I will permit him to give distance and things like that but I won't permit him to testify as to what somebody else might have done.

By Mr. Watts:

Q. All right, sir. Do you know how far it is from the monument to LeBuve Hall, going around behind the YMCA and the Fine Arts Building?

A. Going behind the YMCA through here, sir? I know roughly what the distance is.

[fol. 1687] Q. About 600 yards, isn't it?

A. Probably something like that.

Mr. Watts: That's all.

Mr. Gooch: That's all.

Stand aside. Thank you.

The Court: I will release you, sir.

Mr. Gooch: Call Mr. Travis Buckley.

TRAVIS BUCKLEY, called as a witness by the Defendant, having been first duly sworn, testified as follows, to-wit:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Please state your name.
A. I am Travis Buckley.
Q. Where do you live, Mr. Buckley?
A. I live in Louin, Mississippi, and I practice law down at Bay Springs, just south of Louin.
Q. Spell "Louin".
A. L-o-u-i-n.
Q. And you practice law at Bay Springs?
A. Yes, sir, I practice law. That's in Jasper County.
Q. Do you hold any public office there?
A. Yes, sir, I am County Prosecuting Attorney of Jasper County.
Q. When did you become the County Prosecuting Attorney?
[fol. 1688] A. I was elected in August of last year and took office in January, the 6th, of this year, on January the 6th.
Q. All right. Did you run for office?
A. Yes, sir, it was an elective office.
Q. All right. How old are you, Mr. Buckley?
A. Twenty-nine years of age.
Q. Are you a married man?
A. Yes, sir, I am married and have two children, two girls.
Q. Do you hold any other office or positions in your home town?
A. Yes, sir, in Louin I am General Superintendent of the Sunday School and a Sunday School teacher, also.
Q. In what church?
A. In the Convention Baptist Church.
Q. All right. Were you a student in the University of Mississippi on September the 30th, 1962?

A. Yes, sir, I was at that time.

Q. Was that your last year?

A. Well, yes, sir, that was my last semester. I graduated in the following January.

Q. Yes, sir. Did you happen to be on the campus of Ole Miss on September the 30th, of 1962?

A. Yes, sir, I was on the campus during part of the [fol. 1689] day, part of the night, rather.

Q. Had you been down to Jackson to the football game?

A. No, sir, I had not. I had been to Memphis. A friend's home that day.

Q. Did you live on the campus with your wife?

A. Yes, sir, I lived on the campus with my wife. My wife was not on the campus at the time. We had housing facilities—

Q. Did you have any military training?

A. Yes, sir, I spent two years in the United States Army, 15 months of which were spent in Korea, 1957 and '8.

Q. All right. Now tell me about what time—well, let's shorten this thing up. Were you around the Lyceum Building when the tear gas was fired that evening?

A. Yes, sir, when a great deal of it was fired, I was.

Q. Were you there when the first outburst occurred?

A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know where you were?

A. No, sir. I presume I was on my way home from Memphis but I'm not positive as to where I was.

Q. In other words, tear gas had already been fired when you got back to the campus?

A. Yes, sir, it had, a great deal of it.

[fol. 1690] Q. All right. Now, during the course of that evening, did you see General Edwin A. Walker on that campus?

A. Yes, sir, I did see him.

Q. Where was he when you saw him, Mr. Buckley?

A. When I first saw him, he was in the vicinity of the area which is called the grove, just beyond or, rather, just east of the monument.

Q. All right. Now describe, if you will, please, sir, what action he took and what he said that you heard from the time you first saw him.

A. Well, it first drew my attention by the fact several students commented on the fact that General Walker was in the vicinity.

I asked them where he was and several would say, "Well, he was right there a minute ago," but after a while I did see him and shortly thereafter, the students began to holler or yell, "Speak to us, General Walker."

And after having done that several times, General Walker—the students—or, rather, the students and people around—maybe not all of them were students—said, that he mounted the lower rim of the monument on the—that's the east side of it—and made from there a speech.

Q. Did you hear that speech?

A. Yes, I heard it.

Q. Will you try to recall as best you can the things you [fol. 1691] heard General Walker say in the speech that night.

A. Yes, sir, I will. I don't know that this would be in sequence he said the speech but as—after he mounted the monument, he said, "If there be any bloodshed, let it be on the hands of the Federal Government."

And he said, "This is the long way to Cuba."

Somewhere in around that time, the Reverend Duncan Gray appeared and asked General Walker to stop this; he said, "You can stop this because the boys think you are on their side. Please stop it."

Several of the students—well, General Walker said, "I am ashamed of the fact to admit I am an Episcopalian and belong to the same church that this man does."

He was an Episcopalian minister.

And several students said, "Kill him, get the traitor out of here."

Some of the crowd began to hit, or rather hit at, strike at, and grab Reverend Duncan Gray and when they did, two or three of the boys stepped in and asked them to stop it and led him away. One of them, I believe, was a very large man and he and another student—or he and another individual—whether he was a student or not—led him away.

There were several students had their hands on him, leading him away to begin with, but as it finally turned [fol. 1692] out, I believe there was only two.

But at any rate, he resumed after that, he said that, I believe, he said this was a long way to Cuba. He said, "You are exercising your Constitutional right to protest by your presence here."

And he said, "You are exercising a Constitutional right by protesting this unconstitutional mandate of the Federal Court in putting Mr. Meredith in."

At that time several students began to holler and jeer in a rather sarcastic manner, "Mr. Meredith, Mr. Meredith."

And of course, during most of the rest of it, the atmosphere seemed to be congenial to General Walker. That was the only jeers I heard then.

Shortly thereafter, a minute or two, lapses, maybe more, General Walker went around one side of the statue or the monument and I walked around the other side. I was standing on the southeastern side of it. He went around —I believe he went around to the northeastern side of the—anyway, the next I saw him, he was on the other side of the monument.

Q. What do you mean "the other side"?

A. The other side would have been the west side.

Q. All right.

A. And several students or a good many of those present [fol. 1693] began to yell, "Lead us on, General Walker. Be our leader," and made that remark several times.

And after a minute, General Walker nodded his head and said, "All right, all right, I will."

And the students gathered around him and he proceeded toward the Lyceum, I believe, or what is the Lyceum Building, toward the flagpole at any rate. A good many students were around him.

And as it turned out, a lot of them had rocks, were throwing in the general direction of the United States Marshals, and they proceeded on up for, I suppose, at least 250 yards, or more, toward the Lyceum Building, at which time I turned to the left and toward my apartment in Veterans Village. That would be south.

And General Walker veered to the north. How far he went after that, I don't know. I lost sight of him shortly because it was dark and there was also a great concentration of tear gas.

It was not very dark but there was some light but still it was dark enough that I could see—

Q. Did you see General Walker any more?

A. No, sir, I didn't.

Mr. Gooch: Your witness.

Cross examination.

By Mr. Andress:

[fol. 1694] Q. Mr. Buckley, you say the first time you saw General Walker, he was east of the monument?

A. Yes, sir, he was east of the monument.

Q. How long was it before he got up on the monument to make his speech?

A. Well, after I first saw him, it was only a short period of time. Oh, I would say five minutes, maybe a little longer.

Q. And he stayed over there east of the monument for that five minutes?

A. Well, sir, now I don't exactly recall. He was walking around, commenting to several students. There was a bunch of them trying to get to him and talk to him at the time. They were yelling, hollering, "Here is General Walker. Speak to us."

Q. Was he just kind of milling around through the crowd?

A. Well, yes—the crowd was milling around him, you might say more properly, yes, sir.

Q. He was moving around a little, wasn't he?

A. Well, he was moving around a little.

Q. Folks coming up to him and shaking hands and introducing themselves to him?

A. Well, they were shaking hands with him. Whether or not they were introducing themselves to him, I don't know.

[fol. 1695] Q. But from the time you first saw him until the time he got up on the monument, it was about five minutes, you would say, then?

A. Well, I would say approximately. But of course, this has been a long time and I don't remember the exact length of time or anywhere near, but I would say approximately five minutes, yes, sir.

Q. All right. Now before you first saw General Walker where had you been for the preceding, oh, let's say, 30 minutes?

A. I had been—well, I came on the campus off of Highway 6—I believe it is Highway 6. Anyway, through Sorority Row, approximately 45 minutes to maybe as much as an hour and a half before, and I had proceeded slowly in the direction of my apartment in which I was going to—in Veterans Village.

Q. Well, how long had you been, shall we say, in the circle area prior to the time you saw General Walker?

A. I had not been in the circle area prior to that time.

Q. How did you get down to the monument? What was your path?

A. I walked from the Law School down behind the Fine Arts Building, behind the Y, and then across to the Y Building and then across to the area just south—I mean [fol. 1696] just east of the monument.

Q. So you hadn't been on or within sight of the circle up until just before you saw General Walker?

A. Well, within sight of it, yes, I had been, but not in the circle.

Q. Well, how long had you been in sight of the circle, then, let's say that?

A. Well, I would say before I saw General Walker, approximately 15 minutes, not more—

Q. During that 15 minutes, did you—well, of course, you had seen General Walker then until that time, so you didn't see General Walker lead a charge of a thousand people across the circle, did you?

A. At which time are you speaking, sir?

Q. Before he made his speech from the monument?

A. No, sir, I did not.

Q. And you were in such a position that if there had been a charge of a thousand people before he made his speech from the monument across that circle, you would have seen it, wouldn't you?

A. No, sir, I would not have seen it.

Q. You would not have seen it?

A. No, sir, I would not have.

Q. You mean a thousand people could have moved across the circle without it attracting your attention?

[fol. 1697] A. Why, very easily, because of the fact I was behind the Y Building and in the vicinity of the Law School. I could only just vaguely see the circle area, which there was a great concentration of tear gas at the time.

Q. Do you know what time of day it was or what time of night, I should say, when you first saw General Walker?

A. No, sir, I do not. I know that I came on campus somewhere around 8:00 o'clock. It could have been earlier, it could have been later.

Q. Did you hear the President's speech?

A. No, sir.

Q. How long a speech did he make?

A. General Walker's speech, I presume?

Q. Yes.

A. Well, sir, I would say that the speech itself and the things that happened in connection with it, like Duncan Gray, Reverend Duncan Gray coming up, probably took 10 minutes—not much more.

Q. Well, you would call it a short speech, wouldn't you?

A. Yes—I wouldn't hardly consider it a speech, in a sense. It was just a group of comments.

Q. Uh-huh. And that was done in response to demands that he talk to them or say something to the crowd?

A. Well, he did it in response to—when the students [fol. 1698] kept yelling, "Speak to us," yes, sir.

Q. Do you know when that was with reference to the Highway Patrol leaving?

A. It was shortly after.

Q. Did you hear—

A. In fact, I arrived just about the time the Highway Patrol came through, just about that time.

Q. Did you hear a bunch of comments there, cries through the air that, "Ross has sold us out"?

A. I don't remember having heard that. I do remember the General, General Walker, one of the first things, I believe one of the first things he said when he got on the monument was that, "I understand that one of your State leaders sold us out. I just returned from a meeting downtown where I learned that."

And the best I remember, he didn't know who it was at that time and he leaned over to a boy in the crowd—the students and other persons there began asking who. He leaned over to the boy in the crowd and whispered something in his ear, or it appeared it was, and he straightened back up and said, "It's Col. Birdsong."

[fol. 1699] Q. Now, you said something nobody else had mentioned here about "unconstitutional mandate of the Federal Court"?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Are you definitely sure you heard the General say "Unconstitutional mandate of the Federal Court"?

A. Yes, sir, I am absolutely positive that that was the essence of the words. I don't attempt to recite any of it verbatim.

Q. You don't know whether he used the words "Unconstitutional mandate of the Federal Court"?

A. Well, sir, of course, those are legal words that I would term in my own phraseology, but it was to that effect. I am certain the word unconstitutional—the word "unconstitutional" was used. As to whether he said mandate or order, I wouldn't—I don't distinctly remember that.

Q. In other words, when you used the term "unconstitutional mandate of the Federal Court," that was an impression or conclusion you got from what he said?

A. No, sir, it was not an impression or conclusion that I got from what he said in the sense that I think you are referring to. It was words to that effect. I may have gotten them out of order, but—or I may not have used the exact words, but I haven't changed them in any material way.

[fol. 1700] Q. How close were you to him?

A. I was within two or three feet of him in distance. Close enough I could have touched him, most of the time.

Q. Now, then, I gather from statements we have heard here that there must have been quite a large number of people within two or three feet of him?

A. Yes, sir, there were. They were just as close around the monument as they could pack.

Q. And if he used the term "unconstitutional mandate of the Federal Court," it was sufficiently audible that anybody around there could have heard it, couldn't they?

A. Yes, sir, I think so, very definitely.

Q. Let's see. He got off the monument, and which side of the monument did he go on to get away?

A. Well, sir, I don't believe I said. I said I thought he went over to the north side. I don't know for sure. But I think he did. I know I went on the south side.

Q. You went on the south side?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And went on the opposite side?

A. I don't know that he went on the opposite side, but [fol. 1701] I think he did.

Q. Now, after he went around the monument there you say he stopped and talked to some people?

A. No, sir, I don't believe I said that. But the students started talking to him, or rather yelled to him to "lead us, be our leader".

Q. Was there a group that stood there and talked to him briefly?

A. Well, I don't recall any groups standing there talking to him. I don't see how they could have talked under the circumstances. There was too much hollering and yelling going on.

Q. Were there rebel yells going on?

A. Well, I frankly don't know what you mean by "rebel yell".

Q. You don't know what a rebel yell is?

A. No, sir, I really—I really don't.

Q. Where were you born, Mr. Buckley?

A. I was born in Mississippi, south central Mississippi, Jasper County.

Q. And where did you go to school?

A. Ole Miss.

Q. Where did you grow up and go to high school?

A. Stringer, Mississippi.

Q. And how long had you been at Ole Miss?

[fol. 1702] A. Three years almost. Be about two and a half years.

Q. And you don't know what a rebel yell is?

A. Well, I have heard different yells that were supposed to be rebel yells. I don't have any idea what they are referring to.

Q. Well, at any rate, you didn't hear things you would refer to as rebel yells when the General got down from the monument?

A. Well, I heard all manner of yells, noises, cursing, and talking at the Marshals and Federal authorities. Cursing them. And I just heard all kinds of noises. Frankly, I don't see how anyone there under the circumstances could make a sentence out of any of it.

Q. Well, what were these jeers you heard?

A. The only jeers I had heard, I believe I repeated a while ago, was when—rather—other than those directed at the Marshals—

Q. I mean the ones you heard directed at General Walker?

A. The only ones I heard directed at General Walker was when he said, when he referred to James Meredith as "Mr. Meredith".

Q. Oh, he called him Mr. Meredith?

A. Yes, sir.

[fol. 1703] Q. And that got jeers from the crowd?

A. Yes, sir, there were jeers, repeated it several times, "Mr. Meredith, Mr. Meredith".

Q. What kind of jeers were they?

A. They were just bad. "Mr. Meredith, Mr. Meredith," and the kids were hollering, "Oh-h-h-h," like that.

Q. Sort of a boo or something of that sort?

A. Well, I suppose you could call it boos, yes, sir.

Q. Did you hear the General say violence is not the answer?

A. No, sir, I didn't. I believe the statement I made a while ago was what I heard him say, about peace or violence, was that if there was any violence or bloodshed, let it be on the hands of the Federal Government.

Q. And when was that with reference to the time you heard the boos or jeers?

A. I don't remember the sequence of events that distinctly, frankly.

Q. Now, your deposition has been taken in this case on the 5th of February, 1964?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And at that time didn't you say that General Walker walked off on the opposite side of the statue from where he [fol. 1704] was standing, a few feet from me, and walked around on the opposite side, and I believe he talked to a member of the group briefly."

A. Well, I believe he did. And I also said in my deposition these statements were general and I don't intend to be specific on any of them.

Q. Well, we are asking you to be as specific as you can.

A. Well, I will.

Q. You are a lawyer and you understand what we mean by being specific in a question.

A. I was as specific as I possibly could be.

Q. Also, didn't you say, I believe, he had some students with him around there, and some of them started hollering, "Lead us and be our leader,"?

A. Yes, sir, he said that.

Q. Well, now, how long would you say he talked to some members of that group there?

A. I don't believe I said he talked to any particular member of the group. I said they were around him talking to him.

Q. Did he start to walk off away from the group?

A. Not that I recall, no, sir. He walked away in the group with him as he led the charge up toward the Marshals, I mean up toward the Lyceum.

[fol. 1705] Q. What was his gait?

A. Well, it was rather brisk, I will say.

Q. Did you ever see him run?

A. No, I didn't see him run.

Q. Now, I believe you said that—did he go over there to the, right along the walk, up through the center of the Circle, or did he go off to the north?

A. Well, at what time, now? Eventually he went off to the north, yes, sir.

Q. Where was he when he went off to the north?

A. He was—when I last saw him he was headed north, but was just a piece south of the—well, I would say south and east of the flagpole.

Q. East of the flagpole?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. That is the last time you saw him?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How far east of the flagpole would you say he was when you last saw him?

A. Well, it would only be a rough estimate. I would say fifty feet.

Q. Fifty feet east of the flagpole?

A. Maybe a little further.

Q. That was the last time you saw him?

A. Yes, sir, he turned—I saw him shortly after that, but [fol. 1706] that was the point he turned. I turned one way and he turned the other.

Q. Which way did he turn?

A. He turned north, slightly north.

Q. Did anybody have ahold of him?

A. Not at that time. Now, there had been before, at the time he left the area of the monument. They had their hands around him or on him.

Q. This, of course, was all after the speech, wasn't it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did I understand you to say he went 250 yards towards the Lyceum?

A. No, sir, I said approximately 250 feet. Or that is what I intended to say.

Q. Then, when he turned off when you were fifty feet east of the flagpole, and he turned off, which direction did he turn?

A. North or northwest.

Q. You turned south?

A. Yes, south or west—southwest.

Q. Is that the last time you saw him?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, where—all the time you saw General Walker there were there a lot of students telling him what had hap- [fol. 1707] pened, asking him questions, urging him to do things and so on?

A. Sir, I was only close to General Walker at the time he was making the speech and at the time he started toward the Lyceum Building and I don't know of any conversation, personal conversation that was carried on with him. I don't think anyone could have, under the circumstances, as much noise and confusion as there was.

Q. But you did hear him say up there one time when they were yelling at him to lead them, you did hear him say, "Riot, riot," sir?

A. No, I don't remember that. I don't recall it.

Mr. Andress: All right. That is all.

Mr. Gooch: That is all.

The Court: I am going to excuse this witness.

KINGSBY KINGSLEY, called as a witness by the Defendant, having been first duly sworn, testified on his oath as follows, to-wit:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Please state your name?

A. Kingsby Kingsley.

Q. Where do you live, Mr. Kingsley?

A. Memphis, Tennessee.

[fol. 1708] Q. How old are you?

A. Thirty-five.

Q. What do you do for a living?

A. Reporter for The Memphis Commercial Appeal.

Q. Where were you born?

A. Tupelo, Mississippi.

Q. Did you attend any schools in Mississippi?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Which ones?

A. East Tupelo High School and University of Mississippi.

Q. Did you graduate from the University of Mississippi?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. When?

A. 1953.

Q. All right. Now, were you working—what did you say, the Memphis Appeal?

A. The Memphis Commercial Appeal.

Q. Memphis Commercial Appeal, on September 30, 1962?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you have occasion to be in Oxford, Mississippi on any time on September 30, 1962?

A. Yes, sir.

[fol. 1709] Q. Do you remember when you got there prior to September 30, 1962?

A. You mean that particular day?

Q. Yes, sir.

A. About 2:30 in the morning, between 2:00 and 2:30 in the morning.

Q. That was on Sunday morning, September 30?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you remember where you were staying?

A. At the Henry Hotel.

Q. All right. At any time during that day did you see General Walker?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where?

A. At the Mansion, a restaurant uptown, then he had a press conference in this parking lot, or in the middle of the Ole Miss Motel down on Highway 6.

Q. Did you cover that?

A. Yes, sir, I did.

Q. Now, after the news conference did you thereafter see General Walker?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Give us an account of that, please.

A. It was later this night that I had come back—we had gone in—we had rooms in the hotel, and we had written [fol. 1710] some stories that afternoon and sent them out at Western Union, and then we made arrangements to get back on the campus that night, and then we made arrangements—and I went on about between 6:00 and 6:30, and we had been working all night in different areas of the campus, and it was around 9:00 or sometime there that I saw General

Walker coming on the campus, walking down in front of the Journalism Building.

Q. Where were you at that time?

A. This was on—I was almost in front of the Journalism Building on the sidewalk.

Q. Did you recognize General Walker at that time?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was he doing?

A. He was walking down the sidewalk toward the Circle and the Lyceum.

Q. Where did you—did you have any conversation with him?

A. No, sir, I was en route to the telephone that we were trying to use in the building, and I saw the General and some other people walking toward the Lyceum. I saw him wave his arms to some other people. By this time there were a good many students on the side of the street. He waved his arms and he said something to the effect, "Come on . . . "— [fol. 1711] Mr. Andress: Just a minute, we will object to the effect.

The Court: Unless you are using the exact words—

The Witness: He waved his arms and motioned to these people to come on with him.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. All right, did you stop there at that time, or did you keep going to the Journalism Building?

A. I turned around and watched them as they proceeded on down, then I went in. I was using the 'phone inside the Journalism Building.

Q. How long would you say you were in the Journalism Building, Mr. Kingsley?

A. I would say anywhere from thirty-five to forty-five minutes. I am not sure of the exact number of minutes. Time didn't really mean too much at this particular time.

Q. Did you then come back from the—come back to the campus from the Journalism Building, after you got your 'phone call through?

A. Well, the Journalism Building is on the campus.

Q. I mean, did you come back toward the Circle, is what I am trying to say.

A. Yes, sir.

[fol. 1712] Q. Did you see General Walker when you got back to the Circle?

A. I saw the General in the Circle close to, or—there is a monument right at the edge of it, and I saw him about fifteen or twenty feet toward the Lyceum Building, off to the left at that time, yes, sir.

Q. And what was he doing?

A. He, and there was just a mass of people in this area, and they were proceeding up toward the flagpole and trees, up toward the Lyceum Building at that time.

Q. When they got up a distance there do you know what happened?

A. Well, they got pretty close to the flagpole, and then in the tree area the United States Marshals fired another series or round or rounds of tear gas, and they retreated back.

Q. Did you see General Walker there after that night?

A. At this particular time I was—I saw him behind a—as they retreated, then they got behind the trees and after that I may have seen him somewhere during the night, but General Walker was just one—I was covering other things, and was not really concerned with his activities.

Mr. Gooch: You may have the witness.

[fol. 1713] Cross examination.

By Mr. Watts:

Q. You were coming east along University Avenue when you first saw Walker?

A. East is toward Oxford, yes, sir.

Q. Take the pointer please and step up to the map and identify the location. First, put your pointer on the statue. Now, locate the journalism building. Keep coming. A little more.

A. Right in here?

Q. No, it is down below that. Can you read the letters on the building there?

A. Journalism Building. Here it is.

Q. All right. Now, at exactly what point were you when you saw Walker?

A. I was on the sidewalk, and I would say I was about fifteen feet—it would be west of the walkway to go up to the Journalism Building.

Q. Were you on the north or south side of the sidewalk?

A. I was on the street—toward the street. I don't know whether that would be north or south.

Q. Which way is the top of the map?

A. I would presume that would be north, and I would be—[fol. 1714] Q. All right, sir?

A. On this side of the sidewalk (indicating).

Q. You, then, were on the north side of the sidewalk?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. On the left side of the sidewalk going east?

A. Going east it would be the left, yes, sir.

Q. And General Walker was walking on his left side of the sidewalk going west?

A. He was walking on the side of the sidewalk going toward—well, he would be on this side here (indicating), and I was coming back up on this side. He would be down on this side, or maybe in the middle of the sidewalk. He wasn't—it wasn't all that large.

Q. Just a regular GI sidewalk?

A. Yes, sir, just a regular street sidewalk.

Q. And you were walking east on the north side of the sidewalk?

A. Yes, sir, back toward the Oxford area, yes.

Q. And Walker was walking westward on the left side of the sidewalk?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. So, you were both meeting each other on the left side of the sidewalk, rather than on the right side?

A. We were both meeting, I mean, on the walk, the [fol. 1715] sidewalk. You just automatically meet. I mean he would be—I would be on the street side and he was on the Journalism, or grass side, this side of the sidewalk (indicating).

Q. Do you ordinarily walk on the left side of a sidewalk when you go anywhere?

A. I don't even remember how I walked on the sidewalk.

Q. The question, sir, do you ordinarily walk on the left side of the sidewalk, or the right?

A. I think I walk on the left.

Q. How do you drive your automobile?

A. I—

Q. Do you drive on the right side of the road, or the left?

A. The left.

Q. Left. Were you raised in England?

A. No, sir. You drive on the right side, in an automobile.

Q. All right. And did you walk on the left side of the sidewalk?

A. I think I did.

Q. And you think General Walker, being a soldier, normally would occupy the left side of a sidewalk?

A. I think General Walker, at this particular time, was [fol. 1716] going down the sidewalk and I wouldn't say, just two or three feet this way or two or three feet the other way, no, sir.

Q. Okay, take your seat. Walker waved to them to come on, you say?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who is "them"?

A. People on—he was walking down the sidewalk and there were people up on automobiles, sitting on the sides of cars, and that kind of stuff, yes.

Q. Now, would they be on the left or right side of the sidewalk?

A. Sir?

Q. The ones he waved to?

A. They were people sitting on cars, they were out in the grass. I mean, they would be on both sides. The cars were on the street side.

Q. Well, how do you know, then, whether he waved to them or to one individual to come on the campus with him?

A. Well, I wouldn't say that he waved to anyone or one hundred, but he waved, and then I saw these people that had—some of them getting off cars and off the grass, and they just followed him on down.

Q. As I read your testimony you say, "I saw Walker [fol. 1717] wave his arms at these people."

A. Yes, sir.

Q. That was the testimony?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know whether he had a single friend behind him?

A. I wouldn't know if he had one single friend, or who his friends were.

Q. Well, how do you know, from your observation, that he didn't wave his hand at a man in the place of "these people"?

A. He could have waved it at one particular individual, if he knew them, yes, sir.

Q. So, all you can say, you were walking on the left side of the sidewalk, Walker was approaching you on his left, his left side of the sidewalk, and you saw him wave his arm?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you don't know whether he waved at one man or one hundred, do you?

A. No, sir, I wouldn't say if he waved his arm at one or a hundred.

Q. Was he alone, or was someone with him?

A. No, sir, there were two or three other people. The General was in the center, and there was a man or two on [fol. 1718] each side of him, or right behind him, or there was about four or five men in one little group, yes, sir.

Q. Somewhere around him?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You didn't have to get off the sidewalk as you met that group?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did they all pass you on your right, then, as you went eastward?

A. Well, I was coming—I was coming back, and they passed me. We didn't have to run into each other, no, sir.

Q. Did any of them have ahold of him by the arms, like this (demonstrating)?

A. I don't believe—I don't remember whether they did or not.

Q. That would have been rather singularly positioned for a man to be walking in, wouldn't it?

A. I don't think that the General would walk down with anybody holding his arms when he was waving, no, sir.

Q. You would have certainly noticed it if he had been waving at somebody with one arm and somebody else had ahold of his other, wouldn't you?

A. I am not sure whether I would have noticed whether [fol. 1719] anyone was holding his arm. It is possible.

Q. You didn't see anybody holding his arms, though, did you?

A. No, sir.

Q. I wish you would walk back up to the monument there. After you came out of this Journalism Building did you go back toward the monument?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you saw a group of people around the monument?

A. Yes, sir, up in the area, right in here (indicating).

[fol. 1720] Q. And where was General Walker?

A. He was about the monument—he would be about 15,

20 feet probably, or an estimate anyway, I wouldn't say, right in this area of the site of this walkway up through in there, yes, sir.

Q. Was he conferring with anyone at that time?

A. No, sir.

Q. Was he north or south of the sidewalk?

A. He would be on the south side, yes, sir.

Q. Where were you?

A. I was cutting across right through here and I was going over to the Y.

Q. How far from him?

A. Oh, maybe 20 feet or something like that.

Q. Did anyone have ahold of his arms at that time?

A. I don't know, sir. He was in the front, up in the front and I was cutting around behind.

Q. You didn't see anybody holding on to his arms, did you?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did he cut off to the north and follow you or to the south, the opposite direction, or go straight?

A. He went up in this area up in here, up into this area, and I cut across and went over to the Y because there was a telephone in there that I had to call into the office on [fol. 1721] something.

Q. In other words, then, he was just walking straight alongside that sidewalk?

A. He was over in here and they were walking up through this way, yes, sir.

Mr. Watts: All right, that's all.

The Court: Do you have any further questions from this witness?

Mr. Gooch: No further questions.

The Court: All right. I will release you then, sir.

Mr. Gooch: Let me see if I have got a witness. Would you give me just a minute?

The Court: Yes.

Mr. Gooch: Mr. Sheriff, call Mr. Gregory.

TOM GREGORY, called as a witness by the Defendant, having been first duly sworn, testified as follows, to-wit:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Will you state your name?
A. Tom Gregory.
Q. Where do you live, Mr. Gregory?
A. Meridian, Mississippi.
Q. How old are you?
[fol. 1722] A. Twenty-nine years old.
Q. What do you do for a living?
A. I am a reporter for the Meridian Star.
Q. Is the Meridian Star located in Meridian, Mississippi?
A. It's a daily newspaper of Meridian, Mississippi.
Q. How long have you been in the employ of the paper there in Meridian?
A. A little more than three years. Three years and three months, about.
Q. Prior to that time, did you have any educational background?
A. Yes, sir, I am a graduate of the University of Mississippi in Journalism and English.
Q. All right. Did you keep up with the, shall we call it, the Meredith incident that came to a climax along in September of 1952?
A. Yes, sir, I covered much of it.
Q. Were you at Oxford frequently or infrequently during the month of September, 1962?
A. Three times, as I recollect.
Q. Well, we will not go into all those others because we have had so much background.
Were you on the campus of Ole Miss on September 30th, 1962?
[fol. 1723] A. I was.

Q. Did you know about what time you got there on that date?

A. I went on campus about 6:45.

Q. That's P.M.?

A. That's P.M. 6:45 or 7:00 o'clock, I'm not exactly certain of the time.

Q. Prior to the time you went on the campus that day, had you seen General Edwin A. Walker?

A. No, sir, I had not.

Q. Did you know who he was?

A. From pictures only.

Q. All right. Did you observe the Lyceum Building and the Marshals, and so forth, up there at the time you got to the campus?

A. Yes, sir, the Marshals were already lined around the Lyceum Building at the time I got on campus.

Q. Did you observe any brick throwing or rioting or anything of that sort?

A. After about 8:00 o'clock, I did.

Q. All right. Were you there when tear gas was fired?

A. Yes, sir, I was. I was in front of the Lyceum.

Q. Could you describe what happened before the tear gas was fired relative to any contacts between the crowd [fol. 1724] and the Marshals?

A. Prior to the time the tear gas was fired, I did circulate in the crowd and I saw some cigarette—lighted cigarettes thrown in the direction of the Marshals. I saw some Coca-Cola bottles or drink bottles of some sort thrown—these I saw were thrown over the heads of the Marshals in the direction of the Lyceum Building.

I also saw Marshals and students talking during that time.

And other than that, two different kinds of contact.

Q. Well, eliminating—after the tear gas was thrown, describe generally what was going on there in the circle around the Lyceum Building?

A. After the tear gas was fired, it became almost a process of the students gathering in groups, in the lower part of the circle, and they would rush up in the direction of the Marshals, some of them would throw bottles or bricks in the direction of the Marshals and the Marshals would fire tear gas at the students and the students would retreat, regroup and then go forward again.

Q. Was that more or less continuous? After the tear gas was fired?

A. More or less a continuous process. There would be lapses of time between the charges.

[fol. 1725] Q. All right. Now did you see General Edwin A. Walker in the circle there that night?

A. Yes, sir, it must have been about 9:00 o'clock, about an hour after the thing had started, I was standing almost in front of the YMCA Building, inside the circle but in front of the, the area in front of the YMCA Building, when Van Savell came up to me and said, "General Walker is on the campus," and I turned around and I recognized him and walked in his direction.

That was the first time I had seen Walker.

Q. Had you known Van Savell before?

A. Yes, sir, I met Van Savell previously in Meridian during the trial of Chancellor Williams.

Q. All right. Have you seen him since that time?

A. We both covered a football game at Starkville and other than that, I don't recall having seen him.

Q. All right. When you saw General Walker, what did you do?

A. I went in his direction. Walker—a group was forming around Walker and I joined the group that was forming around Walker.

Q. Did you hear anything that General Walker might have said at the time you joined that group?

A. Well, yes, sir, I heard some things that were said to Walker.

[fol. 1726] When I arrived at the group shortly after, I remember some students had ganged around and there was a commotion as other students called out that General Walker was on the campus.

And there begin to be a crowd around him and one of the students asked General Walker when he would bring his men that he had promised onto the campus and he said, "They will be available when they are needed," and he also asked, says, "Well, where are they now?"

He says, "Oh, they are around town. We can bring them in if we need them."

Q. All right, anything else?

A. There was also some discussion at that time about weapons that went on around General Walker.

Q. Well, now unless General Walker said it, let's don't go into that.

A. Well, General Walker, as I recall, did not participate directly in this conversation. He was listening.

Q. Well, never mind what he was listening to. Just keep it to what General Walker said.

A. Now shortly after this conversation with the students took place, Reverend Duncan Gray came up to the group and Reverend Gray asked Walker if he wouldn't leave the campus, if he wouldn't help to calm the mob and specifically I recall he asked him, "If you will go off the campus, the [fol. 1727] students will follow you."

And going—and General Walker told him that he wouldn't leave, that he intended to stay.

And Reverend Gray made other entreaties to Walker and Walker always refused him, declined to leave.

And at one point Walker asked him if he were not the Reverend Duncan Gray?

And he said that he was and Walker said, "You make me ashamed to be an Episcopalian," and after that Gray left the scene, this crowd around General Walker, and about that time I moved away from it, too.

Q. Did you thereafter see General Walker?

A. It was very shortly thereafter. I was standing in the same general area when I began to hear cries of, "Follow General Walker," and I turned around and I saw a very, a much larger group forming around the General and there were other cries of, "He's going up to the monument— He's going up to the Marshals," and "he won't let"—"General Walker won't let the Marshals stop him," cries like, "Gas won't stop General Walker."

And at that point the General, in the front row of a group, began striding at a rather fast clip in the direction of the Lyceum Building with the crowd, which I estimate at the time to be about 200 behind him and following him. [fol. 1728] Q. And how far did they go westward?

A. Well, I was off to the side, not directly in the crowd, and I walked past the sidewalk that crosses the circle I believe in a north-south direction.

I walked past it about 15 yards, I would imagine, and they went well ahead of me to what I would estimate to be maybe 15 or 20 yards, within 20 yards of the driveway that circles the Lyceum Building.

Q. What happened then?

A. At that time there were—there was a burst of tear gas from the Marshals that obscured the crowd from our vision and they began to disperse.

I saw them running out of the crowds and retreating and I did, too.

Q. All right. Now did you thereafter see General Walker that night?

A. Yes, sir, I saw him somewhat later when I had gone to the foot of the circle where the Confederate monument is and just as I arrived there, I heard someone say, "General Walker is going to speak to us."

And about that time Walker stepped up to the foot of the monument and began speaking.

Q. Did you hear any of the speech that General Walker made?

A. Yes, sir, I was within several feet of the General and [fol. 1729] I heard parts of it. There was quite a commotion in my area of rather loud-mouth people who would clap and cheer and for that reason I could not hear all of the speech and my memory of it is, therefore, in disconnected phrases and sentences.

Q. All right.

A. I heard him, I can recall him saying, "This is a long road to Cuba," and something about, "A splendid protest," quote, "splendid protest, quote.

I also recall him saying, "Give them protest, give them casualties."

And later on he said, "told the students that he had just come from a conference with the representative of Governor Barnett and he said that Governor Barnett did not want the Marshals on the campus and that there had been a sell-out and the students asked, "Who, who," were crying out, they wanted to know who sold them out.

He conferred with some man at the foot of the monument there and then he said, "Col. Birdsong," and there was a great deal of booing at that time.

It was shortly thereafter that Duncan Gray again appeared on the scene on my and as I recall, it was saying, asking the General to stop his speech and someone pulled him away from the foot of the monument, pulled Gray away from the foot of the monument, and began to pull [fol. 1730] him out of the crowd and again I heard General Walker say, "There is a man who makes me ashamed to be an Episcopalian."

At that point there were a number of the people in the crowd directly around me who began to follow Duncan Gray away from the monument and so I went with them. But two men took charge of Gray and I don't recall who they were, outside of the crowd, maybe 30 yards away from the monument, and convinced him that he should leave the campus or told him he should and he began to leave the area.

At this point I, too, left the area of the circle and went to the YMCA Building.

Q. Did you see Walker after that?

A. Later on during the night, I would see him at various places in the circle as various other assaults were launched at the Federal line.

He would be watching and perhaps occasionally speaking to somebody in the area but I did not hear him say anything after that time.

Q. Did you write a story for the Meridian Star on what you saw on the campus that night?

A. Yes, sir, I wrote one the next morning, which was probably showed the next day.

Q. Did you write it from what you saw or from any news service?

A. I did not—at the time I wrote my story, I had seen [fol. 1731] no other reports of what had occurred. I wrote it strictly from what I saw and heard.

Mr. Gooch: What's the next exhibit number, do you know?

(Thereupon, Defendant's Exhibit No. 29, was marked for identification.)

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. I hand you what's been marked as Defendant's Exhibit 29, and ask you if this is a photocopy of the story that you wrote in the Meridian Star?

A. Yes, sir, this is my story.

Q. Is that based on the things that you saw and heard there on the campus that night?

A. It is.

Mr. Watts: We have no objection.

Mr. Gooch: I won't take the time to read this at this time.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Did you call the march by Walker a charge, as he went towards the Lyceum Building?

A. Yes, sir, I did.

The Court: Are you offering 29?

Mr. Gooch: Yes, sir, we offer 29.

The Court: Defendant's 29 is admitted.

Mr. Gooch: We pass the witness.

Mr. Andress: Your Honor, we would like to have a conference before we start, since it is 3:15, could we have a [fol. 1732] recess right now.

The Court: All right. Ladies and Gentlemen, we will recess until 25 minutes until 4:00.

* * * *

[fol. 1733] Q. Mr. Gregory?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Just before the recess did I hear Mr. Gooch stand there and caution you not to talk to anyone during the recess?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And after you got out in the hall didn't you talk to Mr. Fred Smith, the gentleman sitting here, and Mr. Travis Buckley, another witness who has been in here testifying?

A. I talked to Mr. Smith. Mr. Buckley is to carry some stuff back to the hotel room for me.

Q. So, you did talk to Buckley?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where and when did you first know Van H. Savell?

A. The contempt trial of three Ole Miss officials, Chancellor Williams, Dean Lewis and Registrar Ellis, was held in Graham, Mississippi, in the Federal Court, and I covered that, that trial for my newspaper. Van was covering it for the Associated Press, and we met during the process of that trial.

Q. Now, about when was this?

A. As I remember it, well, it was on the Friday preceding the Sunday of this riot. I may be a day or two off. [fol. 1734] I don't recollect.

Q. Did you get pretty well acquainted with Savell?

A. No, sir, we—as I remember, we sat at the press table side by side and I met him. I know or knew his name, it was just an acquaintanceship through the reporting side by side at the trial.

Q. You knew him as you were both newsmen?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Both were in the same general fraternity?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you friendly there with him?

A. Like I say, I never—during the process of the trial was the only time I knew him. We didn't have any opportunity to converse at that time. I—we introduced ourselves as we sat down, as I remember it, and had very little other opportunity to converse.

Q. As I remember your testimony, you saw Savell one time that night?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Near the YMCA?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Would you step to the chart, please, and take the pointer? Would you point to us exactly where it was?

A. Exactly, sir, it would be difficult. It was just about [fol. 1735] in this area.

Q. Somewhere in the northeast quadrant of the Circle?

A. In this area I am pointing to (indicating).

Q. About how long before Walker's speech was that?

A. That would be difficult to say in point of time.

Q. Well, let's see, do you remember when the Highway Patrol left?

A. As I remember it, it was sometime between the time of Walker's speech at the monument and the time that the tear gas was fired.

Q. It was just almost coincident with Walker's speech, wasn't it, just before he made his speech?

A. Not as I remember it.

Q. Where were you when the Highway Patrol left?

A. I was standing at—it would have been right here when they drove by (indicating).

Q. Now, then, put your pointer up there where you met Savell?

A. (Witness complies.)

Q. Where had you been just before that?

A. I had been over this general area. I had been following the wave of students as they went forward toward the Lyceum Building.

[fol. 1736] Q. In other words, you, yourself, had been in that northeast quadrant for some few minutes before you met Savell?

A. Now, exactly, whether I was in this northeast quadrant a few minutes, or how long I had been there, I don't know. I had been over this entire general area just moving around.

Q. You have a distinct recollection of meeting Savell and he told you Walker was on the campus?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You can mentally close your eyes and relive the point and the incident, can't you?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. All right. Now, then, you have put the pointer right where you were when you met Savell?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Could you tell us where you were for the previous, or preceding fifteen minutes?

A. As I say, sir, I was over this general area. It is—during that preceding time, between the time I met Savell and the time that the tear gas was first fired, I moved around generally. I was, oh, down in here, I was up in here, and I was over the general area, and where I was at any other point of time I could not say.

Q. What attracted your attention to Savell?

[fol. 1737] A. Savell walked up to me, and as I say, I remembered him, and he spoke to me first and he says, "General Walker is on the campus."

Q. Now, this occurred, as I remember, and as I noted in your testimony, this contact with Savell occurred after you had seen General Walker in contact with Rev. Gray?

A. No, sir, it—it occurred prior to that time.

Q. Oh, before. I see. In other words, then,—

A. I had not seen General Walker before Savell came up to me and told me that General Walker was on the campus.

Q. I see. After you saw Savell in the northeast quadrant, you walked down in the southeast quadrant and saw General Walker talking to Rev. Gray?

A. No, sir, in point of chronology, I remember incidents that occurred during the night. Now, this has been better than a year and a half ago.

Q. But, now, young man, you have talked to people connected with this lawsuit almost immediately after this thing happened?

A. No, sir.

Q. Mr. Smith?

A. No, sir, no.

[fol. 1738] Q. When did you first talk to Mr. Smith?

A. Oh, I first talked to Mr. Smith perhaps a month or two ago.

Q. Is that the first time you talked to anyone connected with the lawsuit?

A. No, sir, I had talked prior to that then with an attorney out of Jackson, and that had been last fall, as I remember it.

Q. Was that someone out of Mr. Thomas' office?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. In the fall of 1963?

A. Yes, sir, about that time.

Q. Did he take a tape recorded statement from you?

A. No, sir, he did not.

Q. Was that the first man you talked to?

A. I talked to an FBI agent within a matter of a few weeks after the riot.

Q. Did you testify at the Grand Jury?

A. Yes, sir, I did.

Q. So, these incidents since the occurrence have remained fairly clear in your mind, haven't they?

A. Well, as I say, the incidents that I have been asked about, the incidents I have talked about, I had reason to remember those incidents.

[fol. 1739] Q. Now, you do distinctly remember seeing Savell?

A. Yes, sir, I distinctly remember seeing Savell.

Q. And you do distinctly remember his telling you General Walker was on the campus?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You distinctly remember that after learning that General Walker was on the campus, a short time thereafter, you saw General Walker talking to Rev. Gray?

A. It was sometime after that. Like I say, my chronology is a matter of incidence that occurred during the night, and chronologically I am not exactly certain how these incidents did take place.

Q. Now, when you—when you saw Savell and he told you that Walker was on the campus you didn't say, "Well, yes, I know it, I just saw him talking to Rev. Gray?"

A. No, sir, I did not. I turned around, as I remember it, and saw Walker at that point.

Q. So, undoubtedly, then, when you saw Savell and he told you Walker was on the campus, it was before you had seen Rev. Gray talking to Walker, that is a fair conclusion, isn't it?

A. Oh, yes.

Q. Now, then, after you saw him in the northeast quadrant, you went down and saw him talking to Rev. Gray [fol. 1740] in the south—southwest quadrant.

A. Now, as I recall it, sir, when I saw Gray talking to General Walker, it was in an area still in this same quadrant.

Q. In the northeast quadrant?

A. Yes, sir, as I recall.

Q. All right. Anyhow, you saw him talking to General Walker, and you distinctly remember Rev. Gray telling General Walker that he ought to leave the campus?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And Walker distinctly refused to leave?

A. Now, I don't recollect any words that Walker said at this point. I do remember that Walker declined to go. I do remember that Walker did say something to Rev. Gray.

Q. At that point, and at that incident, did you see Gray before you saw Walker, or did you see Walker before you saw Gray?

A. I saw Walker before I saw Gray.

Q. So, you then saw Gray coming up to Walker?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. The Rev. Gray, being a minister, did he stick out his hand and shake hands with General Walker?

A. I don't recall that he did.

[fol. 1741] Q. You don't know one way or another?

A. I just don't recall. I don't really believe that he did.

Q. Then, about how long did they talk?

A. Oh, it was just a matter of a couple of minutes, as I recollect it.

Q. And did Rev. Gray leave?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And your next testimony was that later you saw Walker in the same general area, and you saw a large crowd standing around him?

A. Well, now, whether, at this point, that occurred prior to the time he talked to Gray, or after the time he talked to Gray, I am a little bit hazy on that.

Q. Since your first testimony, or since you left the witness stand, you went out and talked to Mr. Smith?

A. Mr. Smith talked to me.

Q. Yes, sir, he talked to you, and he told you that you got your time fouled up, didn't he?

A. Well, now, as I told Mr. Smith, and—and the attorneys I have talked to throughout this trial, or prior to this trial, sir, my chronology on many instances is not good.

Q. Young man, that was not my question. My question to you, please, was did Mr. Smith tell you—[fol. 1742] A. —Mr. Smith came up to me and said that my story pointed it out a different way, and I wrote the story the next day, and I am testifying sometime later.

Q. And he pointed out to you out in the hall, between the time you testified a while ago and right now, that you were getting your timing fouled up, on this charge.

A. He said my timing did not coincide with my story?

Q. And your testimony was before you went out and talked to Mr. Smith that later, and you testified immediately after you saw the Rev. Duncan Gray, and Walker talking, that General Walker, a large crowd formed around General Walker, and then you saw General Walker walking fast with a crowd of 200, about 200 around him as they went on west fifteen or twenty yards from the curb around the Circle.

A. That was an estimate as to distance, sir.

Q. Sir?

A. That was an estimate as to distance.

Q. As to what?

A. Estimate as to distance.

Q. I understand, but this was after you had seen Gray talking to Walker.

A. Now, like I say, sir, my chronology is not good on [fol. 1743] some of these points.

Q. Well, when you testified before it was good.

A. Well, when I testified before there was no specific reference to chronology.

Q. Well, didn't you testify when you were in here fifteen or thirty minutes ago that after General Walker talked to Rev. Gray, you then saw the crowd gather around General Walker, you then saw a crowd of about 200 people move toward the Lyceum and get within fifteen or twenty yards of the curb, the tear gas was fired, and they went back; and then you testified, if I am mis-quoting your testimony, stop me, you testified, "And then at the foot of the monument you heard Walker speak."

Now, wasn't that your testimony a while ago?

A. As nearly as I can recall the testimony.

Q. And since then you have talked to Mr. Smith?

A. Since then I have talked to Mr. Smith, yes, sir, but—

Q. What is your testimony now?

A. Well, my testimony now is that I am trying, as I am trying to get it.

Q. Sit down over there and give it to us.

A. I tried to tell you—

Q. I don't want to know what you are trying to tell me. I say now what did happen, in the proper sequence starting [fol. 1744] with talking to Van Savell.

A. Well, Van Savell—

Q. Just a minute, please, let me finish the question. You started with meeting Van Savell southwest of the YMCA in the northeast quarter of the intersection, and take it from there in the absolute chronology, because this is critical and important. You relive it and testify for us as you remember, who said what to who and who did what.

A. I met Savell, rather Van Savell came up to me, and he spoke to me and he said, "General Walker is on the campus." I don't recall that I said anything to Van, but I turned around and at that point I remember seeing General Walker, as I testified before. I believe that there was a period of time when a crowd was gathered around Walker, and in that same period of time Duncan Gray came up to General Walker.

I have tried to tell you as truthful as I know how that my chronology is not good.

Q. Well, now, I am not talking about that. Tell us what you saw?

A. Well, I can only restate what I said before. As to when these things happened, I can't be that exact.

Q. But you were exact a while ago.

A. I was not pressed on points of chronology.

[fol. 1745] Q. Go ahead and tell us what you told us before you talked to Mr. Smith.

A. I can only re-tell what I told you a while ago.

Q. All right. Will you tell it, then?

A. At the time I moved into the crowd.

Q. Where was Duncan Gray when you moved into the crowd?

A. Duncan Gray was not present at that time.

Q. How long had he been gone?

A. He was not there.

Q. You said he had talked to Walker and you had seen him?

A. But you are asking me to tell it as I told it before, which I am trying to do.

Q. Go ahead.

A. All right.

Q. All right.

A. All right, at that time there were students gathering around, and there was a great deal of hullabaloo, and a student, I remember asked him, said, "General Walker, where are all these men you promised us?"

And General Walker said, "They will be here when the time comes."

And the student asked him, "Where are they?" And [fol. 1746] General Walker said, "They are around town. They will be here when we need them."

Then there was some conversation around about weapons, and which I don't recall General Walker joining. At some point shortly thereafter Duncan Gray—Rev. Duncan Gray came to the scene, and Duncan Gray began to ask General Walker if he would leave the campus, and he asked General Walker specifically, "If you will go off the campus, the students will follow you."

And I can't recall General Walker's words, but he did decline to go, and it was—[fol. 1747] Q. Just stop right there, or excuse me, let me stop you. Did you hear Reverend Gray say, "You could stop this if you could, if you would"?

A. I don't recall that specifically, no, sir.

Q. All right, go ahead.

A. It's possible he said some things that I did not recall specifically.

Q. Go ahead.

A. General Walker then asked him if he were not Reverend Gray and he said he is, an Episcopal minister, and he said he is, and General Walker said, "You make me ashamed of being an Episcopalian."

Whatever conversation may have taken place between them, I don't recollect now.

But Gray did leave, and I left the group shortly thereafter.

At a period of time around that time, I saw General Walker at a time when I was not immediately close to him, and a group of men gathered around him and I estimated at the time the total to be about 200, it's purely an estimation again, and then Walker began to move in the direction of the Lyceum Building at the head of this group of people.

And he was not in front but he was in the front row of the group and they began to walk in the direction of [fol. 1748] the Marshals with people crying out, "The Marshals won't stop General Walker," and, "Gas won't stop General Walker," and that sort of thing, a great deal of activity and I did not follow them all the way up to the front.

I went to a point across in the Lyceum Building side of this north-south crosswalk that crosses the circle and stopped there.

Q. Would you go over and put your pointer on it, please?

A. As nearly as I can recollect, I must have stopped right about here (indicating).

Q. Now where was Walker then?

A. Walker at the time was moving in this direction, past me and I was slightly ahead of this crowd that was coming until I stopped and then—

Q. Excuse me right there. Where had this movement formed up? You said this group—

A. To the best of my recollection, down in this area (indicating).

Q. I see. Go ahead.

A. And I stopped about here. The group did not move in a straight line but, rather, in a very tight arc in this direction but always toward the Lyceum Building.

Q. They were—

A. They passed me and with me remaining there (indi[fol. 1749] cating) and when they got up in this area, the tear gas began to fall.

And then they—

Q. Did they throw anything, anyone?

A. Now I did not see anyone throw anything. There was a great deal of movement. There might have been something thrown, I personally did not see it.

Q. Now the nearest you can tell, how long after you first saw Savell by the YMCA did this incident happen?

A. Chronologically, sir, I don't know.

Q. Well, could you estimate? Ten, fifteen, thirty minutes?

A. It could have—it could have been five minutes. It could have been ten minutes. It could have been a shorter time. I am just not exactly certain on the chronological order of some of these events.

Q. You know it wasn't as long as 30 minutes, don't you?

A. Oh, no, it wasn't that long.

Q. Now, as you saw Walker going by there, you say he was in the front rank of this group?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did anybody have him by each arm?

A. From where I was standing, sir, I could not tell that anybody did.

[fol. 1750] Q. At least, if they did, you couldn't see?

A. If they did, I couldn't see it, no, sir.

Q. Did you see a young man waving a big Confederate flag out in front?

A. Not at this time, no, sir. That had occurred somewhat earlier than what I saw.

Q. What did you do after Walker passed you with this group going west?

A. I stayed where I was.

Q. What did Walker do?

A. They continued going this way until the tear gas came and I lost sight of General Walker (indicating).

Q. What happened then?

A. Well, the crowd around him began to disperse. I saw those from the crowd moving back in my direction away from the clouds of tear gas and I moved backward, too.

Q. When did you next see Savell—strike that. When did you next see Walker?

A. Oh, well, as far as I can recall, it was at the monument.

Q. Now then prior to the time you saw Savell, you were in the general area of the circle. Stand there for just a minute. Put your pointer on the monument.

A. Here is the monument, I believe.

Q. Move it out about 10, about a hundred feet down [fol. 1751] eastward on University Avenue.

Assuming that General Walker had approached the campus, striding westward toward the monument, had been met by a group of leaders of the mob a little to the west of where you are—now move slightly to the west—more yet—back, no, back to the east a little—had been met there by leaders of the mob and had encountered a large portly, well-dressed man, had been welcomed by the crowd, had been requested to lead the crowd to the steps, had then and there loosened his tie, nodded yes without speaking, conferred with a group of about 15 persons who appeared to be riot leaders, assumed command of the crowd estimated at 1,000 people, was taken by each arm, by two leaders of the mob, marched westward—first northwestward and then southwestward across the northeast quadrant and then into the northwest quadrant from where you were, you could not have missed any movement that dramatic, could you?

A. If they moved in my direction, I would have seen it, yes, sir.

Q. Well, you know, do you not, that all during that period of time, before you saw Savell and after you saw Savell and before Walker's speech on the monument, had an incident that dramatic occurred, you couldn't have kept from seeing it, could you?

A. That's correct, sir.

[fol. 1752] Q. Wouldn't you say, in fairness, from what you saw and where you were, that such an incident did not occur? Yes or no.

A. That Walker went toward the Marshals?

Q. At that time, with a man on each arm and a thousand people behind him?

A. I didn't see any thousand people behind him. I saw General Walker from a point of about here (indicating).

Q. Yes, sir.

A. In the forefront of a group, a crowd, which I personally estimated to be about 200, move in the direction that I have stated, to a point somewhere around there (indicating).

Q. All right, I understood your testimony on that. And that was between the time you talked to Reverend Gray and the time you heard the speech on the monument?

A. I still say that my chronology is not perfect on that time.

Q. All right, sir. Take the stand. Was General Walker walking fast, slow or medium?

A. I would say he was walking at a fast military clip. He was not walking slowly, he was not running.

Q. Do you have a military background?

A. I spent three years in the Army.

Q. You know what cadence is, don't you?

[fol. 1753] A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was he walking pretty much in cadence?

A. As far as any particular cadence, he was walking at a, what I would call a rather fast clip, was standing rather straight and walking at a rather fast clip.

Q. Was anyone else in step with him?

A. I did not notice anybody, whether anybody kept step with him.

Q. Now if at the end of that march that you have outlined there, the crowd had been met with a barrage of tear gas and then went a few feet further and hurled their weapons, bricks, bottles, rocks and wooden stakes, a crowd of that size, you couldn't have helped seeing them hurling these weapons, could you?

A. I testified, sir, that I do not recall seeing anything thrown there. Tear gas fell and tear gas obscured my vision. Whether they were thrown after the tear gas was fired, I don't know.

Q. So you then lost sight of Walker as he proceeded southwesterly up in the northwest quadrant of the circle?

A. I am not too clear, sir, on your directions.

Q. Well, let's get it clear. Get your pointer and let's go up there and get clear. Put your pointer on the point where you lost sight of Walker.

A. Sir, it must have been generally in this area right [fol. 1754] here (indicating).

Q. From there, where were you?

A. I was down in the direction just north of this crosswalk here, just about in this area (indicating).

Q. Then where did you go?

A. I went backwards.

Q. Back where?

A. Back in this direction (indicating).

Q. And where did you next see Walker?

A. My recollection of next seeing Walker was at the monument.

Q. All right. From where did you leave to go to the monument? Put your pointer on it.

A. I don't know. Again I moved throughout this area pretty generally throughout the night (indicating).

And I came from this area over here to a point somewhere along in here when I first heard somebody say that General Walker was going to speak.

Q. And you went over and heard his speech?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Take the stand. Did Walker say anything at all during this movement he made to this group you testified about?

A. During the movement I couldn't say whether he said anything or not. I was not close enough to him to even hear [fol. 1755] him if he had said something.

Q. Did you hear the start of Walker's speech on the monument?

A. I heard—I was standing there when all of it took place up to the time that Reverend Gray left. Now as to my recollection of what was said at various points is rather limited.

Q. How near Walker were you standing?

A. I must have been 10 or 15 feet.

Q. Which direction?

A. It would have been, as the monument faces east, then I would have been to the north of the easterly direction. I would have been on Walker's left.

Q. Did you see Reverend Gray when he attempted to get on the monument?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Had you known Reverend Gray before?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Closely or—

A. No, sir, I only knew him as a face and that was all.

Q. I see. Now what did you do when he started to get up on the monument?

A. When Reverend Gray started to get up on the monument?

[fol. 1756] Q. Right.

A. I didn't do anything.

Q. Now you testified you heard loud booing. Was that before or after Reverend Gray started to get on the monument?

A. Oh, Reverend Gray appeared and there was a great deal of noise as they pulled him back and away from there.

Q. Oh, was that when the booing was?

A. As I recall it, there was some booing at that time, yes, sir.

Q. So you figured the booing was at Reverend Gray?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. But there was very definitely booing?

A. There was—there was uncomplimentary sounds, yes, sir.

Q. Well, you know what a boo is, don't you?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was there or was there not a boo?

A. As I recall, there were some boos.

Q. All right. Now, then who brought Reverend Gray down?

A. I don't know, sir.

Q. Did you see a heavy, portly sort of an individual with him?

A. No, sir.

[fol. 1757] Q. Where did you see Reverend Gray?

A. At that time?

Q. Yes.

A. He came from my right, from the edge of the crowd and—somebody pulled him back down and they began to move away from the crowd and went over there with them. Now who was with him at that time, I did not know the people and had no reason to . . .

Q. Where did you go?

A. From that point?

Q. Right.

A. I went to the YMCA Building.

Q. Did you go in?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long did you stay in?

A. As it turned out, I stayed for some time. I was in there and at a period of several minutes after I went in, the Marshals came down and threw tear gas all around and it got into the YMCA Building and I couldn't get out.

Q. Now you wrote a report for your paper?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. That has been offered in evidence as Defendant's Exhibit 29.

EXCERPTS OF DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 29 READ INTO RECORD

Refreshing your recollection from this, "Into the mob walked Edwin C. Walker, former Major-General of the [fol. 1758] United States Army."

Now where was the mob when he walked into it? Go up there and let's identify and orient this.

A. This was a reference to this point here, when I saw him at this point here (indicating).

Q. All right. The mob then was already formed?

A. Well, there was a mob all over the campus.

Q. No, I am talking about at this point.

A. Well, there were groups of people all around here. When I first saw him, he was with a large group of people.

Q. All right. Oh, well, you didn't see him then walk into this group of people?

He was already with them, is that right?

A. Well, there was—when I first saw him, he was in this group of people.

Q. Well you have stated here, "into the mob walked Edwin C. Walker".

I want to know from which direction he walked and where the mob was when he walked there?

A. Well, when I first saw him, he was walking in this direction and the mob was around him (indicating).

Q. I see. Well you then didn't see him walk into the mob, did you?

A. Well, he was inside—walking in the mob when I saw him, yes, sir.

[fol. 1759] Q. In other words, rather than "into the mob," he was walking with the mob, wasn't he?

A. He was—I had wrote that, sir, on the morning after it occurred.

Q. I understand it.

A. And—

Q. Well, which time is right, then or now?

A. I am trying to explain to you as I recall the thing—

Q. That's what I want.

A. —how it happened. Now there was a crowd, there was Walker (indicating).

And he was in the crowd when I saw him, yes, sir.

Q. He was in the crowd and he did not walk into the crowd after you saw him?

A. Well, he was walking among the crowd and walked to the front of it, yes, sir.

Q. —"around him swirled a whirlpool of humanity and human emotion. Two hundred yards away, a line of gas-masked, club and tear-gas-armed Federal Marshals had turned the ancient Lyceum Building into a Federal fort.

" 'Now we have a leader,' screamed somebody. 'Rally to General Walker!' "

Now where did you hear that?

A. From the crowd behind General Walker.

[fol. 1760] Q. And that's when he was already in the crowd?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. "Walker, wearing a Texas hat and a dark blue suit, walked toward the Lyceum, with perhaps 200 men following him."

Now he walked and didn't run?

A. No, sir, I never did say he ran.

Q. " 'Tear gas won't stop him,' another person yelled. 'Follow General Walker.'

"About 50 yards from the Federal line, tear gas bombs began falling around the group.

"General Edwin Walker (retired),—"

Did you understand he was retired?

A. Yes, sir, that was my understanding.

Q. You didn't know he had resigned?

A. It was my understanding he's retired at that time.

Q. All right. "General Edwin Walker (retired), who wouldn't retreat, did."

Did you see him retreat?

I thought you said you didn't see him any more?

A. Well, I saw him later. He didn't get to the Federal lines.

Q. You didn't see him retreat, did you?

A. I did not see him retreat. I did not see him stop. I did not see him go forward.

Q. In simple language, that's somewhat extravagant [fol. 1761] words, isn't it, young man?

A. Extravagant? The things that occurred around that thing would lead you to believe that he did not go forward.

Q. Well, anyhow, you didn't see him retreat, did you?

A. I did not personally see him retreat, no, sir.

Q. You have stated here, "General Edwin Walker, (retired) who wouldn't retreat, did."?

A. Yes, sir.

[fol. 1762] Q. You may sit down now.

"The former Army officer was just one of the number of outsiders—how many will probably never be known—who egged and aided a hard corps of Ole Miss students into a rock flinging, destructive riot that left two dead, seventy-five to one hundred injured, at least thirty-one arrested and seriously damaged the reputation of a university. I walked through that howling, passionately unthinking mob for more than four hours during the violence here last night. I saw the rock throwers and the agitators. I stood under a Confederate flag hoisted on the flagpole before the stately Lyceum and watched students and outsiders rush the Marshals' lines, retreat before tear gas, regroup and charge again, all without any attempt at control."

And nobody had any leadership whatsoever over this mob, did they?

A. Nobody exercised any leadership.

Q. "Most of the rioters were students, although the number of Ole Miss men steadily decreased through the night. The number of outsiders, non-students, steadily increased. Denim-trousered adults and teenagers from nearby towns furnished the impetus that kept the college boys at their job of injury and destruction."

I am leaving some out.

[fol. 1763] "About an hour after the rioting started, General Walker entered the scene. After his abortive attempt to reach the Marshals' line, he confined his activity to speech making and watching."

That was your understanding? He participated no more after this first attempt?

A. I did not see him participate in any—any more, no, sir.

Q. A crowd gathered around him at the edge of the Grove and he finally said, "All right, I'll speak to them."

Were you down there when that occurred?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, did—I understood you to say that you were attracted to him on the monument as you left the YMCA?

A. No, sir, I did not say that.

Q. Well, what—well, start back up at the YMCA then and tell me what you did immediately before the speech?

A. Well, I had come down to this general area around the monument and I had come down from the direction of the YMCA Building. I see it. I did not say I came from the YMCA Building, whether I was there immediately after, or exactly, I don't remember.

Q. Take the pointer again and point where you were [fol. 1764] when you next saw Walker.

A. I seen him from somewhere up in this area. I had tried to follow things as they went along, and I came down into this area here, and was standing by the monument when next I saw Walker. And he was walking toward—

Q. Well, now, you drew a circle. I wish you would put the pointer where you were standing and where Walker was standing.

A. Well, that is difficult to do, sir. I will try. The best of my recollection, I was standing about here, which is about the same area I remained in, and I moved up and saw Walker, and Walker was standing somewhere over in here (indicating).

Q. Did you see the Highway Patrol go past about that time, or shortly before?

A. I had seen the Highway Patrol go past, but whether it was about that time or shortly before, I don't know. I believe it was prior to this time.

Q. What did you hear Walker say?

A. Walker—I heard some students say, or somebody say, "Walker is going to talk to us." And Walker was standing here. He says, "All right." He turned around, and I could see Walker, and he said, "All right, I will talk to them," and he stepped to the monument.

[fol. 1765] Q. You say, "He finally said 'all right, I will speak to them.'"

What do you mean by "finally"?

A. I don't recall, sir.

Q. Prior to that time had he refused to speak to them?

A. Not to my knowledge, or I don't know.

Q. Take your seat.

"Just prior to that an Episcopalian Priest, Rev. Duncan Gray, Jr., had tried to talk him into leaving and taking the crowd with him. 'They'll follow you,' Gray said. But Walker stood at the foot of the old Confederate monument and began speaking. He told the crowd there had been a 'sell-out'. He said a representative of the Governor's office had told him that Ross Barnett's orders were not to let the Marshals on the campus. After an impromptu whispered conference with a blue-coated follower, Walker said that a member of the Highway Patrol had been responsible for the sell-out. Again there was a conference and Walker said, 'the name is Birdsong.' Col. T. B. Birdsong is the head of the Highway Patrol and was in the car that led the first group of Marshals to the campus during the afternoon. Then referring to the Episcopal Priest who had asked him to leave, 'I am ashamed that I am an Episcopalian.' At this point Rev. Gray appeared in front of the [fol. 1766] crowd and was forcibly taken from the area by men who feared that he would be injured. Later a group of students attempted to arrange a truce, but were unable to make the deal."

Walker was not part of this, was he?

A. Not that I recall.

Q. Where were you when that occurred?

A. When the truce occurred?

Q. Yes, sir.

A. I was up in the area where the truce talk was taking place.

Q. How long after the speech on the monument did this truce incident take place?

A. I couldn't say. I don't recall.

Q. You have no idea how long you were in the YMCA?

A. In the YMCA?

Q. Yes.

A. Oh, it was ten or twelve minutes, until the gas had cleared around the YMCA, until I could get out.

Q. Was Walker's speech just started, just finishing, in the middle, when Rev. Gray was taken out?

A. When Rev. Gray was taken out? Now, anything that was said after Rev. Gray appeared I don't know, because I left with Rev. Gray and I did not hear any more [fol. 1767] Walker.

Q. Did you hear Walker say Governor Barnett had betrayed the people of Mississippi?

A. No, sir, I didn't.

Q. Did he say not to let up now, "You may lose this battle, but you will be heard?"

A. I don't recall that.

Q. Did he say, "This is a dangerous situation, you must be prepared for possible death, if you are not go home"?

A. I don't recall that.

Q. There were cheers, apparently Walker had complete command over the group. Anything like that?

A. Yes, sir, there were cheers, now. And it was evident to me that the group seemed to be behind General Walker.

Q. Also there were boos?

A. Well, there were boos at the time Rev. Duncan Gray came up.

Q. Did you ever hear General Walker beg the students to cease the violence?

A. No, sir, I did not.

Q. As a newsman, did it come to your attention that the United Press International report written by Mr. Alfred B. Kuettner said that, "During a lull in the riot, General Edwin A. Walker mounted the Confederate statue on the [fol. 1768] campus and begged the students to cease their violence, and was met by one massive jeer". Did that come to your attention?

A. No, sir, I never saw that.

Q. Did you ever hear of it from that day to this?

A. No, sir, I have not. This is the first time.

Q. This is the first time?

A. This is the first time I have heard of it.

Q. You never even heard any discussion of that around the newspaper?

A. No, sir, I haven't.

Q. That is all. Just a minute.

Did you see General Walker after he got off the monument?

A. As I recall it, I saw him in the general area. I did not hear anything.

Q. Will you tell us about what you saw him doing in the general area after the speech on the monument?

A. Well, sir, after the speech was over on the monument, my recollection is I did see him in the area walking around, occasionally talking to somebody, and I was never very close to him after that.

Q. No charge then after the speech on the monument?

A. I did not see one.

Q. Now, there is a headline on this dramatic account [fol. 1769] here, "Walker charges then falls back." Did you write that?

A. No, sir, I did not.

Q. You never did see him charge, did you?

A. I saw what I called a charge in my story, sir, which would be the move toward the Lyceum Building.

Q. Pardon?

A. I saw the move that I—that that charge is referring to, is the move toward the Lyceum Building.

Q. Would you read to us, please, sir, out of that story anything you wrote that said that Walker led a charge?

A. I did not say anything—I did not say that he made a charge, no, sir.

Mr. Watts: That is all.

Mr. Gooch: That is all.

The Court: I am going to excuse this witness. You may be excused.

Mr. Gooch: The defense rests.

The Court: What says the Plaintiff?

Mr. Watts: The Plaintiff is ready to start reading depositions, sir.

The Court: All right.

Mr. Watts: Might we have a five-minute recess to get these depositions assembled?

[fol. 1770] The Court: All right, Ladies and Gentlemen, the Defendant has rested, and the Plaintiff will offer probably some rebuttal evidence, so step into the Jury room for about five minutes until I call you back.

(Short recess was had.)

[fol. 1771] Mr. Watts: This is the deposition of Louis Milner, Associated Press employee, taken at New Orleans, on March 30, 1964.

LOUIS MILNER, testified by deposition as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Watts:

Q. Your name is Louis Milner?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Your profession?
A. Newsman.
Q. For whom? And how long?
A. For the Associated Press. Since January 27, 1946.
Q. What is your education, Mr. Milner?
A. Bachelor of Science in Journalism from the University of Illinois.
Q. When did you graduate?
A. 1934, on July 11th—make it June 11th.
Q. During your undergraduate days, give us all the organizations to which you belonged?

Mr. Watts: I think we can skip that. Wait just a minute. On Page 144, line 10.

Q. What was your assignment in the New Orleans AP Bureau?
A. As of the present?
[fol. 1772] Q. What has it been since you have been with them?
A. Well, we have several shifts here. There is a radio assignment, day rewrite, day editor, overnight, night editor, night filing editor, night radio.
And first of all, my time has been spent on the night side.
At present, I am night editor.
Q. How long have you been night editor?
A. I couldn't give you an accurate answer.
Q. Since before or after September 30, 1962?
A. Long before.
Q. Where were you on September 30, 1962?
A. I was on the night desk.

Q. Where were you working that day?

A. That day?

Q. Yes.

A. That night, you mean?

Q. Yes. I will make it more specific. Were you on duty from 8:00 o'clock through midnight of that night?

A. Let me check and see. And what time did you say? From 8:00 p.m., through midnight?

I reported at 5:30 p.m., and I left at 8:30 a.m., the following day, 8:30 a.m., yes.

Q. What was your assignment and duty?

A. Night desk.

[fol. 1773] Q. What is the nature of that duty?

A. Was that a Sunday or a Monday?

Q. That was a Sunday.

A. Yes, I was correct. Night editor and night editor has charge of the night desk, and, also filing the wires.

Q. Did you do anything else during the course of that evening?

A. What do you mean by "anything else"?

Q. Other than handling the night desk and filing the wires?

A. No.

Q. Did you operate the telephone at any time specifically?

A. No, sir.

Q. Could you take your copy here from the night of September the 30th, and pick it up and let me ask you some questions about it?

A. Yes. Is this the original copy or a teletype copy? What specific story?

Q. Well, I am interested in any stories during the course of the evening with which you had any contact that to do with General Walker.

A. Well, here—

Q. Well, I have some others here that were apparently [fol. 1774] presented to me at the time of the taking of the Savell deposition.

A. Well, that would be difficult to—you see, unless I saw the original typewritten copies so as to see whether it passed through my hands or not, because the normal procedure on a normal night, the story comes to me and then it goes on the wire after it has been edited for grammatical errors and ready for the wire.

And in times of stress, it is possible for someone else of equal, shall we say, experience to put it on the wire directly.

Q. How long had you known Van Savell?

A. I had known him ever since he had joined the Bureau.

Q. Did you consider him to be an experienced news reporter on the night of September the 30th, 1962?

A. I did.

Q. What did you understand his experience to be?

A. The past performance.

Q. Did you understand that he had only one year of college and less than a year of full experience?

A. Yes.

Q. What past performance are you referring to now that indicated his experience?

A. Well, his general performance in the Bureau.

[fol. 1775] Q. Outline to us what you mean.

A. Well, just his handling of various stories nearby in comparison with the others.

Q. I wish you would turn to the earliest release there that you can identify that may refresh your recollection and tell us what happened that night.

A. I recall having read this story and this is noted as XAB, and I don't recall whether I was the one who put it on the wire or not.

Q. What is the timing on that?

A. 3:45 a.m., on the morning of October 1st.

Q. Who handled the incoming calls to the New Orleans Bureau that night?

A. I don't know. There were several people.

Mr. Watts: Now, if Your Honor please, in connection with this, I would like to read that communique, XAB, to the jury, but it will involve considerable shuffling of papers and if it is acceptable to the Court, I would like to pick that out over the evening and read it the first thing in the morning, referring back to this portion.

The Court: All right.

Mr. Cravens: Is that the only number you have got on that?

Mr. Watts: That's the only one I have so far.

[fol. 1776] Mr. Cravens: I mean is that the only number designation you have, just XAB?

Mr. Watts: That's his designation.

Mr. Andress: It's capital X dash capital a parenthesis small b parenthesis close.

Q. What is the timing on that?

Mr. Gooch: Where are you reading from now?

A. 3:45 a.m., on the morning of October 1st.

Mr. Watts: I am reading—

Mr. Gooch: Mine shows 3:54. I don't know whether you are right or not.

Mr. Watts: 3:54 is what it is.

Mr. Andress: 3:54. Isn't that what I said? I'm sorry. I reversed it. 3:54 a.m., on the morning of October 1st.

Q. Who handled the incoming calls to the New Orleans Bureau that night?

A. I don't recall. There were several people.

Q. Do you know any of them?

A. I would know anyone who was there but I don't recall who was on duty at this time.

Q. Could you give us the name of anyone that you do know that was on duty?

A. No.

Q. What was the first you heard that night that Walker [fol. 1777] was alleged to have led the charge against the U. S. Marshals?

A. Well, these stories here are out of order and I don't recall the time.

Q. Have you ever heard of anyone other than Van Savell who reported or has purported to have seen General Walker lead a charge on the night of that riot?

A. Normally I wouldn't.

Q. So the answer is no?

A. No, it isn't no.

Q. Well, what is it?

The question is, please, sir, have you ever heard of anyone other than Van Savell that purported to have seen General Walker lead the charge? Just say yes or no. I think you can answer that yes or no.

A. Well, it's like the question, "have you stopped beating your wife?"

Q. No, it isn't.

A. It is to me. Could you rephrase it?

Q. Did you hear that Van Savell reported that he had seen Walker leading the charge?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you hear anybody else other than Van Savell make such a report?

A. Not to the New Orleans Bureau.

[fol. 1778] Q. Have you heard anyone, to the New Orleans Bureau or elsewhere, that anyone else made such a report, that Walker was leading the charge?

A. I understand there have been reports.

Q. Could you give us the name?

A. No.

Q. I mean of any individual who made such a report?

A. No.

Q. Where did you understand that there had been such reports?

A. Just rumors, reports that had drifted to the Bureau since then.

Q. That have drifted where?

A. To the Bureau.

Q. Has anyone made an investigation of such reports?

A. I don't know.

Q. So that you at this time know, or I should say, do you know at this time of any individual other than Van Savell who claimed that he saw Walker lead the charge?

A. You mean person?

Q. You personally?

A. No.

Q. As of October 1, 1962, from your observation of the news bulletin that went out through the office where you were working, was the news disseminated that Walker had [fol. 1779] led a charge of rioters on Mississippi University on the night of September 30th?

A. Whatever is contained in these stories, it was disseminated.

Q. Did you hear anyone in the Associated Press Bureau or anyone connected with the Associated Press ever at any time discuss the fact that UPI reporter, Mr. Al Kuettner had issued a report in form as I point out to you now on Page 32, of Mr. Kuettner's deposition, starting with Line 17?

A. I have never seen this before.

Q. Have you ever heard of such a report being issued by the UPI wire service?

A. No, sir.

Q. As far as you are concerned, then; you never heard any question as to the veracity of the Savell report?

A. No.

Q. Where were you assigned from September—I mean from October 1 through October 6th, 1962?

A. To the New Orleans Bureau.

Q. Were you doing the same type of work there that you were doing on the night of September 30th?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. During that period of time did it come to your attention in your official position as evidenced by the certified [fol. 1780] copy, or copies, of the original complaint of the United States against Edwin A. Walker that Van Savell had furnished to the Government the information upon which its complaint was filed against Walker?

Mr. Gooch: If the Court please, I don't know what relevance this has to the case.

The Court: Let me look.

Mr. Gooch: But it's far afield from anything—I don't know what limits we are going to on rebuttal. This does not occur to me to be rebuttal testimony and I object to it.

If he wanted to put something in in his case in chief, but this is not rebuttal of anything that I know of.

Mr. Watts: This man is an official of the Associated Press and it's rebuttal against all these witnesses that have testified.

Mr. Gooch: Mr. Watts, let me finish my objection.

The Court: Just a second, Mr. Watts. Go ahead, Mr. Gooch.

Mr. Gooch: There is no pleadings to support any such issue as now is sought to be taken before this jury, and for the further reason that in connection with the filing of the Complaint, the witness, whoever he has, has no choice as to whether his name is put on a Complaint or [fol. 1781] not, or a list of witnesses; it's done entirely by the law enforcement officers.

Mr. Watts: I will save the controversy and withdraw it.

Question on Line 22.

Q. Were you at a later time assigned the responsibility of covering a sanity hearing involving General Walker on November 21st and 22nd, of 1962?

A. In part, yes.

Q. Who else was responsible for that?

A. Van Savell.

Q. And were you and Van Savell collaborating in the coverage of that sanity hearing?

A. I would say divided responsibility.
Q. To whom did you look as your immediate superior?
A. You mean in Oxford?
Q. Anywhere?
A. That would be to the Bureau Chief in New Orleans.
Q. That was Ken Davis?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What order did he give you when you went to Oxford?
A. To cover the hearing.
Q. And where did you stay in Oxford?
A. At the Ole Miss Hotel.
Q. Did you encounter Van Savell there?
[fol. 1782] A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you visit with him concerning this incident?
A. Did I what?
Q. Did you visit with him concerning the Walker incident, discuss it with him in any way?
A. No.
Q. You mean you went to Oxford to cover this hearing and met Van Savell, who had written the original report, and didn't have a word of conversation with him about what he had seen and what he had written?
A. No, sir.
Q. Where did you first see Savell?
A. Where?
Q. Where in Oxford?
A. I don't recall. Possibly at the motel.
Q. Where was he staying?
A. I assume at the motel.
[fol. 1783] Q. Did you see him there?
A. At the motel?
Q. Right.
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What did you say to him and what did he say to you?
A. About what?
Q. About anything.
A. I don't recall.

Q. Do you recall anything? At all you said to him or he said to you?

A. No.

Q. You mean you have not one iota, not one solid recollection of the conference you had, or conversation you had with Savell when you went to report on this hearing?

A. Why no.

Q. Did you arrive the day of the hearing, or the day before?

A. I would have to check my work schedule to find out.

Q. What did you think of General Walker when you went up there—before you went up there—

• • •

Mr. Watts: I think that is probably not—[fol. 1784] Mr. Gooch: Go ahead and read it.

• • •

Q. Before you went up there did you have any idea about him?

A. No.

Q. Had you read anything about him, or have any concept about him at all?

A. Why naturally I had read stories which had appeared. He was prominent.

Q. All the stories you had read were adverse to him, weren't they?

A. I don't recall any. Purely objective.

Q. You were not one of his admirers?

A. I have no feeling toward him either way.

Q. You were just completely negative, have no feeling pro or con?

A. Naturally.

Q. And you were performing your duties?

• • •

Mr. Andress: You missed one.

Mr. Watts: Skip to the next one.

• • •

A. Why sure.

Q. Now, do I understand that you arrived there the day before the hearing?

[fol. 1785] A. I didn't say. I said I would have to check my work schedule.

Q. And when and where can you check it?

A. I was probably on overtime and my overtime blanks are at home.

Q. Well, would you bring those with you tomorrow?

A. What time?

Q. Whatever time you come. Let's see. What time do you think you will arrive?

A. It will probably be in the afternoon. I think that is about the only plane connection.

• • •

Mr. Gooch: If the Court please, in the interest of time, I can't see any rebuttal in this.

The Court: What is the purpose of a lot of this?

Mr. Watts: The purpose of a lot of this, if Your Honor please, they have brought in a lot—a lot of witnesses. I won't comment on the testimony, Your Honor heard them, and here is a man in the Associated Press, New Orleans Bureau, one of the officials.

The Court: I am not talking about—

Mr. Watts: And the purpose of it is to show the confusion and the disafusion (sic) of information that cir[fol. 1786] culated about the district office where this thing was all being related form.

Mr. Gooch: If the Court please, we are trying a case about a story that we admit Van Savell wrote. I don't know the purpose of going a long discourse about what was discussed after the story was written.

The Court: I think, Mr. Watts, you can reduce a lot of this.

Mr. Watts: I think perhaps I can skip some of it as I go along.

The Court: Do that and I will overrule the objection for the time being.

Mr. Watts: Let me have a quick look then. A lot of this is preliminary, and of course this was a discovery deposition, and a lot of the things there I have since learned.

All right, on page 156, line 19. This is offered for the purpose of showing either malice or reckless disregard of the truth.

• • •

Q. Did you ever at any time during your reporting of the Walker hearing on November 21st and 22nd bother to go to the Clerk's office and check the file to see what issues were involved in the hearing you were covering?

A. I believe Savell filled me in on it.

[fol. 1787] Q. What did he say?

A. I don't recollect at this time.

Q. And you didn't consider it worthwhile yourself to go in and check the file?

A. I depended upon him.

Q. I see. Are you sure of that?

A. Positive.

Q. Did Savell tell you that he had been listed on the Government's complaint as a complaining witness?

• • •

Mr. Gooch: If the Court please—

The Court: That wouldn't have anything to do with this.

Mr. Gooch: The Jury should be instructed not to regard that. A witness has no earthly way—

The Court: Ladies and Gentlemen, you are instructed not to consider that in any way. A witness doesn't have any choice of whether or not he is going to be called as a witness. That is not up to him. That is up to the governmental agency involved.

Mr. Watts: I will skip on over here.

The Court: I tell you what I think I will do. I believe I will go ahead and recess and let you look over the depositions tonight.

Mr. Watts: All right. That will give us a better chance [fol. 1788] to eliminate preliminaries.

The Court: Ladies and Gentlemen, we will recess until 9:00 o'clock tomorrow morning.

(Thereupon, at 4:25 p.m. an adjournment was taken until the following morning, Thursday, June 18, 1964, at 9:00 o'clock a.m.)

[fol. 1791]

PROCEEDINGS

The Court: Good morning Ladies and Gentlemen.

The Plaintiff had a witness which he wanted to offer but he isn't here and I told him we had waited what I considered to be a reasonable length of time for him. So what says now the Plaintiff?

Mr. Andress: The Plaintiff closes.

The Court: What says the Defendant?

Mr. Gooch: I would like to offer in evidence, if the Court please, two instruments which are—will you mark this, please, Mr. Nuss, as the Defendant's Exhibit, next number, and this.

(Thereupon, Defendant's Exhibit 30-A and 30-B, were marked for identification.)

Mr. Gooch: This will be 31.

(Thereupon, Defendant's Exhibit No. 31, was marked for identification.)

Mr. Gooch: We offer in evidence at this time news releases of the UPI under dateline of October 1, 1962, in connection with the testimony of Al. Kuettner, of United Press, who testified by deposition.

The Court: What numbers are those?

Mr. Gooch: Numbers 30-A, 30-B, and 31. I will read excerpts from them.

The Court: They are admitted.

[fol. 1792]

EXCERPTS OF DEFENDANT'S EXHIBITS NOS. 30-A, 30-B AND 31 READ INTO RECORD

Mr. Gooch: Reading from a portion of 30-A and 30-B, which are reports of United Press International under dateline of October 1, 1962, "The Justice Department announced today that Major-General Edwin Walker, resigned Army General who has become a vocal advocate of right-wing causes, has been arrested at a roadblock in Oxford and charged with a number of offenses, including inciting rebellion.

"Walker was seen during the riots egging the students on."

And from United Press International under date October 1, 1962, this excerpt, "Students were waving the Confederate flag during a lull in the rioting. Edwin A. Walker, former Army Major-General who commanded troops at Little Rock, mounted a Confederate statue and advised the students to cease their violence. 'This is not the proper route to Cuba,' Walker, who was wearing a big Texas hat, said. The crowd jeered. Later, Walker mounted the statue again and said: 'I want to compliment you all on the protest you make here tonight. You have a right to protest under the Constitution.'"

That concludes the evidence of the Defendant.

The Court: Ladies and gentlemen, that concludes all of the evidence. Now we haven't wasted our time this morning. We have already finished preparing the Charge, so [fol. 1793] we will be ready to argue the case at 2:00 o'clock.

We will recess until 2:00 o'clock. At that time be back in the jury room, please.

(Thereupon, at 11:45 o'clock, a.m., a recess was taken until 2:00 o'clock, p.m., of the same day.)

* * *

[fol. 1794] Afternoon Session

2:00 P. M.

The Court: Ladies and Gentlemen, I will first read you the charge of the Court in the case.

(Charge read.)

The Court: Now, after argument of counsel I will deliver this charge to you and you will actually take it into the Jury room with you. I believe Mr. Andress will open for the Plaintiff.

OPENING ARGUMENT OF PLAINTIFF BY MR. ANDRESS

Mr. Andress: May it please the Court, I will charge on the Jury.

Ladies and Gentlemen of the Jury, we have now reached nearly the final stages of nine long days of presenting testimony. Some of it, unfortunately, we have had to rather present over and over again to see the picture. We have tried our best to bring you all of the portions of the picture, all the paint, brush, all the soap of it, and everything of the sort.

The picture is not complete.

The reason it is not complete is not the fault of General Walker and his attorneys. There is one big portion of this picture missing. That portion is to hear from the witness stand live, presented to you where we can cross examine [fol. 1795] him, the story of the man who started all this, Van Savell; the hired hand of the Associated Press who brought witness after witness, a preacher, the Dean of the college, other newsmen, radio people in here, but they didn't bring in the one man who could stand up here before you and tell you that he acted in good faith, that he thought he was writing a fair comment. That he was telling what he believed to be a truthful story, or who, perhaps, on cross examination, would break down and admit that as a sports writer with the Associated Press for about a year he fell into this confusion and completely lost his objective and he painted the kind of picture that he wanted to paint, and he sold it to his superiors.

Why isn't he here? We don't control Mr. Savell. He doesn't work for us.

Now, there is another thing that is missing here. Another thing that is missing here. Van Thomas, the first witness who testified by deposition, the re-write man down in New Orleans told you by the deposition that he talked to their photo people up in Oxford; that they had a wire photo network set up down there in the hotel, and they were behind the Marshals where they could take at least [fol. 1796] a couple of pictures in the dark of the Marshals.

Why didn't they bring in here a single solitary picture of General Walker supposedly leading a charge of 1,000 students across that campus to attack or attempt to attack United States Marshals in an act of insurrection against the authority and the President of the United States?

Why didn't they bring those pictures in? We didn't have a photographer to do it, or a photograph network. They had it. If they could take those pictures that they offered here in evidence, I submit to you that if any such charges had been made or led by General Walker that they would have had pictures. Can you imagine, can you conceive of anything more newsworthy under high Heaven, any greater scoop that any news media could possibly have than to have a picture of a former Major General in the United States Army violating every code or canon of ethics that he had been brought up with, to lead in insurrection, a charge against Marshals of the United States right after the President of the United States had made a speech and executive proclamation.

We really submit that that didn't happen.

Now, you are asked here a number of questions, eleven of them. That is just one more than one question per day [fol. 1797] for the time we have spent here. The Court gives you some definitions. I want to call to your attention a couple of those definitions, and point out the fact that the first one you have is "lead a charge". This paragraph defines both "lead" and "charge" and, of course, the newspaper report was that he led a charge. So that is one phrase. [fol. 1798] So that that's one phrase. "Led," means activities by a person who directs, moves to action, or encourages in some action or movement toward the Marshals or a group of body of people moving toward an objective.

Well, now bear in mind that every time anybody down here at the monument turned and walked west, that is technically speaking a movement toward the marshals.

Is it a Charge?

Where—well, I was brought up on the Charge of the Light Brigade, pickets charged at Gettysburg and Teddy Roosevelt's charge up San Juan Hill and I can't see where there was any such movement that could be defined as a charge or one that General Walker led on the campus of Ole Miss that night because there is one thing, there is one thing on which people are practically unanimous—I hesitate to say "unanimous," because I don't want to mislead you and there were so many witnesses here that, very frankly, I am not sure but what somebody testified to almost everything—but the witnesses were practically unanimous in saying that General Walker never got out of a walk; that some of them said he moseyed along and some said he milled around and some said he strolled around the campus and some said he walked here and around but the best we have ever gotten was a brisk pace—and then only by two [fol. 1799] members of the news media, people who are in the same field of endeavor as the Associated Press.

Now one thing you want to remember about this—these witnesses is, who's got an axe to grind?

Did these kids that were on the campus and for whom disciplinary action and all threat of disciplinary action has apparently passed, have they got an axe to grind or are they telling it to you, laying it on the line the way they saw it?

You saw young Sweat, Dick Sweat, the first boy that testified here today, got himself all scared of the Judge and said, "I take it back," when he was going a little bit farther afield than he ought to go.

Those boys didn't have, haven't got anything to gain by it.

Now what about somebody that's in the news field, that's on the radio or working for a newspaper where the Associated Press controls their news and where their future in the newspaper business, certainly isn't going to help them any if they have been in here fighting the Associated Press.

So bear that in mind when you consider the stories that these various witnesses told you.

[fol. 1800] Now, we only have an hour to the side and Mr. Watts is going to give you most of the details in trying to summarize the manner, so let me go on to these questions.

The first question that was asked of you, "Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the statement, "Walker, who Sunday led a charge of students against Federal Marshals on the Ole Miss Campus" was substantially true?

We submit to you that from a preponderance of the evidence, that question ought to be answered "No", he didn't lead a charge.

The most that anybody has said is that he was with a group who walked up—Savell's own story, by deposition, is that he started from the monument here and he walked up—where is that pointer?

Well, at any rate, he walked up on a diagonal, off at an angle here until he got up here, and then he walked along the inside edge of the circle until he got some place over in here (indicating).

And he walked. Now, a thousand people takes up a lot of room. That actually is not such a big area. It is about 500 feet across. The scale is a foot to an inch and you all can have this map, you can have it moved into your Jury [fol. 1801] room and look at it and study it and look at the scale of things on there.

That's not a very big area. And it's full of trees, as, if you get up here close, those dots are trees, that will tell you pretty much about what kind of a place it was.

He didn't lead a charge. There wasn't a charge in the sense of the word that we think of charge and never did he lead one.

Nobody, even those who say he was in the forefront of a big mass movement, the defense witnesses, no one of them ever says that he issued any commands or purported to say, "Bring it up on the right, come up here on the left, all right, now double quick," or anything of that sort. Nobody says he issued any commands.

Now, certainly, if you lead a charge, you are telling people what to do. And we submit that Special Issue No. 1 should be answered "No".

Special Issue No. 2, "Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the statement, 'Walker, who Sunday led a charge of students against Federal Marshals on the Ole Miss Campus,' complained of by Plaintiff, constitutes fair comment describing the Plaintiff's activities on or about September 30, 1962, at the places described in the [fol. 1802] evidence and under the then attendant circumstances?"

Well, there isn't but one person, really and truly who can say whether what he wrote is fair comment and that's Van Savell and he is not here to tell you that, in his opinion, that was fair comment on what he actually saw.

We don't see how you could possibly, under the evidence, without Savell telling you that he thought it was fair comment on what happened, answer it yes—so we think the answer to it must be "No", that it isn't fair comment.

There was a confusion, a disorderly, disorganized confusion with lots of mad boys that had been tear gassed running up and throwing anything they could lay their hands on, but there wasn't anything of concerted action, anything bigger than small groups of half a dozen to a dozen who were sporadically running forward and throwing rocks.

Special Issue No. 3, "Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the statement inquired about in Special Issue No. 1 was made in good faith in reference to a matter in which the Defendant had a duty to report to its members and then to the public"?

[fol. 1803] Well, that phraseology, of course, is very pious phraseology but it boils itself down to one thing, good faith. Whose good faith? The good faith of the man that wrote the story. Did he come here and tell you folks, "That's the way I saw it, and I was doing my best to do my duty and I think that what I said was fair comment on what I saw and certainly my intentions were good. I did this in good faith?"

You would have to speculate to say that, yes, it was good faith because you don't know from the witness who did it, who wrote it.

We say then that the answer to Special Issue No. 3, from the preponderance of the evidence, we believe, should be "No," it was not in good faith.

It is necessary to establish that it was good faith and unless you think it's established, you should answer that question, "No."

Special Issue No. 4, "Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that in publishing the statement set forth in Special Issue No. 1, the defendant, Associated Press, was actuated by malice as that term is hereinafter defined?"

And the Court tells you that "malice," is meant ill will, bad or evil motive, or that entire want of care which would raise the belief that the act or omission complained of was [fol. 1804] the result of a conscious indifference to the right or welfare of the person to be affected by it.

"* * * * entire want of care which would raise the belief that the act or omission complained of was the result of a conscious indifference to the right or welfare of the person to be affected by it," well, in a certain sense of the word, of course, all of us are dependent for what we believe about what goes on in the world and in our country upon what we read in the newspaper. We get to the point where, if we see it in print, we are inclined to believe it's so.

And I suppose when you come right down to it, very few of us have ever analyzed what goes on behind that and I don't imagine that there are very many citizens who have had the opportunity that you folks have had here in the course of the last nine days to see just exactly how much care or lack of care goes into the printing of a story that can affect an individual and his reputation and his standing in the community as much as this story affected General Walker.

[fol. 1805] Now, we have got a most peculiar situation here. At least I hope it is peculiar. I still want to believe in my own mind and my own heart that most of these things I read in the newspapers are so. But, in this case we have got it real clear, that this young fellow with short experience, and most of that writing sports run out onto this campus and he painted a big beautiful picture as to what happened out there. And I have always heard it said that every newspaperman wants to be an author, and many of them do achieve it.

But, I don't think they ought to start their career in their first year by writing fiction, and I submit to you that from what you have heard from this witness stand, the story Van Savell wrote out there is mighty close to fiction; that there is just lots and lots of inaccuracies on his hands; lots of things that in his excitement and in the confusion that he thought he saw and that he put down.

I am going to leave to my colleague, Mr. Watts, to point out to you the differences between the story that Savell told by his deposition, and that he told to his re-write man about when the charge occurred, and the great discrepancies there are in the stories, about when the incident took [fol. 1806] place, as to whether it was before or after the speech on the monument, not even including the third story by Mr. Graham.

But, to me, the fact that Van Savell, with his light amount of experience, wrote this story and that nobody checked him, and that Van Thomas said that he got only one report about the speech and the charges and that Savell was the only person who ever reported, so far as he knew—no one but Savell reported the charge, and that Relman Morin, by his deposition, said that when he wrote the follow-up story he just picked it up from Savell and had no information except from Savell.

You have got a situation here where General Walker's reputation has been harmed and ruined by one unsupported, unsubstantiated, uncollaborated story, where nobody ever went back to check on the situation and see whether this story full of gory details could be backed up by anybody except this inexperienced young reporter, just one step beyond a cub reporter.

We think that to dissemble a story like that over the wires of the world without making any attempt to check up on it, we think that that comes under the heading of that entire want of care which would raise the belief that [fol. 1807] the act or omission complained of was the result of a conscious indifference to the right or welfare of the person to be affected by it.

Now, let me point this out. The mere publication of the story, the original story, is not itself evidence of malice. But, it was followed up, Relman Morin wrote another story and repeated all this, then along comes the story about when the General was thrown into the mental institution without warrant, and when the charges were ultimately dismissed against him, the slanted story that sticks out of context, the things which were unfavorable to the General, and failed to give the same circulation throughout the world to those stories that showed that the one psychiatrist said he was operating under a superior intelligence, and the fact that those charges were dismissed without any qualification.

[fol. 1808] So we think that when you take all of those together and look at the entire attitude of the Associated Press in this case, that your answer to Special Issue No. 4, should be "Yes," they were actuated by malice.

Now malice is either of these things, ill will, bad and evil motive—I am not going to stand here and attribute an association of many newspapers all over the world to petty gossip or evil motive and so on.

We say that it is a conscious indifference to the rights of General Walker. That is what it is.

Special Issue No. 5, do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the statement, "Walker assumed command of the crowd," was substantially true?

We think the answer to that is no. Nobody ever testified he gave any orders to the crowd. There is nobody that ever testified that anything more than a fact that with a group around him he was walking around that campus, and nobody said he ever said, "This way, come on, or let's go," or anything you would do if you were assuming the command of the crowd. We think the answer should be "no".

Special Issue No. 6, similar to Number 2. Do you find that the statement, "Walker assumed command of the crowd," was a fair comment.

[fol. 1809] The man that could tell you whether it was a fair comment isn't here. He hasn't stood up and been counted. He is unwilling to let this jury pass on him, his truth, his veracity, his—how he answers questions, whether he dodges, whether he hesitates, whether he equivocates, whether he has the appearance of truth like most of these young fellows from the University of Mississippi before you. Why you could look at those people and tell they were telling the truth.

That is what you haven't had the opportunity to do with Van Savell, and that is what the Associated Press failed to produce for you.

Number 7, do you find the statement made in Special Issue No. 5, was made in good faith. That is the same thing. We think the answer ought to be no. The man who could say it was in good faith is not here, the man who wrote it didn't come in here and tell you he did it in good faith.

[fol. 1810] And "If I hurt somebody, I am sorry."

Do you find that the statement "assume command" was actuated by malice. And the same definition of malice. We say again that the statement was made with gross indifference to the rights of General Walker.

Number 9, what sum of money do you find would compensate him. What sum of money would compensate him for the damage done to the reputation and honor of an Army General accused of insurrection. I don't know, that is the kind of thing that is so very difficult to say. One of the things that is almost impossible to say, by me.

However, we do know the story had wide circulation here through the Star Telegram. We know the Star Telegram is the Bible of the cattle country and West Texas. We know that out in the West here everybody reads the Star Telegram. We know that it's circulation is widespread. How many people read each one of these newspapers? I don't know. But, I strongly suspect there are very few homes that take more than one copy of this paper, and I suppose that almost everybody up to reading age reads that paper. Must be three or four people read every issue, every copy of it, on the average.

[fol. 1811] If the paper has got a circulation of a quarter of a million, say 250 thousand, and four people would read it, the damage that the General is asking is one buck, one dollar bill for everybody that saw and read these false stories about him.

Approximately—using those figures, and I think they are not unreasonable, that is about one million people that saw it in the Star Telegram. That is what he is asking for, one dollar for everybody that saw the story that hurt him, that ruined his reputation, creating a definite impression that here is a man, who has served his country all these years now leading an insurrection.

The question of the right of somebody who has been in the United States Army to subsequently withdraw from that Army, resign his commission and do battle against the United States has been forever settled one hundred years ago. The Civil War said you can't do it.

So, today the General Walker was doing, was leading an insurrection against his country, is a damaging statement, for a man in his position, and one for which he should be compensated.

[fol. 1812] Special Issue No. 10, do you find that this is a case in which exemplary damages should be awarded. And exemplary damages are, as the Court defines it to you, penalty or punishment.

They are in your judgment, to be awarded if you want to say to the Associated Press, "Don't do it again; don't do it again."

"Don't ruin a man's reputation without checking your story before you put them out all over the world."

We think the answer is yes, that it is a kind of a case where the punitive or exemplary damages should be allowed, and what they amount to is what you are asked in Issue No. 11.

Ladies and Gentlemen of the jury, I wouldn't attempt to tell you what amount of damages to find to punish the Associated Press, that is, if you believe he is due.

But if you view this evidence as I view it, and as I think it comes to you from the witness stand, I think you will agree with me that it is a bad, bad situation, and our knowledge of what goes on in the world can be made to depend on an unchecked, uncollaborated story that paints a man with a long career of patriotism and service to this country as, in essence, a traitor, leading an insurrection. Thank you.

[fol. 1812a] OPENING ARGUMENT OF DEFENDANT BY MR. GOOCH

Mr. Gooch: May it please the Court and Ladies and Gentlemen of the Jury. Mr. Andress, as I view it, has spent most of his time critical of our not bringing Van Savell here to testify in this case. I would respectfully call to your attention the fact that the Plaintiff in the case, through his Chief Counsel, Mr. Watts, took Van Savell's deposition, in which he was tendered to him to ask all of the questions under the sun that he might want to ask him. You heard the testimony offered by the Plaintiff in this case in which, —and we read all of the answers of Van Savell to the Jury, on the questioning by Mr. Watts, Chief Counsel for General Walker.

He says we brought no photographs. Believe you me, if we had had them we would have brought them. We couldn't find any. We brought all we could find. And I might also state to you, Ladies and Gentlemen, that from what we understand and from the witnesses' understanding, it was not very healthy to have even a pen and pencil out there on that campus that night, let alone photographs to try to take a picture.

He also says that the Associated Press should be criticized because they didn't put out that story of the type that during the sanity hearing of General Walker, that General [fol. 1812b] Walker was operating under a superior level of intelligence.

Ladies and Gentlemen, we introduced in evidence in this case, which we did not read to the Jury, but which you can take into the witness (sic) room, if you desire, a verbatim—verbatim report of Dr. Stubblefield's report, wherein it contains that phrase. The Associated Press didn't skimp by just saying "That is what one of the psychiatrists testified to," Ladies and Gentlemen. Associated Press carried the entire story, or the entire statement of Dr. Stubblefield, which contained that statement. It is there and I will not be challenged on the fact that it was introduced in evidence in this case.

Ladies and Gentlemen, at the outset of this case Mr. Watts, the lawyer from Oklahoma City, stated to you, and I quote, "A Deputy Sheriff who will be here to testify will testify that at no time did Walker lead or participate in anything remotely approximating a charge."

That is a direct quote from Mr. Watts' opening statement to this Jury.

He also said, "The Associated Press deliberately smothered the testimony that Dr. Stubblefield's report showed [fol. 1812c] that Walker was of superior high intelligence." That is a direct quote.

I have answered that there is an exhibit here wherein the Associated Press published the entire Stubblefield report, and I will get down further to Mr. Watts' promise to you in the opening of this case, that he had a Deputy Sheriff who would be here to testify, and would testify that at no time did Walker participate in anything remotely approximating a charge.

Ladies and Gentlemen of the Jury, with this nine days of testimony in which there have been some thirty witnesses heard, including depositions, the case has now died down to three simple issues. One,—and I am paraphrasing—did Walker lead a charge?

Two, as to whether or not General Walker, by his actions and the reasonable inferences you draw based on the Court's definition, assume command over a crowd there on the campus of Ole Miss.

As to whether those statements are true.

Basically that is where the case now stands, and goes into your hands.

If I may, and I don't want to impose on this Jury, I would like if I may to review some of the testimony that has been [fol. 1812d] developed before you.

You cannot decide this case on the statement of lawyers, nor can you decide the case on the innuendoes the lawyers make and the inflection of their voices. All lawyers are advocates. It is their duty to present to you all the evidence available in a way that it will be understood by all persons hearing the testimony.

Let's start out now, if I may, and I shall do my very best to stay within the record in this case as that is, of course, the way in which this matter must be determined, under the instructions of the Court.

[fol. 1813] General Walker, in November of 1961, after a distinguished career in the Army, having attained the rank of Major General, a position that not many men attain—it has to be attained on ability, on leadership study and you have to be a man of those attributes, in my opinion, to reach that high a standard in the Army of the United States—General Walker, for some reason, he explains it, he says, among others, he said, he resigned in November of 1961, and I quote him again, this is General Walker's testimony, "I resigned in order that I might speak out."

Now, I don't criticize in any way General Walker or any other man who says he has a right to speak out.

The Constitution of the United States says a man has a right to speak out. The Constitution refers to freedom of speech and freedom of press. I assume that's to what General Walker alluded.

Now, let's take step by step, though, if you will, please, and see if it was speaking, speaking out, that he was doing or whether there was another connotation, particularly—and I will confine myself now—to the Mississippi incident.

The evidence is quite clear that by September 25th, 1962, [fol. 1814] it was evident to everybody in the world that the highest Court having jurisdiction of this matter had said that Meredith was to be entered as a student at Ole Miss University.

The court had said so, an injunction had been granted against all of the officials of Mississippi and others having knowledge of that Court decree.

What do we find? We find General Walker—and this is his testimony, if you please—calling, as he said he did, a Shreveport radio station and issuing the following statement:

Now, this statement has to come to a listener in the concept of how the listener wants to receive it, but by the same token there are some words that have such a clear meaning that they could not be misunderstood by anybody.

Let's live again, if we will, or hear again a portion of General Walker's address that he asked the radio station over in Louisiana, Shreveport, to carry, his first sentence:

"It is time to move." Now, does "move" mean to anybody in the world that he is to talk?

If you can reach that connotation from that word "move", let's go further and see how General Walker, in his statement, interpreted it:

[fol. 1815] "We have talked, listened and been pushed around far too much by the anti-Christ Supreme Court. Rise."

Now, if there was any doubt in anybody's mind as to what General Walker meant when he said "move" he certainly clarified it in the following portion of his statement.

He goes on down, "Bring your flag, your tent and your skillet. It's time. Now or never. The time is when and if the President of the United States commits or uses any troops, Federal or State, in Mississippi."

I don't think that that needs too much argument as to the connotation to be placed on his statement when he invited the world at large to move.

[fol. 1816] But let's take and see if it calmed that down any. Here is an interview—oh, let's make this chronological. He spoke from Dallas on the next night and it was almost identical, when he said the same things:

"We have talked, listened and been pushed around far too much by the anti-Christ Supreme Court."

Then he goes on down to talk about the flags, the tents and the skillets. And then he's asked this question, and do you remember the TV tape on this, "General, if the forces go, would you lead this force?"

General Walker says, "When I introduced this," well, there is stars, there is pauses, so to fill up those pauses, we play to you the full speech and the moving mouth of General Walker.

"General, if the forces go," inquired a reporter, "Will you lead this force?

for patriotic Americans for patriotic Americans all over the nation. It is a movement of freedom. I will be there. Rise to stand. Now is the time to be heard. Thousands strong from every state in the Union, rally to the cause of freedom."

Again he says, "We have talked too much. Let's rise. Let's get along."

On the 28th of September—mind you, these follow in [fol. 1817] the sequence from September 25th, the day when Meredith was forcibly barred from the University of Mississippi by the Governor, or Lt. Governor Paul Johnson, under the orders of the Governor, all of which General Walker knew—he testified that he knew that.

He goes on to say in this interview, "Sir, what has been the general reactions to your plans of going to Mississippi with troops of citizens? I am sure you have heard from quite a few people throughout the United States."

General Walker, quoting, "We are just utterly swamped here with telephone calls and offers of help and assistance and notifications that people are moving to Mississippi and that they want to assist in every way possible, that they are opposed to what the Administration is doing in opposing the Governor of Mississippi.

"I can assure you that the telephones never stop ringing, calls are backed up six and eight deep. People are telling me it's taking five or six hours even to get into our telephone system and we have seven phones in the house.

"Messages are coming in offering support of groups of 10 to 20 to even 2,000."

[fol. 1818] "Interviewer: Do you have plans, sir, for rallies if and when the Federal troops are entered in Mississippi of a certain point in the State where all your followers will then meet with you to protect the integration, if it does comes about?

"General Walker: I intend to join the movement. There are thousands of people I am sure already in Mississippi. Probably hundreds of thousands there that are already standing beside their Governor Barnett.

"The best place to do this would, of course, be the Capitol or at Oxford, at the University, since that is where the issues involved, and I am sure that is where most of the movements will move to, to show the grass roots in this movement."

Let's go a step further, if you will, please. That's Exhibit 12.

Down at Jackson, Mississippi, where he had gone on the 29th, after he had received a call, as testified from Mr. Leman, who was in Mississippi reviewing the situation for him, he has an interview at the Sun & Sands Motel. Here is what he said:

"I am in Mississippi beside Gov. Ross Barnett. I call for a national protest against the conspiracy from within. Rally to the cause of freedom in righteous indignation, [fol. 1819] violent vocal protest and bitter silence under the flag of Mississippi at the use of Federal troops."

He didn't stop at Federal troops. "This day is a disgrace to the nation in dire peril, a disgrace beyond the capacity of anyone except its enemies. This is the sovereignty of the crucifixion by the anti-Christ conspiracy by the Supreme Court in their denial of prayer and their betrayal of a nation."

That was from Jackson. This is still a part of this matter.

The next one, if you will, please, and I don't want to bore you, but to merely get this in context. This is the one that General Walker made from his home in Dallas around 9:00 o'clock, he testified, on September 30th, 1962, and again at the Ole Miss Motel that afternoon at his press conference when he said—and the heading of it, "On to Mississippi," here is what he said:

"As the Armed Forces of the New Frontier assemble to the north, let history be witness to the courage and determination that calls us to Oxford to support a courageous Governor. His lawful stand for state sovereignty is supported by thousands of people beyond the state borders [fol. 1820] now on the way to join you at Oxford."

Now, nobody sought out General Walker to issue this call after these orders had been confirmed on September the 25th. By General Walker's testimony, he called the various news media and suggested to them that he had something to say that was of vital interest to the people within the sound of his voice over the various news media.

At that time he was calling upon the news media, of which the Associated Press is one, to let the world know that he was on the move, that he was going to Mississippi, that he was going to join the movement, that he was going to stand behind Governor Ross Barnett.

[fol. 1821] He testifies in his own testimony that at the time he got to Mississippi, that at the time he got on the campus of Mississippi, that he still knew that Governor Barnett was opposing the entry of Meredith and that he had so far, or thus far, barred Meredith's entry into the campus of the University of Ole Mississippi by force.

General Walker, after he got to Mississippi—and let's take his version, not anybody else's—he calls on the Sheriff, and let's see what General Walker said:

"I tendered my services to Sheriff Ford."

At that time he testified that he knew that the National Guard of Mississippi, the police officers, the Constables and the Sheriffs were under the direct control of Governor Ross Barnett.

He testifies that he knew that those three governing bodies or law enforcement bodies had successfully, under the direction of Governor Barnett, barred the entrance of Meredith to the campus of the University of Ole Miss. He tenders his service to Sheriff Ford.

Now he has stated that he heard that there were troops in the vicinity. Yet, he was bound to admit, because of his training as a soldier, that troops in a matter such as this could be called out only by the President of the United States.

[fol. 1822] He first testified—and I quote him correctly—that he didn't know for sure that Meredith was on the campus when he went there at the time the rioting was going on, on September 30th, 1962.

Yet he finally did admit, because he knew he had to, that he had been told by the representative of the Governor at the Sheriff's office around 6:00 o'clock that night, that Meredith was on the campus.

He was, also, told—and he admits that—he heard President Kennedy's speech that night, the very first of President Kennedy's speech, advising the nation that Meredith was on the campus at the University of Ole Miss.

So at that time, at that time, Ladies and Gentlemen, he knew that Meredith was in the residence on the campus of the University of Mississippi.

What did he do? He said he heard there was some trouble out there and he went out to see it as an observer.

Now Ladies and Gentlemen, let's see if he was an observer and let's see what his actions were and how he had contrasted his actions.

When General Walker was commanding the troops in Little Rock in 1957, at the Little Rock integration, he identified from this witness stand a speech he made there.

[fol. 1823] He refers to the question of integration. "This decision," I quote from General Walker's speech, "This decision by the highest court in the land is, of course, an authoritative interpretation of our Constitution. It is binding on all citizens and government officers, both State and Federal and may not under our law be changed except by amendment to the Constitution.

"What does all this mean to you students? You have often heard it said, no doubt, that the United States is a nation under law and not under men. This means that we are governed by laws properly decided upon by duly constituted authority and not by the Decrees of one man or one class of men.

"Since this is true, it means that we are all subject to all the laws, whether we approve of them personally or not and as law-abiding citizens, have an obligation in conscience to obey them. There can be no exceptions.

"If it were otherwise, we would not be a strong nation but a mere unruly mob."

[fol. 1824] Let's take up next, if you will, please, what President Kennedy said on this same subject, and I think you will note a rather strong similarity. I quote from President Kennedy's speech that General Walker heard at the Mansion House Cafe, 8:00 o'clock on September the 30th, 1962:

"Americans are free, in short, to disagree with any law, but not to disobey it. For in a Government of laws and Government of men, no man, however prominent or powerful, and no mob, however unruly or boisterous, is entitled to defy a Court of Law.

"If this country should ever reach the point where any man or group of men by force or threat of force could long defy the commands of our Courts and Constitution, then no law would stand free from doubt, no Judge would be sure of his Writ and no citizen would be safe from his neighbors."

Now, Ladies and Gentlemen, it was with that speech of the President which is very closely similar to the one that General Walker made in Little Rock, Arkansas, in 1957, to which General Walker gave utterance, according to his testimony, "nauseating, nauseating."

At about that time he says that he heard of this trouble on the campus, he went out to see. Did he go out to see? [fol. 1825] Ladies and Gentlemen, he testified that he got on the campus, that he asked or sought what was going on. The testimony shows that he was informed that it had been going on in a riotous manner for about an hour.

He was asked in connection with casualties what he said, one witness said he said, "Good, good." He said he does not know whether he said that or not. That's his testimony.

We find, then, according to General Walker's testimony, reluctant though it was, that he did go toward the Marshals with a group.

The testimony on that varies from anywhere from five to six, according to the witnesses, to fifteen to twenty-five to fifty to seventy-five and on up to the astronomical figure of a thousand. I don't know. I wasn't there.

The witnesses have testified, though, without any conflict on those that saw General Walker that he made a movement toward the Marshals that night, before he made his speech in which some number of followers went with him.

Now, let's see what this Deputy Sheriff that Mr. Watts so dramatically portrayed says. He says "The Deputy Sheriff who will be here to testify, will testify at no time. [fol. 1826] did Walker lead or participate in anything remotely approximating a charge." This Deputy Sheriff whom he identified in his pleadings, a man by the name of Witt.

And I take some of this statement, in getting at the pertinent parts:

"Somewhere along during this time, it seemed that all of the State Highway Patrolmen left the campus, as did also some of the law officers, that is, Sheriffs or Deputy Sheriffs, but I stayed on to render any assistance that I could.

"Sometime around 8:00 o'clock or a little later, I began to hear different ones say, 'Here comes General Walker'."

I did not know him prior to that time. And when I first saw him, he was walking toward the Confederate monument, which was several hundred yards in an easterly direction from the Marshals at the Lyceum Building.

"People in the crowd around General Walker began to say different things. Several of them began to say 'We have got a leader now,' or 'Here is our leader.'

"I had on my deputy sheriff's badge and shortly after General Walker arrived in the territory of the Confederate [fol. 1827] monument, he came up to me, shook hands and said, 'I would like for you to deputize me, to help in this matter.' I told him I did not have authority to do that, that I was a Deputy Sheriff, was not a Deputy in that county.

[fol. 1828] Let's pause right there a moment. Earlier in the day, General Walker had tendered his services to Sheriff Ford. At that time Sheriff Ford, according to General Walker, was under the orders of Governor Ross Barnett, to keep Meredith from becoming a student on the campus of Ole Mississippi. In his speech that night, and you will all recall that, he told them that Barnett had not sold them out, that Birdsong had acted contrary to his wishes and to his orders and had let the Marshals on the campus and, therefore, was disobeying the wishes of Governor Barnett.

General Walker now says that that was facetious. That's the first time we have heard that. The Deputy Sheriff was dead serious, apparently, from what he's testified to.

Let's go on with Talmage Witt, the Deputy Sheriff. "I was close to General Walker all the time, from the time he first arrived until a considerable time thereafter.

"Some few minutes after this, various people were asking General Walker to lead them and to make a speech and tell them what to do. Then after a while, he got up on the side of the Confederate monument and made a talk.

"I cannot recall all of the things he said, but I do re- [fol. 1829] member these things: 'Violence is not the answer. Cuba is that way,' and pointed south. He said, 'Protest, protest all you want to. You have a right to protest. They may run out of gas.' He said, 'Help is on the way, thousands are coming.'"

Does that ring true with the statement, when he asked thousands to come, ten thousand from every state to join him, to stand beside Governor Ross Barnett in Mississippi?

"A preacher had been following General Walker," again quoting from the witness, "asking him not to lead the crowd but to get them to stop what they were doing. This preacher said to Walker, 'They will listen to you and do anything you say. Please get them to stop and go home.'"

That's pretty nearly what Reverend Gray testified to.

"And Walker said, 'I am here to watch what happens. I am not interested in stopping it.'"

A portion of that was confirmed by Reverend Gray.

"Walker said, 'You make me ashamed I am an Episcopalian.'" And talks about the threats to the preacher and he took him away.

"After some in the crowd had asked Walker if he would lead them, he stepped down from the side of the monument [fol. 1830] and said, 'Keep protesting and see if we can get closer. . . .'

"He then started towards the Marshals and the crowd of at least a thousand by that time followed him. This crowd was armed with sticks, rocks, Coca-Cola bottles and things as I have heretofore said. They seemed to have everything they could get their hands on. And when they got close enough, they would throw towards the Marshals.

"When the front of this crowd which General Walker was with got within about 200 feet of the Marshals, they fired another blast of tear gas and the crowd ran back with General Walker with them."

At all times during this, I was near or in sight of General Walker and stayed in sight of him until 5:00 a.m., the next morning.

"On a number of occasions, Walker would walk toward the Marshals or in that general direction and whenever he did, a large crowd would follow—would fall in behind him and follow him. In fact, wherever Walker went, the crowd followed.

"During the time after the first march towards the Marshals with Walker at or near the lead, I heard different statements, many of which I cannot remember. But at one time in talking with the group about the protest they [fol. 1831] were making, he said, 'Good, good, keep it up.'

"I heard people asking how to snuff out tear gas and so forth."

He goes on to describe the various rioting that he saw there that night. Now let's see just what must have been in the minds of those people, students, or what-not, at the time General Walker arrived on that campus, according to his testimony, around 8:45 p.m., on September the 30th, 1962.

Here was a group of howling, mobbing students. [fol. 1832] General Walker was immediately informed of what was going on. He could see, and he tells you he saw that they were rioting, there were bricks being thrown at the Marshals. What does he do? Let's take a look at the situation, from the people that he accosted there on the campus there that night. These boys were of an impressionable age. If they were not students, so they were Walker's Army. These boys on the campus, 17, 18, 19 and 20-year-old boys, wrought up about this thing, they felt very strongly because their Governor had been challenged. They felt that they had been let down. What a beautiful position for a man to take command over the crowd, to walk in, a former Major-General of the United States Army, who had announced publicly on four occasions that he was coming to Mississippi to stand beside Governor Ross Barnett and prevent the entry of Meredith into the University of Ole Miss, what a thing to—what a lift it would have made, what a lift it would make to anybody to have a man of that stature stride on the campus, an imposing figure in the midst of riot and turmoil.

He says they didn't welcome him. Yet he admits to all persons concerned they said, "Here is our leader. Our leader, lead us," said, "will you lead us up to the steps"? He says he didn't. Let's take his action.

[fol. 1833] He says he went up there with the group. He knew that they were throwing rocks, bricks, stones and bottles at the Marshals. What more encouragement to the group of this impressionable age, than to have the man of the stature of General Walker walk in there amidst them, discuss their problems with them, and then tell them to keep on protesting, keep up the protest, you have every right to protest under the Constitution of the United States. If there is going to be any bloodshed let it be on the hands of the United States Marshals. We have got casualties. You will be heard around the world.

I can't think of any more inviting statement than for a man of that stature to walk on that campus with that group, cast himself in the role, haven't I promised them support, and at that time, the witnesses, some of them, say that he answered, in response, "Where are your troops?

"They are coming; they will be around when necessary."

As to whether or not they were students or not, I don't know. I can't prove it, I can't attempt to prove that they were General Walker's students, but there is testimony in this case by Dean Love that 160 were arrested and of that [fol. 1834] group 25 were students. Mathematically, you can figure that only 17 percent of those arrested were students. I am not trying to project that over the entire campus. There is no way of knowing that, but statistically that is what it shows. We do not—we do know, according to Dean Love, that there was rifle fire, bullets whistling around the heads of some people. We know that a number—I believe Dean Love said 10 or 11 bullet holes were imbedded in the front of that Lyceum Building. We have General Walker's statement that what he said from the monument—I would like to quote that, if you please.

General Walker said—here is General Walker's quote. "I decided to make a speech to about 150 students at the monument."

Now mind you, Ladies and Gentlemen of the jury, the Court has not made inquiry in this matter as to whether or not the charge was before the speech or after the speech. It says was the charge made?

Therefore, under the Court's charge, it is whether or not in your opinion, according to the evidence, the charge was led by General Walker.

You heard him say that—this is what General Walker said, that nobody came to Mississippi for violence, that no violence was intended. Now how does that contrast with [fol. 1835] some of the statements of some of the witnesses attempting to testify on General Walker's behalf that no violence—that there should be no violence, that they should not engage in violence.

Now these are General Walker's words. This is the past tense. No violence was intended. Yet at the very time he was making this statement about no violence intended, the rocks were being thrown, the gas was being shot, and the various activities you heard so graphically described that have been laid out before you were going on. Let's see what else. "If there is any blood shed in Mississippi, or Oxford, let it be on the hands of the Federal Government. Cuba that way." He says he told them, and this is where he says he was trying to appease them, he told them that the "Governor's orders and his desires have not been carried out."

He says who violated them? He leaned over, and he said, "Birdsong."

Now, Ladies and Gentlemen, is it conducive to quieting down a rioting mob to tell them that the Governor's orders that Meredith was not on the campus, that Meredith still shouldn't be there, that Governor Barnett was saying even at that moment, according to General Walker, "It is my order and desire that those Marshals and Meredith not [fol. 1836] come on that campus. The man who sold you out is Col. Birdsong."

I can't imagine any more of a call to arms than to tell those students who had been supporting their Governor Barnett throughout all this time, who had backed him in every way, to keep Meredith out of that University, than to tell them "Barnett says still keep him out; still keep him out."

General Walker says Barnett has not changed his position. He has not sold you out. It is Birdsong.

Now we get down to the conflicting testimony in this case. Not too much conflict. I am not going to try to quote from the testimony of these some 30 witnesses who testified here personally, or by deposition, but at least three-fourths of them told you that all that they saw on the campus that night, they put General Walker walking in the direction anywhere from a saunter to a fast clip from the monument toward the flagpole and beyond, followed by a group of that howling mob.

The Court has not differentiated, if you will notice, between the time that the Charge was made. The Court has defined very properly what a charge is, "a movement toward the Marshals," and they had the General ahead of them, and we had witness after witness putting him there. [fol. 1837] The numbers have varied, but the movement has not varied materially.

Now, Ladies and Gentlemen, again, this case is entirely in your hands. You are the Supreme Court as far as the facts in this case are concerned. You can write in this verdict that a man has the right to take unto himself the law in his own hands; you can write in this verdict the man has the right to flaunt Constitutional authority, flaunt the Courts, by a one-man rule, or you can say that is not the way, the American way in this life to act.

Mr. Andress has told you that in connection with these questions—but before I get to that, many, many times Mr. Watts questioned the witness, "Did you see an AP (sic) report, in which it stated an AP (sic) writer by the name of Kuettner had written a story in which he said Walker begged the students to quit their violence or cease their violence during a lull."

No such newspaper release has been introduced in this record. Just before we closed today we put in this record the UPI story he says Kuettner wrote.

I may have said Associated Press. I meant UPI.

No UPI report purporting to say what he said it said is in evidence in this case. The UPI report says that Walker mounted the statue (sic) I never can pronounce [fol. 1838] that word statue, and said something about violence. I will read it to you. I can't quote it. Then he comes along and says in a paragraph down here that General Walker again mounted the statue and complimented the students on what they were doing that night.

Which are you going to believe? Going to believe both? General Walker says no violence was intended. That is General Walker's statement. Is that urging people to cease their violence? My interpolation of that, and I am entitled to interpolate what I hear the same as you, he says, "Perhaps we shouldn't have had any violence, we didn't intend there to be any, but now that you have got it keep it up, keep it up, you have got a right to protest. Keep up your protest, you are doing all right, you will be heard, let the blood be on the hands of the Federal Government."

As I stated at the outset, I shall not attempt to re-read the vivid instructions that the Court has given you. The first issue inquires whether or not in substance the story stating that General Walker led a charge was true.

I believe that under the evidence in this case that you will find that the true answer to that story is "Yes."

Number 2, as to whether or not the statement that Gen- [fol. 1839] eral Walker led the Marshals, (sic) on the campus—or led a charge against the Marshals is a fair comment. I believe that under the evidence that you certainly should answer that question yes.

The next question is whether or not the statements were made in good faith. I don't see how you can answer it any way other than yes, in that connection.

Now Mr. Andress criticized this 21 or 22-year old boy. Mr. Watts took his deposition all day, which is rather evident. He would seem to think that nobody but a middle-aged man should be allowed to express himself on any matters of important news coverage.

Let's back up just a moment and consider that. Here is General Walker, who according to his testimony, is somewhere around 52, 53 or 54. Let's take his action. Let's take his report. Is youth so bad that youth cannot see and understand the nature and import of an event that unfurls itself in his very presence? I say to you youth is not—is no curse. It is something we all lose after time comes, and something we treasure greatly, and I have great respect for the youth of this country.

Number 5. Did you find from a preponderance of the evidence that Walker assumed command of the crowd?

How much more could a man do of Walker's stature, [fol. 1840] a retired Major-General in the United States Army, after having called four times for people to come to Oxford to assist him in keeping Meredith out of the University of Mississippi, getting on that campus, and there were those rioters. "You are doing all right, keep up the protest."

There is testimony, he said, "I will lead you."

There is testimony "Let's go up and see what is happening." How? Regardless of what he said. I would say at least 15 of the witnesses have testified that Walker went with a howling mob from an area near the statue on the campus of Ole Miss, up, some of them said he didn't get quite all the way to the flagpole, some of them said he got to the flagpole, and some said that he got way up here, but they all said that when General Walker walked in that direction that mob of students, regardless of how many were in it; that the tear gas was shot by the Marshals, and the crowd was forced to retreat.

Now Ladies and Gentlemen, I am reasonably sure, having had some experience in these matters, that long since you have come to a conclusion about how you feel about this entire matter. I am reasonably sure you feel the lawyers are taking up your valuable time in attempting to stand here and tell you their version of the case. I sin- [fol. 1841] cerely hope not, because I think you should do as you see fit, based on the evidence, with any guidance the lawyers can give you, of course, is what they are for as is the Court.

The Court told you here about malice. Well, who was mad? Ill will? Here is a man that has acquired the stature of Major-General of the United States. He has called in the press. He says, "Tell the world what my plans are, to go to Mississippi. Tell the world, and I will tell the world, come on, bring your flags, your tents and your skillets."

He testified very truthfully he knew his going to Mississippi and to the campus would create publicity. Why else would he call in the news media and ask for these volunteers to come join him there? Why, Ladies and Gentlemen, he hadn't but one purpose in the world, to advertise his going, to seek help to his cause, and to attempt to carry out the directive of Governor Ross Barnett. Let's stop right there a moment.

He testified he let Governor Barnett know where he was, but he says he never was contacted by Governor Barnett. Then he makes the call, "On to Oxford from Jackson." I take that as commanding these hoards that he had sought to come. He says, "Don't go to Jackson as we first planned [fol. 1842] the action—the action is all at Oxford. Come on over to Oxford; on to Oxford; on to Mississippi."

Who could have been mad? Not a question of being mad. A citizen of the prominence of General Walker, who according to his testimony has made speeches throughout the length and breadth of the land—incidentally, he testified there had been a constant demand on his time for speeches from the time he resigned in November, 1961, and that there had been no lessening of that since the Mississippi incident—here is a man who offered himself as a candidate for Governor of the State of Texas, in which he had every right in the world to exercise his views, and I don't criticize that.

I am reminded somewhat of the philosopher Voltaire's statement. I am sure you have all read it, when he stated with respect to a controversy—I believe these were his words, "Sir, I do not agree with the words you have said here tonight but I will defend with my life your right to say them."

That, in effect, is what the Constitution of the United States says. You can say whatever you please if you can find a forum to listen. General Walker testified he has been able to find listeners, both from the podium and through the media. He says he has no trouble getting press releases. A man of that stature who would call for [fol. 1843] volunteers, who would go and get himself mixed up with the stature that he had in a situation like that, telling the students, "Keep on protesting, your Governor is still behind you, he has not sold you out"—how much more of an incentive would these students want than to be told by a man of that stature, a man of that public action, "Here I am to help you, keep on protesting, you have got a right to protest. Let's go there, let's go up there."

Is there any malice? Is anybody mad? Why, Ladies and Gentlemen, that is the very purpose he went there for, was to get publicity to his avowed purpose of standing shoulder to shoulder with Governor Ross Barnett in defying the orders of the Federal Court and the Constitutional authorities.

Now he has said repeatedly that he only intended to go on that campus to do anything about this matter when Federal troops were used. By his own statement he knew when he went on the campus that night that there were no Federal troops on that campus, and all of his testimony is that Federal troops were not brought on that campus until such time as the Marshals had been almost completely exhausted; that the troops did not come in until about midnight. So his excuse that he was going to take part in [fol. 1844] this matter when and if troops were used is not valid, because he knows and he testified the troops cannot be called in that situation except by order of the President, and that order shows that no troops was issued (sic) until September 30, 1962.

Malice? Reports? Ladies and Gentlemen of the Jury, this is my firm conviction, based on the evidence and not from a biased standpoint, that the evidence almost without exception shows that General Walker led a charge towards the Marshals there on that campus that night, and that by his actions he commanded the crowd, by voice, by his statements and by his injunction, "Keep up the protest, you have a right to protest."

Ladies and Gentlemen of the Jury, I believe that you will find from a preponderance of the evidence that the story printed by the Associated Press and carried in the Star Telegram was true, substantially true, as the Court defines it. That Walker assumed command of the crowd, as proven by virtue of his speech, by virtue of his taking out and being followed by this massive group that went forward. I don't believe you can say any malice was there.

The way a man stays prominent in public life is to have [fol. 1845] his activities reported by the press. The press owes it to the public to see to it that the activities of public officials are published, or revealed as to their actions to the general public. I don't believe that you can find that any malice occurred. I believe you will find, I sincerely believe these statements as made were true.

Again I address myself, because Mr. Andress made such a point—it was not a question in this case of what Savell has said, or—although he testified fully by deposition. At the very outset of this case the Associated Press stood before you and said, "We stipulate that this story that appeared in the Star Telegram on October 1st, 1962, was the story written by Van Savell. Van Savell was an employee of the Associated Press. And that is the story on which we are trying this case, as to whether the facts as stated therein are true and correct. I don't know what it gives you to bring in a man, even though he was brought to them for all the questions they wanted to ask, and I knew every one of the questions asked in the Savell deposition was by Plaintiff's counsel in this case. Not one question was asked by the Defense Counsel. They tendered them and turned it over to them to ask anything in the world they wanted to.

[fol. 1846] So the story, in my opinion, based on the evidence, is true. I appreciate your kind attention, you have been a most attentive jury. I am confident to leave this matter in your hands. I thank you.

The Court: I am going to recess until 10 minutes until 4:00.

(Short recess was had.)

[fol. 1847] The Court: All right, Mr. Watts.

ARGUMENT OF PLAINTIFF BY MR. WATTS

Mr. Watts: Your Honor, Ladies and Gentlemen, anything for a story. Anything for a story.

To me, the tragedy of this lawsuit is the ruthless and cold-blooded manner in which an organization that extends its services around the world will mis-use the talents and the concepts of veracity of young men twenty, twenty-one, twenty-two will bring them into a Court of Justice and Law, some of them, and tell conflicting stories such as were tragically produced from this witness stand in a manner such as I have never seen in more than thirty years of the practice of law.

We appear before you Ladies and Gentlemen of the Jury in a solemn hour, facing an ominous and uncertain future for the lives of our country, our children and, above all, the cause of freedom.

The parties to this lawsuit, General Walker and the Associated Press, anxiously await your verdict in this case.

But the issues, Ladies and Gentlemen, now before you and about to be decided by you are far above and beyond, far bigger than the parties to this action, bigger than General Walker, bigger than even the Associated Press, bigger than [fol. 1848] myself, bigger than even Mr. Gooch.

They involve the question of the absolute survival of this country. While Mr. Gooch was speaking, I sat down and made notes of some of the principles that are involved in this lawsuit.

They go to the very essence of Americanism, of survival, of freedom, not only of America but of Christian civilization itself.

This is what's involved in this case: It's not a question of covering the issues with a smoke screen as Mr. Gooch has so cleverly done, as he has so capably shifted the question of the truth or the falsity of the statement that was printed under the authority of the Associated Press.

Here are the issues involved:

"Know the truth and the truth shall make you free."

Now, the American people, my friends, are dependent, as dependent upon the news service of this country for their knowledge and concepts of the truth as is a nursing baby upon his mother.

And when standards of integrity and irresponsibility, such as I have seen come from the witness stand produced by the Associated Press in this case, are taken as commonplace, by the people who have not only the power and the [fol. 1849] capability to shape the lives and the public image of their human beings, but have a sacred trust to the American people to produce the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth.

Now, the issue in this case is not, did General Walker defy a Court order—which I will guarantee you a man of his caliber did not even consider. The issue in this case, Ladies and Gentlemen, is "Who told the truth?" I'll get into that with you in just a few minutes.

Now, the next problem that we have before us, "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor." Thou shalt, Associated Press, maintain and carry forward your duty, your responsibility, your sacred trust to the American people, to avoid smearing as a lunatic and an insurrectionist—

Mr. Gooch: If the Court please, there is no testimony in this case of smearing as a lunatic.

The Court: Sustained.

Mr. Watts: We are entitled to relative comments.

The Court: Sustained.

Mr. Gooch: Move the Jury be instructed not to consider it.

Mr. Watts: To smear, if Your Honor please—

The Court: I sustained that.

[fol. 1850] Mr. Watts: Is that charged against me?

The Court: No.

Mr. Watts: To smear, if Your Honor please, and Ladies and Gentlemen of the Jury, an old friend of mine, a man whose concepts of duty, honor, country, reach a sublime plane of selfless devotion, a man who, for the greater part of his adult life, has lived above and beyond the call of duty in the defense of the country for which he would gladly give his life.

If he had the capability to roll back the sands of time and reverse the trend of this great country of ours from supreme greatness to the brink of disaster that has resulted in the last nineteen years, largely from as a direct and proximate result of things that we have seen, from this witness stand, Ted Walker, I'll guarantee you, would gladly give his life. We have here the kind of a man who will come into Court and under oath—he's got enough guts to come in here and look you Ladies and Gentlemen of the Jury in the eye—if you think he's lying—and that's the sole question in this case, is Ted Walker lying when he tells you that he did not lead a charge against those Marshals at the University of Mississippi? O is this absent witness, Van H. [fol. 1851] Savell, indulging in anything for a story? As tragically did this young lad, Hill, who came in here and made the most miserable, the most obviously distorted and twisted, fabricated presentation of an alleged state of facts that I have ever seen in thirty-two years of practicing law, as did this last poor lad whom they brought in here, took him out in the hall, contrary to the advice and admonition that was given to him, and said, "Say, you are getting your time all mixed up. Get back on that witness stand and tell a different story."

Now, Ladies and Gentlemen of the Jury, is that the concept of integrity? Is that the concept of truth, honor, responsibility? Let an organization such as the Associated Press, who has within their capability to make fools or criminals of everybody in the United States, is that the type of performance that they can come into this Court and ask you to condone?

Are you going to permit them to come in and shift the issues in this lawsuit from questions that are not involved to—and away from the question of who told the truth?

Now, the next issue involved: "He who steals my purse, steals trash. But he who steals my good name steals that [fol. 1852] which enricheth him not and makes me poor indeed."

We have General Walker here converted into a stupid, alleged leader, in the words of Mr. Relman Morin—Mr. Relman Morin, a very capable, widely experienced representative of the Associated Press, who says that Walker's on the opposite side here. He came to lead tens of thousands of volunteers to aid the cause of Gov. Ross Barnett, but his only troops last night were a band of students and other persons—a performance, which if true, as was stated by his old Army buddy, an old horseman, Colonel Dornblaser, made him appear absolutely a lunatic, if that were true.

Now, the question, Ladies and Gentlemen of the Jury, is it true? And as I pointed out to you, there is an unbelievable conflict, there is a conflict, the likes of which I have never seen in a Court of Justice and law, and finally when we get to Courts of Justice and Law, the last and final principle now before you, Ladies and Gentlemen of the Jury, is this:

It is the end of justice that no one shall suffer wrong. Now, the question in this case is, have these people given [fol. 1853] General Walker what he deserves? Or have they lied about him? This is stark reality. We are dealing with simple issues—truth and falsity, to lie or not to lie.

I have heard General Walker as of the time when he was just a Colonel, as of the time of Korea, come forward with a concept that we must now fight for the right to fight.

In this case, Ladies and Gentlemen of the Jury, under the technical guise of fair comment, the Associated Press is fighting for the right to lie.

They have come in to Court and told you a fantastic state of affairs and a story that General Walker strode down University Boulevard, met the leaders of the mob in the front of the statue, assumed command and with a thousand people behind him, ran roughshod in a charge across the Circle.

Either that happened or it didn't happen. Either it's the truth or a lie.

Now, there is no middleway between it. It's not a falsehood, it's not a mistake, it's not an error—either it's a deliberately fabricated lie that destroyed the reputation of General Walker as a man, a law-abiding citizen of integrity and responsibility or it is the truth. I don't believe it is the truth. I don't believe it's the truth.

[fol. 1854] I think General Walker tells you the truth when he said he came up the sidewalk—not the street—he walked up in this area here about halfway to the flagpole and observed what was going on. After the Highway Patrol left, he made a speech on the monument, which I don't have time to repeat. You know what it is almost verbatim.

After the speech on the monument, he got down, visited around in here for a while, shook hands with a lot of people, talked to them, heard their reports and in many reports—this is typical and symbolic of the depths to which people will go to try to smear a man, they said Ted came out here and said, "Riot, riot."

I'm sure you've heard and I'm sure you followed the very clever cross examination of my colleague, I'm sure you heard General Walker in his testimony say, "Right, right;" that's a very common expression of his and I don't believe that bird that wrote it down converted "right" to "riot" in good faith. I think it's just like all the rest of this stuff that the Associated Press is bringing into this court of justice and law to confuse and cover up and hide the real issue in the lawsuit.

Now, what is the real issue? Ladies and Gentlemen of [fol. 1855] the Jury, I have never before seen evidence in a lawsuit comparable to what we have here. We are trying not one lawsuit but three. We are trying not one charge, such as Van Savell reported, that Walker came on the campus, led the leaders—met the leaders of the mob, assumed command and led a charge, then he fell back to the monument, made a speech—that's what Van Savell reported, but that's not the lawsuit we are trying. They very cleverly endeavored to shift that from their lawsuit to something they think they can prove.

We have three lawsuits. All of them under oath. Now, the question is, who is telling the truth and when.

There is an old Latin maxim I learned when I first started out in law school: "Falsus en uno falsus en omnis." That means when a guy lies once, you can't believe anything he says.

Now, let's see what they say. Charge—the charge was before the speech. Van Savell—I just hope I have time to do this, but I am going to violate all principles of giving cases to the Jury because Ladies and Gentlemen, to me this is not an argument, this is a matter of principle.

I am going to cover here briefly some of the things that [fol. 1856] Van Savell said. "Then I heard a comment behind me to the general effect and I don't remember the exact wording, 'Here is General Walker, here comes General Walker,' and I turned and I saw striding fifteen yards behind me, General Walker," and I hate to have to go fast but I have got to do it.

"On which side of the road?

"More or less in the middle.

"He stood there looking around and I moved closer. I was probably within five or six feet of him, and this same person with the Confederate flag and multi-colored shirt, mostly red, said, 'General, will you lead us to the steps,' and Mr. Walker made no comment, he sort of scratched his head . . . looked like somebody who might be thinking . . . raised his head and looked this fellow squarely in the face and nodded his head.

"At this time were there any personnel west of the monument?

"West of the monument, I didn't see anyone . . .

"Had all the crowd then moved back into the street east of the monument?

"That's my understanding.

"They were walking due west—no, as you were."

[fol. 1857] "The group backed up or away from the front of Mr. Walker and this boy took his right hand and grabbed hold of the General's left arm, and another person on the other side did the same thing."

A fantastic state of report and something that you know, I know, and Mr. Gooch knows didn't happen.

He can sit there and grin and smirk all he wants to but it didn't happen, Ladies and Gentlemen of the Jury, and he knows it didn't happen.

". . . they were walking due west, they walked around the monument . . . to the north of the monument, and then they walked straight toward the Lyceum Building for ten or fifteen yards.

"On the sidewalk or on the grass?

"On the grass.

"North or south of the walk?

"North of the walk.

Question: "At what rate of speed?

"Normal.

"After Walker went ten or fifteen yards, they sort of veered to the right . . . in more of a northwesterly direction.

"We walked for about ten or fifteen yards . . . veered to the right . . . in a circular manner . . . bordering on the Circle.

[fol. 1858] "Twenty-five feet from the Circle . . . until they were almost even with the flagpole . . . then veered back toward the center of the Circle.

"But they went toward the sidewalk, didn't reach it, and then turned directly toward the Marshals. At this time Walker and the two fellows that had hold of his arms were between the sidewalk or almost even with the sidewalk and street."

Then, "Now, did this young man who took hold of Walker's arm take a position just east of the monument, or not releasing his arm until he reached the position of W-2," which, you remember, is way west of the north and south walk.

"He didn't release his arm.

"What about the man on the left, was he holding onto Walker's arm, too?

"Yes.

"Then what happened?

"There were about seventy or seventy-five yards from the Lyceum, then this tremendous group that was behind them—

"Where was Walker and these two other men at the time these bricks and things were thrown?

"At the very front . . .

"Mr. Walker turned and sort of ducked down, like this, [fol. 1859] and took off running . . . directly to the east.

"I didn't see him after he ran three or four steps, until I was back down at the monument.

"I heard him make some remarks about, 'Well, we'll get together and charge again . . .

"Now, was this down at the monument?

"He was still running, or wasn't running at this time, more or less walking fast or trotting, but out of breath, appeared to be, and I was out of breath and he didn't make any comment to anyone in particular, just made the comment.

"Now, where is the last recollection you had of Walker, when he said we will charge again?

"In the area of the monument. As soon as he made this comment, I turned and ran to a 'phone."

Now, I'll guarantee you, the little plump sucker ran, from here to LeBauve Hall, 600 yards, Ladies and Gentlemen, and then he raced back.

In his story that he wrote, he said that when he raced back—and I ask you to read it, I don't have time to read it to you, but in this rotten, libelous, filthy publication that they wrote about Ted Walker, he said, when he raced back, he found Walker talking to people near the monument. [fol. 1860] But, in his testimony here, he said he found Walker on the monument speaking.

"As soon as he made the comment, I turned and ran to a 'phone. I ran directly north or a little to the northwest of the monument and I ran between the YWCA and I think the Fine Arts Building, ran near the girls dormitory.

"Did you make a telephone report there?

"Yes, I did."

And I don't have time to read any more. I wish I could read it all because I want to read you the fantastic conflict between that man's testimony and the testimony of the Associated Press, Mr. Ken Davis' number one back there—there sits Mr. Davis, the man under his control that's supposed to preserve, protect and disseminate the truth to the people of the United States of America, here is what he said that Savell reported—

[fol. 1861] He says that Savell reported, "Walker talked to the students, led them on a charge against the Marshals. . . ."

Mr. Gooch: I object to that, if the Court please, once more. Mr. Ken Davis didn't testify in this case.

Mr. Watts: I didn't say he testified.

Mr. Gooch: You just got through saying—

Mr. Watts: I didn't say he testified.

The Court: Go ahead and read from the deposition.

Mr. Watts: That's right. "Walker had talked to the students, had led them on a charge against the Marshals . . ." You can tell when people were getting hurt—yes, sir, walked to the front of the charge, led it against the Marshals. Since I was not actually writing any of the material that he was reporting . . . and so forth and so on, didn't take notes. I remember talking to him; no more than 10 or 15 feet from me. Told him Walker had just led a charge."

"Q. Now then whether this Savell—"maybe I'd better go back and tie him in, because I don't want Mr. Gooch to think I am not tying him in—talking here about Savell's report.

"Now he then approached you on this occasion, when he first reported that Walker had led the charge, that Walker had made a speech from the monument, and that speech seemed to give the boys more organization, and [fol. 1862] then after the speech he led the charge."

Now you see why they didn't bring in Van Savell, because Van Savell's news report, his deposition said that Walker came on the campus, led the charge before the speech, but when he reported to Mr. Ben Thomas he said he reported that Walker led the charge after the speech.

Now let's see who else says something about this. We have the lad, John C. Hill, who came up with a fantastic story that Walker led all this—formed up a charge out in here, and then led it northwest, and northeast and northwest quadrants. And you know what I think about this thing? I don't think Savell saw any charges at all. I think he was hid out here somewhere. I think he reported Walker had been on the campus and the charge, and then when Mr. Relman Morin in the deposition, asked him for a first person report he got a chance for a byline, a chance to really make some individual hay. He then wrote this story which I think came not from Savell, but I think a reasonable inference from the evidence is that it came from John C. Hill.

Well, do you think for a minute that this charge that Savell had reported, and that this news that the Associated Press spread around the world concerning General Walker [fol. 1863] was true? These are the people that say it wasn't true. Ben Thomas, whose deposition I have just read. Buckley, who says that the charge, the so-called charge, as he called it, occurred after the speech on the monument. I wish I had time to pay my respects to Mr. Buckley.

Mr. Alan, the young man—I am sure you remember him, another news hawk. You can see how much responsibility, how much integrity, how much regard he had for the truth. He was the fancy young lad here with the very sneering self-satisfied manner that testified yesterday. You saw him. Then Mr. Proehl, the rather plump lad who also testified the charge occurred not before the speech but after the speech.

Reverend Gray, and incidentally my friends and Ladies and Gentlemen of the Jury, if this charge that Savell and Hill reported had taken place, they would have run right through the Reverend Gray. Reverend Gray was all out in this area all the time that charge was supposed to have been made. It could not have been made without mowing down Reverend Gray. So Reverend Gray says that he saw no charge there by Walker, nor any major charge before the speech.

Now the Witness Brittingham, whose deposition Mr. Gooch read, said the same thing.

[fol. 1864] But now they are not satisfied with two stories, they came up with three.

It just occurred to me just this second how they came up with three, how they happened to come up with three. They have got three sets of lawyers. They have got lawyers in Fort Worth; they have got lawyers in Mississippi, and they have got lawyers in New York. So naturally when Mr. Gooch put on this witness, Gregory, yesterday, you heard him, the most miserable pitiful, despicable performance I have ever seen on the witness stand, after he had been advised and cautioned not to talk to anybody in the hall, he went out and proceeded to come—he went out and was immediately contacted by the Mississippi lawyer and said, "Say, you are fouling up your time."

But by that time we had him caught. He came back in and said that the charge didn't occur before the speech as Savell had testified, it didn't occur after the speech, as all these other people had testified, but it occurred in between the conference with Reverend Duncan Gray down in this area right here, and Walker's speech on the monument.

So there are three separate complete, conflicting detailed stories presented to this Court of Justice and Law and this Jury under oath by the greatest news service on the [fol. 1865] face of the earth, asking you to believe it.

• • •

[fol. 1866] Now, the question is, Ladies and Gentlemen, not why General Walker went to Mississippi. I will cover that in just a minute. But the question is who is telling the truth. That is the question that you Ladies and Gentlemen are to decide by when you write your verdict in this case. If you approve of the standard of integrity that the greatest news service on the face of the earth has imposed upon young lads who look upon the executives of this great organization literally as God, then cut General Walker off and say you got what you deserved. But, if you think that kind of a standard of conduct is not proper, if you think that a great news service such as this should have a greater regard, a greater respect, a greater feeling of the sacred trust for truth in the news, then you write a verdict, Ladies and Gentlemen of the Jury in this case that will adequately —I don't think you can adequately compensate General Walker. I don't think there is enough money in the world to compensate this man here for the ridicule and complete destruction of his good name, but you write a verdict that will say to the Associated Press, "We don't condone of and we don't approve of this kind of a performance by the greatest news media on earth upon whom we are dependent [fol. 1867] for the truth."

You are just like the old saying as it used to go, "Caesar is wise." You must be not only above wrong, but you must be above and beyond a third degree of suspicion of wrong.

Now, they should come in here, in this court as I know Ted Walker would do if he had any feeling of guilt of the criminal offenses with which they charged him, he would square back his shoulders, he would sit there on that witness stand and under oath he would say, "I did it." All we ask is the same standard of integrity on the part of the Associated Press. All we ask one story, not three. We are entitled to it. You Ladies and Gentlemen of the Jury, His Honor on the Bench, learned in the law, is entitled to a better performance.

Now, then, I made some notes on some of Mr. Gooch's remarks. As I pointed out to you, he endeavored to pass out a smoke screen, and he did a very clever job. I hope it hasn't confused you. I hope you can still keep your mind on the basic issues in the lawsuit and who told the truth. Did General Walker get on the witness stand and lie when he told you that he didn't lead a charge, when he said that he was just out there observing, or did these people, the [fol. 1868] owners of three separate stories—well, you, Ladies and Gentlemen of the Jury, can pick the one that sounds the most plausible of their stories. Remember, the burden of proof is on them, not on us, to prove the truth of this heinous charge they made against General Walker.

As I say to you, the tragedy of this case is far above and beyond the six gruesome days and nights he spent in that prison nut house amid an atmosphere of criminal insanity. It is above and beyond that. It goes to the very essence and foundation of the survival of the United States of America itself. Because, unless given the truth the people cannot remain free.

And Mr. Gooch has endeavored to smear General Walker for being out of place where he had no right to be in, as I remember he stated, in defiance of the law. He said did Walker go to Mississippi in defiance of the Court order?

Now, you heard General Walker's explanation of that, Mr. Gooch, and he looked to me like somebody that had been stabbed by a red hot poker when he heard it from General Walker.

General Walker said that: "I was relying on the Attorney General of Mississippi and Judge Satterfield, as [fol. 1869] President of the American Bar Association, to keep Governor Barnett straight in Court. All I was going to do was when the United States Government, with all its power, ready, willing and able to make an unfortunate example out of the State of Mississippi made an improper use of troops in a manner that I knew was destructive to the morale of the Army, I intended to be there."

[fol. 1870] Ted Walker wasn't stupid enough to think he could arm a couple of hundred or five hundred or a thousand helpless college kids with sticks, stones and bottles and take on the whole United States Army. He knew that the very worst thing that could happen when they got to Oxford, was, just as he said, to have an act of violence, which gave some color of authority some color of propriety to the commitment of 26,000 troops to the State of Mississippi.

Mr. Gooch said, "What in the world did you go to Mississippi for anyway?"

I saw Mr. Gooch again squench and squirm when Walker told him why. He said, "I went to Mississippi because I thought it was wrong to commit this vast number of Federal troops into the State of Mississippi, especially—especially with enemy missiles being put up in the first Communist bridgehead 90 miles off our coast in Cuba.

Now it is funny to me how so many people heard General Walker's speech, "violence is not the answer. Let's avoid this violence. Our real enemy is in Cuba." And not one, not one of these witnesses up and down here heard a word about it. Not a word about it did they hear. And remember General Walker also in answer to Mr. Gooch's question as to why he went to Mississippi said, "I commanded the [fol. 1871] troops at Little Rock and I knew you couldn't believe a word you read in the press about integration problems, so I was going down there to see for myself." And that is exactly what Ted Walker did. He went there to see and find out, and he found out that tear gas was fired in the backs, not of the rioters, but in the backs of the Highway Patrol at a time when the students were at least 15 or 20 or 30 feet away from the United States Marshals, under circumstances that are fantastic.

Common sense would teach you that if you are going to use tear gas it must be used not as a direct attack weapon with flat projectory, at pointblank range, but as a warning. Suppose somebody had fired a round—and this is common knowledge, and I am asking you to think this over—they had fired a round up in the air down-wind. Behind the Marshals, for (sic)—

Let them get a whiff of it. Then another round. Maybe two or three.

General Walker found out. And had the press given to his concept the expensive and explosive dramatization that they gave the other side I think the United States of America and the world would have realized that this tragic incident in Oxford was completely unnecessary.

[fol. 1872] So now let's get on with the lawsuit, Mr. Gooch. Let's get away from this business of did Walker make a bunch of statements. I want you to read those statements. You are free to take them in the jury room. You find out if General Walker was advocating any violence. He wasn't that stupid. He knew that violence was the last thing in the world the people of Mississippi wanted. What he wanted was to make it appear as ridiculous as it was. To commit 26,000 troops to Mississippi with Cuba 90 miles off the shores of Florida.

Now Mr. Gooch has come in here and argued, for instance, the UPI report, let me, Ladies and Gentlemen,—and to me, this is fantastically unreasonable—that the two greatest news services of the United States—of the two, one of them says Walker arrived on the campus of the University of Mississippi, assumed command of the crowd of rioting and scattered students, issued orders, led a charge, and the other great news service would say, if I can find it, "General Edwin A. Walker, who commanded troops at Little Rock, mounted the Confederate statue and advised the students to cease their violence." Said, "This is not the proper route to Cuba," Walker said. "The crowd jeered."

Now how significant is it that not one of these carefully coached, these dynamic-vibrant-ready witnesses, who are [fol. 1873] ready to testify to anything Mr. Gooch wanted them to,—now how significant is it that not one of them heard the jeers, with the exception, I believe, one of them did.

The Court: Five minutes.

Mr. Watts: Thank you.

[fol. 1874] So now, then, Ladies and Gentlemen of the Jury, in final summary in this case, you Ladies and Gentlemen, in the composite wisdom that exists in the diverse background of twelve American citizens, are peculiarly fitted to wade through the mess of conflicting evidence that has been produced by the Associated Press in this case and arrive at the beautiful gleam of shining truth; that is your duty. That is your sworn duty in this case. Assume, as I am sure you will—I don't see how you could for one minute reach a contrary conclusion—assume that you reach the conclusion that the Associated Press misrepresented the facts to the world when they said General Walker led a charge against Federal Marshals under the circumstances, then the question arises what shall be reasonable and just compensation for the destruction of the good name of a man whom, as I have said, has lived habitually above and beyond the call of duty in the defense of his country. He resigned his commission and all of the benefits incident thereto to be able to come in and come before the American people and tell some of his concept as to why we are losing, as to why within nineteen years we would slip from magnificent greatness to the brink of disaster. But, when in [fol. 1875] place of receiving appreciation, that a man of that character and background, that integrity, that motivation, that he should receive, he promptly gets smeared by the press who, in the language of the Court, in reliance upon one twenty-one year old reporter, and I wish I had the time to read to you Mr. Relman Morin's deposition—by an organization which has a conscious indifference of the welfare of the person to be affected by it, that they didn't even bother to check up on the language of Mr. Morin again when the United Press report came out that said that Walker was trying to quiet the violence rather than advance it.

So, I suggest to you Ladies and Gentlemen sincerely, almost desperately, that we have reached the point in the life of these United States of America, and of the people thereof, wherein we must start getting down to formalities. Where we must say to organizations like the Associated Press, "You, as great and as powerful as you are, extending around the world hold a sacred trust. In that trust is a requirement and a responsibility to place upon your endless networks of teletype the truth, and any time you fail to produce that truth through a reckless disregard of the [fol. 1876] sources of truth and accuracy, then the only capability under our form of Government in order to insure and accomplish the concept that no one shall suffer wrong, is to write a verdict in this case that will reasonably compensate General Walker for the destruction of his reputation by the battle of the range country in the area where he was raised, in the area where he grew up as a live, lean, strong young Texas ranch hand, as he was when I first saw him, a man of absolute integrity, as I say again, and I hate to be repetitious, a man who has the guts to take that witness stand under oath, which their reporter didn't have to do—it wasn't him, I defend Van Savell, it was the people behind Van Savell that made the decision that he shouldn't come into Court, but General Walker the nerve to stand here and look you Ladies and Gentlemen in the eye, and I will guarantee you had Ted Walker led a charge against the United States Marshals you would have heard from that witness stand under oath, "I did; I did."

Thank you.

[fol. 1877]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 1C

BUT FORMER MAJ. GEN. EDWIN A. WALKER, IN MISSISSIPPI TO LEAD "A NATION PROTEST TO THE CONSPIRACY WITHIN," SAYS "TENS OF THOUSANDS FROM FLORIDA TO CALIFORNIA WILL COME TO SUPPORT GOV. GARNETT."

A219NI PRECEDE DALLAS (A128)

JACKSON, MISS., SEPT. 29 (AP)—FORMER MAJ. GEN. EDWIN A. WALKER ARRIVED HERE TONIGHT AND SAID VOLUNTEERS WILL START ARRIVING AT OXFORD TOMORROW TO BACK UP GOV. ROSS BARNETT IN HIS STRUGGLE WITH THE FEDERAL OVER DESEGREGATION.

"TENS OF THOUSANDS FROM FLORIDA TO CALIFORNIA WILL COME TO SUPPORT GOV. GARNETT," WALKER TOLD A NEWS CONFERENCE.

WALKER SAID HE HAS "BEEN IN TOUCH WITH THE CAPITOL. BUT I HAVE NOT TALKED WITH BARNETT PERSONALLY." HE SAID HE WAS HERE "TO STAND WITH GOV. BARNETT SHOULDER TO SHOULDER."

A NEWSMAN ASKED IF HE ADVOCATED VIOLENCE BY MISSISSIPPI TO BACK UP ITS STAND TO KEEP NEGRO JAMES H. MEREDITH OUT OF THE UNIVERSITY OF MISSISSIPPI IN THE FACE OF POSSIBLE FEDERAL TROOP INTERVENTION. HE DIDN'T ANSWER.

IN A FORMAL STATEMENT READ TO NEWSMEN HERE AND HANDED OUT BY HIS OFFICE IN DALLAS, WALKER CALLED FOR "A NATIONAL PROTEST AGAINST THE CONSPIRACY FROM WITHIN."

[fol. 1878]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. ID

A214NU (TOP ?)

URGENT

SIXTH NIGHT LEAD MEREDITH ROUNDUP

OXFORD, MISS., SEPT. 30 (AP)—MASSIVE FEDERAL FORCES OVERPOWERED STATE RESISTANCE AND MOVED NEGRO JAMES H. MEREDITH ON CAMPUS AT THE UNIVERSITY OF MISSISSIPPI TONIGHT, STUDENTS AND OTHER YOUTHS RIOTED IN WAVES, FORCING A CALL FOR FEDERAL TROOPS.

THE RAMPAGING MOB OF WHITE YOUTHS CHARGES A LINE OF FEDERAL MARSHALS TWICE, DESPITE GOV. ROSS BARNETT'S INDIRECT ADMISSION THAT HE WAS GIVING UP PHYSICAL RESISTANCE IN MISSISSIPPI'S BATTLE TO KEEP THE 29-YEAR-OLD NEGRO OUT OF OLE MISS.

THE 64-YEAR-OLD GOVERNOR, WHO SWORE HE WOULD GO TO JAIL RATHER THAN SEE MEREDITH IN OLE MISS, ISSUED A STATEMENT IN JACKSON SAYING M I S S I S S I P P I WAS "COMPLETELY SURROUNDED" AND "PHYSICALLY OVERPOWERED."

THE FEDERAL MARSHALS BLASTED BACK AT THE RIOTING YOUTHS WITH TEAR GAS—STOPPING TWO CHARGES AND BREAKING UP A RAMPAGE OF VANDALISM.

FORMER MAJ. GEN. EDWIN WALKER LED ONE OF THE CHARGES.

BLASTS OF BIRDSHOT PELLETS KILLED ONE NEWSMAN AND WOUNDED ANOTHER.

THE DEAD MAN WAS IDENTIFIED BY HOSPITAL OFFICIALS AS PAUL GUIRARD, REPORTING FOR THE LONDON DAILY SKETCH AND AGENCE PRESSE OF FRANCE.

BILL CRIER OF THE MEMPHIS BUREAU OF THE ASSOCIATED PRESS, SUFFERED A SLIGHT WOUND IN THE BACK.

A215NU

FLYING BOTTLES, ROCKS AND BRICKS LEFT SCORES MORE BLEEDING AND HURT.

A MARSHALL CLUBBED A WHITE STUDENT ENTERING THE DORMITORY WHERE MEREDITH WAS HOUSED. STUDENTS HOOTED: "ONE NIGGER, ONE DORMITORY." MANY OF THE STUDENTS PACKED THEIR CLOTHES AND LEFT RATHER THAN STAY IN THE DORMITORY WITH THE NEGRO.

EVEN AS THE YOUTHS STORMED THE MARSHALS THE FIRST TIME, PRESIDENT KENNEDY ADDRESSED HIMSELF TO THE OLE MISS STUDENTS IN A NATIONWIDE BROADCAST.

"YOUR HONOR AND THE HONOR OF THE UNIVERSITY ARE AT STAKE," THE PRESIDENT SAID.

IT WASN'T KNOWN WHETHER HE WAS AWARE OF THE RIOTING AS HE SPOKE.

AS THE RIOTING PASSED THE END OF ITS FOURTH HOUR, FEDERAL TROOPS STARTED MOVING IN FROM TWO DIRECTIONS—TEAMS OF RIOT-TRAINED MILITARY POLICEMEN FROM THEIR TEMPORARY BASE AT MEMPHIS, AND AN ARMORED REGIMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI NATIONAL GUARD FROM TUPELO.

RT1140PCS

A216NU

CORRECTION

OXFORD, MISS., SIXTH NIGHT LEAD MEREDITH ROUNDUP (A214NU) SEVENTH GRAF STARTING "THE DEAD," ETC., MAKE READ X X X AGENCE FRANCE PRESSE, ETC., (INSERTING FRANCE).

8TH GRAF MAKE READ AT START BILL CRIDER ETC., (NOT CRIER)

THE AP

RT1142PCS NM

V

A217AX

URGENT

MEMPHIS, TENN., SEPT. 30 (AP)—THE ARMY SAID LATE TONIGHT A FEDERALIZED MISSISSIPPI NATIONAL GUARD UNIT BEGAN MOVING TOWARD THE UNIVERSITY OF MISSISSIPPI AT OXFORD AT 10:30 P.M.

TWO OTHER GUARD UNITS—ONE STATIONED AT LAUREL AND THE OTHER AT AMORY—WERE PLACED ON STANDBY ALERT.

AN ARMY SPOKESMAN AT THE MEMPHIS NAVAL AIR STATION, COMMAND HEADQUARTERS FOR FEDERAL TROOPS ASSEMBLED FOR THE MISSISSIPPI INTEGRATION CRISIS, DECLINED TO SAY HOW MANY MEN WERE INVOLVED.

KY1244AES NM

A218WX

URGENT

(150)

INSERT

WASHINGTON—THIRD NIGHT LEAD KENNEDY-MISSISSIPPI (A173WX) INSERT AFTER THIRD GRAPH "A FORCE X X X PROBABLY TOMORROW."

[fol. 1879]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 1E

SEN. LEVERETT SALTONSTALL, R-MASS., SAID OF THE ADDRESS:

"I THOUGHT THE PRESIDENT EXPRESSED THE SENTIMENTS OF THE GOVERNMENT AND THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES EXTREMELY WELL. I SUPPORT WHOLEHEARTEDLY WHAT HE SAID."

SEN. JENNINGS RANDOLPH, D-W.VA., TERMED IT "BOTH A STRONG AND REASONABLE STATEMENT." HE SAID KENNEDY OFFERED THE OLIVE BRANCH OF CONCILIATION "BUT MADE IT CLEAR THERE CAN BE NO COMPROMISE WITH THE LAW OF THE LAND."

RANDOLPH SAID "AMERICANS GENERALLY WILL BOTH APPLAUD HIS WORDS AND RESPOND TO HIS APPEAL."

REP. WILLIAM M. COLMER, D-MISS., ISSUED A STATEMENT ON BEHALF OF SEVEN OF MISSISSIPPI'S EIGHT MEMBERS OF CONGRESS. REP. FRANK E. SMITH, D-MISS., DID NOT JOIN IN THE ATTACK ON KENNEDY'S ADDRESS. HE IS LEAVING CONGRESS AT THE END OF THIS SESSION TO BECOME A MEMBER OF THE BOARD OF THE TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY.

SEN. JAMES O. EASTLAND, D-MISS., ISSUED A BRIEF AND POINTED STATEMENT OF HIS OWN. "I DISAGREE ENTIRELY WITH THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH," HE SAID.

FROM SENATE DEMOCRATIC LEADER MIKE MANSFIELD OF MONTANA CAME THIS REACTION:

"THANK GOD THAT REASON, UNDERSTANDING AND LAW SEEM TO HAVE PREVAILED."

KENNEDY SAID IN A NATIONALLY-BROADCAST RADIO-TELEVISION ADDRESS THAT FEDERAL COURT ORDERS FOR MEREDITH'S ADMISSION ARE BEGINNING TO BE OBEYED.

THEV

(MORE)

NU-JB920PCS

A183NU

URGENT

5TH NIGHT LEAD MEREDITH ROUNDUP

OXFORD, MISS., SEPT. 30 (AP)—BEHIND A MASSIVE SHOW OF FEDERAL FORCE NEGRO JAMES H. MEREDITH MOVED ON THE CAMPUS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF MISSISSIPPI TONIGHT AND STUDENTS ERUPTED IN TWO WAVES OF RIOTING.

FEDERAL MARSHALS FIRED TEAR GAS BOTH TIMES—FIRST WHEN STUDENTS BROKE INTO A RAMPAGE OF VANDALISM, AND AGAIN WHEN FORMER MAJ. GEN. EDWIN WALKER LED A CHARGE OF BRICK-THROWING STUDENTS AGAINST THE MARSHALS.

WALKER SAID HIS STUDENT FORCE, NUMBERING ABOUT 1,000, WOULD REGROUP AND CHARGE AGAIN.

THE VIOLENCE ERUPTED AT THE VERY MOMENT PRESIDENT KENNEDY WAS SPEAKING TO THE NATION URGING A PEACEFUL SETTLEMENT OF THE FEDERAL-STATE DISPUTE OVER RACIAL SEGREGATION.

REFERRING TO THE BUILDUP OF FEDERAL TROOPS READY FOR ACTION IN ADVANCE OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT'S CLIMACTIC MOVE TODAY, KENNEDY SAID:

"MY OBLIGATION AS PRESIDENT WAS INESCAPABLE. I ACCEPTED."

HE ADDED:

"I DEEPLY REGRET THE STEPS THAT WERE TAKEN, BUT ALL OTHER METHODS, INCLUDING CONCILIATION, HAD BEEN TRIED."

THE VIOLENCE ALSO ERUPTED JUST A FEW MINUTES AFTER GOV. ROSS BARNETT INDIRECTLY ADMITTED HDEFEAT IN A STATEMENT ISSUED AT THE GOVERNOR'S MANSION AT JACKSON.

IT APPEARED MEREDITH WOULD BE ENROLLED TOMORROW.

THE SECOND WAVE OF RIOTING TOOK THE FORM OF A DIRECT CHARGE ON THE MARSHALS HOLDING GUARD POSTS SHOULDER TO SHOULDER OUTSIDE THE ADMINISTRATION BUILDING.

WALKER, AN OUTSPOKEN ADVOCATE OF MISSISSIPPI RESISTANCE TO FEDERAL COURT DESEGREGATION ORDERS, COMMANDED THE 101ST AIRBORNE IN THE LITTLE ROCK DESEGREGATION IN 1957. NOW RETIRED, HE SAYS HE WAS "ON THE WRONG SIDE" THEN.

THE STUDENTS RUSHED THE MARSHALS WITH BRICKS AND SOFT DRINK BOTTLES FLYING. SOME OF THEM WORE GAS MASKS.

BUT THE MARSHALS TURNED THEM BACK WTH THEIR GAS LAUNCHERS.

THE FIRST OUTBURST OF VIOLENCE, INSTEAD OF TAKING THE FORM OF A CHARGE, APPEARED MORE LIKE SPORADIC OUTBURSTS OF VANDALISM.

THE MOB OF STUDENTS, 6TH GRAF FOURTH NIGHT LEAD MEREDITH ROUNDUP (A175NU)

JB925PCS NM

[fol. 1880]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 1F

VASION OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS OF ALL THE PEOPLE OF THESE UNITED STATES AND THE CONCENTRATION OF ALL POWER GOVERNMENT INTO SOME FORM OF A TOTALITARIAN STATE."

SEN. LEVERETT SALTONSTALL, R-MASS., SAID OF THE ADDRESS:

"I THOUGHT THE PRESIDENT EXPRESSED THE SENTIMENTS OF THE GOVERNMENT AND THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES EXTREMELY WELL. I SUPPORT WHOLEHEARTEDLY WHAT HE SAID."

SEN. JENNINGS RANDOLPH, D-W.VA., TERMED IT "BOTH A STRONG AND REASONABLE STATEMENT." HE SAID KENNEDY OFFERED THE OLIVE BRANCH OF CONCILIATION "BUT MADE IT CLEAR THERE CAN BE NO COMPROMISE WITH THE LAW OF THE LAND."

RANDOLPH SAID "AMERICANS GENERALLY WILL BOTH APPLAUD HIS WORDS AND RESPOND TO HIS APPEAL."

REP. WILLIAM M. COLMER, D-MISS., ISSUED A STATEMENT ON BEHALF OF SEVEN OF MISSISSIPPI'S EIGHT MEMBERS OF CONGRESS. REP. FRANK E. SMITH, D-MISS., DID NOT JOIN IN THE ATTACK ON KENNEDY'S ADDRESS. HE IS LEAVING CONGRESS AT THE END OF THIS SESSION TO BECOME A MEMBER OF THE BOARD OF THE TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY.

SEN. JAMES O. EASTLAND, D-MISS., ISSUED A BRIEF AND POINTED STATEMENT OF HIS OWN. "I DISAGREE ENTIRELY WITH THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH," HE SAID.

FROM SENATE DEMOCRATIC LEADER MIKE MANSFIELD OF MONTANA CAME THIS REACTION:

"THANK GOD THAT REASON, UNDERSTANDING AND LAW SEEM TO HAVE PREVAILED."

KENNEDY SAID IN A NATIONALLY-BROADCAST RADIO-TELEVISION ADDRESS THAT FEDERAL COURT ORDERS FOR MEREDITH'S ADMISSION ARE BEGINNING TO BE OBEYED.

THEV

(MORE)

NU-JB920PCS

A183NU

URGENT

5TH NIGHT LEAD MEREDITH ROUNDUP

OXFORD, MISS., SEPT. 30 (AP)—BEHIND A MASSIVE SHOW OF FEDERAL FORCE NEGRO JAMES H. MEREDITH MOVED ON THE CAMPUS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF MISSISSIPPI TONIGHT AND STUDENTS ERUPTED IN TWO WAVES OF RIOTING.

FEDERAL MARSHALS FIRED TEAR GAS BOTH TIMES—FIRST WHEN STUDENTS BROKE INTO A RAMPAGE OF VANDALISM, AND AGAIN WHEN FORMER MAJ. GEN. EDWIN WALKER LED A CHARGE OF BRICK-THROWING STUDENTS AGAINST THE MARSHALS.

WALKER SAID HIS STUDENT FORCE, NUMBERING ABOUT 1,000, WOULD REGROUP AND CHARGE AGAIN.

THE VIOLENCE ERUPTED AT THE VERY MOMENT PRESIDENT KENNEDY WAS SPEAKING TO THE NATION URGING A PEACEFUL SETTLEMENT OF THE FEDERAL-STATE DISPUTE OVER RACIAL SEGREGATION.

REFERRING TO THE BUILDUP OF FEDERAL TROOPS READY FOR ACTION IN ADVANCE OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT'S CLIMACTIC MOVE TODAY, KENNEDY SAID:

"MY OBLIGATION AS PRESIDENT WAS INESCAPABLE. I ACCEPTED."

HE ADDED:

"I DEEPLY REGRET THE STEPS THAT WERE TAKEN, BUT ALL OTHER METHODS, INCLUDING CONCILIATION, HAD BEEN TRIED."

THE VIOLENCE ALSO ERUPTED JUST A FEW MINUTES AFTER GOV. ROSS BARNETT INDIRECTLY ADMITTED HDEFEAT IN A STATEMENT ISSUED AT THE GOVERNOR'S MANSION AT JACKSON.

IT APPEARED MEREDITH WOULD BE ENROLLED TOMORROW.

THE SECOND WAVE OF RIOTING TOOK THE FORM OF A DIRECT CHARGE ON THE MARSHALS HOLDING GUARD POSTS SHOULDER TO SHOULDER OUTSIDE THE ADMINISTRATION BUILDING.

WALKER, AN OUTSPOKEN ADVOCATE OF MISSISSIPPI RESISTANCE TO FEDERAL COURT DESEGREGATION ORDERS, COMMANDED THE 101ST AIRBORNE IN THE LITTLE ROCK DESEGREGATION IN 1957. NOW RETIRED, HE SAYS HE WAS "ON THE WRONG SIDE" THEN.

THE STUDENTS RUSHED THE MARSHALS WITH BRICKS AND SOFT DRINK BOTTLES FLYING. SOME OF THEM WORE GAS MASKS.

BUT THE MARSHALS TURNED THEM BACK WTH THEIR GAS LAUNCHERS.

THE FIRST OUTBURST OF VIOLENCE, INSTEAD OF TAKING THE FORM OF A CHARGE, APPEARED MORE LIKE SPORADIC OUTBURSTS OF VANDALISM.

THE MOB OF STUDENTS, 6TH GRAF FOURTH NIGHT LEAD MEREDITH ROUNDUP (A175NU)

JB925PCS NM

[fol. 1881]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 1G

A183WX

WASHINGTON—FIRST ADD FIRST LEAD CONGRESSIONAL-MISSISSIPPI A182WX X X X BE OBEYED.

THE PRESIDENT SAID HE HOPES IT WILL NOT BE NECESSARY TO CALL ON THE FEDERALIZED MISSISSIPPI NATIONAL GUARD OR ON TROOPS MASSED AT MEMPHIS, TENN., TO ENFORCE THE ORDERS.

"I DON'T LIKE THE DECISION OF THE COURT IN THIS CASE A MINUTE, BUT, SINCE IT IS THE LAW, I DON'T SEE HOW IT CAN BE BYPASSED," ELLENDER SAID.

MANSFIELD PRAISED KENNEDY FOR "MAKING HIS OFFICE AVAILABLE FOR THE CONSIDERATION OF EVERY POSSIBLE ALTERNATIVE IN SEEKING A SOLUTION TO A PROBLEM WHICH, IF CARRIED TO THE EXTREME, COULD HAVE HAD TRAGIC CONSEQUENCES FOR ALL OF US."

WITH MEREDITH ON THE UNIVERSITY CAMPUS, AND APPARENTLY TO BE ENROLLED TOMORROW, MANSFIELD SAID "THE FINAL SOLUTION NOW IS IN THE HANDS OF THE STUDENTS AND FACULTY OF OLE MISS AND THE STATE ADMINISTRATION, AND I AM CONFIDENT THAT AS AMERICANS, THEY WILL LIVE UP TO THEIR FULL RESPONSIBILITIES."

SEN. CLIFFORD P. CASE, R-N.J., SAID OF THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS "OF COURSE, I AGREE WITH IT AND I HOPE IT WILL BE EFFECTIVE."

(NO PICKUP).

EG1130PED NM

A184WX

O

A185WX (CQ)

URGENT

INSERT:

WASHINGTON—THIRD LEAD KENNEDY-MISSISSIPPI (A178WX). INSERT AFTER 3RD GRAF "A FORCE X X X PROBABLY TOMORROW.":

AFTER BEING DISPERSED ONCE, THE STUDENTS RETURNED IN A BRICK-THROWING AT-TACK LED BY FORMER MAJ. GEN. EDWIN A. WALKER WHO RESIGNED FROM THE ARMY AFTER BEING REPRIMANDED FOR TRYING TO INFLUENCE HIS TROOPS VOTES. TEAR GAS FIRED BY THE MARSHALS SCATTERED THE YOUTHS AGAIN.

WALKER, A RESIDENT OF TEXAS AND ADVOCATE OF FAR-RIGHT POLITICAL VIEWS, SAID HE WOULD REGROUP THE THOUSAND OR SO STUDENTS AND ATTACK AGAIN.

IN SOLEMN TONES ETC 4TH GRAF A178WX

—O—

INSERT AFTER 4TH GRAF "IN SOLEMN X X X BE REQUIRED.:"

HOWEVER, AN HOUR AFTER HE HAD FINISHED SPEAKING THERE WAS NO WORD OF CANCELLATION OF ORDERS TO THREE UNITS OF THE MISSISSIPPI NATIONAL GUARD TO REPORT TO OXFORD AT 10 A.M. EST TOMORROW.

A SPOKESMAN AT THE PENTAGON HERE SAID HE KNEW OF NO CHANGE OF ORDERS AS YET. NOR WAS THERE ANY WORD FROM MISSISSIPPI OF A CANCELLATION OF THE ORDERS TO TWO BATTLE GROUPS AND AN ARMORED CAVALRY UNIT OF THE GUARD.

ALL TOLD ETC 5TH GRAF A178WX

EG1134PED NM

A186

FIRST LEAD UNDATED KENNEDY-EISENHOWER INTEGRATION (A1227) (270) BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

—OR—

NEW YORK, SEPT. 30 (AP)—

PRESIDENT KENNEDY IN ADDRESSING THE NATION TONIGHT ABOUT THE MISSISSIPPI INTEGRATION CRISIS REFERRED, AS DID PRESIDENT EISENHOWER IN THE LITTLE ROCK, ARK., CRISIS, TO THE INESCAPABILITY OF HIS DUTY TO INTERFERE.

IT WAS ONLY ONE OF MANY POINTS OF SIMILARITY IN THE TWO PRESIDENTS' ADDRESSES, DELIVERED FIVE YEARS APART, ON BASICALLY THE SAME TOPIC.

KENNEDY TOLD THE NATION: "AMERICANS ARE FREE, IN SHORT, TO DISAGREE WITH THE LAW—BUT NOT DISOBEY IT." EISENHOWER HAD SAID: "OUR PERSONAL OPINIONS ABOUT THE (COURT) DECISION HAVE NO BEARING ON THE MATTER OF ENFORCEMENT."

KENNEDY: "OUR NATION IS FOUNDED ON THE PRINCIPLE THAT OBSERVANCE OF THE LAW IS THE ETERNAL SAFEGUARD OF LIBERTY." EISENHOWER: "THE FOUNDATION OF THE AMERICAN WAY OF LIFE IS OUR NATIONAL RESPECT FOR LAW."

[fol. 1882]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 1H

SPLIT

APR NU 2

HERE IS YOUR SPECIAL SUNDAY MORNING ROUNDUP OF LOUISIANA-MISSISSIPPI NEWS:

(RALLY)

(SHREVEPORT, LOUISIANA)—A CROWD ESTIMATED AT 3,000 RAILLIED IN SHREVEPORT LAST (SATURDAY NIGHT TO OFFER VERBAL SUPPORT TO MISSISSIPPI GOVERNOR ROSS BARNETT IN HIS BATTLE AGAINST DESEGREGATION.

REP. PAREY BRANTON OF WEBSTER PARISH SAID A DELEGATION OF LOUISIANA LEGISLATORS AND CITIZENS WOULD LEAVE MONROE TODAY (SUNDAY) FOR JACKSON, MISSISSIPPI, TO TELL BARNETT THEY WERE BACKING HIM. BRANTON DIDN'T SAY HOW MANY PERSONS OR CARS WOULD BE IN THE CARAVAN.

FORMER STATE SENATOR W.M. RAINACH OF SUMMERFIELD TOLD THE RALLY HE HAD TALKED WITH BARNETT AND THE MISSISSIPPI GOVERNOR DID NOT WANT LARGE GROUPS OF "UNDISCIPLINED PEOPLE AT OXFORD INTERFERING WITH THEIR "PRECONCEIVED PLAN TO DEAL WITH "THE DESEGREGATION ISSUE."

—DASH—

(RAINACH ALSO TOLD THE AUDIENCE HE HAD INFORMED THE GOVERNOR THAT LOUISIANA COULD HAVE 10,000 CITIZENS IN OXFORD TO RALLY UNDER HIS LEADERSHIP.

(REP. WELLBORN JACK OF CADDO PARISH TOLD THE RALLY: "I'VE KNOWN ROSS BARNETT FOR A LONG TIME. WHEN HE SAID HE WOULD GO TO JAIL BEFORE HE ALLOWS THE SCHOOLS IN HIS STATE TO BE INTEGRATED, HE MEANT IT."

—0—

(NEW TOP—WALKER)

(JACKSON, MISSISSIPPI)—FORMER ARMY MAJOR GEN. EDWIN WALKER, IN JACKSON, MISSISSIPPI, SAYS VOLUNTEERS START ARRIVING IN MISSISSIPPI TODAY (SUNDAY) TO SUPPORT GOVERNOR ROSS BARNETT IN HIS STRUGGLE WITH THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT OVER INTEGRATION.

WALKER, AFTER HIS ARRIVAL IN JACKSON LAST NIGHT, TOLD A NEWS CONFERENCE: "TENS OF THOUSANDS FROM FLORIDA TO CALIFORNIA WILL COME TO SUPPORT GOV. BARNETT." WALKER SAID HE PLANNED "TO STAND WITH GOV. BARNETT SHOULDER TO SHOULDER."

—0—

(MEREDITH)

THE HEAD OF THE NEW ORLEANS BRANCH OF THE NEW ORLEANS NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE SAYS JAMES MEREDITH WILL SPEAK IN NEW ORLEANS TODAY (SUNDAY).

CHAPTER PRESIDENT ARTHUR CHAPITAL SAYS MEREDITH WILL SPEAK AT AN N-A-A-C-P MEETING IN THE GYMNASIUM-AUDITORIUM OF THE CORPUS CHRISTI SCHOOL AT 3:30 P.M.

—0—

STATION K-E-E-L, SHREVEPORT (STATION MGRS)

SHREVEPT

STATION K E E L, SHREVEPORT (STATION MGRS)

SHREVEPORT STATION K-E-E-L JOINS US ON THIS THIS WIRE MORNING . . .

WELCOME ABOARD, K E E L.

ASSOCIATED PRESS, NEW ORLEANS-RADIO

[fol. 1883]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 1 I

A205NU

URGENT

OXFORD, MISS.—2ND ADD RIOT SEPARATE (A200NU) XXX TRUCK.

AT THAT POINT THE MARSHALS MOVED. THEY DONNED THEIR GAS MASKS AND BEGAN FIRING TEAR GAS.

FOR A TIME, THEY SCATTERED THE TROUBLE-MAKERS.

THEN FORMER MAJ. GEN. EDWIN WALKER LED A CHARGE OF ABOUT 1,000 OF THE STUDENTS AGAINST THE MARSHALS, STILL HOLDING THEIR POSITIONS AROUND THE RED BRICK ADMINISTRATION BUILDING.

THE STUDENTS MOVED IN ON THE MARSHALS THROWING BOTTLES AND ROCKS AND BRICKS.

THE MARSHALS FIRED MORE TEAR GAS.

THE ATTACKERS BACKED UP.

(MORE)

RT1058PCS NM

A206NU

URGENT

INSERT

OXFORD, MISS., RIOT SEPARATE, (A200NU) INSERT AFTER THIRD GRAF "ANOTHER NEWSMAN XX

BUST IT

[fol. 1884]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 2A

30NU

BULLETIN

MEREDITH DEVELOPING

JACKSON, MISS., SEPT. 30 (AP)—GOV. ROSS R. BARNETT'S OFFICE SAID TONIGHT HE WOULD ISSUE A STATEMENT SHORTLY. APPARENTLY IN CONNECTION WITH THE DESEGREGATION CASE INVOLVING NEGRO JAMES H. MEREDITH AND THE ALL-WHITE UNIVERSITY OF MISSISSIPPI.

JB634PCS NM

A131AX

TELEGRAPH EDITORS (120)

JACKSON, MISS.—MEREDITH-VOLUNTEERS, (A 69AX), SUB FOLLOWING FOR 9TH GRAF: "HOWEVER, A GROUP X X X THE UNIVERSITY."

A GROUP OF ABOUT 20 NORTH LOUISIANA, LEGISLATORS, SHERIFFS AND MAYORS WENT TO JACKSON TODAY TO PLEDGE SUPPORT TO BARNETT.

STATE REP. PAREY BRANTON OF WEBSTER PARISH PRESENTED BARNETT WITH A CITATION HE SAID "SYMBOLIZES THE CONCERN, ANGER AND RESOLVE OF YOUR SISTER STATE OF LOUISIANA."

SHERIFF C. E. HESTER OF TALLULAH PRESENTED BARNETT WITH A CITATION IN BEHALF OF ALL SHERIFFS FROM NORTHEAST LOUISIANA'S 5TH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT.

"WE ENDORSE YOUR FIGHT FOR CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT AND STATE SOVEREIGNTY," IT SAID.

BARNETT, ACCOMPANIED BY MRS. BARNETT, HINDS COUNTY JUDGE RUSSEL MOORE AND DICK MORPHEW OF THE CITIZENS COUNCIL, EMERGED FROM THE MANSION AND TOLD THE GROUP:

"I AM GRATEFUL TO YOU FOR YOUR SUPPORT. I APPRECIATE YOUR SUPPORT. WE HAVE COMMON PROBLEMS. I INTEND TO FIGHT THIS BATTLE ALL THE WAY THROUGH THE COURTS."

GEN. WALKER ETC. 10TH GRAF PVS.

EP739PES

[fol. 1885]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 3

A12NU

(WALKER)

A12WX

(LD REACTION & BJT)

UM

A12AX

URGENT

OXFORD—FIRST ADD FIRST LEAD OXFORD WITH MEREDITH (A7AX) X X X WERE REPORTED.

DOZENS OF RIOTERS, MOSTLY YOUNG BOYS WITH SHIRTTAILS OUT, WERE BEING ROUNDED UP. AT LEAST 30 AND POSSIBLE MORE WERE HERDED INTO THE FEDERAL COURTHOUSE ON THE SQUARE.

PRISONERS WERE FORCED TO PLACE THEIR HANDS OVER THEIR HEADS AND WERE MARCHED AT BAYONET POINT TO THE COURTHOUSE.

THE LATEST RIOTING CAME AFTER FORMER MAJ. GEN. EDWIN WALKER HAD APPEARED IN THE SQUARE—CLAD IN A DARK BLUE SUIT AND WEARING A 10-GALLON HAT.

HE STAYED IN THE SQUARE BRIEFLY, SPOKE QUIETLY TO SOME OF THOSE IN THE CROWD NEAREST THE TROOPS, AND THEN BACKED OFF AS MILITARY EYES WATCHED HIM CLOSELY.

THE BATTLE LEFT A BLOCK OF LITTER AND DEBRIS.

THE SAME YOUTHS, ALONG WITH 100 OTHERS, EARLIER HAD BEEN CLEARED FROM THE SQUARE AFTER CURSING, SCREAMING, AND THROWING ROCKS AND BOTTLES AT PASSING MILITARY VEHICLES.

THEY WERE DRIVEN FROM THE SQUARE BY MP'S ARMED WITH TEAR GAS, AND BAYONETS FIXED TO RIFLES. REMNANTS OF THE CROWD GATHERED ABOUT A HALF BLOCK AWAY SHORTLY BEFORE THE FIRING BROKE OUT.

MILITARY JEEPS RACED AROUND THE LITTERED SQUARE, RUSHING TO TROUBLE SPOTS. DRIZZLING RAIN, ALTERNATED WITH SUNSHINE, FELL ON THE TOWN BUT FAILED TO COOL THE WRATH OF THE MOB.

MEDICS SET UP A FIRST AID STATION BESIDE THE TOWN'S ANCIENT CONFEDERATE WAR MEMORIAL AND TROOPS, WHO BEGAN CLEARING THE STREETS PLACED A PILE OF DEBRIS NEAR THE GRAY STATUE.

LIFE IN THE USUALLY, SLEEPY SOUTHERN TOWN WAS AT A STANDSTILL. ALMOST ALL BUSINESSES FAILED TOPEN THIS MORNING AND THE STREETS WERE PRACTICALLY DESERTED EXCEPT FOR RIOTERS, SOLDIERS AND NEWSMEN.

NEGRO TROOPS ETC., THIRD GRAF ORIGINAL (A160-61NU)

SF1241PES NM

A13NU

URGENT

OXFORD, MISS., FIRST ADD MORIN'S WALKER (A9NU) X X X FUMES.

WALKER SPPEARED ON THE OXFORD TOWN SQUARE DURING THE DISTURBANCE THERE TODAY.

WALKER MARCHED AHEAD OF A FILE OF SOLDIERS AS THOUGH HE WERE THEIR INSPECTING OFFICER.

FINALLY, AN ARMY OFFICER ASKED HIM TO MOVE. HE REFUSED. THE OFFICER ORDERED SEVERAL SOLDIER CARRYING RIFLES WITH BAYONETS ALONGSIDE WALKER.

THE SOLDIERS HELD THEIR BAYONETS WITHIN INCHES OF THE FORMER GENERAL, BUT DID NOT TOUCH HIM. THE OFFICER SAID SOMETHING TO WALKER AND HE WALKED OFF THROUGH THE CROWD.

AS1143ACS

[fol. 1886] A14WX (LD REACTION & BJT)

FIRST LEAD KENNEDY REACTION (350)

WASHINGTON, OCT. 1 (AP)–SEN. WAYNE MORSE, D-ORE., TOLD THE SENATE TODAY PRESIDENT KENNEDY ROSE TO "THE SUPERLATIVE HEIGHTS OF GREATNESS" IN HIS ADDRESS TO THE NATION ON THE UNIVERSITY OF MISSISSIPPI INTEGRATION CRISIS.

MORSE DECLARED THE PRESIDENT IN THE RADIO-TELEVISION ADDRESS LAST NIGHT REDEDICATED THE NATION "TO GOVERNMENT BY LAW, INSTEAD OF GOVERNMENT BY MEN, OR MOB."

AGREEING, SEN. STEPHEN M. YOUNG, D-OHIO, CALLED THE PRESIDENT'S STATEMENT "SOMBER YET TEMPERATE" AND CONCILIATORY, BUT

"FIRM IN HIS DEMAND THAT THE FEDERAL LAW MUST BE OBEYED."

SEN. JOHN STENNIS, D-MISS., CALLED FOR WITHDRAWAL OF THE NEGRO STUDENT, JAMES H. MEREDITH FROM THE UNIVERSITY "TO AVOID FURTHER BLOODSHED AND LOSS OF LIFE."

SEN. JAMES O. EASTLAND, D-MISS., SAID MEREDITH NEVER SHOULD HAVE BEEN ADMITTED, AND CRITICIZED THE FEDERAL JUDGES WHO ORDERED THE UNIVERSITY TO ENROLL HIM.

REP. DALE ALFORD, D-ARK., TOLD KENNEDY IN A TELEGRAM "YOU HAVE MADE THE SAME TRAGIC MISTAKE AS DID YOUR PREDECESSOR IN SENDING ARMED FORCES INTO A SOVEREIGN STATE."

"SHALL THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC ENDURE OR SHALL WE SACRIFICE OUR STATE SOVEREIGNTY TO AN ALL-POWERFUL SUPER STATE ACTING IN DIRECT OPPOSITION TO THE WILL OF THE MAJORITY OF THE PEOPLE OF A SOVEREIGN STATE AND THEREFORE IN OPPOSITION TO THE CONSTITUTION?" THE ARKANSAS CONGRESSMAN ASKED.

ALFORD'S REFERENCE TO KENNEDY'S PREDECESSOR WAS TO FORMER PRESIDENT DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, WHO ORDERED FEDERAL TROOPS INTO LITTLE ROCK, ARK., TO QUELL INTEGRATION DISORDERS THERE.

ALFORD SAID "THE GREAT MORAL ISSUE IN MISSISSIPPI TODAY . . . IS NOT SEGREGATION VS. INTEGRATION OF THE SCHOOLS: IT IS, INSTEAD, THE ISSUE OF THE SOVEREIGN PEOPLE AND THE CONSTITUTION VS. DEFAULTING PUBLIC TRUSTEES AS OATH BREAKING SUSURPERS."

SEN. SAM J. ERVIN JR., D-N. C., ALSO SAID "I DEPLORE THE GREAT TRAGEDY WHICH HAS HAPPENED IN MISSISSIPPI."

"IT SEEMS TO ME," HE ADDED, "THAT THOSE WHO ARE ENGAGED IN FOMENTING LITIGATION WHICH HAS SUCH A TRAGIC AFTERMATH MIGHT WELL MEDIDATE UPON THE WORDS OF ST. PAUL WHEN HE SAID: 'ALL THINGS ARE LAWFUL UNTO ME, BUT ALL THINGS ARE NOT EXPEDIENT.'"

SEN. JACOB K. JAVITS, R-N. Y., CALLED THE VIOLENCE AT MISSISSIPPI UNBELIEVABLE, STUPID AND TRAGIC.

HE SAID KENNEDY IS ENTITLED TO THE NATION'S FULL SUPPORT AS HE ASSERTED THE "PARAMOUNT AUTHORITY" OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT.

"WE CAN ONLY HOPE THE LESSON THAT RECKLESS DEFIANCE OF THE LAW ONLY BREEDS ANARCHY WILL AT LEAST BE LEARNED IN MISSISSIPPI," JAVITS SAID.

FOR THE MOST PART REACTION IN CONGRESS DIVIDED ALONG SECTIONAL LINES.

SOMEWHERE IN ETC., 3RD GRAF A7WX.

ER152PED

A15KX (DARLING)

LEAD EXECUTION

SAN QUENTIN, CALIF., OCT. 1 (AP)–MELVIN T. DARLING, 6 FOOT 7, WENT QUIETLY TO HIS DEATH IN THE PRISON GAS CHAMBER TODAY.

THE LETHAL GAS BEGAN GENERATING AT 10:30 A.M., AND HE WAS PRONOUNCED DEAD AT 10:10.

DARLING, 29 X X X 2ND GRAF A96FX

GM1154ACS NM

A16WX (INSERT)

INSERT

WASHINGTON—MISS.-SENATE (A5WX), INSERT THE FOLLOWING AFTER 4TH GRAF "THE RESUME X X X PROTECT MEREDITH."

ALSO AT THE CAPITOL, REP. JOHN BELL WILLIAMS, D-MISS., TOLD THE HOUSE THE RIOT WAS STARTED BY A U.S. MARSHAL "FIRING DIRECTLY INTO A GROUP OF STUDENTS." HE SAID HIS INFORMATION CAME FROM A RESPONSIBLE OFFICIAL ON THE OLE MISS CAMPUS. WILLIAMS WAS ONE OF SEVERAL SOUTHERN CONGRESSMEN, MOST OF THEM FROM MISSISSIPPI, WHO ADDRESSED THE HOUSE ON THE SITUATION IN OXFORD. ALL CALLED IT "TRAGIC."

"EASTLAND SAID, "ETC., 5TH GRAF.

JK157PED

[fol. 1887] PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 3A

A'20WX

BULLETIN MATTER

WASHINGTON—FIRST ADD FIRST LEAD WALKER (A19WX) X X X INSURRECTION.

KENNEDY SAID WALKER WAS ARRESTED AT A MILITARY ROADBLOCK NEAR OXFORD, MISS., AND WOULD BE ARRAIGNED LATER TODAY.

EARLIER IN THE SENATE WALKER, WHO HAD PARTICIPATED IN THE RIOTING AT THE UNIVERSITY OF MISSISSIPPI, WAS DESCRIBED AS POSSIBLY A "SICK MAN" WHO "OUGHT TO BE COMMITTED" AND WAS LINKED WITH "VIOLENT SEGREGATIONISTS OR PSYCOPATHS."

SEN. WAYNE MORSE ETC., 2ND GRAF A172WX

BU212PED

A21

TOKYO

A21NU

CORRECTION

OXFORD—Third lead Merédith (A7-8NU) eighth graf counting insert, beginning "Arrests jumped" read: arrests jumped to 112. (Not 150).

AS1214PCS NM

A22

TOKYO—First add night lead Red China (A18) x x x futile."

Peiping has branded as the worst "revisionist" President Tito of Yugoslavia, who only last week entertained Soviet President Leonid I. Brezhnev.

Chou made plain Peiping will stick to its policy of actively aiding "liberation struggles" to spread Communism even at the risk of war. Khrushchev has repeatedly claimed the fight can be won on the economic front with the help of revolutionaries in the various countries.

Chou acknowledged that China was confronted with her own economic difficulties and there were even admissions of some opposition at home with suggestions of a purge.

"The serious natural disasters for the past three consecutive years from 1958 to 1961 and the shortcomings and mistakes in our work have indeed caused us difficulties," he said. But Chou insisted the Chinese people have become stronger since the Communists took over.

R217PED

[fol. 1888] PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 3B

A'25WX

BULLETIN MATTER

WASHINGTON—Second add first lead Walker x x x psychopaths.

Kennedy said these charges also have been filed against Walker:

Conspiracy to incite a rebellion or insurrection.

Conspiracy to hinder federal officers in the performance of their duties.

Assaulting a federal officer.

Justice Department officials said the conspiracy to incite rebellion charge carries a maximum penalty of 20 years in prison and a fine of $20,000.

Execution of such a conspiracy, as distinguished from the act of conspiring, involves a maximum penalty of 10 years and $10,000, they said.

The penalty for conspiring to hinder a federal officer could be up to five years in prison and $6,000 and for assaulting a federal officer could be three years and $5,000.

The Justice Department said Walker's arrest came at about 2 P.M. EDT today on the outskirts of the strife-torn college town of Oxford, Miss., and an immediate arraignment before U. S. Commissioner Omar Craig was being arranged.

For his first statement on the Oxford situation since last night's bloody rioting, Kennedy stood in a Justice Department corridor in shirtsleeves, surrounded by newsmen.

SEN. WAYNE MORSE ETC., 2ND GRAF A172 WX

BU230PED

A26WX

—URGENT—

FOREIGN AID (180)

WASHINGTON, Oct. 1 (AP)—The Senate defeated today an attempt to slash $785 million from a committee-approved $4,422,800,000 (B) foreign Aid appropriations bill.

It was only a tentative victory for the Administration in the first skirmish on the big bill for military and economic assistance abroad, however, and left senators free to seek reductions in each of the separate items in the measure.

The vote temporarily sustained the recommendations of the Appropriations Committee that the Senate restore $792,400,000 (M) of cuts totaling $1,124,400,000 (B) made by the House.

Sen. William Proxmire, D-Wis., had asked the Senate to reject the increases and substitute all the House cuts but $7.4 million in administrative expenses.

Sen. Allen J. Ellender, D-La., has announced plans to call up an amendment reducing the Committee's recommended $1,450,000,000 (B) for military assistance at least to the $1.3 billion voted by the House and slashing the $1,125,000,000 (B) the Committee recommended for development loans abroad.

Proxmire also offered amendments to restore a House-approved ban on giving any foreign aid to countries which allow their ships to transport military or other supplies to Communist Cuba, as well as another House prohibition against foreign assistance to Poland and Yugoslavia.

BU/PE234PED

A27AT

A27NU

URGENT

FOURTH LEAD MEREDITH ROUNDUP

OXFORD, Miss., Oct. 1 (AP)—Bayonets of the federal government forced a Negro into the University of Mississippi today. Riot troops arrested former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, who led students in wild charges against Marshals in night long rioting.

The arrest of the controversial general, commander of troop during the Little Rock segregation crisis, came after an outbreak of fresh violence in downtown Oxford that began minutes after James H. Meredith enrolled at Ole Miss.

He was arrested at a roadblock and taken before a U. S. Commissioner later today.

In Washington, Atty. Gen. Robert Kennedy said Walker had been taken into custody on charges of inciting rebellion or insurrection. Conviction could bring 10 years in prison and $10,000 fine.

[fol. 1889] PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 3C

A34WX

WASHINGTON—First add foreign aid (A26WX) x x x Yugoslavia.

The vote today was 47-28 to sustain the Committee.

The voting started after Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, D-Minn., Democratic whip, declared that the House cuts, if allowed to stand, "would be a blow to our national security."

"Never before has this slashing been as ill-timed or ill-conceived as today," he said, "when Communist influence is increasing in the western hemisphere, when Soviet pressure is mounting in Berlin, and when Chinese military, political and economic pressure on southeast Asia is soaring."

ER322PED

A35AT

A35AX (GLANCE) (NU FW)

UNDATED OXFORD-AT-A-GLANCE

BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

James H. Meredith enrolled in University of Mississippi under bayoneted rifles of federal government, becoming first Negro enrolled at University at Oxford, Miss.

Violence breaks out anew in downtown Oxford; federalized Mississippi troops fire over heads of angry mob.

New outbreak comes after lull in night-long rioting in which two persons—a newsman and an Oxford resident—were killed.

Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy announced in Washington the arrest today of former Army Maj. Gen. Edwin Walker on charges of inciting a rebellion or insurrection.

Arrests in Oxford jump to 112 and officers say some taken into custody lived as far away as 500 miles.

SF224PES

A36NU

FIRST NIGHT LEAD MEREDITH ROUNDUP (AMS BJT) (300 UP)

BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OXFORD, Miss., Oct. 1 (AP)—Rifle fire echoed in the streets of downtown Oxford today as James H. Meredith, a Negro, ended 114 years of segregation at the University of Mississippi.

Admist the shooting, troops arrested former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker—the man who led the troops during desegregation in Little Rock in 1957 and then decided he was on the wrong side.

Walker led students in charges that failed against the gas launchers of U.S. Marshals during night-long rioting on the University campus (illegible).

Walker led students in charges that failed against the gas launchers of U.S. Marshals during night-long riotin on the un

Walker led students in charges that failed against the gas launchers of U.S. Marshals during night-long rioting on the University campus that cost the lives of two persons and injured 20 others.

The controversial Texan showed up, too, during fresh trouble that broke out today minutes after Meredith's enrollment at the University—the first Negro knowingly admitted in the University's 114-year history.

Troops picked up Walker at a roadblock

Atty. Gen. Robert Kennedy said in Washington Walker had been charged with inciting a rebellion or insumnomo

Troops picked up Walker at a roadblock

Atty. Gen. Robert Kennedy said in Washington Walker had been charged with inciting a rebellion or insurrection. The penalty on conviction: 20 years in prison, $20,000 fine.

The former general was among 176 arrests, about one third students and the rest non-students. Some lived as much as 500 miles away from this college town.

Meredith, 29-year-old Korean war veteran, registered in a 55-minute routine session with Registrar Robert Ellis, failed to find his first class and drove off with an escort.

Infantrymen ringed the University campus, where last night's gas gumes blanketed the central area.

[fol. 1890]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 3D

A37NU

THERE WERE THESE OTHER DEVELOPMENTS:

—In Congress, Sen. Wayne Morse, D-Ore., said Walker perhaps is "a sick man. If he is, he ought to be committed . . ." Sen. James O. Eastland, D-Miss., said the Justice Department and U.S. Marshals provoked the campus riot.

—The Justice Dept. disclosed that it had okayed Meredith's campus trip yesterday after Gov. Ross Barnett reportedly telephoned a message of capitulation and assurance of police protection. Barnett, who once vowed to go to jail rather than see Ole Miss integrated, branded reports he had altered his defiant stand as "untrue and completely unfounded."

—Still hanging over the 64-year-old Governor and Lt. Gov. Paul M. Johnson, both of whom have personally blocked Meredith's path to enrollment, was a federal contempt of court citation. The U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans gave them until 11 A.M. tomorrow to purge themselves.

—There was widespread praise for President Kennedy abroad and almost universal denunciation of Gov. Barnett and Mississippi officials. Chairman Harold Blot of the British Labor Party called the attempt to bar Meredith a "blot on western civilization."

Renewed uprisings broke out in the tense town of Oxford where tension mounted as residents and others watched more than 4,000 troops stream into the town of 5,200.

Shouting demonstrators, numbering in the hundreds, hurled pop bottles at military vehicles and at a unit of soldiers—which included a large percentage of Negroes.

Military police fired over the crowd and hurled at least two tear gas grenades to disperse them. Troops occupied the

UNEOW

HM — CM

Military police fired over the crowd and hurled at least two tear gas grenades to disperse them. Troops occupied the courthouse square and cleared the area of civilians. Then, a ring of bayonet-carrying soldiers blocked all routes into the square. Many stores put up a "closed" sign.

A mile away, Marshals had escorted Meredith into Lyceum Hall at 7:50 A.M. A confederate flag flew at half mast outside.

A38NU

Meredith seemed outwardly calm, paid his $230 cash for tuition, and asked about class routine. He was given a two-room apartment with kitchenette in a residence hall. His subjects will include History, Political Science and English.

A Justice Department spokseman said Marshals will live with him and escort him to class "as long as he is in any danger."

As Meredith left the Registrar's Office, smiling, he said he was at Ole Miss for purely academic reasons, would attend classes only and would not participate in extra-curricular activities.

He was asked if he was happy that the long struggle had met with success.

"No," he replied. "This is not a happy occasion."

Hundreds of jeering students followed him to his first class—Colonial American times.

"You've got blood on your hands," they cried. Soldiers took the ringleaders into custody.

(MORE)

AS141PCS

[fol. 1891]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 3E

A51NU

NEW ORLEANS—First add first night lead Meredith roundup (A35-38NU) x x x custody.

Walker's arrest came about noon at a military roadblock on the outskirts of the strife-torn Oxford.

At one time today, he marched at the vanguard of a file of soldiers as though he were their inspecting officers. He refused to move after an officer ordered him to do so. Then finally relented when soldiers held their bayonets within inches of his body.

In addition to conspiracy to incite a rebellion or insurrection, charges filed against him include: conspiracy to hinder federal officers in the performanee of their duties and assaulting a federal officer.

Circumstances surrounding the fatal shooting of two men during last night's rioting remained a mystery.

One was Paul Guihard, 30, a member of the New York Bureau of Agence France Presse. He was found shot in the back with a .32 caliber revolver near a dormitory not far from the scene of the major rioting. The other victim, Walter Ray Gunter, 23, an Oxford juke box repairman, was shot in the head, also with a .32 caliber bullet.

The scars of the night rebellion lay scattered through the tree shaded campus. There were six completely burned cars. Twenty others were damaged or had their windows smashed. In the door of the Lyceum Building which the Marshals had ringed during the riot, there were .22-caliber rifle bullet holes. Also the scars of pistol shots.

In Washington, Justice Department Officials indicated Barnett had not kept faith with them. They said he had promised that Meredith and the Marshals would be would be admitted without opposition and that he would "guarantee to preserve law and order with state police or in cooperation with U.S. Marshals."

During the night, the Mississippi Highway Patrol withdrew from the gas-shrouded field of battle. Col. T. B. Birdsong, Patrol Boss, said the patrolmen had defective gas masks. One trooper said their orders were to direct traffic only.

In Jackson, the State Capital, both state and national flags flew at half mast at the Capitol building.

(END ROUNDUP)

RK237PCS

A52NU

URGENT

INSERT

OXFORD, Miss., fourth lead Meredith roundup (A27 NU) after third graf "He was x x x later today" insert the following:

Walker waved preliminary hearing before before U.S. Commissioner Omar Craig on a charge of attempting to impede justice. Bond was set at $100,000 and the Texan had not posted it by mid-afternoon.

In Washington x x x fourth graf A27NU.

RK238PCS

[fol. 1892]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT NO. 3F

A61NU

WITH MEREDITH: WALKER

PRECEDE WASHN DAY (320)

OXFORD, Miss., Oct. 1 (AP)—Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, who led a charge of students against U.S. Marshals at the University of Mississippi last night, was arrested by federal officers today.

He waived preliminary hearing before U.S. Commissioner Omar Craig on a charge of attempting to obstruct justice. Bond was set at $100,000, which the controversial Texan had not posted by mid-afternoon.

When federal officers took him into custody at a military roadblock on the outskirts of this riot-torn town, Walker told them: "I guess I am in custody."

Walker, as a Major General, commanded federal troops sent into Little Rock, Ark., in 1957 to enforce court ordered public school desegregation. He resigned from the Army after a controversy over a troop indoctrination program in Europe.

Walker walked into the courtroom with a slight smile flickering across his face. Craig advised Walker he could waive the preliminary hearing or be represented by counsel.

"My counsel is not in this state," Walker said. Craig told him he could get competent attorneys in Mississippi. Walker asked for and received permission to leave the court momentarily.

He returned, still smiling and asked: "Is it proper to ask that if I waive this hearing, I will be assured that it (his trial comes back to Mississippi?"

Craig told him the trial would be held in U.S. District Court in Mississippi.

"I waive this hearing," Walker said.

Urging a firm stand by Mississippi in the face of federal pressures leading up to Negro James H. Meredith's enrollment at Ole Miss today, Walker had promised last week to deliver "tens of thousands" of volunteers for the final showdown.

But in the end, his role in the resistance on the campus last night was to lead several hundred students storming a line of Federal Marshals guarding the Administration Building. The Marshals turned them back with tear gas.

In Washington, Atty. Gen. Robert Kennedy had announced earlier that Walker would be charged with inciting rebellion or insurrection. Conviction carries a penalty of 20 years imprisonment and a fine of $20,000.

The penalty for ATGTM obstruct justice could be as much ears conviction carries a penalty of 20 years imprisonment and a fine of $20,000.

The penalty for attemptinec
Conviction carries a penalty of 20 years imprisonment and a fine of $20,000.

The penalty for attempting to obstruct justice could be as much as five years in prison and a $5,000 fine.

RK/AS328PCS

A6—

[fol. 1893]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 3G

A78NU

A78NU

2ND NL MEREDITH ROUNDUP (AMS BJT) (A36NU)
(400)

BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OXFORD, MISS., Oct. 1 (AP)—Battle-ready troops continued to pour into Oxford today as James H. Meredith, a Negro, finally enrolled and went to class at the all-white University of Mississippi.

While Army gunfire—with rifles pointed skyward—and tear gas smashed riots in downtown Oxford, troops arrested former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker.

Walker, who last night led a charge of students against Federal Marshals on the Ole Miss campus where two men were killed in nine hours of rioting, waived a preliminary hearing on charges of trying to obstruct justice. Commissioner Omar Craig held him in $100,000 bond.

The controversial Texan—who led federal forces in the 1957 Little Rock desegregation crisis, but changed sides because he said he was wrong—also showed up in renewed skirmishing in the college town today. Troops took him into custody at a roadblock.

In mid-afternoon, a caravan of 92 vehicles, carrying mostly military police, rolled into Oxford. Units of the crack 82nd and 101st Airborne Divisions landed at the Oxford airport, and at Columbus, fresh troops of the 1st Airborne Battle Group of the 328th Infantry disembarked after flying from Ft. Campbell, Ky.

Gov. Ross Barnett, who once vowed to go to jail rather than see Ole Miss integrated, called for an end to violence. Law and order must prevail "even though our state has been invaded by federal forces," Barnett said in a broadcast from Jackson this afternoon.

He told Mississippians not to leave their hometowns. To out-of-states who had rushed to Oxford, Barnett said, "Please go home, and I say this with great emphasis."

It was Barnett's third statement in 24 hours. Late yesterday, Barnett said Mississippi was surrounded and overpowered. His "calm judgment" abhorred any ensuing bloodshed, he said.

Many believed it a statement of concession. The Justice Dept. said it had okayed Meredith's campus trip yesterday after Barnett telephoned assurance of police protection.

Late last night, Barnett issued a second statement saying reports he had yielded were untrue. "We will never surrender," he had said.

In addition to two dead in the night-long campus rioting 20 were injured. In Washington, the Justice Department reported no one had been killed or hurt from gunfire from the weapons of federal troops.

On the campus and in Oxford, military police and infantrymen—with rifles and bayonets—arrested 176 persons, about one-third students. Some lived as much as 500 miles away.

A79NU

Meredith's enrollment brought dismay at Ole Miss. Many students were seen leaving with packed suitcases. A reliable source in the student housing office said more than half the students in the dormitories had check out.

In New Orleans, Jack Greenburg, attorney for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, told the New Orleans States-Item a second Negro—a girl —is in the process of applying for entrance into the University of Mississippi.

Meredith, 29-year-old x x x 8th graf, eliminating 12th graf: "The justice x x x unfounded."

RK/AS443PCS

[fol. 1894]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 3H

A162

URGENT

FOURTH NIGHT LEAD MEREDITH ROUNDUP (240)

OXFORD, MISS., Oct. 1 (AP)—Hoards of combat-ready troops clamped rigid control on this seething southern town tonight after James H. Meredith, a Negro, ended segregation at the University of Mississippi.

Bent on smothering continued riots that took two lives last night and led to today's arrest of former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, helmeted troops patroled with loaded rifles and fixed bayonets.

The Army named Lt. Gen. Hamilton Howze of Ft. Bragg, N.C., to head the massive buildup of nearly 10,000 Army troops. Observers said appointment of the 3-Star General may mean there will be more soldiers in the state than were ever assembled in peacetime.

Military police and infantrymen patroled Oxford with loaded rifles and fixed bayonets. They imposed tight security measures on the Ole Miss campus.

A163

Soldiers permitted no outsiders on the grounds. They searched everyone entering the gates. They kept the numbers of milling students under 100—scattering them.

Scattered arrests persisted into the night. Soldiers broke out tear gas to quash one demonstration of about 30 brick-throwing students near a fraternity house. Troops caught a man wearing a white-hooded garment to his waist and carrying a home-made gas mask.

Federal forces arrested at least 39 persons tonight—most of them youths taken in custody at campus roadblocks. The total brought the arrest number to 215 since the rioting began last night. Many have since been turned loose.

For the most part, quiet settled over Oxford as night fell. The darkness ended a day marred by a downtown riot quelled by rifle fire into the air and tear gas.

Walker, who x x x 4th graf 3rd night lead (A120NU).

UM957PCS NM

A164 (AGYS & RADIO OUT)

ADVANCE FOR AMS OF SUNDAY, OCT. 7—FROM AP NEWSFEATURES

(ADVANCE) VATICAN CITY—First add Vatican II (A161) x x x Church itself.

The meeting of Catholic leaders from over the world that opens Oct. 11 is called the Second Vatican Ecumenical Council. It is only the second such held by the Roman Catholic Church since the Reformation.

It comes at a time of stress and strain in a fast-changing world that has exerted its own forces against the hierarchy and theology of the Church.

Yet it is with quiet excitement, not anxiety, that the biggest Church Council of all time is meeting.

After three years of preparation the Council is just a few days away.

Throughout the Eternal City, hotels are filling up with bishops and theologians. Pontifical colleges that dot the Seven Hills are hosts to high-ranking clerical guests from distant continents.

Banks of green upholstered seats yawn the length of St. Peter's and, flanking them, galleries hung in red damask.

Marble workers before the Basilica's 30-foot bronze doors are machine-polishing a new pavement in which the coat of arms of Pope John XXIII has been imbedded. At least half a million dollars has been spent to put the Basilica in readiness.

The religious goods shops along the broad Roman Avenue that stretches away from St. Peter's Square are stocked with newly struck commemorative medals bearing the image of Pope John and the words "Vatican II."

The last such worldwide meeting was in 1870, when the first Council ever held at the Vatican proclaimed the doctrine of Papal Infallibility—that a Pope is without error when speaking "Ex Cathedra," that is, as Pope, to the Whole Church, on a matter of faith or morals.

[fol. 1895]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 3I

A149KX

CORRECTION

SAN FRANCISCO—Nixon-Brown A131 ninth graf "Nixon said x x x the loan" read it x x x had no part of and no interest in. (Rephrasing)

THE AP

VX903PCS

A150KX

WITH OXFORD (140)

DALLAS, TEX., Oct. 1 (AP)—A 22-year-old man transporting a small arsenal, was arrested yesterday en route to Mississippi to join former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, police said today. Officers said the man had been a worker in Walker's unsuccessful campaign to become Governor of Texas.

Dallas police charged the man, Ashland F. Burchwell of Dallas, with carrying prohibitive weapons. The FBI charged him with interstate transportation of a switch blade knife.

Burchwell was quoted by police as saying he served under Walker in Germany and helped compile the former general's "Pro-Blue" program for which Walker was reprimanded by the Army.

Police seized the following arms and ammunition: 1 37-magnum pistol, fully loaded; 1 303 Army-style rifle, fully loaded; 2,000 rounds of 30-06 ammunition; 3 22-caliber pistols; 1,000 rounds of 22-caliber ammunition; 14 rounds of 303 ammunition; 1 switchblade knife; blankets and changes of clothing.

VX906PCS

A151KX

INSERT

SAN FRANCISCO—Landsberg's Nixon-Brown A131 insert after 7th graf "the loan x x x statements."

The questioner was one of the delegates to the 62nd Annual Convention of the United Press International Editors and Publishers before whom the two candidates made their face to face appearance.

The questioner etc. 8th graf.

GC908PCS

A152KX

(140)

WIT

A152AX (COURT)

A152

EDITORS:

NEW YORK—Lord Home speech (A140) delivered. Delete "In a prepared speech" in 3rd graf.

THE AP, OCT. 1

FV1110PED

[fol. 1896]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 3J

A132

URGENT

Springfield, Mo.—Second add precede Walker (A116, 122) x x x with Walker.

When officers took Walker into custory on the outskirts of Oxford, Walker told them, "I guess I'm in custody."

Walker, as a Major General x x x 7th graf under Oxford dateline.

FV10PED

A133WX

(130) INSERT

Washington—NL Meredith A50WX insert after 6th graf:

A White House spokesman etc. x x x x Justice Department.

About 4 P. M. (EDT) Salinger told newsmen they could expect nothing further from the White House today. He said if there were any announcements of new developments they would be made by the Pentagon or the Justice Department.

Asked if martial law would be declared in Oxford to prevent further violent disorders, Salinger replied that "the commander on the scene • • •

Salinger did not deny that the President had talked by telep violent disorders, Salinger replied that "The commander on the scene has the authority to do what needs doing to maintain law and order."

Salinger did not deny that the President had talked by telephone during the day with Gov. Ross Barnett of Mississippi.

"I cannot comment on that," he said.

Kennedy remained in etc., 8th graf (eliminating 7th graf; Salinger withheld x x x last night).

SR1004PED

A134WX

With Meredith (150)

Washington, Oct. 1 (AP)—Defense Department officials shrugged their shoulders and replied, "We haven't figured it out yet," when asked today about the cost of keeping some 6,000 troops and U. S. Marshals in Mississippi.

The force has been assembled to enforce court orders that Negro James H. Meredith be enrolled as a student at the University of Mississippi.

In the past, in similar cases, the department has been reluctant to estimate such costs. They point out that regular army troops would be on duty anyway and would be using up food and supplies somewhere else.

Official estimates say some 500 U. S. Marshals, about 2,600 regular troops and 2,900 National Guardsmen are assigned to the operation in Oxford, Miss.

The Justice Department said it had no figures yet but the cost for Marshals would be only overtime pay, plus transportation outlays subsistence allowances.

At the time of the desegregation operation in Little Rock, Ark., public schools the army figured its cost at $4.7 million, which included about $95,000 a day for pay and other costs of the Federalized National Guard.

SR1008PED

A135WX

Lemnitzer—Taylor (100)

Washington, Oct. 1 (AP)—The nation's new commander in Europe, Gen. Lyman L. Lemnitzer, was decorated by President Kennedy today for his services as Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. A few minutes later his successor on the Joint Chiefs, Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor, was sworn into office.

Both ceremonies were in the White House garden before an assemblage of distinguished military officers, former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, and high government officials.

Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy gave the oath to Taylor. The occasion coincided with the start of Lemnitzer's duty as Commander of U. S. Forces in Europe. He has been named to become Supreme Commander of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization • • •

[fol. 1897]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 3K

A120NU

Third night lead Meredith wrapup

By the Associated Press

Oxford, Miss., Oct. 1 (AP)—Thousands of helmeted troops poured into this embattled college town tonight, hours after James H. Meredith, a Negro, smashed the University of Mississippi's segregation barrier.

Determined to prevent further rioting that took two lives last night, soldiers arrested 38 persons. Most of them were youths caught at roadblocks set up around the campus.

For the most part, quiet settled over Oxford as night fell. The darkness ended a day highlighted by the arrest of former Gen. Edwin A. Walker and marred by a downtown demonstration which was quelled by rifle fire in the air and by tear gas.

Walker, who last night lead a charge of students against Federal Marshals on the Ole Miss campus, was arrested on four counts including insurrection against the United States.

He was flown to the Federal Medical Center at Springfield, Mo., when he failed to post $100,000 bond. The hospital has facilities for the systematic psychiatric care of prisoners.

Walker also was present during skirmishing at the courthouse square today in Oxford. The controversial Texan, who led the troops in the Little Rock school desegregation crisis in Little Rock in 1957 and said later he was on the wrong side then, was taken into custody at noon at a roadblock.

At the Capital in Jackson, Gov. Ross Barnett, who once vowed to go to jail rather than see Ole Miss integrated, blamed the disorder on the Marshals. He said they were "inexperienced, nervous and trigger happy."

In remarks prepared for a television statement tonight, Barnett said the Marshals fired tear gas point blank at State Highway Patrolmen who he said were successfully moving back a crowd of students. Someone tossed a pop bottle. The Marshals opened up, Barnett said, adding that five patrolmen were treated for effects of the gas.

"This was the direct cause of violence on the campus," he charged.

Earlier, Barnett, under an 11 A.M. (CST) Tuesday deadline to purge himself of contempt of court charges, called for an end to violence. Law and order must prevail, he said in a broadcast, "even though our state has been invaded by federal forces."

All day long, caravans of military vehicles roared into Oxford. They carried crack units of the 82nd and 101st Airborne Divisions. Fresh troops of the 1st Airborne Battle Group of the 328th Infantry landed at Columbus from Ft. Campbell, Ky., to augment the Mississippi contingent.

A121NU

Wearing battle fatiques and equipped with bayonets and gas masks, the soldiers sealed off the campus and courthouse square. Jeeps patrolled the streets.

Federal forces arrested 176 persons, about one-third students. Edwin Guthman, a Justice Department spokesman, said all but about 25 of those in custody were released. The government has the best evidence against them and charges were being prepared, he said.

Guthman said they were being kept in confinement, but declined to say where. Oxford has no jail.

Charges will deal with conspiracy to obstruct justice and to interfere by force with the performance of a court, Guthman said.

Some of those picked up lived as far as 500 miles away.

In Washington, Sen. James O. Eastland, D-Miss., directed the Senate Judiciary Committee to investigate the Ole Miss situation. Eastland, Committee Chairman, and other Mississippi members of Congress aid the Justice Department and the Marshals ignited the mob violence.

In addition to the two killed in the night-long campus rioting, 20 persons were hurt. The Justice Department reported no one had been killed or hurt from gunfire from the weapons of federal troops.

Meredith's x x x pick up in 2nd NL Meredith Roundup, at A79NU.

A8734PCS

EQ

A122KX'

BULLETIN MATTER

SPRINGFIELD, MO.—First add Walker (A116) which make precede Oxford x x x Springfield tonight.

[fol. 1898]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 3L

A97T

A97NU
NU

URGENT

OXFORD, MISS.—First add 2nd hl Walker (A82NU) (which may carry the byline by Relman Morin) x x x in custody."

Walker, as a Major General, commanded federal troops sent into Little Rock, Ark., in 1957 to enforce court ordered public school desegregation. He resigned from the army after a controversy over a troop indoctrination program in Europe.

Charges against Walker were:

(1) Assaulting, resisting, or impeding U.S. Marshals.

(2) Conspiring to prevent discharge of duties.

(3) Inciting, assisting and engaging in insurrection against the authority of the U.S.

(4) Conspiring to oppose by force the execution of any law of the U.S.

Conviction on the fourth count alone could bring a maximum find of $20,000 and a prison sentence of 20 years.

Walker walked x x x pick up 5th graf with Meredith: Walker W61NU) (Eliminating 12th and 13th grafs: "In Washington x x x $5,000 Fine."

A98
INSERT

Washington—Cuba conference A86 insert after third graf "the declaration x x x last week."

In Havana, the Castro regime announced Cuba's President Osvaldo Dorticos plans to make a speech to the U.N. General Assembly in which he will accuse the United States of aggression against Cuba. He will fly to New York this week.

Just what the x x x 4th graf.

A99WX (TOP)

A99

Newspage playoffs (210)

San Francisco, Oct. 1 (AP)—The San Francisco Giants defeated the Los Angeles Dodgers today, 8-0, in the first game of their best-of-three playoff series to determine the winner of the National League Pennant. The two teams finished in a tie for first place at the end of the regular season yesterday.

The winner of the playoffs will meet the New York Yankees in the World Series starting Thursday at the park of the playoff winner.

Willie Mays of the Giants hit two home runs to extend his season total of 49, high for the Major Leagues. Billy Pierce, a 35-year-old left-hander, pitched for the Giants and held the Dodgers to three hits.

The Dodgers have been in a bad batting slump and now have gone 30 straight innings without scoring a run. They were shut out by the St. Louis Cardinals in their final two regular-season games.

Jim Davenport and Orlando Cepeda also hit home runs for the Giants. The Dodgers used six pitchers in an effort to stem the Giants' hitting barrage, but were unsuccessful. Dodger ace Sandy Koufax, who had been bothered with an injured finger for more than two months, started for the Dodgers and lasted less than two innings.

The playoffs now switch to Los Angeles for tomorrow's and, if necessary, Wednesday's game. Jack Sanford, who won 24 games and lost seven during the season, will pitch for the Giants. Stan Williams, whose record is 13 victories and 12 defeats, will pitch for the Dodgers.

FV817PED

[fol. 1899]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 3M

Shed to a tree-lined campus normally wrapped in quiet and peace.

The rioting began soon after dusk. Students had milled about on the campus for several hours, but the effronteries they hurled at Federal Marshals arrayed shoulder to shoulder around the administration building had been more in fun and frustration than in maliciousness.

Even the Marshals, their tear gas ready, smiled at the students jests and jeers.

Confederate flags—romantic symbols of a lost cause of a century ago—were waved by laughing and cheering students, as if they were on parade.

But as time went by, the talk became louder and rougher.

Several students smashed a photographer's camera; others smashed the windows of a car. Still others turned on an army truck and sought to set it afire.

When this took place, the strong contingent of Marshals moved quickly into action. They put on their gas masks and began firing tear gas—indiscriminately, in the words of several persons who got the first strong whiff of it.

The ringleaders and their followers scattered.

Many soon regrouped, however, and followed former Maj. Gen. Edwin Walker in a charge against the Marshals ringing the administration building.

The students, and outsiders in their ranks, hurled bricks and pop bottles at the Marshals, who laid down a heavy tear gas barrage.

The charge faltered and familed. Walker then stood on the Confederate monument not far from the administration building and addressed his followers.

"If you can't win, go home," he declared. "Don't stay at the University. But let's not quit; we can win."

The tear gas fumes and smoke eddied about the campus. Students and outsiders and onlookers alike clasped hands or handkerchiefs to smarting eyes and nose. The smoke carried an eirie sheen against the dark night.

Shots rang out. There was the surge and flow of those uncertain which way to turn. Taunts were spat. Ugly words were used.

A detachment of the mob, peopled by both students and outsiders, used a bulldozer in an effort to smash through the line of Marshals. Tear gas beat back the sally, and the bulldozer was abandoned.

A fire truck that had followed the bulldozer was put out of action and Marshals dragged four persons from the vehicle and roughed them up. One of the men who had driven the bulldozer was arrested. So were others.

Irregular firing cut through the night.

Many of the Marshals and troops went inside the administration building.

Some members of the mob used home-made zip guns triggered by strong rubber bands. Screws, bolts, nuts and rocks were the ammunition for these weapons.

The firing of another kind kept up.

"They've got something that sounds like a high-powered rifle out there," one Marshal said. "And somebody's emptied a pistol—pow, pow, pow—as fast as he could pull the trigger.

He said the person with the pistol was firing at the Marshals. "I could hear the bullets bouncing off the building."

Neither the Marshals nor the troops returned the fire.

A group described as teen-agers raided the science building and made off with various chemicals.

"Molotov cocktails"—an inflammable liquid primed with a burning wick—were hurled. Three cars were burned.

L. L. Love, Dean of Students at the school, described the violence as far beyond anything officials at the University had expected.

Reinforcements continued to reach each side well after midnight. Bayonets gleaned.

Those in the mob yelled their taunts at Marshal and soldier alike.

O[illegible] yelled: "Why don't you go to Cuba?" Some one else screamed the word "Nazi." And another: "Come on out and fight like a man."

Above the babble and clamor and sharp through the sheeting of tear gas smoke a young student called out: "You're treating us like

---

[fol. 1900]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 3N

A169WX (JUSTICE DECN)

(800) Mississippi—Justice

Washington, Oct. 1 (AP)—The decision to move James H. Meredith onto the University of Mississippi campus last night was made after Gov. Ross Barnett telephoned the Justice Department a message of capitulation and assurances of police protection, a Department spokesman said today.

The spokesman also said that charges of insurrection—punishable by up to 20 years in prison and a $20,000 fine—were being considered against some of those arrested in the bloody rioting on the campus.

It was understood that former army Maj. Gen. Edwin Walker was among those who might be arrested.

Jack Rosenthal, Assistant Information Officer at the Justice Department, told reporters that Barnett telephoned Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy three or four times yesterday morning and agreed:

1. That he would see that U.S. Marshals and Meredith would be admitted to the campus without opposition.

2. He would "guarantee to preserve law and order with state police or in cooperation with U.S. Marshals" against any violence which might erupt after the 29-year-old Negro arrived at the campus.

Rosenthal said that by mid-morning today about 35 persons had been arrested in connection with the violence and more were being taken into custody.

He said several thousand troops were in the area and "more are available."

"Things in the town are in control," he said.

Attorney General Kennedy was at the White House from 9:45 P.M. until early today. He spent the rest of the night at his Justice Department headquarters, receiving additional reports from Mississippi and planning the government's next move to endorce court orders that Meredith be enrolled.

The enrollment was accomplished today.

Still ahead is court disposition of the cases of Barnett and Lt. Gov. Paul Johnson, who were found in civil contempt of court for disobeying the orders that Meredith be enrolled.

A Justice Department chronology of events on the riot-torn campus yesterday was, in effect, an accusation that Barnett's public statements to Mississippi citizens were sharply at variance with those he made in private conversations with Kennedy.

The chronology, which Rosenthal said was pieced together from Department officials in Washington and at the riot scene, ran like this:

At 10:45 A.M. (EDT) Barnett, in his last morning telephone call to the Attorney General, agreed to send state police chief T. B. Birdsong to Oxford to confer with a Justice Department representative to work out specific arrangements before Meredith's entry to the campus.

A170WX

President Kennedy was advised of this plan.

Birdsong met late in the afternoon with Joseph Dolan, Assistant Deputy Attorney General.

Asked whether additional help would be needed from the Federal Government to control crowds at the University campus, Birdsong replied:

"No, we can take care of it ourselves."

Shortly after 6:30 P.M. (EDT) Birdsong and other state police escorted the first group of Marshals to the campus.

Meredith, arriving by plane at Oxford from Memphis, Tenn., was transported from the airport to the campus in a state police car along roads patrolled by Mississippi officers.

Shortly thereafter Barnett issue a statement that Meredith had been landed on the campus by helicopter.

"That's inaccurate and the Governor knew it was inaccurate when he

---

[fol. 1901]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 4-A

(HERE'S A NEW TOP ON THE RIOT STORY)

(OXFORD, MISSISSIPPI)—Rifle fire echoed in the streets of Oxford today as a Negro, James M. Meredith, ended 114 years of segregation at the University of Mississippi.

(In the midst of the shooting, troops arrested former Major General Edwin A. Walker—the man who led the troops in the 1957 Little Rock integration disturbance. Since then Walker has decided he was on the wrong side.

(Walker led students in futile charges against law lauchers in the hands of U-S Marshals during night-long rioting. Two persons were killed and 20 injured.

[fol. 1902]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 4B

APR NU '17

BULLETIN

HERE'S A BULLETIN FROM THE ASSOCIATED PRESS:

(MORE TROOPS)

(OXFORD, MISSISSIPPI)—Units of the crack 82nd and 101st Airborne Division began landing at the Oxford Airport today (Monday) to move onto the strife-torn University of Mississippi campus.

The paratroopers were in at least regimental strength. Giant air force transport planes were landing almost continuously at the airport on split second timing, under direction of an air force mobile control tower set up on the runway.

Troops from the 101st "Screaming Eagle" Division from Ft. Campbell, Ky., had their own transports. The 82nd Division from Ft. Bragg, were being loaded in 3rd Army trucks already at Oxford.

—0—

RK408PCS 10/1

Attorney General Kennedy had announced earlier HT Walker would be charged with inciting rebellion or insurrection. Conviction for that carries a penalty of 20 years imprisonment and a fine of $20,000.

SPORTS

MORE PLAYOFF RUNNING

The Dodgers failed to score again in the seventh inning as Pierce set them down in order. When the zero went up on the scoreboard, the Dodger streak of scoreless innings was extended to 28.

The only Giant activity in the seventh was a two out single by Hiller.

Units of the crack 82 and 101st Airborne Divisions have begun landing at the airport in Oxford, Mississippi. They are set to move onto the campus of the University of Mississippi.

(BARNETT CALLS FOR PEACE . . .)

Mississippi Governor Ross Barnett has called for an end to violence in the University case. He says law and order must prevail. And he urged people who traveled to the Oxford area from other states to please go home.

(MEREDITH IS ENROLLED . . .)

The important issue was settled quickly and quietly in the morning . . . Negro James Meredith was enrolled at the University of Mississippi, breaking more than 100 years of segregation at the school. He paid his $230 cash for tuition and asked about class routine. He was assigned to a campus apartment. And it was said U-S Marshals will live with him and escort him to class as long as he is in any danger.

An attorney for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People says a second Negro is in process of applying for

---

[fol. 1903]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 4C

APRNU21

HERE IS THE NIGHT OWL FINAL NEWS OF LOUISIANA AND MISSISSIPPI:

(FIVE STAR FINAL FORECAST)

Louisiana, South Mississippi: Clear to Partly Cloudy and Cool Tuesday and Wednesday. High Tuesday 72-80.

Extreme Southwest Alabama: Partly Cloudy and Cool Tuesday and Wednesday. High Tuesday 76-80.

New Orleans and Vicinity: Partly Cloudy and Cool Tuesday and Wednesday. Low tonight 64-68. High Tuesday 76-79.

(Coastal)

Port Arthur, Texas, to Pensacola, Florida; Northerly winds 10-20 knots (11-23 mph) and Partly Cloudy weather Tuesday and Wednesday.

—0—

(BRANTON)

(Baton Rouge)—State Rep. Parey Branton of Webster Parish says the Kennedys and the National Democrats will attempt to use the University of Mississippi case to encourage registration of every eligible Negro.

Branton led a delegation to Mississippi yesterday (Sunday) to offer aid to Governor Ross Barnett in his battle against integration of Ole Miss.

Branton said today that with the "Fall of Mississippi, the last vestiges of hope for the individual states is gone. Socialist federalism as advocated by Kennedy and his supporters will now run rampant," he added.

—0—

(WITH OXFORD)

(Memphis)—The Federal Aviation Agency today issued a special regulation to control air traffic at the overtaxed Oxford, Mississippi Airport.

It required all planes flying under 5,000 feet within a 10-mile radius of the airport to obtain special permission from the Traffic Control Center at Memphis Municipal Airport.

—0—

(WITH OXFORD)

(Dallas, Texas)—Police of Dallas, Texas, say a 22-year-old man transporting a small arsenal, was arrested yesterday en route to Mississippi to join former Maj. Gen. Edwin Walker.

Officers said the man had been a worker in Walker's unsuccessful campaign to become Governor of Texas.

Dallas police charged the man, Ashland Burchwell of Dallas, with carrying prohibitive weapons. The FBI charged him with interstate transportation of a switch blade knife.

Burchwell was quoted by police as saying he served under Walker in Germany and helped compile the former General's "pro-blue" program for which Walker was reprimanded by the Army.

Police seized arms and ammunition, including one 37-mangum pistol, fully loaded; one 303 Army-style rifle, fully loaded; 2,000 rounds of 30-06 ammunition; three 22-caliber pistols; and 1,000 rounds of 22-caliber ammunition.

—0—

(COURT)

(Jackson, Mississippi)—The Mississippi Supreme Court today (Monday) upheld the manslaughter conviction of Sharkey County Negro Henry Shields in the shooting of his sister-in-law.

Shields appealed his conviction and 20-year sentence in the June, 1961 death of Inez Gibson.

—0—

(CLAYTON-GUARD)

(Washington)—The Defense Department today released Brig. Gen. Claude Clayton of the Mississippi National Guard from active duty in the integration crisis so he can go back to the federal bench.

Clayton is U.S. District Judge for Northern Mississippi. He was called up with the rest of the Mississippi guardsmen when President Kennedy federalized the state guard in the integration crisis at the University of Mississippi.

—0—

(XGR)

(Atlanta)—A resolution offered in the Georgia Senate to commend Mississippi Gov. Ross Barnett for defiance of court-ordered

---

[fol. 1904]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 4D

Confederate flags—Romantic symbols of a lost cause of a century ago—were waved by laughing and cheering students, as if they were on parade.

But as time went by, the talk became louder and rougher.

Several students smashed a photographer's camera; others smashed the windows of a car. Still others turned on an Army truck and sought to set it afire.

When this took place, the strong contingent of marshals moved quickly into action. They put on their gas masks and began firing tear gas—indiscriminately, in the words of several persons who got the first strong whiff of it.

The ringleaders and their followers scattered.

Many soon regrouped, however, and followed former Maj. Gen. Edwin Walker in a charge against the marshals ringing the Administration Building.

The students, and outsiders in their ranks, hurled bricks and pop bottles at the marshals, who laid down a heavy tear gas barrage.

The charge faltered and familed. Walker then stood on the Confederate monument not far from the Administration Building and addressed his followers.

"If you can't win, go home," he declared. "Don't stay at the University. But let's not quit; we can win."

The tear gas fumes and smoke eddied about the campus. Students and outsiders and onlookers alike clasped hands or handkerchiefs to smarting eyes and nose. The smoke carried an eerie sheen against the dark night.

[fol. 1905]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 4E

AP7

FIRST FIVE MINUTE SUMMARY

Here is the latest news from the Associated Press:

All indications are that the Federal Government is gaining the upper hand in its battle to enforce court orders for admission of a Negro, James Meredith, to the University of Mississippi.

President Kennedy notes that Meredith tonight is in residence on the University campus, although not enrolled in the school. The President says this has been accomplished without the use of U-S troops. And he expresses hope troops will not have to be used.

Kennedy says federal court orders in the case are beginning to be called out. He stresses that laws of the U-S must be obyed and that includes court rulings.

The President's remarks came in a radio and T-V address to. the nation.

Governor Ross Barnett does not flatly state he's yielding in his dispute with the Federal Government. But he does say "we are now completely surrounded by Armed Forces and we are physically overpowered." He adds: "Surrounded on all sides by the Armed Forces and oppressive power of the U-S, my courage and my convictions do not waiver. My heart still says 'never,' but my calm judgment abhors the bloodshed that will flow."

The Mississippi Governor says the state will continue to fight the Meredith case and similar cases through the courts. And he says federal officials are destroying the U-S Constitution, trampling on Mississippi sovereignty and stripping the state of honor and respect.

Federal Marshals have put down two riots by students on the University of Mississippi campus. They used tear gas both times.

The second riot was led by former Major General Edwin Walker, who directed a charge of brick-throwing students against the marshals. Walker said his student force would regroup and charge again.

Meredith, under heavy guard of U-S Marshals, flew to Oxford and went by car to the University campus. School officials reported he was given an apartment on the campus but was not enrolled Sunday night because it was the Sabbath. U-S Marshals—some 288—were lined up around the University's Administration Building.

A number of U-S Senators of both parties express approval of President Kennedy's speech. And one southerner, Senator Allen Allender of Louisiana said the law must be obyed whether good or bad.

But a number of Mississippi congressman attack the speech. And Democratic Senator James Eastland of Mississippi said he disagrees entirely with the President's position.

Senate Democratic leader Mike Mansfield said, "Thank God that reason, understanding and law seem to have prevailed.

HERE IS A BULLETIN FROM NEW YORK

Some 75,000 longshoremen quit work at midnight in east and gulf coast ports from Maine to Texas. Formal announcement of the work stoppage was made by the President of the International Longshoremen's Association, Captain William Bradley.

The chief U-S delegate to the U-N, Adlai Stevenson, said the Mississippi integration case has no doubt impaired the image of the U-S overseas. On his T-V show (over ABC), Stevenson said the (Illegible)

[fol. 1906]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT NO. 4F

The federal action to register a Negro student James Meredith at the all-white University has touched off violence that even tear gas has been unable to control. Another newsmen—Bill Crider of the Associated Pres—has been wounded in the rioting. Crider says three or four other persons also have been shot. Crider reports seeing seven or eight teenagers shooting guns.

More than 1,700 troops are standing by in Memphis, Tennessee to move to the aid of the riot-battling Federal Marshals in Oxford. The Memphis Naval Air Station says they are ready to move to the University—70 miles to the south—if called for by the Justice Department.

Mississippi National Guard Headquarters said Sunday night the 108th Armored Calvary Regiment at Tupelo, Mississippi has been ordered to move immediately into Oxford where students are rioting on the University of Mississippi campus.

One of those injured in shotgun blasts fired during the rioting is a U-S Marshal. He is described as in critical condition in the University infirmary.

He was shot in the throat.

The Infirmary is situated in the campus area under siege and infirmary attendants say they are unable to get an ambulance to take the wounded man to the hospital. Efforts to summon a doctor for the marshal also were futile.

One of the riots Sunday night in Oxford was a charge of brick-throwing students led by former Major-General Edwin Walker. Walker resigned from the Army after being reprimanded for trying to influence the votes of soldiers.

Meredith—protected by a large force of Federal Marshals—had earlier been moved onto the Mississippi campus where he has been assigned a room. Indications are that he probably will be enrolled at the University Monday.

The Oxford violence erupted almost at the very moment that President Kennedy was speaking to the nation and urging the Mississippi students to maintain order. The President's nine-minute, nationwide address stressed that Americans have the right to disagree with the law—but not to break it.

The rioting Sunday night followed shortly after Mississippi Governor Ross Barnett indirectly admitted defeat in his efforts to prevent integration at the University. The Governor said state forces are surrounded and overpowered.

Longshoremen along the east coast from Maine to Texas have gone on a work stoppage. The International Longshoremen's Association says picketing will start at once at piers in the New York-New Jersey area. Leaders of the 75,000-member union say the walkout is the result of a lockout involving the lack of a union contract.

American and Continental Can Companies have signed two-year strike-free contracts with the United Steelworkers of America. The contracts provide for improvements in benefits, but no wage increase.

A tropical storm 420 miles east of Puerto Rico may cause a delay in the six-orbit flight of astronaut Walter Schirra —scheduled now for Wednesday between 8 A.M. and 10 A.M. (EDT). The surprise storm is packing winds up to 54 miles-an-hour and may cross the impact area for Schirra's third orbit. A weather bureau advisory says the disturbance is expected to become a hurricane during the next few hours.

[fol. 1907]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 4G

was heard frequently and, at one point, [four illegible words] and federalized National Guardsmen pinned down in the Administration Building.

(MEREDITH)

The shooting and throwing of bottles, bricks and stones began while President Kennedy was explaining to the nation over Radio and T-V why he took the action he did in Mississippi. Before this, Mississippi Governor Ross Barnett indirectly had conceded that the State could not cope with Federal forces to prevent enrollment of Negro James Meredith. It is indicated that Meredith will enroll today.

(TROOPS)

As the situation grew worse, Federal troops were ordered to the riot scene from a number of points. The shooting stopped abruptly around the Administration Building as 200 military policemen marched onto the campus. But later, the rioters threw rocks at the military police. The army order called for some 1,400 soldiers to move out of a staging area near Memphis and head for Oxford. Another 1,100 combat troops from Fort Benning, Georgia were ordered to by-pass Memphis and go directly to Oxford. About 500 were summoned from Fort Hood, Texas.

—DASH—

(One newsman was killed and another newsmen and several officers were wounded in the campus rioting. One

U-S Marshall was wounded critically as shooting broke out at several places on the campus. Killed was a reporter for the French Press Agency and London Daily Sketch, Paul Guihard. Associated Press newsman Bill Crider of Memphis was wounded by shotgun pellets, but not severely.

(In Washington, President Kennedy huddled with top aides through most of the early morning hours at the White House.

(In his nationwide speech last night, President Kennedy declared it to be his inescapable duty to call out troops when Mississippi defied court orders to enroll a Negro at the University. At the time, he said he hoped it would not be necessary to use troops even though conciliation and persuasion has failed. The President noted that students had been admitted—regardless of race—to universities in nine other southern states.

(Congressional reaction to Kennedy's address generally split along sectional lines. All but one of the Mississippi Congressional delegation attacked it sharply. Senators from the north and west praised Kennedy's remarks as being an expression of the public will. Somewhere in between was Louisiana Senator Allen Ellender. He said he did not like the decision of the court, but since it is the law he did not see how it could be bypassed.

(Grim-faced southern governors, who are meeting at Hollywood, Florida, reacted with a wide range of comment on the President's speech. Governor Ernest Hollings of South Carolina said the people of his State are 100 per cent in sympathy with the people of Mississippi. But Governor Terry Sanford of North Carolina called the President's speech an example of good will at its best. Virginia's Governor Albertis Harrison says the question ultimately will have to be resolved by the people of Mississippi.

(For a time, at least, the rioters were led by retired Major General Edwin Walker. The former General had said before that he did not advocate violence. Walker resigned from the army after being reprimanded for instructing his troops how to vote.

MICROCARD

TRADE MARK ®

MICROCARD EDITIONS, INC.
PUBLISHERS OF ORIGINAL AND REPRINT MATERIALS ON MICROCARDS 901 TWENTY-SIXTH STREET, N.W., WASHINGTON 7, D. C. FEDERAL 3-6393

microcard

CARD 50

(The 29-year-old Meredith had arrived at the Oxford Airport in a small border patrol plane and went to the campus in a car. He was assigned an apartment on the campus, but was told he could not enroll because it was Sunday. As word of Meredith's arrival spread, crowds suddenly appeared on the campus. Marshals standing shoulder-to-shoulder choked off entrance to the Administration Building.

(At first there was no outward sign of trouble, but it began to develop bit-by-bit and authorities soon had a full-scale riot on their hands.)

(DOCKERS)

[fol. 1908]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 4H

One newsman and a bystander were killed, and a newsman and several lawmen were wounded, before the first of more than 3,000 Federal troops began pouring onto the campus. Even then, the violence continued. Finally, the army commander ordered his troops to take whatever action necessary to end the disorder. Almost methodically the M-P's moved out with fixed bayonets. And the mob backtracked and broke, some heading for dormitories—others into adjacent woods.

The leader of the student mob, in its initial stages at least, was former army Major General Edwin Walker

---

[fol. 1909]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 4I

[first line illegible] of the savage riots that killed two persons and injured at least 20 others.

—DASH—

(The violence that exploded even as President Kennedy was appealing for peace and observance of the law went on for nine hours. A French newsman and a local Oxford, Mississippi, bystander were killed—the newsman by a bullet in the back. At least one Federal Marshal was critically wounded. Tear gas spread over the campus. Seven cars were burned. An estimated one thousand regular army troops now patrol the 640-acre campus.)

(ARRESTS)

Military Police arrested 93 persons in the rioting. They could get up to 20 years in prison and fines of $20,000.

(MEREDITH)

29-year-old Negro student James Meredith is slated for another attempt today to register for classes at the University. And this time, there seems no doubt that whatever Federal power is needed to get him enrolled will be used.

—DASH—

(It was Meredith's arrival last night on the campus that sparked the wild rioting. The Negro student spent the night in a student apartment on the campus.)

(Students at Ole Miss say this morning that the riots were caused mostly by outsiders. One such outsider was former Major General Edwin Walker, who was on hand to lead the charge against Federal Marshals at the University's Administration Building.

(The rioting started not long after Governor Barnett appealed for an avoidance of violence. He said: "We are surrounded." The violence exploded during President Kennedy's nationwide broadcast in which he said—"Americans are free to disagree with the law but not to disobey it." In calling out the troops, the President said—"My responsibility as President was inescapable. All other avenues and alternatives had been tried and exhausted.")

(STRIKE)

Here is a bulletin from Washington

President Kennedy has invoked the Taft-Hartley Law in an attempt to end the dock strike on the east and gulf coasts. The White House says Kennedy will name a Board to report to him by Thursday on the walkout. This is the first step in machinery that could bring an 80-day cooling off period.

—DASH—

(The strike of some 75,000 members of the International Longshoremen's Union isn't expected to produce hardship for the general public right away.

(It might, however, affect dockside operations of passenger liners arriving in this country, including the unloading of baggage. The strike came at the expiration of the I-L-A's contract with 145 shipping firms. And I-L-A President William Bradley says—"No work until a favorable contract is signed.")

(News directors: Sub following for third intro item, strike):

President Kennedy has invoked the Taft-Hartley Law in the east and gulf coast dock strike and this could bring an 80-day cooling off period.

(CUBA)

New York Senator Jacob Javits has called on President Kennedy to make a broadcast report to the nation on the Cuban situation, and to ask for an emergency meeting of the Organization of American States. The New York Republican says the President should recognize the urgency of what Javits terms the Cuban crisis.

—DASH—

(Javits says that as he sees it, the heart of the Cuban problem

[fol. 1910]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 4J

(LOUISIANA)

In Louisiana, there have been showers this morning (Monday), mainly in the south portion of the State, and there is considerable cloudiness over most of the State. Mild temperatures prevail, and indications are that temperatures will be below normal most of the week, but noon temperatures today climbed into the 80's. Lake Charles had 83 at noon, Alexandria 81; Lake Charles 83; Baton Rouge and Monroe 77; Shreveport 76, and New Orleans 71.

—O—

(SENATOR STENNIS)

(Washington)—U-S Senator John Stennis of Mississippi has called on the Justice Department to withdraw James H. Meredith from the University of Mississippi.

Stennis said the Negro should be withdrawn permanently to prevent further bloodshed and to make it possible for classes to continue.

—O—

(DEMOS)

(Baton Rouge)—Representative Parey Branton of Webster Parish says he feels use of Federal troops at Oxford, Mississippi, would set off a southwide revolt against the national Democratic party in 1964.

Branton, who supported the unsuccessful states' rights presidential slate in Louisiana last time, led a delegation of several Louisiana legislators who had called on Mississippi Governor Ross Barnett yesterday (Sunday).

—O—

(LIVESTOCK)

(Memphis)—Hogs: U. S. 1 and 2 190-240 lb Barrows and Gilts 17.85-18.10. Good and choice 60-140 lb Feeder Pigs 12.00-15.00.

Monday's Cattle Market: Good and low choice 980-1,070 lb Slaughter Steers 26.50-28.00. Utility and Standard Slaughter Heifers 600-800 lb 17.00-21.00; Good and choice 250-500 lb Steer calves 23.00-30.00.

—0—

(WATER PROJECTS)

(Washington)—The House Public Works Committee has approved an Omnibus Bill to authorize 167 flood control, navigation and beach erosion projects throughout the nation.

—0—

(HERE'S A NEW TOP ON THE RIOT STORY)

(Oxford, Mississippi)—Rifle fire echoed in the streets of Oxford today as a Negro, James H. Meredith, ended 114 years of segregation at the University of Mississippi.

(In the midst of the shooting, troops arrested former Major General Edwin A. Walker—the man who led the troops in the 1957 Little Rock integration disturbance. Since then Walker has decided he was on the wrong side.

(Walker led students in futile charges against gas launchers in the hands of U-S Marshals during night-long rioting. Two persons were killed and 20 injured.

—0—

EV (Little Rock, Arkansas)—U-S Senator J. William Fulbright in a news conference today termed events in Mississippi "very tragic and unfortunate."

Fulbright, Arkansas Democrat, said he felt that the most "original and serious mistake the U. S. Supreme Court" had made was "usurping the legislature."

The Senator, who has a Republican opponent in the November 6th general election, said, "I still feel that this (desegregation question) would have been worked out with less trouble and less violence if let to the legislature—that is, the Congress—to deal with," he added.

Fulbright said that several years before the 1954 decision of the U.S. Supreme Court, "Officials of Arkansas solved the question at the University of Arkansas without violence" by admitting a Negro.

TS140PCS 1

[fol. 1911]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT NO. 4K

AP173

WALKER (NEW TOP)

(Oxford, Mississippi)—Former Major General Edwin Walker has waived preliminary hearing in Oxford, Mississippi, on a charge of attempting to impede justice. Bon was set at $100,000, and Walker had not posted it by mid-afternoon.

Walker's arrest came about noon at a military roadblock on the outskirts of stife-torn Oxford.

At one time during the day he marched at the vanguard of file of soldiers as though he were their inspecting officer. He refused to move after an officer ordered him to do so, then finally did move when soldiers held their bayonets within inches of his body.

In addition to attempting to impede justice charges against him include conspiracy to incite a rebellion or insurrection and assaulting a federal officer. The former general led students in an assault on Federal Marshals on the University of Mississippi campus lat night and showed up today during rioting in the Town of Oxford.

Walker resigned from the Army last year after being reprimanded for attempting to influence votes of his troops in Germany. He commanded troops in the integration troubles in Little Rock, Arkansas, in 1957.

RE5PED 1

[fol. 1912]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 4L

AP193

TH FIVE-MINUTE SUMMARY

(BRACKETED LINES OPTIONAL)

Here is the latest news from the Associated Press:

(First, the Mississippi Story . . .)

Federal troops—now being reinforced by crack paratroopers—have been rounding up trouble-makers to prevent another clash over the enrollment of a Negro in the University of Mississippi. Tempers turned to violence for the second time today, leading Governor Ross Barnett to plea for law and order. And there is word a second Negro—a girl—is preparing to apply for admission to the school.

Among those arrested was former Army Major General Edwin Walker—the commander of federal troops in Little Rock in 1957—who tried to command forces of the other side during a wild charge on U-S Marshals last night. Walker, wearing a ten-gallon hat, showed up again at the scene of disorders today. He waived a preliminary hearing on a charge of attempting to obstruct justice. If convicted, he could receive five years in prison and a $5,000 fine.

Units of the 82nd and 101st Airborne divisions have begun landing at the airport in Oxford, Mississippi, to move onto the campus. They will back up hundreds of troops and guardsmen already in the town. National guardsmen from Mississippi today fired shots into the air, hurled tear gas and advanced with fixed bayonets to break up an angry mob—many of them fellow Mississippians—on downtown streets. Some 150 persons were arrested.

The rioting flared only moments after the federal government achieved what it had sought to do all along—register Negro James Meredith in the University. Meredith's presence on the campus touched off eleven hours of rioting earlier that left two persons dead.

(MORE)

LU657PED 1

~~AP195~~

MORE AP193 (14TH 5 MIN SMRY) X X X DEAD.

There is word in New Orleans that a Negro girl's application for admission to the University of Mississippi is being processed. The report comes from a lawyer for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Jack Greenberg. He says the unidentified girl is having no trouble so far.

The N-A-A-C-P has sent a telegram to President Kennedy, applauding him for what it terms the "firm action" of the federal government in the Meredith case.

(KENNEDY STEPS INTO A LABOR DISPUTE . . .)

President Kennedy has invoked the Taft-Hartley law in an attempt to seek an early halt to a strike by 75,000 longshoremen at ports from Maine to Texas. An official of the AFL-CIO longshoremen's union says seven other maritime unions have agreed to respect picket lines and walk off all American ships docking in struck ports. The strike affects 145 shipping firms.

(AN UNCONGENIAL COUPLE: A SPACEMAN AND A STORM NAMED DAISY . . .)

Weathermen say tropical storm "Daisy"—considered the main threat of the space flight by Walter Schirra Junior—has weakened. If all goes well, the Astronaut will make his six-orbit flight on Wednesday. The storm has been regarded as a threat because it would affect the Atlantic recovery area to be used if the flight is cut short at the end of three orbits.

(DAISY'S LOCATION . . .)

Reconnaissance airplanes have been keeping a watchful eye on

[fol. 1913]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 4M

AP198

(400)

MISSISSIPPI (NEW TOP)

(Oxord, Mississippi)—The U-S Government flew crack army combat troops into Oxford, Mississippi, today—apparently to show it means business and will tolerate no further outbreaks of violence.

Units of the 82nd and 101st Airborne Divisions from Fort Campbell, Kentucky and Fort Bragg, North Carolina, being landed at the Oxford Airport to move onto the riot-torn University of Mississippi campus. The paratroopers began arriving in at least regimental strength aboard giant Air Force transport planes.

Reinforcement of the Government's position came as federal troops stood occupation duty in downtown Oxford and on the campus proper, after putting down a night-long battle precipitated by the quartering of Negro student James Meredith on the Ole Miss campus.

Former Army Major General Edwin Walker was among some 150 persons arrested as federal officers rounded up troublemakers in an effort to maintain the peace.

The federal force sealed off the main courthouse square in downtown Oxford. Army troops secured the University campus where a French news agency reporter and an Oxford man were shot to death last night.

Jeering, shouting students appeared again as Meredith emerged from his campus apartment this morning, but they were driven off by Federal Marshals.

Former General Walker was arrested for leading a charge of students against the Marshals last night.

He waived preliminary hearing before a U-S Commissioner on a charge of attempting to obstruct justice. Bond was set at $100,000 and the controversial Texan had not posted it by mid-afternoon.

[fol. 1914]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 4N

AP204

BULLETIN'

Here is a Bulletin from the Associated Press:

(Oxford, Mississippi)—The Government is sending former Major General Edwin Walker from Oxford, Mississippi, to a U-S Medical Center in Missouri. Walker was arrested after leading a charge of students against U-S Marshals at the University of Mississippi.

G756PED 1

[fol. 1915]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 4O

(WALKER)

The government decided late today to send former Major General Edwin Walker, who led a charge of students against Federal Marshals last night on the University campus, to a hospital instead of to jail. Walker failed to post $100,000 bail at his arraignment today. But instead of sending him to some Federal House of Detention, the Justice Department flew him off to the U-S Medical Center in Springfield, Missouri.

—DASH—

(Democratic Senator Wayne Morse of Oregon had said earlier in Congress that Walker appeared to be a sick man and added, if this is so, "he ought to be committed."

(Walker, as a Major General, commanded federal troops sent into Little Rock, Arkansas, in 1957 to enforce court-ordered public school integration. He resigned from the Army after being reprimanded for trying to give troops in Germany political indoctrination.

(Attorney General Robert Kennedy said earlier today that Walker would be charged with inciting to insurrection, a serious charge carrying penalties up to 20 years in prison and $20,000 fine. However, in Oxford, he had been arranged only on a charge of attempting to obstruct justice—a lesser charge—before the decision was made to send him to a hospital.

(He was arrested today at a roadblock outside strife-torn Oxford. Earlier, at one point, he had marched in front of troops as if he were their Inspector General and agreed to leave only [illegible words] a bayonet point.)

(ROUNDUP)

Some 200 have been arrested so far in the clash over integration of the University of Mississippi—described as the most serious federal-state conflict since the Civil War. He are some of the other developments in the many-sided situation:

Mississippi Governor Ross Barnett, in a broadcast this afternoon, called for an end to violence. He said law and order must prevail "even though our state has been invaded by federal forces."

In New Orleans, it's announced a second Negro—a girl this time—is applying for admission to the University of Mississippi. The word is from Jack Greenberg, Attorney for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Democratic Senator James Eastland of Mississippi said the Justice Department and U-S Marshals provoked the campus riot. Eastland, who heads the Senate Judiciary Committee, said the committee and the entire Mississippi Congressional Delegation have been invited to Oxford to investigate.

(BLAME)

Attorney General Robert Kennedy issued a statement clearly indicating that the outbreak of violence should be attributed to failure of Governor Barnett and other state officials to maintain promised police details. President Kennedy, as well as his brother, the Attorney General, are reported to feel that Barnett did not carry out a promise to provide police protection for Meredith.

—DASH—

(In the center of the storm, the 29-year-old Air Force Veteran, James Meredith, appeared outwardly calm. He paid his $230 cash for tution and asked about class routine. He was assigned to a two-room apartment with a kitchenette in a residence hall. Meredith's subjects will include history, political science and English.

(A Justice Department spokesman said marshals will live with Meredith and escort him to class "as long as he is in any danger."

(As Meredith left the registrar's office smiling, he said to reporters he is in the University for purely academic reasons. He said he would not participate in extra-curricular activities.

(Newsmen asked if he was happy that the long struggle had met with success. He replied, "No. This is not a happy occasion."

(Hundreds of jeering students followed him to his first class.)

[fol. 1916]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 4P

H207

WITH WALKER

(Springfield, Missouri)—The hospital to which Major General Edwin Walker is being flown from Oxford, Mississippi—the U-S Medical Center at Springfield, Missouri—has facilities for complete psychiatric care of prisoners.

HB842PED 1

AP208

EASTLAND (NEW TOP)

(Washington)—Mississippi Democratic U-S Senator James Eastland has directed the Senate Judiciary Committee to make a complete investigation of all events at the University of Mississippi since U-S Marshals and army troops moved in. Eastland had said earlier that the committee—of which he is chairman—had been invited to make such an investigation.

HB844PED 1

[fol. 1917]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 4Q

AP214

FIFTEENTH FIVE-MINUTE SUMMARY

(BRACKETED LINES OPTIONAL)

Here is the latest news from the Associated Press:

(FIRST, THE SITUATION AT OXFORD . . .)

Oxford, Mississippi, was quiet late today as several thousand more U-S troops moved into the city by truck and plane to maintain order.

This morning soldiers fired into the air and used tear gas to break the riots in the downtown area.

There were no disturbances at the University of Mississippi campus as Negro James Meredith registered and went to class at the formerly all-white school. He was guarded by Federal Marshals.

There have been these other developments in the wake of last night's bloody disorders in Oxford. . . .

In Washington—The Justice Department issued a statement saying violence broke out on the campus because Governor Ross Barnett and other Mississippi officials did not keep their promise to provide the police details needed to keep order.

In Jackson, Mississippi—Barnett took issue with the Justice Department. He blamed the violence on what he called "inexperienced, nervous and trigger-happy" Federal Marshals.

In Oxford—Former Major General Edwin Walker was arrested by U-S troops and removed to the Federal Medical Center in Springfield, Missouri. Charges against him included insurrection against the government for his part in leading an attack on Marshals last night. But instead of jailing him when he failed to post $100,000 bail, the Justice Department sent him to the Missouri Hospital, which has facilities for mental care.

In New Orleans—The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People said a Negro girl is in the process of applying for admission to the University of Mississippi.

In Washington—Mississippi Senator James Eastland said his Judiciary Committee will make a complete investigation of the events in Oxford.

(VOTES IN THE SENATE . . .)

An attempt was made in the Senate today to slash nearly 800 (M) million dollars from the Foreig d Bill, but it was defeated. The Senate also voted to permit President Kennedy to continue aid to Communist Yugoslavia and Poland if he wishes.

[fol. 1918]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 4R

SPLIT

REST RED 940APED 1

AP220

WALKER (NEW TOP)

(Springfield, Missouri)—A plane carrying former Major General Edwin Walker has landed at Springfield, Missouri. Walker was taken at once to the U-S Medical Center for federal prisoners, which has facilities for psychiatric care. Walker was arrested in Oxford, Mississippi, earlier on charges including insurrection against the United States, for his part in rioting at the University of Mississippi.

The Medical Center is maintained by the Federal Bureau of Prisons to treat prisoners with either physical or mental ills. Federal judges often send accused persons to the center for psychiatric study to determine whether they are sane enough to stand trial.

JP942PED 1

[fol. 1919]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 4S

AP235

SIXTEENTH FIVE-MINUTE SUMMARY

Here is the latest news from the Associated Press:

Thousands of battle-ready troops have been poured into Oxford, Mississippi, following the dramatic ending of more than a century of segregation at the state university. The concentration of troops is taken as a sign of Washington's determination to prevent any more of the rioting that took two lives last night on the university campus.

Quiet has settled over the University of Mississippi after a day which saw a Negro, 29-year-old James Meredith, attending classes, accompanied by Federal marshals. Jeering students followed Meredith, but there were no incidents.

In the town of Oxford, however, a demonstration against U-S troops was quelled by tear gas and rifles fired over the heads of the crowd.

Former Major General Edwin Walker, who last night led a charge of students against Federal marshals, was arrested today on four counts, including insurrection against the United States. He failed to post $100,000 bond and was flown to the Federal Medical Center at Springfield, Missouri. The center has facilities for psychiatric care, and judges often ask it to determine if prisoners are sane enough to stand trial.

Soldiers arrested 33 persons in Oxford tonight—most of them youths caught at campus roadblocks. This brought the total arrested since the rioting began to 214. Most of them have been released. Charges of conspiracy to obstruct justice and to interfere by force with performance of a court are being prepared against 25.

At the State capital in Jackson, Governor Ross Barnett blamed the disorders of the last 24 hours on the Marshals. He said they were—in his words—"inexperienced, nervous and trigger-happy." In remarks prepared for a broadcast statement tonight, he said Marshals fired tear gas point blank at Highway Patrolmen who were successfully moving back a crowd of students.

President Kennedy and his brother, Attorney General Robert Kennedy, are reported to feel that Governor Barnett let them down by not keeping a promise to provide police protection for Meredith. The Attorney General put out a statement blaming the violence on failure of Barnett and other Mississippi officials to maintain promised police details.

Democratic Senator James Eastland of Mississippi has directed the Senate Judiciary Committee to investigate the situation at the university. Eastland is Committee Chairman. He and other Mississippi members of Congress claim the Justice Department and Marshals were responsible for the mob violence.

The Senate has rejected attempts to cut President Kennedy's Four (B) Billion, 422 (M) Million Dollar Foreign Aid Money bill. It put

---

[fol. 1920]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 5A

Louisiana: Clear to partly cloudy today, tonight and Wednesday, highest today 78 to 84, cooler southeast portion tonight, lowest tonight 54 to 64.

South Half of Mississippi: A few showers mainly near the coast today, otherwise clear to partly cloudy through Wednesday, highest today 78 to 84, somewhat cooler tonight with lowest 54 to 64.

New Orleans and vicinity: Clear to partly cloudy today, tonight and Wednesday, cooler tonight, northerly winds 8 to 16 miles per hour, highest temperature today 80 to 84, lowest tonight 60 to 64. The temperature in downtown New Orleans at 4 A-M was 73 degrees, relative humidity 90 per cent and winds 2 miles per hour from the north.

—0—

(WITH OLE MISS-RIOTERS)

(Oxford, Mississippi)—A Federal Commissioner at Oxford, Mississippi has set bonds ranging up to $25,000 for 12 persons arrested in connection with Sunday night rioting at the University of Mississippi.

The Commissioner last (Monday) night ordered the 12 bound over to the Federal Grand Jury on charges ranging from resisting Marshals to insurrection. None of the 12 are Ole Miss students.

Commissioner O. D. Craig, in a special preliminary hearing in the Ole Miss Lyceum Building where Federal forces have set up headquarters, set the highest bond at $25,000 for Melvin Bruce of Decatur, Georgia. Officers said Bruce was arrested on the campus with a rifle in his possession.

—DASH—

(Bruce told Federal Marshals he went to the Ole Miss campus to "help Gen. Walker."

(Former Major General Edwin Walker was arraigned earlier before Craig, held under a $100,000 bond, and then whisked to a medical center for federal prisoners at Springfield, Missouri.

(Held on $5,000 bonds were Joseph E. Cutrer of Kentwood, Louisiana, Frank L. Ott, also of Kentwood; Philip L. Myles of Prichard, Alabama; Clyde May, also of Prichard; and R. H. Hinton of Lucedale, Mississippi.

(Craig set $2,500 bonds for William Gilbert Marr Junior of Memphis; Robert W. Blackard of Olive Branch, Mississippi; William David Marlow the 4th of Ruleville, Mississippi; Edward L. Shade Senior of Picayune, Mississippi; Johnny McCormick, of Grenada, Mississippi; and David Richards of Canton, Mississippi.

(They all face the same charges lodged against Walker: (1) assaulting, resisting, or impeding U-S Marshals. (2) conspiring to prevent discharge of duties; (3) inciting, assisting and engaging in insurrection against the authority of the United States; and (4), conspiring to oppose the execution by force of any law of the United States.)

—O—

(NIGHT CLUBS)

(New Orleans)—A special New Orleans City Committee says one of its first projects will be an investigation of vice in nightclubs.

The special Mayor's Committee met for the first time yesterday (Monday). Then it said it planned a probe of b-drinking, lewd dancing and other offenses in New Orleans nightclubs.

—O—

(WITH OLE MISS-LINDSEY)

(Memphis)—One of the troops on duty in Mississippi is a Medal of Honor winner from Waynesboro, Mississippi. He is Staff Sgt. Jake Lindsey.

He is one of the medal winners mentioned Sunday night by President Kennedy in his television speech.

Lindsey arrived at the Memphis Naval Air Station from Ft. Campbell, Kentucky, yesterday (Monday) and was sent to Oxford a short time later. He is with the 101st Airborne Dvision.

UT44OACS 2

[fol. 1921]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 5B

Coolest spot in the state was Greenwood, which recorded a low of 55. Other minimum readings included: Jackson 58, Tupelo 60, McComb 63, Meridian 68, and Biloxi 69.

Biloxi had the highest reading during the past 24 hours with an 81. Jackson and Meridian were a shade behind at 80, McComb had a 79, Greenwood 78 and Tupelo 72.

—0—

Here's the University of Mississippi desegregation case in a capsule:

Armed federal troops are keeping vigil over an uneasy truce in Oxford, the college hamlet turned into a battleground as a Negro entered the University of Mississippi.

—0—

James H. Meredith, the grandson of a Negro slave, spent the first night as a University of Mississippi student under heavy security guard.

—0—

Mississippi Gov. Ross Barnett is near the deadline to purge himself of contempt of federal court citation.

—0—

Former Major General Edwin A. Walker, Commandant of troops during the Little Rock school integration fight, has been committed to Missouri Prison Center for psychiatric examination.

—0—

Mississippi Senator James Eastland has called for a probe in the segregation fight at Ole Miss. Eastland blames the Kennedy administration for the bloody dispute.

—0—

(New York)—An attorney for the Reverend Martin Luther King is calling for a nationwide economic boycott of the State of Mississippi.

William M. Kunstler—an associate law professor at New York University and Special Legal Counsel for King—said that—in addition—Mississippi should be subject to—as he put it—social ostracism and outspoken criticism for its handling of the James H. Meredith case.

—0—

(WITH MEREDITH)

(New Orleans)—An attorney for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People says the application of a Negro girl for admission to the University of Mississippi is apparently being processed.

Jack Greenberg, Chief Counsel for the NAACP, would not identify the girl when he made the announcement yesterday.

Greenberg said—in these words—"She is getting communications from the book store and the dress shop and they know she is a Negro."

—0—

(HOUSTON-MISS)

(Oxford, Mississippi)—The University of Houston—not the helmeted soldiers who keep a cautious vigil over the campus—was the big question on Mississippi football coach John Vaught's mind today.

Vaught's charges, ranked seventh in this week's Associated Press poll, meet Houston at the University field Saturday.

Or at least the rebels are scheduled to play Houston. There's been some concern the game may be cancelled because of the riots surrounding the admittance of a Negro to Ole Miss.

Vaught, however, said his team was working hard in practice sessions for the Houston game and the one-time Texas Christian All America lineman added—in these words:

"There is nothing I have discovered to change our plans about playing Houston here Saturday."

—0—

UT/TS740ACS 2

[fol. 1922]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 5C

APRNU5

More special Sunday service of the Associated Press for Louisiana and Mississippi:

5 (REACTION)

(Jackson, Mississippi)—Some Mississippi lawmakers are disappointed and concerned about President Kennedy's action federalizing Mississippi National Guard units.

Senator Slavous Lambert of Belmont said he doubted such troops would be used to force the entrance of Negro James H. Meredith into the University of Mississippi.

Senator Frank Barber of Hattiesburg said "I am much disturbed, disappointed and disheartened."

Senator Billy Mitts of Enterprise—who retired as a National Guard officer September 1452—said the federalization of Mississippi National Guard units for possible use in their own state puts these men in a "very, very difficult position."

Senator Campbell of Jackson said "While the Kennedy administration is pitting brother against brother in a sovereign state and acting as an errand boy for the NAACP, the administration has done nothing toward enforcing the requirement that all Communists must register."

—O—

(VOLUNTEERS)

(Jackson, Mississippi)—Besieged with offers of volunteers to help his fight to retain segregation at the University of Mississippi, Governor Ross Barnett has apparently decided against inviting any large number of out-of-staters.

But former Major General Edwin A. Walker, in Mississippi to lead "A national protest to the conspiracy within," says "tens of thousands from Florida to California will come to support Governor Barnett."

Segregationist groups throughout the South have offered volunteers to Barnett. Barnett aides were reported turning down such offers.

Louisiana segregation leader Willie Rainach, who offered 10,000 Louisianans to Barnett, said yesterday (Saturday) that the Governor and other state officials opposed inviting them.

—DASH—

(Speaking to several thousand persons in a rally at Shreveport, Louisiana, Rainach said Mississippi authorities did not want "large groups of undisciplined people at Oxford interfering with their preconceived plan to deal with James Meredith and the federal authorities."

(Rainach, who conferred earlier in the day with Barnett at Jackson, said he offered the volunteers but Barnett "didn't say for them to come."

(Rainach added: "Then again he didn't say for them not to come."

Gen. Walker, who said he was in Jackson "to stand with Governor Barnett shoulder to shoulder," admitted he had "not talked with Gov. Barnett personally."

(Walker's call for volunteers was denounced in Dallas, Texas by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

(Clarence Laws, NAACP Southwest regional secretary, said it was "Irresponsible and dangerous and could lead to dreadful consequences."

(Offers of volunteers to back Barnett have come from citizens councils, the National States Rights Party, units of the Ku Klux Klan and individuals sheriffs and other citizens.

(Fred Hockett of Miami, Executive Secretary of the Florida White Citizens Council, said he had pledged from 1,500 men to move with arms into Mississippi.

(In St. Petersburg, Florida, the national organizer of the National States Rights Party offered Barnett "Any help he needs, whether it is armed or unarmed."

(The Rev. Oren F. Potito, a minister of the Church of Jesus Christ, Christian, said all Barnett has to do is ask and party leaders in 30 states will be contacted.

In Selma, Ala., Sheriff James Clark of Dallas County said he and Sheriff Hugh Champion of neighboring Chilton County were ready to go to Mississippi with posses of up to 500 men to aid in "preserving the public order and in traffic control."

(Clark said the men were prepared to move by car on a few hours notice.

(A group of more than 50 Montgomery, Alabama men planned to leave

[fol. 1923] RADIO-TV BUSINESS

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 5D

APRNU6

Cotton futures opened 15 cents a bale higher to 35 cents lower.

	Prev Close	Open
Oct	33.05N	33.08N
Dec	33. B	33.65B
Mar	34.18B	34.18B
May	34.32B	34.29B
Jul	33.13B	33.10B
Oct	30.94B	30.87B
Dec	31.00B	30.97B
Mar	31.19B	31.22B

N-Nominal; B-Bid.

UM

—0—

(WITH MEREDITH-WALKER)

(New Orleans)—The U-S Attorney's Office in New Orleans says conviction on all the counts against former Major General Edwin A. Walker could result in a total of 37 years imprisonment and more than 35-thousand dollars in fines. Walker led one of the charges of students against Federal Marshals during rioting at the University of Mississippi Sunday night.

—0—

GA JA FW

[fol. 1924]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 5E

A146KX

MEREDITH (190)

Austin, Tex., Oct. 2 (AP)—About 150 University of Texas students paused en route to classes today for three-minutes of silence because of Mississippi integration troubles.

Student Association President Marion Sanford Jr. called for the action to "demonstrate our sadness that this should have to come to pass and to further show our support of the authority of the Constitution."

The University has 20,000 students.

The student assembly sent telegrams yesterday to James Meredith and to the student assembly at Ole Miss favoring integration.

The University of Texas student newspaper, the Daily Texan, said today in a news story that "student opinion is sharply divided on the question of whether the student assembly was right "in sending the telegrams.

A daily Texan editorial today said Mississippi State officials "Must take the blame for the legal resistance to federal court orders. The students—aided and abetted by former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker—are responsible for most of the violence. But the entire state—with its anachronistic values and traditions—must share the blame for the mental and sociological degeneracy which has characterized the Mississippi reaction."

VX/GC747PCS

[fol. 1925]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 5F

Former Major General Edwin Walker—in custody of U-S authorities—has been taken to the U-S Medical Center for federal prisoners in Springfield, Missouri. Accused persons are often sent there for psychiatric examination to determine if they're sane enough to stand trial.

Walker was arrested for his part in riots in Oxford, Mississippi, Sunday night. There are several charges against him, including insurrection against the U-S.

He was unable to raise the $100,000 bond, but the warden at Springfield says Walker told him it will be raised.

EXHIBIT NO. 5g:

Former Major General Edwin Walker has been flown from Oxford to the federal medical center in Springfield, Missouri. The controversial Texan led a charge of students against marshals at the University Sunday night. Accused persons are often sent to the center for psychiatric study to determine whether they are sane enough to stand trial.

EXHIBIT NO. 5h:

Former Major General Edwin Walker—charged with insurrection against the United States for his part in the Oxford rioting—was taken Monday night to the U-S Medical Center for federal prisoners in Springfield, Missouri. The center is maintained to treat prisoners either with physical or mental ills. Walker says he expects friends to raise the $100,000 bond set for his release from U-S custody.

EXHIBIT NO. 5i:

Former Major General Edwin Walker was arraigned earlier before Craig, held under a $100,000 bond, and then whisked to a medical center for federal prisoners at Springfield, Missouri, late in the day.

EXHIBIT NO. 5j:

(In the meantime, a war hero—former Major General Edwin Walker has been held under $100,000, charged with insurrection against the United States. The 53-year-old Texan led one student charge Sunday night against Federal Marshals at the University and, later, appeared in the midst of rioting in downtown Oxford. He was confined last night in the U-S Medical Center for federal prisoners at Springfield, Missouri—a center maintained for the treatment of prisoners with either physical or mental ills.

[fol. 1926]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 6-A

AiiAX (AMS IN) (250)

Oxford, Miss., Oct. 2 (AP)—U.S. Commissioner Omar D. Craig ordered 12 persons arrested in rioting at the University of Mississippi bound over to the federal grand jury late last night.

Charges ranged from resisting marshals to insurrection.

Craig, in a special preliminary hearing in the Ole Miss Lyceum Building, where federal forces have set up headquarters, set a $25,000 bond for Melvin Bruce of Decatur, Ga., who federal officers said was arrested on the campus with a rifle in his possession.

Bruce, not a student, told the marshals he came to the campus from Georgia to "help Gen. Walker."

Former Maj. Gen. Edwin Walker was arraigned earlier before Craig, held under a $100,000 bond, and then whisked to a medical center for federal prisoners at Springfield, Mo., late in the day.

[fol. 1927]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 6B

A17WX

(470) PMS BUDGET

PERSONALITY IN THE NEWS; WALKER

BY HARRY KELLY

Washington, Oct. 2 (AP)—Five years ago Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, a tough spit and polish soldier, told students at Little Rock, Ark., that the Supreme Court's school integration decision was "binding on all citizens."

"If it were otherwise," he said, "we would not be a strong nation but a mere unruly mob."

At the time Walker commanded troops enforcing desegregation of Little Rock schools.

Sunday night, the tall ex-General who led troops in combat in Europe and Korea led a mob of students in a charge on U. S. Marshals trying to enforce desegregation of the University of Mississippi.

A sergeant who served under Walker in Germany once said of him: "He could develop more esprit d' corps in one month than other officers I've served under could in a career."

He used this talent during the violence of Sunday, leaping upon a Confederate Memorial and shouting to the milling students:

"If you can't win, go home. Don't stay at the University. But let's not quit; we can win."

But tear gas broke the charge. The skirmish was lost.

And today the 53-year-old Texan was in a U. S. Medical Center at Springfield, Mo., where federal prisoners are treated and examined for physical or mental ills.

He is charged with conspiracy to incite rebellion or insurrection.

What brought the change from the man at Little Rock to the one at Oxford, Miss.? Says Walker: "I was on the wrong side . . . this time I am on the right side."

[fol. 1928]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 6C

A24NU

PMS BJT (900)

MEREDITH ROUNDUP

Oxford, Miss., Oct. 2 (AP)—A swelling tide of federal troops, bayonets fixed and rifles ready, enforced a grim, uneasy truce today at the University of Mississippi.

Under tightest security guard, James H. Meredith spent his first night on the campus as a forcibly enrolled student. Floodlights played on Baxter Hall where the 29-year-old Negro had a two-room apartment with a kitchenette.

In New Orleans, Mississippi Gov. Ross Barnett had a date in federal court (at 11 A.M., CST) on a contempt citation, harvested from his vain effort to thwart Meredith's entrance as the 114-year-old University's first knowingly admitted Negro student.

"I call on the President to put a stop to further violence by immediate removal of Meredith and the withdrawal of federal troops and marshals from Mississippi soil," the 64-year-old Governor said in a speech telecast across the nation last night.

Barnett blamed federal intervention for the weekend segregation riots and the deaths of a French newsman and an Oxford repairman.

Washington's rebuttal was a mounting building of nearly 12,000 soldiers including the crack 101st Airborne, the paratroop outfit that quelled the 1957 school integration violence at Little Rock.

Troops streamed into Oxford, outnumbering the college hamlet's citizenry 2-1 in the most naked display of federal might since the end of the Civil War nearly a century ago. The armed troops arrested more than 200 persons since Sunday night. About one-third of them students. Most of them went free, but more than a dozen stayed in custody to face various charges, including former Maj. Gen. Edwin Walker.

The military's mission was to protect the slightly-built, 29-year-old Meredith's court-ordered status as a student at the University, and to forestall further rioting on campus or in Oxford.

[fol. 1929]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 6D

Jeeps rattled through inky blackness on inspection of armed footsoldiers who dug foxholes beneath a softly falling rain. The campus was sealed off, to anyone the federal government wished barred. So was the town square of Oxford, where short-lived skirmishes occurred yesterday between civilians and helmeted troops.

A25NU

There was no indication whether Barnett would meet an 11 A.M. (CST) deadline set by the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans. He was given until that hour to purge himself of contempt, incurred last week when he personally blocked initial federal efforts to register Meredith at the University of Mississippi.

Barnett faces a $10,000 a day fine and imprisonment if the contempt sentence was carried through. Mississippi Lt. Gov. Paul M. Johnson faces a $5,000 a day fine for his defiance.

The highlight of yesterday's kaleidoscopic segregation drama was the arrest of Walker, the spit-and-polish former army general who led the 101st Airborne at Central High School during the Little Rock segregation crisis.

Walker, 53, resigned from the army after a dispute over his indoctrination program for overseas American troops. He came here from his home in Dallas, Tex., after urging the massing of tens of thousands of volunteers to resist Meredith's registration.

On Sunday, Walker rallied rioting students on the Mississippi campus. He was arrested yesterday after he shouted encouragement to rioters who hurled bottles and bricks at federal troops in Oxford's Central Square.

Walker failed to make $100,000 bond on charges that included engaging in insurrection against the American flag he once served. Maximum penalty upon conviction would be 20 years in prison and a $20,000 fine.

[fol. 1930]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT NO. 6E

A31NU

MEREDITH AT A GLANCE

BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Armed federal troops keep vigil over uneasy truce in Oxford. The college hamlet turned into a battleground as a Negro enters the University of Mississippi.

—0—

James H. Meredith, grandson of a Negro slave, spends first night as a University of Mississippi student under heavy security guard.

—O—

Mississippi Gov. Ross Barnett nears deadline to purge himself of contempt of federal court citation.

—O—

Former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, commandant of troops during the Little Rock School integration fight, committed to Missouri Prison Center for Psychiatric Examination.

—O—

Mississippi Sen. James Eastland calls for probe in segregation fight at Ole Miss and blames the Kennedy administration for the bloody dispute.

UM237ACS

[fol. 1931]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 6F

A38NU

MTBL IN

A38NU

In their tightening grip of the oak-encircled Oxford campus, troops during Monday night arrested two dozen persons for carrying weapons, including a man and his 14-year-old son. Also seized was a shotgun toting woman, first of her sex to be arrested in the great Mississippi integration crisis.

Since rioting broke out Sunday evening, to be continued spasmodically on Monday, more than 200 arrests have been made, including that of Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, who commanded the troops at the 1957 integration crisis in Little Rock, Ark.

A dozen of those arrested were awaiting Grand Jury action. Many others were freed.

Walker, 53-year-old retired officer, led one student charge against Federal Marshals during Sunday's disorders, and was arrested at bayonet point yesterday during downtown rioting. He had come to Oxford from his Texas home as an avowed opponent of integration.

Walker failed to post $100,000 bond and was taken to a Springfield, Mo., federal prison which specializes in psychiatric diagnosis and care. However, in Washington, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said Walker was confined in a prison section and not in the hospital.

Charges against Walker include insurrection against the United States. Maximum penalty on this and three accompanying counts would total 37 years in prison and fines of $35,300 upon conviction.

The Justice Department was engaged in an intensive investigation to find the slayer of two men, shot down during Sunday's violent clash on the Ole Miss campus.

"We will probably get the fellow or fellows who pulled the trigger," said Guthman, who is Press Secretary to Atty. Gen. Kennedy.

Slain were a French newsman, Paul Guihard, 30, sent to Oxford from New York to cover the integration crisis for French and British news media, and Walter Ray Gunter, 23, an Oxford juke box operator. Guihard was shot in the back, Gunter in the head.

AS109PCS

[fol. 1932]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 6G

AP1NU

AMS BJT (600)

ARRESTS

By Tom Pendergast

Oxford, Miss., Oct. 2 (AP)—Armed with bayonets and loaded rifles, U.S. troops today guarded a stockade holding 75 men arrested by federal agents.

Nine of the men held in the stockade put up at the airport faced serious sedition charges arising out of riots at the University of Mississippi. Three others booked on sedition charges were released on bond.

One of the 12, identified as Melvin Bruce, 36, (2937 Westbury Drive) Decatur, Ga., was held in lieu of $25,000 bond.

Justice Department spokesman Edwin Guthman said Bruce, who had a rifle in

WR

DDWMN, was taken into a few minutes after

DGAD BEEO

Justice Department spokesman Edwin Guthman said Bruce, who had a rifle in his possession, was taken into custody a few minutes after "our people had been fired on by rifles."

Guthman would not say whether Bruce had any connection with any of the deaths or injuries resulting from the riots.

The other 8 men formally charged were held in lieu of $2500 bond.

Guthman said four serious charges were filed against the 12. He said the charges were:

Interfering by force with U.S. Marshals, carrying a maximum sentence of $5,000 fine and three years in jail. 35

3) 3, '0

[fol. 1933]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 6H

A43

SUB

Oxford, Miss.—Meredith roundup BJT (A24NU) sub following for 6th through 8th grafs, "Washington's rebuttal X X X Edwin Walker."

Washington authorities countered that Barnett's failure to provide adequate police protection caused the strife.

There was a mounting buildup of nearly 12,000 soldiers including the crack 101st Airborne, the paratroop outfit that quelled the 1957 school integration violence at Little Rock.

Troops streamed into Oxford, outnumbering the college town's citizenry 2-1 in the strongest display of federal might in this state since the end of the Civil War nearly a century ago.

Armed troops arrested more than 200 persons, about one-third of them students. Most went free, but more than a dozen stayed in custody to face various charges, including former Maj. Gen. Edwin Walker.

The military's, 9th Graf.

ZR514AED

A44

CORRECTION

Oxford, Miss—Meredith roundup BJT (A24-26) in 3rd Graf A26NU, starting "the Students' reference" make it X X X his back. Ray Gunter, 23, an Oxford X X X (fixing name).

THE AP

ZR515AED

[fol. 1934]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 6I

A54MU (OPTIONAL)
OPTIONAL LEAD
WITH MEREDITH: WALKER (A21MU)

Oxford, Miss., Oct. 2 (AP)—Former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, who barked commands to federal troops during one school integration crisis, awaited possible psychiatric examination today from his cell a prison at Springfield, Mo.

U.S. Atty. Gen. Robert Kennedy announced the arrest of the one-time Army Field Commander yesterday. Deputy Atty. Gen. Nicholas Katzenback, the top-ranking Justice Department officer in Oxford, ordered Walker's arrest for taking part in the integration disputes at the University of Mississippi.

The 53-year-old Texan led one student charge against Federal Marshals on the Mississippi campus, and later appeared in the midst of rioting in downtown Oxford.

Shortly after X X X 5th GRAF A21MU.

UN346ACS MM ASKT

[fol. 1935]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 7-A

LQBThere are unconfirmed reports that Walker has arranged to post the $100,000 bond set by a U-S Commissioner in Mississippi in his case.

(A number of Mississippi newspapers have blamed outsiders in large part for the violence on the University campus. As one—the Hattiesburg American—put it: "If there had been no one on the Ole Miss campus but students, the highway patrolmen and Federal Marshals, it is extremely unlikely that serious trouble would have developed."

[fol. 1936]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 7B

A204NU

URGENT

Oxford, Miss.—1st add riot separate A202NU XX with rocks. Guihard was identified by authorities at the Oxford Hospital. The rioting started shortly after sundown when about 2,500—jeering and jok

The rioting started shortly after sundwon when about 2,500 students—jeering and joking—gathered at the Administration Building where the marshals held their tight guard.

In the early stages, much of the shouting at the marshals sounded more like jest than maliciousness.

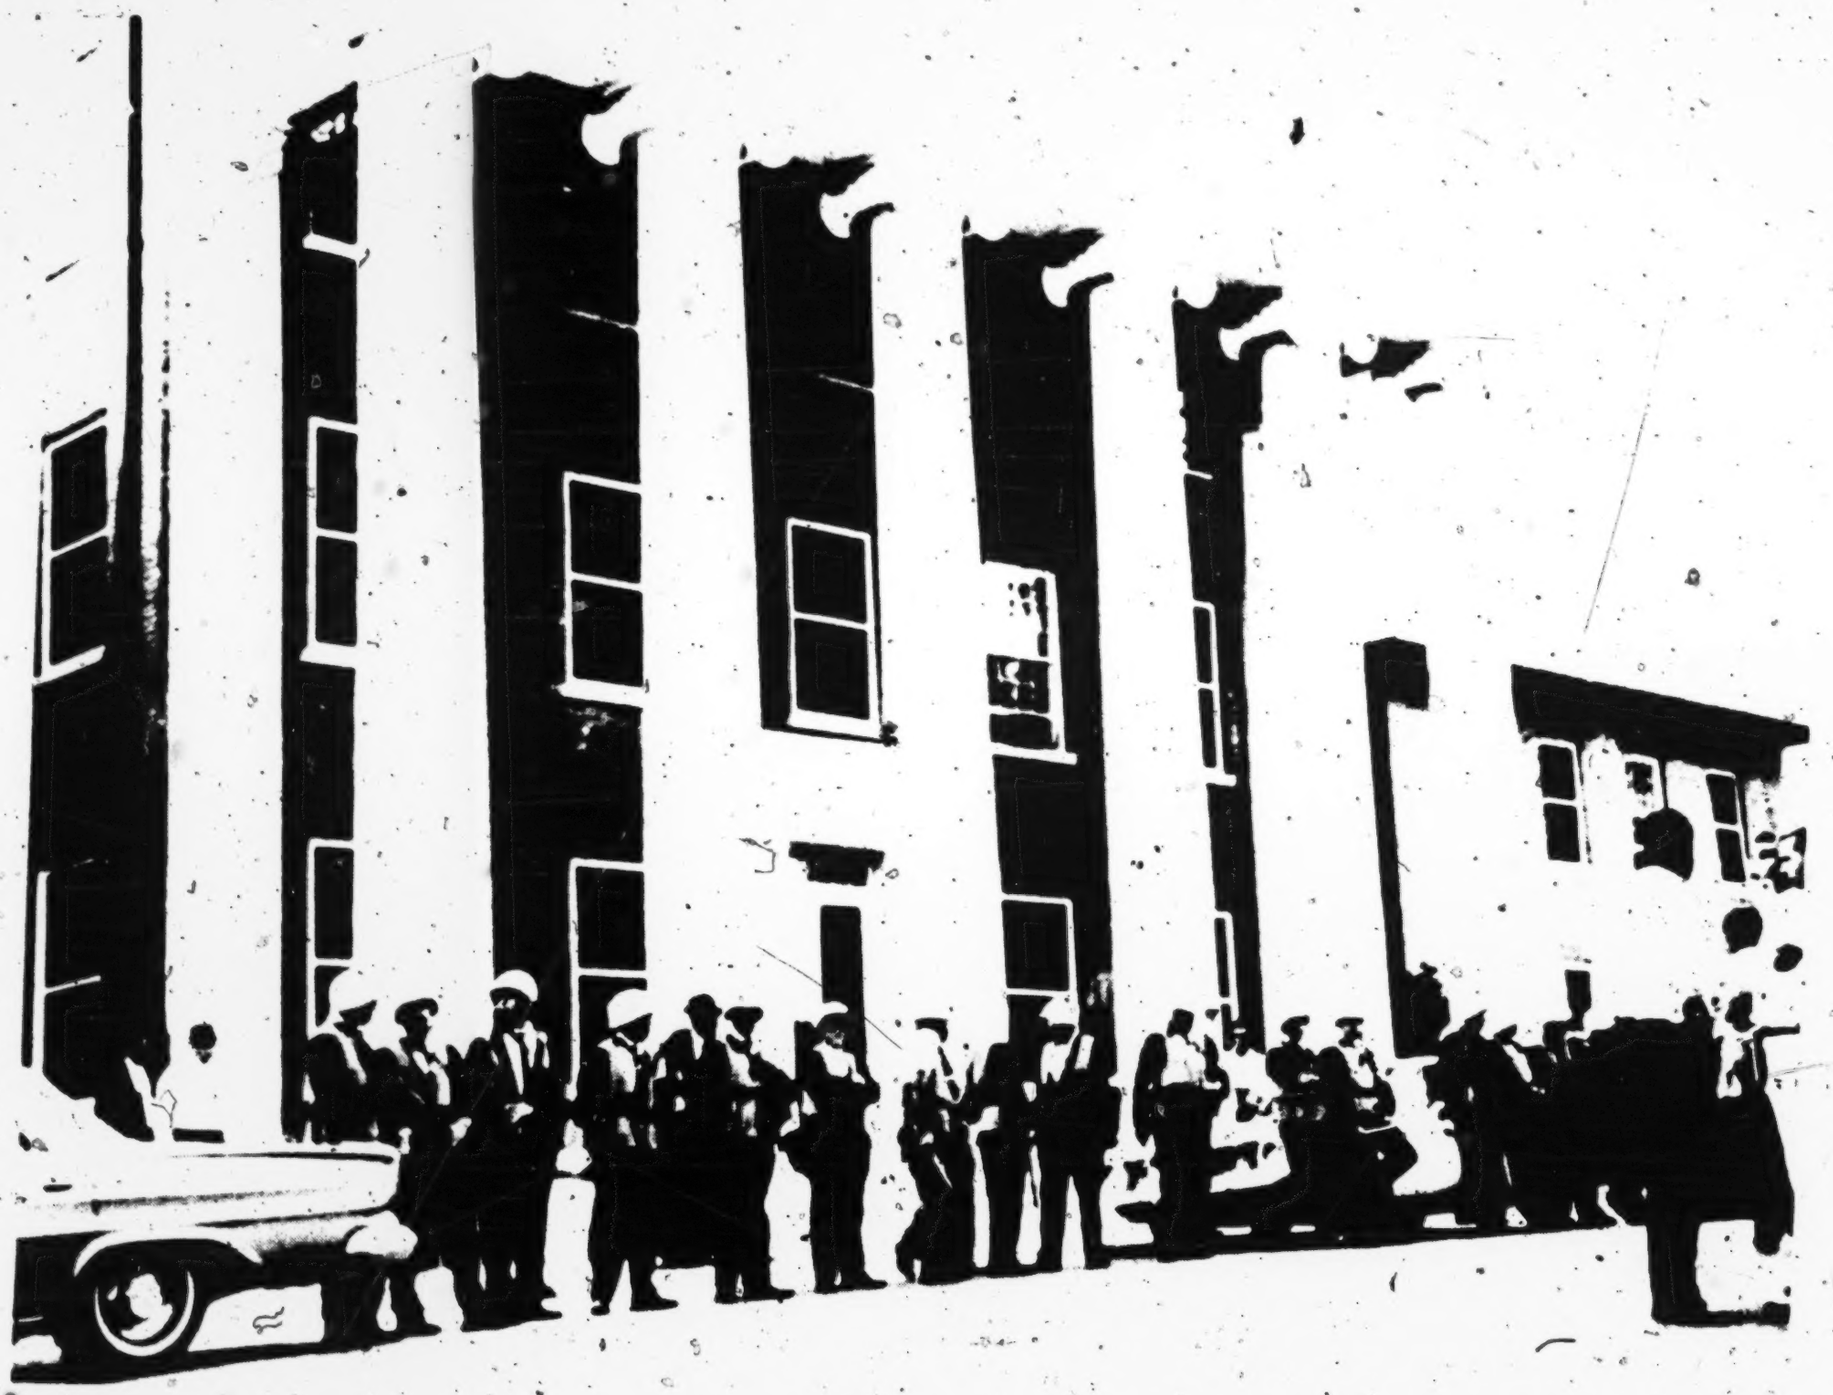
From time to time, even the grim-faced marshals would break into a slight grin.

But as the evening wore on the talk got rougher and the students started rampaging. They tore away a photographers' camera and smashed it. They smashed the windows in a car, sending a man and woman fleeing.

Then they moved against one of the Army trucks standing by with the marshals. They got the cap off the auxiliary gasoline tank and threw a flaming piece of newspaper at the fumes, trying to set fire to the truck.

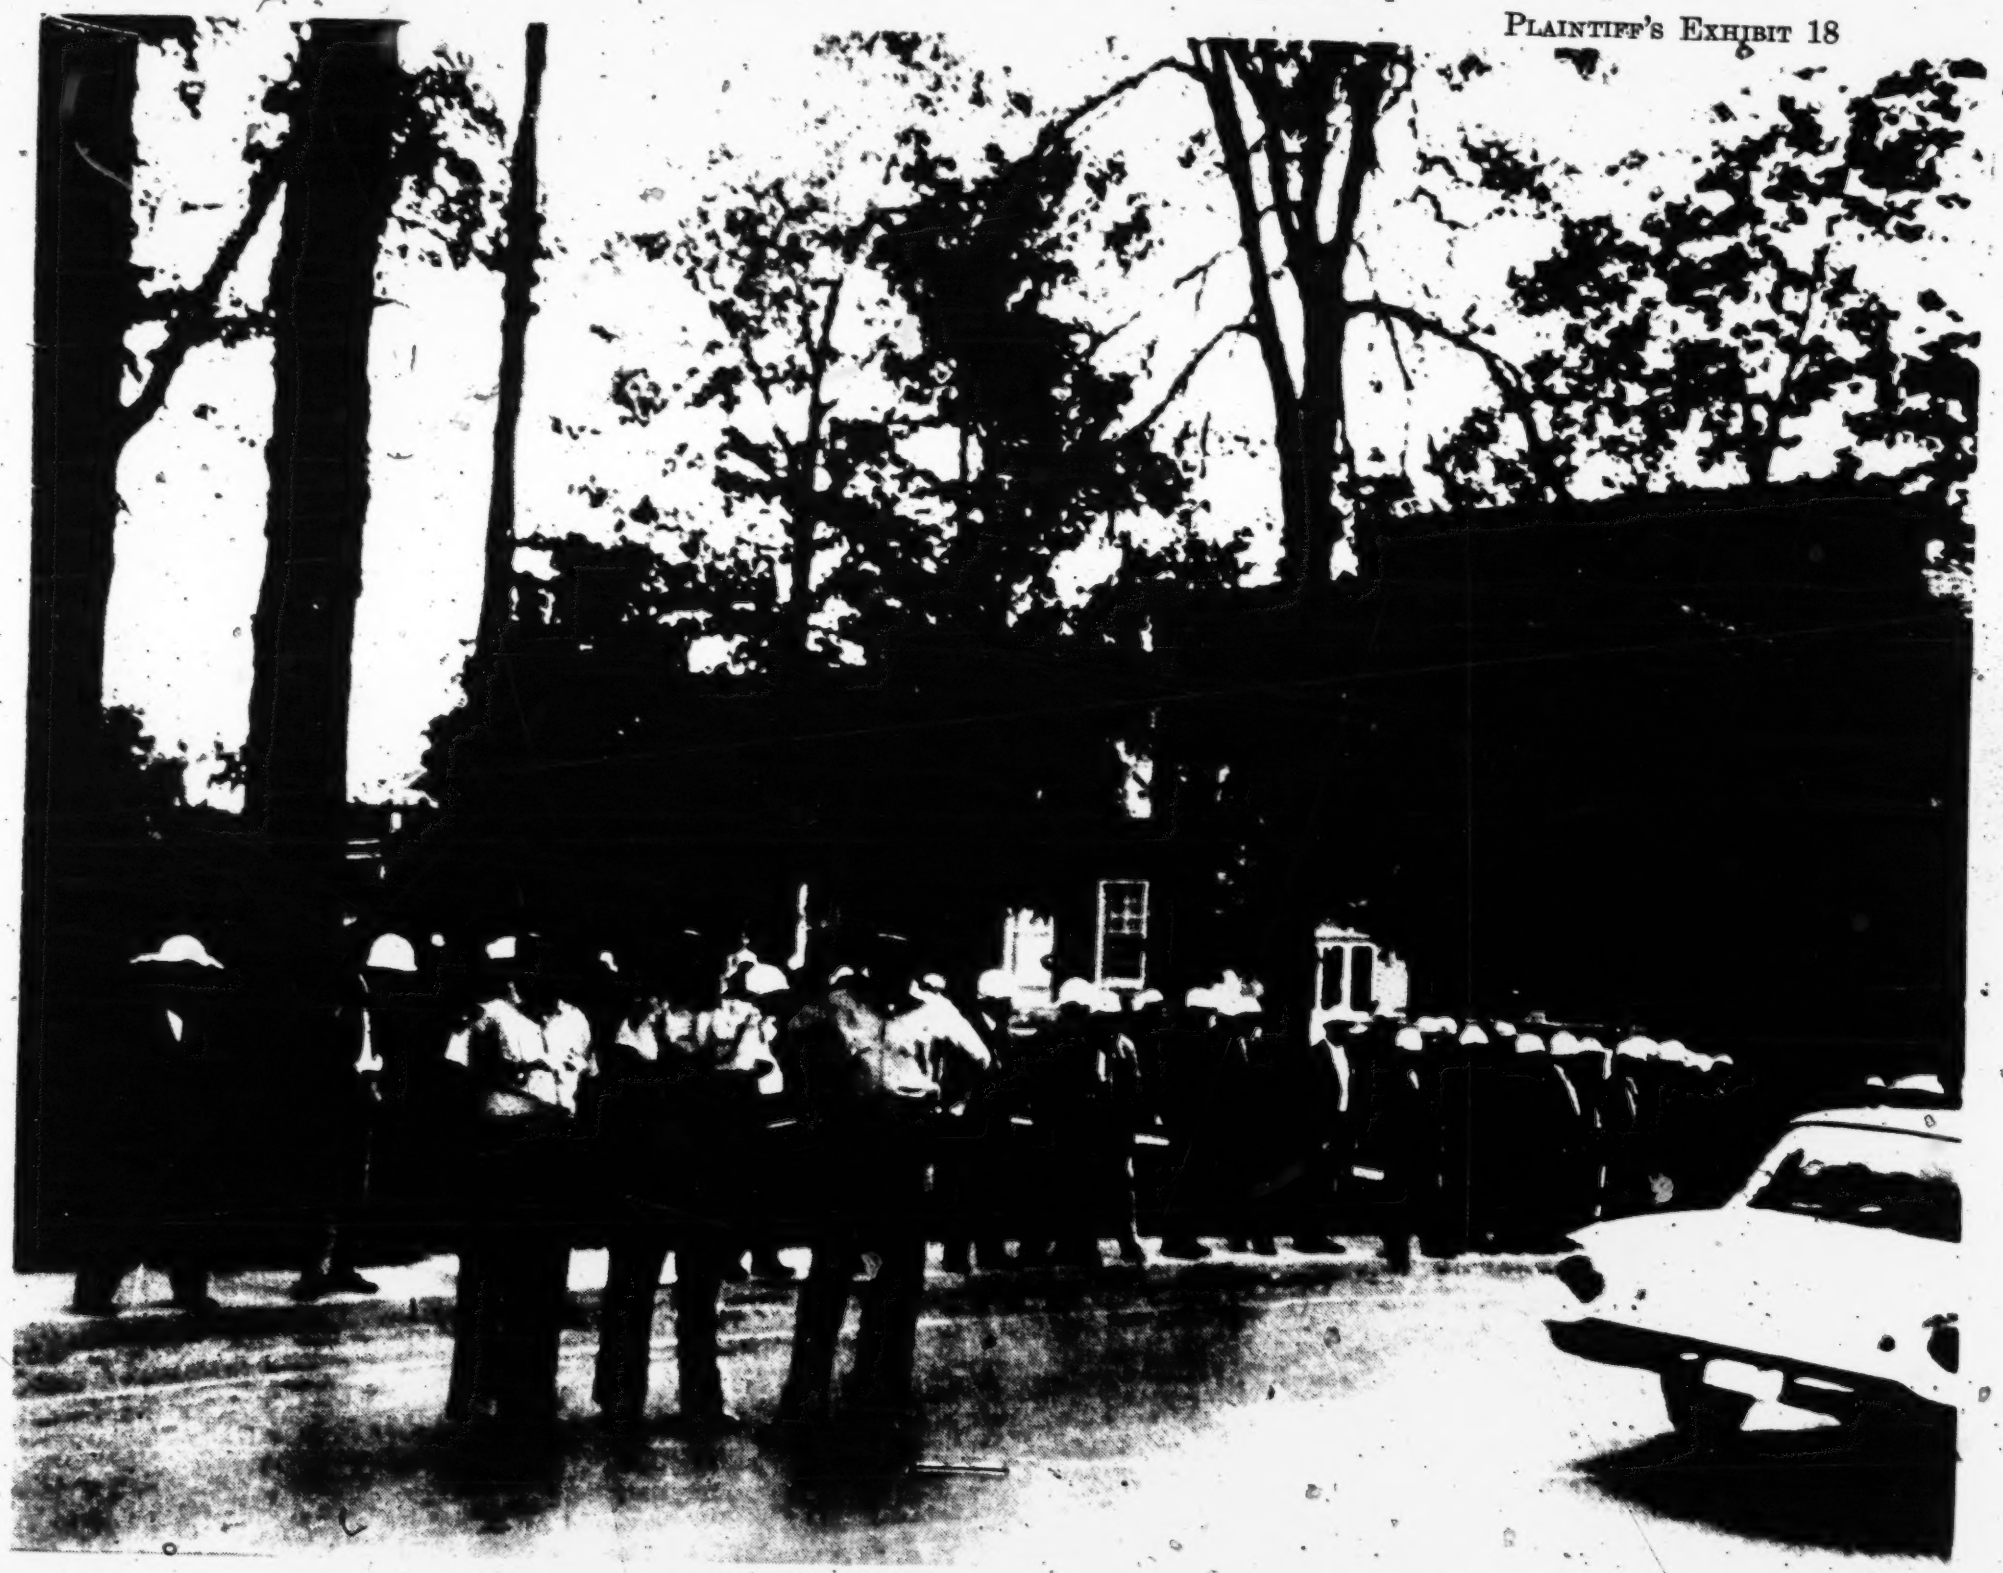
(MORE)

RT 1055PCS NM



[fol. 1938]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT 18



PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT 20

fol. 1940]

DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 14

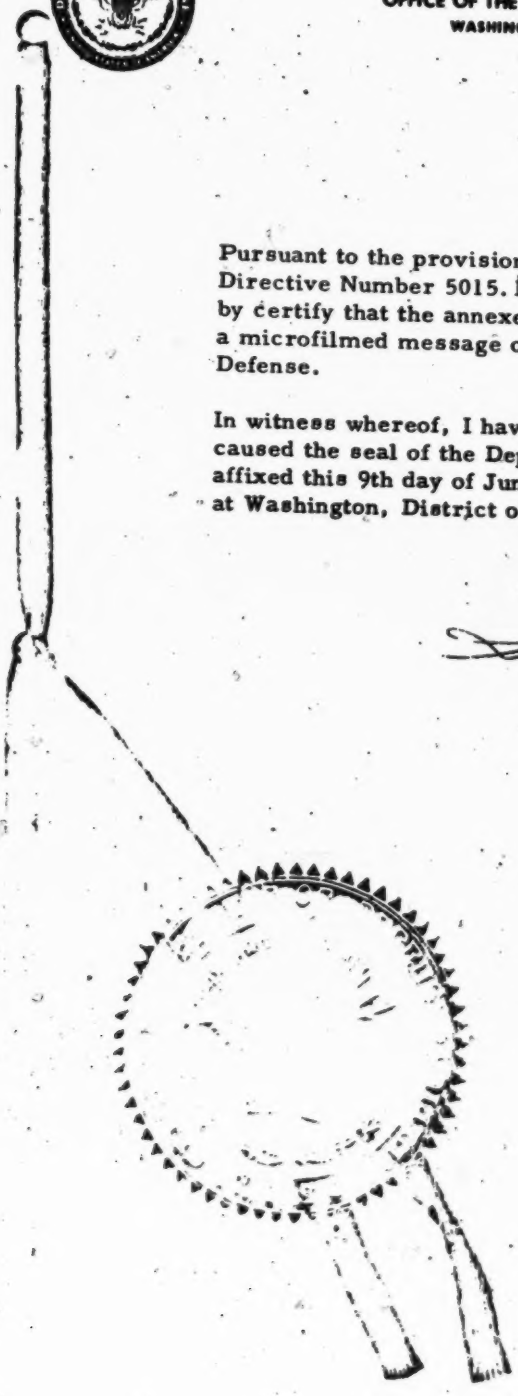
(See opposite) ☞

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20301

Pursuant to the provisions of Department of Defense Directive Number 5015.1 dated July 31, 1952, I hereby certify that the annexed document is a true copy of a microfilmed message on file in the Department of Defense.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the Department of Defense to be affixed this 9th day of June in the year of 1964, A.D. at Washington, District of Columbia.

Shirley E. Meyer
Executive Assistant
Office of Administrative Services



SCAGE

DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY
STAFF COMMUNICATIONS DIVISION

ROUTINE

FROM: PIO US ARMY MILITARY DISTRICT LITTLE ROCK ARK

TO: CINFO DEPTAR WASH DC

NR: 251500Z SEP 57

Speech by Major General Edwin A Walker to students of Little Rock Central High School 0900 hrs 25 Sep 57.

Young ladies and gentlemen of Central High School. Mr Blossom, your superintendent of schools, has asked me to come to your school this morning and discuss with you the situation in Little Rock and what it means to you students. I welcome this opportunity to do so.

As you know, the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States guarantees to all citizens the equal protection of the laws. Since the adoption of this amendment, many states have provided separate schools for their children on the basis of color. The laws establishing such schools have, however, been challenged in the courts, and about three years ago, the Supreme Court of the United States determined that such laws are contrary to the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment and consequently invalid. This decision by the highest court in the land is, of course, an authoritative interpretation of our Constitution, is binding on all citizens and government officers, both state and Federal, and may not, under our law, be changed except by an amendment to the Constitution.

Because of the Supreme Courts decision, it became necessary for those states maintaining separate schools to revise their systems to eliminate distinctions on the basis of color. The nature of these plans was left to the states and local communities, subject to approval by the local Federal District Courts. The Little Rock School District prepared such a plan which was approved by both the District Court and Circuit Court of Appeals. This plan provides for a very gradual abandonment of the separate schools system starting this year.

Subsequent to the approval of this plan, attempts were made in the courts to prevent the school authorities from putting it into effect.

I need not go into the details of this litigation,

SSAGE

DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY
STAFF COMMUNICATIONS DIVISION

NR: 251500Z PAGE 2

sufficient to say it was unsuccessful, and that the plan as originally approved remains unchanged and is full force and effect.

During the past few weeks, as you are well aware, the situation in Little Rock has been such as to prevent the entrance of a few students into your high school. Therefore, to see that the laws of the land be faithfully executed, the President has found it necessary to call the National Guard of Arkansas into the Federal Service and has directed that this force and each other armed forces as may be made available be used to enforce the orders of the Court, as an officer of the United States Army, I have been chosen to command these forces and to execute the Presidents orders.

What does all this mean to you students. You have often heard it said, no doubt, that the United States is a nation under law and not under men. This means that we are governed by laws, properly decided upon by duly constituted authority, and not by the decrees of one man or one class of men. Since this is true, it means that we are all subject to all the laws whether we approve of them personally or not and as law-abiding citizens have an obligation in conscience to obey them. There can be no exceptions, if it were otherwise, we would not be a strong nation but a mere unruly mob.

I believe that you are well-intentioned, law-abiding citizens, who understand the necessity of obeying the laws and are determined to do so. You have nothing to fear from my soldiers, and no one will interfere with your coming, going or your peaceful pursuit of your studies. However, I would be less than honest if I failed to tell you that I intend to use all means necessary to prevent any interference with the execution of your school boards plan. This is what I have been ordered to do, and I intend to carry out my orders. Those who interfere or disrupt the proper administration of the school will be removed by the soldiers on duty and turned over to the local police for disposition in accordance with the laws of your community.

One last word about my soldiers. They are here because they have been ordered to be here. They are seasoned, well-trained soldiers, many of them combat veterans. Being soldiers

DA IN 86395] (25 SEP 57)

35

SSAGE

DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY
STAFF COMMUNICATIONS DIVISION

NR: 251500Z PAGE 3

they are as determined as I to carry out their orders. However, as I stated before, the law-abiding people have nothing to fear from them. They have been carefully instructed not to molest any law-abiding citizen in his person or property, and they will obey these orders. Since a peaceful atmosphere must be maintained in the school and its vicinity, it may be necessary for them to issue instructions concerning such things as loitering, assembling in large groups, and otherwise making it difficult for them to perform their duties. I earnestly ask that you cooperate, for your own benefit and ours.

I wish you all success in your school year and Mr. Matthews, I thank your for the opportunity to talk to the student body.

NOTE: Advance copies have been delivered to DCSOP, OCS, OSA

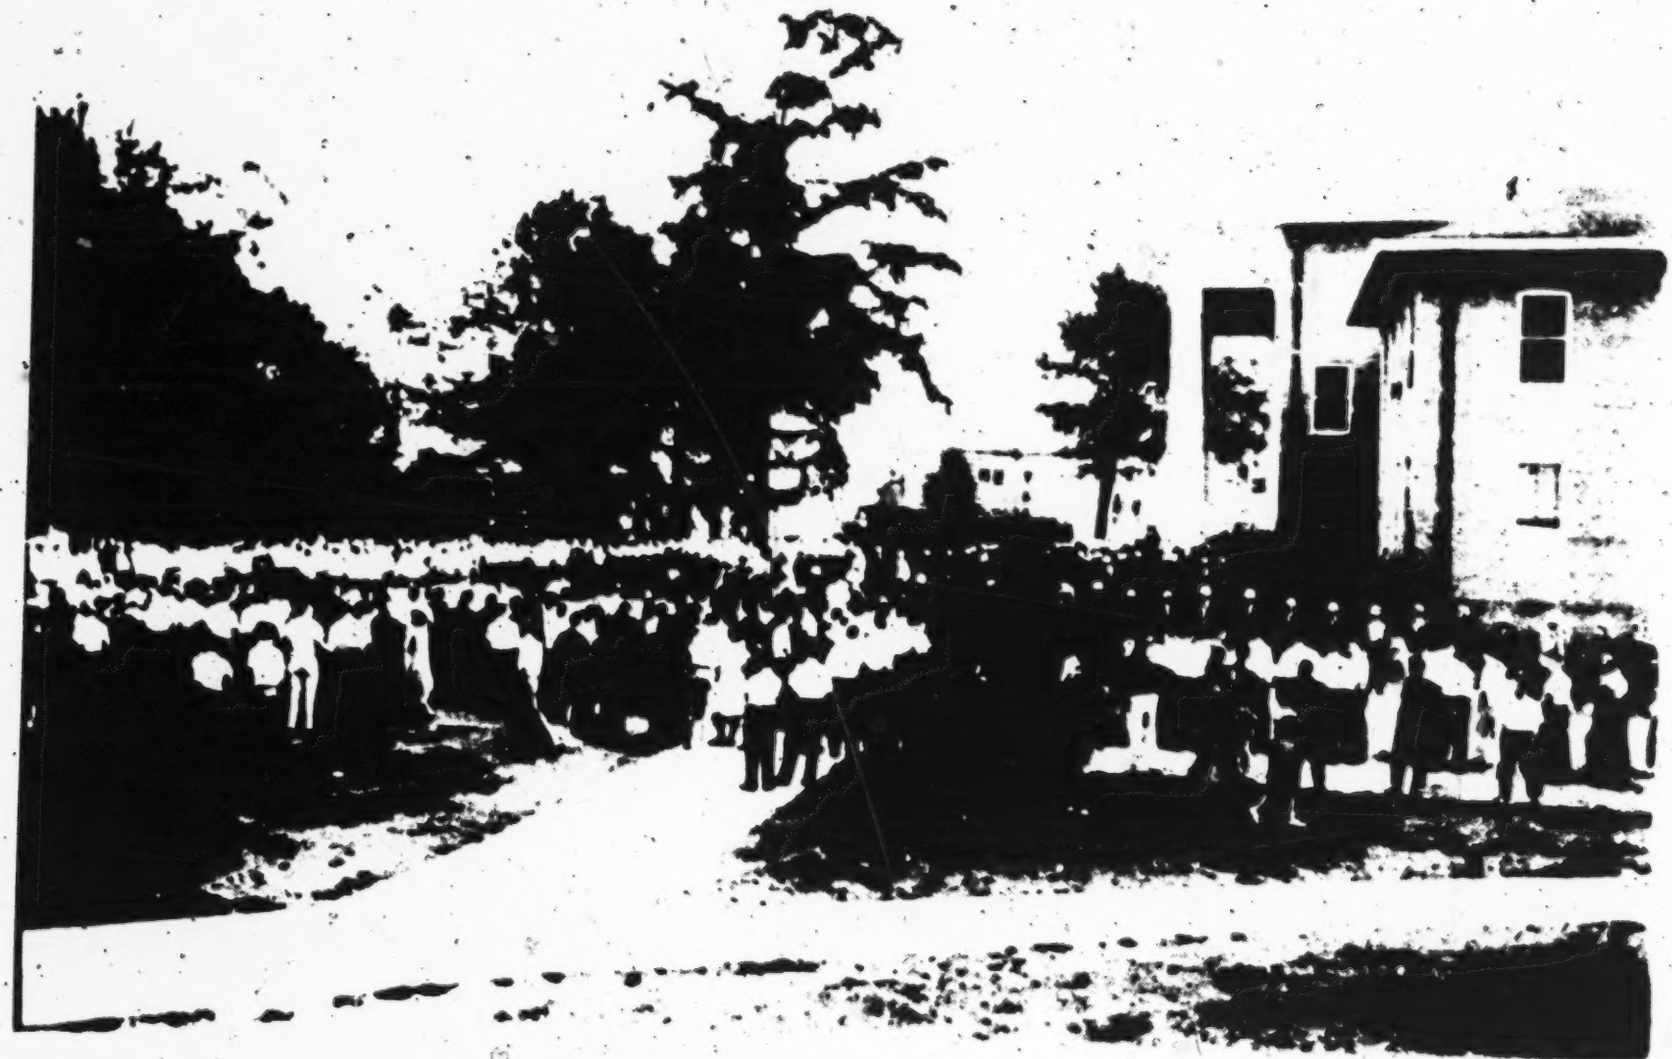
ACTION: DCSOP

INFO: OCS, OSA, CI, JAG, DCSLOG, ACSI, OSD, DCSPER

DA IN 863951 (25 SEP 57) rwt/2

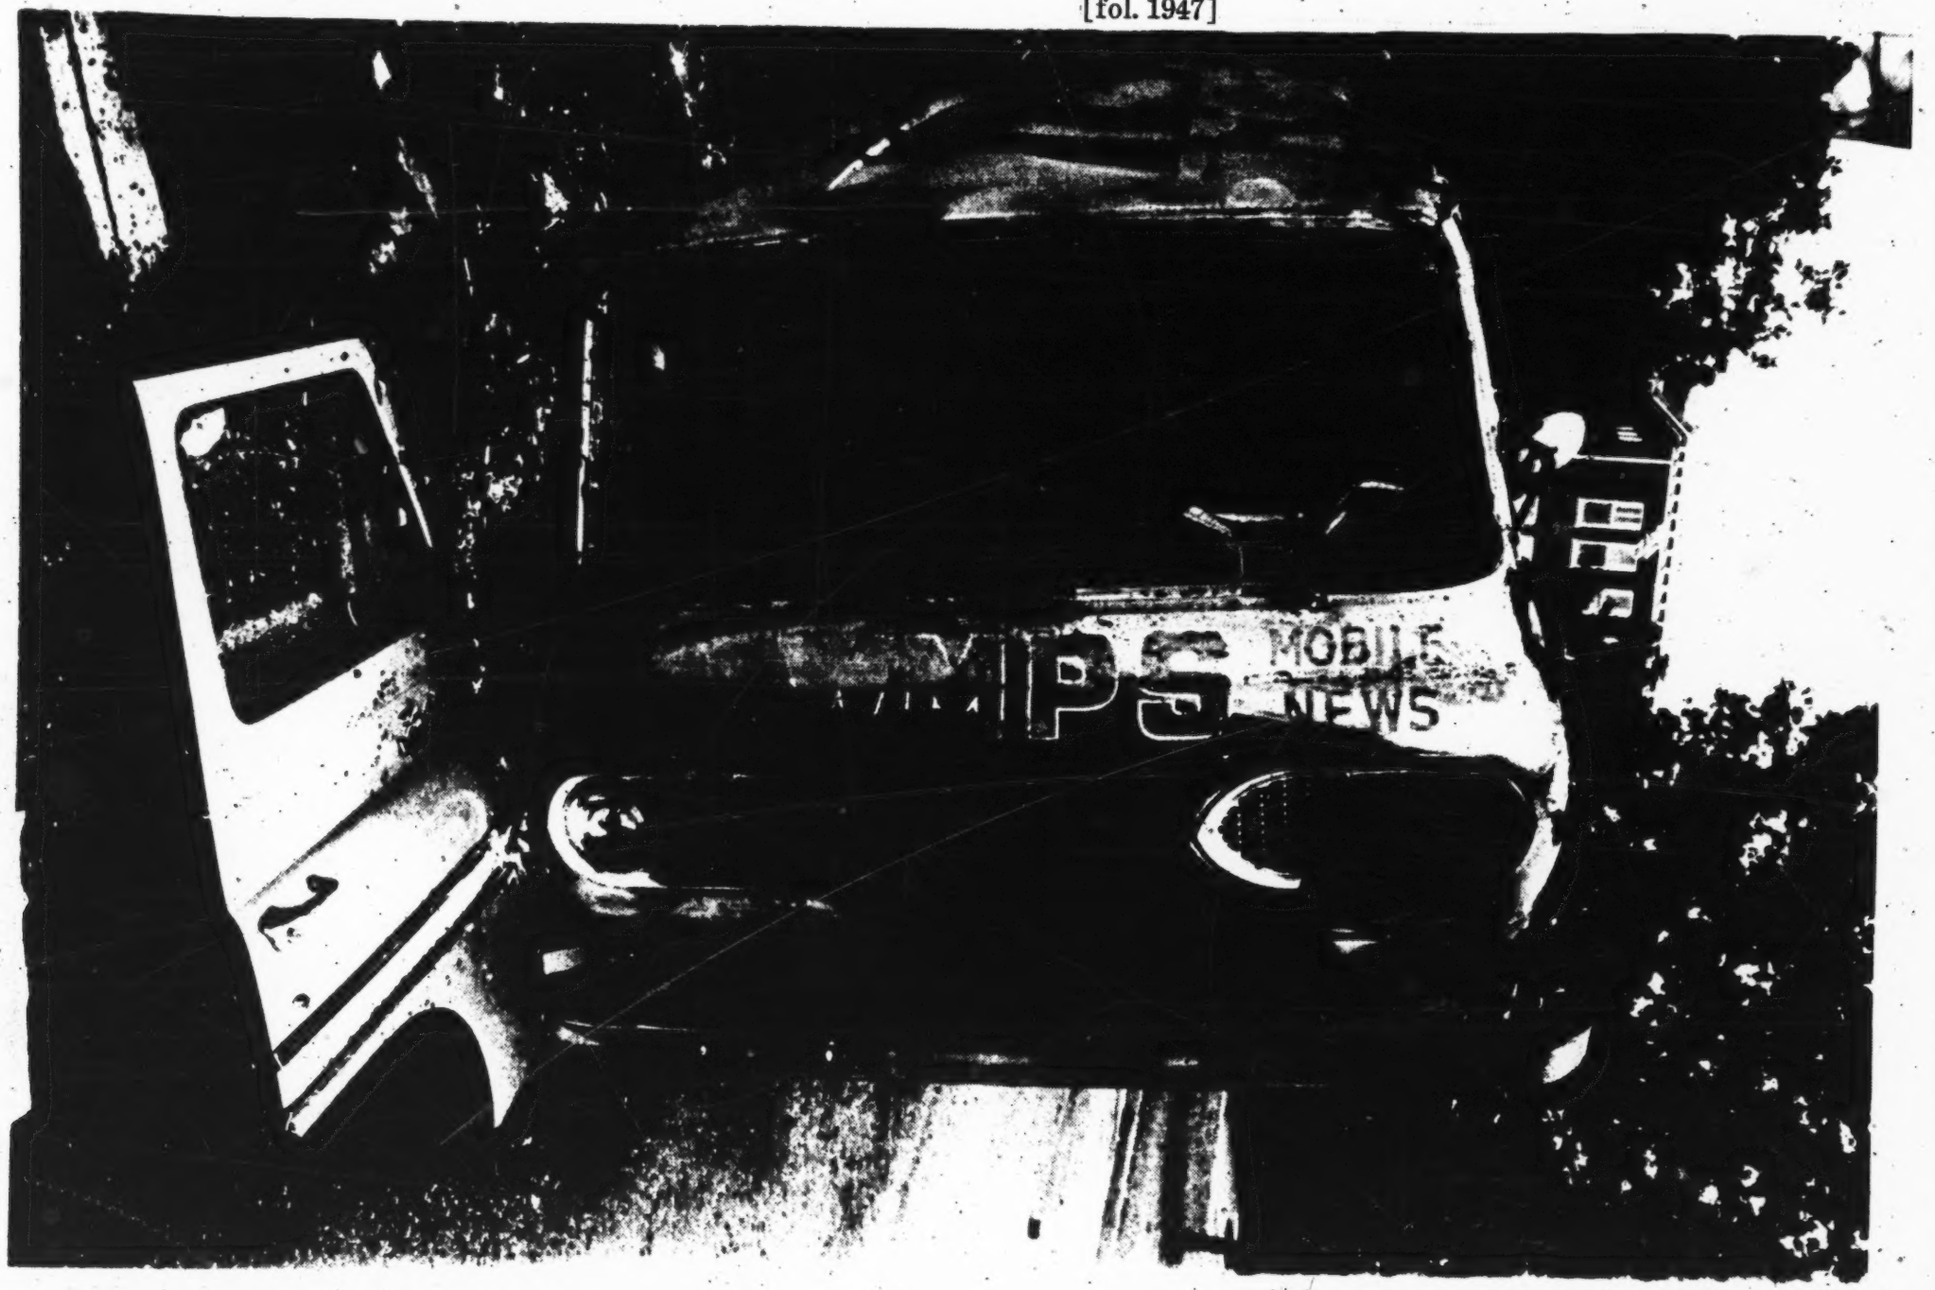
DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 20

[fol. 1944]



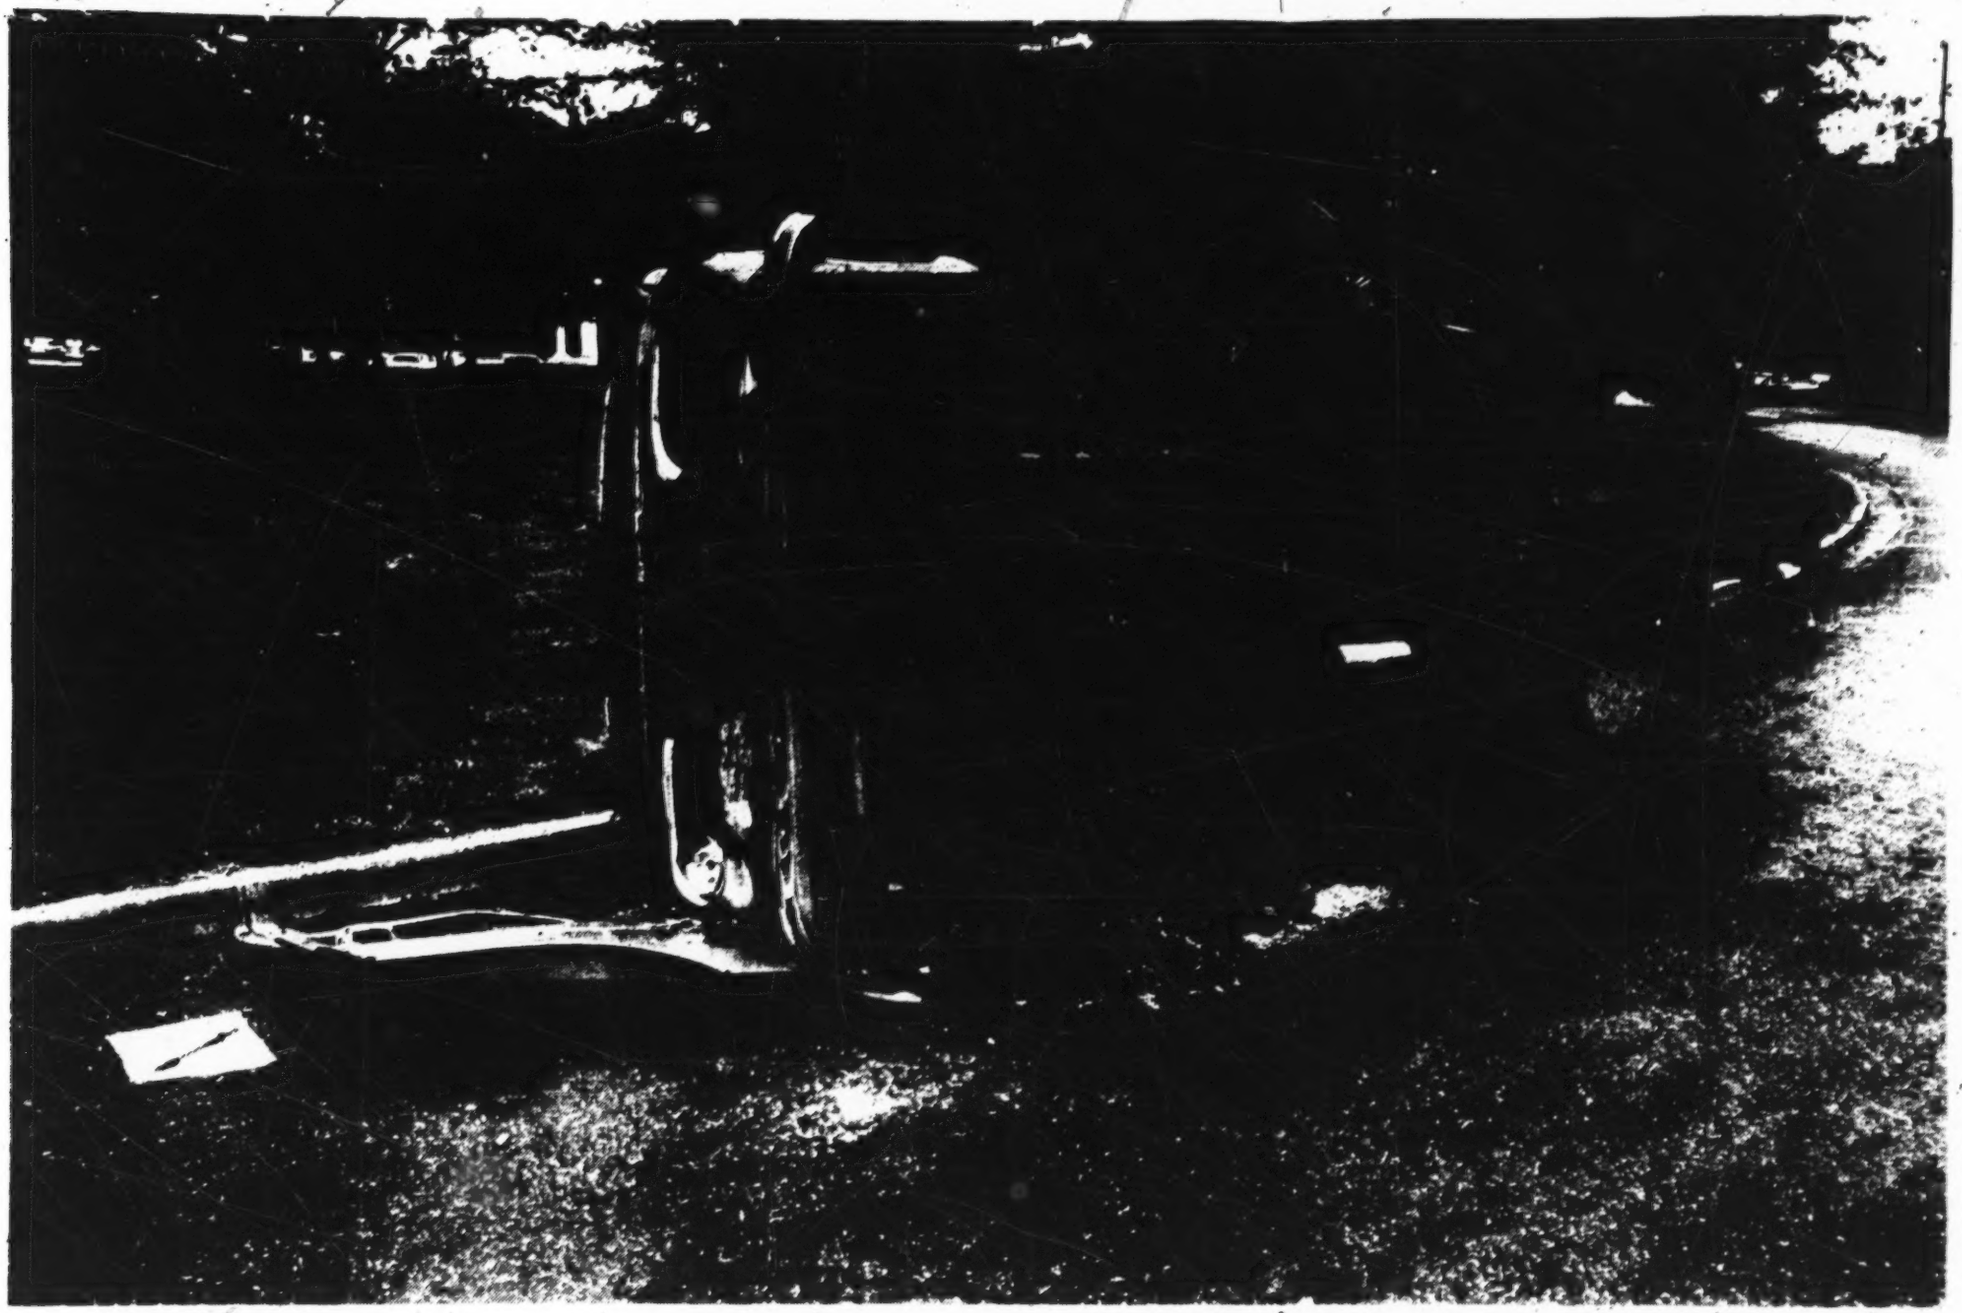
DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 23

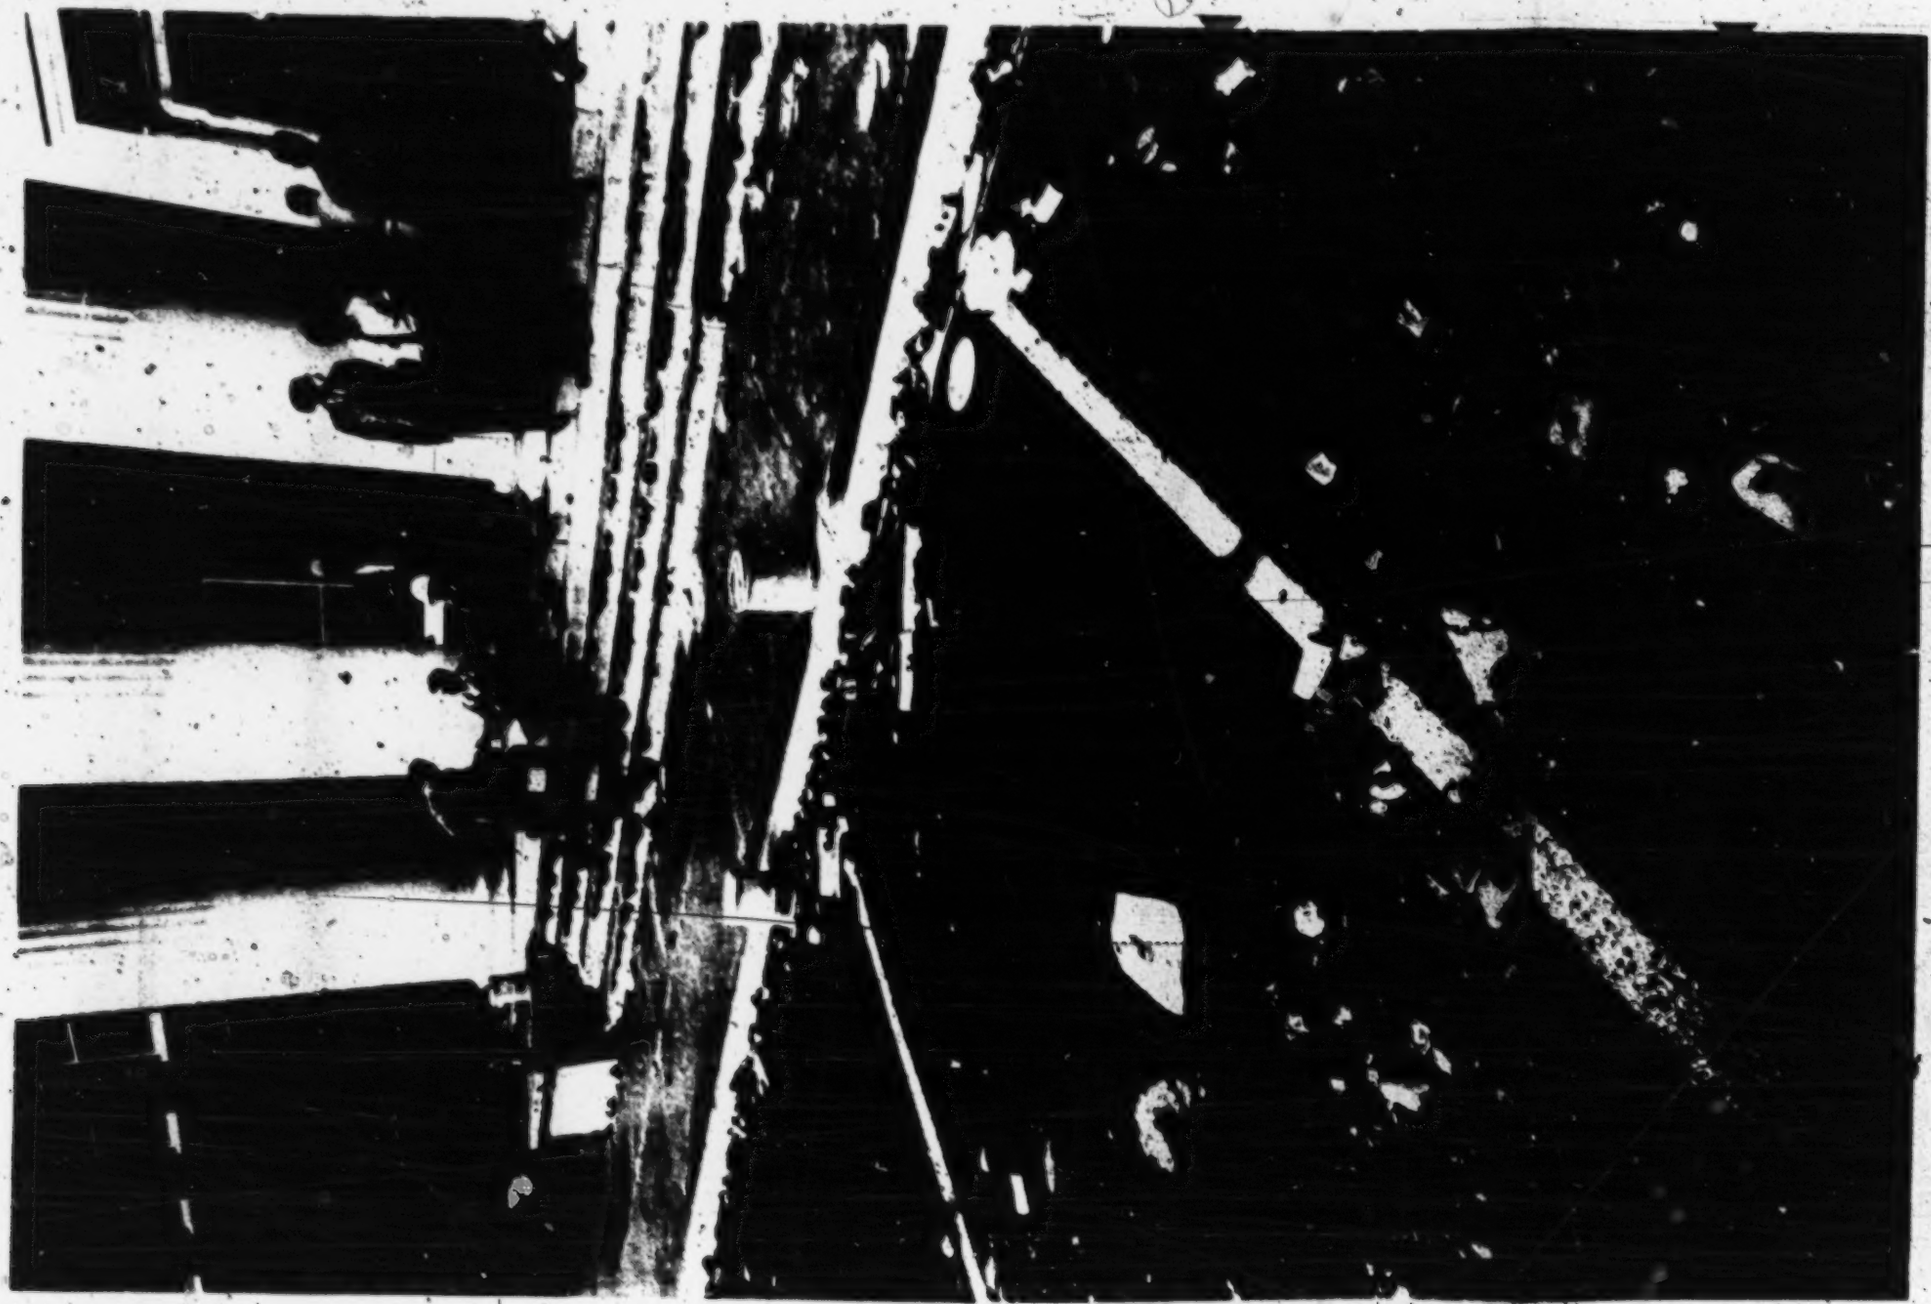
[fol. 1947]

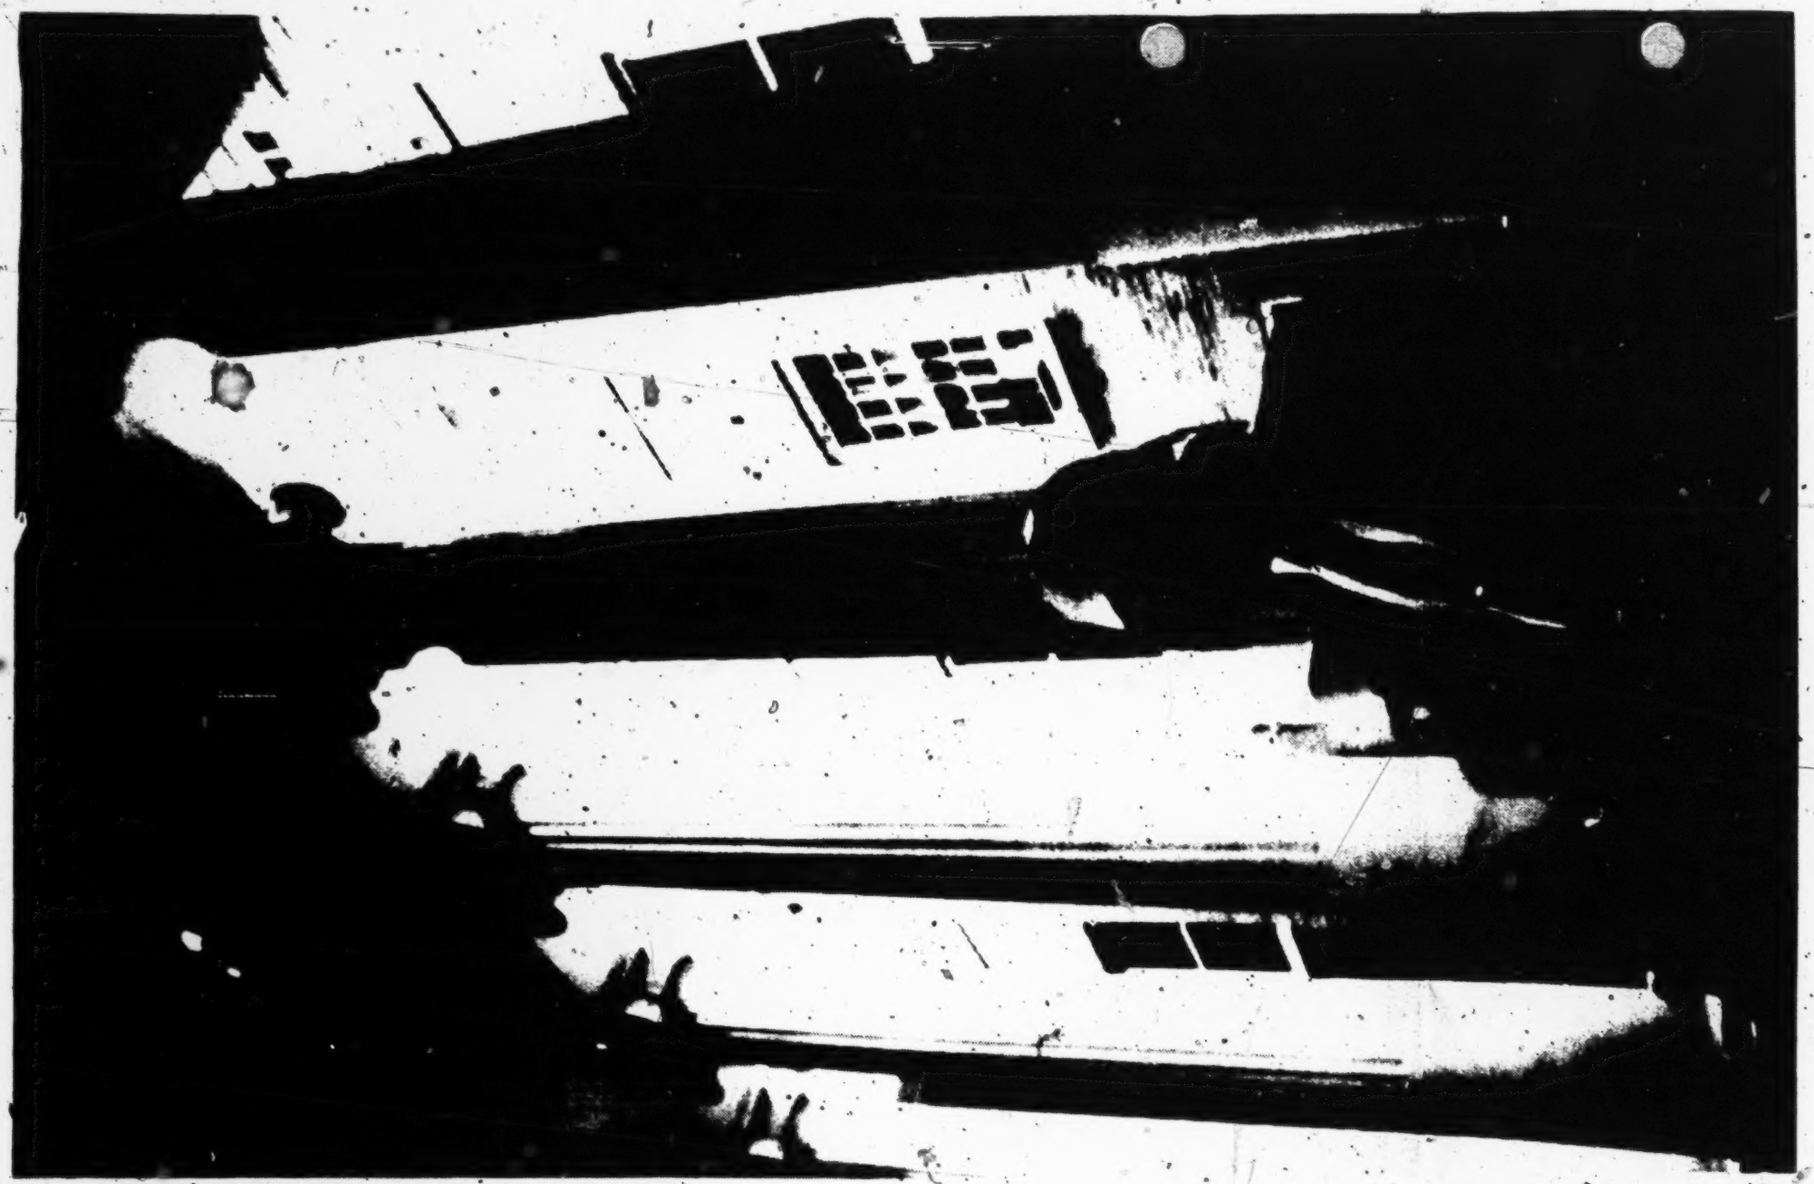


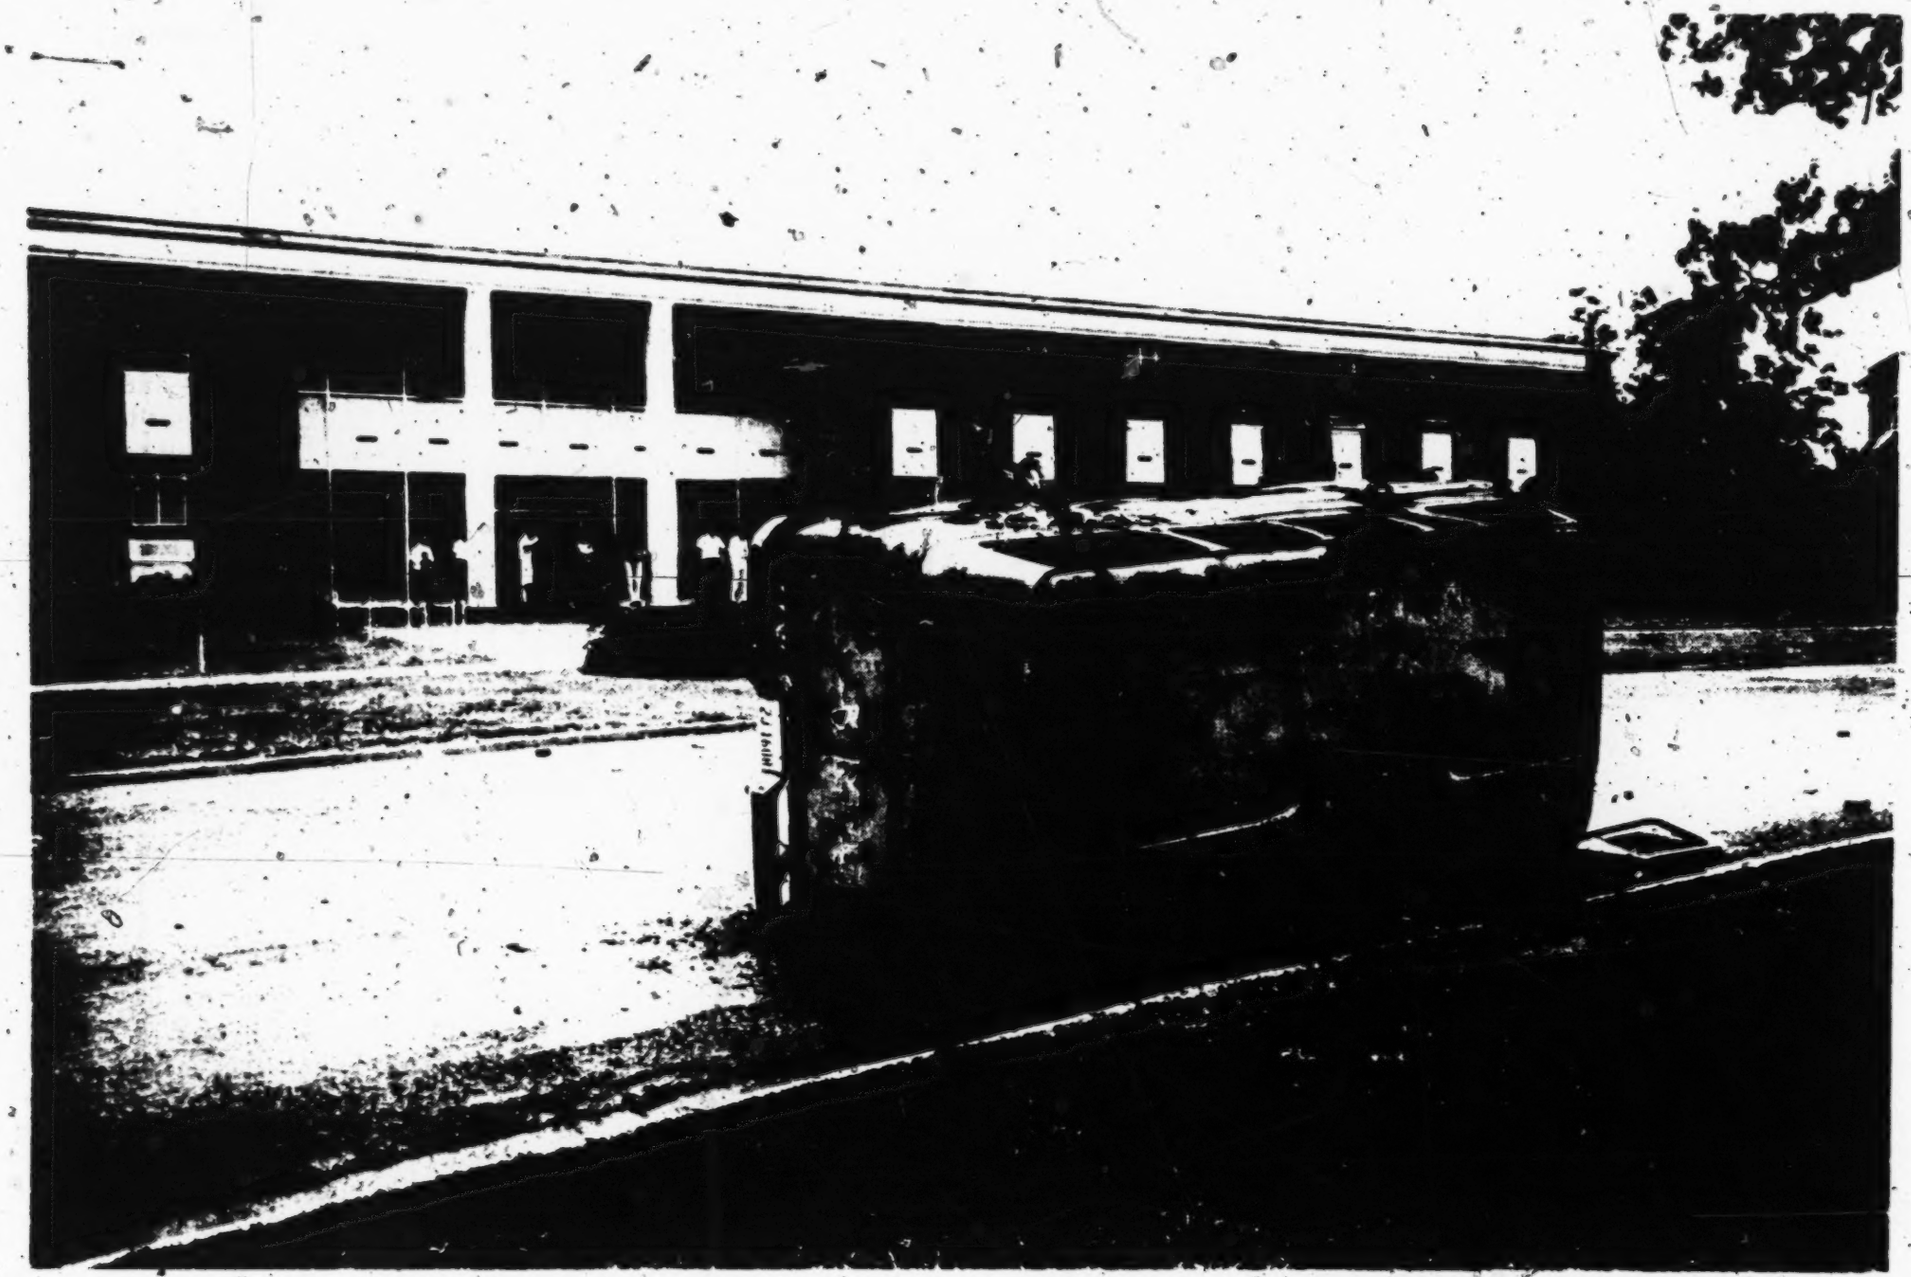
DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 24

[fol. 1948]









fol. 1953]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT 8

Handwritten notation—Thurs. 10-4-62—Night Report—
'runk Copy]

fol. 1954] A171

(ADVANCE FOR MORNING PAPERS OF SUNDAY, OCT. 7)

Meredith—Ole Miss (2,150)

3y the Associated Press

(ADVANCE) Oxford, Miss., Oct. 6 (AP)—James H. Meredith probably doesn't know the exact moment himself. But the moment surely was there—the moment when he made up his mind, the moment he decided to enroll at the University of Mississippi.

Because Meredith is a Negro, his decision on that unknown day marks a turn—a sharp turn—in American history.

Today, James H. Meredith, Negro, is a student at the University of Mississippi—the first of his race ever registered knowingly at proud, historic Ole Miss.

But because the question was settled, the Federal Government and the State of Mississippi collided in a test of strength that shook the very roots of the union.

It was sometimes physical, sometimes legalistic, always packed with every ingredient of tragedy.

It was the biggest clash of State vs. Federal Power since the Civil War.

It reached a climax with two dead and scores injured in a riot at the University, a Governor, Lieutenant Governor and a former Major General all facing the possibility of jail, federal troops occupying this small college town—and Meredith registered.

The violence on the campus has ended—that awful nightmare of tear gas and buckshot, rifle bullets and flying bricks, screaming hordes of people gone wild, and blood and death.

The litter of the battle is gone—the bricks and broken glass swept away, the bullets pried out of the walls of the Administration Building, the wounded healing.

In the student union, the juke box blares and the students dance in a gay atmosphere.

[fol. 1955] They talk and kid with the soldiers occupying their campus.

At a roadblock outside the campus, two soldiers stopped two attractive blondes in a car to check identification.

"Anything else you want of me?" one of the blondes asked the soldier.

"Not just now," one of the soldiers replied with a smile.

"Well, call me later," she said.

Youth was back to acting youthful.

Outwardly, there was an air of easing tensions on the campus. The Federal Marshals cut their force accompanying Meredith to his classes from six to three. The soldiers waved cars by the roadblocks with less fuss and bother.

But a feeling of foreboding lies beneath the surface—smouldering, as any cotton-country boy knows a fire might smoulder unseen in stored cotton, ready at any time to burst into the raging flame.

In the midst of the seeming serenity late in the week, developments illustrated the fear of the smouldering.

The Defense Department forbade the University to stage its homecoming football game here Saturday as scheduled. Fearful of the risks involved in trying to handle 20,000 or 30,000 visitors, most of them deadset against seeing a Negro in Ole Miss, the government told the University: Shift the site or cancel the game. The University moved the game to Jackson, 170 miles to the south.

The marshals, although reduced in number, did continue to accompany Meredith—and will continue, for a length of time nobody tries to guess.

And, of course, the Army still is here.

A172

So is Meredith, living in a dormitory room with three iron cots—one for himself, one for the Justice Department man charged with his overnight protection, and one remaining unused.

He leads a strange and lonely life. He's a free agent, says the government, but marshals guard his every step. He's a college boy, according to his registration papers, but he won't be taking part in many activities. He's a student on a campus that prides itself on friendliness, but he counts no companions in the student body.

He's been through an ordeal—a long trail of court hearings, jeering crowds that shouted "Nigger, Nigger," people who wanted only to get their hands on him.

[fol. 1956] Once the (Illegible) Mississippi and the fear of violence were so great that (Illegible) Gen. Robert F. Kennedy called Meredith and his escort of (Illegible) back just short of the Ole Miss campus. An Army of 500 Sheri (Illegible) ities, highway patrolmen and city police was waiting at the gates of Ole Miss to turn them back.

And the threat of violence is not over. Witness the troops and the marshals.

The question arises: Who is James Meredith? And also: Why does he want to do this?

Meredith summed it up only this week when students at the University of Alberta in Canada invited him to enroll in their University with all expenses paid.

He declined, and told them:

"We, all of my people, have hoped and prayed and fought for a long time for the right to have a decent education. Do you think they all could go to the University of Calgary?"

And earlier, many times, he's said: "I live in Mississippi, and I want to go to school in Mississippi."

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans, in ruling last summer that he must be admitted at Ole Miss, cited an Air Force psychiatrist's report saying

Meredith was a man inclined to "start a crusade to get existing rules and regulations changed."

The grandson of a slave, Meredith was born on a cotton and corn farm near Kosciusko, a small town in central Mississippi, 29 years ago. He was one of 10 children.

His father, Moses (Cap) Meredith, never got past the fourth grade. But he was determined his children would do better. All ten finished high school, and seven went to college.

James was graduated from high school in 1950 and enlisted in the Air Force—the start of a ten-year tour that saw him gather his first college credits.

He began his college work by taking extension courses at the University of Kansas in 1953. He took courses in speech, composition and literature, making C's.

After that, as he traveled with the Air Force, he picked up credits from Washburn University in Kansas and the Far East Division of the University of Maryland.

At Maryland, Stanley Drazek, associate dean of the University College, said Meredith was a "very excellent student" while attending classes in the school's far-flung centers in the Orient.

A civilian again in 1960, he enrolled at Jackson State College, a Negro school in the Mississippi capital.

It wasn't long before he applied at Ole Miss, but he continued his studies at Jackson state. When he enrolled at Ole Miss last week, he needed only six hours to take his degree in political science at the Negro school. In transferring, he lost a year or more.

(MORE)

TB1224AED

[fol. 1957] A25NU (RDUP)

AMS BUDGET

NIGHT LEAD MEREDITH ROUNDUP (580)

BY RELMAN MORIN

Oxford, Miss., Oct. 4 (AP)—The University of Mississipp's gala homecoming football game was switched 170 miles away to Jackson today, to avoid any renewed violence over Negro James H. Meredith's forced integration into the student body.

The Defense Department ordered the transfer "on the basis of information . . . which indicated it would be unwise for the game to go ahead at Oxford and the fact that minor incidents continue to occur."

The Government ultimatum put a damper on a festival weekend for 4,800 Ole Miss students, who had planned to play host to nearly 30,000 visitors. A big Friday night dance was called off. Soheeuoutdoor bonfire rallies and other homecoming events.

As the 29-year-old Meredith, an Air Force veteran, went through his fourth day of scholastic activity, ERT VISITORS. A big Friday night dance was called off. So were outdoor bonfire rallies and other homecoming events.

As the 29-year-old Meredith, an Air Force veteran, went through his fourth day of scholastic activity, his escort of U.S. Marshals was cut in half, from six to three. And plans were announced for the withdrawal of 380 Marshals from among 450 on duty here since campus rioting last weekend claimed two lives.

In Washington, however, an official said the situation at Oxford still was considered "fairly tense."

[fol. 1958] During relatively quiet night campus, only 11 persons were picked up for questioning, and all were released. There have been more than 250 arrests during the week, but only a handful of persons have been charged with crimes.

Meredith, slightly-built, quiet-spoken center of the greatest integration crisis yet in the South, arrived on the campus last Sunday. He was the first Negro ever knowingly enrolled in the 114-year history of the school.

With the rioting, some 12,000 armed Federal troops were rushed into Oxford to restore order. About 8,000 still are on duty.

Nicholas Katzenbach, Deputy U.S. Attorney General, told newsmen here that while there was some relaxation in Meredith's security guard, he did not know when further reductions in the troops might come.

At some point, he added, local authorities may have to assume responsibility for Meredith's safety. However, Lt. Gov. Paul B. Johnson Jr. said earlier in the week he didn't think it ever would be possible for Mereditt to attend the University without Federal protection. Johnson said he could not imagine state forces being used as a substitute for Federal troops.

Katzenbach, asked when he thought it might be possible for the Federal Government to relinquish its tight grip on the University campus, replied that "My crystal ball isn't good enough for that."

[fol. 1959] AS26NU

In Washington, an official who declined to be quoted by name, said he could see no possibility of removing Meredith's escort entirely, and that he probably would need federal protection for as long as he stays at the University —which may be 18 months or longer.

Katzenbach did say:

"I have great confidence in the students and their good behavior . . . I don't think Mr. Meredith will be assaulted on the campus."

As for the football game, Katzenbach said no federal troops or marshals will be detailed to Jackson.

Meredith already had made weekend plans that did not include the game or other homecoming events. He is expected to leave the campus, and may visit his wife, who is a student at Jackson State (Negro) College.

Even in Meredith's absence, federal officials decided against leeting the football game with the University of Houston go on here as scheduled. Federal Marshals had predicted trouble.

"There was some feeling," said Katzenbach, "that Homecoming Day came on us a little fast."

The game will be played at Jackson's Memorial Stadium at 2 P.M. CST. The announcement from Mississippi University Chancellor J. D. Williams said:

"The Ole Miss campus is secure and a condition of near normalcy under the circumstances is rapidly returning. Less than 60 students have formally withdrawn and some of them may return by Monday. . . .

"We have been advised by Robert S. McNamara, Secretary of Defense, and Cyrus R. Vance, Secretary of the Army, from Washington, concerning our homecoming game —that it be played in Houston or Jackson, or that the game be cancelled."

Students reacted in varying ways to the game's transfer. One complained that the student body might as well be under martial law. But another said:

"We've had enough trouble around here without inviting the red-necks in for a football game."

Sarcasm was expressed by State Legislators at Jackson. Rep. Russell Davis, referring to Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy, said in the House Chamber:

"I understand (MORE)—WX

235PED

[fol. 1960] A30NU

Oxford, Miss—1st add NL Meredith roundup (A25-26NU) XXXX House Chamber:

"I understand Bobby Kennedy will referee the game."

"If he does referee the game," replied Speaker Walter Sillers, "Ole Miss is beaten before it starts."

During the night, five carloads of U.S. Marshals assigned to Oxford were halted at Holly Springs, Miss. They were not held but Sheriff Sol Cox claimed four of them were "intoxicated, extremely arrogant and resisted arrest."

Katzenbach said the convoy was permitted to continue within a short time and added:

"There had been no drinking among the men and none was arrested."

Gov. Ross Barnett of Mississippi, and Sen. James O. Eastland, D-Miss., have blamed U.S. Marshals for last weekend's rioting at Oxford. However, a minority group of professors at the University of Mississippi adopted a resolution in defense of the marshals. The campus chapter of the American Association of University Professors added:

"We have evidence that the attempt of men in prominent positions to place all the blame for the riot on the United States Marshals is not only unfair and reprehensible, but is almost completely false. We encourage an investigation by the proper authorities."

The Club's Chairman, Barton Milligan, declined to say whether the resolution specifically was in reply to Barnett or Eastland. Only 50 of 250 professors belong to the Club and Milligan said:

"We are a definite minority among the faculty. I like to think our opinion represents the majority. But I'm not in a position to say that it does."

[fol. 1961] In another statement, ministers of all Oxford churches save one called upon Mississippians, in the aftermath of last weekend's rioting, to observe the coming Sunday as "A specific time for repentence for our collective and individual guilt."

The statement lacked only the backing of the Church of Christ, but that group does not participate in interdenominational actions.

Meredith, meanwhile, turned down an invitation to transfer with all expenses paid to the University of Alberta, Canada. And a denial was made in Washington of a recurrent report that Meredith would transfer to the integrated University of Miami in Florida.

Gov. Barnett, Mississippi's 64-year-old Democratic Chief Executive, who tried in vain to personally block Meredith's integration, made a brief television appearance last night and said deep anger and resentment still are felt by Mississippians over the dispatch of U.S. troops to Oxford. But he added:

"Let's by all means avoid violence. Let's maintain law and order."

AS1247PCS NM ASKT

[fol. 1962] A82NU (MORIN)

WITH MEREDITH ROUNDUP (450)

By Relman Morin

Oxford, Miss., Oct. 4 (AP)—Dr. John D. Williams, Chancellor of the University of Mississippi, said today that the students are "very confused and torn" over the fact that James H. Meredith, a Negro, has been enrolled on the campus.

"Your guess is as good as mine," he replied when asked how long he thought it would be before Meredith could move around the campus without escort.

Dr. Williams said there "is no doubt" that the prestige of the university has been damaged. But he said that the alumni and many, if not most, of the citizens of Mississippi want to recover whatever losses have been sustained.

He was asked to assess the attitude of the majority of the students today, the fourth day of Meredith's attendance at classes. He replied:

"Most of them are not indifferent. I would say they are very confused, very torn between their loyalty to the state and to the nation.

"They came here under the influence of their communities and their homes with many preconceived attitudes. It is the duty of the university to bring them truth and knowledge."

Asked what would happen if the federal government ordered other Negro students to be enrolled on the campus, he replied, "We will follow court orders."

There have been reports that a Negro woman has applied for registration at Ole Miss.

The officials present at the news conference said all they knew was what they had seen in the newspapers, and such information could come only from the registrar. He was not present at the news conference.

[fol. 1963] Dr. Williams said he believed the attendance was approaching normal in the classes. He referred questions on this to Dr. Charles F. Haywood, the provost.

Dr. Haywood said the attendance as of Wednesday was between 50 and 65 per cent. He said he estimated that today it is at 75 to 85 per cent. And he added that in some senior classes and graduate classes it was 100 per cent.

A83NU

Referring to events of last Sunday night when rioting on the campus took the lives of two persons and injured some 75 others, he said, "I can't figure any way we could have prevented it."

Dr. Haywood said there have been about 60 student withdrawals since Sunday. But he said this is "almost normal" for the first semester at this stage.

Dr. Williams said a notice has been posted asking students possessing weapons to surrender them. Newspapermen said they have not seen any such notices. Dr. Williams said he had been informed they had been posted.

He said some students have approached university officials and asked if they could turn over their guns to the university for the time being. He pointed out that many of them go hunting for squirrels and doves at this time of year.

They have been encouraged to turn in their arms, Williams said.

Regarding reports of a special train to take students to Jackson for Saturday's football game with the University of Houston, the chancellor read a telegram from Gov. Ross Barnett.

It said in part, "I will be responsible for round-trip transportation for students who wish to attend the game."

AS415PCS NM ASKT

[fol. 1964] A107NU

WITH MEREDITH

BY ED LEBRETON

Oxford, Miss., Sept. 4 (AP)—The Justive Department revealed today eight deputy U. S. Marshals were injured at the University of Mississippi riots Sunday night before tear gas was used against demonstrators.

And, Deputy Atty. Gen. Nicholas Katzenbach said, the force of 538 Marshals suffered 38 percent casualties—including 29 cases of gunshot wounds and some acid burns. A total of 166 Marshals, including specially deputized border patrolmen and Bureau of Prisons personnel, were wounded.

Katzenbach told a news conference the high rate of injuries by Marshals during the night-long riots that followed the arrival of Negro James H. Meredith under Federal guard at the Ole Miss campus included one wounded seriously. But that man, Graham Same of Indianapolis, was recovering from bullet wounds in the throat.

Most of the injured were hit by bottles, bricks and other flying objects, Katzenbach said.

However, one of the men burned by acid was present at the news conference. John Cameron, Deputy Chief of the special Marshals force, told newsmen he was burned over an area of about four square inches at the base of his neck by acid.

"It could have been worse," Cameron said. "I probably would have received the acid in my face, except that I'd just turned to aid another Marshal who had just been burned."

It was the first report acid had been used by demonstrators during the bloody riots that killed two persons and injured hundreds.

Katzenbach said he expects the force of Marshals in Oxford to be reduced to about 25 by early next week. The military has assured the general security of the area, he said, and the Marshals' remaining job will be to guard Meredith personally.

He declined to say whether Meredith will be accompanied by Marshals when he leaves the campus for the weekend.

RK605PCS

[fol. 1965]

A11ONU

WITH MEREDITH LIBRARY (350)

BY BILL CRIDER

Oxford, Miss., Oct. 4 (AP)—James H. Meredith, first Negro ever enrolled at the University of Mississippi, entered the University's library today, walked from room to room, and checked out a book without incident.

This was Meredith's fourth day attending classes. At the end of his afternoon class, he walked part of the way from Peabody Hall to the library, a distance of about 300 yards.

He entered the library while two U.S. Marshals in civilian clothes loitered unobtrusively in the hall. One was Chief Marshal James P. McShane.

Meredith first was introduced to an assistant librarian who showed him the card file. She was courteous but unsmiling.

After looking at the file, he went into two reading rooms.

Then, he was escorted to the basement where there is another large reading room. Two women librarians there took him around. Again, there were courteous but unsmiling.

While he was in the room, a white student entered. As soon as he saw Meredith, he left.

Another student came out of a small reading room where smoking is permitted.

He spoke to U.S. Marshal Albert Taylor, of Chula Vista, Calif.

"Tell him he can study in here if he wants to smoke," he said.

One youth seeing Meredith examining a card file, called to another. "Come here and look at this," he said.

The second youth, seeing Meredith, said, "Well, I'll be damned."

Another student watching Meredith walk past murmured, "just like a fraternity brother."

[fol. 1966] Some of these in the library stared straight ahead. The expressions of others plainly registered dismay.

During the day, Meredith attended four classes and walked into each with his guards lagging about 20 to 30 feet away.

Encouraged by the relatively quiet reception during the morning, officials decided Meredith could walk from his final afternoon class to the library in the same manner.

It's a distance of about 300 yards.

Watchful Marshals, apparently sensing growing hostility, waved Meredith to a car before he had covered a third of the way. The move came after a pretty co-ed among the students exclaimed, "Why doesn't somebody kill him."

Meredith was driven to the library and entered through a side entrance.

RK629PCS

A112NU

MEREDITH—LEGISLATURE

BY JIM SAGGUS

Jackson, Miss., Oct. 4 (AP)—Sarcasm flooded the chamber of the House of Representatives today after it was announced that the University of Mississippi homecoming football game against Houston would be played in Jackson Saturday.

"I understand Bobby Kennedy (Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy) will referee the game," Rep. Russell Davis of Hinds County said on the floor.

"I hope he will come down," Rep. Thompson McClellan of Clay replied.

"If he does referee the game," speaker Walter Sillers of Bolivar added, "Ole Miss is beaten before it starts."

Gov. Ross Barnett announced today the game had been shifted from the Oxford campus to Jackson in the wake of desegregation violence at Oxford.

SILLERS NOTEDLV

(MORE)

WX RZ836PED

This was Meredith's fourth day attending classes. At the end of his afternoon class, he walked part of the way from Peabody Hall to the library, a distance of about 300 yards.

He entered the library while two U.S. Marshals in civilian clothes loitered unobtrusively in the hall. One was Chief Marshal James P. McShane.

Meredith first was introduced to an assistant librarian who showed him the card file. She was courteous but unsmiling.

After looking at the file, he went into two reading rooms.

Then, he was escorted to the basement where there is another large reading room. Two women librarians there took him around. Again, there were courteous but unsmiling.

While he was in the room, a white student entered. As soon as he saw Meredith, he left.

Another student came out of a small reading room where smoking is permitted.

He spoke to U.S. Marshal Albert Taylor, of Chula Vista, Calif.

"Tell him he can study in here if he wants to smoke," he said.

One youth, seeing Meredith examining a card file, called to another. "Come here and look at this," he said.

The second youth, seeing Meredith, said, "Well, I'll be damned."

Another student watching Meredith walk past murmured, "just like a fraternity brother."

[fol. 1966] Some of these in the library stared straight ahead. The expressions of others plainly registered dismay.

During the day, Meredith attended four classes and walked into each with his guards lagging about 20 to 30 feet away.

Encouraged by the relatively quiet reception during the morning, officials decided Meredith could walk from his final afternoon class to the library in the same manner.

It's a distance of about 300 yards.

Watchful Marshals, apparently sensing growing hostility, waved Meredith to a car before he had covered a third of the way. The move came after a pretty co-ed among the students exclaimed, "Why doesn't somebody kill him."

Meredith was driven to the library and entered through a side entrance.

RK629PCS

A112NU

MEREDITH—LEGISLATURE

BY JIM SAGGUS

Jackson, Miss., Oct. 4 (AP)—Sarcasm flooded the chamber of the House of Representatives today after it was announced that the University of Mississippi homecoming football game against Houston would be played in Jackson Saturday.

"I understand Bobby Kennedy (Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy) will referee the game," Rep. Russell Davis of Hinds County said on the floor.

"I hope he will come down," Rep. Thompson McClellan of Clay replied.

"If he does referee the game," speaker Walter Sillers of Bolivar added, "Ole Miss is beaten before it starts."

Gov. Ross Barnett announced today the game had been shifted from the Oxford campus to Jackson in the wake of desegregation violence at Oxford.

SILLERS NOTEDLV

(MORE)

WX RZ836PED

[fol. 1967]

A117NU

Jackson, Miss.—1st add Meredith-Legislature (A112NU) X X X at Oxford.

Sillers noted that Federal Marshals, Armed Forces and the Justice Department were all involved in tight controls imposed on the campus and asked "Which has the authority to let them play."

A voice in the back yelled "Bobby."

Rep. Jesse Chaffin of Prentiss asked, "I wonder if the NAACP has given its approval?"

Sillers responded, "They have to get permission from lawyer Motley to have the game."

Attorney for Negro James H. Meredith in his successful University desegration suit was Constance Baker Motley, a Negro New York Attorney for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

RK647PCS NM

A111NU

INSERT (120)

Oxford, Miss., NL Meredith roundup, A25NU, insert after 3rd graf: "The Government X X X homecoming events."

Gov. Ross Barnett guaranteed transportation to Jackson for all students who wanted to see the game. He said the money would not come from the State treasury but would be provided from private sources.

Meanwhile the Justice Department disclosed a total of 166 Marshals, including specially deputized border patrolmen and Bureau of Prison personnel, were wounded during the rioting at Oxford. The force of 358 Marshals suffered 39 per cent casualties. Including 29 cases of gunshot wounds and some acid burns, the Department said.

The Department said eight Deputy Marshals were hurt at the campus riots before tear gas was used against demonstrators.

Meredith paid his first visit to the University library today and checked out a book without incident. Two Marshals remained in the hall.

As the X X X 4th graf.

RK634PCS

[fol. 1968] A147NU

INSERT

OXFORD, Miss.—NL Meredith roundup, A25NU, insert after 4th graf: "Gov. Ross x x x private sources."

At Washington, the Army said it will release some 3,500 Mississippi National Guardsmen from federal service at midnight tomorrow. They were called into active service following Sunday's campus riots.

The remaining 4,500 guardsmen were being authorized to return to their homes and jobs—without change in their status on active federal duty, the Army said. Personnel in major Army units in the Oxford area are not affected by the release order.

Meanwhile, the x x x 5th graf.

AS821PCS NM

A161

CORRECTION

OXFORD, Miss., NL Meredith roundup, A25NU, read in 7th graf: "Meanwhile, the x x x Department said."

"x x x the force of 538 Marshals suffered 30 per cent x x x" (correcting figure and percentage)

THE AP

—DASH—

CORRECTION

OXFORD, Miss., with Meredith, A107NU, read in 2nd graf: x x x "and deputy x x x were wounded."

"x x x suffered 30 per cent casualties x x x" (correcting percentage).

THE AP

AS917PCS

[fol. 1969] S42NU

WITH MEREDITH (120)

OXFORD, Miss., Sept. 4 (AP)—Army ROTC students in civilian clothes, saying they volunteered, today began a sweeping cleanup of the University of Mississippi campus.

The students, using brooms and burlap sacks, went after every scrap on the beautiful tree-lined campus where Sunday night's riots killed two and injured 75 persons. They collected tear gas shells, broken glass, sticks, rocks, bricks—even cigaret butts.

"When we're finished," one said, "there won't be a scrap left."

But, there will remain some evidence of the bloody rioting—the bullet marks on the Lyceum building and angry black burns in the green campus grass where the teargas shells exploded.

Some ashes from six burned vehicles remain on the winding blacktop road encircling the area.

AS551PCS

A176NU (AX FW)

INSERT

OXFORD, Miss.—Night lead Meredith roundup (A25 NU), previously inserted in A111NU, insert following after

9th graf (in insert A111NU), "Meredith paid x x x the Hall."

Meredith also ate his first meal in the university cafeteria tonight. Accompanied by three U.S. Marshals, he went through the serving line shortly before 7 P.M.

Some 150 students were in the cafeteria. Four girls two tables away got up and left, apparently without finishing their meals.

Meredith drank a glass of milk and toyed with his meat and three vegetables.

As he left, a small crowd of students jeered and cursed as Meredith and the Marshals got into a car and drove off.

As the x x x etc 10th graf, A25-111NU

HM1054PCS NM

[fol. 1970] PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT 9

Thursday, October 4, 1962

DAY RECORD

[fol. 1971] A2NU (INSERT AND LD RDP)
2ND LEAD MEREDITH ROUNDUP (250-UP)

By Van Savell

OXFORD, Miss., Oct. 4 (AP)—The Defense Department today forced the University of Mississippi to cancel its formal homecoming festivities, and transfer Saturday's football game away from the troubled campus. The game will be played in the state capital of Jackson, 170 miles away.

The ultimatum resulted from official fears that an influx of 30,000 football fans might spark new disorders over the forcible integration into Ole Miss of Negro James H. Meredith.

A traditional Friday night homecoming dance, a parade, outdoor pep rallies and bonfires—all were cancelled.

However, one sign of an increasing return toward normal on the campus was the announcement that more than 300 of 400 U.S. Marshals were being withdrawn from duty here. Meredith's escort of Marshals to take him to and from classes was cut in half, from six to three. There have been no disorders of significance since rioting claimed two lives last weekend.

Nevertheless, from Washington came an assessment of the situation on the campus as still "fairly tense." An official there could see no possibility of removing Meredith's escort entirely, and said he probably would need federal protection as long as he stays in the university—which may be 18 months or longer.

Mississippi University Chancellor J. D. Williams said of the decision to transfer the football game with the University of Houston:

[fol. 1972] "The Ole Miss campus is secure and a condition of near normalcy under the circumstances is rapidly returning. Less than 60 students have formally withdrawn and some of them may return by Monday . . . .

"We have been advised by Robert S. McNamara, Secretary of Defense, and Cyrus R. Vance, Secretary of the Army, from Washington, concerning our homecoming game—that it be played in Houston or Jackson, or that the game be cancelled."

One disgruntled student said of federal officials:

"If they want to tell us every little thing we can do, they ought to put us under martial law."

However, another student expressed relief over transfer of the game and added:

"We've had enough trouble here without inviting the Red-Necks in for a football game."

Meredith, 29, the first Negro knowingly admitted to the university in its history, had already planned to leave the campus for the weekend.

Meanwhile, Mississippi Gov. Ross Barnett and a group of Oxford clergymen made separate pleas for obedience to law and order in the integration crisis.

Barnett, who x x x 10th graf original roundup A8.

AS1114ACS

[fol. 1973] A8NU (BJT)

PMS BUDGET

MEREDITH ROUNDUP (700)

BY VAN SAVELL

Oxford, Miss., Oct. 4 (AP)—Gov. Ross Barnett of Mississippi and Oxford clergymen made separate pleas today for obedience to law and order as Federal marshals grimly predicted new incidents at the University of Mississippi.

The fear of new violence in an area where two men died hinges around the football game Saturday between Ole Miss and the University of Houston. About 30,000 are expected for the game, the focal point of homecoming celebrations.

James H. Meredith, the first Negro knowingly admitted to Ole Miss, is not expected to be in Oxford this weekend. The 29-year-old Meredith, officials said, has plans which will take him off the campus.

University officials insisted the game was on.

Justice Department officials were not so definite.

Edwin Guthman, the Justice Department's top agent on the scene, took this view:

"We realize how important this weekend is to the college and to the alumni. On the other hand, we don't want any more riots or violence. We must make an assessment. There has been a major disturbance here, two people killed, and numerous others injured."

Guthman conferred at McClean, Va., with Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy last night. Guthman said the game can be shifted to another site, "if the facts warrant it in the judgment of the military and the Department of Justice."

Guthman said the Attorney General wanted a full run-down on the Oxford situation, including last Sunday JS RI

Oxford situation, including last Sunday's riots.

Barnett, who defied the Federal court order to admit Meredith, appeared on a Jackson television station and urged Mississippians to "be calm, be patient.

"Let's by all means avoid violence. Let's maintain law and order."

[fol. 1974] The clergy of Oxford, all but one denomination, asked the people for a "time of repentance Sunday." A joint statement asked for "acceptance of the actions of the court and whole-hearted compliance with these as individuals and as a state."

—The military garrison, which at one time totaled 12,000, reduced its strength by nearly 4,000 yesterday. But the redeployed troops were not beyond recallable distance.

In other developments:

—Sheriff Sol Cox at Holly Springs, Miss., said he stopped a convoy of five car loads of U.S. Marshals and said four of them were "intoxicated, extremely arrogant and resisted arrest."

A9NU

Chief U.S. Marshal James McShane at Oxford said he knew nothing of the incident. And in Washington, a Justice Department spokesman said an investigation "shows that no one in these cars haem been drinking." The spokesman said the cars were stopped and searched without authorization.

—A group of Ole Miss professors said they had evidence that efforts to place the blame for last weekend's rioting on Federal Marshals was unfair and almost completely false. The University's chapter of the American Association of University Professors approved a resolution calling for an investigation by proper authorities.

—Alfanette Bracy, a 21-year-old Negro student at Jackson State (Negro) College, told newsmen she had received "just a receipt" in answer to her application for a transfer to Ole Miss. She said she applied last July.

[fol. 1975] —The FBI said it would make ballistics and other tests to try and solve the slaying of French newsman Paul Guihard, 30, and Ray Gunter, 23-year-old Oxford handyman. Both were killed by gunfire last Sunday night on the college campus.

—The four Mississippi National Guard units called into active service during the peak of the University crisis drew "the highest praise" from Army Secretary Cyrus R. Vance. He said he considered the Mississippians' actions as exemplifying "the finest soldierly qualities of discipline, devotion to duty and royalty."

—The Orlando, Fla., Sentinal said last night it had learned from "a source close to the White House" that Meredith would transfer to the University of Miami. The newspaper did not amplify the report. Miami has been desegregated for some time.

The Justice Department said there was "absolutely nothing" to the report Meredith planned a transfer.

In his 5-minute TV appearance, Gov. Barnett said "deep anger and resentment" still dwelt among Mississippians since troops were called in.

"I am informed that citizens have been detained and pushed around at the point of a bayonet and searched without a warrant," the 64-year-old Governor said. "This will in no way weaken our courage or deter our cause."

He urged the people to leave the matter to the state and local government.

UM110ACS NM BJT

[fol. 1976] A57 (WX FW)

MARSHALS (190)

Holly Springs, Miss., Oct. 4 (AP)—A convoy of five car loads of U.S. Marshals was stopped here last night after Sheriff Sol Cox said he received an anonymous call from Memphis "that a group of drunken Marshals were headed toward Oxford."

Cox said four of the occupants, none of whom was driving, were "intoxicated, extremely arrogant and resisted arrest." He said he took a quart of wine from one of the four.

The sheriff identified the four as border patrolmen deputized as Marshals. He said all four were armed.

In Washington, Edwin O. Guthman, Justice Department Public Information Officer, said "Our investigation shows that no one in these cars had been drinking."

"If there was someone intoxicated," the sheriff should have made an arrest," Guthman said.

Cox said he turned the four over to the officer in charge of the convoy after notifying Tycer Young, Chief Deputy in charge of U.S. Marshals at Oxford, site of the University of Mississippi.

Guthman said the Marshals and border patrolmen were returning from Memphis with five automobiles which had been repaired after Sunday night's rioting.

"They were stopped and searched without authorization," Guthman said.

HL620AED

[fol. 1977] A142NU

URGENT

FIRST LEAD MEREDITH—FOOTBALL (A135NU)

Oxford, Miss., Oct. 4 (AP)—The University of Mississippi today skirted the possibility of trouble at Saturday's homecoming football game with Houston by switching the game site to Jackson.

The announcement came from the University Athletic Department but Assistant U.S. Atty. Gen. Nicholas Katzenback said he believed the decision was made by the Department of Defense.

The switch came several hours after Federal Marshals had grimly predicted incidents at the game in the wake of the University's admitting a Negro student. Riots swept across the Oxford campus last weekend and two men died from gunshot wounds.

Jackson's new Municipal Stadium will host the game at 2 P.M. (CST), and is expected to attract about 30,000 fans.

A143NU

Mississippi Gov. Ross Barnett, who defied the Federal Court order to admit James H. Meredith, a 29-year-old Negro from Kosciusko, Miss., offered free transportation for the game to all Mississippi students. Jackson is about 170 miles south of Oxford.

The swap brought this comment from Ole Miss halfback Louis Guy:

"I wish they'd make up their mind once and for all. We'll probably dress out in Jackson Saturday and they'll tell us the game is set for Memphis."

A144NU

Today's announcement came after a conference in McClean, Va., last night between Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy and Justice Department Public Information Officer Edwin Guthman. Guthman has been in Oxford several days and said while the Justice Department did not want to interfere with the game, "We don't want any more riots or violence."

Guthman said X X X 9th Graf Meredith roundup (A8NU).

UM943ACS NM

[fol. 1978]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT 10

B1XF

URGENT

2nd LEAD WALKER (200)

Oxford, Miss., Nov. 21 (AP)—Former Army Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker today testified he felt he did not receive fair treatment during service with the U.S. Army.

Walker resigned from the Army and refused retirement pay when he was relieved of command of the 24th Division in Germany. His testimony came on the second day of a hearing in which he seeks to erase from court record a mental examination requested by the Government.

The text wa ordered in connection with Federal charges of seditious conspiracy and inciting insurrection filed after rioting which killed two men on the University of Mississippi campus following the arrival of Negro James H. Meredith.

Walker said that he was relieved of command without investigation after a brush with the Army newspaper "Overseas Weekly." Atty. Clyde J. Watts of Oklahoma City, Okla., described the paper as a "Scandal Sheet."

Walker said the Overseas Weekly had quoted him falsely as having described former President Harry S. Truman and others as Communists.

Walker also described details of his arrest on Oct. 1, the day after the campus riot. He said he was confident that he would have made $100,000 but was flown to a Federal Prison Hospital in Springfield, Mo., in a border patrol plane.

The questioning, conducted by Watts, made no reference to his activities on the Ole Miss campus.

Dr. Manfred S. Guttmacher of Baltimore, one of the nation's best psychiatrists, said his studey of WXX documents, newspaper clippings and medical records of Walker indicated that he had shown evidence of grandiosity, and defective judgment.

Referring to a press conference held by Walker in Dallas, Tex., last Sept. 27, Dr. Guttmacher said, "I felt that Mr. Walker's replies were unusually slow and there seemed to be some confusion as to the meaning of the questions.

"There was the element of grandiosity in 'There are thousands going to Mississippi, not only because of my interest.'"

Dr. Guttmacher said he felt Walker had shown defective judgment in blacklisting certain books from camp libraries when he had not read the books.

After brief statements by Robert Morris of Dallas, another Walker attorney, the hearing recessed until 2:30 P.M. (CST).

(PICKUP AVBL COPY)

LM/VHS

[fol. 1979] NU

Upcoming first take on Walker-McShane. Still unable find D2JX and no prospects

XF

LM1122PCS B N

(Advance for PMS of Thursday, November 22)

WALKER (RPP UP)
WALKER (500)

(ADVANCE) . . . Oxford, Miss., Nov 22—(AP—Former Army Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker is competent to stand trial "on such criminal charges as may be presented," U. S. Dist. Judge Claude Clayton ruled late yesterday.

The ruling ended a two-day hearing to determine whether there was reasonable cause of was reasonable cause for a mental examination of the 53-year-old Walker.

The two main issues were a defense motion to erase from Walker's record an examination ordered by the court after his arrest here Oct. 1 and a Government motion opposing such an elimination.

Judge Clayton studied the evidence during a brief recess and then (1) overruled the defense motion, (2) said he found that "reasonable cause does exist for psychiatric examination" and (3) said he was willing to accept the report on the mental test which had already been made.

Then court recessed again while Government and defense attorneys conferred. Then they said they were willing to accept the report of the examination mde Nov. 8-10 by Dr. Robert L. Stubblefield, Professor at the Southwestern Medical School at Dallas, Tex.

[fol. 1980] B16XF (CO)

When the hearing resumed a few minutes later, Judge Clayton announced the report had been opened and read for the first time.

"It was essentially negative," the judge said of the Stubblefield Report. "No opinion was expressed. It did not say whether he was sane or insane".
whether he was sane or insane."

However, the judge added tht from his observation of Walker's behavior while on the witness stand he had he had "found that this man is competent" to aid in his defense in such criminal charges as may be presented.

"This, so far as I am concerned, brings to an end this hearing."

Walker was arrested on charges of seditious conspiracy and inciting insurrection in connection with the rioting in which two men died and scores were injured on the University of Mississippi campus AFE of Mississippi campus on Sept. 30 after Negro James H. Meredith arrived.

While the Walker hearing was nearing an end, Chief U. S.

Marshal James P. McShane of Washington surrendered to LA Marshal James P. McShane of Washington surrendered and was arrested on charges of inciting a riot and breach of the peace during the Ole Miss rioting. He turned himself in to Sheriff Joe Ford of Lafayette County and then was held in custody in the Federal Courthouse for three hours.

[fol. 1981] B17XF

Judge Clayton released McShane on a writ of habeas corpus in which the Department of Justice claimed he had acted as a Federal Official. He will be given a hearing in late January.

The Lafayette County Grand Jury last Friday indicted McShane and another person who has not been identified other than being a non-resident of Mississippi.

Clyde J. Watts of Oklahoma City, Oklan one of Walker's four attorneys said Judge Clayton's decision would be appealed—assuming that it can be appealed—on grounds that Walker's constitutional rights had been violated.

Wakjer saud after TGE G

Wakjer saud after TGE GEARURG

Walker said after the hearing he feld he had been subjected to a "great injustice." In an interview taped for television broadcast he added that he felt that he now had a criminal record because of his stay for a few days in the U. S. Medical Center at Springfield, Mo.

In a summation of the issues, Judge Clayton told the court that the legality of Walker's arrest was not before the court at this time.

[fol. 1982]

"If and when an indictment is returned stemming from the charges," the judge said, "that will be the time and place for the question to be SXXX the question to be explored."

Walter's attorneys had contended that the examination was illegally ordered because Walker had not been faced with a bill of information nor had he been indicted by a Federa Grand Jury.

Because there are no facilities to house Federal prisoners in Oxford, Walker was foxx flown in a border patrol XXXXX plane to Springfield on Oct. 2. He was rleased on Oct. 6 after making bond of $50,000—half the amount originally set.

MORE

LM1139PCS D NM NOH

B18XF

OXFORD, MISS

B18XF

(380)

OXFORD, MISS—FIRST ADD WALKER (B14.:1 C1

B18XF

(380)

Oxford, Miss-First add Walker (B14 CQ-17XF) X X X originally set.

When Judge Clayton said he had decided that Walker needed a mental examination, he had been "especially impressed with the testimony" of Dr. Manfred S. Guttmacher, Baltimore, Md., psychiatrist who was the fourth and final government witness.

"To my mind," the judge continued, "he impressed me as being highly intelligent, exceptionally objective, extremely cooperative, a man obviously greatly experienced in the fields with which we are concerned."

Judge Clayton also said he knew more of Walker's career as a soldier and officer than had been presented in evidence.

"I have long admired his service in that capacity," the judge continued. "I have the greatest respect—that, too, goes outside the record."

Dr. Guttmacher, whose testimony opened the final days, said that on the basis of evidence supplied him by the government he had detected gradiosity, confusion and defective judgment on Walker's part.

[fol. 1983]

"There is a possibility that [illegible] has been a deterioration in the mental processes of General Walker in the last year or two," he said.

He repeatedly said he believed a full mental test was needed. At one point he said there is "sufficient smoke to see if there is any fire". Later he said "There are suspicions to warrant further exploration."

Walker was questioned only by his attorneys. He told of arriving in Oxford and details surrounding his arrest and overseas service when he was Commander of the 24th Division in Germany.

He was reliv

He was relieved of the post and reprimancded for p

He was relieved of the post and reprimanded for political indoctrination of troops. Later he resigned from the army.

".878 586)M

"Did you come into contact with a scandal sheet known as the Overseas Weekly," he was asked.

Walker said he had. He described it as a scurrilous publication.

B19XF

In reply to another question, Walker said he had been relieved of his command without an investigation, that he had not—as had been alleged—described President Harry S. Truman or anyone else as a communist.

No mention was made of details of the Ole Miss rioting, but Walker said the charges against him "Are for forcibax Walker said the charges agiinst him "Are for forcible assault, resistance, intimidation, impeding and interfering with Marshals in performance in their duties, insurrection and seditious conspiracy."

LM1230ACS B MN

[fol. 1984]

SHREVEPORT

NY CALLS YOUR ATTN TO A184, INSERT SARK SPOTLIGHTER, U ASKED.

NU

NOV 22 UT1232ACS BC

LO UT

NU

HOW MUCH MOE

NU

HOW MUCH MORE WALKER YOU WANT;?

XF

LM1233ACS B NM

XF

[Illegible] ENUF THANKS

NU

[fol. 1985] B1.1JA

(FLYING FARMER)

At dawn skies will be clear to scattered above 10,000 feet with unlimited visibility.

Surface winds northwest 7-14 mph strongest over northern portion of the mid-South.

JHALL834PCS 11/21/62

BI BA

BATON ROUGE, Nov. 20 (AP)—Rupert Malta filed suit in U. S. District Court Wed. asking for $108,680 for injuries he claimed he received in a house explosion last April.

Rupert named a construction and utilities company and the insurors of the construction firm as defendants.

Malta charged negligence on the part of the construction company for "in some manner disturbing high pressure lines causing the lines to rupture and escape gas into the home of Marie Heatly."

The suit CC TAINL 7A

INL

The suit claims "While Malta was staying in th Heatly house wth the permission of the owner, he investigated a noise, and while doing so, was blown from thehouse in an explosion which blew out the wall of th bathroom.

MMalta was taken to Charity Hopx x x Hsx x x Hspital F with burns over 80 per cent of T his body, thesuit contends.

EM835 PCS

DM

[fol. 1986] B2BA

BATON ROUGE, Nov. 20 (AP)—Dist. Judge Fred S. Leblanc administered a five-year sentence to Dr. Malcom Gray Pierson Wed. on condition the physician enter a hospital for treatment.

The 38-year-old doctor pleaded guilty to being a drug addict.

Pierson was arrested earlier in the week on 125 counts of illegally obtaining narcotics.

EM906 PCS

B14XF

OXFORD, MISS—NIGHT LEAD WALKER INSERT WHERE APPLICABLE

Commenting on the hearing, Walker said tonight in an interview taped for television broadcast that he feld "xxx felt "a great injustice" had been done to him.

He also said he had been harassed by federal psychiatrists xxxxxxxxxx

Walker

xxx psychiatrists.

Walker said he had been given a criminal record through his stay in the federal instituion at Springfield, Mo.

LM905PCS

[fol. 1987] NU

Suggest Dallas might want following on CCC re Walker report

XF

LM710PCS B

BZ

B7XFV

CF

YR B6XF, what NY is asking are quotes re the Truman-Communist comments. AVBL?

NU

NOV 21 RT 712PCS B NM C

NU

Re YR 712PCS only reference find is that Walker was asked if he had described Truman and any others as Communists.

"I had not mentioned President Truman or called anyone a Communist," Walker replied

(End of all reference to Truman)

XF

LM713PCS D

[fol. 1988] B7XF

WITH

WALK

ER (1,200)

OXFORD, Miss., Nov. 21 (AP)—Following is the psychiatric report of Dr. Robert L. Stubblefield, Professor and Chairman of the Department of Psychiatry of the Southwestern Medical Schoolsxx School, Dallas, Tex., on Edwin A. Walker and entered today at a federal hearing for the former Army major general:

PSYCHIATRIC REPORT

EDWIN A. WALKER

This report is written to inform you on the psychiatric evaluation of Edwin A. Walker conducted pursuant to order No. W-C-29-62. After a conference which was attended by Mr. Walker' attorneys (MMr. Watts, Mr. Matthews, Mr. Morris) and Professor Charles Webster and myself, I requested that Mr. Walker appear for the psychiatric evaluation. My purpose was to obtain material which would aid you in your decision about his competence to stand trial in your court. You wanted material in order to deal with three questions: (1) Whether or not the defendant is presently insane, (2) whether or not the defendant is sufficiently competent to uncder stand the the defendant is sufficiently competent to understand the KLLLEGT allegations pending against him, as shown by the complaint now pending against him in the Northern District of Mississippi, and (3) whether or not the defendant is sufficiently competent to properly assist in his own defense.

Mr. Walker pe

[fol. 1989] Mr. Walker presented himself to me on Thursday, November 8, 1962 at 2:00 P. M. After a 1½ hour psychiatric interview, I recommended that he enter the psychiatric ward at Parkland Memorial Hospital as an inpatient for further observation and study. He was admitted at 4:00 P. M. and was cooperative throughout the examinations and procedures. He was released on a pass on his 53rd birthday on Saturday morning. He returned in the evening and was tentatively discharged from the hospital on November 10, 1962 at 10:00 P. M.

B8XF

Summary of findings is as follows:

1. Physical health—essentially normal.

   A. Physical examination—no abnormal findings except a slight deafness in the right ear and marked astigmatism, which is corrected by glasses (examination by A. W. Deloach, M. D., a member of my staff)

   B. Laboratory examinations—normal ranges for blood and urine studies

   C. X-rays of skull—normal

   D. Electrocardiogram—normal

2. Additional special procedures

   A. Electroencephalogram—normal

   B. Urine studies—no evidence of current use of tranquilizing drugs

3. Psychological tests—the report by Irwin Jay Knopf, Ph. D., a diplomate of the American Board of Examiners in professional psychology, and a member of my staff, states that Mr. Walker is functioning currently at the superior level of intelligence. On the Wechsler adult intelligence scale his reasoning, judgment, vocabulary, fund of information, and organizational ability were all above average for his age group.

4. Psychiatric interviews were conducted on:

A. Thursday, November 8, 1962 2:00 P. M.

B. Friday, November 9, 1962 2:00 P. M.

C. Saturday, November 10, 1962 10:00 A. M.

D. Saturday, November 10, 1962 8:00 P. M.

(Jointly with Andrew Watson, M. D., University of Michigan School of Medicine and School of Law)

[fol. 1990]

B9XF

IMPRESSIONS:

Mr. Edwin A. Walker is a 53 yaer old single, white male, who is alert, friendly, and cooperative. He was born at Center Point, Texas and was reared on his parents' far. He received his education in the local grammar school, attended Schreiner Military Institute. Upon completion of high school, he entered the Military Academy at West Point in 1927, and graduated in 1931. He has had a long and distinguished military career, and has received additional education and training in the Services Special War College. He participated in the Kiska, the Italian, the Southern France invasions of World War II, in the Korean War, in the Little Rock crisis and the German occupation. He resigned from the Army and refused his retirement privileges in order to be free to express his opinions about certain governmental policies re the procedures for indoctrination of troops concerning communism.

The following elicited replies point out the awareness of Mr. Walker concerning the nature and the gravity of the charges against him.

When I read the specific charges which were presented in the northern district of Mississippi Federal Court, Mr. Walker replied:

1) "That means forcibly assaulting, resisting, and impeding the United States Government, which means you forcibly intend to stop them and did use force to stop them. I feel I can relate the events in a precise way."

2) "It means you inspire others and make an effort to overthrow the government."

3) "It means that you join with others to conspire against the authority of the U. S. Government and attempt to delay and prevent their action. These are severe charges and they carry a severe penalty with them."

[fol. 1991]

B10XF

After discussion with my counsel, I directed various questions to Mr. Walker concerning the nature of the procdsses of criminal trial. In my opinion, he revealed his awareness in his discussion of the procesures in a military investigation which occurred in Germany.

"When a soldier committed an act against another soldier, y role was to notify the civilian authorities, our own military police, the judge advocate, and the investigating tea. Evidence was gathered and turned over to the civilian authorities if that was indicated by the nature of the crime." Mr. Walker continued and described in detail and correctly the usual procedures of a military court.

The following factual material would indicate that Mr. Walker has an intact, recent, and remote memory system. His specific responses to questions were satisfactory in many AE

SPC

Specific responses to questions were satisfactory in many areas, for example:

1. Events in the Italian Campaign.

2. Events in the Korean War.

3. Ability to calculate, recall numbers, knowledge of current information.

4. Performance in the intelligence tests.

[fol. 1992]

B11B

B11XF

Mr. Walker has led an active life physically; currently, he states he eats well, sleeps well, and exercises moderately. He denies specific symptoms, hallucinations, delusions, addiction to drugs or alcohol, use of tranquilizing drugs. There is no clinical or laboratory evidence which would indicate any physical or toxic condition which would affect adversely his ability to perceive his environment, to evaluate his environment, and to develop effective and appropriate actions in dealing with problems.

In the psychiatric examinations, no effort was made to elaborate a fully detailed picture of (U/L) why (U/L) Mr. Walker functions in his present state, nor whether or not there has been any particular change in his mode of psychological operation, since this was not judged by my staff and me to be relevant to the questions of his (U/L) present (U/L) mental operations. Rather we set out to evaluate (U/L) how (U/L) he thinks, regulates, executes, and deals with his present thoughts, values, and impulses, especially as they relate to the present charges. We felt able to arrive at some very specific answers to these questions, and fond no difficulty in eliciting the full cooperation and assistance of Mr. Walker during the examination.

[fol. 1993]

B12XF

All psychiatric and psychological tests indicate that Mr. Walker appears to be able to deal freely and accurately with his recollections of the incidents leading up to his arrest and present charges. e can discuss them accurately, and without distortion noticeable to the examiners. He was able to describe fully his opinions on the charges, what they meant, what kinds of defensive tactics he intends to employ, how his lawyers are working with him and the unfolding of the events which led to the present charges. However, in regard to the questions of the (U/L) reasons (U/L) for his involvement, he did no feel that whether or not there were emotional forces of which he is not fully aware (and that might possibly relate to the legal question of specific intent and motivation) were properly a part of this report. It is our impression that the court in this case at this time is (U/L) not (U/L) concerned about Mr. Walker's ability to understand fully, the more complex and subtle aspects of his motivation in regard to the acts for which he is charge. If it were, and if we were asked to evaluate these kinds of questions, it would be necessary to conduct a much more penetrating exploration of Mr. Walker's psychological operations.

[fol. 1994]

B13XF

It may be that some of Mr. Walker's attitudes and feelings about specific events in Mississippi are such that if he were pressed hard to deal with them (as for example in a cross-examination) this might have a definite effect on his composure on the stand. Since we assume that the court does not deal with this possibility in its standard of competence, we have therefore made no effort to explore in detail their nature or possibility.

/s/ Robert L. Stubblefield
Robert L. Stubblefield, M. D.
Professor and Chairman
Department of Psychiatry
Southwestern Medical School

LM803PCS

[fol. 1995] B6XF

(WALKER QUOTES ASKD)

Oxford, Miss.—insert night lead x x x Walker x x x

After Walker was put on the stand he went through the formalities of giving his name, age and hometown. Then he spoke in short sentences when asked to tell of his arrival in x x x Oxford last September.

"Upon arriving went one-quarter mile for breakfast," he began. There one hour. Then went to the Ole Miss school grounds and made a circle. Came to town of Oxford. Came to Chourthouse and

A circle. Came to town of Oxford. Came to Courthouse and conversed with Sheriff (Joe) Ford. Went to lunch at Mansion Cafe. It was very late. Had many conferences with press."

The testimony skipped over the time in which the Sept. 30 rioting took place. Walker resumed the account of his activities with the details of his arrest the following day and his trip to the airport to be taken to a fedeaxx federal institution in Springfield, Mo. There were no facilities here to house federal prisoners.

"At the door of the plane I asked where I was to be taken," Walker recalled. "As I mounted the first step I heard a man say 'Springfield.'

"'The plane took off and when we were in the air I asked: 'Illinois?'

"We are going to Springfield, Mo.," he sadxx said someone replied.

Upon arriving at Springfield he said that he was kept as a prisoner in the maximum security house until Oct. 6 on that day his bond of $100,000 was cut to $50,PPP, he made bond and was released.

(END INSERT)

LM648PCS B NNM

[fol. 1996] D24DX

NIGHT LEAD TOLEDOBEND

Baton Rouge, Nov. 21 (AP)—The Sabine River Authority of Louisiana has accepted the low bid of English Electric Corp., Chairman Claude Kirkpatrick said Wednesday, to build twin hydraulic turbines in the Toledo Bend Dam Power Project.

The English firm's bid was approved at a meeting here Tuesday of the Louisiana Authority, Kirkpatrick said, and also has been accepted by the Sabine River Authority of Texas.

The Executive Committee of the Joint Sabine River Authority, he said, will accept the bid formally in Dallas Monday.

Kirkpatrick said the English firm's bid amounted to an overall savings of $383,000 over the next lowest bidder, Allis-Chalmers.

The English Electric base bid was $1,292,017, re-evaluated to $1,677,400. Five firms bid on the project for the $60 million dam on the Louisiana-Texas border. Kirkpatrick said each was evaluated a against a seven-point check list.

JO644PCS 11/21/62

[fol. 1997] B5XF

(NU-INSERT WHERE THEY WILL FIT:)

—0—

Oxford, Miss.—night lead Walker ( ) insert after GRAF

When the two-day hearing finally ended, Walker strode away unsmiling from the courthouse. A newsman who caught up with him asked Walker how he felt the hearing went.

"Fine, Z was Walker's only comment

—0—

Clyde Watts of Oklahoma City, Okla., one of Walker's four attorneys, said Judge DXX Clayton's decision would be appealed—"If it is appealable." Watts said he felt that Walker's constitutional FXX rights had been violated by the October order to undergo mental examination.

END INSERTS

LM612PCS B

XF

PLS GIVE GRAF EXPLAINING HABEAS CORPUS IN RELATION MCSHANE CASE.

NU

Nov. 21 RK622PCS BC

BINU

HOOFBEATS SELECTIONS—FOR THE FAIR GROUNDS . . .

1....Second Light, Sir Hawley, Tulsa Bee

2....LIL RI,

2....Lil Rix, Eight of Hearts, Coushatta Tribe.

3....Giovanni, Pici-A-A Toria, Bill Me.

4....Fleeting Toni, Dixieland King, Royal Woo.

5....Everett's Son, Be Bee Time, Midway Myorxx Mayor.

6....Air Stride, Missiixx Mission Missions, Elfin.

7....SE

7....Steve Valenti, Shoot Luke, Magic Realm.

8....Bull Story, Toxx Troa, Grand Wizard.

9....Blonde Ruler, Clergyman, Picmar.

BEST BET—AIR STRIDE (6).

RK624PCS NM

[fol. 1997a] CLERK'S NOTE:

Plaintiff's Exhibit 11—University of Mississippi Plot Plan appears in POCKET to Exhibit Volume.

FORT WORTH STAR-TELEGRAM

MORNING

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1962 • • • • • 82ND YEAR, NUMBER 240

40 Pages in 3 Sections

PRICE FIVE CENTS

were guarding against another attempt to enroll James Meredith, a Negro. U. S. marshals escorting Meredith were recalled 20 miles from Oxford.

BARNETT AT ROADBLOCK—After being in seclusion all day, Mississippi Gov. Ross Barnett arrives at a roadblock near university entrance Thursday night.

—Associated Press Wirephotos

BOBBY EXPLAINS ORDER—Attorney General Robert Kennedy, as he leaves Washington office, tells newsmen danger of bloodshed prompted postponement at Oxford.

Troops Called to Support US Marshals at Ole Miss

[fol. 1999]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT 14

A148NU

1ST LEAD WALKER (110)

Oxford, Miss., Nov. 21 (AP)—A pscychiatrist said today he considered that former army Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker had shown signs of grandiosity.

Dr. Manfred S. Guttmacher of Baltimore testified as a hearing resumed into the effort of Walker's attorneys to erase a Federal court order for a mental examination.

Dr. Guttmacher said his study of Walker's records also had disclosed confusion and examples of defective judgment.

"There is a possibility that there has been a deterioration in the mental processes of Gen. Walker in the last year or two," Dr. Guttmacher said.

Dr. Guttmacher said he felt that Walker, 53, needed a full examination for his own good.

Walker's attorneys, 2nd GRAF PRVS (A74AX).

RK1105ACS NM.

A149
A149WX

(120) INSERT

Washn—Kennedy-Housing (A13WX) Insert After 13th Graph "But Kennedy" X X X Anti-Bias Laws:

In a statement today, Leonard L. Frank, President of the National Association of Home Builders, said builders feel that "The health of the home building industry now may be sapped by the executive order."

Builders will do their best to fulfill their responsibilities under the order, he said, but the Federal Government also must use its full resources "to lessen the impact on our nation's economy."

Frank said the survey his organization made before the order "reflected the opinion of many builders throughout the country that such an order would cause a cutback in housing production, have an adverse effect on the entire economy, and consequently on jobs and incomes."

Americans for Democratic Action (ADA) applauded the order and said in a statement: "We call for its vigorous enforcement in the interest of an integrated America."

The White House Order etc. 14th Graph

JK1208PES

A150WK

OZONE STUDY (330)

Washington, Nov. 21 (AP)—The Air Force announced plans today for what it called the most thorough study of atmospheric ozone ever made.

The one-year research program, starting next January, will involve the launching of more than 700 balloons.

Simultaneously every Wednesday noon, Greenwich time, 11 stations will launch balloons carrying a new measuring device, called the Regener Ozonemeter, and radio telemetry equipment to send back the measurements.

The balloons will inflate to a diameter of 25 feet at their maximum altitude of 100,000 feet.

In addition, each station will conduct daily launches for a 15-day period next spring when ozone concentrations in the atmosphere are most intense.

Ozone is oxygen that has been electrically charged. Carrying the faint odor of chlorine, it is poisonous to human beings and can harm materials such as rubber if concentrated.

"Although ozone is a minor constituent of O

(MORE)

RK1211PES

[fol. 2000]

A64

PRECEDE KEY WEST ECONOMIC A25

Havana, Nov. 21 (AP)—The BUST HITS

A'64NU

URGENT

NIGHT LEAD WALKER

Oxford, Miss., Nov. 21 (AP)—U.S. District Judge Claude F. Clayton ruled today that a court order for a mental examination of former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker must stand.

He offered, however, to accept the results of a mental examination given Walker recently in Dallas, Tex.

(MORE)

RK420PCS NM

A65

PRECEDE KEY WEST ECONOMIC A25

Havana, Nov. 21 (AP)—The Government labeled as totally false today reports that Cuba had signed a new three-year economic aid treaty with the Soviet Union.

Responsible diplomatic sources said yesterday Soviet Deputy Premier Anastas I. Mikoyan and Ernesto (Che) Guevara, Cuba's Industries Minister, signed the agreement last week.

As broadcast on a television program, the communique said:

"The Revolutionary X X Fourth Graf Key West Dateline A25.

RK522PES

A66

NIGHT LEAD U.N.—CUBAN (220)

BY MILTON BESSER

United Nations, N.Y., Nov. 21 (AP)—The United States said today it will resume negotiations here soon with the Soviet Union on unresolved issues in the Cuban crisis.

These involve mainly arrangements for on-site inspection demanded by the United States as a guarantee against any new buildup of offensive weapons in Cuba.

U.S. Ambassador Adlai E. Stevenson said in a statement that there has been progress toward conclusion of negotiations with the Soviet Union, as President Kennedy noted yesterday.

"However," Stevenson added, "Other issues remain unsettled and negotiations will soon be resumed with the Soviet representatives.

"We hope they will proceed smoothly and that the matter can be concluded in the Security Council before long. Our next meeting with the Soviet representatives has yet been set."

Informed sources said they did not expect any new round of U.S.-Soviet negotiations before next week.

John J. McCloy, Special Adviser to Stevenson on Cuba and head of Kennedy's Coordinating Committee, is expected to remain in New York for the negotiations.

Vasily V. Kuznetsov, Soviet Deputy Foreign Minister, is here as Premier Khrushchev's Special Negotiator on Cuba. There was no word on the plans of Anastas I. Mikoyan, Soviet Deputy Premier who has been talking to Cuban Prime Minister Fidel Castro in Havana.

Castro is still objecting to on-site inspection and threatening to shoot down U.S. reconnaissance planes.

RK527PES

A67

Lille, France, Nov. 21 (AP)—Jacques Vasseur today left his mother's house in a suburb of Lille for the first time in 17 years.

Now 42 years old, Vasseur went into hiding at the end of World War II rather than face charges of collaboration with the enemy. He was condemned to death in abstentia.

From then until now Vasseur remained inside, hiding in the attic every time the doorbell rang.

But Monday Vasseur was too slow and he was spotted. Officers today returned with a warrant.

RK528PES

[fol. 2001] A71

WITH NL CUBANS-SABOTAGE

NEW YORK, Nov. 21 (AP)—The International Longshoremen's Association, AFL-CIO, appealed to President Kennedy today to tighten security on the nation's waterfronts against the possibility of sabotage.

Capt. William V. Bradley, longshoremen's president, told a news conference the recent arrest of pro-Castro Cubans here on sabotage conspiracy charges prompted his telegram to Kennedy.

The port of New York, he asserted, could be "put out of business" in less than 20 minutes by saboteurs.

The telegram included a warning that a Cuban saboteur could come to the United States and be working on the waterfront within a few days.

"Undoubtedly there are some working on our waterfronts at the present time," it said.

SF543PES

A72NU
(500)

OXFORD, Miss—1st add night lead Walker (A64NU) x x x in Dallas, Tex.

Clayton, recently named commander of the 31st National Guard Division of Mississippi and Alabama troops, expressed the "greatest respect" for Walker's military career.

But he added that the weight of the evidence led him to believe that "reasonable cause does exist for a psychiatric examination."

The ruling came at the end of a two-day hearing on Walker's motion to have the court's order for a mental test stricken from the record.

Shortly before the judge took the motion under consideration, Walker took the stand himself, answering questions put to him by his attorney.

He gave details of his arrest by federal troops on charges of seidtious conspiracy and inciting insurrection in the bloody, night-long desegregation riot on the University of Mississippi campus almost two months ago.

But neither he nor his attorney made any mention of his actions the night of the riot.

Walker also discussed his controversial reprimand and loss of command over a troop indoctrination program in Germany. He said the Army treated him unfairly, taking away his command of the 24th Division without investigating the circumstances. Later he resigned from the Army.

Wearing a dark grey suit and a white shirt, Walker spoke in slow, deliberate tones, clearly audible throughout the court room in this tiny north Mississippi town.

Earlier, a psychiatrist, Dr. Manfred S. Guttmacher of Baltimore, described Walker as showing signs of grandiosity, confusion and poor judgment.

Guttmacher said he based his remarks on a study of documents, newspaper clippings and medical records involving Walker.

A67

Lille, France, Nov. 21 (AP)—Jacques Vasseur today left his mother's house in a suburb of Lille for the first time in 17 years.

Now 42 years old, Vasseur went into hiding at the end of World War II rather than face charges of collaboration with the enemy. He was condemned to death in abstentia.

From then until now Vasseur remained inside, hiding in the attic every time the doorbell rang.

But Monday Vasseur was too slow and he was spotted. Officers today returned with a warrant.

RK528PES

[fol. 2001] A71

WITH NL CUBANS-SABOTAGE

NEW YORK, Nov. 21 (AP)—The International Longshoremen's Association, AFL-CIO, appealed to President Kennedy today to tighten security on the nation's waterfronts against the possibility of sabotage.

Capt. William V. Bradley, longshoremen's president, told a news conference the recent arrest of pro-Castro Cubans here on sabotage conspiracy charges prompted his telegram to Kennedy.

The port of New York, he asserted, could be "put out of business" in less than 20 minutes by saboteurs.

The telegram included a warning that a Cuban saboteur could come to the United States and be working on the waterfront within a few days.

"Undoubtedly there are some working on our waterfronts at the present time," it said.

SF543PES

A72NU
(500)

OXFORD, Miss—1st add night lead Walker (A64NU) x x x in Dallas, Tex.

Clayton, recently named commander of the 31st National Guard Division of Mississippi and Alabama troops, expressed the "greatest respect" for Walker's military career.

But he added that the weight of the evidence led him to believe that "reasonable cause does exist for a psychiatric examination."

The ruling came at the end of a two-day hearing on Walker's motion to have the court's order for a mental test stricken from the record.

Shortly before the judge took the motion under consideration, Walker took the stand himself, answering questions put to him by his attorney.

He gave details of his arrest by federal troops on charges of seidtious conspiracy and inciting insurrection in the bloody, night-long desegregation riot on the University of Mississippi campus almost two months ago.

But neither he nor his attorney made any mention of his actions the night of the riot.

Walker also discussed his controversial reprimand and loss of command over a troop indoctrination program in Germany. He said the Army treated him unfairly, taking away his command of the 24th Division without investigating the circumstances. Later he resigned from the Army.

Wearing a dark grey suit and a white shirt, Walker spoke in slow, deliberate tones, clearly audible throughout the court room in this tiny north Mississippi town.

Earlier, a psychiatrist, Dr. Manfred S. Guttmacher of Baltimore, described Walker as showing signs of grandiosity, confusion and poor judgment.

Guttmacher said he based his remarks on a study of documents, newspaper clippings and medical records involving Walker.

Referring to a news conference held by Walker in Dallas, Tex., last Sept. 27, Guttmacher said: "I felt that Mr. Walker's replies were unusually slow and there seemed to be some confusion as to the meaning of the questions."

In reference to one of Walker's remarks, Guttmacher said: "There was the element of grandiosity in 'there are thousands going to Mississippi, not only because of my interest.'"

Guttmacher sadded:

[fol. 2002] A73NU

Zthere is a possibility that there has been a deterioration in the mental processes of Gen. Walker in the last year or two."

Guttmacher added that his study of Walker's records led him to believe that Walker needed a full examination for his own good.

Walker, 53, faces charges of seditious conspiracy and inciting insurrection in connection with his actions in the riot that erupted on the Ole Miss campus after the arrival of Negro James H. Meredith the night of Sept. 30.

The riot killed two and left scores of students and federal Marshals injured.

Federal troops arrested Walker the next day. Federal authorities released him later on $50,000 bond with the stipulation that he undergo a mental examination.

Walker's attorneys contended the court order for a mental test violated his constitutional rights. They said no Grand Jury had indicted him, and no U.S. attorney had presented a bill of information when the court ordered the test.

Government attorneys countered that mental tests were legal when ordered after an arrest and before sentence is passed.

Meantime, Walker has undergone the mental test. Results of the test have not been revealed.

The Government contended that his motion to erase the court order was aimed primarily at giving the record the appearance that he submitted to the test voluntarily.

RKTT455PCS

A74

WIREPHOTO ADVISOREZIN

A74'NU

BULLETIN

OXFORD, Miss., Nov. 21 (AP)—Chief U.S. Marshal James D. McShane gave himself up for arrest here today on charges of inciting to riot and breach of the peace growing out of the University of Mississippi desegregation riots.

RK457PCS NM

AAO

A75CX

UNDATED THANKSGIVING DAY HOLIDAY DEATH LOG

By the Associated Press

6 P.M. EST, the log of deaths in traffic accidents, fires and from miscellaneous causes over the Thanksgiving Day weekend begins.

WZ457PCS NM

TN

A76WX

CORRECTION

WASHINGTON—NL Housing (A62WX) 2nd graf "From other quarters x x x demanding." Read it x x x Civil Rights groups have been demanding. (Inserting groups).

THE AP

PE558PES

A77

WIREPHOTO ADVISORY

Upcoming: three pictures on attempted rescue of sign worker electrocuted at Chicago installation.

AP-Nov. 21

JS558PES

A78KX (MINISTER AND MISSILE WARN)

(300) NIGHT LEAD (SEE WIREPHOTO WE1)

WICHITA, Kan., Nov. 21 (AP)—A married Baptist minister and a 16-year-old girl, missing from their homes in Tatum, Tex., since Nov. 2, were found today living together in Wichita.

The Rev. LeRoy (Caps. L, R) Daniels, 27, pastor of the Christal Farms Baptist Church in Tatum, was arrested on a Texas charge of contributing to the delinquency of a minor.

Flora Jean Cole, who had been the lead singer in his choir and an honor student in high school, was taken to a Home for Girls.

Daniels agreed to waive extradition to Texas. He declined comment but police quoted him as saying, when asked why he and Flora Jean had left Tatum: "It's rather obvious, isn't it?"

V Flora Jean is a brown-eyed blngfeet-2,awly 90 P

(MORE)

MU/RK502PCS

[fol. 2003] A79'NU

BULLETIN MATTER

OXFORD, Miss—1st lead McShane (A74NU) x x x riots.

District Attorney Jesse Yancy Jr. said McShane, who was indicted last Friday by a County Grand Jury, was expected to seek release on a writ of habeas corpus momentarily before U.S. District Judge Claude F. Clayton.

McShane was being held in the Federal Court Building here, Yancy said.

The District Attorney said McShane appeared unexpectedly after learning of the indictment.

RK503CS NM

A80NX

It?"

FIRST ADD NIGHT LEAD (A78KX) X X X ISN'T A80KX

(200) WICHITA, Kan.—1st add nite lead enamored couple (A73KX) xx it?"

Flora Jean is a brown-eyed blonde who stands 5-feet-2 and weighs only 90 pounds.

Police said that when they confronted her in a one-room basement apartment she shared with Daniels she readily agreed to go with them but said firmly:

"I do not want to go home. I won't stay home. I'll run off."

Police said Daniels had been married four months when he disappeared.

They said Flora Jean told them she and Daniels had seen each other secretly for some time. She said they decided to run away because they thought someone had been following them.

They left following a football game at which Flora Jean marched with her high school band.

The couple told officers they arrived in Wichita Nov. 3, stayed the first night in a motel and the next two nights with friends, whom they declined to identify. They moved into the apartment Nov. 6.

Daniels had been working at a liquor wholesale house, as an order-filling clerk, since Nov. 9.

At Tatum, Mrs. Roy Cole, the girl's mother, was quoted as saying the girl never had dated. Mrs. Cole said she had known of no association the girl had with the minister except through the choir.

VX508PCS

A81NU

URGENT

(150)

OXFORD, Miss—2nd add McShane (A74-79)NU) x x x the indictment.

The Lafayette County Grand Jury, following an investigation of the bloody desegregation riot on the Ole Miss campus the night of Sept. 30, returned two indictments in the case.

Under Mississippi law, the names of persons indicted, and the charges against them, cannot be made public until they are in custody.

McShane was in charge of a team of about 300 Federal Marshals accompanying Negro James H. Meredith onto the Ole Miss campus.

The Marshals, after taking Meredith to a dormitory, set up a circle of men, standing shoulder to shoulder, around the Lyceum Building, where the registrar's office is located.

A crowd gathered and violence broke out. During the night of rioting, two persons were killed and scores more—students, Marshals and others—were injured.

The next morning, as federal troops moved in to restore order, the university enrolled Meredith—the first of his race ever knowingly admitted in the 114-year history of the university.

RK512PCS NM

A82

A82KX

PEARL HARBOR, Hawaii, Nov. 21 (AP)—The Navy has warned mariners to keep out of a 22,500 square mile area of the Pacific south of Johnston Island, presumably because of practice firing of missiles.

The warning covered a period from midnight to 6 A.M. Hawaii time (5 A.M.-11 A.M. EST) today and tomorrow.

The notice was published by the Navy Oceanographic Office in Honolulu.

Spokesmen for the Pacific Missile Range Headquarters at Point Mugu, Calif., and at Kaneohe, Hawaii, declined comment.

VX514PCS

[fol. 2004] A96NU

URGENT

INSERT

OXFORD, Miss.—Night lead Walker (A64-72NU), insert after 2nd graf, he offered x x x Dallas, Tex.

Following a conference with attorneys, Clayton opened a copy of the report on Walker's mental test in Dallas.

He described the report as "essentially negative"—that is, it expressed no opinion on the sanity of Walker. Dr. Robert Stubblefield of Dallas examined Walker.

The judge then added that his personal opinion, after hearing Walker testify earlier today, was that Walker was competent to aid in his defense against federal charges filed against him in connection with his actions in the University of Mississippi desegregation riots.

Clayton, 3rd graf night lead (A64-79NU).

RK604PCS

A97NU

URGENT

FIRST LEAD MCSHANE

OXFORD, Miss., Nov. 21 (AP)—Chief U.S. Marshal James McShane surrendered today on an indictment that charged he incited the Sept. 30 desegregation riot at the University of Mississippi. He was released three hours later on a writ of habeas corpus.

U.S. Dist. Judge Claude F. Clayton released McShane after the Justice Department claimed he was "doing duties as a federal official" on the Ole Miss campus.

The burley, ex-New York policeman was indicted last Friday by a Lafayette County Grand Jury that investigated the campus riot that followed the arrival of Negro student James H. Meredith.

Dist. Atty. Jesse Yancy Jr. said after McShane's release that "The case now rests in the hands of the Federal Court. The Justice Department says he was doing his duty and can not be charged.

"However, the State contends McShane made unlawful acts and should be prosecuted in State Court."

Judge Clayton set a hearing for late January. Yancy said it would "probably last a week and bring out all the testimony of the normal trial.

McShane faces up to 10 years and a $500 fine if convicted on the State charges of inciting a riot and breach of the peace.

He was held in the Lafayette County Courthouse under custody of Sheriff Joe Fod during the three hours b Sheriff Joe Ford during the three hours before Judge Clayton released him.

The district x x x etc. 4th graf A74-79NU.

RK606PCS NM

A98

A98KX

CORRECTION

SAN FRANCISCO—Sino-Russian interpretive (A53-54), penultimate graf starting "Particularly from," etc., make second sentence read: The Chinese took Tibet in 1955 x x x (took instead invaded and 1955 inste 1950).

THE AP

VX609PCS

[fol. 2005]

A101WX

SUB

0

A101SX

(See wirephotos CX4, 5, 6)

MOUNT PROSPECT, Ill., Nov. 21 (AP)—George F. Tadin Jr., 26, of Chicago, was electrocuted Wednesday as he removed a 10-foot metal overhead sign at a hardware store in Mount Prospect.

Tadin's leg apparently came into contact with a metal wire carrying 7,200 volts. He was killed instantly.

Tadin's father, George Sr., waited on the sidewalk while Tadin worked 25 feet above him.

Both his father and Mount Prospect firemen tried to revive Tadin.

Dr. Michael Ruance, who pronounced Tadin dead, said the victim was burned badly around the face, neck and leg.

The Tadins operated a south suburban Chicago sign erecting firm. They were working on a sign at a Mount Prospect shopping development.

Mount Prospect is a northwest Chicago suburb.

EC627PCS NM

A102KX

A102NU

URGENT

(This second lead McShane combines the McShane-Walker developments for members desiring one story)

Second lead McShane

Oxford, Miss., Nov. 21 (AP)—Chief U.S. Marshal James McShane gave himself up to Mississippi authorities today on charges he incited the desegregation riot at the University of Mississippi Sept. 30.

The Justice Department obtained McShane's release three hours later on a writ of habeas corpus, claiming the charges against him resulted from his actions "Doing duties as a Federal official."

The Lafayette County Grand Jury indicted two persons last week in connection with the bloody riot that killed two and injured scores of students and Marshals.

McShane was in charge of Federal Marshals on the University campus the night of the riot.

Under Mississippi law, the names of persons indicted, and the charges against them, are held secret until they are taken into custody.

U. S. Dist. Judge Claude F. Clayton ordered McShane's release and set a hearing for late January.

At the same time McShane was entering the Sheriff's Office to give himself up, Clayton was winding up a hearing involving another of the major figures in the riot—former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker.

Clayton ruled that a court order for a mental test of Walker must stand.

Walker, facing charges of seditious conspiracy and inciting insurrection in connection with his actions the night of the riot, had asked the court to eliminate the order, contending it violated his constitutional rights.

A103NU

Clayton, in ruling that the order for a test must remain in effect, offered to accept the results of a mental examination taken by Walker at Dallas, Tex., earlier this month.

After opposing attorneys agreed, Clayton opened the report from Dr. Robert Stubblefield of Dallas, the Psychiatrist who examined Walker.

Clayton said the report expressed no definite opinion on the sanity of Walker.

The judge added, however, that he felt after hearing Walker testify earlier today that the former Major General was competent to aid in his defense against the Federal charges.

Walker himself testified near the end of the two-day hearing on his motion to strike the court order for a sanity test.

He made no mention of his actions the night of the riot.

He said he thought the army treated him unfairly during his military service, and relieved him of command of the 24th Division in Germany without investigation. The army relieved Walker of command during a controversy over troop indoctrination.

Walker also said he had been quoted falsely in reports saying he described former President Harry S. Truman and others as communists.

McShane, a burly ex-New York Policeman was indicted last Friday by a Lafayette County Grand Jury investigating the campus riot that followed the arrival of Negro James H. Meredith.

Dist. Atty., 4th graf first lead McShane (A97NU)

RT639PCS NM

[fol. 2006] A139

Boston, Nov. 21 (AP)—Republican Gov. John A. Volpe formally asked today for a recount of the Nov. 6 election in which he was defeated in the official tally by 3,091 votes.

Endicott Peabody, the Democrat who was victorious in the official tally, expressed confidence that the result would be unchanged "and I will be inaugurated on Jan. 3."

The recount is expected to start next Tuesday and take at least a week.

The official tally gave Peabody 1,051,653 and Volpe 1,048,562 votes.

LU942PES

ABLBUFFA

A139NU

URVNT

A140NU

URGENT

SECOND NIGHT LEAD WALKER (A64-72NU)

Oxford, Miss., Nov. 21 (AP)—U.S. Dist. Judge Claude F. Clayton ruled today that former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker was mentally competent to stand trial and aid in his defense on Federal charges of insurrection.

No trial date was set for Walker, arrested Oct. 1 after a night of rioting at the University of Mississippi following the arrival of James H. Meredith, the school's first known Negro student.

Judge Clayton accepted a Dallas, Tex., mental test given Walker earlier this month, after attorneys for both Walker and the Federal Government agreed that this test could be used.

A few minutes earlier, Judge Clayton had ruled against a motion by Walker's attorneys to throw out his order for a psychiatric test.

Following a conference XX etc., 3rd GRAF Night Lead Walker, A64-72-96NU

RT845PCS NM

A141

Buffalo, N.Y., Nov. 21 (AP)—About 900 students and 50 teachers evacuated a Junior High School in three minutes today when fire broke out on the stage of the school auditorium.

No one was injured. The blaze caused about $15,000 damage, firemen said.

"The children heard the alarm, thought it was a fire drill, and the school was emptied in three minutes," said Thomas J. Connors, Principal of Clinton Junior High School.

LU947PES

A142WX

A142NU

URGENT

SUB

Oxford, Miss.—Second Lead McShane (A102-103NU), sub folowing for 8th GRAF (including PVS insert A112 NU), "at the same X X X Edwin A. Walker."

Clayton also ruled that one of the major figures of the riot—former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker was mentally competent to stand trial and aid in his defense on Federal insurrection charges.

Clayton made the ruling after blocking an attempt by Walker's attorneys to keep the question of Walker's mental competence out of the court records.

Clayton ruled XX etc., 9th GRAF PVS (9th GRAF A102NU)

RT850PCS NM

[fol. 2007] A74AX

(550)

WALKER-MEREDITH

Oxford, Miss., Nov. 21 (AP)—The Government continues today its fight against an attempt to blot out a court-ordered mental examination for former Army Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker.

Walker's attorneys contended yesterday the circumstances under which the order was issued violated his constitutional rights. They said Walker had not been indicted by a Federal Grand Jury nor had a U. S. Attorney presented a bill of information when the test was ordered.

The Government denied any infringement of rights. It said mental tests were legal when ordered after an arrest and before sentence is passed.

A Federal Judge ordered the examination Oct. 2, the day after Walker was arrested on charges of seditious conspiracy and inciting insurrection in connection with a bloody desegregation riot on the University of Mississippi campus. Two men died and scores were injured.

The riot occurred when U. S. Marshals ringed the Ole Miss Administration Building shortly after bringing Negro James H. Meredith to the campus for enrollment.

Meredith's name went unmentioned and the riot itself was not brought up until the first of seven witnesses subpoenaed by the Government testified.

University Police Chief Burns Tatum testified he was about 10 to 15 feet from Walker when the former Major General addressed a group of students in front of the Lyceum Building, the University's Administration Building and scene of the heaviest fighting.

Tatum said he was standing with a group of students, one of whom pointed out Walker to him.

He said he heard Walker, who held a paper cup in his hand, tell the students:

"Col. (T. D.) Birdsong has let you down. Gov. (Ross) Barnett is your guard. Charge!"

Birdsong is head of the Mississippi Highway Patrol which had many units stationed in the campus area.

Other opening day witnesses were Cal Marlin of Miami, Fla., television newsreel cameraman for the National Broadcasting Co., and two psychiatrists—Dr. Charles E.

Smith of Washington, D. C., medical director of the Federal Bureau of Prisons and chief psychiatrist of the Justice Department; and Dr. Manford Guttmacher of Baltimore, Md.

A75AX

A75AX

Marlin's testimony consisted of the filmed report of a statement read by Walker in Jackson Sept. 29, the day before rioting.

"I am in Mississippi beside Gov. Ross Barnett," the statement said. "I call for a national protest rally to the cause of freedom."

The defense objected to the film presentation as irrelevant and immaterial. Judge Claude F. Clayton reserved his ruling on the motion.

The defense hammered at length at a memorandum from Dr. Smith which subsequently was named as a basis for the Government's request to have Walker examined. Smith sent the memo to James V. Bennett, Federal Prisons Director, who sent it by telegram to U. S. Atty. H. M. Ray.

Smith said he based his memorandum on medical records, news stories and a hearing before the Special Preparedness Subcommittee of the Senate Armed Services Committee last April.

Meanwhile, Meredith ate supper last night with an unidentified student and professor at the Ole Miss cafeteria. They were under heavy campus and U. S. Marshal surveillance, apparently because the room of two students was ransacked Friday after they ate lunch with Meredith.

The University Senate took up a resolution to censure the editor of the campus newspaper, The Daily Mississippian, for editorials against student demonstrations and in support of students who have joined Meredith at meal times. The resolution aimed at editor Sidna Brower of Memphis, Tenn., was referred to committee.

XW728AES

AFTER 740AES-AX

[fol. 2008]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT 14A

A139

INSERT

Guantanamo Bay, Cuba—Korth-Thanksgiving A88 Insert After 4th GRAF: Been Made.

He added that he will talk tomorrow with Defense Secretary Robert S. McNamara about the return of the 2,800 dependents "and see whether I can't expedite that as much as possible."

"I do not X X X 5th GRAF.

UK938PES

CLR?

CLR.... A140 NEXT.... 949PES

A140KX (WALKER)

(160)

Gainesville, Tex., Nov. 22 (AP)—Former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker of Dallas directed two fire-fighting units today and was credited with a major effort in keeping a farm home from being destroyed by fire.

Loys R. Dugger said Walker, driving alone along U. S. 77, fourteen miles south of Gainesville, noted the woodshed in the rear of the Dugger farm home ablaze. The ex-general and occupants of the house fought the blaze, which spread to the two-story residence, until fire units from Gainesville and Sanger arrived. Dugger and Charles McSpadden of Denton, who owns the residence where Dugger lives, said Walker then took charge of the fire fighting and assisted in carrying out furniture and personal belongings from the home.

The two-story house was heavily damaged. There was no injuries.

Those at the scene said Walker told them he was returning home from Mississippi. Walker appeared yesterday at a hearing before U. S. Dist. Judge Claude F. Clayton in Oxford. The judge ruled the former general mentally competent to stand trial on charges of seditious conspiracy and inciting an insurrection in connection with Walker's action on the campus at the University of Mississippi during the enrollment of James Meredith, first Negro to attend the school.

GC858PCS NM

AV

A141CX

ADD DEATH LOG

10 R.M. EST: Traffic 134, Fire 8, Miscellaneous 9. Total 151.

WZ858PCS NM

[fol. 2009] A20

CORRECTION

New York—Longshoremen (A17) 2nd GRAF Make It X X X Fidel Castro. (Not Castor)

THE AP

KS325AES

A21

URGENT

Seoul, Korea, Nov. 22 (AP)—An American soldier was killed and another injured in a hand grenade attack by North Korean Communist soldiers Tuesday night, U.N. command spokesman said today.

The soldiers were manning a U.N. observation post in the demilitarized zone on the Western Korean front. They were members of the First Cavalry Division but their names were withheld.

The spokesman said this was the first known attack by North Korea soldiers on an observation post manned by Americans since the Korean Armistice of 1953.

He described it as an "unprovoked, vicious and speedy attack."

The incident occurred near the western end of the 150-mile long demilitarized zone, some 25 miles north of Seoul.

Both American casualities were enlisted men. The injured soldier received wounds in both feet from grenade fragments.

The attackers tossed five Russian grenades. One exploded inside the observation post, 350 yards south of the demarcation line. The spokesman said. Three others exploded on the outside, and one unexploded grenade was found outside the post.

Several U.S. soldiers were in the area, but made no attempt to stage a counterattack. The attackers apparently fled from the scene.

KS328AES

A22AX

PMS BUDGET (570)

WALKER-McSHANE

BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Oxford, Miss., Nov. 22 (AP)—Edwin A. Walker, the controversial former Army Major General, has been ruled mentally competent to stand trial on charges of seditious conspiracy and inciting an insurrection.

U. S. Dist. Judge Claude F. Clayton, who is an Army National Guard Brigadier General, handed down the ruling yesterday at the end of a two-day hearing to determine whether there was reasonable cause for a mental examination of the 53-year-old Walker.

The lean Texan was arrested here Oct. 1 following the desegregation rioting at the University of Mississippi which killed two persons.

Shortly before Clayton ruled in the Walker case, he ordere sons.

Shortly before Clayton ruled in the Walker case, he ordered Chief U. S. Marshal James McShane released from the Lafayette County Jail. McShane had surrendered to Sheriff Joe Ford on state charges of inciting a riot and breach of peace during the rioting.

McShane and one other person—who has not yet been identified—were indicted last week by the County Grand Jury after it probed the rioting which followed the arrival of Negro James H. Meredith on the University campus.

The judge set no date for Walker's trial. He accepted a mental test given Walker earlier this month at Dallas, Tex.

The judge said the examination made by Dr. Robert L. Stubblefield, Professor at the Southwestern Medical School in Dallas, "was essentially negative. No opinion was expressed. It did not say whether he was sane or insane."

Clayton added that from his observation of Walker's behavior while testifying yesterday he "found that this man is competent" to aid in his defense of such criminal charges as may be presented.

Clyde J. Watts of Oklahoma City, Okla., one of Wlker's four Clyde J. Watts of Oklahoma City, Okla., one of Walker's four attorneys, said Clayton's decision in placing the mental test in the case record would be appealed. Walker said afterward he felt he had been subjected to a great injustice.

Clayton, recently chosen to command the 31st (Dixie) Division of Mississippi and Alabama National Guardsmen, expressed the greatest respect for Walker's military career.

[fol. 2010] A23AX

Walker was questioned by his attorneys during the hearing and gave details of his arrest by Federal troops. Neither he nor his attorneys mentioned his actions the night of the rioting.

Walker also discussed his controversial reprimand and loss of command of the 24th Division over a troop indoctrination program in Germany. He later resigned his Army commission.

During his testimony, Walker said he had been misquoted in reports saying he described former President Harry S. Truman and others as Communists.

"I had not mentioned President Truman or called anyone a Communist," said Walker.

Clayton said he would hold a hearing for McShane late in January. The Justice Department claimed McShane was "doing duties as a Federal Official" on the University campus.

After the release on a writ of habeas corpus of the husky former New York Policeman, County Dist. Atty. Jesse Yancy Jr., said "the case now rests in the hands of the Federal Court . . . However, the State contends McShane made unlawful acts and should be prosecuted in State Court."

McShane was in charge of a team of some 300 Federal Marshals accompanying Meredith onto the campus.

In other developments:

The Mississippi Senate approved a resolution which blamed rioting at the University on the "ruthless and corrupted administration in Washington headed by the Kennedy Klan (CQ)." The measure drew 12 dissenting votes and faces House action. The resolution also expressed defiance "and utter contempt for the Kennedy Administration."

Meredith left the campus for Memphis to spend the Thanksgiving holidays with his family.

XW342AES NM

A24AQ

(1SO)

Albuquerque, N.M., Nov. 22 (AP)—Sen. Dennis Chavez, was buried yesterday following services attended by thousands of persons whose votes kept him in Congress for more than a quarter of a century. He was 74.

The Democratic Senator died Sunday at Washington of a heart attack after a long battle with cancer.

Vice-President Lyndon B. Johnson, one among many national dignitaries at graveside, called Chavez "the Champion of the least among us."

"We're here today not to say good-bye, but to say 'until we meet again,'" Vice President Johnson said.

"Sen. Chavez was concerned with unity of the hemisphere. . . . and he became the outstanding spokesman for unity an progress in the Western Hemisphere," Johnson said.

The sorrowing Chavez family exhibited controlled composure throughout the ceremonies at the church and at the graveside.

Mexican Senate Leader Manual Moreno Sanchez sent personal messages to Mrs. Chavez, and to the U.S. Senate expressing the sorrow of the Mexican Senate over the death of Chavez.

Mexican senators said Chavez consistently defended Mexico in disputes and that his help was deeply appreciated there.

Among those attending the services were New Mexico Gov. Edwin L. Mechem and his successor Gov.-Elect Jack Campbell. They stood shoulder to shoulder as they paid their last respects to the colorful Democrat who had played such a leading role in the State's political story.

Gov. Mechem will name a successor for Chavez.

JD145AMS

A25CX

ADD DEATH LOG

4 A.M. EST: 28 FTraffic, 0 Fires, 1 Miscellaneous. Total 29.

AB245ACS

X

A26

New York, Nov. 22 (AP)—Funeral services for John Shubert were held as he planned it—on the stage of Broadway's Majestic Theater.

As his widow sat beside the coffin yesterday, friends and business associates read passages from the Bible. No clergyman participated.

Shubert, 53, Managing Director of his family's vast theatrical real estate holdings, died Saturday during a train trip to Florida.

Among those paying their final respects were personal friends, Shubert employes, and stage performers. Interment was at Morristown, N.J.

KS348AES

[fol. 2011]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT 15

B9XF

IMPE

IMPRESSIONS:

Mr. Edwin A. Walker is a 53 yaer old single, white male, who is alert, friendly, and cooperative. He was born at Center Point, Texas and was reared on his parents' far. He received his education in the local grammar school, attended Schreiner Military Institute. Upon completion of high school, he entered the military academy at West Point in 1927, and graduated in 1931. He has had a long and distinguished military career, and has received additional education a id training in the services special war college. He pat special war college. He participated in the Kiska, the Italian, the southern France invasions of World War IIN the southern France invasions of World War II, in the Korean War, in the Little Rock crisis and the German occupation. He resigned from the army and refused his retirement privileges in order to be free to express his opinions about certain governmental policies re the procedures for indoctrination of troops concerning communism.

The following elicited replies point out the awareness of Mr. Walker concerning the nature and the gravity of the charges against him.

When I reead

When I read the specific charges which were presented in the Northern District of Mississippi Federal Court, Mr. Walker replied:

1) "Ta

1) "That means forcibly assaulting, resisting, and impeding the United States Government, which means you forcibly intend to stop them and did use force to stop them. I feel I can relate the events in a precise way."

2) "It means you inspire others and make an effort to overthrow the government."

3) "It means that you join with others to conspire against the authority of the U. S. Government and attempt to delay ana and prevent their action. These are severe charges and they carry a severe penalty with them."

B10XF

After discussion with my counsel, I r

After discussion with my counsel, I directed various questions to Mr. Walker concerning the nature of the procdsses of criminal trial. In my opinion, he revel trial. In my opinion, he revealed his awareness in his discussion of the procesures in a military investigation which occurred in Germany.

"When a soldier committed an act against another soldier, y role was to notify the civilxx civilian authorities, our own military police, the Judge Advocate, and the investigating police, the Judge Advocate, and the investigating tea. Evidence was gathered and turned over to the vivili gathered and turned over to the civilian authorities if that was indicatd indicated by the nature of the crime." Mr. Walker continued and described in detail and correctly the usual procedures of a ilitary trx military court.

The following factual material would indicate that Mr. Walker has an intact, recent, and remote memory system. His specific responses to questions were satisfactory in many ae spc specific responses to questions were satisfactory in many areas, for example:

1. Events in the Italian campaign.
2. Events in the Korean War.
3. Ability to calculate, recall numbers, knowledge of current information.
4. Pr
4. Performance in the intelligence tests.

[fol. 2012]

B11B

B11XF

MR. WALKR

B11XF

MR. WAKKER HAS H

B11XF

Mr. Walker has led an active life physically; currently, he states he eats well, sleeps well, and exercises moderatelz

V

STATES HE EATS WEL

BP

STT BH

???

B11XF

Mr. Walker has led an active life physically; currently, he states he eats well, sleeps exx well, and exc
t he staes he eats well, sleeps well, and exercises moderately. He denies specific symptoms, hallucinations, delusions, addiction to drugs or alcohol, use of tranquilizing drugs. There is no clinical or laboratory evidence which would incixxx indicate any py physical or toxic condition which would affect adversely his ability to perceive his envitonmrnyzn ability to perceive his environment, to evaluate his environment, and to develop effective and appropriate actions in dealing with and to develop effective and appropriate actions in dealing with problems.

In the psychiatric examinations, no effort was made to elaborate a fully detailed picture of (U/L) Why (U/L) Mr. Walker functions in his present stae, nor functions in his present state, nor whether or not there has been any particular change in his mode of psychological operation, since this was not judged by my staff and me to be relevn this was not judged by my staff and me to be relevant to the questions of his (U/L) present (U/L) mental operations. Rather we set out to evaluate (U/L) how (U/L) he thinks, regulates, executes, and deals with his present thoughts, values, and impulses, especially as they relate to the present charges. We felt able to arrive at some very specific answers to these questions, and fond no difficulty in eliciting the full cooperation and assistance of Mr. Walker during the examination.

[fol. 2013]

B6XF

WALKER QUOTES ASKD)

Oxford, Miss—insert night lead Walker x x x

After Walker was put on the stand he went through the formalities of giving his name, age and hometown. Then he spoke in short sentences when asked to tell of his arrival in Oxofrd last September.

"Upon arriving went one-quarter mile for breakfast," he began. There one hour. Then went to the Ole Miss school grounds and made a circle. Came to town of Oxford. Came to chourthouse and a circle. Came to town of Oxford. Came to courthouse and conversed with Sheriff (Joe) Ford. Went to lunch at Mansion Cafe. It was very late. Had many conferences with press."

The testimony skipped over the time in which the Sept. 30 rioting took place. Walker resumed the account of his activities with the details of his arrest the following day andhis trip to the airport to be taken to a Fedeaxx Federal institution in Springfield, Mo. There were no facilities here to house Federal prisoners.

"At the door of the plane I asked where I was to be taken," Walker recalled. "As I mounted the first step I heard a man say 'Springfield.'

"The plane took off and when we were in the air I asked: 'Illinois?'

"We are going to Springfield, Mo.," he sadxx said someone replied.

Upon arriving at Spring field he said that he was kept as a prisoner in the maximum security house until Oct. 6 on that day his bond of $100,000 was cut to $50,ppp, he made bond and was released.

(END INSERT)

LM648PCS B NNM

B24DX

NIGHT LEAD TOLEDOBEND

Baton Rouge, Nov.21(AP)—The Sabine River Authority of Louisiana has accepted the low bid of English Electric Corp., Chairman Claude Kirkpatrick said Wednesday, to build twin hydraulic turbines in the Toledo Bend Dam Power Project.

The English firm's bid was approved at a meeting here Tuesday of the Louisiana authority, Kirkpatrick said, and also has been accepted by the Sabine River Authority of Texas.

The executive committee of the joint Sabine River Authority, he said, will accept the bid formally in Dallas Monday.

Kirkpatrick said the English firm's bid amounted to an overall savings of $383,000 over the next lowest bidder, Allis-Chalmers.

The English Electric base bid was $1,292,017; re-evaluated to $1,677,400. Five firms bid on the project for the $60 million dam on the Louisiana-Texas border. Kirkpatrick said each was evaluated a against a seven-point check list.

JO644PCS 11/21/62

[fol. 2014] B7XF

WITH

WALK

ER (1,200)

OXFORD, Miss., Nov. 21 (AP)—Following is the psychiatric report of Dr. Robert L. Stubblefield, Professor and Chairman of the Department of Psychiatry of the Southwestern Medical Schoolsxx School, Dallas, Tex., on Edwin A. Walker and entered today at a federal hearing for the former Army major general:

PSYCHIATRIC REPORT

Edwin A. Walker

This report is written to inform you on the psychiatric evaluation of Edwin A. Walker conducted pursuant to order No. W-C-29-62. After a conference which was attended by Mr. Walker' attorneys (MMr. Watts, Mr. Matthews, Mr. Morris) and Professor Charles Webster and myself, I requested that Mr. Walker appear for the psychiatric evaluation. My purpose was to obtain material which would aid you in your decision about his competence to stand trial in your court. You wanted material in order to deal with three questions: (1) Whether or not the defendant is presently insane, (2) whether or not the defendant is sufficiently competent to uncder stand the the defendant is sufficiently competent to understand the klflegt allegations pending against him, as shown by the complaint now pending against him in the Northern District of Mississippi, and (3) whether or not the defendant is sufficiently competent to properly assist in his own defense.

Mr. Walker pe

[fol. 2015] B12XF

All psychiatric and psychologica ndicate that Mr.. Walker appears to be able o

Walker appears to be able to deal freely and accurately with his recollections of the incidents leading up to his arrest and present charges. E can discuss them accurately, and without distortion noticeable to the examiners. He ass able distortion noticeable to the examiners. He was able to describe fully his opinions on the charges, what they meant, what kinds of defensive tactics he exx ofrdefensive tactics he intends to employ, how his lawyers are of defensive tactics he intends to employ, how his lawyers are working withhim and the working with him and the unfolding of the events which led to the present charges. However, in recor the present charges. However, in regard to the questions of the (U/L) reasons (U/L) for his involvement, he did no feel that whether or not there were emotional forces of which he is not fully aware (and that fully aware (and that might possibly relate to the legal question of specific intent and motivation) were properly a part of this report. It is our impression that the Court in this case at this time is (U/L) not (U/L) concerned about Mr. Walker's ability to undersa ability to undersa ability to understand fully, the more complex and subtle aspects of his motivation in regard to the acts for which he is charge. If it were, and if we were asked to evaluate these kinds of questions, it wol wo
it would be necessary to conduct a mou it would be necessary to conduct a much more penetrt it would be necessary to conduct a much more penetrating exploration of Mr. Walker's psychological operations.

B13XF

It may be tnt
It may be that some of Mr. Walker's attitudes and feelings aboutspecific events in Mississippi are such atxx tha about specific events in Mississippi are such that if he were pressed hard to deal with them (as for examplx pressed hard to deal with them (as for example in a cross-examination) this might have a definite effect on his composure on the stand. Since we assume that the Court does not deal with this possibility in its ta ths

this possibility in its standard of competence, we have therefore made no effort to explore in detail their nature or possibility.

/s/ ROBERT L. STUBBLEFIELD
Robert L. Stubblefield, M. D.
Professor and Chairman
Department of Psychiatry
Southwestern Medical School

LM803PCS

[fol. 2016] Mr. Walker presented himself to me on Thursday, November 8, 1962 at 2:00 P.M. after a 1 1/3//// 1//// 1962 at 2:00 P. M. after a 1½ hour psychiatric interview, I recommended that he enter the psychiatric ward at Parkland Memorial Hospital as an inpatient for further observation and study. He was admitted at 4:00 P. M. and was cooperative throughout the examinations and procedures. He was released on ap on a pass on his 53rd birthday on Saturday morning. He returned in the evening and was tentatively discharged from the hospital on November 10, 1962 at 10:00 P. M.

B8XF

Summary of findings is as follows:

1. Physical Health—Essentially normal.

   A. Physical Examination—No abnormal findings except a slight deafness in the right ear and marked astigmatism, which is corrected by glasses (examination by A. W. Beloach, M. D., a member of my staff)

B. Laboratory Examinations—Normal ranges for blood and urine studies

C. X-rays of skull—Normal

D. Electrocardiogram—Normal

2. Additional Special Procedures

A. Electroencephalogram—Normal

B. Urine Studies—No evidence of current use of tranquilizing drugs

3. Psychological Tests—The report by Irwin Jay Knopf, Ph. D., a diplomate of the American Board of Examiners in Professional Psychology, and a member of my staff, states that Mr. Walker is functioning currently at the superior level of intelligence, on the Wechsler Adult Intelligence Scale his res reasoning, judgment, vocabulary, fund of information, and organizational ability were all above average for his age group.

4. Psychiatric interviews were conducted on:

A. Thursday November 8, 1962 2:00 P..

B. Friday, November 9, 1962 2:00 P. M.

C. Saturday, November 10, 1962 10:00 A. M.

D. Saturday, November 10, 1962 8:00 P. M.

(Jointly with Andrew Watson, M. D., University of Michigan School of Medicine and School of Law)

[fol. 2017] B5XF

(NU-INSERT WHERE THEY WILL FIT:)

—0—

OXFORD, Miss.—Night lead Walker ( ) insert after graf

When the two-day hearing finally ended, Walker strode away unsmiling from the courthouse. A newsman who caught up with him asked Walker how he felt the hearing went.

"Fine,Z was Walker's only comment

—0—

Clyde Watts of Oklahoma City, Okla., one of Walker's four attorneys, said Judge Dxx Clayton's decision would be appealled—"If it is appealable." Watts said he felt that Walker's constitutional fxx rights had been violated by the October order to undergo mental examination

END INSERTS

LM612PCS B

XF

Pls give graf explaining habeas corpus in relation McShane case.

NU

Nov 21 RK622PCS BC

B1NU

HOOFBEATS SELECTIONS—FOR THE FAIRGROUNDS...

1.. Second Light, Sir Hawley, Tulsa Bee

2.. Lil Ri,

2.. Lil Rix, Eight of Hearts, Coushatta Tribe.

3.. Giovanni, Pici-A-A Toria, Bill me.

4.. Fleeting Toni, Dixieland King, Royal Woo.

5.. Everett's Son, Be Bee Time, Midway MayorxxMayor.

6.. Air Stride, Missiixxx Mission Missions, Elfin.

7.. Se

7.. Steve Valenti, Shoot Luke, Magic Realm.

8.. Bull Story, Toxx Troa, Grand Wizard.

9.. Blonde Ruler, Clergyman, Picmar.

Best Bet—Air Stride (6).

RK624PCS NM

[fol. 2018]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT 16

A3;450) AMS BU 1/21/63

A32

(280)

ADVANCE HOLD FOR RELEASE EXPECTED MOMENTARILY

(Advance) Liverpool, England, Jan. 21 (AP)—Prime Minister Macmillan warned tonight that no free country can dominate "other equally free states. Nor can any country in these days stand entirely on its own. Alliances are essential to security."

The British leader spoke in reply to President De Gaulle's news conference statement a week ago that Britain is not ready to join Europe by becoming a member of the Common Market.

"Just as the French have themselves retained special links with their former overseas territories, so we in Britain believe that we too can be loyal Europeans without disloyalty to our great commonwealth tradition and duty," he said.

Then he reminded the French leader that the movement for European unity was founded "by the greatest English patriot of his or any other time, Sir Winston Churchill."

This movement, he said, is "based on partnership, not on domination."

When the last round of negotiations for Britain's entry into the European Common Market began in Brussels last week, the Prime Minister said, "it was recognized on all sides that the few outstanding problems were capable of solution. This was the general view—and for good reasons."

"We had made it abundantly clear that we accpeted the Treaty of Rome and aligned ourselves with the political implications as well as the economic content of the treaty. In particular, we had accepted a common agricultural policy and the common tariff.

"We have reached agreed solutions on a very large part of the field. We still believe that given the will the remaining difficulties can be surmounted."

The postponement at France's demand of the Brussels talks (until Jan. 28), he said, "has been a setback, I trust and pray not a fatal setback."

MC321PES

A33AX (OLE MISS)

(270)

Oxford, Miss., Jan. 21 (AP)—A Federal Grand Jury investigating the University of Mississippi desegregation riots adjourned today, apparently without indicting former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker.

Walker was one of 13 persons charged by the Justice Department in connection with rioting that swept the university following the arrival on campus last Sept. 30 of James H. Meredith, a Negro student.

Charges against three persons were dismissed before the Grand Jury went into session two weeks ago.

Last week, the 23-member Grand Jury returned two true bills indicting four persons for interfering with the Federal Marshals enforcing court orders for Meredith's admission.

Indicted were Melvin Bruce, 35, of Decatur, Ga., Philip Lloyd Miles and Kline Lamar May, both of Prichard, Ala., and Richard Hays Hinton of Lucedale, Miss.

TM(MORE)

NY/MC325PES

A34'

BULETIN

LIVERPOOL—RELEASE MACMILLAN A32.

THE AP JAN. 21

MC325PES

A35AX

OXFORD—FIRST ADD GRAND JURY (A33) X X X

MISS.

The panel also returned two no true bills—which means the jury did not believe the complaint warranted an indictment.

The no true bills are never disclosed.

The charges against Walker remain pending even though the Grand Jury apparently either declined to consider the case or returned a no true bill.

He will remain under $50,000 bond unless his attorneys succeed in having U. S. District Court set it aside.

Even if Walker obtains such an order, the government may try to obtain an indictment and prosecute him any time within the next five years, when the statute of limitations expires.

Walker, who was in Oxford the night of the rioting that left two dead and hundreds injured, was charged the following day with insurrection, seditious conspiracy, conspiracy to impede and injure officers of the United States, and assaulting, resisting and impeding officers.

Walker has denied the charges.

BE229PES NM

[fol. 2019]

A57WX

CORRECTION

Washington—Night Lead Gantt (A55WX) 4th Graf "South Carolina" Read X X X Never Admitted a Negro to Its All-White Public Schools or Colleges.

The Appellate Court etc (Inserting "All-White" and Changing "and" to "or").

The AP

JC532PES

A58WX

ADVANCE FOR 6:30 P.M. EST TODAY

(220) FOOD FOR PEACE

BUST IT

BUST IT NY

A58WX (KATANGA)

M

A58WX

(200) KENNEDY—CONGO

Washington, Jan. 21 (AP)—President Kennedy personally hailed today the end of Katanga's secession, and said the people of the Congo "now have a unique opportunity to rally behind their national and provincial leadership" in a unity drive.

In a 400-word statement, Kennedy said the peaceful entry of United Nations forces into the Katangese stronghold of Kolwezi had confirmed the end of the secession movement led by Katanga's leader, Moise Tshombe.

The President said this development "is warmly welcomed by the United States and all who are concerned with the future of the Congo and the whole of Africa."

Throwing a bouquet at former President Dwight D. Eisenhower, Kennedy said "the previous administration determined wisely" that the U.S. objective of seeking conditions allowing the Congolese people to peacefully work out their own future could best be pursued through the United Nations.

Kennedy said his administration has vigorously supported the U.N. efforts and said the American people are deeply indebted to U.N. Secretary General U Thant and his predecessor, Dag Hammarskjold, "who gave his life in the quest for peace" in the Congo.

JC537PES

A59

PHNOM PEN

A-59'NU

BULLETIN

Oxford, Miss., Jan. 21 (AP)—The Justice Department today dismissed charges against former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker and six other persons arrested in connection with desegregation riots at the University of Mississippi last fall.

RK440PCS

A60'NU

BULLETIN MATTER

Oxford, Miss—First add Grand Jury (A59NU) X X X Last Fall.

U.S. Atty. H. M. Ray of Oxford asked for the dismissals several hours after a Federal Grand Jury adjourned without indicting the seven.

The Grand Jury earlier indicted four persons in connection with the rioting Sept. 30, which killed two persons and injured hundreds.

U.S. Dist. Judge Claude F. Clayton of Tupelo, Miss., granted the dismissal "without prejudice" under federal rules of criminal procedure.

The dismissal "without prejudice" means that the charges against Walker and the six others may be reinstated at any time before the statute of limitations expires in five years.

RK443PCS NM

A61

Phnom Penh, Cambodia, Jan. 21 (AP)—President Antonin Novotny of Czechoslovakia and Prince Norodom Sihanouk issued a communique today saying Cambodia will get further Czech technical and economic aid.

The communique was signed at the end of a four-day visit by the communist leader and Mrs. Novotny to this neutral southeast Asian nation.

The Cambodian kingdom looks to Czechoslovakia for mechanical

[fol. 2020]

A62

WITH PARIS ADENAUER—DE GAULLE A13
LUXEMBOU

BUST THIS

A62NU

URGENT

Oxford, Miss.—Second Add Grand Jury (A60NU) (Which Should Be Slugged First Lead) X X X Five Year.

Walker was charged with insurrectin, seditious conspiracy, conspiracy to impede and injure officers of the United States, and assaulting, resisting and impeding officers.

Walker denied the charges.

The other six were Frank Lamar Ott, 29, of Kentwood, La., Joseph Cutrer, 42, of Kentwood, Edward Louis Shade, 28, of Atlayum, Miss., Robert Blackard, 18, of Memphis, William Gilbert Marr, 20, of Olive Branch, Miss., and Charles Clark, address unavailable.

RK444PCS NM

A63

Luxembourg, Jan. 21 (AP)—France boycotted a meeting of Common Market experts called today to prepare for negotiations with Britain Feb. 4-5 on a British application to join the European coal-steel pool.

The coal-steel pool, made up of the six Common Market members, has its headquarters in Luxembourg. Experts of the five other nations—West Germany, Italy, Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxembourg—got to work after expressing regret at the absence of their French colleagues.

The boycott was in keeping with President De Gaulle's opposition to British membership in the continental union.

ML449PES

A64

W

O

A64NU

URGENT

Oxford, Miss—Third Add First Lead Grand Jury (A62NU) X X X Address Unavailable.

On the campus, meanwhile, Negro James H. Meredith neared the end of his first semester at the university by skipping a final examination in algebra.

He gave no reason for cutting the examination. Instead of appearing for the test, he remained in his dormitory.

His last final exam of the fall semester is due tomorrow, a test in English literature.

The rioting broke out on the campus shortly after Meredith arrived late on the afternoon of Sept. 30. The university enrolled him the next day, the first of his race ever knowingly admitted by the school.

Since then, he has attended classes under a guard of military policemen and federal marshals.

Despite this, he's been the target of frequent harrassment—shouted threats, catcalls, and occasional flying bottle, and one seige of fireworks outside his dormitory.

He recently said he didn't plan to return to the university unless his situation became more conducive to study. He didn't detail the changes he wanted.

His plans remain a mystery. He told newsmen he would announce his decision at the end of the present semester, next Monday.

Walker was one of 13 persons charged by the Justice Department in connection with the rioting.

Charges against, 3rd Graf PRVS (A33AX).

RK454PCS NM

A65

WIREPHOTO ADVISORY:

Upcoming: Radiophoto, Chinese Delegate to East Berlin Communist Congress Sits at Desk as Other Communists Stand and Applaud Khrushchev, A24; Transmitted; Redecorated Blue Room of the White House, A150; Paul J. Tierney, Appointed by President to the ICC, A142.

AP—Jan. 21

ML554PES

[fol. 2021]

A66

NIGHT LEAD EUROPEAN WEATHER (310)

BY RAYMOND E. PALMER

London, Jan. 21 (AP)—Tidal rivers iced over and some British sheep were reported frozen to death where they stood as Europe's little ice age entered its second month today.

The human death toll of the cold spell soared above 100.

Five deaths were reported today in Britain. The victims included two members of a climbing club who were buried by an avalanche in Yorkshire.

The white death count in Yugoslavia rose to 20 with the discovery of the body of a farmer frozen in a drift.

Snow fell for the third consecutive day in northern Greece. Icy winds built road-blocking drifts up to nine feet.

In Britain, high winds caused cancellation of helicopter food drops for herds on the moors, but royal marine trucks were attempting to carry in fodder.

Belgian hospitals arranged extra beds to cope with an influx of patients. At least a dozen Belgians have died from the effects of the cold.

As fuel supplies dwindled, Belgian authorities cancelled many passenger runs and switched locomotives to transporting coal.

Many villages in northern Holland were isolated by huge snowdrifts heaped up by weekend gales. Temperatures were around 17 degrees.

A freeze-up in the Baltic Sea brought traffic between West Germany and Scandinavia almost to standstill. The North Sea Island of Heligoland was surrounded by ice. West German army helicopters ferried essential supplies to some isolated islanders.

Police in Bavaria reported three more deaths during the weekend, which brought the Bavarian toll to at least 10.

Thirty icebreaker tugs toiled to keep open the Scheldt River mouth, main entry point into Belgium.

In Germany, special trains went into operation to deliver urgently needed heating oil from North German refineries to cities in the snowbound south.

Lake Zurich froze over for the first time in 34 years. In the Eastern Swiss Alps temperatures of two below zero were reported.

In Britain the river Thames froze from bank to bank at Kingston for the first time in 68 years.

ML601PES

A67KX (PARAPLEGIC&KETCH)

M (AND INSERT)

E

A67NU

URGENT

SECOND LEAD GRAND JURY

Oxford, Miss., Jan. 21 (AP)—Charges were dismissed today against former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker and six other persons avgksted in connection with desegregation riots at the University of Mississippi last fall.

U.S. Atty. H. M. Ray of Oxford asked for the dismissals several hours after a Federal Grand Jury adjourned without indicting the seven.

U.S. District Judge Claude F. Clayton of Tupelo, Miss., granted the dismissal "without prejudice"—meaning that the charges could be reinstated at any time before the statute of limitations expires in five years.

Walker Was X X X 6th Graf First Lead (A59NU Et Seq).

RK506PCS NM

A68KX

(SEE WIREFOTO GO1)

San Diego, Calif., Jan. 21 (AP)—The boat which is bothering some of Frank Keillor's San Diego neighbors is going to be moved, Keillor said today.

It is a 55-foot ketch which he has all but finished in the yard of his home.

Keillor said he would complete it closer to the ocean and then take his family to Hawaii in it. He is a professional ship builder. The complaining neighbors said the boat was unsightly in a residential district and a nuisance.

B(A B507PCS

[fol. 2022]

A83AX (MEREDITH)

A83NU (MEREDITH)

NIGHT LEAD GRAND JURY—MEREDITH (580)

Oxford, Miss., Jan. 21 (AP)—The Federal Government withdrew today the charges against former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker and six other persons arrested in connection with desegregation riots at the University of Mississippi last fall.

U.S. Attorney H. M. Ray went before U.S. District Judge Claude F. Clayton and asked for the dismissals several hours after a Federal Grand Jury adjourned without indicting the seven.

The judge granted the dismissals "without prejudice"—meaning the charges could be reinstated at any time before the statute of limitations expires in five years.

At Dallas, Walker said he would have no comment on the action until he receives formal notification.

The rioting erupted the night of Sept. 30 after Negro James H. Meredith appared on the campus in the company of a heavy force of Federal Marshals.

The night of violence—gunshots, tear gas, flying bricks and bottles—killed two and injured hundreds.

In the last hours of the rioting, the university enrolled Meredith on the morning of Oct. 1—first of his race ever knowingly accepted as a student.

A84NU

Meredith, nearing the end of the semester, skipped a final examination in algebra this afternoon.

Staying in his dormitory, he refused to see newsmen and gave no reason for failing to appear for the examination.

He reportedly has been having difficulty with his grades in algebra. None of his grades has been made public.

Meredith's last final examination is tomorrow, a test in English literature.

His plans after the current semester remain in question —at least publicly.

The 29-year-old Negro, target of numerous taunts and threats despite a constant guard of military policemen and Federal Marshals, said earlier this month he would not return for the second semester unless his siteuation became more conducive to study.

He didn't, however, detail what changes he wanted.

He said he would announce his decision at the end of the present semester, next Monday.

In Washington, U.S. Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said in a copyrighted interview in U.S. News and World Report that "The chances at the present time" are that Meredith will pull out of the university.

Asked if he thought Meredith would stay, Kennedy said:

"I hope he does, but I have some serious questions as to whether he will or not. The changes at the present time are that he will leave."

Addressing a meeting of Washington area Episcopal Church ministers, Kennedy followed up his interview statements by saying Meredith's withdrawal "would be a backward step" for integration in the South. But he added, "It wouldn't be a total loss" because his enrollment demonstrated that federal law will be enforced.

The Grand Jury Panel of 23, all white, indicted four persons earlier in connection with the campus riot. They were Melvin Bruce, 35, of Decatur, Ga., Philip Lloyd Miles and Kline Lamar May, both of Prichard, Ala., and Richard Hays Hinton of Lucedale, Miss.

Along with Walker, charges against these six were dismissed today: Frank Lamar Ott, 29, and Joseph Cutrer, 42, both of Kentwood, La., Edward Louis Shade, 28, at Atlayum, Miss., Robert Blackard, 18, of Memphis, William Gilbert Marr, 20, of Olive Branch, Miss., and Charles Clark, Prentiss, Miss.

The federal government arrested Walker in Oxford the day after the riot on charges of insurrection, seditious conspiracy, conspiracy to impede and injure officers of the United States, and assaulting, resisting and impeding officers.

Walker denied the charges.

As an army officer, Walker directed federal forces in Little Rock during the desegregation crisis there in 1957.

He resigned from the army after a controversy over a troop indoctrination program in Europe.

RK628PGS NM

A85

[fol. 2023]

A106NU

SUB

Oxford, Miss.—Night lead Grand Jury (A83NU) sub fourth graph "at Dallas, x x x formal notification."

At Dallas, Tex., Walker at first declined to comment on the dismissal until we received official notification but later said:

"I am glad to be vindicated by a Mississippi Grand Jury. Today my hopes return to those of Cubans and millions of others who want to return to their homes after haaving escaped from the jails and boundaries of a police state."

The rioting x x x fifth graf.

RK756PCS NM

A107

AGENCIES OUT

(340)

New York, Jan. 21 (AP)—The plight of children forcibly taken from Siberian Evangelical Christians, who sought but were refused refuge in the U.S. Embassy in Moscow last month, was revealed today in a Newsweek Magazine story.

Soviet authorities issued a report that the Christians were "religious fanatics" who cruelly mistreated their children, crippled 30 with beatings, confined them in cellars, and made some of them "mentally ill for life."

Newsweek said: "The Christians left 29 letters at the American Embassy. Many were from their children, who had been forcibly taken away from their parents and lodged in internats (Boarding schools) hundreds of miles away from their families.

"Typical of the letters," said Newsweek, "were letters from Valya Vashchenko, who wrote her father: 'Dear Papa, when I feel said and bitter I write to you and sing Psalms. When we go to eat everybody stands around me and won't let me say Grace. I tell them I won't eat until I ask God's Blessing. If they don't let us emigrate, then let them kill us.'"

Valya wrote her mother: "Mamochka, the director shouts at us—and that is good. The deeper the grief, the closer we are to God . . . Pray that we should stand firm."

The magazine said when the school director tried to force Valya into taking the Communist Young Pioneer's oath, she asked her parents to petition Premier Khrushchev.

"Tell him," said Alya, "I don't want to live any more in the Soviet Union. I tell you I won't study in a Godless school."

Her sister, Tanya, and brother, Petya, also in the same school wrote letters, the magazine said.

Tanya, 8, wrote: "I cry at night. The boys here beat me. But don't worry . . . God still keeps us." Petya, 7, said: "Mama, the boys here beat me. But I bear everything. Mama, I beg them to let me go home, but they won't let me."

Newsweek said "The Evangelical controversy pinpoints a particularly sensitive area of Russia's Anti-Religious Policy: youth education often content to allow Churches of various faiths to continue services for elder members, Soviet authorities seem determined to prevent religious education of the youth, hoping that the Church problem will simply age itself into the grave."

RA904PES

[fol. 2024]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 16A

RACIAL

Oxford, Miss.—Federal Government drops charges against former Gen. Walker; Meredith takes last exam at Ole Miss with future still in doubt—roundup by Ben Thomas (should stand)

Columbia, S.C.—Supreme Court Justice Warren refuses to delay court order admitting Gantt, Negro student, to Clemson; school trustees to meet to consider action (fresh material, may stand; no fresh pictures available)

— — —

FRENCH-GERMANS

Paris—De Gaulle and Adenauer face broad-ranging discussions of European and Allied policy after agreeing on treaty of close cooperation; MacMillan warns De Gaulle against trying to dictate future of free Europe—roundup (lead and picture prospects uncertain; no pictures permitted at last night's dinner)

— — —

CONGO

Elisabethville—What makes 20th Century Mercenary tick? AP correspondent interviews one in Katanga (fresh, should stand; no pictures presently available)

Washington—Kennedy hails end of Katanga secession, declares Congolese now have opportunity to rally behind national and provincial leadership (A7, should stand)

— — —

STRIKES

New York—Newspaper Guild urges increased efforts to settle printers' strike (lead uncertain)

New York—Shipping industry meets today to act on dock strike settlement terms proposed by Presidential board (meeting at 2 P.M. EST)

Philadelphia—Negotiators in eight-day transit strike report no break in sight (may be topped around noon EST)

— — —

REPUBLICANS

Washington—GOP colleagues arranging dinner salute to Goldwater they hope will produce $500,000 to help bail out financially strapped party—by Jack Bell (A6, fresh, should stand)

[fol. 2025]

A17 1/20/63

PMS BUDGET (300)

TOVARICH

BY JAMES E. WALTERS

Philadelphia, Jan. 22 (AP)—The modern theory of nonsinging stars in musical comedy was tested anew last night as "Tovarich" had its premiere here.

Vivien Leigh, making her bow as a singer and dancer, was enchanting as the Russian Grand Duchess Tatiana who becomes a housemaid so she can have food and shelter in the Paris of 1927.

Her voice—probably more an alto than anything—met the demands of her role, but her acting carried it off.

For her leading man she had Jean Pierre Aumont, also unknown hitherto as a singer. His voice—a creditable baritone—was an unexpected bonus to his performance as her handsome husband, the Prince Consort Mikhail, who becomes a butler.

The musical is in two acts. There are several tuneful moments, and it is pleasant enough entertainment. The first act—running nearly an hour and a half—will need cutting before Tovarich finishes its three-week run here and goes on to Boston and then Broadway. The second is faster-paced.

The plot is almost identical with of the popular Broadway play of the same name in 1936-37 and a later movie starring Claudette Colbert and Charles Boyer.

Miss Leigh retains the beauty and charm she displayed as Scarlett O'Hara in the 1939 movie, "Gone With the Wind." Her dancing of the Charleston, in "Wilkes-Barre, Pa." is a show-stopper.

She does a pleasing job on her two solos—"The Only One" and "I Know That Feeling"—and duets with Aumont; "Her Highness and Her Husband" and the lilting, "All of You."

The supporting cast is first-rate: Bryon Mitchell as the youthful son and Margery Gray as the daughter of the American couple who employ the Prince and Grand Duchess; Taina Elg as a sexy Russian refugee, and George S. Irving and Louise Kirtland as the mother and father. Mitchell and Miss Gray seem to have a real hit in "Uh-Oh."

Music is by Lee Pockriss and lyrics by Anne Croswell.

BN356AES

A18AX (BJT)

PMS BUDGET (460)

WALKER-MEREDITH RDP

BY BEN THOMAS

Oxford, Miss., Jan. 22 (AP)—The Federal Government has dropped charges against former Army Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker and six others arrested after the University of Mississippi desegregation riots last Fall.

U. S. Atty. H. M. Ray asked for the dismissal yesterday several hours after a Federal Grand Jury quit without indicting Walker.

Meanwhile, James H. Meredith—the Negro whose arrival at the University Sept. 30 ignited the riot—takes his final semester test today.

A question mark hangs over the future of the 29-year-old former Air Force Sergeant. He has threatened to withdraw from the University after this semester unless campus conditions change. He has been the target of frequent harassment.

The charges against Walker were dismissed by U. S. Dist. Judge Claude F. Clayton "without prejudice." This means the Federal Government may reconsider them before the statute of limitations expires in five years.

The white grand jury panel indicted four persons last week in connection with the riots which killed two and injured scores.

They were Melvin Bruce of Decatur, Ga., Philip Lloyd Miles and Kline Lamar May, both of Prichard, Ala., and Richard Hays Hinton of Lucedale, Miss.

They were charged with interfering with Federal Marshals in the performance of duties and impeding them in the execution of court orders directing Meredith's enrollment.

Besides Walker, charges were dropped against Frank Lamar Ott and Joseph Cutrer, both of Kentwood, La., Edward Louis Shade of Atlayum, Miss., Robert Blackard of Memphis, Tenn., William Gilbert Marr of Olive Branch, Miss., and Charles Clark, Prentiss, Miss.

Walker, who commanded Federal troops at Little Rock during the 1957 desegregation crisis, was arrested in Oxford the day after the riot.

He was charged with insurrection, seditious conspiracy, conspiracy to impede and injure officers of the United States and assaulting, resisting and impeding officers. He denied the charges.

The 53-year-old Texan, who resigned his commission in a dispute over troop indoctrination policies, said at Dallas, Tex., he was glad to be vindicated.

"My hopes return to those of Cubans and missions of others who want to return to their home after having escaped from the jails and boundaries of a police state," Walker said.

[fol. 2026] A19AX

Although U. S. Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy—in a copyright interview with U. S. News and World Report—said the chances were that Meredith would quit school, there is strong sentiment now on campus that the Negro will be back next semester.

He skipped an examination yesterday in Algebra—a course with which he reportedly has been having difficulty. He declined to comment on reasons for missing the test.

Meredith said he would leave Jackson to see his wife and son "as soon as possible" after completing today's test in English Literature. He has promised to reveal his future plans sometime after the official end of this semester next Monday.

XW408AES

A20

PMS BUDGET

ADENAUER-DE GAULLE (400)

BY JOSEPH E. DYNAN

Paris, Jan. 22 (AP)—West German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer and French President Charles De Gaulle faced Atlantic and European issues dividing them today after agreeing on a treaty of close diplomatic cooperation between their countries—traditional enemies.

Adenauer is under heavy pressure from his public to play a mediating role in the crisis which erupted last week when De Gaulle rejected the American Plan for a NATO nuclear force and slammed the door on British membership in the European Common Market.

West Germany favtrs British membership in the Common Market and has endorsed the American project for a multinational nuclear NATO force. Adenauer was expected to press De Gaulle to modify his position at a meeting today with only interpreters present.

British bitterness over De Gaulle's position welled up last night in a sharp speech by Prime Minister MacMillan, warning the French President against trying to dictate the future of free Europe. MacMillan told a political rally in Liverpool that no country "in these days can stand entirely on its own. Alliances are essential to security."

A21

MacMillan accused De Gaulle of opposing Britain's bid to enter the Common Market for political reasons. He rejected French claims that he had been insincere with De Gaulle in agreeing to President Kennedy's proposals to scrap the Skybolt missile in favor of Polaris missiles that would be controlled by the North Atlantic Alliance.

The British leader also reminded De Gaulle that the movement for European unity was founded "by the greatest English patriot of this or any other time, Sir Winston Churchill."

De Gaulle and Adenauer agreed yesterday on a treaty of close cooperation in diplomacy, defense and culture, open to other states of Europe, which they hope will repair their differences in foreign policy.

West Germany backed away from an exclusive inner alliance with France inside the European and Atlantic communities. This apparently doomed the French concept of a continental "third force" dominated by France and West Germany.

The treaty provides for regular meetings between th chiefs of state or governments, and between their foreign, defense, education and youth ministers to noordinate action in thev education and youth ministrs to coordinate action in these fields. The heads of state or government will meet at least twice a year, and the ministers on a quarterly basis.

The treaty also calls for more student exchanges, joint studies on military strategy, joint military maneuvers and officer exchanges.

Spokesmen specified that the treaty would be subject to Parliamentry ratification in West Germany—if not in France as well. This was considered important since an overwhelming majority of the West German Bundestag favors British entry into the European Economic Community and endorses participation in the NATO nuclear force.

The talks between De Gaulle and Adenauer are to end tomorrow.

BJ417AES

A22

Taipei, Formosa, Jan. 22 (AP)—A Chinese Communist gunboat was hit and "disappeared from sight" in an encounter with three Nationalist Chinese Warships Sunday near the Nationalist-held Matsu Island, the Defense Ministry said today.

BJ418AES

[fol. 2027]

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 21

I'm sad for you go make your spiel some where else

CK NW

You are doing allright
Riot Riot
You are getting news all over the country
You got casualties

I want to compliment you all on your protest and the agencies thereof

I have just been informed at order of certain official Birdsong

[fol. 2028]
This is a long route to Cuba

escorted off
You can continue protesting as you are

You have a right
Did not come to see violence

by reps of Governor that this fact that these people are on campus

I am only telling you what has been reported by official rep of gov.

Sorry an Epi copal church

There is no stopping point.
Many heading toward Oxford

Any blood you see tonight is on hands of fed govt

due to sell out def. orders that marsh not be allowed on campus

Do not expect violence and protest
until Meredith not admitted

Duncan
Gray says stop it you can

1963 Beginning On Priest Dam Assur

By FRANK VAN DER LINDEN
Chief of the Banner's Washington Bureau

Washington — The Senate today assured that construction of the J. Percy Priest Dam on Stones River can begin sometime in 1963.

Senate approval of the $5 billion public works bill marked final approval of $1 million to commence construction of the $32 million project in Nashville.

The Senate approval for the money for the Priest Dam marked a final victory for U.S. Rep. J. Carlton Loser of Nashville who has been working hard for the project since he came to Congress six years ago as successor to the late Rep. Priest.

Since the House previously had granted the same amount there is no difference to be settled in conference between the two houses.

Money to Begin Job

Therefore, the final bill which will go to President Kennedy soon is certain to include the money to start the projects as well as $1 million to begin the Cordell Hull Dam on the Cumberland River at Carthage.

President Kennedy's budget for 1963 originally included $604,000 for the Army Engineers to finish planning the Priest reservoir and $300,000 to finish planning the Hull project.

Originally named the Stewarts Ferry Dam, the project was originally authorized by Congress in 1938, but little was done about starting it until Loser took charge of the effort.

Rep. Joe L. Evins of Smithville, whose district will touch both the Priest and Hull projects, used his influence on the House Appropriations Committee to have the fund approved this year.

Col. James Newman III, Nashville district engineer, indicated the Priest project could be started in the spring or summer of 1963. It will provide flood control for Nashville in addition to 30,000 kilowatts of hydro-electric power and a large lake area for recreational facilities.

13 Miles Upriver

The reservoir will cover 7,420 acres and will extend 13 miles up the river.

Also in the final Senate bill is $311-million to continue building the Barkley Dam on the lower Cumberland River in Kentucky.

The Senate added $725,000 to begin the controversial Tennessee-Tombigbee waterway to connect the Ohio River and the Gulf of Mexico at Mobile. Since the House has granted no money for this item, the conference will finally decide whether it will stay in the bill.

Ellington

(From Page One)

...sion taken during the conference on the Mississippi situation.

Federal-State Matter

"I do not think that there is any doubt in any of our minds about what the outcome will be in Mississippi because no state is stronger than the federal government," Ellington added. "But still it is a matter for the federal government and the state of Mississippi to work out."

There has been speculation for several days that resolutions will be introduced during the four-day conference either favoring Barnett's action or seeking a vote of censure.

Michigan Gov. John B. Swainson last week asked that the executive committee of the National Governors' Conference censure Barnett for his action in the Meredith case.

The executive committee of the National Governors' Conference will meet here Thursday, the final day of the meeting of the Southern governors.

So far, there has been no word from Washington Gov. Albert D. Rosellini, chairman of the national group, on whether any action will be taken on Swainson's request.

Not in Sympathy

Rosellini has stated that he is not in sympathy with Gov. Barnett's action.

"I think the authority of the U.S. Constitution and Supreme Court decisions must be upheld," Rosellini added.

Commenting on Swainson's request, Ellington told reporters that he did not "think it appropriate for one governor to try to tell another one what to do about a situation in his home state."

In his opening remarks to the conference, Ellington pointed out to the governors that "we can have a repetition of the chaotic situation which occurred at the last national meeting in Hershey, Pa., in which certain individuals indulged in the old game of headline hunting and almost overshadowed the accomplishments of an otherwise informative and constructive conference."

Ellington was referring to an effort by Swainson and New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller to adopt a civil rights resolution at the Hershey meeting. The move was defeated by a filibuster by several Southern governors.

Statement Echoed

Although Barnett has reservations here at the diplomat hotel, conference headquarters, there was growing speculation today that the Mississippi chief executive would not attend the conference.

Ellington's statement that the Meredith case was a "Mississippi problem" was echoed by several other governors.

Host Gov. Farris Bryant of Florida, Gov. Ernest Vandiver of Georgia, and Gov. Terry Sanford of North Carolina agreed that the other Southern governors should not attempt, by resolution, to comment on Barnett's actions.

Vandiver said he did "not favor the use of armed troops to enforce the orders of the federal courts.

The same end and here I am in compliance with the court orders can be accomplished peacefully and without the danger of bloodshed through the use of a sufficient

Barnett

(From Page One)

...tempt. He faces a $5,000 daily fine.

Barnett issued his statement after being informed Meredith was on the campus. He called on state officers "under my command to do everything in their power to preserve peace and to avoid violence, in any form."

"I know that our principles remain true, but we must at all times preserve the peace and avoid bloodshed," he said.

"Surrounded on all sides by the armed forces and oppressive power of the United States of America, my courage and my convictions do not waiver.

'I Love Mississippi'

"My heart still says 'never' but my calm judgement abhors the bloodshed that will follow.

"I love Mississippi. I love her people. I love those 10,000 good Mississippians in the National Guard who have now been federalized and requested to oppose me and their own people."

Barnett's son and son-in-law were among Guardsmen called to active duty by the President.

In his closing remarks, directed to federal officials Barnett said:

"You are destroying the Constitution of this great nation. May God have mercy on your souls. Mississippi will continue to fight the Meredith case and all similar cases through the courts to restore the sovereignty of the state and constitutional government."

Heavy Blow

This statement had struck a heavy blow to the citizens of Mississippi. The townspeople were in a fighting mood. The streets were alive with United State Flags and some men even were complete Confederate uniforms.

Somebody played a phonograph record of "Dixie," the crowd let out a mighty cheer and surged toward the white pillars of the Governor's Mansion. They formed a ring around it that at one time was four deep. There were men, women, teenagers and even a few women carrying babies.

Despite the fact that there was no truth in the rumor that Barnett was going to be arrested, the crowd did not disperse until it got word that the governor would be safe.

Johnson said in his statement that President Kennedy called on the state to preserve law and order and then federalized the National Guard—"the only adequately instrumentality capable of preserving law and order should an emergency arise."

The lieutenant governor said the Administration had raised "the false issue of integration" throughout the entire situation.

Nearly 2,000 persons milled outside the Governor's Mansion Sunday after a Citizens Council leader called for a meeting to protest the use of federal troops.

Meredith Attends Classes At Ole Miss

AP Wirephoto

Federal marshals wearing gas masks stand guard as students demonstrate on the campus of Ole Miss at Oxford in protest of court ordered enrollment of James Meredith, Negro Air Force veteran.

(Continued From Page One)

...handed him a stack of forms. The historic occasion was concluded quietly.

Meredith, who caught a whiff of the tear gas that clouded the campus early today, rubbed his eyes occasionally.

President Kennedy, who...ught only four hours sleep during the troubled night, was in close touch with the situation. His radio-television appeal to the students Sunday night failed to quell rioting that broke out when the campus and town learned that Meredith, turned away three times, had been brought onto the campus.

Campus Littered

The campus, littered today with burned out automobiles, spent tear gas grenades, broken glass and other assorted rubble, was under virtual martial law. An estimated 400 U. S. marshals and 1,000 federal troops kept a firm grip on the order.

The Justice Department in Washington announced about noon that at least 100 persons had been arrested.

Those included a Decatur, Ga., man, Melvin Bruce, 24, identified as a frequent companion of members of the American Nazi Party. He was accused by military authorities of sniping at the marshals Sunday night with a powerful rifle.

The dead were identified as Paul Guihard, correspondent for the French News Agency, who was found dead of a bullet wound in the back, and Ray Gunter, 23, an Oxford resident.

Maj. Gen. Edwin Walker, who resigned his Army commission under fire for his rightist viewpoints, was seen during the rioting congratulating the students. He reappeared downtown this morning in a big, White Texas that and began shaking hands...out was ushered out of courthouse square at bayonet point.

Walker, who commanded federal troops that former President Eisenhower sent to Little Rock during the school integration crisis in 1957, said he came here to take the other side and protest the use of federal force.

More Than Eight Hours

The campus rioting lasted more than eight hours and reached almost unbelievable heights. Many of the rioters were believed to be self-appointed vigilantes from the nearby countryside and from other parts of Mississippi and neighboring states.

Many were armed and bullets and shot whizzed across the campus much of the night.

One group of men tied down the accelerator of an automobile, jumped out and let it go in an attempt to mow down a group of marshals. It crashed into a tree before anyone was harmed.

The rioting in downtown Oxford this morning threatened for a time to become as violent and bloody but sufficient numbers of troops rushed in and, using time-honored riot control techniques, boxed the troublemakers into courthouse square.

Troops set up a skirmish line between downtown Oxford and the campus area and began moving in battle position along the line clearing it of anyone who seemed to be a troublemaker.

Troops in squad-sized groups moved outward from the skirmish line, clearing a wide area. Three soldiers jumped the hedge at the First Presbyterian Church and skirted across the lawn in the familiar stooped couch of a soldier in an enemy town.

Presently troops began moving back in the square with young teenagers marching reluctantly ahead of them. Eight were placed under arrest within 15 minutes.

Under Patrol

Soldiers with their guns at the ready patrolled the many narrow streets and alleys in the downtown Oxford area.

Trouble started forming in downtown Oxford early in the day.

Roving bands of young toughs, some of them beneath college age and some above, walked the streets, many of them carried rocks and clubs. There was no effort by local police, the sheriff's office or the state patrol to stop them although several patrol cars were observed passing by the groups.

The youths usually travelled in groups of about eight or 10 and walked the wide sidewalks of the downtown area in a bel...

Troops fired ... shots over ... group of youths.

Before the ... gas was ... truck's windshie... to a large ro... roped on a ba... piling timber on ...

Tear gas flowed ... house Square, ... lines of troops ... rioters, and the ... gas seeped into ...

Women staggered ... their eyes gu... midmorning the ... campus, appeare... virtual martial l... there was no of... tion.

Truckload afte... troops poured ... Square. Ten A... arrived, overload...

Rioters ...

Stubborn rioters ... the cover of pre... rained rocks, M... and gunfire on ... formed in pocke... campus and had ... by soldiers.

In the downtown ... containing two ... stoned this morn... carloads of high... and police set a...

The cat-and-mouse ... tation and the ... jumped out and ...

Knocking ...

Street lights ... the campus were ... the demonstrators ... area was broken ... flash of gunfire ... splash of flaming ... sprayed from the ... tov cocktails."

Demonstrators ... wide use of fire ... downtown area a... ing. One group of ... were seen carrying ... case filled with ... which are wrapped ... set aflame and h...

One was thrown ... Army truck, but ... missed on without ... apparent serious ...

Another boy w... federate cap race... a truck and pla... bottle in its pa... truck stopped and ... ed a bottle at the ... not, immediately ... whether the drive...

A car with an ... woman inside also ... set for a turn, ... the vehicle man... time on through.

Many of the citi... players turned up ... the downtown are... their employers h...

Most of them w... frightened and in... the area.

Army troops ... onto the campus a... three hours after ... but it was not ... that the last stub... tionists were rou... arrested.

More violence ... in less than four ... the six-month per... unwitroopers force... of Central High S... Rock five years a...

Twelve marshal... wounded or inju... them seriously, an... were hurt.

Most of the ... caused by bricks a... lengths of pipe. ... some gunshot wou...

Many of the ri... parently students ... sippi State College...

A massive demo... conducted there ... noon including ma... the Negro section ... and the burning ... President Kennedy...

Meredith, 29, a ... of the Korean W... had been denied ... campus by Gov... and Lt. Gov. Pa... was escorted sec... university by a ... U. S. marshals ... down for the nig... military which w... heavy guard.

Neither Barnett ... was in Oxford w... broke out between ... civilians and the ... shals.

Barnett ordered ... Highway Patrol n... to stop the fede... Both he and Ke...

Oxford Victim 'Loved Life's Good Things'

New York (UPI) — Paul Guihard, who was killed in the integration riot on the University of Mississippi campus Sunday night had been a member of the New York office of the French News Agency-Agence France Presse for the past three years.

Guihard, assigned to cover the government's attempt to enroll Negro James H. Meredith in the all-white university, died of a bullet wound in his back.

The newsman also worked as a stringer part-time correspondent for the Daily Sketch of London.

His acquaintances describe the stocky, red-haired Guihard as a man with a great sense of humor, one of like Peter Ustinov and a man who loved good food and the other good things of life.

Guihard was 30. He was born in London of French parents and enjoyed dual citizenship.

Guihard stopped to talk to newsmen at the press room at International Airport in New York before taking off for Oxford at 9 a.m. CST Sunday.

"I'm going to pose as a Kentucky colonel and cover this thing with a mint julep in my hand," the bearded Britisher told them. Newsmen who told him to be careful said Guihard laughed off the warning.

Guihard earned the nickname "Flash" for the energy and drive with which he plunged into stories.

He was a fun loving man with a red beard.

Among previous tough assignments for Guihard were the ill-fated anti-Castro landings on Cuba's Bay of Pigs and the flood disaster in British Honduras.

He was the author of a one-act play called "The Deck Chair," which had been performed in a Greenwich Village cabaret theater.

His acquaintances said Guihard spoke Spanish and French as well as English.

He served in the British army and went to work for AFP after

AP Wirephoto

PAUL GUIHARD

he was discharged. He worked for six years in London AFP office before going to Paris and then to New York.

In another incident at the scene at Oxford yesterday, a member of the press, Gaston Yodet of Telenews, came down from Dallas, Tex., was beaten up by the campus mob.

Yodet, who pulled from a burning wagon by the ... which tipped over, ... from his neck and ... then they began beating him.

The mob took every window in Yodet's car, rifled through his belongings and equipment, ripped everything to shreds and left the engine and battery on the fenders.

Yodet's wife was with him but apparently was not hurt.

Son Of Knoxville Newsman Held

Oxford, Miss. (UPI) — Joseph J. Levitt Jr., son of the city editor of the Knoxville News-Sentinel, was arrested or detained in the administration building on the University of Mississippi campus early today.

Levitt said he was taken into custody while working as a newsman on the scene.

Levitt, who was able to telephone United Press International in another building on campus, said he was being held in a room in the administration building. He said he was not under guard but at least 10 other persons were.

Walker

Paradoxes In Integration Crisis

Oxford, Miss. (UPI) — Paradoxes in the Mississippi integration crisis:

Ross Barnett, Jr., son of Mississippi's anti-integration governor was inducted into federal service to take action against his father's stand in the case of James H. Meredith. Young Barnett is a lieutenant in headquarters company of the Mississippi National Guard at Jackson. The unit was federalized Sunday.

John Stennis, a Jackson attorney and son of Sen. John C. Stennis, also was called to active duty. The Fiery Stennis has supported the governor in his fight to keep Meredith from enrolling at all-white Ole Miss.

Edwin A. Walker, who as a U.S. Army major general commanded the federal troops which integrated Central High School at Little Rock, and now a civilian, appeared on the Ole Miss campus in support of Barnett.

Col. T. P. Birdsong, head of the Mississippi State Police which had been ordered by Barnett to prevent Meredith's admittance to the campus, rode with U.S. marshals in the lead car escorting the Negro applicant onto university property.

Student Rioting Brings 'Dishonor' Says Campus Editor

Oxford, Miss. (UPI) — Editor of the University of Mississippi student newspaper told his fellow students today they are bringing "dishonor and disgrace" to their university and to the state by participating in riots.

An editorial was made in a regular edition of the Mississippian which contained students that not today as usual despite the sounds of gunfire and exploding ... the south which rang in ... the night as the newsmen worked.

Many of the newsmen covering the riot used the journalism building as a command post. It is near the edge of the campus.

John Bhowar, editor of the Mississippian, wrote this editorial for the riot issue of her paper.

The riot is unjust to the entire student body and to anyone concerned with the present situation. Not only do the students chance forfeiting their education by participating in riots, but they are bringing dishonor and shame to the university and to the state of Mississippi.

"When students hurl rocks bottles and eggs, the federal marshals are forced to resort to tear gas to back off the crowds.

"When outsiders show their objections in the form of violence, they are seriously injuring the students in their attempt to continue their education. As a student I beg you to return to your homes.

"This is a battle between the

The 100 years ago over almost the same issues and the United States of America prevailed. The federal government is once again showing its strength and power to uphold the laws of our country.

"No matter what your convictions you should follow the advice of Gov. Ross Barnett in not taking any action for violence. Blood has already been shed and will continue to flow unless people realize the seriousness of the situation.

"Whatever your beliefs you are a citizen of the United States of America and of the state of Mississippi and should preserve peace and harmony of both governments."

Mississippi Case 'Disgraceful': Sen. Kefauver

Beverly Hills, Calif. (UPI) — U.S. Sen. Estes Kefauver today branded as "sad and disgraceful" the integration crisis at the University of Mississippi but praised President Kennedy's handling of the affair.

Kefauver told a political meeting he was aboard for Gov. Ross Barnett and other Mississippi officials to have thwarted until

63 Beginning On Priest Dam Assured

By FRANK VAN DER LINDEN
Chief of the Banner's Washington Bureau

...n — The Senate today assured that ... the J. Percy Priest Dam on Stones ... sometime in 1963.

...proval of the $5 billion public works ...al approval of $1 million to commence ... the $32 million project in Nashville.

...proval for the ... Priest Dam ...ctory for U.S. ...ower of Nash... working hard ...ore he came to ...rs ago as suc... Rep. Priest. ...ed previously ... same amount ...ference to be ...ference between

Begin Job

...inal bill which ...sident Kennedy ... to include the ...he projects as ...k to begin the ...n on the Cum... Cartilage.

...nedy's budget ...ly included ...Army Engineers

...ton

...ge One)

...ituting the com... Mississippi situa...

...ke Matter

...k that there is ...y of our nuclear ...ntenance will be ...ecause no state ...m the federal ...unction added, ...a matter for the ...ight and the ...ssippi to work ...

...ion speculation ...and during the ...ew other favor... ...tion or seeking ...

...John R Swain... ...asked that the ...ittee of the Na... ...ng Conference ...t for his action ...ber.

...committee of ...manors' Confer... ...here Thursday, ...f the meeting of ...ernors.

...has been no ...ington Gov. Al... ...n, chairman of ...on, on whether ...ll be taken on ...ion.

...mpathy

...stated that he ...athy with Gov. ...

...uthority of the ...e and Supreme ...must be upheld."

...on Swainson ... told reporters ...t "think it ap... governor to ...ver one what to ...then in his home ...

...remarks to ...shington point... governors that ...e repetition of ...tion which or... national meet... Pa., in which ...ha indulged in ...headline hunt... overshadowed ...nts of an oth... ...tive and con... ...ference."

...referring to an... ...son and New ...n Rockefeller to ...his resolution at ...ting. The move ...a filibuster by ...e governors.

...Echoed

...ott has reser... ...the diplomat he... ...headquarters. ...ng speculation ...ssissippi chief ...ot attend the ...

...ment that the ...d "Mississippi ...ed by several ...

...ia Bryant ...nest Vandiver ...Gov. Terry San... ...arolina signed ...Southern gover... ...attempt, by re... ...ment on Bar...

...he did "not fa... ...armed troops to... ...ves of the fed... ...

...and here I ...ree with the ...can be accom... ...and without ...bloodshed ... ...of a sufficient ...

(From Page One)

...to finish planning the Priest ...reservoir and $500,000 to finish ...planning the Hull project.

Originally named the Stewarts Ferry Dam, the project was originally authorized by Congress in 1938, but little was done about starting it until Lower took charge of the effort.

Rep. Joe L. Evins of Smithville, whose district will touch both the Priest and Hull projects, used his influence on the House Appropriations Committee to have the fund approved this year.

Col. James Newman III, Nashville district engineer, dedicated the Priest project could be started in the spring or summer of 1963. It will provide flood control for Nashville in addition to 28,000 kilowatts of hydro-electric power and a large lake area for recreational facilities.

13 Miles Upriver

The reservoir will cover 1,420 acres and will extend 13 miles up the river.

Also in the final Senate bill is $31 1-million to continue building the Barkley Dam on the lower Cumberland River in Kentucky.

The Senate added $725,000 to begin the controversial Tennessee-Tombigbee waterway to connect the Ohio River and the Gulf of Mexico at Mobile. Since the House has granted no money for this item, the conference will finally decide whether it will stay in the bill.

Barnett

(From Page One)

...tempt. He faces a $5,000 daily fine.

Barnett issued his statement after being informed Meredith was on the campus. He called on state officers "under my command" to do everything in their power to preserve peace and to avoid violence in any form.

"I know that our principles remain true, but we must at all odds preserve the peace and avoid bloodshed," he said.

"Surrounded on all sides by the armed forces and oppressive power of the United States of America, my courage and my convictions do not waver.

'I Love Mississippi'

"My heart still says 'never' but my calm judgment abhors the bloodshed that will follow.

"I love Mississippi. I love its people. I love those 40,000 good Mississippians in the National Guard who have now been federalized and requested to oppose me and their own people.

Barnett's son and son-in-law were among Guardsmen called to active duty by the President.

In his closing remarks, directed to federal officials Barnett said:

"You are destroying the Constitution of this great nation. May God have mercy on your souls. Mississippi will continue to take the Meredith case and all similar cases through the courts to restore the sovereignty of the state and constitutional government."

Heavy Blow

This statement had struck a heavy blow to the people of Mississippi. The long-suffering citizens were alive with United State Flags and some men even wore complete Confederate uniforms.

Immediately played a phonograph record of "Dixie," the crowd let out a mighty cheer and surged toward the white pillars of the Governor's Mansion. They formed a ring around it that at one time was four deep. There were men, women, teenagers and even a few women carrying babies.

Despite the fact that there was no truth in the rumor that Barnett was going to be arrested, the crowd did not disperse until it got word that the governor would be safe.

Johnson said in his statement that President Kennedy called on the state to preserve law and order and then federalized the National Guard—"the only adequate instrumentality capable of preserving law and order should an emergency arise."

The lieutenant governor said the Administration and raised "the false issue of integration" throughout the entire situation.

Nearly 2000 persons milled outside the Governor's Mansion Sunday after a Citizens Council leader called [illegible]

Meredith Attends Classes At Ole Miss

AP Wirephoto

Federal marshals wearing gas masks stand guard as students demonstrate on the campus of Ole Miss at Oxford in protest of court ordered enrollment of James Meredith, Negro Air Force veteran.

(Continued From Page One)

handed him a stack of forms. The historic occasion was concluded, quietly.

Meredith, who caught a whiff of the tear gas that clouded the campus early today, rubbed his eyes occasionally.

President Kennedy, who caught only four hours sleep during the troubled night, was in close touch with the situation. His radio-television appeal to the students Sunday night failed to quell rioting that broke out when the campus and town learned that Meredith, turned away three times, had been brought onto the campus.

Campus Littered

The campus, littered today with burned out automobiles, spent tear gas grenades, broken glass and other assorted rubble, was under virtual martial law. An estimated 400 U. S. marshals and 1,000 federal troops kept a firm grip on the order.

The Justice Department in Washington announced about noon that at least 108 persons had been arrested.

Those included a Decatur, Ga., man, Melvin Bruce, 24, identified as a frequent companion of members of the American Nazi Party. He was accused by military authorities of sniping at the marshals Sunday night with a powerful rifle.

The dead were identified as Paul Guihard, correspondent for the French News Agency, who was found dead of a bullet wound in the back, and Ray Gunter, 23, an Oxford resident.

Maj. Gen. Edwin Walker, who resigned his Army commission under fire for his rightist viewpoints, was seen during the rioting congratulating the students. He reappeared downtown this morning in a big, White Texas limousine and began shaking hands but was ushered out of courthouse square at bayonet point.

Walker, who commanded federal troops that former President Eisenhower sent to Little Rock during the school integration crisis in 1957, said he came here to take the other side and protest the use of federal force.

More Than Eight Hours

The campus rioting lasted more than eight hours and reached almost unbelievable heights. Many of the rioters were believed to be self-appointed vigilantes from the nearby countryside and from other parts of Mississippi and neighboring states.

Many were armed and bullets and shot whizzed across the campus much of the night.

One group of men tied down the accelerator of an automobile, jumped out and let it go in an attempt to mow down a group of marshals. It crashed into a tree before anyone was harmed.

The rioting in downtown Oxford this morning threatened for a time to become as violent and bloody but sufficient numbers of troops rushed in and, using time-honored riot control techniques, boxed the troublemakers into courthouse square.

Troops set up a skirmish line between downtown Oxford and the campus area and began moving in battle position along the line clearing it of anyone who seemed to be a troublemaker.

Troops in squad-sized groups moved outward from the skirmish line, clearing a wide area. Three soldiers jumped the hedge at the First Presbyterian Church and skirted across the lawn in the familiar stooped crouch of a soldier in an enemy town.

Presently troops began moving back to the square with young teenagers marching reluctantly ahead of them. Eight were placed under arrest within 15 minutes.

Under Patrol

Soldiers with their guns at the ready patrolled the many narrow streets and alleys in the downtown Oxford area.

Trouble started forming in downtown Oxford early in the day.

Roving bands of young toughs, some of them beneath college age and some above, walked the streets, many of them carried rocks and clubs. There was no effort by local police, the sheriff's office or the state patrol to stop them although several patrol cars were observed passing by the groups.

The youths usually travelled in groups of about eight or 10 and walked the wide sidewalks of the downtown area in a belligerent manner.

It was after this had gone on Troops fired about a half-dozen shots over the heads of one group of youthful rock throwers.

Before the order to fire the tear gas was given an Army truck's windshield was shattered by a large rock and a man leaped on a balcony to drop a falling timber on a passing truck.

Tear gas flowed across Courthouse Square, where advancing lines of troops had pinned the rioters, and choking clouds of gas seeped into stores.

Women staggered from stores, their eyes gushing tear. By midmorning the town, as the campus, appeared to be under virtual martial law although there was no official proclamation.

Truckload after truckload of troops poured into Courthouse Square. Ten Army helicopters circled overhead.

Routed Out

Stubborn rioters — who under the cover of pre-dawn darkness rained rocks, Molotov cocktails and gunfire on federal forces formed in pockets all over the campus and had to be routed out by soldiers.

In the downtown area a car containing two Negroes was stoned this morning while four carloads of highway patrolmen and police sat and watched.

The car swerved into a gas station and the two Negroes jumped out and fled inside.

Knocked Out

Street lights in and around the campus were knocked out by the demonstrators and the darkness was broken only by the flash of gunfire and the ugly splash of flaming gasoline that sprayed from the rioters' "Molotov cocktails."

Demonstrators were making wide use of fire bombs in the downtown area again this morning. One group of about six boys were seen carrying a wooden case filled with bottles of gas, which are wrapped in paper, set aflame and hurled.

One was thrown at a passing Army truck, but the truck continued on without suffering any apparent serious damage.

Another boy wearing a Confederate cap raced in front of a truck and placed a broken bottle in its path. When the truck stopped another boy hurled a bottle at the driver. It was not immediately determined whether the driver was hurt.

A car with an elderly Negro woman inside also was the target for a rain of bottles, but the vehicle managed to continue on through the barrage.

Many of the city's Negro employes turned up for work in the downtown area, only to find their employers had not arrived. Most of them were obviously frightened and immediately left the area.

Army troops began moving onto the campus at 10 p.m. CST, three hours after the riot began, but it was not until 4 a.m. that the last stubborn segregationists were routed and some arrested.

More violence was uncovered in less than four hours than in the six-month period when U.S. paratroopers forced integration of Central High School in Little Rock five years ago.

Twelve marshals were either wounded or injured, three of them seriously, and five soldiers were hurt.

Most of the wounds were caused by bricks and bows with lengths of pipe. But there were some gunshot wounds.

Many of the rioters were apparently students from Mississippi State College at Starkville. A massive demonstration was conducted there Sunday afternoon including marches through the Negro section of Starkville and the burning of an effigy of President Kennedy.

Meredith, 29, a Negro veteran of the Korean War who twice had been denied entry to the campus by Gov. Barnett and Lt. Gov. Paul B. Johnson was escorted secretly into the university by a motorcade of U. S. marshals and bedded down for the night at a dormitory which was put under heavy guard.

Neither Barnett nor Johnson was in Oxford when the riots broke out between gun-wielding civilians and the federal marshals.

Barnett ordered the State Highway Patrol not to attempt to stop the federal marshals. Both he and Kennedy advised the students not to resort to

Oxford Victim 'Loved Life's Good Things'

New York (UPI) — Paul Guihard, who was killed in the integration riot on the University of Mississippi campus Sunday night had been a member of the New York office of the French News Agency (Agence France Presse) for the past three years.

Guihard, assigned to cover the government's attempt to enroll Negro James H. Meredith in the all-white university, died of a bullet wound in his back.

The newsman also worked as a stringer (part-time correspondent) for the Daily Sketch of London.

His colleagues described the stocky, red-haired Guihard as a man with a great sense of humor, one of the Paris Latins, and a man who loved good food and the other good things of life.

Guihard was 36. He was born in London of French parents and enjoyed dual citizenship.

Guihard stopped to talk to newsmen at the press room at International Airport in New York before taking off for Oxford at 9:45 a.m. CST Sunday.

"I'm going to pose as a Kentucky colonel and cover this thing with a mint julep in my hand," the bearded Britisher told them. Newsmen who told him to be careful said Guihard laughed off the warning.

Guihard earned the nickname "Flash" for the energy and drive with which he plunged into stories.

He was a fun loving man with a red beard.

Among perhaps tough assignments for Guihard were the ill-fated anti-Castro landings on Cuba's Bay of Pigs and the flood disaster in British Honduras.

He was the author of a one-act play called "The Dock Chair," which had been performed in a Greenwich Village cabaret theater.

His acquaintances said Guihard spoke Spanish and French as well as English.

He served in the British army and went to work for AFP after

AP Wirephoto

PAUL GUIHARD

he was discharged. He worked for six years in London AFP office before going to Paris and then to New York.

In another incident of violence in Oxford involving a member of the press Gaston Yoder, a Telescope correspondent from Dallas, Tex., was beaten up by the campus mob.

Yoder was pulled from a car and was dragged by the crowd which ripped his shirt from his neck and ripped the buttons off it. He finally escaped by running into the courthouse and locking himself in a room.

Yoder's car was also badly damaged.

Patterson

(From Page One)

...mously to waive the rules to allow consideration of special resolutions.

Action will be taken at the final conference session Thursday.

Patterson who said he is considering offering a resolution was named to a five-man resolutions committee, headed by [illegible] of Texas.

Paradoxes In Integration Crisis

Oxford, Miss. (UPI) — Paradoxes in the Mississippi integration crisis:

Ross Barnett, Jr., son of Mississippi's anti-integration governor was inducted into federal service to take action against his father's stand in the case of James H. Meredith. Young Barnett is a lieutenant in headquarters company of the Mississippi National Guard at Jackson. The unit was federalized Sunday.

John Stennis, a Jackson attorney and son of Sen. John C. Stennis, also was called to active duty. The elder Stennis has supported the governor in his fight to keep Meredith from enrolling at all-white Ole Miss.

Edwin A. Walker, who as a U.S. Army major general commanded the federal troops which integrated Central High School at Little Rock, and now a civilian, appeared on the Ole Miss campus in support of Barnett.

Col. T. P. Birdsong, head of the Mississippi State Police which had been ordered by Barnett to prevent Meredith's admittance to the campus, rode with U.S. marshals in the lead car escorting the Negro applicant onto university property.

Student Rioting Brings 'Dishonor' Says Campus Editor

Oxford, Miss. (UPI) — The editor of the University of Mississippi student newspaper told his fellow students today they are bringing "dishonor and shame to the university and to the state of Mississippi."

An editorial was made in a special edition of the Mississippian which mentioned students not by name but as dual despite the sounds of gunfire and exploding tear gas shells which rang in [illegible]

Many of the persons covering the riot used the journalism building as a command post. It is near the edge of the campus.

Billie Brewer, editor of the Mississippian, wrote this editorial for the riot issue of his paper.

"This is an appeal to the entire student body and to anyone concerned with the present situation. Not only do the students change, forfeiting their education by participating in riots, but they are bringing dishonor and shame to the university and to the state of Mississippi.

"When students hurl rocks, bottles and eggs, the federal marshals are forced to resort to tear gas to back off the crowds.

"When outsiders show their objections in the form of violence, they are seriously injuring the students in their attempt to continue their education. As a student I beg you to return to your homes.

"This is a battle between the state of Mississippi and the [illegible] The 100 years ago over almost the same issues and the United States of America prevailed. The federal government is once again showing its strength and power to uphold the laws of our country.

"No matter what your convictions you should follow the advice of Gov. Ross Barnett by not taking any action for violence. Blood has already been shed and will continue to flow unless people realize the seriousness of the situation.

"Whatever your beliefs you are a citizen of the United States of America and of the state of Mississippi and should preserve peace and harmony of both governments."

Son Of Knoxville Newsman Held

Oxford, Miss. (UPI) — Joseph J. Levitt Jr., son of the city editor of the Knoxville News-Sentinel, was arrested or detained in the administration building on the University of Mississippi campus early today.

Levitt said he was taken into custody while working as a newsman on the scene.

Levitt, who was able to telephone United Press International in another building on campus, said he was being held in a room in the administration building. He said he was not under guard but at least 10 other persons were [illegible]

Walker

Mississippi Case 'Disgraceful': Sen. Kefauver

Beverly Hills, Calif. (UPI) — Sen. Estes Kefauver today branded as "sad and disgraceful" the integration crisis at the University of Mississippi but praised President Kennedy's handling of the affair.

Kefauver told a political meeting it was absurd for Gov. Ross Barnett and other Mississippi officials to have thwarted until Sunday night a court order compelling enrollment of Negro stu[illegible]

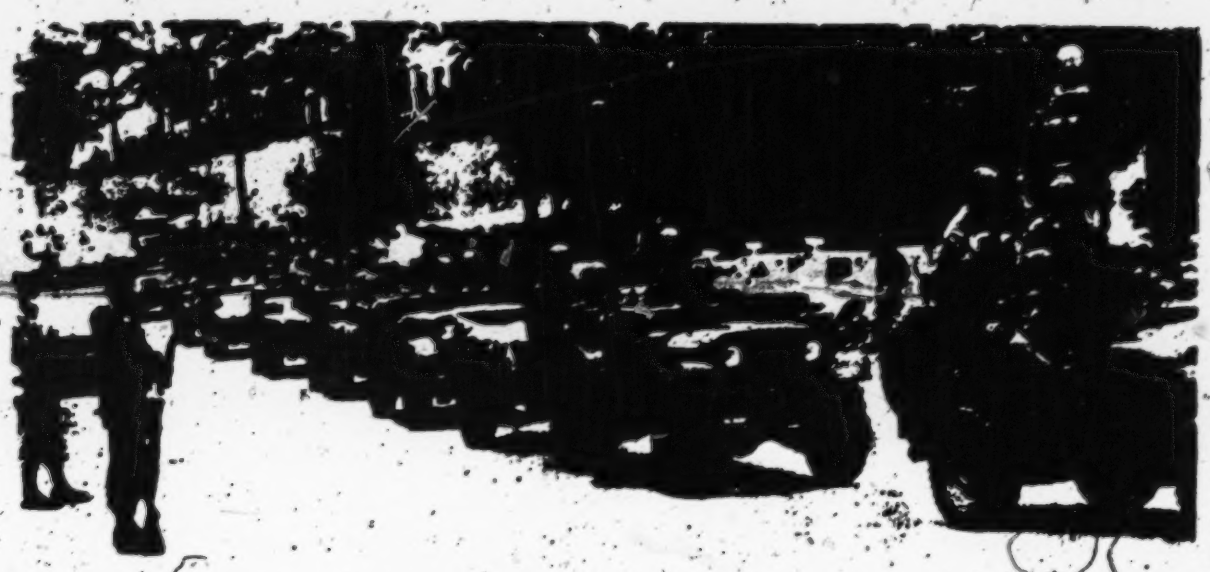
[fol. 2030]

Nashville Banner

Nashville's Oldest Newspaper — LONG MAY OUR LAND BE BRIGHT WITH FREEDOM'S HOLY LIGHT; PROTECT US BY THY MIGHT, GREAT GOD, OUR KING — Founded 1

VOL. LXXXVI, NO. 249 — NASHVILLE, TENN., MONDAY AFTERNOON, OCT. 1, 1962 — 34 PAGES — PRICE

MEREDITH ATTENDS CLASSE
AS GIs BATTLE RIOTERS



A long line of jeep borne Army troops leaves the main gate of the University of Mississippi at Oxford after patrolling the riot torn campus.

Oxford, Miss. (UPI)—Negro James Meredith registered today at the University of Mississippi and began attending classes on a campus littered with the debris of a major riot that took two lives and injured at least 75 persons.

"It is not a happy occasion," he said.

About 100 U.S. deputy marshals and 1,000 federal troops guarded the campus as the 29-year-old Negro cracked the segregation barriers of the 114-year-old school.

The campus was brought under military control early today but the rioting spread to downtown Oxford and at least one soldier was hurt in a barrage of rocks, timbers and pop bottles before the crowd was dispersed with tear gas and reinforcements were brought in.

Witnesses said several shots were fired at the troops at one point downtown. The troops, identified as Mississippi National Guardsmen, immediately rushed forward and fired rifle shots over the heads of the crowd.

At least 20 rioters were rounded up. Most of them were young boys. They were ordered to place their hands over their heads and were marched at bayonet point to the courthouse.

In Jackson, Gov. Ross Barnett was in seclusion but his office issued a statement saying "there has been an invasion of our state resulting in bloodshed of our citizens and threatened bloodshed of others." The Capitol building's Mississippi state flag flew at half-staff.

Walks Amid Shouts

Meredith, whose determination to desegregate "Ole Miss" brought about a conflict that threatened to rock the federal union, walked solemnly to an American colonial history class at 9 a.m. CST to shouts of "nigger, nigger" and "was it worth two deaths?"

He was accompanied, to the classes by three deputy marshals and U.S. Department of Justice Representative Ed Guthman.

The Negro was met at the registrar's office by University Registrar Robert B. Ellis who

(Turn to Page 12, Column 7)

Deputy U.S. Marshals Jack Evins and James Kemp, both of Nashville, were among the Federal marshals flown to Oxford, Miss., from Millington Naval Air Base near Memphis. They arrived in Oxford about 2:30 p.m. Sunday.

Walker Arrested In Oxford

Washington — Former Army Gen. Edwin Walker was ordered today on charges of "rebellion, insurrection and seditious conspiracy." Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy announced.

The Attorney General told women that Walker had been arrested and would be arraigned in court today at Oxford, Miss. No further details were immediately available.

Earlier today Mrs. Wayne Morse [illegible] for unwarranted [illegible] said it was particularly reprehensible [illegible] Walker sought to [illegible] campus of this great university [illegible] "the rantings of violent segregationists or psychopathic such as Gen. Edwin A. Walker."

Young said if Walker made the statements attributed to him, "I am glad he is an ex-general and a private citizen instead of in command of any youth in this country."

"I hold him in utmost contempt for his appearance on the campus of this great university [illegible] 'Ole Miss' and for attempting to lead a charge of some 1,500 unruly rioters against United States marshals," Young said.

Disturbing reports from Oxford, Miss., said Walker sought to lead a charge by rioters against U.S. marshals and quoted him as saying to students: "If you can't win, go home. Don't stay at the university. But let's not quit. We can win."

In another Senate speech Rep. Thomas G. Abernethy, D-Miss., said today "An inexperienced U.S. marshal" fired the shot in the rioting at the University of Mississippi campus against "a group of kids who were doing nothing."

Abernethy said the marshal "got excited" and fired a tear gas shell into the crowd. He said it hit a state policeman "who is either dead or at the point of death."

"So help me, God, that's what happened," Abernethy told the House.

The Mississippian, in an emotion-filled speech, said university authorities pleaded with the Justice Department to wait until Monday morning to bring Negro student James H. Meredith to the campus, promising to publish and broadcast "appeals for calm.

"But the Justice Department was not to be denied," he said.

Sen. James O. Eastland, told the Senate that information reported by university officials indicated that "Amateurism by untrained marshals" in firing tear gas shells caused Sunday night's bloody campus riot.

The other, Sen. John C. Stennis, said in a statement that the mere presence of Negro James H. Meredith on the campus was the cause of what he called a "frightful night."

"To avoid further bloodshed and loss of life," Stennis said.

(Turn to Page 12, Column 4)

Ellington Aim: Avoid Issue At Conference

By NEIL CUNNINGHAM
Banner Staff Writer

Hollywood, Fla.—Gov. Buford Ellington today implied he will accept any effort to resolve the Southern Governors' Conference on the integration struggle between Mississippi and the federal government.

Ellington, chairman of the 17-state organization, opened the conference here this morning stating, "We can use these events as a spotlighted platform from which to round off an image of an emotional or political nature and thus gain in the game of demagoguery, providing words where action is needed and confusion where understanding is necessary.

"On the other hand, we can and I hope that we will, use these problems in politics and use these conferences as a forum for constructive discussion of the University of Mississippi problem and the Southern Governors' Conference is not in position to offer any advice."

He added that it would be his guess that these would not be

(Turn to Page 12, Column 1)

Barnett Plans To Send Lawyers To U.S. Court

Jackson, Miss. (UPI)—Gov. Ross Barnett planned to send his attorneys to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals today—perhaps to seek removal of the Meredith, a Negro, in the University of Mississippi.

Part of the purge may have come Sunday night when Barnett, in an emotional message to Mississippi citizens, indirectly

In the statement, issued before the rioting began on the Ole Miss campus at Oxford, 180

Court Opens Mixing Bar Hearings

By LARRY BRINTON and BRAD CARLISLE

The first of 16 petitioning to [illegible] against downtown [illegible] bars got under way to-

By Reason—Not Temper—

Mississippi Tragedy Have Been Averted

(An Editorial)

BLIND, BLUNDERING, BLUDGEONING

respective of which "side" it is on—can the tragedy of Mississippi; antagonizing fu troversy that could and should have been recourse to either military invasion or in lence.

Foresight should have noted that as clear now discerns it, for a restraining effect on federal authorities, on whom a joint responsi ed—and each of which, again, has contribut seemly spectacle of breakdown in law and

Let it be said once more that this tolerate chaos and anarchy, from any caus

Regardless of personal feeling, or co political advantage on either side, this ca been settled far short of the present calamit and would have been had calm judgment pr see its way to a solution. Instead, free rei tempers.

* * *

MISSISSIPPI COULD HAVE resolved thi

other states—including Tennessee—no states' rights in policy determination, and pulsory integration, but aware of the legal ob whom turned back by every level of the fe They betrayed to the necessity for observance o ever much it incurred individual or mass reser

Throughout this ordeal, state by state an there has been the incitation to hysteria, mi vated by aggravating processes of various p And the outrageous fact is—to which thos indifferent—that the Negro as an individ group has been the pawn in all of this politi on the part of Democrats and Republicans by the parties in power.

The present is no exception.

* * *

PRESIDENT KENNEDY last night spoke peaceful solution via reason on both s and temperate message, though late, was se mind and heart of a thinking people; and of such marking the vast constituency of M

The Banner does not believe that it wa sary or advantageous to send troops, as such almost immediately dispatched. The Natio Mississippi had been federalized, and was along with hundreds of U.S. marshals—e to any task of law enforcement, or the pur they were assigned.

As is did in the case of Little Rock, whe dent Eisenhower dispatching the 101st Airb this newspaper condemns no less the milita Mr. Kennedy's order, of a sovereign state.

Two factors there were present almost calculated to touch off the student rioting (1) the sight of federal forces, deemed a tre the presence of former Maj. Gen. Edwin Wa it up for a demonstration of resistance. The less out of place than the former, and a co cumstance to the turmoil erupting into tragedy

* * *

LATE AS IT IS, all parties concerned must cerned—for the settlement, by law, th occurred days ago. It is America's prayer, will end here—by responsible address to the of which is decency's paramount interest in ment under law.

It is about time, by the way, for the federate Flag—an honored symbol—to co used for rabble-rousing appeals to riotor The stain of such is on it no less than s

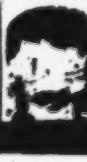
* * *

'Round The Clock

WITH RED O'DONNELL

MONDAY'S MESSAGE

Pinckney Kori gave some State Fair tickets to Jean (7), Billy (5) & Becky (11) Martin, 1360 25th Ave. S.



Jean's letter of thanks read:

"I enjoyed the Fair. Thank You. P.S.—Becky & Billy enjoyed it to but they're to

...reservoir will cover 1,420 acres and will extend 13 miles up the river.

Also in the final Senate bill is $31 1-million to continue building the Barkley Dam on the lower Cumberland River in Kentucky.

The Senate added $725,000 to begin the controversial Tennessee-Tombigbee waterway to connect the Ohio River and the Gulf of Mexico at Mobile. Since the House has granted no money for this item, the conference will finally decide whether it will stay in the bill.

Barnett

(From Page One)

tempt. He faces a $5,000 daily fine.

Barnett issued his statement after being informed Meredith was on the campus. He called on state officers "under my command to do everything in their power to preserve peace and to avoid violence in any form."

"I know that our principles remain true, but we must at all odds preserve the peace and avoid bloodshed," he said.

"Surrounded on all sides by the armed forces and oppressive power of the United States of America, my courage and my convictions do not waiver."

'I Love Mississippi'

"My heart still says 'never,' but my calm judgment abhors the bloodshed that will follow.

"I love Mississippi. I love its people. I love those 10,000 good Mississippians in the National Guard who have now been federalized and requested to oppose me and their own people.

Barnett's son and son-in-law were among Guardsmen called to active duty by the President.

In his closing remarks, directed to federal officials, Barnett said:

"You are destroying the Constitution of this great nation. May God have mercy on your souls. Mississippi will continue to fight the Meredith case and all similar cases through the courts to restore the sovereignty of the state and constitutional government."

Heavy Blow

This statement had struck a heavy blow to the capital of Mississippi. The townspeople of New were in a fighting mood. The streets were alive with Confederate flags and some men even were complete Confederate uniforms.

Somebody played a phonograph record of "Dixie" the crowd let out a mighty cheer and surged toward the white pillars of the Governor's Mansion. They formed a ring around it that at one time was four deep. There were men, women, teenagers and even a few women carrying babies.

Despite the fact that there was no truth in the rumor that Barnett was going to be arrested, the crowd did not disperse until it got word that the governor would be safe.

Johnson said in his statement that President Kennedy called on the state to preserve law and order and then federalized the National Guard—"the only adequate instrumentality capable of preserving law and order should an emergency arise."

The lieutenant governor said the Administration and Council "the false issue of integration" throughout the entire situation.

Nearly 2,000 persons milled outside the Governor's Mansion Sunday after a Citizens Council leader called for volunteers to prevent any attempt to arrest Barnett.

Barnett who received many offers from volunteers throughout the day, conferred with segregation leaders, including former state Sen. Willie Rainach of Louisiana.

Gets Marshall County Post

Lewisburg Miss Martha Sue McCain of Waverly will assume duties here as home demonstration agent Oct. 15.

Miss McCain has served as assistant home agent in Humphrey's County three years. Her duties here will include both adult and 4-H club work. She is a graduate of David Lipscomb College, Nashville.

AP Wirephoto

Federal marshals wearing gas masks stand guard as students demonstrate on the campus of Ole Miss at Oxford in protest of court ordered enrollment of James Meredith, Negro Air Force veteran.

Oxford Victim 'Loved Life's Good Things'

New York (UPI)—Paul Guihard, who was killed in the integration riot on the University of Mississippi campus Sunday night had been a member of the New York office of the French News Agency (Agence France Presse) for the past three years.

Guihard, assigned to cover the government's attempt to enroll Negro James H Meredith in the all-white university, died of a bullet wound in his back.

The newsman also worked as a stringer (part-time correspondent) for The Daily Sketch of London.

His acquaintances described the stocky, redhaired Guihard as a man with a great sense of humor, out of the Peter Ustinov mold, a man who loved good food and the other good things of life.

Guihard was 36. He was born in London of French parents and enjoyed dual citizenship.

Guihard stopped to talk to newsmen at the press room at International Airport in New York before taking off for Oxford at 9 a.m. CST Sunday.

"I'm going to pose as a Kentucky colonel and cover this thing with a mint julep in my hand," the bearded Britisher told them. Newsmen who told him to be careful said Guihard laughed off the warning.

Guihard earned the nickname "Flash" for the energy and drive with which he plunged into stories.

He was a fun loving man with a red beard.

Among perilous tough assignments for Guihard were the ill-fated anti-Castro landings on Cuba's Bay of Pigs and the flood disaster in British Honduras.

He was the author of a one-act play called "The Rock Chair," which had been performed in a Greenwich Village cabaret theater.

His acquaintances said Guihard spoke Spanish and French as well as English.

He served in the British army and went to work for AFP after he was discharged. He worked for its offices in London and Paris before going to Paris and then to New York.

In another move of importance at Oxford involving a number of the press, Gordon Yoder of Tuscaloosa, chief of the United Press International bureau in Jackson, Miss., was headed up for the campus post.

Yoder was pulled from a station wagon by the crowd which roped him around his neck and dragged him. Then they began beating him.

The mob took every opportunity to vent its hatred for newsmen. Cameras were smashed, cars overturned, presumably in search of the cameras and packed in the fenders.

Yoder's wife was with him but apparently was not hurt.

AP Wirephoto

PAUL GUIHARD

Son Of Knoxville Newsman Held

Oxford, Miss. (UPI)—Joseph J. Levitt Jr., son of the city editor of the Knoxville News-Sentinel, was arrested or detained in the administration building on the University of Mississippi campus early today.

Levitt said he was taken into custody while working as a newsman on the scene.

Levitt, who was able to telephone United Press International in another building on campus, said he was being held in a room in the administration building. He said he was not under guard but at least 10 other persons were.

Patterson

(From Page One)

mouse to waive the rules to allow consideration of special resolution.

Action will be taken at the final conference session Thursday.

Patterson who said he is considering offering a resolution was named to a five-man resolutions committee headed by Gov. Price Daniel of Texas.

Under the regular procedure resolutions must be filed three weeks in advance of a session. None had come in within that time.

The Southern governors generally had expressed sympathy for Barnett's position but the majority said the basic issue involved was preserving law and order and that court decisions must be obeyed.

In opening remarks, Gov. Buford Ellington of Tennessee, conference chairman, and Gov. Farris Bryant of Florida, host governor, expressed hopes that a peaceful and rightful solution to the Mississippi problem would be found.

Ellington appealed to his fellow governors to resist headline grabbing on the emotional racial subject, and to concentrate on regular work of the conference.

Walker

(From Page One)

it is abundantly clear that Meredith should promptly be withdrawn from the campus and all efforts to enter him at the University of Mississippi be permanently abandoned."

"There is no way that Meredith can go to school at the University of Mississippi," he said. "The United States government should remove him."

Sen Herman E. Talmadge, D-Ga., said he deeply regretted the Mississippi situation. He commented that he was repeatedly and unsuccessfully sponsored legislation which would, he said, end encroachment by federal courts and "re-establish state and local control over public education."

Talmadge said the current situation results from "judicial usurpation" which, he said, was bolstered by the application of the federal power. He called it detrimental to the federal government process and said it will "serve" to divide the American people at a time when they should be united against the threat of Communism.

Sen Sam J. Ervin Jr. D-N.C. said those "fomenting" litigation which has such tragic results should remember St Paul's injunction that all which is lawful is not necessarily expedient.

Miss Lela Pearl Rogers

Clarksville—Funeral services for Miss Lela Pearl Rogers, 76, will be held Tuesday at 3 p.m. at Tarpley Funeral Home with burial in Greenwood Cemetery. Miss Rogers died Sunday in a Clarksville infirmary.

Paradoxes In Integration Crisis

Oxford, Miss. (UPI)—Paradoxes in the Mississippi integration crisis:

Ross Barnett, Jr., son of Mississippi's anti-integration governor was inducted into federal service to take action against his father's stand in the case of James H. Meredith. Young Barnett is a lieutenant in headquarters company of the Mississippi National Guard at Jackson. The unit was federalized Sunday.

John Stennis, a Jackson attorney and son of Sen. John C. Stennis, also was called to active duty. The elder Stennis has supported the governor in his fight to keep Meredith from enrolling at all-white Ole Miss.

Edwin A. Walker, who is a U.S. Army major general commanded the federal troops which integrated Central High School at Little Rock, and now a civilian, appeared on the Ole Miss campus in support of Barnett.

Col T. P. Birdsong, head of the Mississippi State Patrol which had been ordered by Barnett to prevent Meredith's admittance to the campus, rode with U.S. marshals in the lead car escorting the Negro applicant onto university property.

Student Rioting Brings 'Dishonor' Says Campus Editor

Oxford, Miss. (UPI)—The editor of the University of Mississippi student newspaper told his fellow students today they are bringing "dishonor and shame to the university and to the state of Mississippi" by participating in riots.

An open letter was made in a regular column of the Mississippian which "condemn" students not for their usual disdain for the comforts of campus and concentrating instead on the ways they worked.

Many of the newsmen covering the riot used the journalism building as a command post. It is on the edge of the campus.

John Brower, editor of the Mississippian, wrote this editorial for the riot issue of her paper:

"Try to be neutral to the entire student body and to anyone concerned with the present situation. Not only do the students chance forfeiting their education by participating in riots, but they are bringing dishonor and shame to the university and to the state of Mississippi.

"When students hurl rocks, bottles and eggs, the federal marshals are forced to resort to tear gas to back off the crowds.

"When outsiders show their objections in the form of violence, they are seriously injuring the students in their attempt to continue their education. As a student I beg you to return to your homes.

"This is a battle between the state of Mississippi and the United States government. The University is caught in the middle. The Civil War was fought 100 years ago over almost the same issues and the United States of America prevailed. The federal government is once again showing its strength and power to uphold the laws of our country.

"No matter what your convictions you should follow the advice of Gov. Ross Barnett by not taking any action for violence. Blood has already been shed and will continue to flow unless people realize the seriousness of the situation.

"Whatever your beliefs you are a citizen of the United States of America and of the state of Mississippi and should preserve peace and harmony of both governments."

Mississippi Case 'Disgraceful': Sen. Kefauver

Beverly Hills, Calif. (UPI)—U.S. Sen. Estes Kefauver today branded as "sad and disgraceful" the integration crisis at the University of Mississippi but praised President Kennedy's handling of the affair.

Kefauver told a political meeting it was absurd for Gov. Ross Barnett and other Mississippi officials to have thwarted until Sunday night a court order compelling enrollment of Negro student James H. Meredith at the tax-supported campus.

Washington announced about noon that at least 108 persons had been arrested.

Those included a Decatur, Ga., man, Melvin Bruce, 26, identified as a frequent companion of members of the American Nazi Party. He was accused by military authorities of sniping at the marshals Sunday night with a powerful rifle.

The dead were identified as Paul Guihard, correspondent for the French News Agency, who was found dead of a bullet wound in the back, and Ray Gunter, 23, an Oxford resident.

Maj. Gen. Edwin Walker, who resigned his Army commission under fire for his rightist views points, was seen during the rioting congratulating the students. He reappeared downtown this morning in a big, White Texas hat and began shaking hands—not was ushered out of courthouse square at bayonet point.

Walker, who commanded federal troops that former President Eisenhower sent to Little Rock during the school integration crisis in 1957, said he came here to take the other side and protest the use of federal force.

More Than Eight Hours

The campus rioting lasted more than eight hours and reached almost unbelievable heights. Many of the rioters were believed to be selfappointed vigilantes from the nearby countryside and from other parts of Mississippi and neighboring states.

Many were armed and bullets and shot whizzed across the campus much of the night.

One group of men tied down the accelerator of an automobile, jumped out and let it go in an attempt to mow down a group of marshals. It crashed into a tree before anyone was harmed.

The rioting in downtown Oxford this morning threatened for a time to become as violent and bloody but sufficient numbers of troops rushed in and, using time-honored riot control techniques, boxed the troublemakers into courthouse square.

Troops set up a skirmish line between downtown Oxford and the campus area and began moving in battle position along the line clearing it of anyone who seemed to be a troublemaker.

Troops in squad-sized groups moved outward from the skirmish line, clearing a wide area. Three soldiers jumped the hedge at the First Presbyterian Church and skirted across the lawn in the familiar stooped crouch of a soldier in an enemy town.

Presently troops began moving back to the square with young teenagers marching reluctantly ahead of them. Eight were placed under arrest within 15 minutes.

Under Patrol

Soldiers with their guns at the ready patrolled the many narrow streets and alleys in the downtown Oxford area.

Trouble started forming in downtown Oxford early in the day.

Roving bands of young toughs, some of them beneath college age and some above, walked the streets, many of them carried rocks and clubs. There was no effort by local police, the sheriff's office or the state patrol to stop them although several patrol cars were observed passing by the groups.

The youths usually travelled in groups of about eight or 10 and walked the wide sidewalks of the downtown area in a belligerent manner.

It was after this had gone on for more than an hour that the first military units — a couple of squads of MPs — turned up.

The cops of the...ruined rocks, Molotov cocktails and gunfire on federal forces formed in pockets all over the campus and had to be routed out by soldiers.

In the downtown area a car containing two Negroes was stoned this morning while four carloads of highway patrolmen and police sat and watched.

The car swerved into a gas station and the two Negroes jumped out and fled inside.

Knocked Out

Street lights in and around the campus were knocked out by the demonstrators and the darkness was broken only by the flash of gunfire and the ugly splash of flaming gasoline that sprayed from the rioters' "Molotov cocktails."

Demonstrators were making wide use of fire bombs in the downtown area again this morning. One group of about six boys were seen carrying a wooden case filled with bottles of gas, which are wrapped in paper, set aflame and hurled.

One was thrown at a passing Army truck, but the truck continued on without suffering any apparent serious damage.

Another boy wearing a Confederate cap raced in front of a truck and placed a broken bottle in its path. When the truck stopped another boy hurled a bottle at the driver. It was not immediately determined whether the driver was hurt.

A car with an elderly Negro woman inside also was the target for a rain of bottles, but the vehicle managed to continue on through the barrage.

Many of the city's Negro employes turned up for work in the downtown area, only to find their employers had not arrived. Most of them were obviously frightened and immediately left the area.

Army troops began moving onto the campus at 10 p.m. CST, three hours after the riot began, but it was not until 4 a.m. that the last stubborn segregationists were routed and some arrested.

Mob violence was unleashed in less than four hours than in the six-month period when U.S. paratroopers forced integration of Central High School in Little Rock five years ago.

Twelve marshals were either wounded or injured, three of them seriously, and five soldiers were hurt.

Most of the wounds were caused by bricks and bows with lengths of pipe. But there were some gunshot wounds.

Many of the rioters were apparently students from Mississippi State College at Starkville. A massive demonstration was conducted there Sunday afternoon including marches through the Negro section of Starkville and the burning of an effigy of President Kennedy.

Meredith, 29, a Negro veteran of the Korean War who thrice had been denied entry to the campus by Gov. Barnett and Lt. Gov. Paul B. Johnson was escorted secretly into the university by a motorcade of U. S. marshals and bedded down for the night at a dormitory which was put under heavy guard.

Neither Barnett nor Johnson was in Oxford when the riots broke out between gun-wielding civilians and the federal marshals.

Barnett ordered the State Highway Patrol not to attempt to stop the federal marshals. Both he and Kennedy advised the students not to resort to violence.

But that was not to be.

Shortly before 8 p.m. CST, the word flashed around the campus that Meredith was th... And, even as Kennedy spoke, the riot began. A group of students threw lighted cigarets on the canvas top of a truck carrying U. S. marshals. The canvas caught fire and the marshals, in steel helmets painted white and wearing orange vests with tear gas grenades, jumped out.

First Barrage

Then they fired the first barrage of tear gas at the students.

The murky white fumes rose and all but obscured the first floor of the main administration building. Students, screaming and yelling, bolted away to get out of the stinging gas. Nose, tears streaming, went into YMCA building and stood on chairs to listen to Kennedy on TV. Afterwards, many of them went back out and rejoined the violence.

The riot grew even worse after Guihard and Gunter were killed. One group started an automobile full speed at a group of marshals and jumped out. The car hit a tree.

Newsmen were beaten. Cameras were destroyed. Radio station sound trucks had their insides ripped out. Other cars were set afire.

One youth fired a fire extinguisher into the face of one of the drivers of the trucks used to bring in the marshals. A state highway patrolman was struck in the face by a tear gas cartridge. A U.S. marshal was shot in the neck.

List Of Units In Oxford Or En Route To Scene

Washington (UPI)—Following is a Defense Department list of troop units either already in or around Oxford, Miss., or en route there:

The 70th Engineers, from Ft. Campbell, Ky.

The 503rd Military Police Battalion, Ft. Bragg, N. C.

From Ft. Dix, N. J., the 716th Military Police Battalion.

The 108th Cavalry Regiment, a Mississippi National Guard unit.

The 1st and 2nd Battle Groups of the Mississippi National Guard.

From Ft. Benning, Ga., the 2nd Battle Group of the 23rd Infantry.

The 720th Military Police from Ft. Hood, Tex.

AP Wirephoto

James Meredith is escorted onto the University of Mississippi campus at Oxford for court ordered enrollment.

Tashville Banner.

Newspaper — LONG MAY OUR LAND BE BRIGHT WITH FREEDOM'S HOLY LIGHT; PROTECT US BY THY MIGHT, GREAT GOD, OUR KING — Founded, April 10, 1876

149 — NASHVILLE, TENN., MONDAY AFTERNOON, OCT. 1, 1962 — 34 PAGES — PRICE: TEN CENTS

EREDITH ATTENDS CLASSES
S GIs BATTLE RIOTERS

AP Wirephoto

A jeep borne Army troops leaves the main gate of the University of Mississippi at Oxford after patrolling the riot torn campus.

lker Arrested In Oxford

Oxford, Miss. (UPI)—Negro James Meredith registered today at the University of Mississippi and began attending classes on a campus littered with the debris of a major riot that took two lives and injured at least 75 persons.

"It is not a happy occasion," he said.

About 100 U.S. deputy marshals and 1,000 federal troops guarded the campus as the 29-year-old Negro cracked the segregation barriers of the 114-year-old school.

The campus was brought under military control early today but the rioting spread to downtown Oxford and at least one soldier was hurt in a barrage of rocks, timbers and pop bottles before the crowd was dispersed with tear gas and reinforcements were brought in.

Witnesses said several shots were fired at the troops at one point downtown. The troops, identified as Mississippi National Guardsmen, immediately rushed forward and fired rifle shots over the heads of the crowd.

At least 30 rioters were rounded up. Most of them were young men. They were ordered to keep their hands over their heads and were marshaled at bayonet point to the courthouse.

In Jackson, Gov. Ross Barnett was in seclusion but his office issued a statement saying "there has been an invasion of our state resulting in bloodshed of our citizens and threatened bloodshed of others." The Capitol building's Mississippi state flag flew at half-staff.

Walks Amid Shouts

Meredith, whose determination to desegregate "Ole Miss" brought about a conflict that threatened to rock the federal union, walked solemnly to an American colonial history class at 9 a.m. CST to shouts of "nigger, nigger" and "was it worth two deaths?"

He was accompanied to the classes by three deputy marshals and U.S. Department of Justice Representative Ed Guthman.

The Negro was met at the registrar's office by University Registrar Robert B. Ellis who

(Turn to Page 12, Column 7)

Deputy U.S. Marshals Jack Evins and James Komp, both of Nashville, were among the Federal marshals flown to Oxford, Miss., from Millington Naval Air Base near Memphis. They arrived in Oxford about 2:30 p.m. Sunday.

'Round The Clock
WITH RED O'DONNELL

MONDAY'S MESSAGE

Pinckney Keel gave some State Fair tickets to Jean (7), Billy (9) & Becky (11) Martin, 1309 20th Ave. S.

Jean's letter of thanks read:

"I enjoyed the Fair. Thank You.

"P.S.—Becky & Billy enjoyed it too but they're in bed."

Ellington Aim: Avoid Issue At Conference

By NEIL CUNNINGHAM
Banner Staff Writer

Hollywood, Fla.—Gov. Buford Ellington today implied he will resist any effort to involve the Southern Governors' Conference in the integration struggle between Mississippi and the federal government.

Ellington, chairman of the 17-state organization, opened the conference here this morning stating, "We can use the governors' conference as a spotlighted platform from which to sound off on issues of an emotional or political nature and thus join in the game of demagoguery, preceding words where action is needed and confusion where understanding is necessary.

"On the other hand, we can and I hope that we will, rise above pettiness in politics and the rantings of violent segregationists or psychopaths such as retired Gen. Edwin A. Walker."

Young said if Walker made the statements attributed to him, "I am glad he is no longer and a private citizen instead of in command of any youth in this country."

"I hold him in utmost contempt for his appearance on the campus of this great university, 'Ole Miss,' and for attempting to lead a charge of some 1,000 unruly rioters against United States marshals," Young said.

Dispatches from Oxford, Miss., said Walker sought to lead a charge by rioters against U.S. marshals and quoted him as saying to students: "If you can't win, go home. Don't stay at the university. But let's not quit. We can win."

In another Senate speech Rep. Thomas G. Abernethy, D-Miss., said today: "An inexperienced U.S. marshal" fired the shot in the rioting at the University of Mississippi campus against "a gang of kids who were doing nothing."

Abernethy said the marshal "got excited" and fired a tear gas shell into the crowd. He said it hit a state policeman "who is either dead or at the point of death."

"So help me, God, that's what happened," Abernethy told the House.

The Mississippian, in an emotion-filled speech, said university authorities pleaded with the Justice Department to wait until Monday morning to bring Negro student James H. Meredith to the campus, promising to publish and broadcast appeals for calm.

"But the Justice Department was not to be denied," he said.

Sen. James O. Eastland, told the Senate that information reported by university officials indicated that "Amateurism by untrained marshals" in firing tear gas shells caused Sunday night's bloody campus riot.

The other Sen. John C. Stennis, said in a statement that the mere presence of Negro James H. Meredith on the campus was the cause of what he called a "frightful night."

"To avoid further bloodshed and loss of life," Stennis said,

(Turn to Page 12, Column 4)

(Turn to Page 12, Column 1)

state of the University of Mississippi problem and the Southern Governors' Conference is not in position to offer any advice."

He added that it would be his guess that there would not be

Barnett Plans To Send Lawyers To U.S. Court

Jackson, Miss. (AP)—Gov. Ross Barnett planned to send his attorneys to the 5th U.S. Circuit

Meredith, a Negro, in the University of Mississippi.

Part of the purge may have come Sunday night when Barnett issued from the Governor's Mansion where he spent the night.

In the statement, issued before the rioting began on the

By Reason—Not Temper—
Mississippi Tragedy Could Have Been Averted
(An Editorial)

BLIND, BLUNDERING, BLUDGEONING sectistry—irrespective of which "side" it is on—can only compound the tragedy of Mississippi; antagonizing further the controversy that could and should have been settled without recourse to either military invasion or insurrective violence.

Foresight should have noted that as clearly as hindsight now discerns it, today restraining effect on both state and federal authorities, on whom a joint responsibility has rested—and each of which, again, has contributed to the unseemly spectacle of breakdown in law and order.

Let it be said once more that this nation cannot tolerate chaos and anarchy, from any cause.

Regardless of personal feeling, or considerations of political advantage on either side, this case should have been settled far short of the present calamitous showdown; and would have been had calm judgment prevailed to reason its way to a solution. Instead, free rein was given to tempers.

* * *

MISSISSIPPI COULD HAVE resolved this issue, as have other states—including Tennessee—no less mindful of states' rights in policy determination, and opposing compulsory integration, but aware of the legal obstacles erected when turned back by every level of the federal judiciary. They bowed to the necessity for observance of the law, however much it incurred individual or mass resentment.

Throughout this ordeal, state by state and section-wide, there has been the incitation to hysteria, much of it cultivated by aggravating processes of various pressure groups. And the outrageous, fact is—to which these elements are indifferent—that the Negro as an individual or citizen group has been the pawn in all of this political hawhawing on the part of Democrats and Republicans alike—exploited by the parties in power.

The present is no exception.

* * *

PRESIDENT KENNEDY last night spoke to the point of peaceful solution via reason on both sides. His firm and temperate message, though late, was addressed to the mind and heart of a thinking people; and was respectful of such marking the vast constituency of Mississippi.

The Banner does not believe that it was either necessary or advantageous to send troops, as such, as they were almost immediately dispatched. The National Guard of Mississippi had been federalized, and was on the scene, along with hundreds of U.S. marshals—a force adequate to any task of law enforcement, or the purpose to which they were assigned.

As it did in the case of Little Rock, when it was President Eisenhower dispatching the 101st Airborne Division, this newspaper condemns no less the military invasion, on Mr. Kennedy's order, of a sovereign state.

Two factors there were present almost automatically calculated to touch off the student rioting that occurred: (1) the sight of federal forces, deemed a trespass; and (2) the presence of former Maj. Gen. Edwin Walker, whopping it up for a demonstration of resistance. The latter was no less out of place than the former, and a contributory circumstance to the turmoil erupting into tragedy.

* * *

LATE AS IT IS, all parties concerned must come to their senses—for the settlement, by law, that should have occurred days ago. It is Aristide's prayer, surely, that it will end here—by responsible address to the realities, chief of which is decency's paramount interest in orderly government under law.

It is about time, by the way, for the revered Confederate Flag—an honored symbol—to cease being misused for rabble-rousing appeals to rioters, old or young. The stain of such is on it no less than on Old Glory.

* * *

[fol. 2029]

Tashville Banner.

Newspaper — LONG MAY OUR LAND BE BRIGHT WITH FREEDOM'S HOLY LIGHT; PROTECT US BY THY MIGHT, GREAT GOD, OUR KING — Founded, April 10, 1876

149 — NASHVILLE, TENN., MONDAY AFTERNOON, OCT. 1, 1962 — 34 PAGES — PRICE: TEN CENTS

EREDITH ATTENDS CLASSES
S GIs BATTLE RIOTERS

AP Wirephoto

A jeep borne Army troops leaves the main gate of the University of Mississippi at Oxford after patrolling the riot torn campus.

lker Arrested In Oxford

Oxford, Miss. (UPI)—Negro James Meredith registered today at the University of Mississippi and began attending classes on a campus littered with the debris of a major riot that took two lives and injured at least 75 persons.

"It is not a happy occasion," he said.

About 100 U.S. deputy marshals and 1,000 federal troops guarded the campus as the 29-year-old Negro cracked the segregation barriers of the 114-year-old school.

The campus was brought under military control early today but the rioting spread to downtown Oxford and at least one soldier was hurt in a barrage of rocks, timbers and pop bottles before the crowd was dispersed with tear gas and reinforcements were brought in.

Witnesses said several shots were fired at the troops at one point downtown. The troops, identified as Mississippi National Guardsmen, immediately rushed forward and fired rifle shots over the heads of the crowd.

At least 30 rioters were rounded up. Most of them were young men. They were ordered to keep their hands over their heads and were marshaled at bayonet point to the courthouse.

In Jackson, Gov. Ross Barnett was in seclusion but his office issued a statement saying "there has been an invasion of our state resulting in bloodshed of our citizens and threatened bloodshed of others." The Capitol building's Mississippi state flag flew at half-staff.

Walks Amid Shouts

Meredith, whose determination to desegregate "Ole Miss" brought about a conflict that threatened to rock the federal union, walked solemnly to an American colonial history class at 9 a.m. CST to shouts of "nigger, nigger" and "was it worth two deaths?"

He was accompanied to the classes by three deputy marshals and U.S. Department of Justice Representative Ed Guthman.

The Negro was met at the registrar's office by University Registrar Robert B. Ellis who

(Turn to Page 12, Column 7)

Deputy U.S. Marshals Jack Evins and James Komp, both of Nashville, were among the Federal marshals flown to Oxford, Miss., from Millington Naval Air Base near Memphis. They arrived in Oxford about 2:30 p.m. Sunday.

'Round The Clock
WITH RED O'DONNELL

MONDAY'S MESSAGE

Pinckney Keel gave some State Fair tickets to Jean (7), Billy (9) & Becky (11) Martin, 1309 20th Ave. S.

Jean's letter of thanks read:

"I enjoyed the Fair. Thank You.

"P.S.—Becky & Billy enjoyed it too but they're in bed."

Ellington Aim: Avoid Issue At Conference

By NEIL CUNNINGHAM
Banner Staff Writer

Hollywood, Fla.—Gov. Buford Ellington today implied he will resist any effort to involve the Southern Governors' Conference in the integration struggle between Mississippi and the federal government.

Ellington, chairman of the 17-state organization, opened the conference here this morning stating, "We can use the governors' conference as a spotlighted platform from which to sound off on issues of an emotional or political nature and thus join in the game of demagoguery, preceding words where action is needed and confusion where understanding is necessary.

"On the other hand, we can and I hope that we will, rise above pettiness in politics and the rantings of violent segregationists or psychopaths such as retired Gen. Edwin A. Walker."

Young said if Walker made the statements attributed to him, "I am glad he is no longer and a private citizen instead of in command of any youth in this country."

"I hold him in utmost contempt for his appearance on the campus of this great university, 'Ole Miss,' and for attempting to lead a charge of some 1,000 unruly rioters against United States marshals," Young said.

Dispatches from Oxford, Miss., said Walker sought to lead a charge by rioters against U.S. marshals and quoted him as saying to students: "If you can't win, go home. Don't stay at the university. But let's not quit. We can win."

In another Senate speech Rep. Thomas G. Abernethy, D-Miss., said today: "An inexperienced U.S. marshal" fired the shot in the rioting at the University of Mississippi campus against "a gang of kids who were doing nothing."

Abernethy said the marshal "got excited" and fired a tear gas shell into the crowd. He said it hit a state policeman "who is either dead or at the point of death."

"So help me, God, that's what happened," Abernethy told the House.

The Mississippian, in an emotion-filled speech, said university authorities pleaded with the Justice Department to wait until Monday morning to bring Negro student James H. Meredith to the campus, promising to publish and broadcast appeals for calm.

"But the Justice Department was not to be denied," he said.

Sen. James O. Eastland, told the Senate that information reported by university officials indicated that "Amateurism by untrained marshals" in firing tear gas shells caused Sunday night's bloody campus riot.

The other Sen. John C. Stennis, said in a statement that the mere presence of Negro James H. Meredith on the campus was the cause of what he called a "frightful night."

"To avoid further bloodshed and loss of life," Stennis said,

(Turn to Page 12, Column 4)

(Turn to Page 12, Column 1)

state of the University of Mississippi problem and the Southern Governors' Conference is not in position to offer any advice."

He added that it would be his guess that there would not be

Barnett Plans To Send Lawyers To U.S. Court

Jackson, Miss. (AP)—Gov. Ross Barnett planned to send his attorneys to the 5th U.S. Circuit

Meredith, a Negro, in the University of Mississippi.

Part of the purge may have come Sunday night when Barnett issued from the Governor's Mansion where he spent the night.

In the statement, issued before the rioting began on the

By Reason—Not Temper—
Mississippi Tragedy Could Have Been Averted
(An Editorial)

BLIND, BLUNDERING, BLUDGEONING sectistry—irrespective of which "side" it is on—can only compound the tragedy of Mississippi; antagonizing further the controversy that could and should have been settled without recourse to either military invasion or insurrective violence.

Foresight should have noted that as clearly as hindsight now discerns it, today restraining effect on both state and federal authorities, on whom a joint responsibility has rested—and each of which, again, has contributed to the unseemly spectacle of breakdown in law and order.

Let it be said once more that this nation cannot tolerate chaos and anarchy, from any cause.

Regardless of personal feeling, or considerations of political advantage on either side, this case should have been settled far short of the present calamitous showdown; and would have been had calm judgment prevailed to reason its way to a solution. Instead, free rein was given to tempers.

* * *

MISSISSIPPI COULD HAVE resolved this issue, as have other states—including Tennessee—no less mindful of states' rights in policy determination, and opposing compulsory integration, but aware of the legal obstacles erected when turned back by every level of the federal judiciary. They bowed to the necessity for observance of the law, however much it incurred individual or mass resentment.

Throughout this ordeal, state by state and section-wide, there has been the incitation to hysteria, much of it cultivated by aggravating processes of various pressure groups. And the outrageous, fact is—to which these elements are indifferent—that the Negro as an individual or citizen group has been the pawn in all of this political hawhawing on the part of Democrats and Republicans alike—exploited by the parties in power.

The present is no exception.

* * *

PRESIDENT KENNEDY last night spoke to the point of peaceful solution via reason on both sides. His firm and temperate message, though late, was addressed to the mind and heart of a thinking people; and was respectful of such marking the vast constituency of Mississippi.

The Banner does not believe that it was either necessary or advantageous to send troops, as such, as they were almost immediately dispatched. The National Guard of Mississippi had been federalized, and was on the scene, along with hundreds of U.S. marshals—a force adequate to any task of law enforcement, or the purpose to which they were assigned.

As it did in the case of Little Rock, when it was President Eisenhower dispatching the 101st Airborne Division, this newspaper condemns no less the military invasion, on Mr. Kennedy's order, of a sovereign state.

Two factors there were present almost automatically calculated to touch off the student rioting that occurred: (1) the sight of federal forces, deemed a trespass; and (2) the presence of former Maj. Gen. Edwin Walker, whopping it up for a demonstration of resistance. The latter was no less out of place than the former, and a contributory circumstance to the turmoil erupting into tragedy.

* * *

LATE AS IT IS, all parties concerned must come to their senses—for the settlement, by law, that should have occurred days ago. It is Aristide's prayer, surely, that it will end here—by responsible address to the realities, chief of which is decency's paramount interest in orderly government under law.

It is about time, by the way, for the revered Confederate Flag—an honored symbol—to cease being misused for rabble-rousing appeals to rioters, old or young. The stain of such is on it no less than on Old Glory.

* * *

[fol. 2029]

AP Wirephoto

A long line of jeep borne Army troops leaves the main gate of the University of Mississippi at Oxford after patrolling the riot torn campus.

Walker Arrested In Oxford

Oxford, Miss. (UPI)—Negro James Meredith registered today at the University of Mississippi and began attending classes on a campus littered with the debris of a major riot that took two lives and injured at least 75 persons.

"It is not a happy occasion," he said.

About 100 U.S. deputy marshals and 1,000 federal troops guarded the campus as the 29-year-old Negro cracked the segregation barriers of the 114-year-old school.

The campus was brought under military control early today but the rioting spread to downtown Oxford and at least one soldier was hurt in a barrage of rocks, timbers and pop bottles before the crowd was dispersed with tear gas and reinforcements were brought in.

Witnesses said several shots were fired at the troops at one point downtown. The troops, identified as Mississippi National Guardsmen, immediately rushed forward and fired rifle shots over the heads of the crowd.

At least 20 rioters were rounded up. Most of them were young boys. They were ordered to place their hands over their heads and were marched at bayonet point to the courthouse.

In Jackson, Gov. Ross Barnett was in seclusion but his office issued a statement saying "there has been an invasion of our state resulting in bloodshed of our citizens and threatened bloodshed of others." The Capitol building's Mississippi state flag flew at half-staff.

Walks Amid Shouts

Meredith, whose determination to desegregate "Ole Miss" brought about a conflict that threatened to rock the federal union, walked solemnly to his American colonial history class at 9 a.m. CST to shouts of "nigger, nigger" and "was it worth two deaths?"

He was accompanied to the classbo by three deputy marshals and U.S. Department of Justice Representative Ed Guthman.

The Negro was met at the registrar's office by University Registrar Robert B. Ellis who

(Turn to Page 12, Column 7)

Deputy U.S. Marshals Jack Ewing and James Kemp, both of Nashville, were among the Federal marshals flown to Oxford, Miss., from Millington Naval Air Base near Memphis. They arrived in Oxford about 2:30 a.m. Sunday.

'Round The Clock

WITH RED O'DONNELL

MONDAY'S MESSAGE

Pinckney 'Keel gave some State Fair tickets to Jean (7), Billy (9) & Becky (11) Martin, 1309 25th Ave. E.

Jean's letter of thanks read:

"I injoyed the Fair. Thank You.

"P.S.—Becky & Billy injoyed it to but they're to lasy to write.

"P.S.—I Love You."

O'Donnell

CINEMA GIG — Movie theater marquee:

"Listen-Patterson Fight Films & Other Selected Shorts."

JETTY—Mel Barnes phoned the airlines office and asked "How long does it take to fly from Nashville to Phoenix, Ariz.?"

"Just a minute," said the reservationist.

"Thanks," replied Barnes and hung up.

OOPS—Didja hear about the

(Turn to Page 5, Column 3)

Market Trends

New York (UP) — The stock market took another fairly sharp loss in moderately active trading early this afternoon.

The Associated Press average of 60 stocks at noon was off 1.2 at 213.7 with industrials down 2.1 rails down .3, and utilities down .5.

Although losses of most key stocks ranged only from fractions to about a point, weakness in a scattering of pivotal issues brought them declines of more than that and weighted market averages more sharply to the downside.

Some of the "growth" issues also fell more sharply than the over-all list.

Weather Report

NASHVILLE FORECAST — Cloudy and mild with periods of rain this afternoon and Tuesday. High this afternoon in the 70s. Low tonight about 50 with the high Tuesday near 70. Outlook for Wednesday: Mostly cloudy and cool.

Temperatures

12 midnight	59	7 a.m.	56
1 a.m.	59	8 a.m.	63
2 a.m.	57	9 a.m.	66
3 a.m.	56	10 a.m.	70
4 a.m.	54	11 a.m.	72
5 a.m.	53	12 Noon	72
6 a.m.	52	1 p.m.	72

Court Opens Mixing Bar Hearings

By LARRY BRINTON and BRAD CARLISLE

The first of 14 policeblitz injunctions against downtown mixing bars got under way today in Criminal Court with Raymond Leathers hearing State's evidence against the Lido Club, a Printer's Alley bistro.

Hearings on two other mixing bars, the Zanzibar and Jolly Roger and a petition to cite their owner, A. J. (Mickey) Kreitner, with contempt of court, was scheduled to begin this afternoon before John L. Draper, judge of Div. II Criminal Court.

The injunctions sought against seven bars in Printer's Alley, the city's best known nightclub strip, and seven others in the area of Broadway, Commerce street and Sixth Avenue N., resulted from a series of whisky raids by sheriff's patrolmen and City police.

The bars are accused of illegally selling mixed drinks. State laws permit bars to mix drinks for customers who bring their own whisky.

Dist. Atty. Gen. Harry Nichol said approximately 100 witnesses, including police officers, missing

(Turn to Page 2, Column 2)

FEATURE INDEX

Amusements	18	Horoscope	6
Bridge	19	Jumble	19
Business	20	Markets	20
Comics	20	Outdoors	28
Crossword	6	Radio & TV	21
Dr. Alice	29	Russell	21
Editorials	4	Sor.	14-15
Farm Talk	22	Sports	24-27
Garden Talk	18	Want Ads	29-33
Helen	5	Woman's	21

Ellington Aim: Avoid Issue At Conference

By NEIL CUNNINGHAM
Banner Staff Writer

Hollywood, Fla.—Gov. Buford Ellington today implied he will resist any effort to involve the Southern Governors' Conference in the integration struggle between Mississippi and the federal government.

Ellington, chairman of the 17 state organization, opened the conference here this morning stating, "We can use these events as a spotlighted platform from which to round off on issues of an emotional or political nature and thus join in the game of demagoguery, providing words where action is needed and confusion where understanding is necessary.

"On the other hand, we can and I hope that we will, use these problems in politics and use these conferences as a forum for constructive discussion and realistic examination of the problems facing our states, and as a means of giving the weight of regional or national effort toward meeting problems not necessarily confined within the boundaries of an individual state."

Chief Topic

The Mississippi integration situation has been the chief topic of conversation since the governors and their aides began arriving here Sunday for their 28th annual meeting.

Governors have been asked time and time again whether they favor or disapprove of Gov. Ross Barnett's action in attempting to prohibit the enrollment of James H. Meredith as the first Negro student in the history of the University of Mississippi.

At the first press conference of the session, Ellington established a theme followed by several other governors when he stated the Meredith case "is a problem of the University of Mississippi, not in position to offer any advice."

He added that it would be his guess that there would not be

(Turn to Page 12, Column 1)

Why Not Face Truth On Cuba?

Why not face the truth about Soviet-dominated Cuba and its dire implications for the United States? That's what Clare Boothe Luce does in four penetrating articles, the first of which appears today on Page 4.

Barnett Plans To Send Lawyers To U.S. Court

Jackson, Miss. (UP)—Gov. Ross Barnett planned to send his attorneys to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals today—perhaps to seek removal of the stern penalties for contempt leveled against him.

Barnett must purge himself of contempt by 11 a.m. Tuesday or be jailed and fined $10,000 daily. This was the penalty set by eight appeals judges for blocking enrollment of James H. Meredith, a Negro, in the University of Mississippi.

Part of the purge may have come Sunday night when Barnett, in an emotional message to Mississippi citizens, indirectly said he was giving up physical resistance to federal court edicts.

Completely Surrounded

"We are now completely surrounded by armed forces and we are physically overpowered," the governor said in a statement issued from the Governor's Mansion where he spent the night.

In the statement, issued before the rioting began on the Ole Miss campus at Oxford, 180 miles away, the 66-year-old governor vowed he would "never yield a single inch in my determination to win the fight we are all engaged in."

He said this fight would be in the courts.

Barnett said he had no plans at this time to close the university, although he had previously said he would shut the school to avoid integration.

Federal marshals whisked Meredith on to the Oxford campus at sunset Sunday. The 29-year-old Negro was given a campus apartment but university officials refused to register him on the Sabbath.

Lt. Gov. Paul Johnson who physically prevented Meredith from registering last Wednesday, also has until 11 a.m. Tuesday to purge himself of con-

(Turn to Page 12, Column 2)

Patterson, Faubus Place Bloodshed Blame On U.S.

Hollywood Fla. (AP) Two Southern governors declared angrily today the federal government must accept responsibility for bloodshed in the Mississippi integration dispute and announced they were backing Gov. Ross Barnett 100 per cent.

Gov. John Patterson of Alabama told newsmen as the Southern Governors conference got under way that he would like to see the conference go on record endorsing Barnett's action.

Backing up his stand, Gov. Orval Faubus of Arkansas said the lesson the federal government should learn in the Mississippi and Little Rock integration struggles is that social changes can't be accomplished by force.

"You can do certain things by coercion and be successful," Faubus declared. "Certain processes must come by evolution."

Patterson, who arrived this morning, said, "We stand ready in Alabama to support Governor Barnett and the people of Mississippi in any way they deem necessary."

He declined to comment on a report that he had placed the Alabama Highway Patrol on a five-minute alert because of events in neighboring Mississippi.

The 18 Southern governors on hand here evidenced growing concern over violence in Mississippi and cleared the way for consideration of a resolution on the subject.

At the opening conference session, the governors voted unan-

(Turn to Page 12, Column 3)

By Reason—Not Temper—

Mississippi Tragedy C Have Been Averted

(An Editorial)

BLIND, BLUNDERING, BLUDGEONING zeal respective of which "side" it is on—can only c the tragedy of Mississippi; antagonizing further traversy that could and should have been settled recourse to either military invasion or insurrec lence.

Foresight should have noted that as clearly as now discerns it, for a restraining effect on both federal authorities, on whom a joint responsibility ed—and each of which, again, has contributed to seemly spectacle of breakdown in law and order.

Let it be said once more that this nation tolerate chaos and anarchy, from any cause.

Regardless of personal feeling, or considera political advantage on either side, this case sho been settled far short of the present calamitous sh and would have been had calm judgment prevaile on its way to a solution. Instead, free rein was tempers.

* * *

MISSISSIPPI COULD HAVE resolved this issue other states—including Tennessee—no less m states' rights in policy determination, and oppos pulsory integration, but aware of the legal obstacle when turned back by every level of the federal They bowed to the necessity for observance of the ever much it incurred individual or mass resentment

Throughout this ordeal, state by state and sect there has been the incitation to hysteria, much of vated by aggravating processes of various pressur And the outrageous fact is—to which these elem indifferent—that the Negro as an individual o group has been the pawn in all of this political h on the part of Democrats and Republicans alike— by the parties in power.

The present is no exception.

* * *

PRESIDENT KENNEDY last night spoke to the peaceful solution via reason on both sides. and temperate message, though late, was addresse mind and heart of a thinking people; and was of such marking the vast constituency of Mississi

The Banner does not believe that it was either sary or advantageous to send troops, as such, as th almost immediately dispatched. The National G Mississippi had been federalized, and was on th along with hundreds of U.S. marshals—a force to any task of law enforcement, or the purpose they were assigned.

As it did in the case of Little Rock, when it w dent Eisenhower dispatching the 101st Airborne this newspaper condemns no less the military inv Mr. Kennedy's order, of a sovereign state.

Two factors there were present almost auto calculated to touch off the student rioting that (1) the sight of federal forces, deemed a trespass the presence of former Maj. Gen. Edwin Walker, it up for a demonstration of resistance. The latte less out of place than the former, and a contribu cumstance to the turmoil erupting into tragedy.

* * *

LATE AS IT IS, all parties concerned must come to a concession—for the settlement, by law, that sho occurred days ago. It is America's prayer, surely will end here—by responsible address to the realiti of which is decency's paramount interest in orderly ment under law.

It is about time, by the way, for the raver federate Flag—an honored symbol—to cease bei used for rabble-rousing appeals to rioters, old or The stain of such is on it no less than on Old Glo

* * * * * *

His 'Duty To Call Ou Troops,' Says Kenne

Washington (AP) President Kennedy declared today it was his inescapable duty to call out troops when Mississippi defied court orders to enroll a Negro at the University of Mississippa.

Grim, yet conciliatory at times, the President said Sunday night in a short, radio-television address to the nation that he hoped it would be unnecessary to use troops, even though conciliation and persuasion had failed to obtain admission of James H. Meredith.

After his address Kennedy sat beside the telephone in his office getting up-to-the-minute reports on rioting, gunfire and tear gas sweeping across the university campus at Oxford and the arrival on the scene of federal military reinforcements.

Others Keep Vigil

Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy and several members of the White House staff kept the vigil with the Chief Executive.

Courts of law, all the way up to the Supreme Court, Kennedy said in his speech, ordered Meredith's admission into the university. When the orders were defied and those who carry them out were with arrest and vi U.S. Court of Appe clear the fact that t ment of its order h an obligation of the States government."

"Even though this had not originally be to the case," the Chief said, "my responsibili dent was therefore accept it . . .

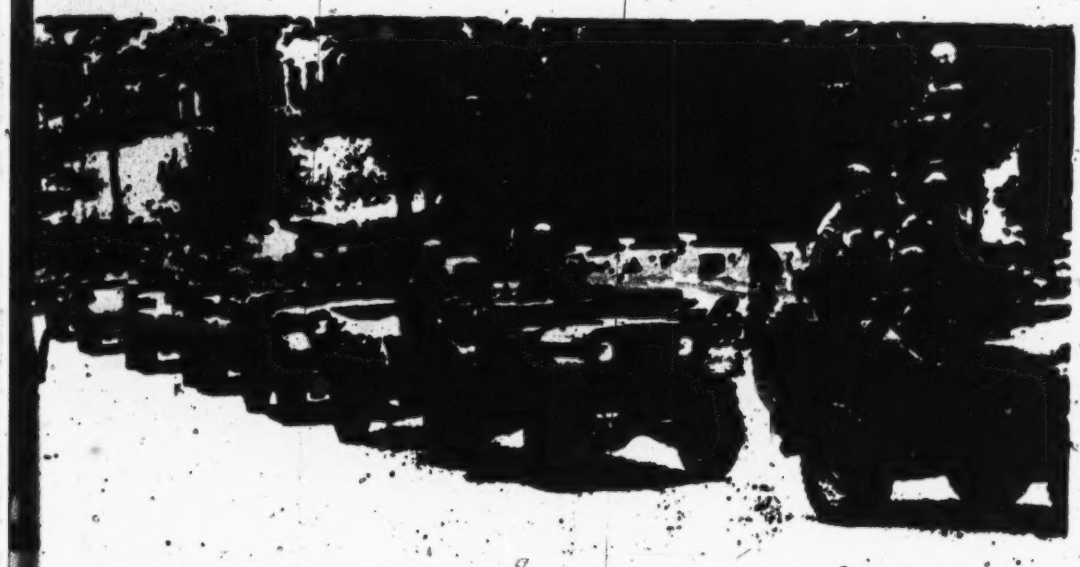
"I deeply regret th

(Turn to Page 12, C

New Yemen Tightening G

Aden (UP) The ne rulers of Yemen announced more execu arrests, apparently ti their grip on the litt country. They also c viet ab well as U Republic support fo gime.

Unconfirmed repo various moves within try aimed at crushin olutionary regime an the monarchy.



AP Wirephoto

Jeep borne Army troops leaves the main gate of the University of Mississippi at Oxford after patrolling the riot torn campus.

lker Arrested In Oxford

Oxford, Miss. (UPI)—Negro James Meredith registered today at the University of Mississippi and began attending classes on a campus littered with the debris of a major riot that took two lives and injured at least 75 persons.

"It is not a happy occasion," he said.

About 100 U.S. deputy marshals and 1,000 federal troops guarded the campus as the 29-year-old Negro cracked the segregation barriers of the 114-year-old school.

The campus was brought under military control early today but the rioting spread to downtown Oxford and at least one soldier was hurt in a barrage of rocks, timbers and pop bottles before the crowd was dispersed with tear gas and reinforcements were brought in.

Witnesses said several shots were fired at the troops at one point downtown. The troops, identified as Mississippi National Guardsmen, immediately rushed forward and fired rifle shots over the heads of the crowd.

At least 20 rioters were rounded up. Most of them were young boys. They were ordered to place their hands over their heads and were marched at bayonet point to the courthouse.

In Jackson, Gov. Ross Barnett was in seclusion but his office issued a statement saying "there has been an invasion of our state resulting in bloodshed of our citizens and threatened bloodshed of others." The Capitol building's Mississippi state flag flew at half-staff.

Walks Amid Shouts

Meredith, whose determination to desegregate "Ole Miss" brought about a conflict that threatened to rock the federal union, walked solemnly to an American colonial history class at 9 a.m. CST to shouts of "nigger, nigger" and "was it worth two deaths?"

He was accompanied to the classes by three deputy marshals and U.S. Department of Justice Representative Ed Guthman.

The Negro was met at the registrar's office by University Registrar Robert B. Ellis who

(Turn to Page 12, Column 7)

Deputy U.S. Marshals Josh Evins and James Komp, both of Nashville, were among the Federal marshals flown to Oxford, Miss., from Millington Naval Air Base near Memphis. They arrived in Oxford about 2:30 p.m. Sunday.

"the rantings of violent segregationists or psychopaths such as ex-Gen. Edwin A. Walker."

Young said if Walker made the "statements attributed to him, "I am glad he is an ex-general and a private citizen instead of in command of any youth in this country."

"I hold him in utmost contempt for his appearance on the campus of this great university. We can win.

In another Senate speech Rep. Thomas G. Abernethy, D-Miss., said today "An inexperienced U.S. marshal" fired the shot in the rioting at the University of Mississippi campus against "a group of kids who were doing nothing."

Abernethy said the marshal "got excited" and fired a tear gas shell into the crowd. He said it hit a state policeman "who is either dead or at the point of death."

"So help me, God, that's what happened," Abernethy told the House.

The Mississippian, in an emotion-filled speech, said university authorities pleaded with the Justice Department to wait until Monday morning to bring Negro student James H. Meredith to the campus, promising to publish and broadcast appeals for calm.

"But the Justice Department was not to be denied," he said.

Sen. James O. Eastland, told the Senate that information reported by university officials indicated that "Amateurism by untrained marshals" in firing tear gas shells caused Sunday night's bloody campus riot.

The other, Sen. John C. Stennis, said in a statement that the mere" presence, of Negro James H. Meredith on the campus was the cause of what he called a "frightful night."

"To avoid further bloodshed and loss of life," Stennis said,

(Turn to Page 12, Column 4)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Ellington Aim: Avoid Issue At Conference

By NEIL CUNNINGHAM
Banner Staff Writer

Hollywood, Fla.—Gov. Buford Ellington today implied he will resist any effort to involve the Southern Governors' Conference in the integration struggle between Mississippi and the federal government.

Ellington, chairman of the 15-state organization, opened the conference here this morning stating, "We can use these events as a spotlighted platform from which to sound off on issues of an emotional or political nature and thus join in the game of demagoguery, providing words where action is needed and confusion where understanding is necessary.

"On the other hand, we can and I hope that we will, rise above pettiness in politics and use these conferences as a forum for constructive discussion and realistic examination of the problems facing our states, and as a means of giving the weight of regional or national effort toward meeting problems not necessarily confined with nthe boundaries of an individual state."

Chief Topic

The Mississippi integration situation has been the chief topic of conversation since the governors and their aides began arriving here Sunday for their 28th annual meeting.

Governors have been asked here in the time and time again whether they favor or disapprove of Gov. Ross Barnett's action in attempting to prohibit the enrollment of James H. Meredith as the first Negro student in the state of the University of Mississippi.

At the first press conference of the session, Ellington established a theme followed by several other governors when he stated the Meredith case "is a Mississippi problem and the Southern Governors' Conference is not in position to offer any advice."

He added that it would be his guess that there would not be

(Turn to Page 12, Column 1)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Barnett Plans To Send Lawyers To U.S. Court

Jackson, Miss. (AP)—Gov. Ross Barnett planned to send his attorneys to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals today—perhaps to seek removal of the stern penalties for contempt levied against him.

Barnett must purge himself of contempt by 11 a.m. Tuesday or be jailed and fined $10,000 daily. This was the penalty set by eight appeals judges for blocking enrollment of James H. Meredith, a Negro, in the University of Mississippi.

Part of the purge may have come Sunday night when Barnett, in an emotional message to Mississippi citizens, indirectly said he was giving up physical resistance to federal court edicts.

Completely Surrounded

"We are now completely surrounded by armed forces and we are physically overpowered," the governor said in a statement issued from the Governor's Mansion where he spent the night.

In the statement, issued before the rioting began on the Ole Miss campus at Oxford, 150 miles away, the 64-year-old governor vowed he would "never yield a single inch in my determination to win the fight we are all engaged in."

He said this fight would be in the courts.

Barnett said he had no plans at this time to close the university, although he had previously said he would shut the school to avoid integration.

Federal marshals whisked Meredith on to the Oxford campus at sunset Sunday. The 29-year-old Negro was given a campus apartment but university officials refused to register him on the Sabbath.

Lt. Gov. Paul Johnson who physically prevented Meredith from registering last Wednesday also has until 11 a.m. Tuesday to purge himself of contempt.

(Turn to Page 12, Column 2)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Patterson, Faubus Place Bloodshed Blame On U.S.

Hollywood Fla. (AP) Two Southern governors declared angrily today the federal government must accept responsibility for bloodshed in the Mississippi integration dispute and announced they were backing Gov. Ross Barnett 100 per cent.

Gov. John Patterson of Alabama told newsmen as the Southern Governors conference got under way that he would like to see the conference go on record endorsing Barnett's action.

Backing up his stand, Gov. Orval Faubus of Arkansas said the lesson the federal government should learn in the Mississippi and Little Rock integration struggles is that social changes can't be accomplished by force.

"You can do certain things by coercion and be successful," Faubus declared. "Certain processes must come by evolution."

Patterson, who arrived this morning, said, "We stand ready in Alabama to support Governor Barnett and the people of Mississippi in any way they deem necessary."

He declined to comment on a report that he had placed the Alabama Highway Patrol on a five-minute alert because of events in neighboring Mississippi.

The 18 Southern governors on hand here evidenced growing concern over violence in Mississippi and cleared the way for consideration of a resolution on the subject.

At the opening conference session, the governors voted unanimously to

(Turn to Page 12, Column 3)

Why Not Face Truth On Cuba?

Why not face the truth about Soviet-dominated Cuba and its dire implications for the United States? That's what Clare Boothe Luce does in four penetrating articles, the first of which appears today on Page 4.

Weather Report

NASHVILLE FORECAST — Cloudy and mild with periods of rain this afternoon and Tuesday. High this afternoon in the 70s. Low tonight about 60 with the high Tuesday near 70. Outlook for Wednesday: Mostly cloudy and cool.

Temperatures

12 midnight	66	7 a.m.	66
1 a.m.	66	8 a.m.	68
2 a.m.	67	9 a.m.	69
3 a.m.	66	10 a.m.	70
4 a.m.	64	11 a.m.	72
5 a.m.	63	12 Noon	72
6 a.m.	62	1 p.m.	72

'Round The Clock
WITH RED O'DONNELL

MONDAY'S MESSAGE

Pinckney Kerl gave some State Fair tickets to Jean (7), Billy (6) & Becky (11) Martin, 1309 25th Ave. S.

O'Donnell

Jean's letter of thanks read:

"I injoyed the Fair. Thank You.

"P.S.—Becky & Billy injoyed it to but they're to lasy to write.

"P.S.—I Love You."

CINEMA GIG — Movie theater marquee:

"Listen-Patterson Fight Films & Other Selected Shocks."

JETTY—Mrs Barnes phoned the airlines office and asked "How long does it take to fly from Nashville to Phoenix, Ariz.?"

"Just a minute," said the reservationist.

"Thanks," replied Barnes and hung up.

COPS—Didja hear about the

(Turn to Page 5, Column 3)

Market Trends

New York (AP) — The stock market took another fairly sharp loss in moderately active trading early this afternoon.

The Associated Press average of 60 stocks at noon was off 1.2 at 213.7 with industrials down 2.1 rails down .3, and utilities down .3.

Although losses of most key stocks ranged only from fractions to about a point, weakness in a scattering of pivotal issues brought them declines of more than that and weighted market averages more sharply to the downside.

Some of the "growth" issues also felt more sharply than the over-all list.

By Reason—Not Temper—

Mississippi Tragedy Could Have Been Averted

(An Editorial)

BLIND, BLUNDERING, BLUDGEONING zealotry—irrespective of which "side" it is on—can only compound the tragedy of Mississippi; antagonizing further the controversy that could and should have been settled without recourse to either military invasion or insurrective violence.

Foresight should have noted that as clearly as hindsight now discerns it, for a restraining effect on both state and federal authorities, on whom a joint responsibility has rested—and each of which, again, has contributed to the unseemly spectacle of breakdown in law and order.

Let it be said once more that this nation cannot tolerate chaos and anarchy, from any cause.

Regardless of personal feeling, or considerations of political advantage on either side, this case should have been settled far short of the present calamitous showdown; and would have been had calm judgment prevailed to reason its way to a solution. Instead, free rein was given to tempers.

★ ★ ★

MISSISSIPPI COULD HAVE resolved this issue, as have other states—including Tennessee—no less mindful of states' rights in policy determination, and opposing compulsory integration, but aware of the legal obstacles erected when turned back by every level of the federal judiciary. They bowed to the necessity for observance of the law, however much it incurred individual or mass resentment.

Throughout this ordeal, state by state and section-wide, there has been the incitation to hysteria, much of it cultivated by aggravating processes of various pressure groups. And the outrageous fact is—to which those elements are indifferent—that the Negro as an individual or citizen group has been the pawn in all of this political hoeheuling on the part of Democrats and Republicans alike—exploited by the parties in power.

The present is no exception.

★ ★ ★

PRESIDENT KENNEDY last night spoke to the point of peaceful solution via reason on both sides. His firm and temperate message, though late, was addressed to the mind and heart of a thinking people; and was respectful of such massing the vast constituency of Mississippi.

The Banner does not believe that it was either necessary or advantageous to send troops, as such, as they were almost immediately dispatched. The National Guard of Mississippi had been federalized, and was on the scene, along with hundreds of U.S. marshals—a force adequate to any task of law enforcement, or the purpose to which they were assigned.

As it did in the case of Little Rock, when it was President Eisenhower dispatching the 101st Airborne Division, this newspaper condemns no less the military invasion, on Mr. Kennedy's order, of a sovereign state.

Two factors there were present almost automatically calculated to touch off the student rioting that occurred: (1) the sight of federal forces, deemed a trespass; and (2) the presence of former Maj. Gen. Edwin Walker, whooping it up for a demonstration of resistance. The latter was no less out of place than the former, and a contributory circumstance to the turmoil erupting into tragedy.

★ ★ ★

LATE AS IT IS, all parties concerned must come to their senses—for the settlement, by law, that should have occurred days ago. It is America's prayer, surely, that it will end here—by responsible address to the realities, chief of which is decency's paramount interest in orderly government under law.

It is about time, by the way, for the revered Confederate Flag—an honored symbol—to cease being misused for rabble-rousing appeals to rioters, old or young. The stain of such is on it no less than on Old Glory.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

His 'Duty To Call Out Troops,' Says Kennedy

Washington (AP) President Kennedy declared today it was his inescapable duty to call out troops when Mississippi defied court orders to enroll a Negro at the University of Mississippi.

Grim, yet conciliatory at times, the President said Sunday night in a short radio-television address to the nation that he hoped it would be unnecessary to use troops, even though conciliation and persuasion had failed to obtain admission of James H. Meredith.

After his address Kennedy sat beside the telephone in his office getting up-to-the-minute reports on rioting, gunfire and tear gas sweeping across the university campus at Oxford and the arrival on the scene of federal military reinforcements.

Others Keep Vigil

Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy and several members of the White House staff kept the vigil with the Chief Executive.

Courts of law, all the way up to the Supreme Court, Kennedy said in his speech, ordered Meredith's admission into the university. When the orders were defied and those who tried to carry them out were threatened with arrest and violence, the U.S. Court of Appeals "made clear the fact that the enforcement of its order had become an obligation of the United States government."

"Even though this government had not originally been a party to the case," the Chief Executive said, "my responsibility as President was therefore inescapable. I accept it.

"I deeply regret the fact that

(Turn to Page 12, Column 1)

New Yemen Rulers Tightening Grip

Aden (AP) The new military rulers of Yemen have announced more executions and arrests, apparently tightening of their grip on the little Red Sea country. They also claimed Soviet as well as United Arab Republic support for their regime.

Unconfirmed reports told of various moves within the country aimed at crushing the revolutionary regime and restoring the monarchy.

[fol. 2029]
PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT No. 22
1443

Weather Forecast

Full Report on Page B-6

The Evening Star

WITH SUNDAY MORNING EDITION

110th Year. No. 274. Phone LI. 3-5000  WASHINGTON, D. C., MONDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1962—48 PAGES

Home Delivered: Daily and Sunday, per mon

Troops Fire Over Oxford M After Quelling Campus

Senate OKs $5.2 Billion Works Bill

Aid Funds Debate Is Next Big Item In Closing Rush

By J. A. O'LEARY
Star Staff Writer

The Senate today passed the $5.2 billion public works appropriation bill as Congress began what leaders hope will be the final week of the session.

The public works measure carries funds for numerous river, harbor and flood control projects, plus $500 million for the emergency program requested by President Kennedy to reduce unemployment. The vote on passage was 63 to 6.

It came after Senator Proxmire, Democrat of Wisconsin, was defeated 52 to 17, in an effort to knock out the Glen Elder reclamation project in Kansas, which he said would stimulate production of feed grains at a time when the Government is struggling to get rid of a feed grain surplus.

This leaves only three money bills remaining to pass one or both houses before Congress can adjourn. Also awaiting action this week are the conference reports on the President's foreign trade and tax revision bills.

Aid Bill Is Next

The Senate turned immediately to debate on the $4.2 billion foreign aid bill, which conservatives will try to cut.

Meanwhile, the House Appropriations Committee reported out the last supplemental appropriation bill, carrying $400 million for miscellaneous Government needs. The Senate Appropriations Committee was in session prepared to act on the other remaining money bill for the State, Justice and Commerce departments.

Smathers Plans Fight

But a comparatively minor bill, designed to let self-employed persons set up their own retirement plans, was the most serious threat to adjournment by Saturday.

Senator Smathers, Democrat of Florida, has given his colleagues notice he will try to delay adjournment to prevent President Kennedy from giving the pension bill a pocket veto.

The President has 10 days from last Saturday in which to pocket veto this bill. Senator Smathers is confident two-thirds in the House and Senate could pass the bill over a veto.

But if Congress adjourns while Mr. Kennedy is still considering the measure he could let it die without his signature.

Democratic leaders will try to get a decision from the President on the pension bill when they hold their weekly conference with him tomorrow morning.

Troops in battle gear move through a crowd of townspeople today at the square in Oxford, Miss., home of the embattled campus of the University of Mississippi.—AP Wirephoto.

Army troops escort a group of prisoners to the National Guard Armory following a disturbance today in downtown Oxford, Miss., site of riots protesting registration of a Negro at the University of Mississippi.—AP Wirephotos.

Meredith Two Die,

By C

Former Maj. G rested today at a re charged on four
Robert F. Kennedy charges, which inc insurrection, conspi conspiring to hind duties and assultin

OXFORD, Miss.,
today as Army troop
gangs out of the area
Infantrymen wit moved down streets
morning of disorders carrying on the battl
H. Meredith in the
The 29-year-old N university this morni

More Pictures on Pages A-into Oxford after a nig on the nearby Ole Miss jured.

Troops from the 2 moved systematically d square and in thorough from the area.
They were using liv
the heads of those flee
Many of the young hands held high were hauled away in trucks.
The townspeople sa had come in from other
There were no imm
The university can with fixed bayonets di
most of the night.
The Negro student morning behind the m
ment and troops carryi
As this compliance carried out, roving gang square and along adjoi and foot soldiers who oc sticks and even a garba
The gangs were ma and hurled a barrage of appeared.

T

The Army first mov
the courthouse. They m
the courthouse lawn b
After enduring the fantrymen suddenly to had been tormenting t
Some of the infant to infuriate even more
the square.
Nearly all busine square, in the heart o locked their doors.
About one block a who appeared not to the intersections of St through town.
They hurled bricks
the gauntlet.

Co

Even with increasi and in the square, gr passing convoys with

Dock Workers Go on Strike

President Acts To End Walkout

NEW YORK, Oct. 1 (AP)—Longshoremen quit work on Atlantic and Gulf Coast ports today after their contract expired. Within 10 hours, President Kennedy invoked the Taft-Hartley Act in an attempt to end the work stoppage.

The presidential action, the first step in Taft-Hartley machinery, appeared to be the only immediate likelihood of bringing the unionized long[illegible] to uncontrolled riot-

Administration Sees Barnett As Breaking His Promise

By MIRIAM OTTENBERG
Star Staff Writer

Gov. Ross Barnett of Mississippi assured the President and the Attorney General that his State police would maintain order if Negro Student James H. Meredith was brought to the University of Mississippi campus—and then, in the administration's view, broke his promise.

The off-again-on-again role of the Governor came to light as his apparent capitulation and guarantees of safe passage generally agreed on a plan to put Mr. Meredith on the campus Sunday behind a Federal force.

Yesterday morning, Gov. Barnett called the Attorney General with something similar in mind. He asked for a show of force to justify his capitulation but promised that the Federal forces would run into no opposition.

Agreed on Two Points

The Attorney General and the Mississippi Governor consulted by telephone three or four times during the morning.

MEREDITH BEGINS FIRST DAY WITH COLONIAL STUDY

OXFORD, Miss. (AP)—Negro James Meredith's first scheduled class today as a student at the University of Mississippi was Colonial American history.

Other courses being taken by the first known Negro to enroll at the 114-year-old institution include English, political science, mathematics and Spanish.

Kennedy Say He Did Duty

Broadcast Gri But Conciliato

By the Associated Press

President Kennedy d[illegible] arres it was his inescapable d[illegible] to call out troops when [illegible]sissippi defied court orde[illegible] to enroll a Negro at the [illegible] University.

Grim, yet conciliatory [illegible]t times, the President said [illegible]t night in a short radio-tel[illegible]sion address to the Nation t[illegible] he hoped it would be unnec[illegible]sary to use troops, even though conciliation and persuasio[illegible] had failed to obtain admission

Ellington

(From Page One)

...ion was taken during the conference on the Mississippi situation.

Federal-State Matter

"I do not think that there is any doubt in any of our minds about what the outcome will be in Mississippi because no state is stronger than the federal government," Ellington added. "But still it is a matter for the federal government and the State of Mississippi to work out."

There has been speculation for several days that resolutions will be introduced during the four-day conference either favoring Barnett's action or seeking a vote of censure.

Michigan Gov. John B. Swainson last week asked that the executive committee of the National Governors' Conference censure Barnett for his action in the Meredith case.

The executive committee of the National Governors' Conference will meet here Thursday, the final day of the meeting of the Southern governors.

So far, there has been no word from Washington Gov. Albert D. Rosellini, chairman of the national group, on whether any action will be taken on Swainson's request.

Not In Sympathy

Rosellini has stated that he is not in sympathy with Gov. Barnett's action.

"I think the authority of the U.S. Constitution and Supreme Court decisions must be upheld," Rosellini added.

Commenting on Swainson's request, Ellington told reporters that he did not "think it appropriate for one governor to try to tell another one what to do about a situation in his home state."

In his opening remarks to the conference, Ellington pointed out to the governors that "we can have a repetition of the chaotic situation which originated at the last national meeting in Hershey, Pa., in which certain individuals indulged in the old game of headline hunting and almost overshadowed the accomplishments of an otherwise informative and constructive conference."

Ellington was referring to an attempt by Swainson and New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller to adopt a civil rights resolution at the Hershey meeting. The move was defeated by a filibuster by several Southern governors.

Statement Echoed

Although Barnett has reservations here at the diplomat hotel, conference headquarters, there was growing speculation today that the Mississippi chief executive would not attend the conference.

Ellington's statement that the Meredith case was a "Mississippi problem" was echoed by several other governors.

Host Gov. Farris Bryant of Florida, Gov. Ernest Vandiver of Georgia, and Gov. Terry Sanford of North Carolina agreed that few other Southern governors should not attempt, by resolution, to comment on Barnett's actions.

Vandiver said he did "not favor the use of armed troops to enforce the orders of the federal courts."

The same end and here is how compliance with the court orders can be accomplished peacefully and without the danger of bloodshed through the use of a sufficient number of federal marshals," Vandiver added.

However, the Georgia chief executive did state that in his opinion, "as long as Mississippi is a state of the U.S. and does not secede from the Union, they, like every other state, must abide by the laws and the decisions of the courts which directly affect them."

Faced Some Decisions

"Speaking of one who has had to make the same hard decision that now faces the governor of Mississippi, I believe that Mississippi will eventually come to see that law and order is the only course open to them," Vandiver added.

Vandiver said he definitely would not support a resolution censuring Barnett.

Sanford said he had made it plain since he has been governor of North Carolina to solve his problems in other states is the governors of other states.

He said he thought the outcome in Mississippi would be that law and order would finally triumph.

Bryant stated that the problem should be left to Mississippi and the federal government.

He did point out that he was opposed to the 1954 segregation decision by the Supreme Court, but was faced with the fact that the federal government must uphold the law.

Bryant brought another controversial issue into the conference today.

Resolution Hinted

It appeared that he might introduce a resolution Thursday condemning the slaughter of Russian forces in Hungary.

The reservoir will cover 1,420 acres and will extend 13 miles up the river.

Also in the final Senate bill is $3.1-million to continue building the Berkley Dam on the lower Cumberland River in Kentucky.

The Senate added $725,000 to begin the controversial Tennessee-Tombigbee waterway to connect the Ohio River and the Gulf of Mexico at Mobile. Since the House has granted no money for this item, the conference will finally decide whether it will stay in the bill.

Barnett

(From Page One)

tempt. He faces a $5,000 daily fine.

Barnett issued his statement after being informed Meredith was on the campus. He called on state officers "under me command to do everything in their power to preserve peace and to avoid violence in any form."

"I know that our principles remain true, but we must at all odds preserve the peace and avoid bloodshed," he said.

"Surrounded on all sides by the armed forces and oppressive power of the United States of America, my courage and my convictions do not waiver.

'I Love Mississippi'

"My heart still says 'never,' but my calm judgment abhors the bloodshed that will follow.

"I love Mississippi. I love her people. I love those 10,000 good Mississippians in the National Guard who have now been federalized and requested to oppose me and their own people."

Barnett's son and son-in-law were among Guardsmen called to active duty by the President.

In his closing remarks, directed to federal officials, Barnett said:

"You are destroying the Constitution of this great nation. May God have mercy on your souls. Mississippi will continue to fight the Meredith case and all similar cases through the courts to restore the sovereignty of the state and constitutional government."

Heavy Blow

This statement had struck a heavy blow to the capital of Mississippi. The town was quiet. There were no signs of a fighting mood. The streets were alive with United State Flags and some men even wore complete Confederate uniforms.

Somebody played a phonograph record of "Dixie," the crowd let out a mighty cheer and surged toward the white pillars of the Governor's Mansion. They formed a ring around it that, at one time was four deep. There were men, women, teenagers and even a few women carrying babies.

Despite the fact that there was no truth in the rumor that Barnett was going to be arrested, the crowd did not disperse until it got word that the governor would be safe.

Johnson said in his statement that President Kennedy called on the state to preserve law and order and then federalized the National Guard--"the only adequately instrumentality capable of preserving law and order should an emergency arise."

The lieutenant governor said the Administration had raised "the false issue of integration" throughout the entire situation.

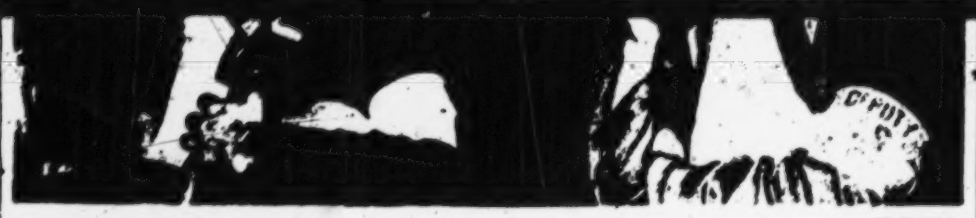
Nearly 2,000 persons milled outside the Governor's Mansion Sunday after a Citizens Council leader called for volunteers to prevent any attempt to arrest Barnett.

Barnett who received many offers from volunteers throughout the day, conferred with segregation leaders, including former state Sen. Willie Rainach of Louisiana.

Gets Marshall County Post

Lewisburg Miss Martha Sue McCain of Waverly will assume duties here as home demonstration agent Oct. 15.

Miss McCain has served as assistant home agent in Humphrey's County three years. Her duties here will include both adult and 4-H club work. She is a graduate of David Lipscomb College, Nashville.



AP Wirephoto

Federal marshals wearing gas masks stand guard as students demonstrate on the campus of Ole Miss at Oxford in protest of court ordered enrollment of James Meredith, Negro Air Force veteran.

Oxford Victim 'Loved Life's Good Things'

New York (UPI) — Paul Guihard, who was killed in the integration riot on the University of Mississippi campus Sunday night had been a member of the New York office of the French News Agency, Agence France Presse for the past three years.

Guihard, assigned to cover the government's attempt to enroll Negro James H. Meredith in the all-white university, died of a bullet wound in his back.

The newsman also worked as a stringer part-time correspondent for the Daily Sketch of London.

His acquaintances described the slender, dark Guihard as a man with a great sense of humor, one of the Paris Latin Quarter men who loved good food and the other good things of life.

Guihard was 31. He was born in London of French parents and enjoyed dual citizenship.

Guihard stopped to talk to newsmen at the press room at International Airport in New York before taking off for Oxford at 9 a.m. CST Sunday.

"I'm going to pose as a Kentucky colonel and cover this thing with a mint julep in my hand," the bearded Britisher told them. Newsmen who told him to be careful said Guihard laughed off the warning.

Guihard earned the nickname "Flash" for the energy and drive with which he plunged into stories.

He was a fun loving man with a red beard.

Among previous tough assignments for Guihard were the ill-fated anti-Castro landings on Cuba's Bay of Pigs and the flood disaster in British Honduras.

He was the author of a one-act play called "The Deck Chair," which had been performed in a Greenwich Village cabaret theater.

His acquaintances said Guihard spoke Spanish and French as well as English.

He served in the British army and went to work for AFP after he was discharged. He worked for six years in London AFP office before going to Paris and then to New York.

PAUL GUIHARD

In another incident of violence at Oxford involving a member of the press, Hal Lyon Yoder, Television cameraman from Dallas, Tex., was beaten up by the campus mob.

Yoder was pulled from a television wagon by the mob which ripped his camera from his neck and pounded him. Then they began beating him.

The mob took every wooden fence post it could find and used it to beat Yoder with. Yoder's wife, who had accompanied her husband to Oxford, was not injured.

Son Of Knoxville Newsman Held

Oxford, Miss. (UPI) Joseph J. Levitt Jr., son of the editor of the Knoxville News-Sentinel was arrested or detained in the administration building on the University of Mississippi campus early today.

Levitt said he was taken into custody while working as a newsman on the scene.

Levitt, who was able to telephone United Press International in another building on campus, said he was being held in a room in the administration building. He said he was not under guard but at least 10 other persons were

Walker

(From Page One)

it is abundantly clear that Meredith should promptly be withdrawn from the campus and all efforts to enter him at the University of Mississippi be permanently abandoned."

"There is no way that Meredith can go to school at the University of Mississippi," he said. "The United States government should remove him."

Sen Herman E. Talmadge, D-Ga., said he deeply regretted the Mississippi situation. He commented that he was repeatedly and unsuccessfully sponsored legislation which would, he said, end encroachment by federal courts and "re-establish state and local control over public education."

Talmadge said the current situation results from "judicial usurpation" which, he said, was bolstered by the application of the federal power. He called it detrimental to the federal government process and said it will "serve to divide the American people" at a time when they should be united against the threat of Communism.

Sen Sam J. Ervin Jr., D-N.C. said those "tomenting" litigation which has such tragic results should remember St. Paul's injunction that all which is lawful is not necessarily expedient.

Miss Lela Pearl Rogers

Clarksville Funeral services for Miss Lela Pearl Rogers, 76, will be held Tuesday at 3 p.m. at Tarpley Funeral Home with burial in Greenwood Cemetery.

Miss Rogers died Sunday in a Nashville infirmary.

Paradoxes In Integration Crisis

Oxford, Miss. (UPI) Paradoxes in the Mississippi integration crisis:

Ross Barnett, Jr., son of Mississippi's anti-integration governor was inducted into federal service to take action against his father's stand in the case of James H. Meredith. Young Barnett is a lieutenant in headquarters company of the Mississippi National Guard at Jackson. The unit was federalized Sunday.

John Stennis, a Jackson attorney and son of Sen. John C. Stennis, also was called to active duty. The elder Stennis has supported the governor in his fight to keep Meredith from enrolling at all-white Ole Miss.

Edwin A. Walker, who as a U.S. Army major general commanded the federal troops which integrated Central High School at Little Rock, and now a civilian, appeared on the Ole Miss campus as a supporter of Barnett.

Col. T. B. Birdsong, head of the Mississippi State Police which had been ordered by Barnett to prevent Meredith's admittance to the campus, rode with U.S. marshals in the lead car escorting the Negro applicant onto university property.

Student Rioting Brings 'Dishonor' Says Campus Editor

Oxford, Miss. (UPI) — Editor of the University of Mississippi student newspaper told his fellow students today they are harming "dishonor and disgrace" to the university and to the state by participating in riots.

An open letter was made in regard to violation of the Mississippian which was taken to mean that today's issue would not be published as usual despite the efforts of faculty and students to get out a regular edition.

The 100 years ago over almost the same issues and the United States of America prevailed. The federal government is once again showing its strength and power to uphold the laws of our country.

"No matter what your convictions you should follow the advice of Gov. Ross Barnett by not taking any action for violence. Blood has already been shed and will continue to flow unless people realize the seriousness of the situation.

"Whatever your beliefs you are a citizen of the United States of America and of the state of Mississippi and should preserve peace and harmony of both governments."

Mississippi Case 'Disgraceful': Sen. Kefauver

Beverly Hills, Calif. (UPI) — U.S. Sen. Estes Kefauver today branded as "sad and disgraceful" the integration crisis at the University of Mississippi but praised President Kennedy's handling of the affair.

Kefauver told a political meeting it was absurd for Gov. Ross Barnett and other Mississippi officials to have thwarted until Sunday night a court order compelling enrollment of Negro student James H. Meredith of the tax-supported campus.

AP Wirephoto

James Meredith is escorted onto the University of Mississippi campus at Oxford for court ordered enrollment.

List Of Units In Oxford Or En Route To Scene

Washington (UPI)—Following is a Defense Department list of troop units either already in or around Oxford, Miss., or en route there:

The 70th Engineers, from Ft. Campbell, Ky.

The 545rd Military Police Battalion, Ft. Bragg, N. C.

From Ft. Dix, N. J., the 716th Military Police Battalion.

The 108th Cavalry Regiment, a Mississippi National Guard unit.

The 1st and 2nd Battle Groups of the Mississippi National Guard.

From Ft. Benning, Ga., the 2nd Battle Group of the 23rd Infantry.

The 720th Military Police from Ft. Hood, Tex.

s Fire Over Oxford Mob
er Quelling Campus Riot

ttle gear move through a crowd of townspeople square in Oxford, Miss., home of the embattled campus of the University of Mississippi.—AP Wirephoto.

escort a group of prisoners to the National ery following a disturbance today in downtown Oxford, Miss., site of riots protesting registration of a Negro at the University of Mississippi.—AP Wirephotos.

Meredith Registered; Two Die, Scores Hurt

BULLETIN

Former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker was arrested today at a road block in Oxford, Miss., and charged on four offenses. Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy in Washington announced the charges, which included inciting to rebellion or insurrection, conspiring to commit this offense, conspiring to hinder Federal officers in their duties and assaulting a Federal officer.

By CECIL HOLLAND
Star Staff Writer

OXFORD, Miss., Oct. 1—Rifle fire cracked here today as Army troops moved in to clear marauding gangs out of the area around the town's public square.

Infantrymen with fixed bayonets methodically moved down streets leading from the square after a morning of disorders brought about by roving groups carrying on the battle over the enrollment of James H. Meredith in the University of Mississippi.

The 29-year-old Negro student was enrolled in the university this morning while Federal troops poured into Oxford after a night of wild and uncontrolled rioting on the nearby Ole Miss campus left two dead and scores injured.

More Pictures on Pages A-6, 7; Other Stories on Pages A-5, 6, 9.

Troops from the 2nd (Indianhead) Infantry Division moved systematically down streets leading from the town square and in thorough fashion drove all the troublemakers from the area.

They were using live bullets but seemed to be firing over the heads of those fleeing before them.

Many of the young men were rounded up and with their hands held high were collected at street corners and then hauled away in trucks.

The townspeople said they were strangers and apparently had come in from other places.

There were no immediate reports of casualties.

The university campus remained quiet after soldiers with fixed bayonets disbursed a mob which rioted there most of the night.

The Negro student was registered in the university this morning behind the massed might of the Federal Government and troops carrying rifles with fixed bayonets.

As this compliance with Federal court orders was being carried out, roving gangs wandered through the courthouse square and along adjoining streets pelting Army convoys and foot soldiers who occupied the square with rocks, bottles, sticks and even a garbage can.

The gangs were made up of both youths and older men and hurled a barrage of taunts at the soldiers whenever they appeared.

Tossed Tear Gas

The Army first moved infantrymen into the area around the courthouse. They marched around the square and across the courthouse lawn before taking up positions.

After enduring the jeers and missile barrages, the infantrymen suddenly tossed tear gas cannisters at those who had been tormenting them and cleared the square.

Some of the infantrymen were Negroes and this served to infuriate even more the people who were collected around the square.

Nearly all business establishments around the large square, in the heart of this Deep South town, closed and locked their doors.

About one block south of the square, many young men, who appeared not to be natives of Oxford, congregated at the intersections of State Routes 6 and 7, principal arteries through town.

They hurled bricks at nearly every car that tried to run the gauntlet.

Convoys Still Pelted

Even with increasing numbers of troops along the streets and in the square, groups of young men still bombarded passing convoys with bottles, rocks and other missiles.

As one convoy passed through the town's center, a heavy log was dropped from a second floor balcony on one of the passing vehicles.

The firing was attributed by the Associated Press to Mississippi National Guard troops from Tupelo.

The rioting in Oxford came after former Maj. Gen. Edwin Walker had appeared in the square—clad in a dark blue suit and wearing a 10-gallon hat, the Associated Press reported.

He stayed in the square briefly, spoke quietly to some of those in the crowd nearest the troops, and then backed off as military eyes watched him closely.

The Confederate flag hung at half staff in front of

See MEREDITH, Page A-6

orkers rike

Acts elkout

1 (AP)— work on Coast ports contract ex- hours. Presi- oked the n an attempt ispage.

otion, the artley ma- to be the elihood of ised long- locks from ress.

uick agree- ck contract said Presi- d create a e report to n the nature work stop- ge of the President to order

Page A-2

Administration Sees Barnett As Breaking His Promise

By MIRIAM OTTENBERG
Star Staff Writer

Gov. Ross Barnett of Mississippi assured the President and the Attorney General that his State police would maintain order if Negro Student James H Meredith was brought to the University of Mississippi campus—and then, in the administration's view, broke his promise.

The off-again-on-again role of the Governor came to light as his apparent capitulation and guarantees of safe passage gave way to uncontrolled rioting on the campus last night and early today.

What Happened

The behind-the-scenes story of the last 24 hours, explains why the President postponed his broadcast to the Nation, why the marshals at first went on the campus alone and why Federal troops were finally summoned to quell the rioters.

This is the story as the administration sees it, pieced together from reports reaching Washington:

On Saturday, Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy and Burke Marshall, his assistant attorney general in charge of the civil rights division, had generally agreed on a plan to put Mr Meredith on the campus Sunday behind a Federal force.

Yesterday morning, Gov. Barnett called the Attorney General with something similar in mind. He asked for a show of force to justify his capitulation but promised that the Federal forces would run into no opposition.

Agreed on Two Points

The Attorney General and the Mississippi Governor consulted by telephone three or four times during the morning. Finally, at about 10:45 a.m., the Governor agreed on two points.

He promised that the Federal marshals and Mr. Meredith would be admitted to the campus without resistance and he guaranteed that he would preserve law and order through the use of State police, either working alone or in co-operation with the marshals.

This guarantee was repeated

See PROMISE, Page A-2

MEREDITH BEGINS FIRST DAY WITH COLONIAL STUDY

OXFORD, Miss (AP)— Negro James Meredith's first scheduled class today as a student at the University of Mississippi was Colonial American history.

Other courses being taken by the first known Negro to enroll at the 114-year-old institution include English, political science, mathematics and Spanish.

Mr. Meredith is living in a two-room apartment in Baxter Hall. The apartment includes a kitchenette.

Kennedy Says He Did Duty

Broadcast Grim But Conciliatory

By the Associated Press

President Kennedy declares it was his inescapable duty to call out troops when Mississippi defied court orders to enroll a Negro at the State University.

Grim, yet conciliatory at times, the President said last night in a short radio-television address to the Nation that he hoped it would be unnecessary to use troops, even though conciliation and persuasion had failed to obtain admission of James H. Meredith.

After his address, Mr. Kennedy sat beside the telephone in his office getting up-to-the-minute reports on rioting, gunfire and tear gas sweeping across the university campus at Oxford—and the arrival on the scene of Federal military reinforcements.

Attorney General Robert F Kennedy and several members of the White House staff kept

See KENNEDY, Page A-6

1451

[fol. 2031] DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 1

STATEMENT OF TALMADGE WITT OF PONTOTOC, MISSISSIPPI

I am Talmadge Witt, 42 years old, I live in Pontotoc County, Mississippi, and I am a deputy sheriff under Sheriff John H. Moore of that county, and have been serving as such deputy since March 1, 1960. I was acting as such deputy on September 30, 1962, and was called by Sheriff Faulkner of Union County to come to Oxford, Mississippi, getting that call about 3 p.m. on the 30th day of September, 1962. Shortly after receiving this call I went to Oxford with Cecil Payne, another deputy from Pontotoc County. We went directly to the campus of the University of Mississippi and arrived there sometime around 4:30 o'clock p.m.

When I got on the campus of the University, the United States Marshals were already around the Lyceum Building, that is, a building with big white columns in front, facing in an easterly direction. There was a paved roadway in front of that building, and the marshals were lined up along the side of that roadway next to the building; on the other side of the roadway, and all out in front of the building, were some men and boys and girls, with the roadway between them and the marshals. The crowd out in front of the building was not as big then as it was later, but it gradually grew larger from then on. When I got to this place there were a number of highway patrolmen and other officers in the roadway, between the marshals and the crowd, keeping the crowd back from the marshals, and I joined them and helped to do this.

The crowd grew larger as time passed, and the lights were turned on, on the campus. At this time there was not as much disorder as there was later, there was some loud talk, and some of those in the crowd would throw or flip lighted cigarettes and matches towards the marshals and on the cloth top of some of the army trucks which were there. It is difficult to remember the exact time that events happened, but after I had been there about an hour and a half to two hours, and at a time when I was standing across the road in front of said building, the marshals fired [fol. 2032] the first blasts of tear gas and the crowd scattered and ran away, and I, of course, went some distance away, also, but still stayed in the area down in front of the Lyceum Building. For some time, after the first tear gas was fired, the crowd simply milled around, many of them armed themselves with bricks or pieces of broken bricks, rocks, sticks, coca cola bottles and anything that they could get their hands on, and when they could get close enough, they would throw these things at and towards the marshals, and the tear gas would drive them back. The crowd did not seem to have any definite leadership at that time, and simply milled around, hollering, yelling, shouting and talking among themselves.

Somewhere along during this time it seemed that all of the State Highway Patrolmen left the campus, as did also some of the law officers, that is, sheriffs and deputy sheriffs, but I stayed on to render any assistance that I could. Sometime around 8 o'clock p.m., or a little later, I began to hear different ones say, "here comes General Walker." I did not know him prior to that time, and when I first saw him he was walking towards a Confederate monument which was several hundred yards in an easterly direction from the marshals at the Lyceum Building. People in the crowd around General Walker began to say different things. Several of them began to say, "we have got a leader now," or "here is our leader." I had on my deputy sheriff's badge, and shortly after General Walker arrived in the territory of the Confederate monument, he came up to me, shook hands and said: "I would like for you to deputize me to help in this matter." I told him that I did not have authority to do that, that I was a deputy sheriff and was not a deputy in that county.

I was close to General Walker all of the time, from the time when he first arrived, until a considerable time thereafter.

Some few minutes after this, various people were asking General Walker to lead them and to make them a speech and tell them what to do, and after awhile he got up on the side of the Confederate monument and made a talk. [fol. 2033] I cannot recall all the things he said, but I do remember his saying these things: "Violence is not the answer, Cuba is that way," and pointed south. He said: "Protest, protest, all you want to, you have a right to protest, and they may run out of gas." He said: "Help is on the way, thousands are coming."

A preacher had been following General Walker around asking him not to lead the crowd, but to get them to stop what they were doing. This preacher said to Walker: "They will listen to you and do anything you say, please get them to stop and go home," and Walker said: "I am here to watch what happens—I am not interested in stopping it," and then Walker asked the preacher what denomination he was, and the preacher replied "Episcopalian," and Walker said: "You make me ashamed that I am an Episcopalian." About this time I heard some serious threats made against the preacher by people in the crowd, after Walker said what he did to him, and I was afraid the preacher was going to be hurt, so I took him by the arm and pulled him and carried him out of the crowd. Two men came up to the edge of the crowd and stated that they were friends of the preacher, and asked me what I was doing with him. I told them that someone was going to hurt him if he did not leave, and I suppose they left with him, as I never saw them any more.

After some in the crowd had asked Walker if he would lead them, he stepped down from the side of the monument and said: "Keep protesting and see if we can get closer." He then started towards the marshals and the crowd of at least a thousand by that time, followed him. This crowd was armed with sticks, rocks, coca cola bottles and other things, as I have heretofore stated. They seemed to have anything that they could get their hands on, and when they got close enough, they would throw towards the marshals. When the front of this crowd, which General Walker was with, got in about 200 feet of the marshals, they fired another blast of tear gas, and the crowd ran back, with General Walker with them. At all times during this, I was near or in sight of General Walker and stayed in sight of him until about 5 a.m. the next morning.

[fol. 2034] On a number of occasions Walker would walk towards the marshals, or in that general direction, and whenever he did, a large crowd would fall in behind and follow him. In fact, wherever Walker went, the crowd followed. During the time after the first march towards the marshals with Walker in or near the lead, I heard different statements, many of which I cannot remember, but at one time, in talking with a group about the protest they were making, he said, "good, good, keep it up." I heard people asking how to snuff out or counteract the tear gas, and Walker told them to use water, and right after that they got a fire truck and hose and began to try to use that to stop the gas. I saw a group making Molotov cocktails. They were taking coca cola bottles and putting gasoline in them and putting some kind of wick in them, setting the wicks afire, and they would then throw this towards the marshals. I did not hear Walker say anything about the Molotov cocktails, but I did see him in the vicinity of where they were being made. During all of this time, when Walker was there, and at the time when he was telling them to continue to protest, the men and boys in the crowd were armed as I stated before, they were throwing the Molotov cocktails, they were setting automobiles afire, and I personally counted sixteen automobiles that were burned. There was a new building going up near the scene of the rioting, and the students and others would get bricks over there, I saw them roll wheelbarrows up loaded with bricks, and they would break them up and take them in their arms when they went towards the marshals. Many of the lights were broken out around the campus, especially around the flagpole that was between the (illegible).

In reading over the foregoing, I notice it appears that what the preacher first said to Walker about stopping the rioting, was said after he got on the monument, and this is not correct. It was before Walker got up on the monument that the preacher was urging him to try to stop the rioting and get them to go home, and it was before he got [fol. 2035] up on the monument that Walker replied, "I am here to watch what happens—I am not interested in stopping it." It was after he got on the monument or about the time he got on the monument to make the speech that he asked the preacher what denomination he was, and the preacher replied "an Episcopalian." I simply wanted to add this to my statement in order to clear it up.

This the 25th day of November, 1963.

/s/ TALMADGE WITT
Talmadge Witt

...s after Mr. Meredith and his escort circled the Lyceum and returned without finding the proper class building, Edward O. Guthman, spokesman for the Justice Department, said:

"Marshals will escort Meredith about the campus as long as necessary. They won't leave him as long as he is in any danger."

At least 40 marshals have been berthed at Baxter Hall, the campus apartment building where Mr. Meredith was housed last night.

The Government built up its strength during the night despite the lull in the disorder. An Army spokesman said 4,000 regular troops now are in Oxford. The town's population is 5,283.

The campus rioting, punctuated with gunfire from the rioters ranks, broke out last night as the students and many outsiders vented their anger over the entrance of Mr Meredith to the 114-year-old institution.

Raged Through The Night

The riot raged throughout the night as students and outsiders repeatedly attacked several hundred marshals who had brought the Negro student to the campus late in the afternoon.

Regular Army troops were ordered here from their staging area in Memphis, Tenn., when the situation rapidly got out of hand under the cover of darkness.

Mississippi's Lt Gov Paul B. Johnson, jr., visited the campus at the height of the rioting and warned Justice Department officials who are here to expect more violence and possibly bloodshed during the day.

The Lieutenant Governor was said to have expressed fears that many from outside Oxford were on the way here to join in the battle against integrating the university.

Newsman Killed

One of those killed in the campus rioting was a French newspaperman, Paul Guihard, representing the London Daily Sketch and a French news agency. After one of the early student forays he was found dead with a wound in the back.

A 23-year-old juke box repairman, Ray Gunter, of Oxford, also was fatally shot. He was taken from the university campus to Oxford Hospital, where he was pronounced dead on arrival.

A United States marshal, Graham Same was critically wounded by a gunshot in the neck and was flown to the hospital at the Memphis Naval Air Station for emergency treatment. Another marshal was wounded in the thigh by rifle fire.

Newsman Bill Crider of the Memphis staff of the Associated Press was wounded in the back by a burst of birdshot. Several members of the Mississippi State patrol also were wounded.

Mr Crider's wounds were not serious. He was treated and soon returned to the campus.

The troops arriving early this morning forced the rioters into dormitories and the wooded hills that make up the 640-acre Ole Miss campus. They left behind the litter of battle and the hulks of a half dozen burned out cars.

Military police arrested 93 as they swept back the rioters. Later arrests brought the total taken into custody to 112. Estimates put the strength of the troops on the campus at 1,800 men.

United States marshals, attired in riot jackets and helmet liners, earlier had turned back the attackers time after time in a battle they fought with tear gas and smoke bombs.

The attackers used bricks, iron pipes and as the night wore on, turned to Molotov cocktail bombs made from soda bottles filled with gasoline.

Cars, Trucks Hit

Cars and television trucks were smashed and one was burned as the rioters turned on newspapermen and television cameramen with a widely separated number of attacks.

Mr. Walker, the man who led the troops ordered by President Eisenhower into Little Rock in 1957 in another desegregation crisis, led a thousand college youths in one charge that left back a hundred yards from the marshals.

James Meredith is followed closely by United States Chief Marshal James McShane (left) and other marshals today as he leaves the office where he enrolled as a student at the University of Mississippi at Oxford.

Mr. Walker jumped on a campus Confederate memorial and yelled:

"If you can't win, go home. Don't stay at the university. But, let's not quit. We can win."

The marshals, while armed, used only their tear gas bombs and never fired on their attackers, a Justice Department spokesman inside the beleaguered building said.

One time they fired warning shots in the air and another time punctured a fire hose being used by the students.

They were harassed and under danger from intermittent gunfire which came from a hidden sniper who potted away at the buildings.

Serious Situation

The plight of the marshals was becoming increasingly serious as the first military unit arrived on the campus.

This was the Oxford contingent of the Mississippi National Guard which had been Federalized by the President.

Its commander, Capt. Murray Falkner, a nephew of William Faulkner, the author who lived in Oxford, was among those injured. He was struck on the arm with a hurled brick.

The students and the outsiders "borrowed," as one said, a bulldozer and a fire engine and used these in an effort to run down the marshals and get close enough to hurl bricks.

The bricks and timber used to set barricades on the drives leading to the administration building were taken from a science building under construction close at hand.

The marshals, for the most part, stayed close around the building except for forays to drive the attackers back. They captured 31 prisoners during the night's rioting.

Two of these were operating the bulldozer and the firetruck. The truck made two successful runs close to the marshals before it was stopped amid a cloud of tear gas.

Wasn't Student

The operator, a Justice spokesman said, was not a student.

Most of the action and the bitterest fighting took place in front of a tree-spotted, park-like area called University Circle. It is adorned with a monument as a memorial to the Confederate dead in the Civil War.

The whole area is strewn today with the debris of the fighting—empty tear gas canisters, smashed and burned automobiles and television trucks, broken bricks, logs and slashed fire hoses.

The rioters went wild when they learned that Mr. Meredith, who had been denied admission three previous times to the university, had been brought without incident on to the campus.

Obscenities filled the air. The rioters' wrath was directed more at the marshals than at the Negro student who had been housed under heavy guard in an apartment on the campus to await enrollment today.

Officials Arrive

It came after Deputy Attorney General Nicholas de B. Katzenbach and other high Justice Department officials, who arrived here in an Air Force plane, conferred with the university officials, including Chancellor J. D. Williamson in the main administration building.

With a wild assortment of yells, screams and curses the rioters moved on the marshals surrounding the building. "You ——nigger lover" and "why don't you bring Kennedy down here" were some of the cries that filled the air thick with flying brickbats.

When word filtered into the ranks of the rioters that a marshal had been shot and seriously wounded a cheer went up.

The rioting broke out in frightening fashion as darkness came.

In a short while Mississippi State police, several hundred strong were withdrawn from the immediate fighting area and then moved off the campus.

This left the marshals and a small contingent of Army engineers, sent here as a housekeeping unit for the marshals, to hold off the repeated attacks.

With State police gone the entrances to the university campus were left wide open and anyone who wished could walk down the darkened streets toward the administration building. The building was often bathed in drifting smoke from the bombs that had been set off.

As unexpectedly as the State police roadblocks were called off, they were restored four hours and 45 minutes later just as the Regular Army forces began appearing on the campus.

This blocked off the university grounds from groups of men who seemed to be heading there in increasing numbers.

Quiet Week End

The night's wild disorders came after an ominously quiet week end here marked only by a few hijinks over Ole Miss's football victory over Kentucky Saturday night in Jackson, the State capital.

Tensions began building up when reports filtered through the town that some move could be expected soon to bring the Negro student here for registration.

Rumors flew thick and fast and the tension grew as word came that President Kennedy had taken control of the Mississippi National Guard. Angry mutterings were heard then and later about this action.

The State police, which had disappeared from Oxford late Friday, returned in force early Sunday. They sealed off the campus and would permit no one except students and those living on the campus. Newspapermen who had been given press quarters in the administration building were denied admittance.

Engineers Arrived

Early in the morning the engineers had arrived at Graham Lake, 15 miles from Oxford, and set up a housekeeping camp for the marshals.

At 2 p.m., amidst all sorts of rumors, the marshals arrived at the Oxford-University airport. First a DC-6 and then four two-engine planes landed and all were filled with marshals.

Chief United States Marshal James McShane and his assistant, Jack Cameron, descended from the four-motored plane and went to a telephone with Mr. McShane clutching a fistful of dimes.

Soon seven Army trucks drove up. The marshals, numbering about 70 lined up near the trucks in straggly military fashion. They stood and waited.

A little later an Air Force jet swooped down and disgorged Mr. Katzenbach and other Justice Department officials.

After more telephoning and conferring the officials and marshals climbed into troop carriers and three sedans and took off from the airport.

Midway to the highway they met a Mississippi highway patrol car carrying Col. T. B. Birdsong, State safety commissioner, and University Chancellor J. D. Williams. Another conference followed and then the caravan moved off.

By this time hundreds had gathered at the airport and lined the road leading into town.

Much to everyone's surprise the caravan turned abruptly into one of the university gates without opposition from the State police guards. Within a few minutes the empty troop carriers came out another gate and headed back to the airport.

The marshals quickly surrounded the administration building, and three hours later Mr. Meredith was brought to Oxford. He landed in a small plane at the airport accompanied by John Doar of the Justice Department and a marshal and was taken without incident through a gathering throng along the road to the university.

Reporters, not allowed in, watched from the entrance several blocks away. They could hear yells and cheers occasionally and got frequent reports from students who came and went.

As dusk came the mood of the crowd within the university grounds and outside began to change. At the airport Mr. McShane was asked by a young woman in torreador pants for an autograph for her son.

A few hours later a mob, first of students and then of students and outsiders, was crying for his blood.

Yoders Attacked

About dark reporters suddenly were allowed inside the grounds. Television cameraman Gordon Yoder of Dallas and his wife, a native of Jackson, Miss., were the first to reach the university circle.

Mr. Yoder left his car to make pictures and was set up. As State police stood by he went back to his car where both stood shoulder to shoulder around the building. There were cries, "tear gas," and the marshals donned their masks and took out their containers and readied their tear gas guns. Then the order would come "hold gas" and a little later "secure gas."

Order Came

All of a sudden the explosion came. The order came and this time a cascade of canister and tear gas bombs fell amidst the advancing students. A squad of State police and newsmen were caught in the fumes.

Mr. Guthman explained later that Chief Marshal McShane gave the order after a piece of iron pipe had been hurled at a marshal and left a big dent in his helmet liner.

Inside the building Col. Birdsong was asking the Justice Department officials if they wanted the State police to remain. He was told they did. The Mississippi official recommended that military troops be called out and about 8:30 p.m. (CST) the order for troops went out.

Then the State police, angered because they were caught in the first tear gas barrage and resenting, it seemed, the presence of the marshals, began withdrawing. Orders came up to them to keep back from the firing line.

Conditions rapidly worsened. Without the presence of the State police the attacks on the marshals grew bolder.

And more people, including women and girls, were pouring into the fighting area. There were advances and threats depending on the volume of tear gas.

CONGRESS

Continued From Page A-1

billion, which the House chopped down to $3.6 billion. The Senate committee restored about two-thirds of this cut, but a coalition of conservative Democrats and Republicans will try to trim it closer to the House figure.

Another bill which could delay adjournment is an omnibus $2.2 billion authorization for flood control, river and harbor projects, which is still tied up in the House Public Works Committee.

Closely related to this measure is the public works appropriation bill, which passed the Senate today ahead of foreign aid. Most of this money is for water projects authorized in past years.

The House is expected to act early this week on the postal rate increase bill, to which the Senate attached pay increases for Federal employes. The House must decide whether to accept it as it stands, or seek a conference with the Senate.

Two New Frontier measures which seem likely to die are the bills to create job opportunities for young people leaving school, and to help cities provide mass transportation.

ugly and dangerous. In Oxford, the ugliness and, danger is magnified to a gigantic scale.

And one of the ironies of the situation here today is that former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, who commanded the Federal troops that took over Little Rock, is on the opposite side of the fence here.

Mr. Walker whipped up the students and others on the campus of the University of Mississippi last night, when it became known that James H. Meredith, was on the campus.

After the Little Rock riots, Mr. Walker said that he found his duty there distasteful.

However, at the time, he was the crisp and professional soldier, who gave no sign of his feelings. He set up his command post at the corner of Central High School—the object of the riots.

Contrasts in Size

The contrast is most marked by the size of the operations here. In Little Rock, it was largely quiet three or four blocks from the school. In Oxford today, there is little quiet anywhere. On the contrary, there is a brooding sense of disaster.

Several days ago Mr. Walker said he planned to lead "tens of thousands" of volunteers to aid the cause of Gov. Ross Barnett.

But his only troops last night were a band of students and other persons whom he led in a charge on the positions of the Federal marshals.

They got within 100 feet but the tear gas fumes repelled them.

Gives Advice

Later, Mr Walker was giving demonstrators advice on how to counteract the acrid tear gas fumes.

Mr. Walker appeared on the Oxford town square during the disturbance there today.

Mr. Walker marched ahead

KENNEDY

Continued From Page A-1

the vigil with the Chief Executive.

The President did not get to bed until about 5:30 a.m. today and was up again at 9:45 a.m., White House Press Pierre Salinger told reporters.

Working with the President in his office and keeping in touch with events in Mississippi until 5:30 a.m. were his brother, Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy, and White House aides P. Kenneth O'Donnell, Theodore C. Sorensen, Lawrence F. O'Brien and Andrew T. Hatcher, associate press secretary.

The President had put off his address for 2½ hours, from 7:30 p.m. to 10 p.m. (EZT). In the interval, United States marshals had installed Mr. Meredith on the Ole Miss campus, and Gov. Ross Barnett had acknowledged "we are physically overpowered."

Mr. Kennedy avoided any dressing down of Gov. Barnett by name. And, as he spoke, the students at the university were ignoring the Governor's appeal to void violence.

The soldiers held that [illegible] nets within inches of [illegible] mer general, but did not [illegible] him. The officer said [illegible] thing to Mr. Walker [illegible] walked off through the [illegible]

$10,000 Winn[illegible] At Dice Shot By 'Poor Lose[illegible]

A Southeast Was[illegible] man has learned just ho[illegible] serous a poor loser can [illegible]

The "winner," Robert [illegible] derson, 23, of 4004 E[illegible] S.E., told police he was [illegible] the legs and robbed of [illegible] by one of the players in [illegible] game at a home in th[illegible] block of Ninth street N[illegible] Monday.

Mr. Anderson said th[illegible] dent occurred as he w[illegible] ing the game with h[illegible] nings.

He said another [illegible] asked him for $800 a[illegible] added: "I hate to do [illegible] you, but give me the [illegible]

Mr. Anderson did not [illegible] but continued walking a[illegible] shot in the legs by the [illegible] man who then robbed [illegible] the money.

Capt. Murray Kutner, [illegible] of the robbery [illegible] said police have arrested [illegible] year-old man and will b[illegible] case directly to the gra[illegible] because the holdup sus[illegible] presently on bond in c[illegible] tion with a narcotics ca[illegible]

Nuclear Sub Saf[illegible]

LONDON, Oct. 1 (AP) [illegible] British Admiralty has [illegible] orders forbidding men [illegible] aboard nuclear submari[illegible] wear watches with lu[illegible] dials. The order said suc[illegible] emit a radioactive ga[illegible] might affect instrume[illegible] nuclear subs.

KENNEDY JOI[illegible]

Washin[illegible] To Call

President Kennedy's [illegible] troops in Mississippi [illegible] latest in a long series o[illegible] actions dating all the wa[illegible] to George Washington.

Washington used [illegible] troops in 1794 to put do[illegible] Whisky Rebellion. In [illegible] farmers in Western Pe[illegible] vania objected to a liqu[illegible] tax.

In 1799, President Joh[illegible] ams used troops in [illegible] Pennsylvania against reb[illegible] citizens who refused t[illegible] Federal taxes. John Fri[illegible] arrested, and after [illegible] trials, was pardoned b[illegible] President.

Slave Act Riot

In 1833, President A[illegible] Jackson threatened u[illegible] troops when South C[illegible] "nullified" Federal [illegible] South Carolina backed [illegible] and the nullification [illegible] was rescinded.

MARSHALS' ROLE BLASTED

Southern Congressmen Call for Probe

Senator Eastland, Democrat of Mississippi, charged today that the "bloodshed" at Oxford, Miss., last night "is largely on the hands of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals."

He made the statement during Senate debate, in the course of which Senator Morse, Democrat of Oregon, suggested that, if former Army Gen. Edwin Walker took part in the campus riot, all available legal action "should be taken against him on charges of inciting an insurrection."

At another point in the debate, Senator Thurmond, Democrat of South Carolina, said it would be well for a congressional committee to investigate what happened in Mississippi yesterday.

Marshals Criticized

He made this statement after Senator Eastland read a long statement from the board of trustees of the University of Mississippi, critical of the way in which the force of United States marshals handled the situation.

In placing the blame on the judges of the appellate court who ruled on the Meredith case, Senator Eastland declared that Chief Judge Elbert P. Tuttle "aspires to be a Supreme Court Justice. He has become a Government judge, and that court is largely responsible."

In the statement they sent Senator Eastland, the trustees said the Department of Justice asked university officials yesterday to warn students not to assemble or demonstrate with a threat of expulsion if they did.

The university officials advised the Senator that they felt threats were not the way to handle the matter. They outlined a plan whereby on Sunday night a special edition of the Mississippian, the campus newspaper, would be distributed early Monday morning. They said they were preparing such a paper with appeals in it from various officials when they were informed that Mr. Meredith would be brought to the campus last night.

Time Not Appropriate

They said they advised the Justice Department this might not be an appropriate time "as the students were returning from their homes in large numbers at that time and that we have not yet had time to put into effect the appeal to students which was planned for late Sunday and early Monday morning. The university was informed that Mr. Meredith was coming anyway."

After describing the arrival of Mr. Meredith and the marshals, who surrounded the administration building, the report from the university official continued:

"As a natural consequence, students gathered in front of the Lyceum building to see what was going on. Before long you could hear the rebelling, giving college yells and, of course, occasional jeering. Some of the more reported to have flicked their cigarettes in the direction of the marshals from a position across the street from the marshals and some of the cigarettes were reported as being flicked on fabric covering military trucks."

The university officials reported that members of the State Highway Patrol were assisting the marshals and were pushing the students back onto the green and "seemed to have things under control when, without warning, the marshals fired tear gas projectiles, some of them at least fired point blank at the students and highway patrolment. This seemed, from all accounts, to have been unnecessary and illogical. This is also not the way to use tear gas, as any professional, well-trained law enforcement officer would know."

Investigation Proposed

Further on the university report accused the marshals of "amateurism," "poor leadership" and "bad judgment." They suggested that the Mississippi delegation in Co[illegible] have representatives o[illegible] Judiciary Committee [illegible] Mississippi to investigate

In the House, all [illegible] State's six House membe[illegible] cept Representative Sm[illegible] sued antiwar manifesto. [illegible] declared that their p[illegible] warning to President K[illegible] against attempting to r[illegible] Mr. Meredith as a stude[illegible] prophetic because "tensi[illegible] built to the point of a[illegible] caust."

"All this happened b[illegible] Federal authority insis[illegible] pressing for the regis[illegible] of one individual at Ol[illegible] although it is well know[illegible] he has no genuine de[illegible] obtain the benefits of h[illegible] available there," they a[illegible]

Several other Southern[illegible] lers indorsed the Mis[illegible] delegation's statement. [illegible] sentative Rivers, Demo[illegible] South Carolina, asserte[illegible] "Mississippi has grante[illegible] most demands by Plei[illegible] shal Martin Luther K[illegible]

The Evening Star
WITH SUNDAY MORNING EDITION

Phone LI. 3-5000  WASHINGTON, D. C., MONDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1962—48 PAGES

Home Delivered: Daily and Sunday, per month, 2.25

10 Cents

Guide for Readers

Amusements	A 18-19	Feature Page	B-16
Business Marts	A 25-27	Music	B-10
Classified	B-11-16	Obituaries	B-6
Editors	B 17-19	Society Events	B-4-5
Crossword	B-10	Sports	A 20-24
Editorial	A-14	TV Radio	A-16-17
Editorial Articles	A-15	Weather	B-6

ps Fire Over Oxford Mob ter Quelling Campus Riot

Troops in battle gear move through a crowd of townspeople today at the square in Oxford, Miss., home of the embattled campus of the University of Mississippi.—AP Wirephoto.

Army troops escort a group of prisoners to the National Guard Armory following a disturbance today in downtown Oxford, Miss., site of riots protesting registration of a Negro at the University of Mississippi.—AP Wirephotos.

Meredith Registered; Two Die, Scores Hurt

BULLETIN

Former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker was arrested today at a road block in Oxford, Miss., and charged on four offenses. Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy in Washington announced the charges, which included inciting to rebellion or insurrection, conspiring to commit this offense, conspiring to hinder Federal officers in their duties and assaulting a Federal officer.

By CECIL HOLLAND
Staff Writer

OXFORD, Miss., Oct. 1—Rifle fire cracked here today as Army troops moved in to clear marauding gangs out of the area around the town's public square.

Infantrymen with fixed bayonets methodically moved down streets leading from the square after a morning of disorders brought about by roving groups carrying on the battle over the enrollment of James H. Meredith in the University of Mississippi.

The 29-year-old Negro student was enrolled in the university this morning while Federal troops poured into Oxford after a night of wild and uncontrolled rioting on the nearby Ole Miss campus left two dead and scores injured.

More Pictures on Pages A-6, 7; Other Stories on Pages A-3, 6, 9.

Troops from the 2nd 'Indianhead' Infantry Division moved systematically down streets leading from the town square and in thorough fashion drove all the troublemakers from the area.

They were using live bullets but seemed to be firing over the heads of those fleeing before them.

Many of the young men were rounded up and with their hands held high were collected at street corners and then hauled away in trucks.

The townspeople said they were strangers and apparently had come in from other places.

There were no immediate reports of casualties.

The university campus remained quiet after soldiers with fixed bayonets disbursed a mob which rioted there most of the night.

The Negro student was registered in the university this morning behind the massed might of the Federal Government and troops carrying rifles with fixed bayonets.

As this compliance with Federal court orders was being carried out, roving gangs wandered through the courthouse square and along adjoining streets pelting Army convoys and foot soldiers who occupied the square with rocks, bottles, sticks and even a garbage can.

The gangs were made up of both youths and older men and hurled a barrage of taunts at the soldiers whenever they appeared.

Tossed Tear Gas

The Army first moved infantrymen into the area around the courthouse. They marched around the square and across the courthouse lawn before taking up positions.

After enduring the jeers and missile barrages, the infantrymen suddenly tossed tear gas cannisters at those who had been tormenting them and cleared the square.

Some of the infantrymen were Negroes and this served to infuriate even more the people who were collected around the square.

Nearly all business establishments around the large square, in the heart of this Deep South town, closed and locked their doors.

About one block south of the square, many young men, who appeared not to be natives of Oxford, congregated at the intersections of State Routes 6 and 7, principal arteries through town.

They hurled bricks at nearly every car that tried to run the gauntlet.

Convoys Still Pelted

Even with increasing numbers of troops along the streets and in the square, groups of young men still bombarded passing convoys with bottles, rocks and other missiles.

As one convoy passed through the town's center, a heavy log was dropped from a second floor balcony on one ck Workers on Strike

President Acts To End Walkout

W YORK, Oct. 1 (AP)— ...shoremen quit work on ... and Gulf Coast ports ... after their contract ex... Within 10 hours, Presi... Kennedy invoked the ...artley Act in an attempt ...the work stoppage.

... presidential action, the ...ep in Taft-Hartley ma... appeared to be the ...mmediate likelihood of ... the unionized long...

Administration Sees Barnett As Breaking His Promise

By MIRIAM OTTENBERG
Star Staff Writer

Gov. Ross Barnett of Mississippi assured the President and the Attorney General that his State police would maintain order if Negro Student James H Meredith was brought to the University of Mississippi campus—and then, in the administration's view, broke his promise.

The off-again-on-again role of the Governor came to light as his apparent capitulation and guarantees of safe passage gave way to uncontrolled rioting on the campus last night

MEREDITH BEGINS FIRST DAY WITH COLONIAL STUDY

OXFORD, Miss. (AP)—Negro James Meredith's first scheduled class today as a student at the University of Mississippi was Colonial American history.

Other courses being taken by the first known Negro to enroll at the 114-year-old institution include English, political science, mathematics and Spanish.

Mr. Meredith is living in generally agreed on a plan to put Mr. Meredith on the campus Sunday behind a Federal force.

Yesterday morning, Gov. Barnett called the Attorney General with something similar in mind. He asked for a show of force to justify his capitulation but promised that the Federal forces would run into no opposition.

Agreed on Two Points

The Attorney General and the Mississippi Governor consulted by telephone three or four times during the morning. Finally, at about 10:45 a.m., the Governor agreed on two

Kennedy Says He Did Duty

Broadcast Grim But Conciliatory

By the Associated Press

President Kennedy declares it was his inescapable duty to call out troops when Mississippi defied court orders to enroll a Negro at the State University.

Grim, yet conciliatory at times, the President said last night in a short radio-television address to the Nation that he hoped it would be unnecessary to use troops, even though conciliation and persuasion had failed to obtain admission of James H. Meredith.

After his address, Mr. Kenredith is followed closely by United States Chief Marshal thane (left) and other marshals today as he leaves the office enrolled as a student at the University of Mississippi at Oxford.

yards from frightening fashion as dark- ed from the four-motored jumped on a new came. plane and went to a telephone rate memorial In a short while Mississippi Soon seven Army trucks drove win, go home. State police, several hundred up. The marshals, numbering the university. strong were withdrawn from about 70 lined up near the quit. We can the immediate fighting area, trucks in steely military and then moved off the fashion. They stood and waited.
campus A little later an Air Force
This left the marshals and jet swooped down and dis-while armed, a small contingent of Army gorged Mr. Katzenbach and rear gas bombs engineers, sent here as a house- other Justice Department offi-on their at- keeping unit for the marshals, cials.
the Department to hold off the repeated at- After more telephoning and the brief- tacks. conferring the officials and said. With State police gone the marshals climbed into troop fired warning entrances to the university carriers and three sedans and and another campus were left wide open and took off from the airport.
a fire hose anyone who wished could walk Midway to the highway they students down the darkened streets to- met a Mississippi highway pa-harassed and ward the administration build- trol car carrying Col. T. B. intermittent ing. The building was often Birdsong, State safety commiscame from a bathed in drifting smoke from sioner, and University Chancel-who potted away the bombs that had been set lor J. D. Williams. Another con-off. ference followed, and then the caravan moved off.
As unexpectedly as the State By this time hundreds had police roadblocks were called gathered at the airport and off, they were restored four lined the road leading into hours and 45 minutes later just town.
as the Regular Army forces Much to everyone's surprise began appearing on the cam- the caravan turned abruptly
pus. into one of the university gates
This blocked off the univer- without opposition from the sity grounds from groups of State police guards. Within a men who seemed to be heading few minutes the empty troop there in increasing numbers carriers came out another gate and headed back to the airport.
Quiet Week End
The night's wild disorders The marshals quickly sur-came after an ominously quiet rounded the administration week end here marked only by building, and three hours later a few hijinks over Ole Miss's Mr. Meredith was brought to football victory over Kentucky Oxford. He landed in a small Saturday night in Jackson, plane at the airport accom-the State capital panied by John Doar of the Tensions began building up Justice Department and a mar-when reports filtered through shal and was taken without in-the town that some move could cident through a gathering be expected soon to bring the throng along the road to the Negro student here for regis- university.
trations. Reporters, not allowed in,
Rumors flew thick and fast watched from the entrance sevand the tension grew as word eral blocks away. They could came that President Kennedy hear yells and cheers, occa-had taken control of the Mis- sionally and got frequent resissippi National Guard. An- ports from students who came gry mutterings were heard then and went.
and later about this action. As dusk came the mood of The State police, which had the crowd within the university disappeared from Oxford late grounds and outside began to Friday, returned in force early change. At the airport Mr. Me-Sunday. They sealed off the shane was asked by a young campus and would permit no woman in torreador pants for one except students and those an autograph for her son.
living on the campus. News- A few hours later a mob, papermen who had been given first of students and then of press quarters in the adminis- students and outsiders, was tration building were denied crying for his blood.
admittance. Yoders Attacked
Engineers Arrived About dark reporters sud-Early in the morning the denly were allowed inside the engineers had arrived at Ox- grounds. Television camerford, and set up a housekeep- man Gordon Yoder of Dallas ing camp for the marshals. and his wife, a native of
At 7 p.m., amidst all sorts Jackson, Miss., were the first of rumors, the marshals arrived to reach the university circle.
at the Oxford-University air- Mr. Yoder left his car to port. First a DC-6 and then make pictures and was set up.
four two-engine planes landed As State police stood by he and all were filled with mar- went back to his car where both shals.
Chief United States Marshal
James McShane and his assistant, Jack Cameron, descend-pushing in on the marshals standing shoulder to shoulder around the building. There were cries, "tear gas," and the marshals donned their masks and took out their containers and readied their tear gas guns. Then the order would come "hold gas" and a little later "secure gas."

Order Came

All of a sudden the explosions came. The order came and this time a cascade of canisters and tear gas bombs fell amidst the advancing students. A squad of State police and newsmen were caught in the fumes.

Mr. Guthman explained later that Chief Marshal McShane gave the order after a piece of iron pipe had been hurled at a marshal and left a big dent in his helmet liner.

Inside the building Col. Birdsong was asking the Justice Department officials if they wanted the State police to remain. He was told they did. The Mississippi official recommended that military troops be called out and about 8:30 p.m. CST the order for troops went out.

Then the State police, angered because they were caught in the first tear gas barrage and resenting, it seemed, the presence of the marshals, began withdrawing. Orders came up to them to keep back from the firing line.

Conditions rapidly worsened. Without the presence of the State police the attacks on the marshals grew bolder.

And more people, including women and girls, were pouring into the fighting area. There were advances and threats depending on the volume of tear gas.

CONGRESS

Continued From Page A-1

billion, which the House chopped down to $3.6 billion. The Senate committee restored about two-thirds of this cut, but a coalition of conservative Democrats and Republicans will try to trim it closer to the House figure.

Another bill which could delay adjournment is an omnibus $2.2 billion authorization for flood control, river and harbor projects, which is still tied up in the House Public Works Committee.

Closely related to this measure is the public works appropriation bill, which passed the Senate today ahead of foreign aid. Most of this money is for water projects authorized in past years.

The House is expected to act early this week on the postal rate increase bill, to which the Senate attached pay increases for Federal employes. The House must decide whether to accept it as it stands, or seek a conference with the Senate.

Two New Frontier measures which seem likely to die are the bills to create job opportunities for young people leaving school, and to help cities provide mass transportation.

in the capital of Arkansas were ugly and dangerous. In Oxford, the tautness and danger is magnified to a gigantic scale.

And one of the ironies of the situation here today is that former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, who commanded the Federal troops that took over Little Rock, is on the opposite side of the fence here.

Mr. Walker whistled up the students and others on the campus of the University of Mississippi last night, when it became known that James H. Meredith was on the campus.

After the Little Rock riots, Mr. Walker said that he found his duty there distasteful.

However, at the time, he was the crisp and professional soldier who gave no sign of his feelings. He set up his command post at the corner of Central High School—the object of the riots.

Contrasts in Size

The contrast is most marked by the size of the operations here. In Little Rock, it was largely quiet three or four blocks from the school. In Oxford today, there is little quiet anywhere. On the contrary, there is a brooding sense of disaster.

Several days ago Mr. Walker said he planned to lead "tens of thousands" of volunteers to aid the cause of Gov. Ross Barnett.

But his only troops last night were a band of students and other persons whom he led in a charge on the positions of the Federal marshals.

They got within 100 feet, but the tear gas fumes repelled them.

Gives Advice

Later, Mr. Walker was giving demonstrators advice on how to counteract the acrid tear gas fumes.

Mr. Walker appeared on the Oxford town square during the disturbance there today.

Mr. Walker marched ahead

KENNEDY

Continued From Page A-1

the visit with the Chief Executive.

The President did not get to bed until about 3:30 a.m. today and was up again at 8:45 a.m., White House Press Pierre Salinger told reporters.

Working with the President in his office and keeping in touch with events in Mississippi until 5:30 a.m. were his brother, Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy, and White House aides P. Kenneth O'Donnell, Theodore C. Sorensen, Lawrence F. O'Brien and Andrew T. Hatcher, associate press secretary.

The President had put off his address for 2½ hours, from 7:30 p.m. to 10 p.m. EDT. In the interval, United States marshals had installed Mr. Meredith on the Ole Miss campus, and Gov. Ross Barnett had acknowledged "we are physically overpowered."

Mr. Kennedy avoided any dressing down of Gov. Barnett by name. And, as he spoke, the students at the university were ignoring the Governor's appeal to void violence.

The soldiers held their bayonets within inches of the former general, but did not touch him. The officer said something to Mr. Walker and he walked off through the crowd.

$10,000 Winner At Dice Shot By 'Poor Loser'

A Southeast Washington man has learned just how dangerous a poor loser can be.

The "winner," Robert E. Anderson, 23, of 4004 E street, S.E., told police he was shot in the legs and robbed of $10,000 by one of the players in a dice game at a home in the 4400 block of Ninth street N.W. last Monday.

Mr. Anderson said the incident occurred as he was leaving the game with his winnings.

He said another player asked him for $800 and then added: "I hate to do this to you, but give me the money."

Mr. Anderson did not reply, but continued walking and was shot in the legs by the other man who then robbed him of the money.

Capt. Murray Kutner, commander of the robbery squad, said police have arrested a 23-year-old man and will take his case directly to the grand jury because the holdup suspect is presently on bond in connection with a narcotics case.

Nuclear Sub Safety

LONDON, Oct. 1 (AP)—The British Admiralty has issued orders forbidding men serving aboard nuclear submarines to wear watches with luminous dials. The order said such dials emit a radioactive gas that might affect instruments in nuclear subs.

[illegible] consenting a lawyer.

The 51-year-old ex-convict asked the Appellate Court to reverse the District Court mainly on the grounds that the sentence was "disproportionately harsh in relation to the essential nature of the offense."

Morgan also argued that he was incompetent to act as his own chief counsel. Although he hired a lawyer, Morgan fled his own defense during the trial.

He was convicted last November on 13 counts of an indictment and faced a maximum sentence of 110 years in prison.

For a period of 18 months, Morgan impersonated a real lawyer, Lawrence Archie Harris, formerly of Washington, now living in Sacramento, Calif.

Polio Advisers Called by Terry

By the Associated Press

Surgeon General Luther L. Terry announced today he has called his special advisory committee on oral polio vaccines to meet tomorrow.

United States Public Health Service spokesmen said they knew of no particular reason for the meeting other than for the advisers to consider any additional information that has become available since they met on September 18, and to take another look at the general situation.

Tomorrow's meeting will be the fourth for the group, set up by Dr. Terry to evaluate the Nation's experience with oral polio vaccines and to make recommendations.

KENNEDY JOINS LIST

Washington Was First To Call Federal Troops

President Kennedy's use of troops in Mississippi is the latest in a long series of such actions dating all the way back to George Washington.

Washington used Federal troops in 1794 to put down the Whisky Rebellion, in which farmers in Western Pennsylvania objected to a liquor tax.

In 1799, President John Adams used troops in Eastern Pennsylvania against rebellious citizens who refused to pay Federal taxes. John Fries was arrested, and after several trials, was pardoned by the President.

Slave Act Riot

In 1833, President Andrew Jackson threatened use of troops when South Carolina "nullified" Federal tariffs. South Carolina backed down, and the nullification statute was rescinded.

Troops were called out to assist marshals in getting Anthony Burns, a Negro, through the streets of Boston and on a ship during Fugitive Slave Act riots in 1854.

During the Reconstruction period, much of the South was under military rule, and Federal troops were used to put down disturbances on a number of occasions.

The railroad strikes of 1887, which brought on widespread disturbances, brought out Federal troops to quell them, primarily on the basis of State requests.

Coxey's Army in 1894 was raised to demand Federal action during a depression. In one incident, President Cleveland ordered Federal troops into action to subdue a mob and recover a stolen railroad train in Montana.

In the Pullman strike of 1894, enforcement of Federal Court orders was a basis for the use of troops in Chicago. Interference with mail and with interstate commerce was also cited, but a broad order enjoined Eugene V. Debs at the time.

Governor Protested

The Justice Department, in a chronology of past troop use, pointed out that in the Pullman strike, the governor of Illinois, John P. Altgeld, not only did not request troops, but protested against their use.

Troops continued to be used on various occasions in strikes through the early 20th century. Usually this was at State request, but enforcement of Federal court orders was also used as a reason.

President Hoover in 1932 used troops to force Bonus Army marchers off Federal property, and troops took possession of plants in the Montgomery Ward seizure in 1946 under President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The most recent use, of course, was in September 1957, when President Eisenhower sent Army units to Little Rock, Ark., under Federal statutes which the Justice Department said were direct descendents of the law George Washington sought.

MARSHALS' ROLE BLASTED

Southern Congressmen Call for Probe

Senator Eastland, Democrat of Mississippi, charged today that the "bloodshed" at Oxford, Miss., last night "is largely on the hands of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals."

He made the statement during Senate debate, in the course of which Senator Morse, Democrat of Oregon, suggested that, if former Army Gen. Edwin Walker took part in the campus riot, all available legal action "should be taken against him on charges of inciting an insurrection."

At another point in the debate, Senator Thurmond, Democrat of South Carolina, said it would be well for a congressional committee to investigate what happened in Mississippi yesterday.

Marshals Criticized

He made this statement after Senator Eastland read a long statement from the board of trustees of the University of Mississippi, critical of the way in which the force of United States marshals handled the situation.

In placing the blame on the judges of the appellate court who ruled on the Meredith case, Senator Eastland declared that Chief Judge Elbert P. Tuttle "aspires to be a Supreme Court Justice. He has become a Government judge, and that court is largely responsible."

In the statement they sent Senator Eastland, the trustees said the Department of Justice asked university officials yesterday to warn students not to assemble or demonstrate with a threat of expulsion if they did.

The university officials advised the Senator that they felt threats were not the way to handle the matter. They outlined a plan whereby on Sunday night a special edition of the Mississippian, the campus newspaper, would be distributed early Monday morning. They said they were preparing such a paper with appeals in it from various officials when they were informed that Mr. Meredith would be brought to the campus last night.

Time Not Appropriate

They said they advised the Justice Department this might not be an appropriate time "as the students were returning from their homes in large numbers at that time and that we have not yet had time to put into effect the appeal to students which was planned for late Sunday and early Monday morning. The university was informed that Mr. Meredith was coming anyway."

After describing the arrival of Mr. Meredith and the marshals, who surrounded the administration building, the report from the university official continued:

"As a natural consequence, students gathered in front of the Lyceum building to see what was going on. Before long you could hear the mobbing, giving college yells and, of course, occasional jeering. Some of the severe reported to have flicked their cigarettes in the direction of the marshals from a position across the street from the marshals and some of the cigarettes were reported as being flicked on fabric covering military trucks."

The university officials reported that members of the State Highway Patrol were assisting the marshals and were pushing the students back onto the grass and "seemed to have things under control when, without warning, the marshals fired tear gas projectiles, some of them at least fired point blank at the students and highway patrolment. This seemed, from all accounts, to have been unnecessary and illogical. This is also not the way to use tear gas, as any professional, well-trained law enforcement officer would know."

Investigation Proposed

Further on the university report accused the marshals of "amateurism," "poor leadership" and "bad judgment." They suggested that the Mississippi delegation in Congress have representatives of the Judiciary Committee go to Mississippi to investigate.

In the House, all of the State's six House members except Representative Smith issued another manifesto. They declared that their previous warning to President Kennedy against attempting to register Mr. Meredith as a student was prophetic because "tension has built to the point of a holocaust."

"All this happened because Federal authority insisted on pressing for the registration of one individual at Ole Miss, although it is well known that he has no genuine desire to obtain the benefits of learning available there," they stated.

Several other Southern members indorsed the Mississippi delegation's statement. Representative Rivers, Democrat of South Carolina, asserted this "Mississippi lies prostrate to most demeaning by Field Marshal Martin Luther King."

Daily and Sunday, per

Troops Fire Over Oxford M After Quelling Campus

Senate OKs $5.2 Billion Works Bill

Aid Funds Debate Is Next Big Item In Closing Rush

By J. A. O'LEARY
Star Staff Writer

The Senate today passed the $5.2 billion public works appropriation bill as Congress began what leaders hope will be the final week of the session.

The public works measure carries founds for numerous river, harbor and flood control projects, plus $500 million for the emergency program requested by President Kennedy to reduce unemployment. The vote on passage was 63 to 8.

It came after Senator Proxmire, Democrat of Wisconsin, was defeated 52 to 17, in an effort to knock out the Glen Elder reclamation project in Kansas, which he said would stimulate production of feed grains at a time when the Government is struggling to get rid of a feed grain surplus.

This leaves only three money bills remaining to pass one or both houses before Congress can adjourn. Also awaiting action this week are the conference reports on the President's foreign trade and tax revision bills.

Aid Bill Is Next

The Senate turned immediately to debate on the $4.3 billion foreign aid bill, which conservatives will try to cut.

Meanwhile, the House Appropriations Committee reported out the last supplemental appropriation bill, carrying $400 million for miscellaneous Government needs. The Senate Appropriations Committee was in session prepared to act on the other remaining money bill for the State, Justice and Commerce departments.

Smathers Plans Fight

But a comparatively minor bill, designed to let self-employed persons set up their own retirement plans, was the most serious threat to adjournment by Saturday.

Senator Smathers, Democrat of Florida, has given his colleagues notice he will try to delay adjournment to prevent President Kennedy from giving the pension bill a pocket veto.

The President has 10 days from last Saturday in which to sign or veto this bill. Senator Smathers is confident two-thirds in the House and Senate would pass the bill over a veto.

But if Congress adjourns while Mr. Kennedy is still considering the measure he could let it die without his signature.

Democratic leaders will try to get a decision from the President on the pension bill when they hold their weekly conference with him tomorrow morning.

Drive Against Aid

Meanwhile, Senator Ellender, Democrat of Louisiana, was preparing to launch a drive in the Senate to eliminate some of the $782 million the Senate Appropriations Committee restored to the Foreign Aid bill.

The administration asked for the full authorization of $4.7

See CONGRESS, Page A-6

Troops in battle gear move through a crowd of townspeople today at the square in Oxford, Miss., home of the embattled campus of the University of Mississippi.—AP Wirephoto.

Army troops escort a group of prisoners to the National Guard Armory following a disturbance today in downtown Oxford, Miss., site of riots protesting registration of a Negro at the University of Mississippi.—AP Wirephotos.

Dock Workers Go on Strike

President Acts To End Walkout

NEW YORK, Oct. 1 (AP).—Longshoremen quit work on Atlantic and Gulf Coast ports today after their contract expired. Within 10 hours, President Kennedy invoked the Taft-Hartley Act in an attempt to end the work stoppage.

The presidential action, the first step in Taft-Hartley machinery, appeared to be the only immediate likelihood of bringing the unionized longshoremen back to docks from New England to Texas.

Prospects for quick agreement on a new work contract seemed remote.

The White House said President Kennedy would create a board of inquiry to report to him by Thursday on the nature and scope of the work stoppage. On the basis of the board's report, the President will decide whether to order

See DOCKS, Page A-2

Administration Sees Barnett As Breaking His Promise

By MIRIAM OTTENBERG
Star Staff Writer

Gov. Ross Barnett of Mississippi assured the President and the Attorney General that his State police would maintain order if Negro Student James H. Meredith was brought to the University of Mississippi campus—and then, in the administration's view, broke his promise.

The off-again-on-again role of the Governor came to light as his apparent capitulation and guarantees of safe passage gave way to uncontrolled rioting on the campus last night and early today.

What Happened

The behind-the-scenes story of the last 24 hours explains why the President postponed his broadcast to the Nation, why the marshals at first went on the campus alone and why Federal troops were finally summoned to quell the rioters.

This is the story as the administration sees it, pieced together from reports reaching Washington.

On Saturday, Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy and Burke Marshall, his assistant attorney general in charge of the civil rights division, had generally agreed on a plan to put Mr. Meredith on the campus Sunday behind a Federal force.

Yesterday morning, Gov. Barnett called the Attorney General with something similar in mind. He asked for a show of force to justify his capitulation but promised that the Federal forces would run into no opposition.

Agreed on Two Points

The Attorney General and the Mississippi Governor consulted by telephone three or four times during the morning. Finally, at about 10:45 a.m., the Governor agreed on two points.

He promised that the Federal marshals and Mr. Meredith would be admitted to the campus without resistance and he guaranteed that he would preserve law and order through the use of State police, either working alone or in co-operation with the marshals.

This guarantee was repeated

See PROMISE, Page A-2

MEREDITH BEGINS FIRST DAY WITH COLONIAL STUDY

OXFORD, Miss. (AP).—Negro James Meredith's first scheduled class today as a student at the University of Mississippi was Colonial American history.

Other courses being taken by the first known Negro to enroll at the 114-year-old institution include English, political science, mathematics and Spanish.

Mr. Meredith is living in a two-room apartment in Baxter Hall. The apartment includes a kitchenette.

Kennedy Says He Did Duty

Broadcast Grim But Conciliatory

By the Associated Press

President Kennedy declares it was his inescapable duty to call out troops when Mississippi defied court orders to enroll a Negro at the State University.

Grim, yet conciliatory at times, the President said last night in a short radio-television address to the Nation that he hoped it would be unnecessary to use troops, even though conciliation and persuasion had failed to obtain admission of James H. Meredith.

After his address, Mr. Kennedy sat beside the telephone in his office getting up-to-the-minute reports on rioting, gunfire and tear gas sweeping across the university campus at Oxford—and the arrival on the scene of Federal military reinforcements.

Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy and several members of the White House staff kept

See KENNEDY, Page A-6

Meredit Two Die

Former Maj. ... rested today at a... charged on fe... Robert F. Kenne... charges, which i... insurrection, con... conspiring to h... duties and assaul...

By ...

OXFORD, Mis... today as Army tro... gangs out of the ar...

Infantrymen ... moved down street... morning of disorde... carrying on the ba... H. Meredith in the...

The 29-year-old ... university this mor...

More Pictures on Page...

into Oxford after a r... on the nearby Ole Mis... jured.

Troops from the ... moved systematically ... square and in thorough... from the area.

They were using li... the heads of those fle...

Many of the young... hands held high were ... hauled away in trucks...

The townspeople s... had come in from othe...

There were no im...

The university ca... with fixed bayonets ... most of the night.

The Negro student ... morning behind the m... ment and troops carry...

As this compliance ... carried out, roving gan... square and along adj... and foot soldiers who o... sticks and even a garb...

The gangs were m... and hurled a barrage o... appeared.

T...

The Army first mo... the courthouse. They m... the courthouse lawn b...

After enduring the ... fantrymen suddenly to... had been tormenting "t...

Some of the infant... to infuriate even more ... the square.

Nearly all busines... square, in the heart o... locked their doors.

About one block s... who appeared not to ... the intersections of Sta... through town.

They hurled bricks ... the gauntlet.

Co...

Even with increasin... and in the square, gr... passing convoys with b...

As one convoy pa... heavy log was dropped ... of the passing vehicles.

The firing was att... Mississippi National Gu...

The rioting in Oxfor... Walker had appeared in... and wearing a 10-gallon...

He stayed in the a... of those in the crowd ... off as military eyes wa...

The Confederate f...

MEREDITH

Beleaguered Marshals Use Tear Gas, Refrain From Firing on Rioters

Continued From Page A-1.

the Lyceum Building at Ole Miss as Mr. Meredith was escorted by Registrar Robert Ellis.

Federal marshals, a bit the worse for wear after the night of shambles, surrounded the old Doric building.

Mr. Meredith walked out of the Lyceum a duly registered student. He was smiling and he seemed calm as he has been during the excitement of the past two weeks. A crowd gathered slowly 100 feet away in front of Conner Hall, across a campus street.

Impassioned students, yelling constantly, shouted:

"You've got blood on your hands."

"How's it feel to have blood on your hands?"

"Nigger go home."

Mr. Meredith's impassivity didn't alter when someone asked him if he were happy that his struggle to enroll met success.

"No," he said, "this is not a happy occasion."

Marshals to Stay

A few minutes after Mr. Meredith and his escort circled the Lyceum and returned without finding the proper class building, Edward O. Guthman, spokesman for the Justice Department, said:

"Marshals will escort Meredith about the campus as long as necessary. They won't leave him as long as he is in any danger."

At least 40 marshals have been berthed at Baxter Hall, the campus apartment building where Mr. Meredith was housed last night.

The Government built up its strength during the night despite the lull in the disorder. An Army spokesman said 4,000 regular troops now are in Oxford. The town's population is 5,283.

The campus rioting, punctuated with gunfire from the rioters ranks, broke out last night as the students and many outsiders vented their anger over the entrance of Mr Meredith to the 114-year-old institution.

Raged Through The Night

The riot raged throughout the night as students and outsiders repeatedly attacked several hundred marshals who had brought the Negro student to the campus late in the afternoon.

Regular Army troops were ordered here from their staging area in Memphis, Tenn., when the situation rapidly got out of hand under the cover of darkness.

Mississippi's Lt. Gov. Paul B. Johnson, jr., visited the campus at the height of the rioting and warned Justice Department officials who are here to expect more violence and possibly bloodshed during the day.

The Lieutenant Governor was said "to have expressed fears that many from outside Oxford were on the way here to join in the battle against integrating the university.

Newsman Killed

One of those killed in the campus rioting was a French newspaperman, Paul Guihard, representing the London Daily Sketch and a French news agency. After one of the early student forays he was found dead with a wound in the back.

A 23-year-old juke box repairman, Ray Gunter, of Oxford, also was fatally shot. He was taken from the university campus to Oxford Hospital, where he was pronounced dead on arrival.

A United States marshal, Graham Same, was critically wounded by a gunshot in the neck and was flown to the hospital at the Memphis Naval Air Station for emergency treatment. Another marshal, was wounded in the thigh by rifle back a hundred yards from the marshals.

James Meredith is followed closely by United States Chief Marshal James McShane (left) and other marshals today as he leaves the office where he enrolled as a student at the University of Mississippi at Oxford.

Mr. Walker jumped on a campus Confederate memorial and yelled:

"If you can't win, go home. Don't stay at the university. But, let's not quit. We can win."

The marshals, while armed, used only their tear gas bombs and never fired on their attackers, a Justice Department spokesman inside the beleaguered building said.

One time they fired warning shots in the air and another time punctured a fire hose being used by the students.

They were harassed and under danger from intermittent gunfire which came from a hidden sniper who potted away at the buildings.

Serious Situation

The plight of the marshals was becoming increasingly serious as the first military unit arrived on the campus.

This was the Oxford contingent of the Mississippi National Guard which had been Federalized by the President.

Its commander, Capt. Murray Falkner, a nephew of William Faulkner, the author who lived in Oxford, was among those injured. He was struck on the arm with a hurled brick.

The students and the outsiders "borrowed," as one said, a bulldozer and a fire engine and used these in an effort to run down the marshals and get close enough to hurl bricks.

The bricks and timber used to set barricades on the drives leading to the administration building were taken from a science building under construction close at hand.

The marshals, for the most part, stayed close around the building except for forays to drive the attackers back. They captured 31 prisoners during the night's rioting.

Two of these were operating the bulldozer and the firetruck. The truck made two successful runs close to the marshals before it was stopped amid a cloud of tear gas.

Wasn't Student

The operator, a Justice spokesman said, was not a student.

Most of the action and the bitterest fighting took place in front of a tree-spotted, parklike area called University Circle.

frightening fashion as darkness came.

In a short while Mississippi State police, several hundred strong, were withdrawn from the immediate fighting area and then moved off the campus.

This left the marshals and a small contingent of Army engineers, sent here as a housekeeping unit for the marshals, to hold off the repeated attacks.

With State police gone the entrances to the university campus were left wide open and anyone who wished could walk down the darkened streets toward the administration building. The building was often bathed in drifting smoke from the bombs that had been set off.

As unexpectedly as the State police roadblocks were called off, they were restored four hours and 45 minutes later just as the Regular Army forces began appearing on the campus.

This blocked off the university grounds from groups of men who seemed to be heading there in increasing numbers.

Quiet Week End

The night's wild disorders came after an ominously quiet week end here marked only by a few hijinks over Ole Miss's football victory over Kentucky Saturday night in Jackson, the State capital.

Tensions began building up when reports filtered through the town that some move could be expected soon to bring the Negro student here for registrations.

Rumors flew thick and fast and the tension grew as word came that President Kennedy had taken control of the Mississippi National Guard. Angry mutterings were heard then and later about this action.

The State police, which had disappeared from Oxford late Friday, returned in force early Sunday. They sealed off the campus and would permit no one except students and those living on the campus. Newspapermen who had been given press quarters in the administration building were denied admittance.

Engineers Arrived

Early in the morning the engineers had arrived at Graham Lake, 15 miles from Oxford, and set up a housekeeping camp for the marshals.

At 2 p.m., amidst all sorts ed from the four-motored plane and went to a telephone with Mr. McShane clutching a fistful of dimes.

Soon seven Army trucks drove up. The marshals, numbering about 70 lined up near the tracks in straggly military fashion. They stood and waited.

A little later an Air Force jet swooped down and disgorged Mr. Katzenbach and other Justice Department officials.

After more telephoning and conferring the officials and marshals climbed into troop carriers and three sedans and took off from the airport.

Midway to the highway they met a Mississippi highway patrol car carrying Col. T. B. Birdsong, State safety commissioner, and University Chancellor J. D. Williams. Another conference followed and then the caravan moved off.

By this time hundreds had gathered at the airport and lined the road leading into town.

Much to everyone's surprise the caravan turned abruptly into one of the university gates without opposition from the State police guards. Within a few minutes the empty troop carriers came out another gate and headed back to the airport.

The marshals quickly surrounded the administration building, and three hours later Mr. Meredith was brought to Oxford. He landed in a small plane at the airport accompanied by John Doar of the Justice Department and a marshal and was taken without incident through a gathering throng along the road to the university.

Reporters, not allowed in, watched from the entrance several blocks away. They could hear yells and cheers, occasionally and got frequent reports from students who came and went.

As dusk came the mood of the crowd within the university grounds and outside began to change. At the airport Mr. McShane was asked by a young woman in torreador pants for an autograph for her son.

A few hours later a mob, first of students and then of students and outsiders, was crying for his blood.

Yoders Attacked

About dark reporters suddenly were allowed inside the he and his wife, who was driving, came under attack. Headlights were kicked out, windows smashed and eventually the rioters began rolling the car to overturn it with Mr. and Mrs. Yoder inside.

The State police took them out and away as the mob wrecked the car. Mr. Yoder also lost a camera.

At the entrance to the Administration Building a Shreveport television man was manhandled and an Atlanta (Ga.) reporter was struck with the cry, "Damn Yankee, go home."

Three troop carriers, each with a Negro driver, were the targets of some of the rioters. Flaming torches were hurled at the canvas tops of the trucks and the army men were kept busy putting out the fires.

It soon became evident that Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy and the President had sent too little a force to cope with the situation and it was too late for the moment to get in supporting forces.

Edwin O. Guthman, the Justice Department's public relations officer who had come to Oxford, came out and said in 10 minutes he would meet with reporters at a nearby motel for a briefing on what had happened.

The briefing still has not been held and the reporters' contacts with Mr. Guthman inside the administration building have been by telephone.

The students and others kept pushing in on the marshals standing shoulder to shoulder around the building. There were cries, "tear gas," and the marshals donned their masks and took out their containers and readied their tear gas guns. Then the order would come "hold gas" and a little later "secure gas."

Order Came

All of a sudden the explosion came. The order came and this time a cascade of canister and tear gas bombs fell amidst the advancing students. A squad of State police and newsmen were caught in the fumes.

Mr. Guthman explained later that Chief Marshal McShane gave the order after a piece of iron pipe had been hurled at a marshal and left a big dent in his helmet liner.

Inside the building Col. Birdsong was asking the Justice Department officials if they wanted the State police to remain. He was told they did. The Mississippi official recommended that military troops be called out and about 8:30 p.m. (CST) the order for troops went out.

Then the State police, angered because they were caught in the first tear gas barrage, and resenting, it seemed, the presence of the marshals, began withdrawing. Orders came up to them to keep back from the firing line.

Conditions rapidly worsened. Without the presence of the State police the attacks on the marshals grew bolder.

And more people, including women and girls, were pouring into the fighting area. There were advances and threats depending on the volume of tear gas.

Newsman Killed in R... Worked on His Day O...

NEW YORK (AP).—Paul Guihard, 30, the newsman who was killed last night at the University of Mississippi, worked in the New York bureau of Agence France Presse. He also was a part-time correspondent for the London Daily Sketch.

President Kennedy expressed today "the shock of the American people" at the slaying.

The President sent a telegram of condolence to Jean Marin, president and director general of Agence France Presse in Paris, which employed Mr. Guihard.

Mr. Kennedy told Marin:

"I want to express to you the shock of the American people on the death of your correspondent, Paul Guihard, last night in Oxford, Miss.

"The American people, I am sure, as well as the l... ing citizens in the ... Mississippi, share my ... that this could have h... in our country.

"I hope you will ex... condolences to his fami...

Mr. Guihard, ... desk editor, had been ... to the integration stor... day off because his ... shorthanded.

He arrived in Mississ... terday, filed his firs... from Jackson, then pr... to Oxford.

Born in London of a ... father and British mot... Guihard had worked ... French news agency ... years. He came here tw... ago for a four-year assi... He was a bachelor.

A novice playright, ...

Walker Aids Bands Fighting U. S. in Oxfo...

By REUBEN MODEEN
Associated Press Staff Writer

OXFORD, Miss., Oct. 1.—Little Rock was a skirmish. Oxford is a war.

The riots just five years ago in the capital of Arkansas were ugly and dangerous. In Oxford, the ugliness and danger is magnified to a gigantic scale.

And one of the ironies of the situation here today is that former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, who commanded the Federal troops that took over Little Rock, is on the opposite side of the fence here.

Mr. Walker whipped up the students and others on the campus of the University of Mississippi last night, when it became known that James H. Meredith, was on the campus.

After the Little Rock riots, Mr. Walker said that he found his duty there distasteful.

However, at the time, he was the crisp and professional soldier who gave no sign of his feelings. He set up his command post at the corner of Central High School—the object of the riots.

Contrasts in Size

The contrast is most marked by the size of the operations here. In Little Rock, it was largely quiet three or four blocks from the school. In Oxford today, there is little quiet anywhere. On the contrary, there is a brooding sense of disaster.

Several days ago Mr Walker said he planned to lead "some of thousands" of volunteers to aid the cause of Gov. Ross Barnett.

But his only troops last night were a band of students and other persons whom he led in a charge on the positions of the Federal marshals.

They got within 100 feet but the tear gas fumes repelled them.

Gives Advice

Later, Mr Walker was giving demonstrators advice on how to counteract the acrid tear gas fumes.

Mr. Walker appeared on the Oxford town square during the disturbance there today.

Mr. Walker marched ahead of a file of soldiers as he were their inspecting ... Finally, an Army ... asked him to move. He ... The officer ordered ... soldiers carrying rifles ... bayonets alongside him. ... The soldiers held their ... nets within inches of t... mer general, but did not ... him. The officer said ... thing to Mr. Walker ... walked off through the ...

CONGRESS

Continued From Page A-1

billion, which the House chopped down to $3.6 billion. The Senate committee restored about two-thirds of this cut, but a coalition of conservative Democrats and Republicans will try to trim it closer to the House figure.

Another bill which could delay adjournment is an omnibus $2.2 billion authorization for flood control, river and harbor projects, which is still tied up in the House Public Works Committee.

Closely related to this measure is the public works appropriation bill, which passed the Senate today ahead of foreign aid. Most of this money is for water projects authorized in past years.

The House is expected to act early this week on the postal rate increase bill, to which the Senate attached pay increases for Federal employes. The House must decide whether to the visit with the Chief Executive.

KENNEDY

Continued From Page A-1

The President did not get to bed until about 5:30 a.m. today and was up again at 8:45 a.m., White House Press Pierre Salinger told reporters.

Working with the President in his office and keeping in touch with events in Mississippi until 5:30 a.m. were his brother, Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy, and White House aides P. Kenneth O'Donnell, Theodore C. Sorensen, Lawrence F. O'Brien and Andrew T. Hatcher, associate press secretary.

The President had put off his address for 2½ hours, from 7:30 p.m. to 10 p.m. (EDT). In the interval, United States marshals had installed Mr. Meredith on the Ole Miss campus, and Gov. Ross Bar-

$10,000 Winn... At Dice Shot By 'Poor Lose...

A Southeast West... man has learned just ho... gerous a poor loser can ...

The "winner," Robert ... derson, 23, of 4004 E ... S.E., told police he was ... the legs and robbed of ... by one of the players in ... game at a home in the ... block of Ninth street N.W. ... Monday.

Mr. Anderson said the ... dent occurred as he was ... ing the game with his ... nings.

He said another ... asked him for $800 and ... added: "I hate to do t... you, but give me the m...

Mr. Anderson did not ... but continued walking a... shot in the legs by the ... man who then robbed h... the money.

Capt. Murray Kutner, ... mander of the robbery ... said police have arrested ... year-old man and will ta... case directly to the grand ... because the holdup susp... presently on bond in co... tion with a narcotics ca...

Nuclear Sub Saf...

LONDON, Oct. 1 (AP).—... British Admiralty has ... orders forbidding men a... aboard nuclear submarin... wear watches with lum... dials. The order said such ... emit a radioactive gas ... might affect instrumen... nuclear subs.

KENNEDY JOIN...

Washin... To Call ...

President Kennedy's u... troops in Mississippi ... latest in a long series of ... actions dating all the way ... to George Washington.

Washington used F... troops in 1794 to put dow... Whisky Rebellion, in ... farmers in Western Pe... vania objected to a liquo...

In 1799, President John... ams used troops in E... Pennsylvania against rebe... citizens who refused to ... Federal taxes. John Frie... arrested, and after ... trials, was pardoned by ... President.

PLAINTIFF'S EXHIBIT 13

...r 1, 1962

...Marshals Use Tear Gas, ...n Firing on Rioters

...Meredith is followed closely by United States Chief Marshal ...McShane (left) and other marshals today as he leaves the office ...he enrolled as a student at the University of Mississippi at Oxford.

...ded yards from ...r jumped on a ...derate memorial ...n't win, go home. ...t the university ...d quit. We can ...

...ade, while armed, ...it tear gas bombs ...red on their at... ...stice Department ...nside the briea... ...g said.

...hey fired warning ...air and another ...ed a fire hose ...f the students ...e harassed and ...from intermittent ...h came from a ...who potted away ...ngs.

...e Situation

...n of the marshals ...ing increasingly ...the first military ...on the campus.

...the Oxford con... ...Mississippi Na... ...which had been ...y the President.

...ager, Capt. Mur... ...a nephew of Wil... ...the author who ...ford, was among ...d. He was struck ...a hurled brick, ...ng and the out... ...ed," as one said, ...and a fire engine ...in an effort to ...arshals and get ...to hurl bricks ...and timber used to ...on the drives ...administration ...aken from a sci... ...under construc... ...ed.

...ks for the most ...ose around the ...for forays to ...ers back. They ...oners during the ...

...were operating ...nd the firetruck. ...e two successful ...e marshals be... ...ed amid a cloud ...

...Student

...r, a Justice ...d, was not a ...

...action and the ...g took place in ...-spotted, park... ...University Cir... frightening fashion as dark... ...ness came.

In a short while Mississippi State police, several hundred strong were withdrawn from the immediate fighting area and then moved off the campus.

This left the marshals and a small contingent of Army engineers, sent here as a housekeeping unit for the marshals, to hold off the repeated attacks.

With State police gone the entrances to the university campus were left wide open and anyone who wished could walk down the darkened streets toward the administration building. The building was often bathed in drifting smoke from the bombs that had been set off.

As unexpectedly as the State police roadblocks were called off, they were restored four hours and 45 minutes later just as the Regular Army forces began appearing on the campus.

This blocked off the university grounds from groups of men who seemed to be heading there in increasing numbers.

Quiet Week End

The night's wild disorders came after an ominously quiet week end here marked only by a few hijinks over Ole Miss's football victory over Kentucky Saturday night in Jackson, the State capital.

Tensions began building up when reports, filtered through the town that some move could be expected soon to bring the Negro student here for registrations.

Rumors flew thick and fast and the tension grew as word came that President Kennedy had taken control of the Mississippi National Guard. Angry mutterings were heard then and later about this action.

The State police, which had disappeared from Oxford late Friday, returned in force early Sunday. They sealed off the campus and would permit no one except students and those living on the campus. Newspapermen who had been given press quarters in the administration building were denied admittance.

Engineers Arrived

Early in the morning the engineers had arrived at Graham Lake, 15 miles from Oxford, and set up a housekeeping camp for the marshals.

At 2 p.m., amidst all sorts ...ed from the four-motored plane and went to a telephone with Mr. McShane clutching a fistful of dimes.

Soon seven Army trucks drove up. The marshals, numbering about 70 lined up near the tracks in straggly military fashion. They stood and waited.

A little later an Air Force jet swooped down and disgorged Mr. Katzenbach and other Justice Department officials.

After more telephoning and conferring the officials and marshals climbed into troop carriers and three sedans and took off from the airport.

Midway to the highway they met a Mississippi highway patrol car carrying Col. T. B. Birdsong, State safety commissioner, and University Chancellor J. D. Williams. Another conference followed and then the caravan moved off.

By this time hundreds had gathered at the airport and lined the road leading into town.

Much to everyone's surprise the caravan turned abruptly into one of the university gates without opposition from the State police guards. Within a few minutes the empty troop carriers came out another gate and headed back to the airport.

The marshals quickly surrounded the administration building, and three hours later Mr. Meredith was brought to Oxford. He landed in a small plane at the airport accompanied by John Doar of the Justice Department and a marshal and was taken without incident through a gathering throng along the road to the university.

Reporters, not allowed in, watched from the entrance several blocks away. They could hear yells and cheers, occasionally and got frequent reports from students who came and went.

As dusk came the mood of the crowd within the university grounds and outside began to change. At the airport Mr. McShane was asked by a young woman in torreador pants for an autograph for her son.

A few hours later a mob, first of students and then of students and outsiders, was crying for his blood.

Yoders Attacked

About dark reporters suddenly were followed inside the grounds. Television camer... he and his wife, who was driving, came under attack. Headlights were kicked out, windows smashed and eventually the rioters began rolling the car to overturn it with Mr. and Mrs. Yoder inside.

The State police took them out and away as the mob wrecked the car. Mr. Yoder also lost a camera.

At the entrance to the Administration Building a Shreveport television man was manhandled and an Atlanta (Ga.) reporter was struck with the cry, "Damn Yankee, go home."

Three troop carriers, one with a Negro driver, were the targets of some of the rioters. Flaming torches were hurled at the canvas tops of the trucks and the army men were kept busy putting out the fires.

It soon became evident that Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy and the President had sent too little a force to cope with the situation and it was too late for the moment to get in supporting forces.

Edwin O. Guthman, the Justice Department's public relations officer who had come to Oxford, came out and said in 10 minutes he would meet with reporters at a nearby motel for a briefing on what had happened.

The briefing still has not been held and the reporters' contacts with Mr. Guthman inside the administration building have been by telephone.

The students and others kept pushing in on the marshals shoulder to shoulder around the building. There were cries, "tear gas," and the marshals donned their masks and took out their containers and readied their tear gas guns. Then the order would come "hold gas" and a little later "secure gas."

Order Came

All of a sudden the explosion came. The order came and this time a cascade of canister and tear gas bombs fell amidst the advancing students. A squad of State police and newsmen were caught in the fumes.

Mr. Guthman explained later that Chief Marshal McShane gave the order after a piece of iron pipe had been hurled at a marshal and left a big dent in his helmet liner.

Inside the building Col. Birdsong was asking the Justice Department officials if they wanted the State police to remain. He was told they did. The Mississippi official recommended that military troops be called out and about 8:30 p.m. CST the order for troops went out.

Then the State police, angered because they were caught in the first tear gas barrage and resenting, it seemed, the presence of the marshals, began withdrawing. Orders came up to them to keep back from the firing line.

Conditions rapidly worsened. Without the presence of the State police the attacks on the marshals grew bolder.

And more people, including women and girls, were pouring into the fighting area. There were advances and threats depending on the volume of tear gas.

Newsman Killed in Riot Worked on His Day Off

NEW YORK (AP).—Paul Guihard, 29, the newsman who was killed last night on the University of Mississippi campus, worked in the New York bureau of Agence France Presse. He also was a part-time correspondent for the London Daily Sketch.

President Kennedy expressed today "The shock of the American people" at the slaying.

The President sent a telegram of condolence to Jean Marin, president and director general of Agence France Presse in Paris, which employed Mr. Guihard.

Mr. Kennedy told Marin:

"I want to express to you the shock of the American people on the death of your correspondent, Paul Guihard, last night in Oxford, Miss.

"The American people, I am sure, as well as the law-abiding citizens in the State of Mississippi, share my sorrow that this could have happened in our country.

"I hope you will convey my condolences to his family."

Mr. Guihard, normally a desk editor, had been assigned to the integration story on his day off because his office was shorthanded.

He arrived in Mississippi yesterday, filed his first story from Jackson, then proceeded to Oxford.

Born in London of a French father and British mother, Mr. Guihard had worked for the French news agency for 10 years. He came here two years ago for a four-year assignment. He was a bachelor.

A novice playright, he was the author of a one-act avant garde comedy, "The Dark Chair." It played about five months off-Broadway last winter.

PAUL GUIHARD
—AP Wirephoto

Walker Aids Bands Fighting U. S. in Oxford

By [redacted]

OXFORD, Miss., Oct. 1.—Little Rock was a skirmish. Oxford is a war.

The riots just five years ago in the capital of Arkansas were ugly and dangerous. In Oxford, the ugliness and danger is magnified to a gigantic scale.

And one of the ironies of the situation here today is that former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, who commanded the Federal troops that took over Little Rock, is on the opposite side of the fence here.

Mr. Walker [redacted] the students and others on the campus of the University of Mississippi last night, when it became known that James H. Meredith, was on the campus.

After the Little Rock riots, Mr. Walker said that he found his duty there distasteful.

However, at the time, he was the crisp and professional soldier who gave no sign of his feelings. He set up his command post at the corner of Central High School—the object of the riots.

Contrasts in Rise

The contrast is most marked by the size of the operations here. In Little Rock, it was largely quiet three or four blocks from the school. In Oxford today, there is little quiet anywhere. On the contrary, there is a brooding sense of disaster.

Several days ago Mr. Walker said he planned to lead "tens of thousands" of volunteers to aid the cause of Gov. Ross Barnett.

But his only troops last night were a band of students and other persons whom he led in a chant on the positions of the Federal marshals.

They got within 100 feet but the tear gas fumes repelled them.

Gives Advice

Later, Mr. Walker was giving demonstrators advice on how to counteract the acrid tear gas fumes.

Mr. Walker appeared on the Oxford town square during the disturbance there today.

Mr. Walker marched ahead of a file of soldiers as though he were their inspecting officer.

Finally, an Army officer asked him to move. He refused. The officer ordered several soldiers carrying rifles with bayonets alongside him.

The soldiers held their bayonets within inches of the former general, but did not touch him. The officer said something to Mr. Walker and he walked off through the crowd.

CONGRESS

Continued From Page A-1

billion, which the House chopped down to $3.6 billion. The Senate committee restored about two-thirds of this cut, but a coalition of conservative Democrats and Republicans will try to trim it closer to the House figure.

Another bill which could delay adjournment is an omnibus $2.2 billion authorization for flood control, river and harbor projects, which is still tied up in the House Public Works Committee.

Closely related to this measure is the public works appropriation bill, which passed the Senate today ahead of foreign aid. Most of this money is for water projects authorized in past years.

The House is expected to act early this week on the postal rate increase bill, to which the Senate attached pay increases for Federal employes. The House must decide whether to the vigil with the Chief Executive.

KENNEDY

Continued From Page A-1

The President did not get to bed until about 5:30 a.m. today and was up again at 8:45 a.m., White House Press Pierre Salinger told reporters.

Working with the President in his office and keeping in touch with events in Mississippi until 5:30 a.m. were his brother, Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy, and White House aides P. Kenneth O'Donnell, Theodore C. Sorensen, Lawrence F. O'Brien and Andrew T. Hatcher, associate press secretary.

The President had put off his address for 2½ hours, from 7:30 p.m. to 10 p.m. EDT. In the interval, United States marshals had installed Mr. Meredith on the Ole Miss campus, and Gov. Ross Barnett had acknowledged "we are

$10,000 Winner At Dice Shot By 'Poor Loser'

A Southeast Washington man has learned just how dangerous a poor loser can be.

The "winner," Robert E. Anderson, 23, of 4004 E street, S.E., told police he was shot in the legs and robbed of $10,000 by one of the players in a dice game at a home in the 4400 block of Ninth street N.W. last Monday.

Mr. Anderson said the incident occurred as he was leaving the game with his winnings.

He said another player asked him for $800 and then added: "I hate to do this to you, but give me the money."

Mr. Anderson did not reply, but continued walking and was shot in the legs by the other man who then robbed him of the money.

Capt. Murray Kutner, commander of the robbery squad, said police have arrested a 22-year-old man and will take his case directly to the grand jury because the holdup suspect is presently on bond in connection with a narcotics case.

Nuclear Sub Safety

LONDON, Oct. 1 (AP).—The British Admiralty has issued orders forbidding men serving aboard nuclear submarines to wear watches with luminous dials. The order said such dials emit a radioactive gas that might affect instruments in nuclear subs.

Court Upholds Conviction of Fake Lawyer

The United States Court of Appeals today upheld the conviction of Daniel Jackson Oliver Wendell Holmes Morgan, who received a three-to-15-year prison sentence for impersonating a lawyer.

The 51-year-old ex-convict asked the Appellate Court to reverse the District Court mainly on the grounds that the sentence was "disproportionately harsh in relation to the essential nature of the offense."

Morgan also argued that he was incompetent to act as his own chief counsel. Although he hired a lawyer, Morgan led his own defense during the trial.

He was convicted last November on 13 counts of an indictment and faced a maximum sentence of 110 years in prison.

For a period of 16 months, Morgan impersonated a real lawyer, Lawrence Archie Harris, formerly of Washington, now living in Sacramento, Calif.

Polio Advisers Called by Terry

By the Associated Press

Surgeon General Luther L. Terry announced today he has called his special advisory committee on oral polio vaccines to meet tomorrow.

United States Public Health Service spokesmen said they know of no particular reason for the meeting other than for the advisers to consider any additional information that has become available since they met on September 15, and to take another look at the general situation.

"Tomorrow's meeting will be the fourth for the group, set up by Dr. Terry to evaluate the Nation's experience with oral polio vaccines and to make recommendations.

KENNEDY JOINS LIST

Washington Was First To Call Federal Troops

President Kennedy's use of troops in Mississippi is the latest in a long series of such actions dating all the way back to George Washington.

Washington used Federal troops in 1794 to put down the Whisky Rebellion, in which farmers in Western Pennsylvania objected to a liquor tax.

In 1799, President John Adams used troops in Eastern Pennsylvania against rebellious citizens who refused to pay Federal taxes. John Fries was arrested, and after several trials, was pardoned by the President.

Slave Act Riot

Troops were called out to assist marshals in getting Anthony Burns, a Negro, through the streets of Boston and on a ship during Fugitive Slave Act riots in 1854.

During the Reconstruction period, much of the South was under military rule, and Federal troops were used to put down disturbances on a number of occasions.

The railroad strikes of 1887, which brought on widespread disturbances, brought out Federal troops to quell them, primarily on the basis of State requests.

Coxey's Army in 1894 was

[fol. 2038]

DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 3

[Stamp—U. S. Court of Appeals—Filed Jul 27 1962—Edward W. Wadsworth, Clerk]
[Handwritten notation—I concur—JRB—D DeV]

IN THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FIFTH CIRCUIT

No. 19475

JAMES H. MEREDITH, on behalf of himself and others similarly situated, Appellant,

v.

CHARLES DICKSON FAIR, President of the Board of Trustees of the State Institutions of Higher Learning, Et Al., Appellees.

Order Vacating Stay, Recalling Mandate, and Issuing New Mandate Forthwith

Before Brown and Wisdom, Circuit Judges, and DeVane, District Judge.

Judge Wisdom:

In this case time is now of the quintessence. Time has been of the essence since January 1961 when James Meredith, in the middle of his junior year at Jackson State College (for Negroes), applied for admission to the University of Mississippi.

This Court heard three appeals of the case. In its opinion on the last appeal we concluded:

"... [F]rom the moment the defendants discovered Meredith was a Negro they engaged in a carefully calculated campaign of delay, harassment, and masterly inactivity. It was a defense designed to discourage and to defeat by evasive tactics which would > have been a credit to Quintus Fabius Maximus. . . . We see no valid, non-discriminatory reason for the University's not accepting Meredith. Instead, we see a well-defined pattern of delays and frustrations, part of a Fabian policy of worrying the enemy into defeat while time worked for the defenders."

Chronology highlights this case. June 25, 1962, this Court reversed the district court and remanded the case with instructions that the district court grant the injunction prayed for in the complaint. Rule 32 of the Rules of the [fol. 2039] Fifth Circuit, in part, reads:

> "Mandate shall issue at any time after twenty-one days from the date of the decision, unless an application for rehearing has been granted or is pending. If such application is denied the mandate will be stayed for a further period of ten days. No further stay will be granted unless applied for within the delay given above. A mandate once issued will not be recalled except by the court and to prevent injustice."

During the twenty-one day period the defendants did not apply to this Court for a rehearing or for a stay of mandate. July 17 the mandate went down. Bright and early July 18, the attorney for the defendant presented to the Clerk for filing an order staying "the execution and enforcement of the mandate". The order, dated July 18 at Meridian, Mississippi, was signed by the Honorable Ben F. Cameron, United States Circuit Judge. Judge Cameron was not a member of the Court which heard any of Meredith's appeals. The Court which determined the cause was composed of Circuit Judges Brown and Wisdom and District Judge DeVane, sitting by designation. July 19 the Clerk, acting under instructions from this Court, telegraphed the parties through their counsel, requesting that they exchange and file, within five days, "statements of their positions with memorandum briefs for or against the granting of any stays, including the vacating of the stay entered by Judge Cameron, the issuance by this Court of injunctions pending further appeal, or other appropriate action". The Court has now received and considered the statements and their supporting briefs.

It is unnecessary to decide whether a judge who is not a member of the Court determining the cause is not "a judge of the Court rendering the judgment or decree" within the meaning of 28 U.S.C.A. §2101(f). See Application of Chessman, 1954, 75 Cal. S. Ct. 85, 274 P. 2d 645. [fol. 2040] The Court is bigger than a single judge. Assuming, but without deciding, that Judge Cameron is indeed a judge of "the court rendering the judgment", we hold that the court determining the cause has inherent power to review the action of a single judge, whether or not the single judge is a member of the panel. Rosenberg v. United States, 1953, 346 U. S. 273, 73 S. Ct. 1152, 97 L. Ed. 1607, reconsideration denied, 346 U. S. 324, 73 S. Ct. 1171, 97 L. Ed. 1634, reconsideration denied, 346 U. S. 324, 73 S. Ct. 1178, 97 L. Ed. 1634. A contrary position would allow a judge in the minority, were he a member of the panel deciding the case, to frustrate the mandate of the majority. And, it is unthinkable that a judge who was not a member of the panel should be allowed to frustrate the mandate of the Court.

All of the members of this Court agree that when a mandate has been issued, it is logically and legally too late to stay it. Unless the Court should recall the mandate, the Court's control over the judgment below comes to an end after the mandate has been issued. That is the plain meaning of Rule 32. The authorities fully support the rule. Omaha Electric Light & Power Co. v. City of Omaha, 216 Fed. 848, setting aside on rehearing decree in 179 Fed. 455, which aff'd 172 Fed. 494, appeal dismissed 230 U. S. 123, 57 L. Ed. 1419, 33 S. Ct. 974; In re Nevada-Utah Mines & Smelters Corp., 204 Fed. 982, denying rehearing 202 Fed. 126. For this reason the purported stay is vacated and set aside.

Judge Brown and Judge Wisdom are also of the opinion that even if the thin residual control an appellate court might have over an issued mandate were broad enough to support a stay in exceptional cases, here the stay order should be vacated and set aside on the ground that it was improvidently granted.

[fol. 2041] Judge Cameron did not sit on this case. He did not have the opportunity of a sitting judge to study the record, to hear the argument, to discuss the facts and the law in the judges' conference on the case.

This is not a Chessman case. It is not a Rosenberg case. It is not a matter of life or death to the University of Mississippi. Texas University, the University of Georgia, Louisiana State University, the University of Virginia, other Southern universities are not shriveling away because of the admission of Negroes. There was no emergency requiring prompt action by a single judge. Apparently, however, there was studied action by the applicants' attorney to avoid asking the Court for a rehearing or for a stay.

In the matter of stays, this Court is not at all in the position of the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court is the final arbiter of the ultimate answer to any question sought to be preserved by a stay. Courts of Appeal, on the other hand, have disciplined themselves to take a restricted view of the propriety of issuing stays. When time is of the essence to the successful party in the Court of Appeals a stay should be predicated upon a doubtful question of law unresolved by earlier court decisions and there should be a reasonable likelihood of the Supreme Court finally deciding in favor of the applicant for a stay. See Rule 32 of the Rules of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals. As recently as October 26, 1961, the Fifth Circuit Court, with only Judge Hutcheson absent, rendered the following order:

> "Stays of Mandates of the Court after the denial of a motion for rehearing are to be cautiously granted to avoid situations such as where the applicant was the losing party in the trial court and there has been no grant of supersedeas."

Chief Justice Taft, in Magnum Import Co. v. Coty, 1923, 262 U. S. 159, 164, 43 S. Ct. 531, 67 L. Ed. 922, established [fol. 2042] guidelines for granting stays which have withstood the years:

> "The petition should, in the first instance, be made to the circuit court of appeals, which, with its complete knowledge of the cases, may, with full consideration, promptly pass on it. That court is in a position to judge, first; whether the case is one likely, under our practice, to be taken up by us on certiorari; and second, whether the balance of convenience requires a suspension of its decree and a withholding of its mandate. It involves no disrespect to this court for the circuit court of appeals to refuse to withhold its mandate or to suspend the operation of its judgment or decree pending application for certiorari to us. If it thinks a question involved should be ruled upon by this court, it may certify it. If it does not certify, it may still consider that the case is one in which a certiorari may properly issue, and may, in its discretion, facilitate the application by withholding the mandate or suspending its decree. This is a matter, however, wholly within its discretion. If it refuses, this court requires an extraordinary showing before it will grant a stay of the decree below pending the application for a certiorari, and even after it has granted a certiorari, it requires a clear case and a decided balance of convenience before it will grant such stay."

In United States v. Louisiana, 1960, 364 U. S. 500, 81 S. Ct. 260, 5 L.Ed.2d 245 the Supreme Court was requested to grant a stay of a three judge court decision which nullified a series of Louisiana laws aimed at maintaining a statewide policy of school segregation. In denying the request for a stay, pending appeal, the Supreme Court ruled, "The scope of these enactments and the basis on which they were found in conflict with the Constitution of the United States are not matters of doubt." Similarly, in Evans v. Ennis,

1960, 364 U. S. 802, 81 S.Ct. 27, 5 L.Ed.2d 36, the Supreme Court denied a stay of a decision by the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit holding a grade a year plan of desegregation invalid in the State of Delaware. Evans v. Ennis, 1960, 3 Cir., 281 F.2d 385. On the same day, the Supreme Court denied a stay in a school segregation case from Houston, Texas; Houston Independent School District v. Ross, 1960, 364 U. S. 803, 81 S. Ct. 27, 5 L.Ed.2d 36, where [fol. 2043] a district court rejected the school board plan and entered an order embodying its own grade a year plan. Houston Independent School District v. Ross, 1960, 5 Cir., 282 F.2d 95. See also Orleans Parish School Board v. Bush and Davis v. Williams, 1960, 364 U. S. 803, 81 S.Ct. 27, 5 L.Ed.2d 36. In Lucy v. Adams, 1955, 350 U. S. 1, 76 S.Ct. 33, 100 L.Ed. 3, the Supreme Court vacated a stay granted by a District Court of its order directing the admission of the first two Negroes to the University of Alabama pending appeal to the Fifth Circuit. The court there held that where the rights are personal and present and where the stay issue is coextensive with that on the merits, the stay should be denied. See also, Cooper v. Aaron, 1958, 358 U.S. at 27, 78 S.Ct. 1397, 3 L.Ed.2d 1. The Supreme Court also refused to reverse the action of Chief Judge Tuttle of the Fifth Circuit when he vacated a stay granted, by the District Court, pending appeal, in the University of Georgia case. Danner v. Holmes, 1961, 364 U.S. 939, 81 S.Ct. 376, 5 L.Ed. 2d 371. In this case Judge Tuttle's order stressed the fact that it was unlikely that this Court would reverse the District Court's decision in a case in which there had been a trial on a motion for preliminary injunction and a final hearing on the merits where all the facts aired in a lengthy trial and the judge made lengthy and careful findings of fact. See also, Hawkins v. Board of Control, 1958, 5 Cir., 253 F.2d 752, where this Court issued its mandate forthwith when the District Court delayed further adjudication of Hawkins' right to enter the University of Florida after nine years of litigation through the state court. In Tureaud v. Board of Supervisors of L.S.U., 1953, 346 U. S. 881, the Supreme Court stayed this Court's reversal of the District Court's injunction order ordering the admission of a Negro student to L.S.U. As a result of the Supreme Court's stay pending certiorari, the injunction order of the District [fol. 2044] Court was reinstated and the applicant was able to enter the University of Louisiana.

The defendants have an absolute right to apply for a writ of certiorari—regardless of whether the mandate is stayed or issued. D ial of a stay is a minor inconvenience to the defendants. But to allow a stay would subject the successful litigant, Meredith, to the injustice of additional delays. Partly to avoid such a possibility, and to bring the case to a prompt ending after a full trial on the merits, this Court denied a preliminary injunction. Unfortunately, the wording of the mandate, "that an injunction issue as prayed for in the complaint" was so loose as to defeat the intentions of the Court. Accordingly, the mandate must be clarified by being recalled and amended.

There is no doubt as to the power of the court to recall its mandate. Thus, in Wichita Royalty Co. v. City Nat. Bank of Wichita Falls, 5 Cir., 1938, 97 F.2d 249, the Fifth Circuit held: "[The Court has the] power to recall the mandate and rehear the case, though too late under our rules regularly to do so." The opinion was written by Judges Sibley, Holmes, and Mize. In that case the term at which judgment was rendered had not closed. It had not in this case. However, "the power exists to recall the mandate and set aside the judgment even after the expiration of the term during which the judgment became final, but a court of appeals in the exercise of that power usually is guided by its own applicable rules, such as a requirement that good cause must be shown in order for a mandate to be recalled." 14 Cyclopedia of Federal Procedure, §69.14. See Hines v. Royal Indemnity Co., 6 Cir., 253 F.2d 111. See also Judge Holmes' opinion for this Court in Sun Oil Co. v. Burford, 5 Cir., 1942, 130 F.2d 10.

[fol. 2045] It is now forthwith ordered that the mandate and judgment of this Court be recalled and amended by making explicit the meaning that was implicit in this Court's conclusions as expressed throughout its opinion in this cause, dated June 25, 1962. To this end, the order will now read as follows:

> The case is reversed and remanded with directions to the District Court forthwith to grant all relief prayed for by the plaintiff and to issue forthwith a permanent injunction against each and all of the defendants-appellees, their servants, agents, employees, successors and assigns, and all persons acting in concert with them, as well as any and all persons having knowledge of the decree, enjoining and compelling each and all of them to admit the plaintiff-appellant, James H. Meredith, to the University of Mississippi under his applications heretofore filed, which are declared by us to be continuing applications. Such injunction shall in terms prevent and prohibit said defendants-appellees, or any of the classes of persons referred to from excluding the plaintiff-appellant from admission to continued attendance at the University of Mississippi. Pending such time as the District Court has issued and enforced the orders herein required and until such time as there has been full and actual compliance in good faith with each and all of said orders by the actual admission of plaintiff-appellant to, and the continued attendance thereafter at the University of Mississippi, this Court herewith issues its own preliminary injunction enjoining and compelling each and all of said parties to admit plaintiff-appellant to, and allow his continual attend> [fol. 2046] ance at the University of Mississippi, further prohibiting and preventing said parties or any other of them from excluding said plaintiff-appellant from attendance to and continued attendance thereafter on the same basis as other students at the University of Mississippi.

Judge Cameron's stay order dated July 18 is forthwith vacated and set aside. The mandate in this cause is forthwith recalled and amended as set forth herein. This Court's preliminary injunction against the defendants-appellees is forthwith issued.

Judge DeVane concurs in the result.

A true copy

EDWARD W. WADSWORTH
Clerk, U. S. Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit
/s/ (Signature Illegible)
Deputy

(Seal)

New Orleans, Louisiana

May 14, 1964

[fol. 2047]

DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 4

[Stamp—U. S. Court of Appeals—Filed Sep 12 1962—Edward W. Wadsworth, Clerk]

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. ....., October Term, 1962

JAMES MEREDITH, Petitioner,

vs.

CHARLES DICKSON FAIR, ET AL.

ORDER

UPON CONSIDERATION of the application of counsel for the movant and of the opposition of the respondents thereto,

IT IS ORDERED that the orders of Circuit Judge Ben F. Cameron of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit of July 18, 1962, July 28, 1962, July 31, 1962, and August 6, 1962, purporting to stay the effectiveness of the mandates of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit be, and the same are hereby, vacated and that the judgment and mandate of said Court shall be effective immediately.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the respondents be, and they are hereby, enjoined from taking any steps to prevent enforcement of the United States Court of Appeal's judgment and mandate pending final action by this Court on the petition for writ of certiorari now on the docket.

/s/ HUGO L. BLACK
Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States

Dated this 10th day of September, 1962.

A true copy JOHN F. DAVIS

Test:

Clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States
Certified this Tenth day of September 1962

By B. F. CULLINAN
Chief Deputy

A true copy

Test: EDWARD W. WADSWORTH

Clerk, U. S. Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit

By (Signature illegible)
Deputy

New Orleans, Louisiana May 14, 1964

[fol. 2048]

DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 5

[Stamp—Southern District of Mississippi—Filed Sep 14 1962—by Loryce E. Wharton, Clerk, by Deputy]

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

FOR THE JACKSON DIVISION OF THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF MISSISSIPPI

JAMES HOWARD MEREDITH, On Behalf Of Himself And Others Similarly Situated

V. No. 3130

CHARLES DICKSON FAIR, President of the Board of Trustees of the State Institutions of Higher Learning, et al.

ORDER GRANTING PERMANENT INJUNCTION

This matter is now before this Court by virtue of the Mandate of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit and the Mandate of Mr. Justice Black of September 10, 1962 setting aside all stays granted by Judge Ben F. Cameron and putting into effect the mandates of the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit enjoining the Trustees and officials of the University of Mississippi from taking any steps to prevent enforcement of the mandates of the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, and this Court having now considered the mandates of the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit of July 17, 1962, July 27, 1962 and its final order of August 4, 1962, and this Court having considered the mandate of July 17, 1962 wherein the Court of Appeals reversed the judgment of the District Court with directions to this Court to issue an injunction as prayed for in the complaint and by its mandate of July 27, 1962 ordered that the judgment of that Court issued as and for the mandate on July 17, 1962, be recalled and amended by making explicit the meaning that was implicit as expressed in its opinion dated June 25, 1962 and ordering that this Court "forthwith grant all relief prayed for by the plaintiff and to issue forthwith a permanent injunction against each and all of the defendants-appellees, their servants, agents, employees, successors and assigns, and all persons acting in concert with them, as well as any and all persons having knowledge of the decree, enjoining [fol. 2049] and compelling each and all of them to admit the plaintiff-appellant, James H. Meredith, to the University of Mississippi under his applications heretofore filed, which are declared by us to be continuing applications. Such injunction shall in terms prevent and prohibit said defendants-appellees, or any of the classes of persons referred to from excluding the plaintiff-appellant from admission to continued attendance at the University of Mississippi."

And by its mandate of August 4, 1962 the Court of Appeals reaffirmed its orders of July 17, 1962 and July 27, 1962 in the following language: "All of our orders of July 17, July 27 and this date, therefore continue in full force and effect and require full and immediate obedience and compliance."

Now, therefore, it is here ordered, adjudged and decreed that the plaintiff, James Howard Meredith, be and he is hereby granted all the relief that is prayed for by him in his complaint and that the defendants, Charles Dickson Fair, President of the Board of Trustees of State Institutions of Higher Learning of the State of Mississippi, Louisville, Mississippi; Euclid Ray Jobe, Executive Secretary of the Board of Trustees of State Institutions of Higher Learning of the State of Mississippi, Jackson, Mississippi; Edgar Ray Izard, Hazlehurst, Mississippi; Leon Lowrey, Olive Branch, Mississippi; Ira Lamar Morgan, Oxford, Mississippi; Malcolm Mette Roberts, Hattiesburg, Mississippi; William Orlando Stone, Jackson, Mississippi; S. R. Evans, Greenwood, Mississippi; Verner Smith Holmes, McComb, Mississippi; James Napoleon Lipscomb, Macon,

Mississippi; Tally D. Riddell, Quitman, Mississippi; Harry Gordon Carpenter, Rolling Fork, Mississippi; Robert Bruce Smith, II, Ripley, Mississippi and Thomas Jefferson Tubb, West Point, Mississippi, Members of the Board of Trustees of State Institutions of Higher Learning; James Davis Williams, Chancellor of the University of Mississippi, Oxford, Mississippi; Arthur Beverly Lewis, Dean of the College of Liberal Arts of the University of Mississippi, [fol. 2050] Oxford, Mississippi, and Robert Byron Ellis, Registrar of the University of Mississippi, Oxford, Mississippi, and each of them, their agents, servants, employees, successors, attorneys and all persons in active concert and participation with them be and they hereby are permanently restrained and enjoined from:

(1) Refusing to admit plaintiff, James Howard Meredith immediately to the University of Mississippi and that they shall each of them be, and they are hereby required to admit him to the University of Mississippi upon the same terms and conditions as applicable to white students;

(2) From interfering in any manner with the right of plaintiff, James Howard Meredith to matriculate in, or attend the University of Mississippi;

(3) From taking any action or doing any act or being guilty of any conduct which will impair, frustrate or defeat his right to enter the University of Mississippi;

(4) Refusing to admit the plaintiff, James Howard Meredith to the University of Mississippi upon his applications heretofore filed, all of which are continuing applications.

It is further ordered that said defendants, or any of the classes of persons referred to, are prohibited and enjoined from excluding the said James Howard Meredith from admission to continued attendance at the University of Mississippi.

It is further ordered that the defendants, their servants, agents, employees, successors and assigns, and all persons acting in concert with them, are enjoined to admit the plaintiff, James Howard Meredith to the University of Mississippi upon his applications heretofore filed and they are enjoined from excluding the said James Howard Meredith from admission to continued attendance at the University of Mississippi or discriminating against him in any way whatsoever because of his race.

[fol. 2051] It is further ordered that a copy of this order and injunction be served by the United States Marshal on each of the defendants herein.

ORDERED, this the 13th day of September, 1962.

/s/ S. C. MIZE
United States District Judge

[Seal]

A true copy, I hereby certify.

Loryce E. Wharton, Clerk, By: E. Mathison, Deputy Clerk.

[fol. 2052]

DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 6

[Stamp—U. S. Court of Appeals—Filed Sep 28 1962—Edward W. Wadsworth, Clerk]

IN THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS

FOR THE FIFTH CIRCUIT

No. 19,475

JAMES H. MEREDITH,

Appellant,

vs.

CHARLES DICKSON FAIR, et al.,

Appellees.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Amicus Curiae and Petitioner,

vs.

STATE OF MISSISSIPPI, et al.,

Defendants.

(Marginal initials illegible)

FINDINGS OF FACT, CONCLUSIONS OF LAW AND JUDGMENT OF CIVIL CONTEMPT.

Before TUTTLE, Chief Judge, and HUTCHESON, RIVES, JONES, BROWN, WISDOM, GEWIN and BELL, Circuit Judges.

This Court having on September 25, 1962 issued orders requiring Ross R. Barnett to appear before this Court today at 10:00 A. M., to show cause, if any he has, why he should not be held in civil contempt of the temporary restraining orders entered in this action on September 25, 1962, and Ross R. Barnett having been given notice of the orders to show cause, and it having been regularly called on the calendar for hearing at 10:00 A. M. this day, and Ross R. Barnett having failed to appear or respond in person or by counsel, and having failed to deny the factual statements contained in the verified application of the United States, and of the appellant and

The Court having heard and received evidence on behalf of the United States and of the appellant, and having de- [fol. 2053] liberated and considered the legal issues involved, now renders its Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law and Judgment as follows:

FINDINGS OF FACT

1. Since this Court entered its order of July 28, 1962, and the District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi entered its order on September 13, 1962, requiring the admission of James H. Meredith to the University of Mississippi, Ross R. Barnett, as Governor of the State of Mississippi, has issued a series of proclamations calling upon all officials of the state to prevent and obstruct the carrying out of the Court's orders with respect to the admission of James H. Meredith to the University. Two of these proclamations were issued by Ross R. Barnett on September 24 and September 25, 1962.

2. On September 25, 1962, this Court entered its temporary restraining orders restraining Ross R. Barnett from interfering with or obstructing in any manner or by any means the enjoyment of rights or the performance of obligations under this Court's order of July 28, 1962 and the order of the District Court of September 13, 1962.

3. At approximately 4:30 P. M. on September 25, 1962, Ross R. Barnett, having full knowledge of the existence and terms of this Court's temporary restraining orders, went to the office of the Board of Trustees of Institutions of Higher Learning in Jackson, Mississippi at a time when James H. Meredith was due to appear at the office and be enrolled as a student in the University of Mississippi, pursuant to the order of this Court. When James H. Meredith arrived at the office and sought to enter for the purpose of enrolling, Ross R. Barnett deliberately prevented him from entering and told him that his application for enrollment was denied by Ross R. Barnett.

4. On September 26, 1962, James H. Meredith sought to enter the campus of the University of Mississippi in Oxford, [fol. 2054] Mississippi. He was prevented from entering by Paul B. Johnson, Jr., Lieutenant Governor of the State of Mississippi, acting pursuant to the instructions and under the authorization of Ross R. Barnett.

5. The conduct of Ross R. Barnett in preventing James H. Meredith from enrolling as a student in the University of Mississippi has been with the deliberate and announced purpose of preventing compliance with the orders of this and other federal courts.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. This Court has jurisdiction of the person of Ross R. Barnett.

2. Ross R. Barnett is in contempt of the temporary restraining orders entered by this Court on September 25, 1962.

[fol. 2055] JUDGMENT OF CIVIL CONTEMPT

Upon the foregoing findings of fact and conclusions of law:

IT IS ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED THAT:

Ross R. Barnett is in civil contempt of the temporary restraining orders of this Court entered September 25, 1962; that such contempt is continuing; and that Ross R. Barnett shall be committed to and remain in the custody of the Attorney General of the United States and shall pay a fine to the United States of $10,000. per day unless on or before

Tuesday, October 2nd, 1962 at 11:00 a.m. he shows to this Court that he is fully complying with the terms of the restraining orders, and that he has notified all law enforcement officers and all other officers under his jurisdiction or command:

(a) To cease forthwith all resistance to and interference with the orders of this Court and the District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi;

(b) To maintain law and order at and around the University and to cooperate with the officers and agents of this Court and of the United States in the execution of the orders of this Court and of the District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi to the end that James H. Meredith be permitted to register and remain as a student at the University of Mississippi under the same conditions as apply to all other students.

Nothing herein shall prevent a later assertion of a charge of criminal contempt against Respondent.

[fol. 2056] Jurisdiction is hereby reserved for such other and further orders as may be appropriate.

Judges Jones, Gewin and Bell dissent from that portion of the judgment imposing a fine upon the Respondent.

[Seal]

A true copy

EDWARD W. WADSWORTH
Clerk, U. S. Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit

/s/ (Signature Illegible)
Deputy

New Orleans, Louisiana

May 14, 1964

[fol. 2057]

DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 7

It is time to move. We have talked, listened, and been pushed around far too much by the Anti-Christ Supreme Court. Rise . . . . . to a stand beside Governor Ross Barnett at Jackson, Mississippi. Now is the time to be heard: Ten thousand strong from every State in the union. Rally to the cause of freedom. The Battle Cry of the Republic. Barnett, Yes! Castro, No! Bring your flag, your tent, and your skillet. It's time. Now or never. The time is when and if the President of the United States commits or uses any troops, Federal or State, in Mississippi.

The last time—in such a situation—I was on the wrong side. That was in Little Rock, Arkansas in 1957 and 1958. This time I am out of uniform and I am on the right side. And I will be there.

[Handwritten notation—Station KWKH—Shreveport, La. —"Party Line"—Wed Sept 26 '62 about 7:30 P. M.—by Ted Walker]

[fol. 2058]

DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 8

I am in Mississippi—beside Governor Ross Barnett.

I call for a national protest against the conspiracy from within.

Rally to the cause of Freedom in righteous indignation, violent vocal protest and bitter silence under the Flag of Mississippi at the use of Federal troops.

This today is a disgrace to the Nation in "Dire Peril" —a disgrace beyond the capacity of anyone except its enemies. This is the conspiracy of the crucifixion by the anti-Christ conspirators of the Supreme Court in their denial of prayer and their betrayal of a nation.

EDWIN A. WALKER

[Handwritten notation—Sat. Sept 29th (about 5:00 P.M.) —from Jackson—from Ney Williams res.]

[fol. 2059]

DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 11

ON TO MISSISSIPPI.

As the forces of the New Frontier assemble to the North let history be witness to the courage and determination that calls us to Oxford to support a courageous Governor. His lawful stand for state sovereignty is supported by thousands of people beyond the state borders now on the way to join you at Oxford.

[Handwritten notation—Sunday—Sept 30 Called back by Ted from Oxford—about 9: A.M.]

[fol. 2060]

DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 12

RADIO INTERVIEW—WNOE

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1962

GENERAL EDWIN WALKER

INTERVIEWER: General Walker, do you still intend to follow through with your plans to go to Mississippi after the government warning today, supposedly that you will be held in contempt?

GENERAL WALKER: I plan to go to Mississippi as I had intended if and when federal troops are used in Mississippi. I do not feel that there is any constitutional law that prevents a citizen moving from state to state or place to place as he sees fit, and there are hundreds of causes moving to Mississippi, or that are reflecting their attitudes in Mississippi, and I am only a small part of this movement, and I intend to be there if and when the decision is made to use federal troops there.

INTERVIEWER: Well, do you personally, sir, believe that that order will be given by Attorney General Robert Kennedy?

GENERAL WALKER: I would hope that they certainly do not use federal troops as it was a catastrophe when they did it before in 1957 and '58 in Little Rock. It was unconstitutional then, as several governors had pointed out, and also many members of the bar, and they should read the [fol. 2061] Constitution more carefully and they would recognize this is unconstitutional. There is no law that requires integration.

INTERVIEWER: Well now, sir, what do you think the repercussions would be if these federal troops are sent to Oxford, and, as a matter of fact, the State of Mississippi?

GENERAL WALKER: I am not sure. It depends on what their mission is and what they are supposed to do and how they carry out that mission, and what the intents are after they get to Mississippi. I would say it certainly is obvious now that the cause of state rights extends far beyond Mississippi, and practically every state of the union is recognizing the importance of the sovereignty of the state, and that is very much involved, greatly involved, in this issue.

INTERVIEWER: Sir, what has been the general reaction to your plans of going to Mississippi with groups of citizens? I'm sure you have heard from quite a few people throughout the United States.

GENERAL WALKER: We are just utterly swamped here with telephone calls and offers of help and assistance and notifications that people are moving to Mississippi and that they want to assist in every way possible; that they are opposed to what the administration is doing in opposing the governor in Mississippi. I can assure you that the telephones shall never stop ringing. Calls are backed up six [fol. 2062] and eight deep. People are telling me it's taking four or five hours to even get into our telephone system, and we have seven phones in the house. Messages are coming in offering support in groups of 10 to 20 to even 2,000.

INTERVIEWER: Well, sir, do you find these telegrams and well wishes from people throughout the United States are predominantly southern, or are they also coming from the north and the west and from the east?

GENERAL WALKER: They are from all parts of the country. Many have come in from Ohio, just a few minutes ago from St. Paul, quite a few from New York, Florida, of course, Los Angeles, and many of the states in between. I have just gotten off the line to Seattle, Washington.

INTERVIEWER: Do you have plans, sir, for rallies, if and when the federal troops are entered into Mississippi, of a certain point in the state where all your followers will then meet with you to protest the integration, if it does come about?

GENERAL WALKER: I intend to join the movement. There are thousands of people, I am sure, already in Mississippi—probably hundreds of thousands there—that are already standing beside their Governor Barnett. The best place to do this would, of course, be at the Capitol or at Oxford, at the university, since that is where the issue is involved, and I am sure that that is where most of the move-[fol. 2063] ments will move to, to show the grass roots movement in this issue.

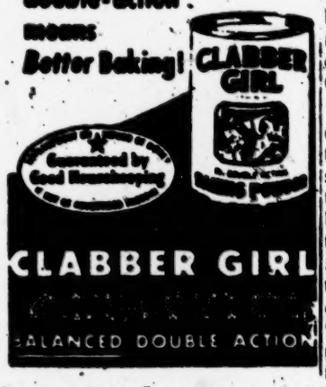
INTERVIEWER: One final question, sir. Just what were your thoughts when acting as an officer of the United States Army when you were commanded to enter Little Rock? What were your thoughts in 1957, seeing these same type of citizens in another state, so opposedly or reportedly opposing federal seizure, or federal acts, against a sovereign state, supposedly?

GENERAL WALKER: At that time I knew it was unconstitutional, and felt that it was at that time, in using troops, and it should never have been done. My principles have not changed, but now, out of uniform, I'm on the other side, and this time on the right side, and that is in opposition to unconstitutional actions by the federal government, and I'm very happy to be free from the requirements of the military service in those cases where the military service has been unconstitutionally used against the citizens of the United States. It would appear to me with all the problems in the international situation, and with an enemy, and a very critical enemy, 90 miles off our coast, it would be as utterly fantastic, as well as impossible, that the administration should now be in a cause and a purpose which is as to the disunity of the United States of America, when the important thing is today that all Americans be unified [fol. 2064] against the one and only important enemy in the world today—the one who has established that he intends to bury us—and by the President's own statement, this country is in dire peril.

You should know THIS about baking...

It's the BALANCE of ingredients in baking powder that governs its leavening action. Only when these are scientifically balanced can you be sure of uniform action in the mixing bowl plus that final, balanced rise to light and fluffy texture in the oven . . . That's the story of Clabber Girl's balanced double action . . . Better Baking everytime!

BALANCED double-action means Better Baking!



Text of General's Speech to Students

Here is the text of the speech made by Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker to the students of Little Rock Central High School yesterday morning:

Young ladies and gentlemen of Central High School. Mr. Blossom, your superintendent of schools, has asked me to come to your school this morning and discuss with you the situation in Little Rock and what it means to you students. I welcome this opportunity to do so.

As you know, the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States guarantees to all citizens the equal protection of the laws. Since the adoption of this amendment, many states have provided separate schools for their children on the basis of color. The laws establishing such schools have, however, been challenged in the courts; and about three years ago, the Supreme Court of the United States determined that such laws are contrary to the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment and consequently invalid. This decision by the highest court in the land is, of course, an authoritative interpretation of our Constitution, is binding on all citizens and government officers, both state and federal, and may not, under our law, be changed except by an amendment to the Constitution.

Because of the Supreme Court's decision, it became necessary for those states maintaining separate schools to revise their systems to eliminate distinctions on the basis of color. The nature of these plans was left to the states and local communities, subject to approval by the local federal district courts. The Little Rock School District prepared such a plan which was approved by both the District Court and Circuit Court of Appeals. This plan provides for a very gradual abandonment of the separate school system starting this year.

Subsequent to the approval of this plan, attempts were made in the courts to prevent the school authorities from putting it into effect.

I need not go into the details of this litigation; sufficient to say, it was unsuccessful, and that the plan as originally approved remains unchanged and in full force and effect.

During the past few weeks, as you are well aware, the situation in Little Rock has been such as to prevent the entrance of a few students into your high school. Therefore, to see that the laws of the land be faithfully executed, the president has found it necessary to call the National Guard of Arkansas into the federal service and has directed that this force and such other armed forces as may be made available be used to enforce the orders of the court. As an officer of the United States Army, I have been chosen to command these forces and to execute the president's orders.

What does all this mean to you students? You have often heard it said, no doubt, that the United States is a nation under law and not under men. This means that we are governed by laws, properly decided upon by duly constituted authority, and not by the decrees of one man or one class of men. Since this is true, it means that we are all subject to all the laws, whether we approve of them personally or not, and as law-abiding citizens, have an obligation in conscience to obey them. There can be no exceptions; if it were otherwise, we would not be a strong nation but a mere unruly mob.

I believe that you are well-intentioned, law-abiding citizens, who understand the necessity of obeying the law, and are determined to do so. You have nothing to fear from my soldiers, and no one will interfere with your coming, going or your peaceful pursuit of your studies. However, I would be less than honest if I failed to tell you that I intend to use all means necessary to prevent any interference with the execution of your School Board's plan. This is what I have been ordered to do, and I intend to carry out my orders. Those who interfere or disrupt the proper administration of the school will be removed by the soldiers on duty and turned over to the local police for disposition in accordance with the laws of your community.

One last word about my soldiers. They are here because they have been ordered to be here. They are seasoned, well-trained soldiers, many of them combat veterans. Being soldiers, they are as determined as I to carry out their orders. However, as I stated before, the law-abiding people have nothing to fear from them. They have been carefully instructed not to molest any law-abiding citizen in his person or property, and they will obey these orders. Since a peaceful atmosphere must be maintained in the school and its vicinity, it may be necessary for them to issue instructions concerning such things as loitering, assembling in large groups, and otherwise making it difficult for them to perform their duties. I earnestly ask that you co-operate, for your own benefit and ours.

I wish you all success in your school year and Mr. Matthews [the principal], I thank you for the opportunity to talk to the student body.

Irish Ambassador's Son Shot By Friend

Washington, Sept. 25 (AP). — The son of Irish Ambassador John J. Hearne was shot and killed today. Police said a pistol in the hands of a friend discharged accidentally.

The victim, John Justin Hearne, 20, died with a bullet in his chest.

Police Capt. Albert Embrey said the pistol was fired by John E. Kieffer Jr., 22, in an office building where Kieffer's father operates the Universal Research and Consultants, Inc., a public relations firm.

Police quoted young Kieffer as saying the shooting occurred when he started to take the pistol from a drawer. Kieffer added, police said, that young Hearne also reached for the weapon and might have touched the trigger.

7 Brazilians Killed In Rent Battle

Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, Sept. 25 (AP).—A battle over rents between squatters at Santo Antonio and a colonization company killed at least seven persons and sent many Brazilian villagers across the border to Argentina for refuge, reports reaching here said today.

Santo Antonio is in the southern tip of Brazil.

Lights Out!

New York, Sept. 25 (AP).—An all-night beacon near the top of the Empire State Building will be kept turned off until November 1 so as not to interfere with the southern migration of birds. Many birds, thrown off course by the light, have crashed into the building or the ground.

Satchmo Changes His Mind

Davenport, Ia., (UP).—Louis ("Satchmo") Armstrong greeted the news of President Eisenhower's action in the Little Rock situation by proclaiming today "this is the greatest country." He indicated he may change his mind about abandoning a government-sponsored tour of Russia.

"Things are looking a lot better than they did before," the Negro jazz trumpeter told newsmen today.

He said "it was just wonderful" the way President Eisenhower explained his action in sending troops to Little Rock.

"The president said the troops are going down there and that's all right with me, it won't start any trouble," Armstrong said.

Armstrong last week accused Eisenhower of having "no guts" in dealing with the Little Rock situation and announced he would turn down a State Department invitation to tour Russia. He changed his tune today.

He said he had sent the president a telegram saying, "if you decide to walk into the schools with the colored kids, take me along daddy. God Bless you."

Biggest Truck

Lyon, France, Sept. 25 (AP).—The firm of Berliet will unveil what it calls the world's biggest and strongest truck at the Paris auto show opening October 3. Made for Sahara desert work, it carries 100 tons of freight, has a 600-horsepower engine weighing 5,520 pounds, carries 400 gallons of fuel, and has wheels 7 feet 3 inches in diameter. The main Sahara interest now is oil.

[fol. 2066]

DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 15

GENERAL SERVICES ADMINISTRATION

NATIONAL ARCHIVES AND RECORDS SERVICE

THE NATIONAL ARCHIVES

(Seal)

ALL TO WHOM THESE PRESENTS SHALL COME, GREETING:

I CERTIFY That the annexed copy, or each of the specified number of annexed copies, of each document listed below is a true copy of a document in the official custody of the Archivist of the United States.

Proclamation No. 3497

Obstructions of justice in the State of Mississippi

IN TESTIMONY WHEREOF, I, WAYNE C. GROVER, Archivist of the United States, have hereunto caused the Seal of the National Archives to be affixed and my name subscribed by the Director, Office of the Federal Register of the National Archives, in the District of Columbia, this 20th day of March, 1964.

/s/ WAYNE C. GROVER
Archivist of the United States

By /s/ DAVID C. EBERHART

[fol. 2067]

OBSTRUCTIONS OF JUSTICE IN THE STATE OF MISSISSIPPI

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

A PROCLAMATION

WHEREAS the Governor of the State of Mississippi and certain law enforcement officers and other officials of that State, and other persons, individually and in unlawful assemblies, combinations and conspiracies, have been and are willfully opposing and obstructing the enforcement of orders entered by the United States District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi and the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit; and

WHEREAS such unlawful assemblies, combinations and conspiracies oppose and obstruct the execution of the laws of the United States, impede the course of justice under those laws and make it impracticable to enforce those laws in the State of Mississippi by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings; and

WHEREAS I have expressly called the attention of the Governor of Mississippi to the perilous situation that exists and to his duties in the premises, and have requested but have not received from him adequate assurances that the orders of the courts of the United States will be obeyed and that law and order will be maintained:

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JOHN F. KENNEDY, President of the United States, under and by virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and laws of the [fol. 2068] United States, including Chapter 15 of Title 10 of the United States Code, particularly sections 332, 333 and 334 thereof, do command all persons engaged in such obstructions of justice to cease and desist therefrom and to disperse and retire peaceably forthwith.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the Seal of the United States of America to be affixed.

DONE at the City of Washington this 30th day of September in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and sixty-two, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and eighty-seventh.

By the President:

/s/ JOHN F. KENNEDY

/s/ GEORGE W. BALL
Acting Secretary of State

[Stamp—The National Archives and Records Service—Filed and Made Available for Public Inspection—Sep 30 10:50 AM '62—In the Office of the Federal Register]

[fol. 2069]

DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 16

GENERAL SERVICES ADMINISTRATION

NATIONAL ARCHIVES AND RECORDS SERVICE

THE NATIONAL ARCHIVES

(Seal)

ALL TO WHOM THESE PRESENTS SHALL COME, GREETING:

I CERTIFY That the annexed copy, or each of the specified number of annexed copies, of each document listed below is a true copy of a document in the official custody of the Archivist of the United States.

Executive Order 11053

Providing assistance for the removal of unlawful obstructions of justice in the State of Mississippi

IN TESTIMONY WHEREOF, I, WAYNE C. GROVER, Archivist of the United States, have hereunto caused the Seal of the National Archives to be affixed and my name subscribed by the Director, Office of the Federal Register of the National Archives, in the District of Columbia, this 20th day of March, 1964.

/s/ WAYNE C. GROVER
Archivist of the United States

By /s/ DAVID C. EBERHART

[fol. 2070]

EXECUTIVE ORDER

PROVIDING ASSISTANCE FOR THE REMOVAL OF UNLAWFUL OBSTRUCTIONS OF JUSTICE IN THE STATE OF MISSISSIPPI

WHEREAS on September 30, 1962, I issued Proclamation No. 3497 reading in part as follows:

"WHEREAS the Governor of the State of Mississippi and certain law enforcement officers and other officials of that State, and other persons, individually and in unlawful assemblies, combinations and conspiracies, have been and are willfully opposing and obstructing the enforcement of orders entered by the United States District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi and the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit; and

"WHEREAS such unlawful assemblies, combinations and conspiracies oppose and obstruct the execution of the laws of the United States, impede the course of justice under those laws and make it impracticable to enforce those laws in the State of Mississippi by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings; and

"WHEREAS I have expressly called the attention of the Governor of Mississippi to the perilous situation that exists and to his duties in the premises, and have requested but have not received from him adequate assurances that the orders of the courts of the United States will be obeyed and that law and order will be maintained:

[fol. 2071] "NOW, THEREFORE, I, JOHN F. KENNEDY, President of the United States, under and by virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and laws of the United States, including Chapter 15 of Title 10 of the United States Code, particularly sections 332, 333 and 334 thereof, do command all persons engaged in such obstructions of justice to cease and desist therefrom and to disperse and retire peaceably forthwith;" and

WHEREAS the commands contained in that proclamation have not been obeyed and obstruction of enforcement of those court orders still exists and threatens to continue:

NOW, THEREFORE, by virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and laws of the United States, including Chapter 15 of Title 10, particularly Sections 332, 333 and 334 thereof, and Section 301 of Title 3 of the United States Code, it is hereby ordered as follows:

Section 1. The Secretary of Defense is authorized and directed to take all appropriate steps to enforce all orders of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi and the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit and to remove all obstructions of justice in the State of Mississippi.

Section 2. In furtherance of the enforcement of the aforementioned orders of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi and the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, the Secre- [fol. 2072] tary of Defense is authorized to use such of the armed forces of the United States as he may deem necessary.

Section 3. I hereby authorize the Secretary of Defense to call into the active military service of the United States, as he may deem appropriate to carry out the purposes of this order, any or all of the units of the Army National Guard and of the Air National Guard of the State of Mississippi to serve in the active military service of the United States for an indefinite period and until relieved by appropriate orders. In carrying out the provisions of Section 1, the Secretary of Defense is authorized to use the units, and members thereof, ordered into the active military service of the United States pursuant to this section.

Section 4. The Secretary of Defense is authorized to delegate to the Secretary of the Army or the Secretary of the Air Force, or both, any of the authority conferred upon him by this order.

/s/ JOHN F. KENNEDY

THE WHITE HOUSE

September 30, 1962

[Stamp—The National Archives and Records Service—Filed and Made Available for Public Inspection—Sep 30 11:30 AM '62—In the Office of the Federal Register]

Walker Mentally Able To Stand Trial, Judge Says

EVE NOV 22 1962

OXFORD, Miss., Nov. 22 (AP)—Edwin A. Walker, the controversial former Army major general, has been ruled mentally competent to stand trial on charges of seditious conspiracy and inciting an insurrection.

U. S. District Judge Claude F. Clayton, who is an Army National Guard brigadier general, handed down the ruling Wednesday at the end of a two-day hearing to determine whether there was reasonable cause for a mental examination of the 53-year-old Walker.

The lean Texan was arrested here Oct. 1 after the desegregation rioting at the University of Mississippi which killed two persons.

Shortly before Clayton ruled in the Walker case, he ordered Chief U. S. Marshal James McShane released from the Lafayette County jail. McShane had surrendered to Sheriff Joe Ford on state charges of inciting a riot and breach of peace during the rioting.

McShane and one other person—who has not yet been identified—were indicted last week by the county grand jury after it probed the rioting which followed the arrival of Negro James H. Meredith on the university campus.

The judge set no date for Walker's trial. He accepted a mental test given Walker earlier this month at Dallas.

The judge said the examination made by Dr. Robert L. Stubblefield, professor at Southwestern Medical School in Dallas, "was essentially negative. No opinion was expressed. It did not say whether he was sane or insane."

Clayton added that from his observation of Walker's behavior while testifying Wednesday he "found that this man is competent" to aid in his defense of such criminal charges as may be presented.

Stubblefield's report said Walker is "functioning currently at the superior level of intelligence."

The report said, "on the Wechsler adult intelligence scale, his reasoning, judgment, vocabulary, fund of information and organizational ability were all above average for his age group."

Judge Clayton overruled defense objections that his earlier order for a mental test be erased from the court record. Although the judge held that Walker was mentally competent to stand trial, the primary purpose of the hearing was the defense motion to strike the sanity test order.

Clyde J. Watts of Oklahoma City, one of Walker's four attorneys, said Clayton's decision in placing the mental test in the case record would be appealed. Walker said afterward he felt he had been subjected to a great injustice.

Clayton, recently chosen to command the 31st (Dixie) Division of Mississippi and Alabama national guardsmen, expressed the greatest respect for Walker's military career.

Walker was questioned by his attorneys during the hearing and gave details of his arrest by federal troops. Neither he nor his attorneys mentioned his actions the night of the rioting.

Walker also discussed his controversial reprimand and loss of command of the 24th Division over a troop indoctrination program in Germany. He later resigned his Army commission.

Clayton said he would hold a hearing for McShane late in January. The Justice Department claimed McShane was "doing duties as a federal official" on the university campus.

After the release on a writ of habeas corpus of the husky, former New York policeman, County District Attorney Jesse Yancy Jr., said, "the case now rests in the hands of the federal court . . . However, the state contends McShane made unlawful acts and should be prosecuted in state court."

McShane was in charge of a team of some 300 federal marshals accompanying Meredith onto the campus.

In other developments:

The Mississippi Senate approved a resolution which blamed rioting at the university on the "ruthless and corrupted administration in Washington headed by the Kennedy klan."

[fol. 2073]

DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 17

1485

U. S. Orders Mental Tests For Walker

MORN OCT 3 1962

DEY 18

Former General's Attorneys Plan to Fight Court's Decision

SPRINGFIELD, Mo., Oct. 2 (AP)—Former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, a key figure in week-end battling over admission of a Negro to the University of Mississippi was ordered placed under psychiatric examination in a federal prison Tuesday.

His attorneys announced immediately they would fight the order Wednesday in U. S. District Court here. They instructed Walker to refuse to co-operate with prison physicians.

Walker was locked in the U. S. Medical Center here. He was brought from Oxford, Miss., in a U. S. Border Patrol plane Monday night after his arrest and arraignment on charges of inciting insurrection and seditious conspiracy.

U. S. District Attorney F. Russell Millin of Kansas City told reporters the psychiatric examination order was issued in Oxford Tuesday afternoon by U. S. District Judge Claude Clayton. Millin said it prevents Walker from obtaining his release under a $100,000 bond set Monday at his arraignment.

Millin said he understood the psychiatric examination would take 60 to 90 days and that during that period Walker would not be bailable.

However, in Washington, Rep. Bruce Alger, Texas Republican, said Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy had

Turn to Walker on Page 8

WALKER

Continued From Page 1

assured him Walker would be released on bail as any other citizen has the right to be. Kennedy was quoted as saying no examination of the ex-general could be made without a court hearing.

Alger told reporters he had telephoned the attorney general in view of his deep concern that Walker "has been sent to a mental hospital before having a court hearing."

Saying he admired Walker's "anti-Communist work," Alger said he was concerned for his rights as he would be for any of his other Texas constituents.

Clyde J. Watts, spokesman for Walker's corps of attorneys, said they would ask U. S. District Judge John W. Oliver, holding court here, for either a writ of habeas corpus freeing Walker or for an injunction against any surgical or medicinal treatment of the former general without the presence of a psychiatrist or physician approved by Walker's counsel.

Watts said he and two Springfield attorneys, George Donagan and William Wear, talked to Walker in the medical center Tuesday morning and found him "clear, lucid, undisturbed and possessing all his mental faculties."

Watts said they told Walker "that his response to questions asked by physicians or psychiatrists at the medical center should be only his name, rank and serial number—the same as an American soldier who has been captured."

Watts, reading from a four-page statement, told reporters he had talked to Judge Clayton at Oxford by telephone and was informed the order committing Walker for psychiatric examination was issued on the basis of testimony by Dr. Charles E. Smith, a Bureau of Prisons psychiatrist. Watts quoted Judge Clayton as saying Dr. Smith had not seen Walker.

Watts said he had known Walker since boyhood and "I can assure the public of the United States he is completely sound mentally and physically."

Walker Version

Watts said that during their talk with Walker Tuesday morning, Walker gave them his version of what happened at Oxford.

"He at no time led any assault, charge or overt act against any state or federal officer, including U. S. marshals," Watts said. "He at no time incited anyone to riot or disorder."

Walker told his lawyers, Watts said, that he contacted the sheriff in Oxford Saturday and Sunday and advised him he was "there to observe developments."

1487

Walker said he was eating dinner S[illegible]night during President [illegible]y's television speech to the nation when reporters advised him of a demonstration at the Ole Miss campus. He said he went there and found a "scene of considerable disturbance." He said he was standing near a Confederate monument about 300 yards from the administration building when several persons asked him to make a statement.

"General Walker made a statement that participants should avoid all seemblance of violence—that the real war was in Cuba, not Mississippi," Watts said.

'No Missile'

The general told the lawyers his remarks lasted about five minutes, and that as he watched the students going toward the U. S. marshals and then moving back, he was no closer than 30 feet to the officers.

Watts said Walker had "no missile, weapons or rocks" and that "he counseled the participants to avoid violence.

Watts said he learned that Walker was transferred from Oxford to the Springfield Medical Center on telegraphed orders from James V. Bennett, director of the Bureau of Prisons.

The lawyer said the statement he read to reporters had been concurred in by another Walker attorney, Robert Morris of Dallas, former counsel for the House un-American activities committee. Morris was in Cleveland, Ohio, Tuesday but was expected to arrive in Springfield Tuesday night or Wednesday.

Watts said Walker is willing to submit to an examination by any court-approved psychiatrist to determine whether he is mentally competent to consult with his counsel.

The $100,000 bail set for Walker was offered on the basis of Oklahoma sureties which were not otherwise identified. Mrs. George Walker of Center Point, Texas, wife of the general's rancher brother, told reporters in Houston that it had been raised from two sources — the family and others whom she did not identify.

[illegible]PY

[illegible]LEGRAM

[illegible]AR, NUMBER 245

[illegible]ss for C

[fol. 2075]

1488

DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 19

COURT REVERSAL ASKED

MORN dateline p[illegible] Page 1

Walker's attorneys said the U. S. attorney could call for a mental test only when he "can show reasonable ground for belief that a defendant may be presently insane or so mentally incompetent that he can not understand the proceedings against him or properly assist in his own defense."

In addition, Walker's attorneys also asked the court to strike from the record a telegram from James V. Bennett, director of federal prisons, to U. S. Atty. H. H. Ray at Oxford. The telegram concerned a memorandum from Charles E. Smith, chief psychiatrist of the federal prison bureau.

They charged the telegram "and all purported and assumed factual claims contained therein are redundant, immaterial, impertinent, scurrilous and scandalous, do great damage and prejudice to the defendant, maligns his mental capacity and violates every ethical and responsible standard of conduct."

They said Smith's memorandum "purportedly states or infers that Smith had read or heard some unidentified news reports and other unidentified information and based solely on this, believed that defendant Walker's conduct is unpredictable and Walker is suffering from paranoia, psychosomatic disorders and other underlying disorders."

The motion was filed with the court here late Tuesday. There was no indication when any action might be taken on it.

In Dallas Tuesday, Dr. R. L. Stubblefield, the psychiatrist designated to examine Walker, said he would ask two other psychiatrists to help him determine how to go about it.

Dr. Stubblefield of the University of Texas' Southwestern Medical School was named as one psychiatrist. The government named Dr. Winfred Overholser of Washington as the other.

Dr. Overholser's name was withdrawn after protests by Walker's lawyers, who said Dr. Overholser has a history of tending to seek commitments.

He said he will consult Thursday with Dr. Andrew Watson, professor of psychiatry of the University of Michigan, and Dr. Titus Harris, retiring professor of psychiatry at the University of Texas.

Court Asked To Reverse Walker Order

MORN OCT 17 1962

OXFORD, Miss., Oct. 16 (AP)—Attorneys for former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker asked a federal court Tuesday to reverse its order that he undergo a psychiatric examination.

U. S. District Judge Claude Clayton had directed that Walker, facing four federal charges including insurrection for his role in desegregation riots here Sept. 30, be examined to see if he is mentally competent to stand trial.

In a motion filed here Tuesday, Walker's attorneys charged that the court's order "violates the constitutional rights" of Walker in four ways.

It listed these as:

1. "The right to make bail and be released thereon.

2. "The right to be represented by counsel at every stage of the proceedings against him."

3. "The right to notice of proceedings against him, which is a necessary element of due process of law.

4. "The right to be present in person at the hearing wherein defendant's mental sanity and mental competency is questioned."

Walker, arrested here Oct. 1 and sent to the Springfield, Mo., federal medical center, was freed six days later on $50,000 bond with the stipulation that he undergo the psychiatric examination.

A section of the motion by

Turn to Court Reversal on Page 2

DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 29

Walker Charges, Then Falls Back

Outsiders Take Part In Campus Rioting

By TOM GREGORY
Star Staff Writer

OXFORD, Miss. — Into the mob walked Edwin C. Walker, former major general of the United States Army.

Around him swirled a whirlpool of humanity and human emotion. Two hundred yards away, a line of gas-masked, club and tear gas-armed federal marshals had turned the ancient Lyceum building into a federal fort.

"Now we have a leader," screamed somebody. "Rally to General Walker!"

Walker, wearing a Texas hat and a dark blue suit, walked toward the Lyceum, with perhaps 200 men following him.

"Tear gas won't stop him," another person yelled. "Follow General Walker."

About 50 yards from the federal line, tear gas bombs began falling around the group.

General Edwin Walker (retired), who wouldn't retreat, did.

One of Many

The former Army officer was just one of the number of outsiders — how many will probably never be known—who egged and aided a hard core of Ole Miss students into a rock flinging, destructive riot that left two dead, 75 to 100 injured, at least 31 arrested and seriously damaged the reputation of a university.

I walked through that howling, passionately unthinking mob for more than four hours during the violence here last night. I saw the rock throwers and the agitators.

(Turn to Page 2, Column 1)

Walker Charges, Then Falls Back

(Continued From Page One)

I stood under a Confederate flag hoisted on the flag pole before the stately Lyceum and watched students and outsiders rush the marshals' line, retreat before tear gas, regroup and charge again—all without any attempt at control.

Most of the rioters were students—although the number of Ole Miss men steadily decreased through the night. The number of outsiders — non-students—steadily increased.

Denim-trousered adults and teenagers from nearby towns furnished the impetus that kept the college boys at their job of injury and destruction.

One Reference to Meredith

"Do you think they'll leave that nigger here now?" a young student asked nobody in particular shortly after the riot began. In each hand he held a brick.

That was the only direct reference to Negro James Meredith I heard after the rioting began.

Earlier the crowd had attacked at least two newsmen and destroyed a number of cameras and tape recorders, but during the height of the riot, they practically ignored writers taking notes. No cameramen dared take a picture once the situation got out of control.

I wore no identification and was dressed in a short-sleeved white shirt and tie. I was never questioned. Late in the evening, there were so many non-students that nobody questioned anybody who did not have a camera or recorder.

Only a few of the students—I would estimate 200—actually participated in the violence and destruction.

There were incidents of violence almost as soon as the newsmen started arriving on the campus about 7 p.m. But then, almost without warning, the marshals began firing tear gas into the crowd. After that it was a mob scene.

Walker Enters Scene

About an hour [illegible] rioting started General Walker entered the scene.

After his abortive attempt to reach the marshals' line, he confined his activity to speech-making and watching. A crowd gathered around him at the edge of the grove and he finally said, "All right, I'll speak to them."

Just prior to that, an Episcopal priest, Rev. Duncan Gray, Jr., had tried to talk him into leaving and taking the crowd with him.

"They'll follow you," Gray said.

But Walker stood at the foot of the old Confederate monument, and began speaking.

He told the crowd there had been a "sellout." He said a representative of the governor's office had told him that Gov. Ross Barnett's orders were not to let the marshals on the campus.

After an impromptu whispered conference with a blue-coated follower, Walker said, that a member of the Highway Patrol had been responsible for the sellout.

Again there was a conference and Walker said:

"The name is Birdsong."

Col. T. B. Birdsong is the head of the Highway Patrol and was in the car that led the first group of marshals to the campus during the afternoon.

Then, referring to the Episcopal priest who had asked him to leave:

"I am ashamed that I am an Episcopalian."

At this point Rev. Gray appeared in front of the crowd and was forceably taken from the area by men who feared that he would be injured.

Later a group of students attempted to arrange a truce, but were unable to make the deal (it was: no rocks, no tear gas) because of shouts from the crowd that had inched toward the building. Among the truce-triers were members of the Ole Miss football squad.

One of the shouters was a fat, middle aged man who quite obviously was not a student.

"No truce! No truce!" he shouted.

There was no truce. After a while the troops arrived.

[fol. 2080]

DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 30A

UPI A167 AJ

URGENT

5TH LEAD MEREDITH (A153)

BY AL KUETTNER

UNITED PRESS INTERNATIONAL

Oxford, Miss., Oct. 1 (UPI)—Negro James Meredith registered today at the University of Mississippi and began attending classes on a campus littered with the debris of a major riot that took two lives and injured at least 75 persons.

"It is not a happy occasion," he said.

About 400 U. S. Deputy Marshals and 1,000 Federal troops guarded the campus as the 29-year-old Negro cracked the segregation barriers of the 114-year-old school.

[Handwritten notation—Insert A26N]

The campus was brought under military control early today but the rioting spread to downtown Oxford and at least one soldier was hurt in a barrage of rocks, timbers and pop bottles before the crowd was dispersed with tear gas and reinforcements were brought in.

(MORE)—BU1110A10/1

UPI A168 AJ

1st add 5th lead Meredith (A167) Oxford X X X brought in.

Meredith, whose determination to desegregate "Ole Miss" brought about a conflict that threatened to rock the Federal Union, walked solemnly to an American Colonial History class at 9 A.M. CST to shouts of "Nigger, nigger" and "Was it worth two deaths?"

He was accompanied to the classes by three Deputy Marshals and U. S. Department of Justice representative Ed Guthman.

The Negro was met at the Registrar's Office byy University Registrar Robert B. Ellis who handed him a stack of forms. The historic occasion was concluded quietly.

Meredith, who caught a whiff of the tear gas that clouded the campus early today, rubbed his eyes occasionally.

(MORE)—BU1113A10/1. .

[fol. 2081]

DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 30B

UPI A26N AJ

Insert 5th lead Meredith (A167) Oxford after 3rd PGH XXX 114-year-old school.

The Justice Department announced today that Maj. Gen. Edwin Walker, resigned Army General who has become a vocal advocate of right-wing causes, has been arrested at a roadblock in Oxford and charged with a number of offenses, including inciting rebellion. Walker was seen during the riots egging the students on.

(PICKUP 4TH PGH: THE CAMPUS)

CB139PES. .

[fol. 2082]

DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 31

UPI A66

1st add Meredith. Oxvord (A65 XX More Violence.

Barnett ordered the State High Patrol yesterday not to attempt to stop the Federal Marshals. Both he and Kennedy advised the students not to resort to violence.

But that was not to be.

Shortly before 10 P.M. EDT, the word flashed around the campus that Meredith was there. And, even as Kennedy spoke, the riot began. A group of students threw lighted cigarets on the canvas top of a truck carrying U. S.

Marshals. The canvas caught fire and the Marshals, in steel helmets painted white and wearing orange vests with tear gas grenades, jumped out.

Then they fired the first barrage of tear gas at the students.

The murky white fumes rose and all but obscured the first floor of the main administration building. Students, screaming and yelling, bolted away to get out of the stinging gas. Some, tears streaming, went into a YMCA building and stood on chairs to listen to Kennedy on TV. Afterwards, many of them went back out and re-joined the violence.

Men were armed with brick bats, clubs and "Molotov cocktails"—beer and soft drink bottles filled with gasoline. One man struck a Federal Marshal in the leg with a two-foot iron pipe.

The Marshals loosed barrages of tear gas. The Mississippi State Highway Patrol, surrounding but not entering the campus, made no move. It had been ordered by Barnett not to hinder the Marshals but neither—apparently—did it have orders to help.

The riot grew even worse after Guihard and Gunter were killed. One group started an automobile full speed at a group of Marshals and jumped out. The car hit a tree.

Newsmen were beaten. Cameras were destroyed. Radio station sound trucks had their insides ripped out. Other cars were set afire.

One youth fired a fire extinguisher into the face of one of the drivers of the trucks used to bring in the Marshals. A State Highway Patrolman was struck in the face by a tear gas cartridge. A U. S. Marshal was shot in the neck.

Students were waving the Confederate flag during a lull in the rioting. Edwin A. Walker, former Army Major General who commanded troops at Little Rock, mounted a Confederate statue and advised the students to cease their violence.

"This is not the proper route to Cuba," Walker, who was [fol. 2083] wearing a big Texas hat, said.

The crowd jeered.

Later, Walker mounted the statue again and said:

"I want to compliment you all on the protest you make here tonight. You have a right to protest under the Constitution."

The battle swayed back and forth across the Ole Miss campus. The Federal Marshals appeared to hold the upper end of the campus around the Lyceum (Administration Building) and the demonstrators seemed to be in command of the lower end toward the entrance and surrounding the Confederate statue.

Lights were smashed, leaving the campus almost in total darkness.

The rioting had been going on for almost three hours when army troops put in their appearance at midnight. They were members of the Federalized Mississippi National Guard. They rolled into the campus in jeeps. There were about 200 of them.

One group of rioters had control of a fire engine and held back the Marshals with a steady stream of water which also tended to keep back the burning smoke of the tear gas.

It appeared at 3 A.M. EDT that the riot had been brought under control.

But then gunfire could be heard in the night. It was discovered a sniper with an automatic rifle had the Marshals pinned down and was taking potshots at the cars and men in front of the Lyceum.

The sniper also had National Guardsmen scurrying for cover. He fired repeatedly and the men took refuge behind trees and buildings.

The rioters barricaded University Avenue directly in front of the monument of the Confederate soldier. The barricande was about three feet high and three or four feet wide, built of lumber taken from a nearby construction project.

The Marshals were eagerly awaiting the arrival of the additional army forces. One regular unit, the 2nd battle group, 23rd Infantry, comprising about 1,100-men in 175-200 vehicles was rolling to Oxford from Fort Benning, Ga.

Two MP outfits were flown in by helicopter from a base at Memphis and additional units of the Mississippi National Guard were summoned.

MORE WN525AED

[fol. 2085]

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF TARRANT COUNTY, TEXAS

17TH JUDICIAL DISTRICT

No. 31,741-C

EDWIN A. WALKER

vs.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Transcript of Hearing on Motion for New Trial—September 18, 1964

Be It Remembered that upon the hearing of the defendant on Motion for New Trial, before His Honor Charles J. Murray, Judge of said court, on the 18th day of September, A. D. 1964, the following proceedings were had and evidence adduced:

APPEARANCES:

Mr. Clyde A. Watts, 219 Couch Building, Oklahoma City, Oklahoma.

Mr. Toy Crocker, Continental Life Building, Fort Worth, Texas.

Mr. William Andress, Jr., 627 Fidelity Union Life Bldg., Dallas, Texas.

Attorneys for Plaintiff.

Mr. Sloan B. Blair, Mr. Daniel Settle, Mr. J. A. Gooch, First National Bank Building, Fort Worth, Texas.

Attorneys for Defendant.

[fol. 2086] Mr. Andress: If the Court please, we have filed some exceptions to that amended motion for new trial insofar as the calling of jurors is concerned.

The Court: All right. Do you want to be heard on it?

Mr. Andress: Yes, sir, we would like to be heard because we don't believe they have set forth in their motion with sufficient certainty and definiteness the basis for calling the jurors in here and bringing them back in that the motion that they have filed here does not set forth the names of any of the jurors who are supposed to have made the statements nor do they allege sufficiently that any such statements would have prejudiced their rights so as to be prejudicial jury misconduct under the rules. Now those are the holdings of such cases as Federal Underwriter's Exchange vs Skinner and Roy Jones Lumber Company vs Murphy, and Thompson vs The Railway Express Agency, and Smith vs Houston Transit Company, so we don't feel that they have set forth with sufficient certainty and definiteness what it is they propose to prove.

The Court: I am going to overrule you, counsel. I have already spent a substantial amount of time looking into this case, and if any of you haven't read it yet there is a very good law review by Associate Justice Jack Pope in [2087] 40 Texas Law Review 849 in which he reviews the problems involved in jury misconduct.

Now before we start I am going to tell you first of all what I am not going to hear as far as any of the jurors are concerned. As I understand Texas law we can only go into overt acts of the jurors and not their mental processes, so therefore a juror will not be permitted to testify that he was not influenced by any statement; he will not be permitted to testify that he was influenced by any statement. The Courts have held that goes into mental process. Moreover, a juror will not be permitted to say that he felt, he believed, he meant, he aimed, he desired, he was convinced, he was not convinced, nor may he give his impressions of any sort. I will only go into what was said, at what point it was said, and what, if anything, the jurors as a whole did after that point.

Mr. Gooch: We concede that those are the rules.
The Court: All right.

MR. M. L. MERIWEATHER, called as a witness by the defendant, being first duly sworn to testify the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Gooch:

[fol. 2088] Q. Please state your name.
A. M. L. Meriweather.
Q. Where do you live, Mr. Meriweather?
A. 300 Emma street, Forth Worth, Texas.
Q. Were you a juror in the case of General Edwin A. Walker versus the Associated Press that was tried in June of 1964 in this court-room?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you participate as a juror in the hearing of the evidence and the deliberations after the evidence was closed?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. I will ask you if during the deliberations and prior to the time that a verdict was reached in this case that there were any statements made by any jurors, while all the jurors were together and prior to the time the verdict was reached, as to whether or not prejudice was indicated against the news media in general.

Mr. Andress: Now wait just a minute. That is calling for a conclusion.
The Court: Sustained.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Were you acquainted with a man by the name of Waverly Johnson who was foreman of the jury?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. A man by the name of Trotter who was a juror in the case?

[fol. 2089] A. Yes, sir.

Q. Would you tell the Court what, if anything, was said by those gentlemen relative to the news media in general?

A. Well one of them made the statement that the Associated Press was always hurting someone and something on that order, printing false statements.

Q. Was there anything said about news media in general?

A. There was a statement made by one of them, I don't recall which one,—Now this is about the Press itself?

Q. That's right. About news media is the question I asked.

Mr. Andress: If the Court please, we don't believe news media would be pertinent. We think it is what was said about Associated Press.

The Court: Overruled.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. You have executed an affidavit in this case have you not, Mr. Meriweather?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Andress: If the Court please, the affidavits are not admissible, not even for refreshing his memory, and we are going to object to his re-reading his affidavit at the present moment.

The Court: Overruled.

A. You are referring to this one here?

The Court: Mr. Meriweather, if you say anything at all [fol. 2090] to Mr. Gooch you have to say it loud enough for the court reporter and counsel to hear it.

Mr. Gooch: That's right.

The Court: Now all he has done so far is just hand you the affidavit. He hasn't asked you any further question.

A. Well, now, of course.

The Court: He hasn't asked you a question.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Have you re-read your affidavit that you gave in this case?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were the matters set forth in that affidavit true and correct to the best of your knowledge and belief at the time you executed it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now in that affidavit you state "One juror stated that news services were always publishing false and malicious reports".

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was that statement made in the jury-room when all jurors were present prior to the time a verdict was reached?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was there anything said in the jury-room and prior to the time the verdict was reached, when all jurors were present about money?

[fol. 2091] A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was that?

A. One of the jurors stated that he should be awarded the full amount because the Associated Press had plenty of money.

Q. Do you remember what juror said that?

A. I don't recall his name, but he was the same fellow that works out there with me, a tall slim fellow.

Q. Was his name Trotter?

A. I believe it was, sir.

Q. Was anything said to this effect, that the Associated Press had plenty of money and would never miss it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was that prior to the time the verdict was reached?

A. It was before, yes, sir.

Q. Was there anything said about a Georgia Football coach having received a substantial award and damages for libel?

A. Yes, sir. They made a statement that one of the coaches received the full amount on a libel suit.

Q. Was that statement made before the verdict was reached?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you recall any statement made by a man by the name of Johnson, who was the foreman, as to his antagonism or non-antagonism toward the Associated Press?

Mr. Andress: That is a conclusion, Your Honor.

The Court: It would be, Mr. Gooch.

[fol. 2092] Q. State what, if anything, Mr. Johnson said about the Associated Press, if you recall.

A. Well, he didn't say a whole lot, he just kind of left the impression that he was—

The Court: Wait just a minute. I will strike that.

Mr. Gooch: All you can do is say what he said. If you recall.

A. Well I don't recall his exact words, Mr. Gooch.

Q. Can you give the substance of what he said?

A. Well it was something on the order that the Press was always—hurt people and printing false statements. Something on that order.

Mr. Gooch: That's all.

Cross examination.

By Mr. Andress:

Q. Mr. Meriweather, when did the jury go out and start its deliberations? What time of day?

A. Well I don't recall. Whenever the trial was over.

Q. Was it in the afternoon of one day or the morning of the day you brought in the verdict?

A. It was in the afternoon.

Q. And that afternoon you elected a foreman?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You elected Waverly Johnson as the foreman. Is that right?

[fol. 2093] A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now how long was it after you started your deliberations that anybody said anything about the Associated Press always hurting someone and printing false statements?

A. Oh, I would say within about thirty minutes.

Q. Within about thirty minutes?

A. Uh huh.

Q. And who was it that said that?

A. The foreman, Johnson.

Q. Now the foreman, was he sitting at the head of the table?

A. No, sir.

Q. Where was he sitting?

A. He was sitting over on this side.

Q. Over on this side? Let's see, toward the window or away from the window?

A. Towards the door.

Q. Towards the door. And where were you sitting?

A. I was sitting next to him, on the east side of him.

Q. Were you and he talking together when he made that remark?

A. No, sir.

Q. Who did he make the remark to?

A. Just the jury as a bunch.

Q. What did any of the other jurors then say or so?

A. Well, like Mr. Gooch asked me, there was one of them [fol. 2094] made the statement the Associated Press had plenty of money.

Q. That was right after Mr. Johnson said that the Associated Press was always hurting someone with false stories and then somebody in reply to that said the Associated Press had plenty of money?

A. No, sir, it wasn't after that.

Q. Was it before that?

A. It was when they voted on malice and they started voting on how much money.

Q. At that time had a vote been taken on the amount of money?

A. No, sir.

Q. Now when the vote was taken on the amount of money did everybody speak up and say what they thought was the proper amount of money?

A. Everyone but me.

Q. Everyone but you. You didn't express any view on the amount of money?

A. Well I didn't agree on it.

Q. You mean in the discussion you didn't agree on the amount?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. At the time that this discussion began did everyone else agree on the $500,000?

A. On the first count, yes, sir.

[fol. 2095] Q. Now was it before or after that that this remark was made about the Associated Press having plenty of money?

A. It was after that.

Q. After that?

A. Uh huh.

Q. In other words it wasn't until after eleven jurors had voted in favor of $500,000.00 as actual damages that somebody said the Associated Press had plenty of money?

A. That's right, and award the full amount.

Q. Of course the full amount asked for for a million dollars.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the eleven jurors had already decided not to award the full amount but to award the figure they had arrived at.

A. Well we hadn't got into the malice part yet.

Q. But I mean the $500,000.00.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now do you know of anybody that actually heard, other than yourself, what Mr. Johnson said about the Associated Press hurting someone, printing false statements?

A. I am sure that all the jurors did.

Q. Did anybody make a comment about it at the time?

A. I think not, sir.

Q. Nobody made any comment at all.

A. No, sir.

Q. The matter wasn't discussed any further?

[fol. 2096] A. No, sir.

Q. So that it was simply a comment made by Mr. Waverly Johnson that was not picked up and didn't become a discussion and wasn't talked about any further.

A. Not that particular one. The other one was discussed quite a bit.

Q. Which one?

A. The one about the Press having quite a bit of money. I stopped that because I told them it didn't make any difference how much money the Press had and in the first place they didn't know how much they had, and I thought it was out of order, and that's when said "Meriweather's right, let's drop it".

Q. And you told them the jury should not consider that, that it was outside the record and shouldn't be considered. Is that right?

A. That's right.

Q. And then was it dropped?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And all of that took place after eleven jurors had already voted for $500,000.00.

A. On the five hundred, yes, sir.

Q. Now when Mr. Waverly Johnson made the remark about the Associated Press always hurting somebody did anybody speak up then like you very properly did a little later on to say, "Well we musn't consider that. That's not to be considered"?

[fol. 2097] A. I didn't say a thing.

Q. Did anybody else speak up and say that?

A. Not that I recall.

Q. In other words that was a remark that was made and they just let it lay. Nobody did anything further about it at all.

A. I don't think there was any further discussion on it, no, sir.

Q. Do you remember who it was that mentioned something about the Georgia Football coach collecting?

A. No, I don't recall which one it was, which one of the jurors.

Q. Do you remember at what stage of the game that happened?

A. That happened when we were voting on the malice part.

Q. When you were voting on the malice part?

A. Uh huh.

Q. Did you take these issues in order and work through them?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And so the malice part would be one of the very last things you did wouldn't it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. It wasn't until you got to the malice part that the mention was ever made about the Georgia Football coach.

A. The best I recall I made some statement myself that a libel suit was hardly ever awarded the full amount, and that's when this come in. One of the jurors said "Well the [fol. 2098] football coach was awarded the full amount".

Q. Well, of course, that had been a matter that was about as well spread in the public press as the incident over in Mississippi, wasn't it? I mean all of you knew about that didn't you?

A. I suppose so, yes, sir.

Q. Was there any further comment or discussion about it?

A. Not that I recall.

Q. That was just one of the things that anybody that reads the papers knew something about and nobody paid any attention to it then?

A. I guess so.

Mr. Gooch: We object to that last question and the answer that nobody paid any attention to it.

The Court: Yes, it is sustained. This juror may not testify as to whether someone did or did not pay any attention to it.

By Mr. Andress:

Q. Let me ask you another question if I may, Mr. Meriweather. When this remark was made about the Georgia Football coach in reply to the remark that you made, was there any further discussion about it?

A. Oh, I don't think there was any long discussion. There may have been a few words said here and there, something on that order.

[fol. 2099] Q. Just a casual remark as you discussed things in the jury?

A. Yes.

Mr. Gooch: We object to the "casual remark".

The Court: Sustained. Just give it in the context in which it occurred.

A. Well, that's about how it happened.

Mr. Andress: That's all.

Mr. Wm. J. Martin Tarter called as a witness by the defendant, being first duly sworn to testify the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Please state your name.

A. William J. Martin Tarter.

Q. Where do you live, Mr. Tarter?

A. Route one, Keller.

Q. And were you one of the jurors in the case of General Edwin A. Walker versus the Associated Press that was tried in this court in June of 1964?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you executed an affidavit in connection with this case, Mr. Tarter?

A. Yes, sir. I know what it says.

Mr. Andress: We have the same objection to the [fol. 2100] The Court: Same ruling.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Would you like to refresh your memory with it?

A. No, sir, I know what it says.

Q. All right. Now do you recall that the jury spent some several hours in deliberations before a verdict was reached?

A. About two hours I believe.

Q. Now prior to the time the jury reached its verdict and brought it into open court—

After you got into the jury room I assume that you elected a foreman. Is that correct?

A. That's right.

Q. Then did a general discussion of the case take place?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Prior to answering any issues in the case was there some discussion in the jury-room?

A. Yes, sir, the whole case was debated in general.

Q. That's prior to the time you answered any issues?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was there anything said by anybody, and name if you can, as to whether or not news media in the past had been guilty of irresponsible and malicious reporting?

Mr. Watts: Objected to as leading.

The Court: Sustained.

By Mr. Gooch:

[fol. 2101] Q. Please state whether or not there was anything said about the news media in general prior to the time you voted on the issues and prior to the time you brought in a verdict.

A. Yes, sir, there was.

Q. What was that?

A. Well it was said I believe—excuse me for saying I believe— It was said that the news media had been malicious in their reporting in the past in some cases.

Q. All right. Was that prior to the time you started voting on the issues?

A. Yes, sir, I believe it was.

Q. Was it said prior to the time that the verdict was actually brought into open court?

A. Would you please rephrase that?

Q. Was that said prior to the time the verdict was actually brought into court—before you were discharged?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, do you know which juror made the statement that you have just attributed to him?

A. No, sir, I don't. I don't recall.

Q. Do you recall that a man by the name of Johnson was foreman?

A. Yes, sir, he was.

Q. Do you recall whether or not he made that statement?

Mr. Watts: We object to that as leading and suggestive, [fol. 2102] putting the words in the witness' mouth.

The Court: Sustained.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Do you now recollect as to who might have made the statement that you have mentioned?

A. No, sir, I can't.

Q. Do you know how many of such jurors might have made the statement that you have attributed to the irresponsibility and malicious reporting.

Mr. Andress: We object to how many might have; we want to know how many did.

The Court: I sustain the objection in that form.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Do you know how many?

A. Sir, everyone has an opinion on that subject.

The Court: That isn't what he asked you. He asked you how many expressed that opinion in the jury-room.

A. No, sir, I couldn't give you an exact number. There were several of us.

Q. Were you one of them?

A. Yes, sir, I was.

Mr. Gooch: That's all. Thank you.

Cross examination.

By Mr. Andress:

Q. Mr. Trotter, was there any continued discussion of [fol. 2103] anything of that sort with respect to the Associated Press itself?

A. No, sir, there wasn't.

Q. In other words it was a general conversation rather than one directed to the Associated Press?

A. That's right.

Q. Now when you came to pass upon the issues here so far as you were aware was anything considered other than the evidence that had been heard from the witness stand?

Mr. Gooch: If the Court please, we object to that.

The Court: You may not answer that question. That's going into his mental processes.

Mr. Andress: I think we can find some law in connection with that, Judge.

Q. I believe, Mr. Trotter, I am correct. This is the first time you had served on a jury isn't it?

A. That's right.

Q. At any time when any of this conversation about the news media generally was under discussion did anyone say that, well you weren't interested in news media generally but in the Associated Press and you ought not to consider what the news media generally might or might not do?

A. I don't recall, sir.

Q. Do you have any idea how many people may have heard this remark that was made about news media being malicious in the past?

[fol. 2104] A. Everyone I imagine.

Q. Now in connection with the issues and the answering of the issues was there any sharp split in the jury or were they pretty well together the first time you took a ballot on the issues?

Mr. Gooch: We object to that as mental processes.

The Court: Re-read the question, Mr. Nuss, please.

(Whereupon the question was read)

The Court: Sustained in that form.

By Mr. Andress:

Q. All right. Now, Mr. Trotter, do you remember what the vote was the first time that you took a vote on the first special issue about whether or not—as to whether or not General Walker led a charge?

A. Yes, sir, I do. It was ten for Walker and Meriweather voted against and there was one person who didn't vote.

Q. All right. Now on special issue No. two as to whether that statement that Walker led a charge constituted fair comment was the vote about the same?

A. Now as I recall the question it was ten and one didn't vote, one of them.

Q. Would you say the first time the votes were taken that they generally ran ten in favor of the way you finally answered the issues on the first ballot on each one of them?

Mr. Gooch; We object to that if the Court please as [fol. 2105] improper.

The Court: Overruled.

A. On about the third statement there you know on the paper it changed to eleven to one, and on the fifth I believe now that it changed to eleven and Meriweather quit voting.

By Mr. Andress:

Q. And it went that way all the way through?

A. Throughout the first reading of it.

Q. Now you didn't hear any comment about you ought to give a million dollars because the Associated Press had plenty of money, did you?

A. The statement was brought up I believe that the Associated Press had a lot of money but at that time I don't believe that the million dollars had been brought up in that statement.

Q. Was that after you had already voted on the $500,000.00 total one time like Mr. Meriweather remembered it?

A. I believe it had, sir.

Q. Did you hear any statement about the Georgia Football coach?

A. Sir, I am real sure that the Butts case was never discussed. Let me say something, I brought up now that in Germany there was a German news media, I believe now, I am not sure which one, or now that it was German, but they reported in the Spring I believe that Khrushchev had been killed, you know, if you recall that, but the Butts case I don't ever recall being discussed.

[fol. 2106] Q. Things like that were matters of pretty common knowledge in a discussion?

A. Yes, sir, it is.

Mr. Gooch: If the Court please, we object to that as improper examination.

The Court: Sustained.
Mr. Andress: That's all.
Mr. Gooch: That's all, thank you.

MR. R. A. HOBSON, called as a witness by the defendant, being first duly sworn to testify the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Please state your name.
A. R. A. Hobson.
Q. Where do you live, Mr. Hobson?
A. 1401 Boyce.
Q. Were you one of the jurors in the case of General Walker versus the Associated Press that was tried in this court-room in June of 1964?
A. I was.
Q. You have been in the court-room while Mr. Meriweather and Mr. Tarter have testified, have you not?
[fol. 2107] A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you hear any statements made in the jury-room, and if so please state when, if you heard them, regarding the news media in general?
A. I don't recall just what was said at that time.
Q. Was there something said about the news media?
A. Well in the general discussion there was something said but I don't recall just what.
Q. Was there anything said about the news media had been guilty of false and malicious—

Mr. Watts: We object to that, Judge.
Mr. Gooch: Let me finish the question.
Mr. Watts: The damage is done. Regardless of starting out to lead the witness we object to even finishing the inquiry.
The Court: I think so, counsel.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Can you recall anything that was said about the news media in general?

A. Nothing more than that sometimes they had been at fault.

The Court: Sometimes what?

A. Had been at fault in printing falsified news.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Was there anything said concerning the amount of money that was to be awarded, concerning the ability of the [fol. 2108] Associated Press to pay?

A. Well, of course, when we started talking about the amount that we need give him, of course that had to be discussed. We couldn't all agree on the same amount the first go round.

Q. Was there any discussion as to whether or not the Associated Press had a lot of money?

Mr. Watts: We object to it as leading and suggestive and putting words in the witness's mouth.

The Court: Sustained.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Do you recall anything further about, that might have been said about the Associated Press' financial statement, or financial affairs?

A. Oh, nothing more than that the Associated Press probably had a lot of money.

Q. Now I will ask you whether or not there was any discussion as to what a large verdict against the Associated Press might do toward the news media in general.

Mr. Andress: We object to that, Your Honor, as being leading and suggestive.

The Court: Overruled.

Mr. Andress: It certainly goes into mental processes, a discussion of what the effect of it would be.

The Court: Read it to me again, Mr. Nuss.

(Whereupon the question was read)

[fol. 2109] The Court: Overruled.

A. I don't recall that any such statement was made.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Do you recall having discussed this matter with Mr. Settle and Mr. Blair shortly after the jury was discharged?

A. Oh, we exchanged a few words. I don't remember what was said.

Q. I will ask you if you made this statement at that time:

Mr. Andress: Just a minute. We object to his attempting any kind of statement in impeachment of what he is now testifying without laying the proper predicate.

The Court: Overruled.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. "That a high award as damages in this case would act as a deterrent to false reporting by the entire Press in the future". Do you remember making that statement?

A. I don't recall.

Q. Would you say you did or didn't?

A. I still don't recall whether I did or not.

Q. Was anything like that said in the jury-room prior to the time the verdict was reached?

A. If it was I don't remember.

Mr. Andress: Now if the Court please, we are going to object to this line of questioning because this is in strict accordance with the charge of the Court defining what is [fol. 2110] meant by punitive damages to act as a deterrent, and we think that any such discussion, if it took place, is a perfectly proper discussion under the Court's charge.

The Court: It may be, counsel, but I have to hear it before I can determine that.

Mr. Gooch: I believe that an answer to that would be chronological.

The Court: I am going to let you go on into it.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Now the statements that you have recalled and testified here to as having recalled, were those statements made prior to the time the jury reached its verdict and brought it into open court?

A. Well, of course, it would have to have been before we reached a verdict.

Q. Was it also before any of the issues had been answered?

A. No, it was just during the process of reaching a verdict.

Mr. Gooch: That's all.

Cross examination.

By Mr. Andress:

Q. Mr. Hobson, this business about the Associated Press probably had a lot of money, was there any extended discussion on that?

A. No.

Q. Was that after you had already taken a vote on the [fol. 2111] amount and eleven people had voted on the amount of $500,000.00? Like Mr. Meriweather remembered it?

Mr. Gooch: Now, we object to comparing one witness' testimony with another.

The Court: Sustained. Just ask him what he recalls.

Mr. Andress: What we asked him is whether he heard the testimony of these other witnesses.

The Court: I heard it, and I sustain his objection.

A. Now what was the question?

By Mr. Andress:

Q. Was there any such discussion here about the A. P. having a lot of money after you had already taken one vote on the amount of money to be awarded?

A. Well I think it was, yes.

Mr. Andress: That's all.

Mr. Gooch: That's all. Thank you.

Mrs. I. A. Smith, called as a witness by the defendant, being first duly sworn to testify the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Mrs. Smith, please state your name?

A. Mrs. I. A. Smith.

Q. And your address please.

[fol. 2112] A. 3537 Ruth Road.

Q. Were you one of the jurors in the case of General Walker versus the Associated Press tried in this court-room in June of 1964?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you recall taking part in the deliberations leading to the verdict?

A. I recall doing it, yes.

Q. Did you hear any reference to the news media in general by word of mouth from any other jurors prior to the time you answered the questions and prior to the time you brought the verdict into the court-room?

Mr. Watts: Your Honor, we object to that as leading. He can ask her what she heard and when she heard it.

Mr. Andress: I don't think he can fix the time.

The Court: No, I don't think so, Mr. Gooch. You have asked three questions in one.

Mr. Gooch: The Court has sustained the objection so I will start over, Mrs. Smith.

Q. Do you recall a discussion at any time during the deliberations of the jury concerning news media in general?

A. Yes, I believe there was some discussion.

Q. Will you please tell us what it was?

A. That the news media had been in error in reporting news.

Q. Do you remember when with reference to answering [fol. 2113] the questions that statement was made?

A. No, I don't.

Q. Was it before the verdict was brought in to the Court? Was it during the jury's deliberations is what I am trying to ask.

A. Yes, I believe it was.

Q. Do you remember at what part of the deliberations that statement was made?

A. No, Mr. Gooch, I don't.

Q. Do you remember whether it was before or after you had answered any of the issues?

A. No, I don't recall.

Mr. Gooch: That's all.

Cross examination.

By Mr. Andress:

Q. Mrs. Smith was there any discussion about the Associated Press in particular or was it just news media in general?

A. There was discussion of A. P. and news media.

Q. That included the radio, television, newspapers, magazines and just everything. Is that right?

A. Yes, I believe so.

Q. Was there any extended discussion at that time?
A. No.
Q. Do you remember who made any remarks about it?
A. No, I'm sorry I don't.
[fol. 2114] Q. Would you say it was one person or more than one?
A. I would say it was more than one.
Q. Would you say it was just a remark and a reply and then it passed off?
A. Yes, more like small talk.

Mr. Andress: That's all.
Mr. Gooch: No further questions.

MRS. T. E. TOMLINSON called as a witness by the defendant, being first duly sworn to testify the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Please state your name and address, Mrs. Tomlinson?
A. My name is Mrs. T. E. Tomlinson.
Q. And your address please, ma'am?
A. 4001 Pershing.
Q. Were you one of the jurors in the case of General Walker versus the Associated Press that was tried in this court-room in June of 1964?
A. Yes, I was.
Q. Mrs. Tomlinson, did you hear any discussion in the jury-room at any time prior to the jury returned its verdict concerning news media in general?
A. Yes.
[fol. 2115] Q. Could you tell the Court what that discussion was?
A. Well it was just a general discussion of different medias.

Q. What was said, please, ma'am?

A. I don't recall just what was said.

Q. Was there anything said, any discussion about news media making false reports?

Mr. Watts: We object to it as leading and suggestive.

The Court: Sustained.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Do you recall anything that might have been said about the news media in general?

A. No, sir.

Q. Mrs. Tomlinson, I am not trying to trip you but do you recall talking to Mr. Blair and Mr. Settle shortly after the jury returned its verdict in this case?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Do you remember stating to them in substance—

Mr. Andress: If the Court please, we are going to object to asking this lady what she said at some prior date to somebody not under oath. The question is what took place that she testifies to under oath, and we object to this form of interrogation.

The Court: Overruled.

[fol. 2116] Mr. Andress: May it go to the entire line?

The Court: No, just to this question.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Did you make this statement: "That because of the false and erroneous reporting of the news media in general in the past that the Associated Press had two strikes against it to begin with"?

A. I don't recall saying that.

Q. Would you say you did or didn't?

A. I didn't say that.

Q. But there was some discussion in the jury room of news media in general. Is that correct?

A. Yes.

Mr. Watts: We object to that as repetition.
The Court: I will let her go ahead and answer that.

By Mr. Gooch:

Q. Can you give the substance of it in any particular?
A. Of what, Mr. Gooch?
Q. Of what was said about the news media.
A. In the jury-room?
Q. Yes, ma'am.
A. Well it was discussed that A. P. and other forms of news media was at fault at times.

Mr. Gooch: That's all. Thank you.

Cross examination.

[fol. 2117] By Mr. Andress:

Q. Mrs. Tomlinson, was that discussion after you had voted on these first issues? In other words after the jury had already voted about all the issues except money?
A. Mr. Andress, I don't recall whether it was before. I presume it was before though.
Q. That's all you recall about the conversation?
A. Yes.
Q. And was it any extended discussion or just passing remarks?
A. Just passing remarks.

Mr. Andress: That's all.
Mr. Gooch: That's all. That's all we have, Your Honor, on that feature.
The Court: All right. Does the plaintiff have anything so far as jurors are concerned?
Mr. Andress: No, sir.

Mr. Gooch: We are not waiving any of the questions. The Court's attention is called specifically that most of the other objections or grounds for motion for new trial are based on the written record and the objections and exceptions to the Court's charge as the Court probably has noted. We have urged a complaint here to a portion of the evidence, and I believe the Court will recall that none of the witnesses were allowed to testify concerning the word [fol. 2118] "charge". General Walker, when he was on the stand, over our objection, was allowed by the Court to testify that he did not lead a charge and answered that question specifically.

The Court: Mr. Gooch, let me ask you this question: Don't you think that General Walker had, as part of his case, to deny that the story was true?

Mr. Gooch: No, I don't think so for the purpose of this argument, because you had not allowed any other witness to use the word "charge", and you did comment to the jury, Your Honor, "Mr. Gooch, I will allow this witness to answer that question with the word charge in it", which I believe was a comment in that you allowed this witness to use the word charge in connection with his testimony.

The Court: Did I use the word charge in my statement to you or did I just say, "I will permit this witness to answer that question"?

Mr. Gooch: I can't be specific now whether it was or not but I had an objection to him answering the question, the specific question, as to whether or not he led a charge. You said, "Mr. Gooch, I will allow this witness to answer that question". Whether or not you used the word charge in overruling my objection I can't be positive. I would have to look at the record, but you did say, "Mr. Gooch, I will [fol. 2119] allow this witness to answer that question", and complaint is made. No disrespect to the court.

The Court: I understand.

Mr. Gooch: But people raise these objections and lots of times the Court in the heat of the battle has made mistakes. Not this Court, but some courts have. But I don't want to take that as a waiver of the assignment of error.

Then the next thing we present is the unconscionable amount of this verdict. General Walker testified that his popularity had not waned, that he was still getting just as many calls to make speeches as he ever had. It's true that one witness testified that after having said on two or three occasions that the news report of General Walker including his insanity hearing and so on and so forth had damaged his character finally confined it and said that General Walker's reputation had been damaged in a particular area in Texas.

The Court: You say you are raising the question about excessiveness of the verdict?

Mr. Gooch: Yes, sir.

The Court: What part in your motion?

Mr. Gooch: It's in there about seven or eight times.

The Court: You don't ask for a remittitur do you?

[fol. 2120] Mr. Gooch: I believe under the rules, if the Court please, we are not required to ask for a remittitur. We raise the question of excessiveness because that's in the hands of the Court.

Mr. Andress: Only in connection with jury misconduct, Judge; I don't see anywhere else.

The Court: Let me hear from Mr. Gooch first, and then I will hear from you, Mr. Andress. I didn't find it when I read it over.

Mr. Gooch: "Damages found by the jury in answer to special issue No. nine, to-wit, the sum of $500,000.00 is so grossly excessive as to be manifestly wrong and unjust, and to show that the jury disregarded the evidence and was influenced by passion, prejudice and other improper motives," which is in the language of rule 328, paragraph J, under 10, and it's in there another three or four times. Maybe be considered that each and every point as raised in our amended motion for new trial has been presented?

The Court: Yes, sir.

Mr. Gooch: That's all.

The Court: I will tell you first, Mr. Andress, I am not going to rule today. I want to give you time, both of you, to prepare briefs so far as this jury misconduct is concerned.

[fol. 2121] Mr. Andress: Judge, there is a long motion there which has been presented in gross. There is no earthly use in taking up your time unless there is some particular thing.

The Court: The only thing I want the brief on is jury misconduct.

Mr. Andress: We also want to direct to your attention that we have here a motion to reform the judgment to give us back our exemplary damages.

The Court: Which is now overruled.

Mr. Andress: You will note our exception and in any order exception and notice of appeal.

The Court: I have already passed on that once.

Mr. Andress: Yes, sure you have, but I am not giving up on it.

The Court: Yes, I understand.

Mr. Andress: Your Honor, there is nothing in particular to reply to then so far as counsel are concerned and so far as this motion for new trial is concerned. Of course the permission of General Walker to testify to a charge the Court's point I think was well taken that it was necessary for the defendant who is charged with it to so speak. Furthermore he was the only person on the witness stand who, as a qualified expert from his long military career could testify to whether he did or did not lead a charge. He was [fol. 2122] an expert and the others weren't.

We will submit a brief.

The Court: All right, now, I would like to have it if it's possible by September 28th. Will that give you enough time?

Mr. Andress: That's ample time.

The Court: That's a non-jury week and I will have more time.

Mr. Andress: How do you want that handled? Do you want a brief from him and a reply brief from us, or just what do you want?

The Court: Do you want to submit anything, Mr. Gooch?

Mr. Gooch: We will submit you a brief.

The Court: All right. You submit one and send it to Mr. Andress as soon as you can, and you can reply to that, but I would like to have them both by the 28th if possible.

Mr. Andress: All right.

Mr. Gooch: All right, sir.

The Court: Now how much time has expired and how much more time do I have? Have you checked that Mr. Blair?

Mr. Blair: This motion was filed, Your Honor, on August 31st which means that we have 45 days from that [fol. 2123] date as I understand it.

The Court: Well you have 15 days after it is presented don't you?

Mr. Blair: Yes, sir.

The Court: Well it's presented today.

Mr. Andress: So far as I am concerned if the Court wants additional time I am perfectly willing to extend it.

Mr. Gooch: You can't extend it.

Mr. Andress: We can do this, we can argue this thing and present it on the 30th of September officially and then give you 15 days.

The Court: I can make a decision within 15 days if I can get your briefs by the 28th, both of them.

Mr. Watts: If Your Honor please, since this is the last appearance in person we will have in the court I would like to have about 30 seconds.

The Court: Yes, sir.

Mr. Watts: If your Honor please, after living thru this lawsuit I sincerely feel that deep in the conscious of the Court there rests a firm and abiding conviction that this defendant had a fair trial, that the parties have had their day in court and that justice has been done, and it would be a tragedy for the Court after the type of a jury verdict that has come in here to upset the composite wis-[fol. 2124] dom and judgment of twelve American citizens.

The Court: Do you desire to reply to that, Mr. Gooch?

Mr. Gooch: All I can say is I don't think the Associated Press has had a fair day in court coupled with what has transpired here, the time in which it was tried, the obvious discussion of the jury of the news media as a whole, the outlandish award of the amount of damages, the finding of exemplary damages when there was no evidence whatsoever is in such a state as to cause me to believe very firmly and maybe just as firmly, if not more firmly than Mr. Watts, that the Associated Press has not had a fair trial, but has been subjected to undue influences, to the sins and alleged errors of the news media elsewhere, to statements that have drifted in as to what has happened in other cases, the overall picture is to me one that the Associated Press has not had the benefit of a fair and impartial trial at the hands of its peers.

The Court: All right, gentlemen.

Reporter's Certificate to foregoing transcript (omitted in printing).

[fol. 2126] AGREEMENT OF COUNSEL

It is hereby agreed by and between counsel representing the plaintiff and the defendant in the above numbered and entitled cause that the above and foregoing 2125 pages contain a full, true, and correct transcript of all proceedings had and evidence adduced upon the trial of the above numbered and entitled cause taken at the time and place set forth in the captions hereof, together with a full, true, and correct transcript of the proceedings had and evidence adduced upon the hearing of the defendant's motion for new trial; and

We further agree that this record containing eleven volumes may be filed in this case as the Statement of Facts. This the 30th day of November A. D. 1964.

Looney Watts Looney Nichols & Johnson, C. J. Watts; Andress, Woodgate, Richards & Condos, Wm. Andress, Jr., Attorneys for Plaintiff.
Cantey, Hanger, Gooch, Cravens & Scarborough, Sloan B. Blair, Attorneys for Defendant.

Approved, Chas. J. Murray, Judge presiding.

[fol. 2127]

IN THE COURT OF CIVIL APPEALS FOR THE SECOND SUPREME JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS

No. 16624

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS, Appellant,

vs.

EDWIN A. WALKER, Appellee.

From the District Court of Tarrant County

PER CURIAM. OPINION—July 30, 1965

This is a libel suit. The parties will be designated as they were in the court below or The Associated Press as the A. P. and Walker by name.

The following are the reports of which Walker complained:

"October 2, 1962 'Walker, who Sunday night led a charge of students against federal marshals on the Ole Miss Campus, was arrested on four counts including insurrection against the United States.'

"October 3, 1962 (Editors Note: Former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, a key figure in the week-end battling over admission of a Negro to the University of Mississippi, was eating dinner Sunday night when he says he was told there was a 'scene of considerable disturbance' on the University of Mississippi Campus. He went there. Here is the story of Van Savell, 21, Associated Press newsman, who was on the scene and saw what happened.)

"By Van Savell: Oxford, Miss., October 3, 1962 (AP) 'Utilizing my youth to the fullest extent, I dressed as any college student would and easily milled among the several thousand rioters on the University of Mississippi Campus Sunday night.

" 'This allowed me to follow the crowd—a few students [fol. 2128] and many outsiders—as they charged federal marshals surrounding the century old Lyceum Building. It also brought me into direct contact with former Army Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, who is now under arrest on charges of inciting insurrection and seditious conspiracy.

" 'Walker first appeared in the riot area at 8:45 p. m., Sunday near the University Avenue entrance about 300 yds. from the Ole Miss Administration Building.

" 'He was nattily dressed in a black suit, tie and shoes and wore a light tan hat.

" 'The crowd welcomed Walker, although this was the man who commanded the 101st Airborne Division during the 1957 school integration riots at Little Rock, Arkansas.

" 'One unidentified man queried Walker as he approached the group. "General, will you lead us to the steps?"

" 'I observed Walker as he loosened his tie and shirt and nodded "Yes" without speaking. He then conferred with a group of about 15 persons who appeared to be the riot leaders.

" 'The crowd took full advantage of the near-by construction work. They broke new bricks into several pieces, took survey sticks and broken soft drink bottles.

" 'Walker assumed command of the crowd, which I estimated at 1,000 but was delayed for several minutes when a neatly dressed, portly man of about 45 approached the group. He conferred with Walker for several minutes and then joined a group near the front.

"'Two men took Walker by the arms and they headed for the Lyceum and the federal marshals. Throughout this time, I was less than six feet from Walker.

"'This march toward tear gas and some 200 marshals was more effective than the previous attempts. Although Walker was unarmed, the crowd said this was the moral [fol. 2129] support they needed.

"'We were met with a heavy barrage of tear gas about 75 yards from the Lyceum steps and went a few feet further when we had to turn back.

"'Before doing so, many of the rioters hurled their weapons—the bricks, the bottles, rocks and wooden stakes—toward the clustered marshals.

"'We fled the tear gas and the charging marshals—the crowd racing back to a Confederate soldier's statue near the grove entrance below the Lyceum.

"'I went to a telephone. A few minutes later I returned and found Walker talking with several students. Shortly thereafter, Walker climbed halfway up the Confederate monument and addressed the crowd.

"'I heard Walker say that Gov. Barnett had betrayed the People of Mississippi. "But don't let up now," he said, "You may lose this battle, but you will have been heard."

"'He continued: "This is a dangerous situation. You must be prepared for possible death. If you are not, go home now."

"'There were cheers. It was apparent that Walker had complete command over the group.

"'By this time, it was nearly 11:00 p. m. and I raced to the telephone again. Upon my return, Walker was calmly explaining the "New Frontier Government" to several bystanders. He remained away from the rioting throughout the next few hours, but advised on several tactics.

"'One Ole Miss student queried the former General,

"What can we use to make the tear gas bombs ineffective? Do you know of any way that we can attack and do some damage to those damn Marshals?"

"'Walker suggested the use of sand to snuff out the tear gas.

"'"This stuff works real well, but where can you get it?", he asked.

"'At this time the rioters were using a University fire [fol. 2130] truck and fire extinguishers in an attempt to make the tear gas bombs ineffective.

"'I left Walker and walked about 100 yards away where Molotov cocktails—gasoline, in bottles with a fuse—were being made.

"'Again I left the area for a telephone. As I walked toward a Dormitory with George Bartsch of the Little Rock Associated Press Bureau, we were attacked by Marshals who mistook us for students. We were deluged by tear gas, manhandled, handcuffed and beaten with clubs during a 200 yard walk back to the Lyceum Building.

"'Thanks to recognition from Chief Marshal James P. McShane, we were quickly released and given freedom in the Marshals' Headquarters.

"'Within minutes rifle and shotgun fire erupted from the rioting crowd and two men—one a French newsman—were killed. We considered ourselves lucky to have been arrested and glad to be behind closed, heavily guarded doors.'"

The only two statements of the above quoted reports which were complained of by Walker as being libelous and which form the basis of special issues submitted by the Court were: (1) "Walker, who Sunday led a charge of students against federal marshals on the Ole Miss Campus" (October 2, 1962 report), and (2) "Walker assumed command of the crowd" (October 3, 1962 report). For the sake of brevity these two statements will hereinafter be referred to as the "charge" and "command" statements respectively.

In answer to special issues one through four, the jury found that the "charge" statement was not "substantially true", did not constitute fair comment, was not made in good faith and was actuated by malice. It found to the same effect in response to similar issues five through eight concerning the "command" statement.

In answer to issue No. 9 the jury found damages in the sum of $500,000.00 and having found that A. P. was actuated by malice in answer to special issues Nos. four and eight the jury, in response to special issues Nos. ten and eleven [fol. 2131] found that exemplary damages should be awarded and in the amount of $300,000.00.

Based upon the verdict of the jury, judgment was entered for Walker and against the A. P. in the sum of $500,000. The judgment recited that there is no evidence to support the jury's findings of malice and $300,000 for exemplary damages.

Appellant contends that the court erred in rendering judgment for appellee rather than it because (1) as a matter of law the evidence conclusively established that the "charge" and "command" statements were substantially true; (2) each statement was a fair comment about a matter of public concern published for general information and thus privileged under the provisions of Art. 5432, V. A. C. S.; (3) such statements made without malice are protected by the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States; (4) over objection appellee was permitted to testify that he did not assume command; (5) it held as a matter of law that the "charge" and "command" statements were libelous rather than submitting issues as to each; (6) the evidence conclusively established as a matter of law that the "charge" and "command" statements were made in good faith with reference to matters it had a duty to report to its members and thence to the public; (7) the amount of damages found was so grossly excessive as to be patently wrong and unjust and the findings in response to the damage issue No. 9 and to special issues one, two, three, five, six and seven are so against the weight and preponderance of the evidence as to be manifestly wrong and unjust and thus insufficient to support such answers; and (8) the evidence conclusively established as a matter of law that the jury was guilty of material misconduct which probably resulted in injury to the defendant.

We affirm.

[fol. 2132] Evidence

In discussing the points relating to the quantity and quality of the evidence we have examined the complaints of the appellant in the light of the Article by Chief Justice Robert W. Calvert entitled, "'No Evidence' and 'Insufficient Evidence' Points of Error", 38 Tex. Law Rev. 361 and authorities therein cited.

The evidence considered in its most favorable light in support of the findings of the jury and the judgment of the court is in essence as follows: At approximately 4:00 P. M. of the day in question, a ring of Federal marshals had encircled the Lyceum Building. Walker arrived on the campus about 8:45 P. M. At that time a loud, violent riot was in progress in an area of the campus known as the Circle. A crowd assembled in the Circle area, began taunting and jeering the marshals. By 8:00 P. M. a full scale riot had erupted which was to continue all night, destroy 16 automobiles, kill two people, injure 50. The rioters would form into groups and charge toward the marshals, throwing bricks, bottles, rocks, sticks and other missiles. The rioters attempted to charge the marshals with a fire truck and then with a bulldozer. "Molotov cocktails" were hurled at the marshals. Finally rifle fire erupted. The next morning the campus looked like a battlefield. Soon after his arrival, Walker, after some urging to say a few words, spoke from the steps of the Confederate Monument. While there is some dispute as to what he said, there is testimony that he told the assembled groups that while they had a right to protest that violence was not the answer. He was "booed" or "jeered" at this time and again when urging a cessation of violence. He and others walked in the direction of the Lyceum Building where the marshals were stationed but he never came closer to the marshals than the monument or the length of a football field. He was there to watch what happened. He wanted a peaceful demonstration as a protest. His presence there was not illegal or [fol. 2133] unlawful. He had the same right to come upon the campus and observe the activity as did the various members of the press who were there to observe and to report. He was one of the crowd. He was not in the forefront, never in front of the crowd. He never hurled any rock, brick or other missile in the direction of the marshals or otherwise. He did not participate in the riot. He never directed or suggested that others do so. He issued no directions nor did he counsel or suggest to others that they charge the marshals or take any other offensive action toward them. The crowd was disorganized. It was a leaderless group. Groups were milling aimlessly. No one, including Walker, made any effort to assume leadership. Walker did not run. He never got out of a slow walk, described as strolling, ambling, or "moseying" along. He never participated in the riot or violence in any manner. He made no effort to incite or move others to action or violence. When asked how to drive the marshals out, he said: "You don't."

Throughout the trial Walker maintained the firm position that because of his opposition to the use of Federal troops within a State, and his personal knowledge of the deviation between the occurrences at Little Rock where he was indeed in command and the newspaper stories of those occurrences, that he was at Oxford to see for himself at first hand what was actually going on. He maintained that he did not assume command of the crowd, did not lead a charge, and did not participate in the rioting. He was present for the sole purpose of observing. The jury saw him, observed his demeanor, heard what he said, and believed him.

"'No evidence' points must, and may only, be sustained when the record discloses one of the following situations: (a) a complete absence of evidence of a vital fact; (b) the court is barred by rules of law or of evidence from giving weight to the only evidence offered to prove a vital fact; (c) the evidence offered to prove a vital fact is no more than a mere scintilla; (d) the evidence establishes conclu- [fol. 2134] sively the opposite of the vital fact." 38 Tex. Law Review, pp. 361, 362, supra.

Subdivisions (a) and (b) above have no application to the record or the facts in this case. As to (c) we have viewed the evidence in its most favorable light in support of the findings of the jury upon which the judgment of the Court is based, considering only the evidence and the inferences which support the findings and rejecting the evidence and the inferences which are contrary to the findings. In the application of this test we have determined that all of the findings of the jury, upon which the Court based its judgment, are supported by ample evidence. Having reached this conclusion it follows that we find no merit in the appellant's contention that the evidence establishes conclusively the opposite of what the jury found. We find that none of the situations discussed by Judge Calvert under (a), (b), (c) or (d) is disclosed by the record. Further we have concluded from our study and examination of the entire record that the findings of the jury upon which the Court based its judgment is not so contrary to the great weight and preponderance of the evidence as to be clearly wrong or unjust.

Jurors are the exclusive judges of the controverted issues of fact raised by the evidence, of the weight to be given the evidence, and the inferences to be drawn therefrom. They are the exclusive judges of the credibility of the witnesses. "The law does not attempt to tell jurors what amount or kind of evidence ought to produce a belief in their minds. They may believe a witness although he has been contradicted. They may believe the testimony of one witness and reject the testimony of other witnesses.

They may accept part of the testimony of one witness and disregard the remainder." McCormick & Ray, Texas Law of Evidence, § 3; Austin Fire Ins. Co. v. Adams-Childers Co., 246 S. W. 365 (Tex. Com. App. 1923).

"The mere fact that a verdict is against the preponderance of the evidence will not authorize a reviewing court [fol. 2135] to set it aside, if there is some evidence to support it, or evidence that would support a verdict either way. The court of civil appeals will set aside the verdict and findings of a jury only in cases where they are so against such a preponderance of the evidence as to be manifestly unjust or clearly wrong, or where they show clearly that the finding or verdict was the result of passion, prejudice, or improper motive, or in such obvious conflict with the justice of the case as to render it unconscionable." 4 Tex. Jur. 2d, p. 395, § 838, and authorities cited therein.

"Where evidence is conflicting, a reviewing court will not disturb the jury's verdict or findings if there is evidence of probative value to support them, unless the evidence is so overwhelmingly against the verdict or findings as to shock the conscience or show clearly that the conclusion reached was wrong or was the result of passion, prejudice or improper motive.

"The findings on conflicting evidence are usually regarded as 'conclusive,' 'binding,' or 'decisive,' and will be 'adopted' or 'accepted' as the findings of the appellate court, unless some good reason is presented that would justify the court in taking some other view.

"A jury finding on facts will not be set aside because it does not appear to be clearly right; it must appear to be clearly wrong before the appellate court will disturb it.

"The fact that the appellate court would not have found as the jury did is not the test to be applied on appeal. The true test is that made by the jury, on firsthand evidence, adduced before them from living witnesses whose credibility and the weight to be given their testimony were determinable by the jury. Where the jury's findings are in accord with the testimony of different disinterested witnesses, the fact that there is other testimony to the contrary does not authorize the appellate court to overturn the verdict. . . ." 4 Tex. Jur. 2d 390, § 837, and authorities cited therein.

[fol. 2136] In the application of the rules of law and the authorities above referred to, we overrule all points of error relating to the quantity or quality of the evidence supporting the findings of the jury upon which the Court based its judgment.

We find no error on the part of the Court in permitting Walker to testify that he did not assume command of the crowd.

He testified that he became a professional soldier upon completing four years at West Point in 1931 when he was commissioned as a Second Lieutenant. He had combat experience in the Mediterranean, European and Asiatic Theatres during World War II and in Korea. He finally attained the rank of Major General. During the course of the trial Walker testified on several occasions without objection that during the Little Rock matter he took command of the troops, was assigned as commander or that the troops were under his command. In connection with the occasion in question at Ole Miss he was asked if he, "participated in any way in any activity of the crowd that was throwing things at the Marshals?" He answered without objection that he had not participated in any way. He was then asked if he assumed "any command over this crowd." Objection was made on the ground that the answer would be a conclusion on the part of the witness. The Court permitted Walker to answer and he stated, "I certainly did not," and in response to another question he answered without objection that he certainly knew what it meant to assume command. The news item in question had identified Walker as the former Major General who commanded the 101st Airborne Division at Little Rock followed by the statement, "Walker assumed command of the crowd."

The Article in question stated as a fact that Walker had "assumed command of the crowd." We think that Walker, subject of this remark, had the right to deny or affirm the truth of it. We think that the opinion in Goode v. Ramey, 48 S. W. 2d 719 (El Paso Civ. App., 1932, re-[fol. 2137] fused), is applicable. Therein it was stated, "We are not prepared to say under the record, as presented here, that it was error to admit the statement of the witness. The issue sought to be proved was not a mixed question of law and fact, but purely a fact question. We think the issue was one upon which a witness in possession of all the facts may properly state his opinion or conclusion to which such facts would fairly lead, notwithstanding the witness' answer may embrace the very issue to be submitted to the jury. The conclusion of the witness is then testified to like any other fact to be considered by the jury for what they may believe it to be worth. Scalf v. Collin County, 80 Tex. 514, 16 S. W. 314; Adkins-Polk Co. v. John Barkley & Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 297 S. W. 757; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Mills, 34 Tex. Civ. App. 127, 78 S. W. 11."

If we are mistaken in holding that the testimony of Walker was admissible we nevertheless overrule the point of error because we are of the opinion that the error, if any, in admitting the testimony, was harmless within the meaning of Rules 434 and 503, T. R. C. P.; Dallas Railway & Terminal Co. v. Bailey, 250 S. W. 2d 379, 151 Tex. 359 (Sup. Ct., 1952).

Fair Comment

The appellant contends that the "charge" and "command" statements constituted fair comment and thus were privileged under the provisions of Art. 5432, V. A. C. S. We find and hold that both the "charge" and the "command" statements were statements of fact and not of comment. "Walker, who Sunday night led a charge of students against federal marshals . . . . " and "Walker assumed command of the crowd . . . .", (emphasis added) are positive statements of fact. Truth of the statements would constitute a complete defense. Appellant failed in its effort to establish this defense to the satisfaction of the jury which found that neither of the statements were substantially true.

[fol. 2138] In an article on "Fair Comment" by John E. Hallen, 8 Tex. Law Review 41 (1929-30), the author in discussing Art. 5432, V. A. C. S., states: "The 1927 Libel Law provides:

"'The publications of the following matters by any newspaper or periodical shall be deemed privileged and shall not be made the basis of any action for libel . . .

"'4. A reasonable and fair comment or criticism of the official acts of public officials and of other matters of public concern published for general information.'

"Paragraph 4 was in no way changed by the 1927 amendments and has appeared exactly in that form since 1901.

". . . the right of fair comment was not created by the statute. It is well recognized by the common law. Every one has the right to comment on matters of public interest and general concern and within limits is not liable for stating his real opinion on such subjects, however severe the criticism may be. It is immaterial whether or not the criticism is sound, or whether the court or jury would agree with it, so long as it represents the honest opinion of the speaker upon a matter of recognized public interest.

"The statute expressly declares that fair comment by newspapers and periodicals is privileged. But since this right was enjoyed by everyone at common law, the statute gives the newspaper no added privileges. Nor is it to be construed as taking away the common law defense of individuals. . . . (p. 41)

"It should be remembered that there is a distinction between comment or criticism, which is the opinion of the speaker or writer upon certain facts, and the facts upon which that opinion is based. A misstatement of fact cannot ordinarily be justified by a plea of fair comment. . . . (p. 43) [fol. 2139] "It has already been said that fair comment is a criticism, discussion, or expression of opinion upon existing facts and does not protect against a misstatement of the facts themselves. The question of what should be called fact and what comment is difficult. . . ." (p. 53)

"Texas has swung from its early holding in the Copeland Case (Express Printing Co. v. Copeland, 64 Tex. 354 (1885) that an untrue charge of crime, honestly and reasonably made, about a public officer, is privileged, to its present position that such a charge cannot be justified by a newspaper. In following its present doctrine Texas is supported by the weight of authority, and there are strong reasons for its holding." (p. 99)

An article under the heading of "Libel and Slander—Fair Comment—Statements of Opinion" by Tom J. Mays appears in 16 Tex. Law Review 87 (1937-38). He commences with, "A judicial warning to the press with respect to comment and criticism upon matters of public interest is discernible in the recent decision of Houston Printing Co. v. Hunter." 105 S. W. 2d 312 (Fort Worth Civ. App., 1937), affirmed 106 S. W. 2d 1043 (Tex. Sup., 1937). The article continues, "That fair comment and criticism upon such matters is qualifiedly privileged is quite generally recognized both at common law and in Texas by statute. On the other hand, where false allegations of fact are made regarding matters of public concern, the courts are not in accord. Perhaps a majority of the courts hold that false allegations of fact are not entitled to immunity even though made in good faith and without malice. . . . Texas is clearly in line with the majority, holding that falsification of the facts is never privileged.

"Although the distinction between statements of fact and statements of opinion or comment has been freely recognized, it is generally conceded that distinguishing the two becomes a difficult problem in many cases." (p. 88)

[fol. 2140] "Most of the cases, it seems, wherein the words are held actionable as statements of fact, have found imputation of malfeasance, misconduct, or corruption in office, or imputations of evil or corrupt motives in the administration of duties. These being treated as statements of fact, then certainly a false imputation of crime committed by a public officer or candidate would be actionable as a statement of fact in Texas. (pp. 89-90) . . .

"It is manifest that some method is needed by which to distinguish between statements of fact and comment; and it is equally certain that no absolute test can be laid down. But it is submitted that more desirable and satisfactory results can be reached." (p. 90)

The author suggests the following test by which to distinguish statements of fact from comment, "Where the statement alleged to be libelous can be reasonably construed by the reader as an expression of opinion only, on the basis of facts either already known to the reader or else reasonably assumed by the person writing the statement to be known to the reader, then it should be regarded as fair comment. Where, however, the statement alleged to be libelous, as reasonably construed, conveys to the reader not only an expression of the writer's opinion, but also certain supposed information, and this information conveyed does not accord with the true facts, it is not comment, but should be treated as a statement of fact.

"Under this test, whether a publication will be treated as a statement of fact and libelous, if untrue, will depend upon the surrounding circumstances of each particular case. Under such a guidance, even an imputation of crime might be held to be merely an expression of opinion and not actionable." (p. 91)

In, "The Press and the Law in Texas" by Norris G. Davis, University of Texas Press, Austin, 1956, it is stated [fol. 2141] that, " . . . the right of fair comment is a weak defense in most libel suits. It is subject to so many limitations that it is seldom completely applicable. There are three groups of limitations. First, the comment must be limited to matters of public concern. Second, the article must be a statement of opinion—or comment—rather than a statement of fact, a very difficult distinction to make. Finally, the comment must be reasonable and fair and made in good faith, and this limitation is also difficult to define." (p. 65)

"Even if the subject matter and the person concerned are clearly matters of public concern, there remains two severe limitations. One of these, the requirement that the story or article must be comment, not a statement of fact, has caused by far the most trouble. The separation of comment from factual statements in most stories and articles is extremely difficult, and Court decisions have shown confusion on the point." (p. 67) "One important rule developed for separation of fact and comment is the theory that imputation of dishonest motives to a public official or imputation of an act constituting a crime under the law is a statement of fact and cannot be considered fair comment." (p. 68) San Antonio Light Pub. Co. v. Lewy, 113 S. W. 574 (CCA of Texas, 1908, Ref.); Forke v. Homann, 39 S. W. 210 (CCA of Texas, 1896, ref.). The author in reference to the article by Mays in 16 Tex. Law Review 87 (1937-38), states: "One writer who has studied the fair-comment cases in Texas and has found the same confusion illustrated here has offered the following definitions of 'opinion statements' and 'fact statements.'" (p. 73) He then quotes the test suggested by Mays and continues: "Certainly the courts should become aware of the need to distinguish statements of fact from opinion on a less arbitrary basis than is now customary. If the Supreme Court would adopt such a definition as the one quoted above, it would do much toward creating such an awareness. Actual differentiation of fact and opinion would still be difficult, but court decisions would be more just. (p. 74) [fol. 2142] "Actually, it is clear that almost any story, editorial, or other type of news article must be a mixture of statements of fact and comment, even though the writer attempts to confine himself to comment. Any type of comment, in implication at least, must be based on fact; and newsmen know that the most effective comment is that based on startling and important statements of fact. Newsmen should therefore be prepared to prove the truth of any statement of fact and to rely on fair comment as defense only for the conclusions drawn from these true facts. They should strongly urge the courts also to make the distinction between fact and opinion rather than, as they so often do, plead all defenses to all parts of a story alleged to be libelous." (p. 74)

In our opinion the test suggested by Mr. Mays and favorably commented on by Mr. Davis is a good one. We think that its application to the facts in this case support our holding that the statements involved were statements of fact and that the appellant was not prepared to prove the truth of either statement. The information conveyed was not in accord with the true facts. Reference is made to the complete text of the articles above referred to and the authorities cited therein. See also 36 Tex. Jur. 2d, Libel and Slander, §§ 87, 89, 92 and 171 together with cases cited under each.

We find no merit in appellant's contention that the reports, made without malice, are protected from the claim of libel by the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution. These Amendments prohibit Congress from making laws abridging freedom of speech and of the press and the State from making or enforcing laws of similar nature.

"The interest of the public in obtaining information about public affairs and of the defendant in discussing such matters is often brought directly in conflict with the plaintiff's claim to his own good name, and the law must draw a line between them. . . . (8 Tex. Law Rev. 41, p. 98) [fol. 2143] "It is not true that false and derogatory statements about a man's character are today always actionable. If they were, the whole defense of privilege would be swept away. Nor is it true that everything may be justified under a defense of free speech or press. These rights as embodied in constitutions and statutes, were designed primarily to prevent interference by the government with a man's talking or writing, and not to do away with responsibility for what was said. If 'Freedom of the Press' always furnished a complete defense there could be no such tort as libel. . . ." (8 Tex. Law Rev. 56)

"It is submitted that any decision based entirely upon the right to an inviolate character or freedom of speech is unsound. Either doctrine given full sway would annihilate the other. . . ." (8 Tex. Law Rev. 61)

"Articles 5430, 5431, 5432, and 5433, Vernon's Texas Civil Statutes, 1948, clearly declare the policy of this State regarding the question of libel. The law protects the right of a citizen to defend his reputation and good name from libelous publications, and this right is zealously guarded. Bell Pub. Co. v. Garrett Engineering Co., 141 Tex. 51, 170 S. W. 2d 197; Belo & Co. v. Looney, 112 Tex. 160, 246 S. W. 777; Express Pub. Co. v. Keeran, Tex. Com. App., 284 S. W. 913." Fitzjarrald v. Panhandle Pub. Co., 228 S. W. 2d 503 (Tex. Sup., 1950).

We find no application of the authorities cited by the appellant to the facts of this case.

Libelous Per Se

Did the Court commit error in holding as a matter of law that the "charge" and "command" statements were libelous per se, rather than to submit same to the jury for its determination? We think not. The language contained in the statements is not ambiguous. There can be no doubt as to the meaning of either.

Each of the statements imputed to Walker the crime of [fol. 2144] insurrection against the United States. It is undisputed that the crowd on the Ole Miss Campus was engaged in rioting and by force interfering with the efforts of U. S. marshals to enforce an executive order of the President of the United States issued under sanction of law and of applicable statutes. Insurrection is punishable by fine or imprisonment or both.

The statements further imputed to Walker responsibility for the death of two men and of the wanton destruction of property, all accomplished by students and others under his leadership and direction. The onslaught of the riotous crowd "led" by Walker who had "assumed command" was such that Van Savell considered he was, "lucky to have been arrested and glad to be behind closed, heavily guarded doors."

It imputed that Walker, who "advised on several tactics," none of which were ever specified, directed or advised on the making and use of the molotov cocktails (gasoline bombs) and other offensive weapons used by the rioters.

"The court should construe the meaning of unambiguous language, pass on its defamatory character, and instruct the jury accordingly. But where the language is ambiguous or of doubtful meaning there is a question for the jury." 36 Tex. Jur. 2d 496, § 166; p. 482, § 156 of the same text and cases cited under each. Fitzjarrald v. Panhandle Pub. Co., supra.

"To charge a person with or impute to him the commission of any crime for which punishment by imprisonment in jail or the penitentiary may be imposed is slanderous or libelous per se." 36 Tex. Jur. 2d 288, § 7; H. O. Merren & Co. v. A. H. Belo Corp., 228 F. Supp. 515.

"Any written or printed language tending to degrade a person in the estimation of honorable people, or imputing to him disgraceful or dishonorable acts, is libelous per se." 36 Tex. Jur. 2d 297, § 13.

"The language claimed to be defamatory must be taken as a whole. Thus, a newspaper article must be considered in its entirety in determining the sense in which its language is used, and whether the article, or a particular [fol. 2145] statement therein, is libelous." 36 Tex. Jur. 2d 313, § 27.

"'Libelous per se' means that written or printed words are so obviously hurtful to person aggrieved by them that they require no proof of their injurious character to make them actionable." Rawlins v. McKee, 327 S. W. 2d 633 (Texarkana Civ. App., 1959, ref., n.r.e.).

"Defamatory language may be actionable per se, that is, in itself, or may be actionable per quod, that is, only on allegation and proof of special damages. The distinction is based on a rule of evidence, the difference between them lying in the proof of the resulting injury. Language that necessarily, in fact or by a presumption of evidence, causes injury to a person to whom it refers is actionable per se. In other words, the defamatory words must be of such a nature that the court can presume as a matter of law that they will tend to disgrace and degrade the person or hold him up to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or cause him to be shunned and avoided. Where the language is actionable per se damages are conclusively presumed and need not be proved." 36 Tex. Jur. 2d 280, § 2.

"To be libelous a publication must be defamatory in its nature, and must tend to injure or impeach the reputation of the person claimed to have been libeled. The language used, taken in connection with the facts and circumstances alleged by way of innuendo, must be reasonably calculated to produce one or more of the results mentioned in the statutory definition; that is, it must have the effect of injuring or tending to injure the person to whom it refers to the extent of exposing him to public hatred, contempt, ridicule, or financial injury, or to impeach his honesty, integrity, or virtue.

"It is not necessary, however, that the language have all the injurious or pernicious tendencies enumerated in the statute; it is actionable if it has any of them. . . .

[fol. 2146] "A publication that tends to subject the plaintiff to public contempt, or that impeaches his integrity or reputation, is libelous though it does not charge him with a crime.

"The term 'public hatred,' as found in the statutory definition, signifies public or general dislike or antipathy." 36 Tex. Jur. 2d 285, § 6.

Damages

In connection with special issue No. 9 the jury was instructed that it may take into consideration such damages, if any, to the reputation of the plaintiff and such mental anguish, if any, and humiliation, if any, and embarrassment, if any, which plaintiff may have sustained as a direct and proximate result of the statements inquired about. The jury awarded $500,000.00.

From our investigation and study of the record we are unable to find any legal justification to disturb the award of damages. If any improper influences were present they do not appear from the record. Under the pleadings the appellee sought damages, including exemplary damages, in the sum of $2,000,000.

"Mental suffering on the part of the person defamed is one of the direct results of a libel or slander. Accordingly, injury to the feelings, humiliation, and anguish of mind are proper elements of compensatory damages, provided they are the direct and proximate result of the defamation. This suffering is classed as general damages, that are presumed to have been sustained, and that, in actions for libel, are recoverable under a general averment, without specific proof that they were incurred, and, by virtue of statute, regardless of whether there was any other injury or damage, even though the publication was not libelous per se." 36 Tex. Jur. 2d 402, § 98.

"The plaintiff is entitled to compensation for injury to his character or reputation caused by the defamation. . . . [fol. 2147] It follows that the jury, in fixing the amount of recovery, may consider the loss of, or injury to, character or reputation, even though there is no proof thereof nor any proof of good character. . . ." 36 Tex. Jur. 2d 400, § 97.

"In other words, a general allegation of damages will admit evidence of those damages naturally and necessarily resulting from the defamation charged. It is unnecessary to itemize the elements of general damages; rather, the amount may be alleged in the aggregate. Thus, the plaintiff need not aver the nature, character or extent of the mental suffering caused, or even that he thereby suffered any agony, but it is sufficient to aver the damages he sustained by reason thereof. . . ." 36 Tex. Jur. 2d 445, § 126.

"Generally speaking, the damages resulting from a libel or slander are purely personal and cannot be measured by any fixed standard or rule. The amount to be awarded rests largely in the discretion of the jury, or the court in a case tried without a jury, and an appellate court will not disturb the verdict or award unless it appears from the record to be excessive or the result of passion, prejudice, or other improper influence. . . .

"In fixing the amount the jury may take into consideration the motives of the defendant, and the mode and extent of publication. . . ." 36 Tex. Jur. 2d 405, § 102.

Exemplary Damages

By counter-points the appellee contends the court erred in setting aside the findings of the jury in response to special issues Nos. 4, 8, 10 and 11, which related to malice and exemplary damages.

Issues Nos. 4 and 8 inquired if appellant was actuated by malice, and malice was defined, "you are instructed that by the term 'malice' is meant ill will, bad or evil motive, or that entire want of care which would raise the belief that the act or omission complained of was the result of a [fol. 2148] conscious indifference to the right or welfare of the person to be affected by it."

The appellee had the burden of proving that the appellant's act or acts were such as to fall within the above definition before he was entitled to a finding of malice and exemplary damages.

The statement of facts consists of eleven volumes and 2126 pages. The entire record has received our close and sustained attention.

In view of all the surrounding circumstances, the rapid and confused occurrence of events on the occasion in question, and in the light of all the evidence, we hold that appellee failed to prove malice as defined, and the trial court was correct in setting aside said findings.

We think there is yet another reason to support the Court's action in disregarding the jury's answers to the issue relating to malice and exemplary damages, namely, the lack of necessary pleadings and proof required under the holdings in Western Union Tel. Co. v. Brown, 58 Tex. 170 (Tex. Sup., 1882); Wortham-Carter Pub. Co. v. Littlepage, 223 S. W. 1043, p. 1046 (Fort Worth Civ. App., 1920, no writ hist.), and Fort Worth Elevators Co. v. Russell, 70 S. W. 2d 397 (Tex. Sup., 1934).

The record leaves some doubt as to whether A. P. is an incorporated or an unincorporated association. It does appear, however, that its composition, the manner in which it functions, and its organizational set-up is more akin to a corporation than not and that the holdings in the above cited cases would be applicable.

We think the record in this case will support our view. Certainly, A. P. is not an individual. Having no mind and being an entity only by a fiction of law, it must be held incapable of entertaining actual or express malice unless the requirements of the holding in Fort Worth Elevators Co. v. Russell, Western Union Tel. Co. v. Brown and Wortham-Carter Publishing Co. v. Littlepage, supra, are complied with. A. P. is referred to as a corporation in the appellee's brief.

[fol. 2149]

Jury Misconduct

We find no error in the action of the Court in overruling the appellant's amended motion for new trial because of alleged misconduct of the jury.

During a general discussion of the case a juror remarked that the A. P. (or news media generally) was always hurting someone by the printing of false or malicious reports of words to this effect. There was considerable discrepancy in the testimony of the five jurors called to testify on the motion for new trial as to whether the reference was to the A. P. or to news media generally. It was a casual statement. "Nobody made any comment at all" about it. It is undisputed that it was quickly dropped. Who made the statement, which jurors or how many probably heard it or specifically at what stage in the proceedings the statement was made was not shown. It was dropped and not again mentioned. The jury discussed and answered the issues in order. They were 11 to 1 on the issues preceding those relating to malice and exemplary damages. While discussing these issues a remark was made that the full amount should be awarded because the A. P. had plenty of money and it was mentioned "about the Georgia football coach (Wally Butts) collecting." The jurors were in dispute as to whether the statement concerning Butts was ever made. It is without dispute that the statements, if any, were made after the jury had already found damages in the sum of $500,000 and were considering the issues on malice and exemplary damages.

The juror who was the last to agree on the $500,000 was the juror who stopped the discussion as to how much money the Press had. He pointed out that it did not make any difference and was out of order. The matter was promptly dropped. The only answers which could have been influenced or affected by such statements, if any, were those to the issues on malice and exemplary damages and these find[fol. 2150] ings of the jury were disregarded by the Court on other grounds in the rendition of judgment.

In order to justify a new trial under Rule 327, T. R. C. P., the movant has the burden of establishing to the satisfaction of the Court that it reasonably appears from the evidence both on the hearing of the motion and the trial of the case and from the record as a whole that injury probably resulted by reason of the alleged jury misconduct. The appellant failed to meet its burden under this rule.

The trial court in its findings of fact and conclusions of law found that none of the statements singly or collectively induced any juror to change an answer or vote differently than he would otherwise have done. That there was no showing of probable injury to the appellant because of such statements.

"When a trial court hears the testimony of jurors on an issue of misconduct, alleged to have occurred during the jury's deliberation upon its verdict, he is accorded the same latitude in passing upon the credibility of the witnesses and of the weight to be given to their testimony as the jury had upon the trial of the original cause. If there be any inconsistencies or contradictions in the testimony of a witness upon the hearing of a motion for new trial, it rests within the sound discretion of the trial court to harmonize and reconcile such conflicts so far as possible. A juror's testimony upon such hearing may be so contradictory and inconsistent that the trial court in exercising its privilege to pass upon the credibility of the witness may be justified in disregarding his entire testimony. Carl Construction Co. v. Bain, 235 Ky. 833, 32 S. W. (2d) 414." Monkey Grip Rubber Co. v. Walton, 122 Tex. 185, 53 S. W. 2d 770 (1932).

In our opinion the alleged improper statements, when viewed in the light of the evidence on the motion for new [fol. 2151] trial and on the trial of the case and on the record as a whole, did not probably result in injury to defendant. Rules 327 and 434, T. R. C. P.

Having considered each of the appellant's points of error and the cross-points raised by the appellee and having concluded that each should be they are each and all accordingly overruled, and the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

Per Curiam

[fol. 2152] Clerk's Certificate to foregoing paper (omitted in printing).

[fol. 2153]

IN THE COURT OF CIVIL APPEALS FOR THE
SECOND SUPREME JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS
From the District Court of Tarrant County
(No. 31,741-C)
16624

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
vs.
EDWIN A. WALKER

JUDGMENT—July 30, 1965

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record and the same having been reviewed, it is the opinion of the Court that there was no error in the judgment. It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that the judgment of the trial court in this cause be and it is hereby affirmed.

It is further ordered that appellee, Edwin A. Walker, do have and recover of and from appellant, The Associated Press, and its surety on its supersedeas bond, Houston Fire and Casualty Insurance Company, the amount adjudged below, with interest thereon at the rate of six per cent per annum from August 3, 1965, together with all costs in this behalf expended, both in this Court and in the trial court, for which let execution issue, and that this decision be certified below for observance.

IN THE COURT OF CIVIL APPEALS FOR THE
SECOND SUPREME JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS
17887—16624

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
vs.
EDWIN A. WALKER

ORDER DENYING APPELLANT'S MOTION FOR REHEARING—
September 17, 1965

This day came on to be heard the motion by appellant for a rehearing in this cause and said motion having been duly considered by the Court is hereby overruled.

[fol. 2154]
IN THE COURT OF CIVIL APPEALS FOR THE
SECOND SUPREME JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS
17888—16624

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
vs.
EDWIN A. WALKER

ORDER DENYING APPELLEE'S MOTION FOR REHEARING—
September 17, 1965

This day came on to be heard the motion by appellees for a rehearing in this cause and said motion having been duly considered by the Court is hereby overruled.

[fol. 2155] Clerk's Certificate to foregoing papers (omitted in printing).

[fol. 2156]

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF TEXAS

From Tarrant County, Second District

No. A-11,069

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

vs.

EDWIN A. WALKER

ORDER DENYING APPLICATIONS FOR WRITS OF ERROR—
February 9, 1966

Application of The Associated Press, as well as the conditional application of Edwin A. Walker, for writs of error to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Second Supreme Judicial District having been duly considered, and the Court having determined that same present no error requiring reversal of the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals, it is ordered that said applications be, and hereby are, refused.

It is further ordered that applicant, The Associated Press, and its surety, Houston Fire & Casualty Insurance Company, and applicant, Edwin A. Walker, each pay all costs incurred on their respective applications for writs of error.

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF TEXAS

From Tarrant County, Second District

No. A-11,069

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

vs.

EDWIN A. WALKER

ORDER DENYING MOTION FOR REHEARING OF APPLICATION FOR WRIT OF ERROR—March 23, 1966

Motion of The Associated Press for rehearing of its application for writ of error having been duly considered, it is ordered that such motion be, and hereby is, overruled.

[fol. 2157] Filed in Court of Civil Appeals for Second Supreme Judicial District of Texas, March 30, 1966—Lida Swanson, Clerk.

[fol. 2158] Clerk's Certificate to foregoing transcript (omitted in printing).

[fol. 2159]

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 150—October Term, 1966

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS, Petitioner,

v.

EDWIN A. WALKER.

ORDER ALLOWING CERTIORARI—October 10, 1966

The petition herein for a writ of certiorari to the Court of Civil Appeals of the State of Texas, Second Supreme Judicial District and/or the Supreme Court of the State of Texas is granted and one and one half hours are allotted for oral argument.

And it is further ordered that the duly certified copy of the transcript of the proceedings below which accompanied the petition shall be treated as though filed in response to such writ.

FILED
DEC 1 1 1965
JOHN F. DAVIS, CLERK

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

October Term, 1965.

No. ~~814~~ 37

CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,
Petitioner,

v.

WALLACE BUTTS,
Respondent.

PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FIFTH CIRCUIT.

HERBERT WECHSLER,
435 West 116th St.,
New York, N. Y. 10027
PHILIP H. STRUBING,
123 South Broad St.,
Philadelphia, Penna. 19109
Attorneys for Petitioner,
Curtis Publishing Company.

PEPPER, HAMILTON & SCHEETZ,
Philadelphia, Penna.,
KILPATRICK, CODY, ROGERS,
McCLATCHEY & REGENSTEIN,
Atlanta, Ga.,
Of Counsel.

International, 711 So. 50th St., Phila., Pa. 19143—Tel. SA 7-8711 Area Code 215

INDEX.

	Page
Opinions Below	1
Jurisdiction	2
Questions Presented	2
Constitutional and Statutory Provisions Involved	2
Statement	3
Reasons for Granting the Writ	10
Conclusion	21
Appendix A	1a
Appendix B	5a
Appendix C	97a
Appendix D	101a

TABLE OF CASES CITED.

	Page
Abernathy v. Patterson, 295 F. 2d 452 (5th Cir. 1961)	14
Aetna Insurance Co. v. Kennedy, 301 U. S. 389 (1937)	13, 14
Alaska Juneau Gold Mining Co. v. Robertson, 331 U. S. 793 (1947)	11
Allen v. Regents, 304 U. S. 439 (1938)	7
Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U. S. 58 (1963)	18
Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U. S. 516 (1960)	18
Bay Ridge Operating Co. v. Aaron, 334 U. S. 446 (1948)	11
Brabham v. Mississippi, 96 F. 2d 210 (5th Cir. 1938)	20
Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U. S. 296 (1940)	17
Commonwealth ex rel. Ensor v. Cummings, 416 Pa. 510 (1965)	12
Commonwealth v. Jacobs, 346 Mass. 300 (1963)	13
Day v. Woodworth, 13 How. 362 (1851)	17
Dillon v. Peters, 341 F. 2d 337 (10th Cir. 1965)	12
Dimick v. Schiedt, 293 U. S. 474 (1935)	20
England v. Louisiana State Board of Medical Examiners, 375 U. S. 411 (1964)	13, 15
Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U. S. 478 (1964)	13
Fay v. Noia, 372 U. S. 391 (1963)	14, 15
Ford Motor Co. v. Mahone, 205 F. 2d 267 (4th Cir. 1953)	20
Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U. S. 51 (1965)	18
Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64 (1964)	16
Green v. United States, 355 U. S. 184 (1957)	15
Griffin v. California, 380 U. S. 609 (1965)	11, 12, 13
Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U. S. 233 (1936)	18
Hamm v. Rock Hill, 379 U. S. 306 (1964)	10
Helvering v. Richter, 312 U. S. 561 (1941)	10, 12

TABLE OF CASES CITED (Continued).

	Page
Henry v. Collins, 380 U. S. 356 (1965)	16
Henry v. Mississippi, 379 U. S. 443 (1965)	12
Henry v. Pearson, 380 U. S. 356 (1965)	16
Herndon v. Georgia, 295 U. S. 441 (1935)	14
Hormel v. Helvering, 312 U. S. 552 (1941)	10, 14
Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U. S. 458 (1937)	14
King v. State, — Del. —, 212 A. 2d 722 (1965)	13
Life & Casualty Co. v. McCray, 291 U. S. 566 (1934)	18
Linkletter v. Walker, 381 U. S. 618 (1965)	11, 12
Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U. S. 1 (1964)	13
Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U. S. 643 (1961)	12
Massey v. United States, 291 U. S. 608 (1934)	10
Minneapolis, St. P. & S. S. M. Ry. v. Moquin, 283 U. S. 520 (1931)	20
Moity v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 201 (1964)	16
Murphy v. Waterfront Commission, 378 U. S. 52 (1964)	15
N. A. A. C. P. v. Alabama, 357 U. S. 449 (1958)	18
N. A. A. C. P. v. Button, 371 U. S. 415 (1963)	21
National Surety Co. v. Jean, 61 F. 2d 197 (6th Cir. 1932)	20
New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254 (1964)	2, et seq.
149 Madison Avenue Corp. v. Asselta, 331 U. S. 795 (1947), modifying 331 U. S. 199 (1947)	11
People v. Hillery, 62 Cal. 2d 692 (1965)	13
People v. Kitchens, 46 Cal. 2d 260 (1956)	13
People v. Loria, 10 N. Y. 2d 368 (1961)	12
People v. McLucas, 15 N. Y. 2d 167 (1965)	13
People v. Roberts, — Cal. 2d —, 45 Cal. Rptr. 155 (1965)	13
Polites v. United States, 364 U. S. 426 (1960)	11, 14

TABLE OF CASES CITED (Continued).

	Page
Reynolds v. Pegler, 223 F. 2d 429 (2d Cir. 1955)	20
Rosenblatt v. Baer (U. S. No. 38, 1965 Term)	16
Ruppert v. Ruppert, 134 F. 2d 497 (D. C. Cir. 1942)	13
Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U. S. 479 (1960)	18
Smith v. California, 361 U. S. 147 (1959)	18
Speiser v. Randall, 357 U. S. 513 (1958)	18
State v. Clifton, — Ore. —, 401 P. 2d 697 (1965)	13
State v. Lanzo, 44 N. J. 560 (1965)	13
State v. Smith, 37 N. J. 481 (1962)	12
Sulzbacher v. Continental Casualty Co., 88 F. 2d 122 (8th Cir. 1937)	13
Tehan v. United States ex rel. Shott, 381 U. S. 923 (1965)	13
Uebersee Finanz-Korp. v. McGrath, 343 U. S. 205 (1952)	10, 12
United Brotherhood of Carpenters v. United States, 330 U. S. 395 (1947)	15
United States v. Alabama, 362 U. S. 602 (1960)	10
United States v. Chambers, 291 U. S. 217 (1934)	10
United States v. O'Connor, 237 F. 2d 466 (2d Cir. 1956)	13
United States v. Ohio Power Co., 353 U. S. 98 (1957)	15
United States v. The Schooner Peggy, 1 Cranch 103 (1801)	10
United States v. Tynen, 11 Wall. 88 (1870)	10
United States ex rel. Angelet v. Fay, 333 F. 2d 12 (2d Cir. 1964), aff'd, 381 U. S. 654 (1965)	13
United States ex rel. Carafas v. LaVallee, 334 F. 2d 331 (2d Cir. 1964), cert. denied, 381 U. S. 951 (1965)	12
United States ex rel. Dalton v. Myers, 342 F. 2d 202 (3d Cir. 1965)	12

TABLE OF CASES CITED (Continued).

	Page
United States ex rel. Durocher v. LaVallee, 330 F. 2d 303 (2d Cir. 1964)	13
United States ex rel. West v. LaVallee, 335 F. 2d 230 (2d Cir. 1964)	12
Vandenbark v. Owens-Illinois Glass Co., 311 U. S. 538 (1941)	10
White v. Maryland, 373 U. S. 59 (1963)	11, 12
Whitney v. California, 274 U. S. 357 (1927)	18
Whitus v. Balkcom, 333 F. 2d 496 (5th Cir. 1964)	15
Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U. S. 471 (1963)	20
Yakus v. United States, 321 U. S. 414 (1944)	11

STATUTES AND AUTHORITIES CITED.

	Page
Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Rule 60(b)	1, 6, 7, 11, 12, 15
Ga. Code Ann. § 26-2101	19
Ga. Code Ann § 27-2506	19
Ga. Code Ann. §§ 32-101 et seq.	7
Ga. Code Ann. § 105-1801	15
Randall, The Life of Thomas Jefferson, vol. iii, pp. 563-564 (1858)	16
28 U. S. C. § 1254(1)	2
25 U. S. C. § 1352(a)(1)	2
28 U. S. C. § 2106	14
United States Constitution:
First Amendment	5, 9
Fifth Amendment	5
Seventh Amendment	9
Fourteenth Amendment	5

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States.

OCTOBER TERM, 1965.

No. ———.

CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,

Petitioner,

v.

WALLACE BUTTS,

Respondent.

PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FIFTH CIRCUIT.

Petitioner respectfully prays that a writ of certiorari issue to review the judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit entered in the above entitled case on July 16, 1965.

Opinions Below.

The opinions of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit (R. 1616-1678, 1786-1801, Appendix B, pp. 5a-75a) are not yet reported. The opinion of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia on petitioner's motion for new trial (R. 88-101, Appendix B, pp. 76a-88a), is reported in 225 F. Supp. 916. The opinion of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia, denying petitioner's motions for new trial under Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b) (R. 1460-1468; Appendix B, pp. 89a-96a), is reported in 242 F. Supp. 390.

Jurisdiction.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was entered on July 16, 1965. A timely petition for rehearing was denied on October 1, 1965. The jurisdiction of the district court was based on diversity of citizenship and amount under 25 U. S. C. § 1352(a)(1). The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under 28 U. S. C. § 1254(1).

Questions Presented.

1. Whether the constitutional limitations on the standard of liability in libel actions, enunciated by the decision of this Court in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254 (1964), may be disregarded in reviewing a verdict and judgment rendered prior to the New York Times decision, on the ground that the constitutional question was not raised by the defendant at the antecedent trial.

2. Whether a publication charging, in substance, that the athletic director of a state university gave to the football coach of another state university confidential information calculated to affect the outcome of a forthcoming football game between the two schools is protected by the First Amendment, as interpreted by this Court in the New York Times and subsequent decisions.

3. Whether an award of $400,000 as punitive damages for libel, after a jury verdict of $3,000,000 in punitive damages, constituted, in the circumstances, an abridgement of freedom of the press or a taking of property without due process of law.

Constitutional and Statutory Provisions Involved.

The constitutional and statutory provisions involved are set forth in Appendix A, pp. 1a-4a.

Statement.

This is a libel action instituted by respondent against the petitioner on March 25, 1963, in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia demanding $5,000,000 in general damages and $5,000,000 punitive damages for the alleged defamation of respondent in an article published in The Saturday Evening Post of March 23, 1963.

The article (R. 1407-1410; Appendix D, pp. 101a-104a) entitled "The Story of a College Football Fix" and subtitled "A Shocking Report of How Wally Butts and 'Bear' Bryant Rigged a Game Last Fall," asserted that on September 14, 1962, eight days before the opening game of the football season between the University of Georgia and the University of Alabama, George Burnett, an insurance salesman in Atlanta, while dialing a local telephone number, was accidentally connected into a long distance telephone call from respondent at that local number to Paul Bryant in Tuscaloosa, Alabama. Respondent, the former head coach of the football team of the University of Georgia, was then athletic director of the University. Bryant was the head coach of the football team of Alabama.

According to the article:

> Burnett listened to the conversation between Butts and Bryant and heard Butts give Bryant detailed information about Georgia's team and the plays and formations it would use against Alabama in the forthcoming game.
>
> Occasionally, in response to Bryant's questions, Burnett heard Butts say "I don't know about that. I'll have to find out." The conversation ended with Bryant telling Butts that he would telephone him at home the next Sunday.

Burnett made notes of what he heard but decided to forget the incident and put his notes away.

Alabama won the football game 35-0, its team exhibiting familiarity with Georgia's plays and tactics.

After brooding about this until early January, Burnett decided to tell his story and exhibit his notes to Johnny Griffith, the head coach of Georgia's team. Griffith reported this information and gave Burnett's notes to the University authorities, precipitating an investigation in which Burnett cooperated and in the course of which Butts resigned as athletic director.

In an editorial accompanying the article, the Post's editors referred to it as "the story of one fixed game of college football", asserting that the "corrupt were two men—Butts and Bryant—employed to educate and to guide young men."

Admitting the publication of the article, petitioner denied that it was published "wilfully, maliciously and falsely," as averred by the respondent (R. 22, 26) and also pleaded truth as a defense (R. 27)—a plea that the trial court ruled the defendant had the burden of establishing by a preponderance of evidence (R. 44, 1347).

At the trial it was established by records of the telephone company, and was not denied by respondent, that Butts telephoned Bryant on September 13,[1] the call lasting 15 minutes (R. 165-167, 1416). It was also proved and not denied that Bryant called Butts at his home the following Sunday, the call lasting one hour and seven minutes (R. 168-169, 1417). There was conflicting evidence, however, as to whether Butts gave Bryant any information about Georgia's team, formations and plays and as to the value of the information that Burnett, according to his prior statement, his notes and his testimony, heard Butts give. There also was dispute as to the adequacy of the Post's investigation of Burnett's story prior to its acceptance and publication and as to the publication policy followed by the Post under its recently changed command.

1. The article inaccurately fixed the date of the call as September 14, but Burnett's notes and testimony both fixed the date correctly as September 13 (R. 178, 189).

The District Court held that petitioner's evidence in support of its plea of truth sufficed to present a question for the jury, declining to direct a verdict for the plaintiff on that issue (R. 480-488). It charged the jury, in accordance with its prior ruling (R. 44) that the defendant had the burden of proving the truth of the "sting of the libel" by a preponderance of evidence (R. 1347, 1349); that unless the defendant proved the statements to be true, they were libelous per se (R. 1348-1350); that malice was "to be inferred" (R. 1353); and that "the law will presume that anyone so libeled must have suffered damage" (R. 1353). The jury also was instructed that where "it is established that the defendant was inspired by actual malice in the publication of the defamatory matter, the jury, in its discretion, may, but is not required to award punitive damages" (R. 1356). Actual malice, the court charged, "encompasses the notion of ill will, spite, hatred and an intent to injure one" and "also denotes a wanton or reckless indifference or culpable negligence with regard to the rights of others" (R. 1356).

On August 20, 1963, the jury returned a verdict in favor of respondent, awarding him $60,000 general damages and $3,000,000 punitive damages (R. 1371). Petitioner filed a timely motion for new trial, contending inter alia that the verdict for punitive damages was invalid under the First, Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution. On January 14, 1964, the District Court denied petitioner's constitutional claims on the ground that they represented only an attack on the Georgia statute allowing punitive damages and, as such, should have been raised prior to verdict (225 F. Supp. at 920; Appendix B, p. 83a). However, the court found the amount of the punitive damages to be "grossly excessive" (225 F. Supp. at 920; Appendix B, p. 83a) and granted petitioner's motion for new trial conditioned on respondent failing to remit that portion of the punitive damages in excess of $400,000 within 20 days (225 F. Supp. at 922; Appendix B, p. 88a). Respondent filed the remittitur (R. 103). On January 22, 1964, the District Court entered judgment for $460,000 against petitioner (R. 105). Petitioner filed a notice of appeal to the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit on January 24, 1964 (R. 106).

On February 28, 1964, petitioner moved again for a new trial under Rule 60(b)(2) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure on the ground of newly discovered evidence (R. 1428-1455). While this motion was pending, this Court, on March 9, 1964, decided New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254. Thereafter, on March 23, 1964, petitioner filed an additional motion for new trial under Rule 60(b) contending that the respondent as Director of Athletics of the University of Georgia was a public official within the meaning of the New York Times decision and thus precluded from recovering for a statement relating to his official conduct without proof that the statement was published with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not; that the definition of "actual malice" given the jury by the District Court did not conform to this requirement; and that the evidence at the trial did not suffice to prove malice in this sense with the "convincing clarity" required by the Times decision.[2]

---

2. The additional motion for new trial under Rule 60(b) was inadvertently omitted from the printed record. It is, however, included in the certified record filed in this Court with this petition and, for the convenience of the Court, is reproduced herein as Appendix C, pp. 97a-100a.

Though the issue had not been litigated as such at the trial, the record showed or it was subject to judicial notice that the University of Georgia is a state institution operated by the Board of Regents of the University System (Ga. Code Ann. §§ 32-101 et seq.); that the respondent was employed as the Director of Athletics of the University by the separately incorporated Athletic Association, an organization directed by faculty members and alumni which is an agent of and employed by the Board of Regents (R. 262, 1161-1165; see Allen v. Regents, 304 U. S. 439, 443, 452 [1938]); that by virtue of his position respondent was also a member of the faculty (R. 1466); that he received a salary of $12,000 per annum from the Association (R. 1162, 1165), part of his salary being paid directly by the University subject to teacher retirement (R. 810, 1123); and that his duties were to supervise the entire athletic program of the University, including the scheduling and location of intercollegiate games in all sports, planning and budgeting, the adding of new athletic facilities and ticket sales (R. 569, 654-655).

The District Court denied the motions for new trial on April 7, 1964, ruling both that the respondent was not a public official within the principle of the New York Times decision and that "there was ample evidence from which a jury could have concluded that there was reckless disregard by defendant of whether the article was false or not" (242 F. Supp. at 395; Appendix B, p. 96a). Petitioner filed a notice of appeal from this decision on April 10, 1964 (R. 1469).

On appeal from the judgment and the order denying the motion for new trial under Rule 60(b), petitioner urged the constitutional contentions rejected by the District Court on the motions for new trial and argued, in addition, that the judgment entered on the remittitur was repugnant to the Constitution.

The Court of Appeals affirmed the judgment by divided vote. The majority (Judge Spears, with the concurrence of Judge Brown) declined to rule upon petitioner's contentions based upon the New York Times decision on the ground that petitioner's failure to raise at the trial the constitutional questions that some of its attorneys knew were being litigated in the Times case "clearly waived any right it may have had to challenge the verdict and judgment on any of the constitutional grounds asserted in Times" (Appendix B, pp. 20a-21a). Ignoring the constitutional attack on the verdict, the Court also held that there was "ample basis for the trial court's judgment" in selecting "the sum of $400,000 as the maximum which the law would accept to deter Curtis from repeating the trespass or to compensate the wounded feelings of Butts" (Appendix B, p. 32a); and that the requirement of the remittitur of the punitive damages held to be excessive was "a permissible course" that "does not infringe upon the Seventh Amendment's guaranty of jury trial" (Appendix B, pp. 31a-32a).

Judge Rives dissented on all points. In his view the respondent was a public official and the publication related to his official conduct, within the principle of New York Times (Appendix B, pp. 36a-46a); the trial court's instruction did not comply with the New York Times standard since it permitted "recovery on a showing of intent to inflict harm or even the culpably negligent infliction of harm, rather than intent to inflict harm through falsehood" (Appendix B, pp. 41a-42a); it was the duty of the District Court to give effect to the supervening decision of this Court by granting the motion for new trial (Appendix B, p. 46a) and the defendant may not be "said to have waived by 'silence' a constitutional right not enunciated at the time" (Appendix B, p. 42a).

Apart from the constitutional deficiency of the criterion of malice embodied in the District Court's instruction to the jury, Judge Rives also concluded that the $400,000 punitive award was a deprivation of property without due process and a prior restraint forbidden by the First Amendment; and that the jury verdict of $3,000,000 so reflected passion and prejudice that it could not be cured by the remittitur consistently with the Seventh Amendment. These grounds Judge Rives thought, were all properly presented in petitioner's attack upon the verdict and upon the District Court's denial of the motions for new trial.

A petition for rehearing before the Court of Appeals en banc, filed under Fifth Circuit Rule 25(a), was denied by the same panel of the Court by the same divided vote, the majority and the minority reiterating their positions in further opinions (Appendix B, pp. 62a-75a).

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT.

I.

In holding that the constitutional limitations on the standard of liability in libel actions, enunciated by the decision of this Court in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, may be disregarded in reviewing a verdict and judgment rendered prior to the Times decision on the ground that the question was not raised by the defendant at the antecedent trial, the Court of Appeals has decided an important federal question in a way that conflicts with applicable decisions of this Court and of the courts of other Circuits.

Ever since the early days of the Republic this Court has affirmed the duty of the courts of the United States to decide cases in accordance with the law prevailing at the time when they are called upon to render judgment, including, in the case of an appellate court, the time of the appellate judgment. United States v. The Schooner Peggy, 1 Cranch 103 (1801). The doctrine applies to "nisi prius and appellate tribunals alike" (Vandenbark v. Owens-Illinois Glass Co., 311 U. S. 538, 543 [1941]) and has been reaffirmed repeatedly upon a supervening change in the law governing the cause, whether the change was worked by treaty as in The Schooner Peggy, by constitutional amendment as in United States v. Chambers, 291 U. S. 217 (1934); Massey v. United States, 291 U. S. 608 (1934), by the repeal or the enactment of a statute, as in United States v. Tynen, 11 Wall. 88 (1870); United States v. Alabama, 362 U. S. 602 (1960); Hamm v. Rock Hill, 379 U. S. 306 (1964), by a novel interpretation of a statute as in Hormel v. Helvering, 312 U. S. 552 (1941); Helvering v. Richter, 312 U. S. 561 (1941); Uebersee Finanz-Korp. v. McGrath, 343 U. S. 205, 212-213 (1952) or by a judicial alteration of a rule of common law (Vandenbark v. Owens-Illinois Glass Co., supra).

That the rule governs when the change in law derives from a revised interpretation of the Constitution by this Court assuredly is not an open question. See Linkletter v. Walker, 381 U. S. 618, 622-629 (1965); Griffin v. California, 380 U. S. 609 (1965); White v. Maryland, 373 U. S. 59 (1963). Whether or not the change will be accorded retrospective operation in collateral attack upon a final judgment, it will, as this Court said in Linkletter "be given effect while a case is on direct review" (381 U. S. at 627).

The judicial duty thus defined by these decisions is not qualified by a requirement that supervening change in law must have been anticipated by the litigant who claims its benefit at stages of the litigation prior to the time when it occurred. Such a condition would be patently unthinkable in cases where the change is wrought by legislative action, since no ruling could be premised upon unenacted legislation. Cf. 149 Madison Avenue Corp. v. Asselta, 331 U. S. 795 (1947), modifying 331 U. S. 199 (1947); Alaska Juneau Gold Mining Co. v. Robertson, 331 U. S. 793 (1947); Bay Ridge Operating Co. v. Aaron, 334 U. S. 446, 477 (1948). The situation is no different when the change is brought about by a decision modifying the prevailing norm. Here, too, a lower court must make its rulings prior to the change under the law that is established at that time. A litigant wishing himself to challenge the prevailing rule may, to be sure, be asked to lay the groundwork of that challenge in the lower court, futile though his effort there may be. Cf. Yakus v. United States, 321 U. S. 414, 444-445 (1944). The higher court will thus obtain the benefit of ventilation of the issue in the court below before it must confront the novel question raised.[3] But neither this nor any other purpose of the legal system is subserved by insisting that a litigant anticipate a change he does not seek to bring about, under penalty of forfeiting its benefit if it should subsequently be ordained, while his case is still pending in the courts. Even a state rule of procedure must be shown to serve a valid interest of the state judicial system if it is relied on to foreclose consideration of a federal contention. Henry v. Mississippi, 379 U. S. 443 (1965). A federal court can surely have no greater freedom to decree a forfeiture of constitutional protection on a ground that serves no useful purpose in administration of the law.[4]

3. Petitioner's motion for new trial, filed under Rule 60(b) promptly following the New York Times decision and before this judgment became final (cf. Polites v. United States, 364 U. S. 426, 433 [1960]), afforded the District Court an opportunity to rule on the effect of that decision prior to the Court of Appeals' review.

That there was no anticipatory objection in Griffin, White, Helvering or Uebersee (supra pp. 10-11) is, we submit, decisive of the proposition that it may not be required as a pre-condition of invoking supervening judgments of this Court. This is the view of the three Circuit Courts which, anticipating or following this Court's decision in Linkletter held nonetheless that Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U. S. 643 (1961), governed in cases pending on direct review at the time of the Mapp decision, despite the absence of objection to the evidence when it was offered at the antecedent trial. United States ex rel. Carafas v. LaVallee, 334 F. 2d 331 (2d Cir. 1964), cert. denied, 381 U. S. 951 (1965); United States ex rel. West v. LaVallee, 335 F. 2d 230 (2d Cir. 1964); Dillon v. Peters, 341 F. 2d 337 (10th Cir. 1965); United States ex rel. Dalton v. Myers, 342 F. 2d 202 (3d Cir. 1965). State courts, facing the question on appeal, have reached the same decision on the issue. People v. Loria, 10 N. Y. 2d 368 (1961); State v. Smith, 37 N. J. 481 (1962); Commonwealth ex rel. Ensor v. Cummings, 416 Pa. 510 (1965);

---

4. Since the District Court, ruling on petitioner's motion for new trial under Rule 60(b), held the New York Times decision inapplicable to this cause, it is entirely clear that the anticipation of that issue at the trial by an objection to the charge could not in fact have altered the result.

cf. Commonwealth v. Jacobs, 346 Mass. 300 (1963); People v. Kitchens, 46 Cal. 2d 260, 262-263 (1956). The result has been the same in pending cases calling for the application of Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U. S. 1 (1964), and Griffin v. California; 380 U. S. 609 (1965). See People v. Roberts, — Cal. 2d —, 45 Cal. Rptr. 155 (1965); State v. Lanzo, 44 N. J. 560 (1965); People v. McLucas, 15 N. Y. 2d 167 (1965); cf. Tehan v. United States ex rel. Shott, 381 U. S. 923 (1965). So too under Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U. S. 478 (1964). See People v. Hillery, 62 Cal. 2d 692 (1965); King v. State, — Del. —, 212 A. 2d 722 (1965); State v. Clifton, — Ore. —, 401 P. 2d 697 (1965). For other Court of Appeals decisions giving effect to later rulings not anticipated by an earlier submission, see, e.g., Sulzbacher v. Continental Casualty Co., 88 F. 2d 122 (8th Cir. 1937); Ruppert v. Ruppert, 134 F. 2d 497 (D. C. Cir. 1942); United States v. O'Connor, 237 F. 2d 466, 471 (2d Cir. 1956).

The decision of the court below cannot be reconciled with this impressive body of authority and, dealing as it does with the respect to be accorded to decisions of this Court, it urgently demands review. The decision, to be sure, was cast in terms of finding "waiver" by petitioner. But the sole ground of "waiver" was the failure to advance in the trial court before this Court's decision in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan "the constitutional grounds asserted in Times" to the knowledge of one of petitioner's co-counsel (Appendix B, pp. 13a-18a, 21a). If, as we submit, there was no duty to anticipate the ruling of this Court in New York Times, there was no basis for the finding made. See, e.g., United States ex rel. Angelet v. Fay, 333 F. 2d 12, 16 (2d Cir. 1964), aff'd, 381 U. S. 654 (1965). United States ex rel. Durocher v. LaVallee, 330 F. 2d 303, 309-310 (2d Cir. 1964). Cf. England v. Louisiana State Board of Medical Examiners, 375 U. S. 411, 422 (1964); Aetna Insur- ance Co. v. Kennedy, 301 U. S. 389, 393 (1937). The reference to a "known right or privilege" in Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U. S. 458, 464 (1937) and Fay v. Noia, 372 U. S. 391, 439 (1963) envisages, of course, a right known to exist, not one merely asserted in another litigation. Indeed, the Circuit Court's concern with "waiver" added to the forfeiture that it decreed the spectacle of an inquiry into the extent to which the various attorneys for petitioner were aware of the issues tendered in New York Times. Far from supporting the determination of the Court, that "unseemly trial of Curtis' lawyers" (Rives, J., dissenting, Appendix B, p. 74a) adds further reason for review.

That the New York Times decision broke new ground in holding that the First and Fourteenth Amendments impose limits on state libel law, as well as in its formulation of the nature of the limits they impose, is not a point we feel obliged to labor here. See New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 268, 279, 283, 297, 299 (1964); cf. Abernathy v. Patterson, 295 F. 2d 452, 456 (5th Cir. 1961).

We submit, therefore, that the Court of Appeals was legally obliged to test this judgment in the light of this Court's ruling in the New York Times decision. But even if the absence of an anticipatory objection at the trial engendered a discretion to apply or disregard the supervening judgment of this Court "as may be just under the circumstances" (28 U. S. C. § 2106; see Hormel v. Helvering, 312 U. S. 552, 556-557 [1941]), we think it clear that such discretion was abused by the decision to decline review. For here the issue was presented to the District Court at the first reasonable opportunity following this Court's decision (cf. Herndon v. Georgia, 295 U. S. 441, 444 [1935]; Polites v. United States, 364 U. S. 426 [1960]); the District Court decided it upon the merits, its ruling making clear that any earlier submission would have had no influence on the result;[5] and only the unfounded ground of waiver was adduced to justify denial of review. Even after a plea of nolo contendere, this Court has been astute to grant an opportunity to a defendant to present a possible defense established by a subsequent decision. United Brotherhood of Carpenters v. United States, 330 U. S. 395, 411-412 (1947). Cf. United States v. Ohio Power Co., 353 U. S. 98 (1957); Murphy v. Waterfront Commission, 378 U. S. 52 (1964). No less solicitude is due to a defendant who has not confessed to judgment when enormous punishment has been imposed and the supervening ruling goes to First Amendment rights.

II.

The District Court in ruling on the motion for new trial under Rule 60(b) held that the publication here in suit was not protected by the ruling of this Court in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan and subsequent decisions because the respondent was not a "public official" within the meaning of the rule this Court laid down. The only other Judge who passed upon the issue, Judge Rives dissenting

5. The Court of Appeals in denying the petition for rehearing, regarded as "persuasive" the respondent's suggestion that petitioner pleaded truth as a defense rather than raising constitutional defenses "in order to get the right to open and close the arguments" (Appendix B, pp. 67a-68a). The right to open and close was, however, a concomitant of the burden of proof which the Georgia law placed on defendant if the plea of truth was made (R. 44; Ga. Code Ann. § 105-1801). If a constitutional defense had been coupled with that plea, there is no support whatever for the view that the burden would have shifted to the plaintiff. In fact, the defense presumably would have been stricken upon motion. Moreover, if that defense could not have been coupled with the plea and the defendant had to choose between a plea that it thought valid and an as yet unestablished defense, as the Court appears to intimate below, it is unthinkable to find a waiver of federal right in the choice to rely upon the plea. Cf. Fay v. Noia, 372 U. S. 391, 439 (1963); Green v. United States, 355 U. S. 184, 192-194 (1957); England v. Louisiana State Board of Medical Examiners, 375 U. S. 411, 422 (1964); Whitus v. Balkcom, 333 F. 2d 496 (5th Cir. 1964).

in the court below, squarely rejected this conclusion. The issue thus presented plainly is a question calling for this Court's review.

The question is, indeed, akin to that sub judice in Rosenblatt v. Baer, No. 38, this Term, argued here on October 20, 1965. Here, as in Rosenblatt, the trial court's charge did not conform to the requirements of New York Times; Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64 (1964); Moity v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 201 (1964); Henry v. Pearson and Henry v. Collins, 380 U. S. 356 (1965), if the respondent's official position brought the publication within the constitutional privilege that those decisions have established. In Rosenblatt the plaintiff was employed by County Commissioners to operate a public recreation area and the publication impugned his honesty in the discharge of those official duties. Here the respondent was employed as the Athletic Director of a State University by an Athletic Association functioning as agent of the Board of Regents and the publication impugned his fidelity in the discharge of the public trust that he assumed. The considerations deemed to warrant this Court's review in Rosenblatt accordingly are applicable here.

If, as we submit, the rule of New York Times applies to any publication critical of the conduct of public employees in the discharge of their duties of employment, since there is a public interest in the way that they discharge their duties, it is clear that a reversal is demanded here. The man who wished his tombstone to record that he was "father of the University of Virginia" (Randall, The Life of Thomas Jefferson, vol. iii, pp. 563-564 [1858]) would surely be amazed by the conclusion of the District Court that the Director of Athletics of a State University was not a "public official," within the meaning of a constitutional principle designed to preserve free discussion of the way in which all public trusts may be discharged.

It is, of course, irrelevant that the District Court considered that "there was ample evidence from which a jury could have concluded that there was a reckless disregard of whether the article was false or not" (242 F. Supp. at 395; Appendix B, p. 96a). The Court did not submit that question to the jury and its verdict made no finding on the issue. The ruling that there was a jury question on defendant's plea of truth, despite the burden of persuasion placed on the defendant, applies a fortiori on this record if the plaintiff must establish reckless disregard.

III.

Whether or not the rule of liability applied in the District Court satisfied the constitutional requirements defined by the New York Times and subsequent decisions, the verdict and the judgment in this cause present substantial questions of profound importance to the freedom of the press.

First: The jury verdict of $3,000,000 punitive damages for a publication causing injury assessed at $60,000 was not only "grossly excessive", as the District Court has found; it contravened the First Amendment and entailed a deprivation of due process. These points were made against the verdict by the motion for new trial (R. 46-48) and were, therefore, plainly open in the Court of Appeals on appeal from the judgment.

Conceding, arguendo, that a punitive award in libel cases, imposed as a deterrent to the defendant and to others and "to protect the community" (R. 1356), is not per se an unconstitutional method of regulating publication (cf. Day v. Woodworth, 13 How. 362, 370-371 [1851]), it is clear that "the power to regulate must be so exercised as not, in attaining a permissible end, unduly to infringe the protected freedoms." Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U. S. 296, 304 (1940). For that reason, even though a measure burdening the freedom of expression serves a valid end, it must be tested by "close analysis and critical judgment" (Speiser v. Randall, 357 U. S. 513, 520 [1958]) and "viewed in the light of less drastic means for achieving the same basic purpose." Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U. S. 479, 488 (1960). See also, e.g., Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U. S. 233 (1936); N. A. A. C. P. v. Alabama, 357 U. S. 449 (1958); Smith v. California, 361 U. S. 147, 150-151 (1959); Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U. S. 516 (1960); Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U. S. 51 (1965). As Mr. Justice Brandeis said long ago "a police measure may be unconstitutional merely because the remedy, although effective as a means of protection, is unduly harsh or oppressive." Whitney v. California, 274 U. S. 357, 377 (1927) (concurring opinion). Indeed, quite apart from the protection of the First Amendment, this Court has held that a penalty or money judgment deprives of property without due process if it is "so extravagant in amount as to outrun the bounds of reason and result in sheer oppression". Life & Casualty Co. v. McCray, 291 U. S. 566, 571 (1934).

Since the First and the Fourteenth Amendments apply to all the agencies of government (N. A. A. C. P. v. Alabama, 357 U. S. 449, 463 [1958]; Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U. S. 58, 68 [1963]), a jury verdict must be tested by these standards, no less than a judicial or administrative action or an act of legislation.

So tested, we believe it clear that the $3,000,000 verdict, representing 65% of the defendant's retained earnings (R. 1389), was in violation of the Constitution. The verdict plainly was designed to put defendant out of business and was thus, as Judge Rives said below (Appendix B, pp. 51a-52a), equivalent to a prior restraint. Prior restraint or not, it takes no argument to show that such a penalty, imposed in addition to full compensation for all injury believed to be inflicted on the plaintiff and the mitigation of such injury involved in the mere fact of verdict, "unduly" infringed the "protected freedom" and inflicted "sheer oppression". Nothing could be better calculated than a verdict of this kind to impose "the pall of fear and timidity" upon the press and thus create "an atmosphere in which the First Amendment freedoms cannot survive". New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. at 278. The maximum penalty against a corporation for criminal libel is fixed by Georgia law at a fine of $1,000. Ga. Code Ann. §§ 26-2101; 27-2506. That legislative judgment as to what is necessary to protect the community provides, in our submission, the perspective for appraising the constitutional validity of this award.

This jury verdict, therefore, even more than that in New York Times supplies what Mr. Justice Black, concurring in that judgment, called "dramatic proof . . . that state libel laws threaten the very existence of an American press virile enough to publish unpopular views on public affairs and bold enough to criticize the conduct of public officials" (376 U. S. at 294). The only way that threat can be removed, short of according the absolute privilege this Court declined in Times to find embodied in the First Amendment, is to hold that a jury's compensatory verdict must bear reasonable relationship to the amount of damage shown and that a punitive additional award must be proportionate to the offense committed, as that offense is measured by the damages incurred. The punitive verdict here did not comport with these requirements and thus was tainted by a violation of the Constitution.

Second: If the verdict was, as we submit, unconstitutional, it was not saved by the remittitur required by the District Court. For even though the use of a remittitur may be too well established to be "reconsidered or disturbed at this late day," as this Court reluctantly declared in Dimick v. Schiedt, 293 U. S. 474, 485 (1935), it is no less established that a verdict based upon a jury's prejudice cannot be cured. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. S. M. Ry. v. Moquin, 283 U. S. 520, 521 (1931); National Surety Co. v. Jean, 61 F. 2d 197, 198 (6th Cir. 1932); Brabham v. Mississippi, 96 F. 2d 210 (5th Cir. 1938); Ford Motor Co. v. Mahone, 205 F. 2d 267 (4th Cir. 1953). A verdict violative of the Constitution surely is no less incurably defective, if, indeed, the jury's prejudice is not in such a case to be presumed.

The vice of such a verdict is shown plainly in this case. For when the trial court found the jury's verdict to be "grossly excessive", it did not ask itself what size of verdict might comport with constitutional requirements and show a due regard for the importance of preserving freedom of the press. It asked, instead, what was the largest verdict "ever sustained for punitive damages by the Appellate Courts" and, finding that figure to be $175,000 (of which $100,000 was the largest sum awarded against any one defendant) in Reynolds v. Pegler, 223 F. 2d 429 (2d Cir. 1955), it expressed its "considered opinion that the maximum sum" that "should have been awarded . . . should be $400,000" (225 F. Supp. at 919-920; Appendix B, pp. 81a-83a). That the magnitude of the invalid jury verdict exerted a substantial influence upon the Court's determination is, therefore, undeniable. The Court's award was inescapably a "fruit" of the illegal action of the jury. Cf., e.g., Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U. S. 471, 484 (1963).

Third: Even if the judgment must be tested by the District Court's award, without regard to the invalid verdict of the jury, we contend that the punishment imposed is repugnant to the Constitution.

In assessing the sum of $400,000 as "the maximum" that "should have been awarded", the Court, as we have said, employed no standard other than its search for the highest punitive award that an appellate court had thus far sustained and, finding that statistic, more than doubled the top figure that it found. Such a determination, taking no account of the effect of such a punishment upon defendant or of the threat of like awards on other publications revealed no solicitude at all for First Amendment guarantees. The size of the award, no less than its unprincipled assessment, thus impinges far too heavily and arbitrarily upon the freedom of the press to preserve the "breathing space" required by that First Amendment freedom "to survive". N. A. A. C. P. v. Button, 371 U. S. 415, 433 (1963).

CONCLUSION.

For the foregoing reasons, it is respectfully submitted that this petition for a writ of certiorari should be granted.

HERBERT WECHSLER,
PHILIP H. STRUBING,
Attorneys for Petitioner,
Curtis Publishing Company.

PEPPER, HAMILTON & SCHEETZ,
KILPATRICK, CODY, ROGERS,
MCCLATCHEY & REGENSTEIN,
Of Counsel.

APPENDIX A.

Constitutional and Statutory Provisions Involved.

CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES.

AMENDMENT I.

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

AMENDMENT V.

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation."

AMENDMENT XIV.

Section 1. "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

UNITED STATES CODE TITLE 28.

§ 2106 Determination "The Supreme Court or any other court of appellate jurisdiction may affirm, modify, vacate, set aside or reverse any judgment, decree, or order of a court lawfully brought before it for review, and may remand the cause and direct the entry of such appropriate judgment, decree or order, or require such further proceedings to be had as may be just under the circumstances. June 25, 1948, c. 646, 62 Stat. 963.

FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE.

Rule 60(b).

Mistakes; Inadvertence; Excusable Neglect; Newly Discovered Evidence; Fraud, etc. "On motion and upon such terms as are just, the court may relieve a party or his legal representative from a final judgment, order, or proceeding for the following reasons: (1) mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect; (2) newly discovered evidence which by due diligence could not have been discovered in time to move for a new trial under Rule 59(b); (3) fraud (whether heretofore denominated intrinsic or extrinsic) misrepresentation, or other misconduct of an adverse party; (4) the judgment is void; (5) the judgment has been satisfied, released, or discharged, or a prior judgment upon which it is based has been reversed or otherwise vacated, or it is no longer equitable that the judgment should have prospective application; or (6) any other reason justifying relief from the operation of the judgment. The motion shall be made within a reasonable time, and for reasons

(1), (2), and (3) not more than one year after the judgment, order, or proceeding was entered or taken. A motion under this subdivision (b) does not affect the finality of a judgment or suspend its operation. This rule does not limit the power of a court to entertain an independent action to relieve a party from a judgment, order or proceeding, or to grant relief to a defendant not actually personally notified as provided in Title 28, U. S. C., § 1655, or to set aside a judgment for fraud upon the court. Writs of coram nobis, coram vobis, audita querela, and bills of review and bills in the nature of a bill of review, are abolished, and the procedure for obtaining any relief from a judgment shall be by motion as prescribed in these rules or by an independent action. As amended Dec. 27, 1946, eff. March 19, 1948; Dec. 29, 1948, eff. Oct. 20, 1949."

GEORGIA CODE ANNOTATED.

§ 26-2101 (340 P. C.)

LIBEL DEFINED; PUNISHMENT.—A libel is a malicious defamation, expressed either by printing or writing, or signs, pictures or the like, tending to blacken the memory of one who is dead, or the honesty, virtue, integrity, or reputation of one who is alive and thereby expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule. Every person convicted of this offense shall be punished as for a misdemeanor. (Cobb. 812.)

§ 27-2506 (1065 P. C.)

MISDEMEANORS, HOW PUNISHED.—Except where otherwise provided, every crime declared to be a misdemeanor shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $1,000, confinement in the county or other jail not to exceed six months, to work on the public works in such public works camp or other appropriate institution under the jurisdiction of the State Board of Corrections not to exceed 12 months, any one or more of these punishments in the discretion of the trial judge. (Acts 1865-6, p. 233; 1878-9, p. 54; 1895, p. 64; 1908, p. 1119; 1956, pp. 161, 168; 1957, pp. 477, 482.)

§ 32-101

CREATION OF BOARD OF REGENTS. CORPORATE NAME OF TRUSTEES OF UNIVERSITY OF GEORGIA CHANGED.—There is hereby constituted a department of the State Government of Georgia, to be known as the "Board of Regents of the University System of Georgia." The name of the corporation heretofore established and existing under the name and style, "Trustees of the University of Georgia," is hereby changed to "Regents of the University System of Georgia" (Acts 1931, pp. 7, 20).

§ 32-113

GOVERNMENT OF UNIVERSITY OF GEORGIA.—The management and government of the University of Georgia, and all of its branches named in section 32-103 are vested in the Board of Regents (Acts 1931, pp. 7, 21).

§ 105-1801 (4488)

PLEA OF AUTHORITY UNDER LAW; EFFECT AS TO RIGHT TO OPEN AND CONCLUDE.—In every case of tort, if the defendant was authorized by law to do the act complained of, he may plead the same as a justification; by such plea he admits the act to be done, and shall be entitled to all the privileges of one holding the affirmative of the issue; but such plea shall not give to the defendant the right to open and conclude the argument before the jury, unless it shall be filed before the plaintiff submits any evidence to the jury trying the case (Acts 1888, p. 35).

APPENDIX B.

The Decisions Below.

IN THE

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS

FOR THE FIFTH CIRCUIT.

No. 21491.

CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,

Appellant-Appellee,

versus

WALLACE BUTTS,

Appellee-Appellant.

(AND REVERSE TITLE)

APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA.

(July 16, 1965.)

Before RIVES and BROWN, Circuit Judges, and SPEARS, District Judge.

SPEARS, District Judge: This is a libel suit. Curtis Publishing Company[1] published an article in the March 23, 1963 issue of the Saturday Evening Post[2] entitled "The Story of a College Football Fix", characterized by the Post

1. Hereinafter referred to as either "Curtis", "defendant" or the "Post".

2. Also referred to herein as the "Post".

in the sub-title as "A Shocking Report of How Wally Butts and 'Bear' Bryant Rigged a Game Last Fall."

On March 25, 1963, Wally Butts,[3] former Athletic Director of the University of Georgia, instituted this action against Curtis. In August, 1963, the case was heard before a jury, which returned a verdict against Curtis for $60,000 general and $3,000,000 punitive damages. Conditioned upon the failure of Butts to remit that portion of the award for punitive damages in excess of $400,000, the trial court granted Curtis' motion for new trial. At the same time, Curtis' motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict was denied. On January 22, 1964, after Butts had filed a remittitur, Curtis' motion for new trial was denied, and judgment for Butts in the amount of $460,000 was entered. Thereafter, Curtis filed motions for new trial under Rule 60(b), F. R. Civ. P., which were denied on April 7, 1964. This appeal is taken from the judgment of January 22, 1964, and from the trial court's denial of Curtis' motions for judgment notwithstanding the verdict and for new trial. We affirm.

Curtis publishes various magazines including the Post. Prior to the publication of the story in question, the editor-in-chief, undoubtedly hoping to attract more readers, had decided to "change the image" of the magazine by making it an "expose" type, and embarking upon a policy of "sophisticated muckraking", in order "to provoke people" and "make them mad".[4]

The article[5] involved was based upon a claim by one George Burnett that on September 13, 1962 he had acci-

---

3. Sometimes hereinafter referred to as "Butts" or "plaintiff".

4. See note 25, infra.

5. The following editorial comment was inserted at the beginning of the story:

"Not since the Chicago White Sox threw the 1919 World Series has there been a sports story as shocking as this one. This is the story of one fixed game of college football.

dentally overheard, and made notes of, a long-distance telephone conversation between Butts and "Bear" Bryant, football coach at the University of Alabama, in which Butts divulged certain information about football plays the University of Georgia would use in its opening game against Alabama. Georgia was subsequently defeated 35-0.

About four months after the alleged telephone conversation Burnett contacted various people, including Georgia football coach Johnny Griffith, and then decided to tell his story to the Post. A writer, Frank Graham, Jr., was assigned by the Post to investigate and write the story, and an Atlanta sports editor was retained to advise him. Graham never saw Burnett's notes, as they were at the time in the possession of Georgia school officials; he did not interview a witness known by him to have allegedly discussed the notes with Burnett on the same day the telephone conversation purportedly took place; he never viewed the game films; and neither he nor anyone else on behalf of the Post ever contacted Butts or Bryant. He agreed

---

"Before the University of Georgia played the University of Alabama last September 2, Wally Butts, athletic director of Georgia, gave Paul (Bear) Bryant, head coach of Alabama, Georgia's plays, defensive patterns, all the significant secrets Georgia's football team possessed.

"The corrupt here were not professional ballplayers gone wrong, as in the 1919 Black Sox scandal. The corrupt were not disreputable gamblers, as in the scandals continually afflicting college basketball. The corrupt were two men—Butts and Bryant—employed to educate and to guide young men.

"How prevalent is the fixing of college football games? How often do teachers sell out their pupils? We don't know—yet. For now we can only be appalled.—THE EDITORS."

In the story itself it is stated, among other things, that "(t)he Georgia players, their moves analyzed and forecast like those of rats in a maze, took a frightful physical beating". Georgia coach Johnny Griffith was quoted as saying bitterly to a friend, "I never had a chance." The next sentence read: "When a fixer works against you, that's the way he likes it."

that both he and Curtis knew publication of the article "would ruin Coach Butts' career".

On March 11, 1963, eleven days before the article was published, Curtis was informed by telegram and letter, both sent by Butts' counsel, of the "absolute falsity of the charges" contained in the proposed story. The record does not disclose that any additional investigation was initiated, and the telegram and letter went unanswered. In addition, a long-distance telephone appeal that the article not be published, made by Butts' daughter prior to publication, was rejected. After the article was published, Curtis refused a demand that it publish a retraction.

The Post took the position from the beginning that the statements made in the article concerning Butts were true, and that because of their nature it had exercised great care by thoroughly checking every significant source of information as to their truthfulness and accuracy, in advance of publication.

Curtis chose not to use as a witness either the author of the article or any of its editors who had made contributions to the article after it had been submitted. Nor did it use the Atlanta sports editor who had assisted in the preparation of the story. As one of its principal witnesses it called upon George Burnett, who was known by Curtis to have been convicted of writing bad checks and to be on probation at the time he claimed to have listened in on the conversation.

Both Butts and Bryant testified. Each emphatically denied the charges contained in the article and stated that there was never any conversation between them having as its purpose the fixing or rigging of any football game. Several football players, past and present, expressed their opinions to the effect that the outcome of a football game cannot be rigged or fixed without participation by the players themselves, and that there is no way in which two coaches can rig or fix the outcome of a football game without the players' knowledge. Other "experts" stated their opinion that the information contained in the "so-called" Burnett notes would not be of any assistance at all to the University of Alabama in preparing for its game with the University of Georgia. In several instances Butts' witnesses denied direct quotations attributed to them in the article.

In an opinion written by the district judge the facts are stated in some detail,[6] and no useful purpose could be served by repeating them here, although portions thereof pertinent to specific issues later discussed may be utilized. It is significant, however, at this point, to say that in view of the verdict it rendered, the jury undoubtedly accepted Butts' version that the story was "willfully, maliciously and falsely" published, as a result of which he has suffered substantial injury to his "peace, happiness and feelings", as well as to his "honor, reputation and integrity". As the trial judge saw it: "The article was clearly defamatory and extremely so. . . . The guilt of the defendant was so clearly established by the evidence in the case so as to have left the jury no choice but to find the defendant liable."[7] We wholeheartedly agree with that appraisal.

The Issues Presented.

Curtis submits twenty-eight specifications of error which are argued in its brief under ten propositions. The issues involved are: (1) Was the article libelous per se? (2) Does the court's judgment violate Curtis' rights under the First, Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments? (3) Did the arguments of Butts' counsel, not objected to at the trial, require a new trial? (4) Did the court err in excluding certain testimony offered to impeach the credibility of Butts and the witness John Carmichael? (5) Were the extra-judicial statements of George Burnett, and the statements made to him by third person, properly excluded? (6) Did the trial court commit plain error in instructing the jury? (7) Did the trial court err in refusing to charge the jury that it should construe Butts' testimony "most strongly against him"? (8) Did the trial court err in refusing to charge the jury that it should disregard the entire testimony of any witness whom it found to have knowingly and wilfully testified falsely? (9) Does the "newly discovered evidence" offered in Curtis' motion under Rule 60(b), F. R. Civ. P. require a new trial? (10) Is the award of punitive damages so excessive that it cannot be cured by the remittitur?

---

6. Butts v. Curtis Publishing Co. (N. D. Ga. 1964), 225 F. Supp. 916.

7. Id. at 919.

THE ARTICLE AS LIBELOUS PER SE.

The trial judge charged the jury that the article was libelous per se. This was objected to by Curtis on the ground that Butts was not actively engaged in the profession of a football coach at the time of publication, and, that no special damage was shown.[8] Curtis took the same position in its motions for directed verdict and for judgment notwithstanding the verdict.

Curtis' contention in this regard cannot be sustained. This is a libel suit as distinguished from a slander suit.[9]

---

8. In support of this proposition, Curtis cites—Weatherholt v. Howard, 143 Ga. 41, 84 S. E. 119 (1915); Van Epps v. Jones, 50 Ga. 238 (1873); Mell v. Edge, 68 Ga. App. 314, 22 S. E. 2d 738 (1942); Haggard v. Shaw, 100 Ga. App. 813, 112 S. E. 2d 286 (1959); and Estes v. Sterchi Bros. Stores, 50 Ga. App. 619, 179 S. E. 222 (1935). These cases, however, appear to be "delinquent debtor cases" referred to in note 11, infra.

9. Ga. Code Ann. § 105-701 (libel), § 105-702 (slander).

Under Georgia law, a plaintiff may recover in a libel action where the defamation is apparent from the writing itself, without the necessity of alleging or proving special damages,[10] and it is not necessary that he be engaged in the pursuit of his trade, business or profession at the time of publication.[11]

---

10. Floyd v. Atlanta Newspapers, Inc., 102 Ga. App. 840, 117 S. E. 2d 906 (1960), the leading case in Georgia, states that words which, if merely spoken, would not be actionable in absence of special damage, may be libelous when printed if false and tend to injure reputation and bring one into public hatred, contempt or ridicule. Ordinarily, only general damages need be alleged in an action for libel.

11. Ga. Code Ann. § 105-701, defines libel as the "false and malicious defamation of another, expressed in print . . . tending to injure the reputation of an individual and exposing him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule . . .", without the requirement that the charges be calculated to injure one in his trade, office or profession. A newspaper libel is described in Ga. Code Ann. § 105-703, as being "any false and malicious defamation of another in any newspaper, magazine or periodical tending to injure the reputation of any individual and expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule", again without the requirement that the charges refer to one's trade, office or profession. Only in the area of slander is a reference to one's trade, office or profession required. Ga. Code Ann., § 105-702.

The case of Floyd v. Atlanta Newspapers, Inc., supra, note 10, in its definitive statement of the Georgia law of libel explains that written words are sufficient to constitute libel per se if they tend to bring a man into public hatred, contempt or ridicule. Damages will be presumed from the nature of the words themselves and their harmful effect and no proof of special damages is necessary. Where the only possible construction is that the words are libelous per se, upon proof thereof, the only remaining question for the jury is that of damages. See also Restatement of the Law Second, Torts, Tentative Draft No. 11, April 15, 1965, Section 569, wherein Georgia is named as one of the majority of states following this rule, and, as explained in the notes to Restatement of the Law of Torts, 1938, Vol. III, Sec. 569, Comment e, pp. 168-9, it may be libelous to impute misconduct in one's trade, etc., although he is at the time no longer engaged in the pursuit of the trade, business or profession.

Curtis cites many cases in support of its position (see note 8, supra. However, these are part of a group of cases known in Georgia as the "delinquent debtor cases", and, as explained by the Floyd case, stand in a class by themselves, and have no bearing on causes of action other than those involving charges that one owes a debt and refuses

But even if the law necessitated a showing that Butts was actively engaged in the profession of a football coach at the time of publication, we think this requirement has been satisfied.

The story was purchased by Curtis on February 22, 1963. Butts resigned as Athletic Director effective February 28, 1963. The article was published in the March 23, 1963 issue of the Post. Thus it may be assumed that Butts was at least temporarily out of work on the day of publication, but it hardly follows that he had completely abandoned the coaching business.

Actually, Curtis admitted in its answer that Butts "has enjoyed a national reputation as a successful and respected member of the coaching profession", and that he "has been approached and offered employment as head football coach by several colleges and professional football teams in the country due entirely to his reputation as a successful member and leader in his profession." This admission, in and of itself, would indicate a recognition that Butts was still identified with some phase of football activities.

Upon Curtis' insistence, its second defense asserting that the statements contained in the article were true, was held to be a valid plea of justification. By interposing this plea, Curtis admitted a prima facie case,[12] but gained the valuable right to open and close. The complaint alleged that "plaintiff's career as a member of the football coaching profession had been ruined and destroyed by this scurrilous and contemptible defamation." (Emphasis sup-to pay, or owes a debt long past due. In this isolated situation the charge is, as a matter of law, uniformly held in Georgia, not libelous per se, and it is in these cases that Curtis finds language to the effect that falsely spoken or written words that do not contain a charge made in reference to one's trade, office or profession are not actionable without proof of special damages.

---

12. See Ga. Code Ann. § 105-708 and § 105-1801; Baldwin v. Davis, 188 Ga. 587, 590, 4 S. E. 2d 458 (1939).

plied.) Without regard to any question as to whether the plea constitutes an admission that the remarks were made with malice, it is our view that it necessarily carries with it an admission, not only that the libelous statements were made by Curtis, but also that they were made in relation to Butts "as a member of the football coaching profession". Under all the circumstances, it is untenable to say that simply because Butts was temporarily out of a job at the time of publication, he was not actively engaged in the coaching business as a means of livelihood.[13]

We hold that the trial court correctly charged the jury that the article was libelous per se, and that he did not err in denying Curtis' motions for a directed verdict and for judgment notwithstanding the verdict.

Curtis' Constitutional Rights.

Curtis contends that the trial court's judgment violates and abridges its rights of freedom of speech and of the press guaranteed by the First, Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States. It relies upon the case of New York Times Company v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 84 Sup. Ct. 710, 11 L. Ed. 2d 686 (1964), decided subsequent to the trial of this case, in which it was held that in order for a public official in a libel suit to recover any damages he must prove that a statement against his official conduct was published "with actual malice—that is knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not". 376 U. S. at 279-80.

---

13. In the Missouri case of Clark v. McBaine, 299 Mo. 77, 252 S. W. 428 (1923), at 432, cited by Curtis, the Court stated that though the plaintiff "had been removed as a member of the faculty, . . . his profession, or means of a livelihood, was still that of a professor of law, and a writer of textbooks upon the law, and the gist of his damages . . . consisted of injury done to his standing as a professor and writer of law."

This holding, says Curtis, "drastically changed the constitutional principles applicable to libel actions", by announcing new safeguards which "make it manifestly clear not only that the rules of law which were applied in the trial of the instant case were unconstitutional, but also that the result reached by the jury is a patently unconstitutional result which cannot be permitted to stand."

Countering this, Butts says that the invocation of the constitutional defenses in libel cases has received emphatic and substantial attention by scholars and Courts over the years; that the Times case resulted in no fundamental change of law, but merely gave new sanctions to a long standing rule; and that in any event, Curtis did not invoke those defenses even though they are more broadly stated in the Georgia law than in the Times case.[14] Moreover, Butts emphasizes that the Times' constitutional grounds now asserted were not timely raised or preserved below. In fact, they were presented for the first time in the F. R. Civ. P. 60(b) motion filed on March 23, 1964, long after trial.

---

14. In support of his position, Butts cites: "Justice Black and First Amendment 'Absolutes'; A Public Interview," 37 N. Y. U. L. Rev. 349 (1962); C. L. Black, Jr., "Mr. Justice Black, the Supreme Court, and the Bill of Rights," Harpers, February, 1961, p. 63; Caldwell v. Crowell-Collier Pub. Co., (5th Cir. 1947), 161 F. 2d 333; Sweeney v. Schenectady Union Pub. Co., (2d Cir. 1941), 122 F. 2d 288, aff'd 316 U. S. 642 (1942); Henry v. Collins, 158 So. 2d 28 (Miss. 1963); Louisiana v. Garrison, 244 La. 787, 154 So. 2d 400 (1963); Louisiana v. Moity, 245 La. 546, 159 So. 2d 149 (1963); and other pre-Times defamation cases. He points out that the Supreme Court in Times recognizes that "a like rule" has existed for a number of years in some state courts; that the Kansas Supreme Court, in Kennedy v. Mid-Continent Telecasting, Inc., 193 Kans. 544, 394 P. 2d 400 (Kan. 1964), noted that the Times decision requires no change in the law; that the trial court said (note 23, infra) that Georgia provides this "like rule" by a statute granting a qualified privilege for "comments upon the acts of public men in their public capacity and with reference thereto", citing Ga. Code Ann. § 105-709(6); and that privilege can be lost by proof of actual malice, citing Ga. Code Ann. § 105-710.

The record reflects that Curtis did not object to the trial court's instructions.[15] The Times case was decided by the Alabama Supreme Court on August 30, 1962. A petition for writ of certiorari presenting constitutional questions identical to those now being urged by Curtis, was filed in the United States Supreme Court on November 21, 1962, four months prior to the filing of the complaint in this case on March 25, 1963.[16] Certiorari was granted in the Times case on January 7, 1963. The jury verdict in the instant case was returned on August 20, 1963, and the trial court's judgment thereon was entered the same day. A Birmingham, Alabama law firm, which represented the New York Times in the case brought against it by Sullivan, also, together with Curtis' General Counsel, represented Curtis in a libel suit Coach Bryant had filed against it in the United States District Court at Birmingham, Alabama. A member of this law firm had sent information to Curtis about the alleged telephone conversation between Butts and Bryant, and had talked with the author, Graham, about the matter prior to publication of the story. The same lawyer, together with another member of the firm, sat (as did the General Counsel for Curtis) at Curtis' Counsel table throughout the trial of this case.[17]

---

15. See Rule 51, F. R. Civ. P. Also see note 36, infra.

16. We have examined the petition for writ of certiorari presenting the constitutional questions, and find that it was filed by the New York Times Company on November 21, 1962. The brief for respondent in opposition was filed on December 15, 1962, and petitioner's reply thereto was filed on December 29, 1962.

17. The Birmingham law firm of Beddow, Embry and Beddow, which represented the New York Times in the Supreme Court of Alabama, is also shown to be counsel for the Times in the Supreme Court of the United States. Mr. Roderick Beddow of that firm represented Curtis in the case of Paul Bryant v. Curtis Publishing Company, in the United States District Court in Birmingham, and both he and Mr. T. Eric Embry of that firm sat, along with the General Counsel of Curtis, Mr. Philip H. Strubing, at the Curtis counsel table throughout the trial of this case. Butts' brief states,

While it is true that the Supreme Court did not decide the Times case until March 9, 1964, it would be contrary to reason and common sense to assume that there had not been, at all times during the pendency of this case, full communication among Curtis' counsel, particularly concerning trial strategy. The facts more than justify our conclusion that Curtis was fully aware when this suit was instituted, and certainly no later than the beginning of trial, that the constitutional questions it now argues had been for some time, and were still being, vigorously asserted in Times.

The Supreme Court said, in Michel v. Louisiana, 350 U. S. 91, 99, 100 L. ed. 83, 76 S. Ct. 158 (1955), that "(t)he test (in making a claim to a constitutional right) is whether the defendant has had 'a reasonable opportunity to have the issue as to the claimed right heard and determined by the . . . court.'" It then cited the case of Yakus v. United States, 321 U. S. 414, 444, 88 L. ed. 834, 64 S. Ct. 660 (1944), for the proposition that "(n)o procedural principle is more familiar to this court than that a constitutional right may be forfeited . . . by the failure to make timely assertion of the right."[18] without contradiction, that Mr. Beddow "initially 'sent them (Curtis) this information' about the alleged telephone conversation and was a principal in the initial work of the author Frank Graham."

---

18. Michel v. State of Louisiana, 350 U. S. 91, 76 S. Ct. 158, 100 L. ed. 83 (1955), involved a Louisiana statute requiring any challenge to the composition of a Grand Jury to be made before the end of the term of the Grand Jury, holding that the statute was not unconstitutional, and that since the petitioners had not, under that statute, made timely challenge to the constitutional composition of the Grand Jury, they waived any such right to so challenge the Grand Jury. The court announced that the test was whether the defendant had had a reasonable opportunity to have the issue as to the claimed right heard and determined by the court.

On the other hand, in the case of Reece v. State of Georgia, 350 U. S. 85, 76 S. Ct. 167, 100 L. ed. 77 (1955), decided at the same time as the Michel case, the state court had refused to consider the

It cannot be said that this case falls within the category of those cases cited by Curtis [19] which hold that if subsequent to a trial or hearing, but before a final decision by the trial or appellate court, the fundamental law is changed, it is the duty of the court to apply the law as amended. Those were "exceptional cases", where there was no waiver and the court was satisfied that to do otherwise would result in a "plain miscarriage of justice". In this case, however, even if it is assumed that the basic law has defendant's motion to quash the indictment filed before his arraignment on the ground of the composition of the Grand Jury, because, by Georgia practice, objections to the Grand Jury must be made before the indictment is returned. The court held that there had been no waiver there, and that due process had been violated, because defendant, a semi-illiterate Negro, had no counsel until the day after his indictment, pointing out that "the right to object presupposes an opportunity to exercise that right."

---

In Kewanee Oil and Gas Co. v. Mosshamer, (10th Cir. 1932), 58 F. 2d 711, where the constitutionality of a state statute was raised on appeal, the court stated that "if the constitutionality of a statute is not raised in the pleadings ordinarily it may not be raised at the trial."

Other cases decided by district courts, and holding that constitutional questions ordinarily must be raised at the trial, are: Alexander v. Daugherty (D. C. Wyo. 1960), 189 F. Supp. 956 (only where failure to raise the constitutional question at the trial was due to ignorance, duress or other reason for which petitioner could not be held responsible, may redress be had, and then if "it is made to appear that there had been such gross violation of constitutional right as to deny the defendant the substance of a fair trial"); Houck v. Eastchester P. U. District (D. C. Alaska 1952), 104 F. Supp. 588; Mount Tivy Winery v. Lewis (N. D. Cal. 1942), 42 F. Supp. 636; and White Cleaners and Dyers v. Hughes (W. D. La. 1934), 7 F. Supp. 1017.

19. Ziffrin, Inc. v. United States, 318 U. S. 73, 87 L. ed. 621, 63 S. Ct. 465 (1943); United States v. Schooner Peggy, 5 U. S. (1 Cranch) 103, 2 L. ed. 49 (1801); and Hormel v. Helvering, 312 U. S. 552, 85 L. ed. 1037, 61 S. Ct. 719 (1941), an unusual case in which the Supreme Court allowed the Tax Commissioner to assert for the first time on appeal in the Court of Appeals the taxability of income under another section of the code, but stated that "ordinarily an appellate court does not give consideration to issues not raised below . . . (but) there may be exceptional cases where injustice may otherwise result except where express waiver is given."

been changed, the situation is quite different. For whatever tactical or other reason[20] Curtis sat back and failed to carry the constitutional torch before verdict and judgment, the fact remains that it was charged with knowledge, through its interlocking battery of able and distinguished attorneys, of the issues involved in the Times case, and was afforded every reasonable opportunity to have those same issues heard and determined by the trial court in the case at bar. What the Supreme Court would, or might, hold in Times was not decisive. What was important was that Curtis had to invoke any constitutional claims in an appropriate way, and at an appropriate time. Considering the resources of Curtis, both practical and legal, and the contemporary awareness of constitutional rights pervading even problems of local jurisprudence Curtis' complete and utter silence amounted to "an intentional relinquishment or abandonment of a known right or privilege."[21]

Without expressing any opinion as to whether Times fundamentally changed the substantive law applicable to libel cases, or whether the charge on malice given by the trial court was adequate under Times,[22] or whether Butts

---

20. Butts thinks it can be inferred that "defendant never considered plaintiff to be in any class of 'public men' so as to make the defense available."

21. Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U. S. 458, 58 S. Ct. 1019, 82 L. ed. 1461 (1938).

22. The trial court's charge on malice was, in part, as follows:

"At this point, I think it is well that I should explain to you the meaning of malice under the law of defamation. Malice, in the law of defamation, may be used in two senses. First, in a special or technical sense to denote absence of lawful excuse or to indicate absence of privileged occasion. Such malice is known as implied malice or malice in law. There is no imputation of ill will to injure with implied malice. Secondly, malice involving intent of mind and heart or ill will against a person is classified as express malice or malice in fact . . .

"Where it is established that the defendant was inspired by actual malice in the publication of the defamatory matter, the jury, in its was the kind of "public official" contemplated by Times,[23] or whether a reversal might otherwise be required if the discretion, may, but is not required, to award punitive damages. As previously stated to you, actual malice encompasses the notion of ill will, spite, hatred, and an intent to injure one. Malice also denotes a wanton or reckless indifference or culpable negligence with regard to the rights of others. The purpose of punitive damages is to deter the defendant from a repetition of the offense and is a warning to others not to commit a like offense. It is intended to protect the community and has an expression of ethical indignation, although the plaintiff receives the award. The plaintiff charges that the column was written and published both with actual malice and in utter and wanton disregard of his rights . . . ."

23. In a second opinion dated April 7, 1964 (See Butts v. Curtis Publishing Company (N. D. Ga. 1964) ..... F. Supp. ....., at .....), denying Curtis' motions under Rule 60(b), the trial judge gave the following as his views concerning Butts' status as a "public official":

"In the present motion at hand, the defendant contends that plaintiff's action comes under the Times ruling in that plaintiff was a public official, and that the verdict and judgment was awarded plaintiff as damages for injury to his reputation as a football coach on account of a publication made by the defendant concerning plaintiff's actions while acting as Director of Athletics at the University of Georgia. In the trial of the case, movant defended the action by entering a plea of justification, and no defense was made or evidence introduced concerning Butts' position as Athletic Director or as a public official. Georgia law provides under certain conditions communications concerning the acts of public men in their public capacity and reference therewith to be deemed privileged. Georgia Code Annotated, Section 105-107(6). Just where in the ranks of government employees the 'public official' designation extends, the Supreme Court in the Times case did not determine. The decision did determine that Sullivan, as an elected city commissioner of Montgomery, fitted into the category of public officials.

"Under Georgia law, members of the Board of Regents of the University System are public officials. Georgia Sessions Laws, 1931, Pages 7, 45. The evidence presented at the trial shows that plaintiff was Director of Athletics at the University for some two years prior to February, 1963, at which time he resigned. The article complained of was published in the defendant's issue of March 23, 1963. The Board of Regents at both the University of Georgia (located in Athens) and the Georgia School of Technology (located in Atlanta) control the athletic programs of the two institutions, but the details are handled at each institution by an athletic association composed of faculty members and alumni, and each is incorporated to facilitate such business transactions as improvement of athletic grounds and equip-constitutional issues had been timely presented, we hold that Curtis has clearly waived any right it may have had ment at the two institutions. The schedule of athletic contests for each year is approved by the faculty and by the Regents. The separate athletic associations at both institutions are wholly under the control of the Regents and are their agents. For further details of the athletic setup, see Page v. Regents of University System of Georgia, 93 F. 2d 887, 891-892. As was stated in the Page case, the 'coaches' are also members of the faculty.

---

"Plaintiff Butts was Director of Athletics at the University. The Athletic Director, along with the various coaches in the Athletic Department, were employed by the separate incorporated athletic association. However, the defendant seeks by this motion to extend the category of 'public officials' to one employed as agent by the University of Georgia Athletic Department. Even if plaintiff was a professor or instructor at the University, and not an agent of a separate governmental corporation carrying on 'a business comparable in all essentials to those usually conducted by private owners' he would not be a public officer or official. Under Georgia law, the position of a teacher or instructor in a state or public educational institution is not that of a public officer or official, but he is merely an employee thereof. Regents of the University System of Georgia v. Blanion, 49 Ga. App. 602(4); Board of Education of Doerun v. Bacon, 22 Ga. App. 72. To hold plaintiff, an employee of the University Athletic Association, a public official would, in this court's opinion, be extending the 'public official' designation beyond that contemplated by the ruling in the case of New York Times Company v. Sullivan, supra."

See also: Martin v. Smith, 239 Wis. 314, 1 N. W. 2d 163, 140 ALR 1063.

The case of Barr v. Matteo, 360 U. S. 564, 3 L. ed. 2d 1434, 79 S. Ct. 1335 (1959), cited in the Times case, held that in the reciprocal situation where two government employees were suing the director of an important United States Government agency for his alleged libelous conduct, the director, a public official, has absolute privilege, regardless of the existence of malice, in defense of the alleged libel, although his conduct was within the outer perimeter of his line of duty. The policy of this position is to aid in the effective functioning of government by assuring that government officials shall be free to exercise their duties without fear of damage suits with respect to acts done in the course of those duties.

In cases decided since the Times case, the "public official" designation has not been extended. The court, in the case of Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64, 13 L. ed. 2d 125, 85 S. Ct. 209, (Nov. 1964), in reversing the conviction of the New Orleans Parish District Attorney for the criminal defamation of eight judges of the Criminal District Court of the Parish of New Orleans, stated that "the rule protects . . . the free flow of information to the people concerning to challenge the verdict and judgment on any of the constitutional grounds asserted in Times.

THE ARGUMENTS OF COUNSEL.

Curtis contends that the jury arguments of Butts' counsel constituted "significant and fundamental errors which the court may notice without objection".

---

public officials, their servants . . .", whatever touches upon "an official's fitness for office is relevant . . . . A candidate must surrender to public scrutiny and discussion so much of his private character as affects his fitness for office". Justice Goldberg, in his concurring opinion, stated that 'libel on the official conduct of the governors (of the people) . . . can have no place in our Constitution."

The Second Circuit, in Pauling v. News Syndicate Company, Inc. (2nd Cir. 1964), 335 F. 2d 659, considered the possible extensions of the doctrine of the Times case, stating that a candidate for public office would seem an inevitable candidate for extension, and that once an extension is made, the participant in public debate on any issue of grave public concern would be next in line. Quoting the Time case, the court then said: " 'The profound issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open', now applied to confer immunity on 'vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasant sharp attacks on government and public officials', may some day be found to demand still further erosion of the protection heretofore given by the law of defamation."

The Henry v. Collins and Henry v. Pearson cases, 380 U. S. 356 (1965), reversed a judgment for the plaintiffs on the ground that the lower court's charge to the jury on malice was error under the Times and Garrison cases, thus indicating that a County Attorney and a Chief of Police would come within the privilege. Justices Black, Douglas and Goldberg concurred, not due to the error in the charge, but on the ground that such a suit would violate the First and Fourteenth Amendments under the Times case, where the defendant published his criticism of the plaintiffs' performance of their public duties.

This court in Buckley v. The New York Times (5 Cir. 1964), 338 F. 2d 470, after deciding the case on procedural grounds, stated in dicta that "a judicial determination by this court of the proposition that the principles of (the Times case) should be extended to candidates for public office, must await an appropriate case."

For other cases decided by district courts, see: Smoot v. League of Women Voters of the Grand Traverse Area (W. D. Mich. 1964), 36 F. R. D. 4; and H. O. Merren & Co., Ltd. v. A. H. Belo Corp. (N. D. Tex. 1964), 228 F. Supp. 515.

The record reflects that Curtis was represented at the trial by several attorneys. One argument for each side was made on Friday and the remaining arguments were completed the following Monday. Much of the argument of which complaint is now made was offered on Friday. Yet, no objection to any portion of the arguments was raised until Curtis filed its motion for new trial nine days after the jury verdict was returned.

The trial court correctly disposed of this matter in the following language:

> "It is an elementary principle of federal law that a new trial will not be granted where a party seeks to raise for the first time, on a motion for a new trial, (the objection) that opposing counsel was guilty of misconduct in his argument to the jury, where such conduct was not excepted to during the trial." [24]

If, as Curtis' counsel now claim, the arguments were, among other things, "grossly improper and inflammatory", "intemperate and inexcusable", "appeals to passion and prejudice", "corruptions of the evidence", "completely unsupported by the evidence", and "unsworn testimony of counsel", it is inconceivable to us that they would have delayed so long without raising the slightest hint of an objection. Leeway must often be allowed counsel in objecting to argument lest the objection itself magnify the harm. But to say nothing during argument, the extended weekend recess, and for nine days thereafter, leaves us with the conviction that they did not consider the arguments objectionable at the time they were delivered, but made their claim as an afterthought.

---

24. Supra note 6, at 922.
See also: Fidelity & Casualty Co. of N. Y. v. Williams (5th Cir. 1952), 198 F. 2d 128.

Furthermore, after carefully considering the entire record, we do not consider that the arguments belatedly objected to would have required a reversal, even if timely objections had been made. Some of the argument was invited, but the very nature of the case made it virtually impossible to discuss the evidence free of emotion or drama. The editor-in-chief of the Post set the tone and the stage for the attack. He openly boasted that the Post's new policy of "sophisticated muckraking" was the "final yardstick" of editorial achievement since it meant "we are hitting them where it hurts." It was no wonder that the author Graham was equally callous in admitting that he knew that "when this article was published that was the death of Wally Butts in his chosen profession" and that "Curtis Publishing Company knew that when that article was published it would ruin Coach Butts' career." The policy of the magazine so bluntly stated[25] was by itself

25. In the deposition of Clay D. Blair, Jr., editor-in-chief, it was developed that for the first quarter of 1963, Curtis showed a loss of about $1.1 million, compared to a loss in 1962 for the same quarter of $4.7 million; that in 1960 the amount of advertising revenue was $106 million; that in 1961 the figure had dropped to $86 million; that Blair was made a vice-president of Curtis in June of 1962; that circulation is one of the factors that affects advertising revenues; that demography is important, because "all circulation in Russia would not be appealing to General Motors;" that Blair wrote a memo to his staff, which found its way to a national magazine, in which he was quoted as saying: "The final yardstick is the fact that we have about six lawsuits pending, meaning that we are hitting them where it hurts, with solid, meaningful journalism"; that he was not being facetious when he used the phrase "sophisticated muckraking"; that he meant it when he said it and when he testified; that he was correctly quoted as being "concerned with the image of the Post and in trying to get a new image, portray a different type of magazine"; that he did change the image of the Post; that the Butts issue was representative of the new type magazine Curtis was interested in publishing; that "we have perhaps come . . . 25 per cent of the way with this issue . . . toward the goal of the magazine that I envision"; that this issue is a step in the right direction; that he was acquainted with the term "muckraking" prior to using it in the interview which led to an article in Newsweek on November 19, 1962; that in the interview with News-more than enough to inflame the jury. Counsel for Butts could only gild the lily.[26]

The Exclusion of Testimony.

Butts was asked by Curtis' counsel on cross-examination if he recalled having made a statement over television, on a date prior to the institution of this action, that he "would never at any time and never . . . (had) done anything that would injure the University of Georgia". He responded that he had made a statement to that effect, but that "as far as my services at the University of Georgia are concerned that represents only my opinion". Proferred evidence which Curtis asserts "is replete with incidences of Butts' unfaithfulness and disloyalty to the University of Georgia", was excluded by the trial court. Curtis insists, however, that the evidence should have been admitted, not only to demonstrate Butts' true character, but to impeach his credibility as a witness.

---

week he stated that he intended to "restore the crusading spirit . . . the sophisticated muckraking, the expose in the mass magazines . . . to provoke people, make them mad"; that he further stated in the interview: "But careers will be ruined, that is sure", and he could not quarrel with the fact that Butts' career was one of the careers to which reference was made in that statement.

26. The trial court also pointed out that Butts was unquestionably one of the leading figures in the national football picture; that responsible officials of the Post knew that after the article was published Butts' career would be ruined; that Butts, through his attorney, had notified Curtis before publication that the article was false; that one of Butts' daughters had telephoned long distance to a Post official with a plea that the article be withheld from publication; and that after publication Butts had, pursuant to Georgia law, requested a retraction from Curtis, which was refused. The court then commented that the jury was warranted in concluding from all the facts in the case, including "the persistent and continuing attitude of the officers and agents of the defendant that there was a wanton or reckless indifference of plaintiff's rights." Supra note 6 at 919.

We are in agreement with the trial court that proof of Butts' character could be made by reputation only, and that particular acts of misconduct are irrelevant.[27]

The rule that "a party may be cross-examined to bring out matters, even though they may be collateral, which are inconsistent with the testimony given by him",[28] is not applicable here. The answer given by Butts to the question asked by Curtis' counsel concerning a statement previously made out of court, was not such an affirmative profession of faithfulness and loyalty to the University of Georgia, made at the trial, as would open the door, for the purpose of impeachment, in mitigation of damages, or otherwise, to the admission of alleged incidents of "unfaithfulness and disloyalty" to that institution, either by cross-examination of Butts, or by direct evidence from other witnesses.

Complaint is made that Curtis was not permitted to show that Butts had refused to answer certain questions in his deposition, and that evidence offered as to purportedly false testimony given by Butts in his deposition was rejected. Butts refusal to answer was on advice of counsel. The answers sought were subsequently supplied, but Curtis argues that because of the delay it was denied adequate discovery and thereby "lost valuable time in the preparation of its case".

The trial judge was clothed with broad discretion in controlling the extent of direct and cross-examination,[29] and we cannot say that he abused that discretion in excluding the proffered evidence.

---

27. Note 6, supra, at 921.

28. 98 C. J. S. Witnesses, § 399; 3 Wigmore, Evidence (3d. ed. 1940), § 1006(2).

29. See Roberson v. United States, (5 Cir. 1957) 249 F. 2d 737; Carpenter v. United States, (4 Cir. 1959) 264 F. 2d 565; Poliafico v. United States, (6 Cir. 1956) 237 F. 2d 97.

Similarly, we do not think the trial court abused his discretion in refusing to admit evidence that the witness Carmichael, while a minor in Ohio, had been convicted of petty larceny in 1933. The ruling was based upon lapse of time.[30]

Curtis sought to introduce into evidence certain extra-judicial statements made by George Burnett, and statements made to him by third parties. These included inquiries made by Burnett of the telephone operator and her replies thereto;[31] a telephone conversation between Burnett and one Milton Flack, purportedly made immediately after Burnett had overheard a telephone conversation between Butts and Bryant;[32] Burnett's conversation with one Bob Edwards about the notes he had taken;[33] Burnett's statements at meetings with officials of the University of Georgia; and statements of these university officials made in checking Burnett's story at meetings with

30. Supra note 6, at 921.

31. Curtis says this was offered only to show that a telephone conversation between Butts and Bryant had actually taken place. Butts, however, contends no such limitation was placed on this testimony.

32. Burnett testified that he had been trying to contact Milton Flack by telephone when he intercepted the alleged call between Butts and Bryant, after which he says he hung up the phone and sat for about twenty or thirty seconds before picking up the phone and again calling Flack's number. Curtis wanted to prove that Burnett asked Flack: "Is Wally Butts in your office now Milt", to which Flack is supposed to have replied that Butts was at that time in his office making a telephone call. The court allowed Burnett to state that he called Flack, but excluded as hearsay anything he might have said to Flack.

33. Bob Edwards was division manager of the company with which Burnett was connected. Burnett testified that he had a conversation with Edwards on January 4, 1963 about the notes he had taken on September 13, 1962. The court sustained an objection to the conversation itself on the ground that it was hearsay. On cross-examination, Burnett testified that he did not have his notes with him when he first talked with Edwards on January 4, 1963, but did show them to Edwards some two weeks later.

him.[34] All of these incidents had been reported in the article.

It was, of course, important from Curtis' standpoint that it show its good faith in publishing the article. The proffered evidence would have tended to show that these statements as set forth in the article had, in fact, been made, and we think the trial court should have admitted it for that limited purpose only. However, the full import of most, if not all, of that evidence got before the jury in some form before the trial was concluded.

In any event, none of the testimony involved related to the real "sting of the libel", and we do not consider that substantial error was committed in its exclusion. Curtis had the burden to show more than nominal error to secure reversal for rulings of evidence,[35] and this it has failed to do.

THE JURY INSTRUCTIONS.

Complaint is made that the trial court committed plain and prejudicial error in instructing the jury. No objections to any instructions were made at the trial of the case.[36] Rule 51, F. R. Civ. P., provides in part that:

> "No party may assign as error the giving or the failure to give an instruction unless he objects thereto before the jury retires to consider its verdict, stating distinctly the matter to which he objects and the grounds of his objection. Opportunity shall be given to make the objections out of the hearing of the jury."

---

34. Curtis contends that the investigation conducted by the officials of the University of Georgia would support Burnett's credibility, because it demonstrated his willingness to cooperate, and to have his story questioned.

35. Rule 61, F. R. Civ. P.; Jennings v. United States (5 Cir. 1934), 73 F. 2d 470, 471.

36. The claim that certain of the jury instructions violated constitutional rights of Curtis is dealt with in this opinion under the heading "Curtis' Constitutional Rights". See notes 15-23, supra.

Full opportunity was afforded counsel for Curtis to make any objections before the jury was permitted to consider its verdict. Under Rule 61, F. R. Civ. P., all errors which could not change the result of the trial, or which did not affect the substantial rights of the parties, are harmless and must be disregarded. No action taken by the court with respect to any instruction now under attack appears inconsistent with substantial justice, or to have affected the substantial rights of the parties, and we agree with the trial court that Curtis may not now complain.[37]

THE REFUSAL TO GIVE REQUESTED INSTRUCTIONS.

There is no merit to Curtis' contention that the trial court erred either in refusing to charge the jury that it should construe Butts' testimony most strongly against him, or in refusing to charge the jury that it should disregard the entire testimony of any witness whom it found to have knowingly and wilfully testified falsely.

The court's charge fully covered the general rules relating to the credibility of witnesses. The question concerning the credibility of any witness, and whether or not he had been successfully impeached, was left entirely to the jury. There was no showing that any witness had knowingly and wilfully testified falsely, and the evidence was more than adequate to support the verdict, even if the jury had completely disregarded the alleged equivocal testimony of Butts.

THE "NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE".

In its motion for new trial under Rule 60(b)(2), F. R. Civ. P., Curtis contended that new evidence discovered since the trial conclusively demonstrates the falsity of the testimony of two of Butts' witnesses, Dr. Frank A. Rose and Coach Paul "Bear" Bryant, and strongly supports the defense of justification.

37. Supra note 6, at 922.

The trial court rejected this contention because (1) Curtis had not exercised reasonable diligence, (2) the evidence would merely tend to affect the weight and credibility of the testimony of Dr. Rose, and (3) the evidence would not have changed the verdict in this case.[38]

We are in accord with the trial court's conclusions, and do not find that he has abused his discretion.

PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

The trial judge gave his reasons for requiring the remittitur of all punitive damages in excess of $400,000.[39] There is not the slightest suggestion that he thought, or even intimated, that the larger award was based on passion or prejudice. On the contrary, fully aware of the distinction between a verdict excessive in amount which may be reduced by remittitur, and one resulting from improper influences such as passion and prejudice which may not be corrected in this way, the judge necessarily rejected the idea that this verdict had been infected by such destructive elements.

The Georgia Code expressly provides for punitive damages.[40] Under Georgia law, three things are left for the 38. In his opinion dated April 7, 1964 the trial court fully discussed this matter. (See supra note 23, at 16).

39. Supra note 6, at 919.

40. Ga. Code Ann. § 105-2002: "In every tort there may be aggravating circumstances, either in the act or the intention, and in that event the jury may give additional damages, either to deter the wrongdoer from repeating the trespass or as compensation for the wounded feelings of the plaintiff." Also see National Association for the Advancement of Colored People v. Overstreet, ... Ga. ...., ... S. E. 2d .... (No. 22814, April 20, 1965, as modified May 7, 1965). See Division 4, subd. (b) of opinion.

jury to determine: (1) "when punitive damages shall be allowed"; (2) "the amount of such damages"; and (3) the purpose of the award as "either to deter the wrongdoer from repeating the trespass or as compensation for the wounded feelings of the plaintiff."[41] Obviously there are, and can be, no precise standards for these determinations. Not for the first time in the common law tradition, the law turns to the jury. And Georgia prescribes that "(t)he measure of . . . punitive damages . . . is to be fixed by the enlightened conscience of an impartial jury."[42] What the "enlightened conscience" of one impartial jury might consider to be fair may not satisfy another impartial jury with an equally enlightened conscience. A wide variance in the amounts of such awards is inescapably inherent in any submission of the issue of punitive damages.

But, of course, no one would suppose that it is left wholly and solely to the jury. As with every other issue traditionally for jury resolution, the trial judge must still determine whether, as a matter of law, the verdict comports with law. The law recognizes that an award of any type of damages—compensatory or punitive—made by a jury free of bias, may be too small or too large. When that occurs—when the judge concludes that the law regards the verdict as too small or too large—then appropriate action must be taken by the court. Reviewing the amount of the verdict and reaching the conclusion that it is more than the law would permit is not, therefore, the equivalent of the judge's determination that excessiveness is due to a runaway jury, under the spell of passion or bias.

The trial judge had the duty of determining whether as a matter of law (a) any allowance for punitive damages

---

41. National Association for the Advancement of Colored People v. Overstreet, supra, note 40.

42. Id.

could be made, and (b) what the maximum would be. As to (a), the trial court not only expressed the opinion that the article was extremely defamatory, and that the jury had no choice other than to find Curtis liable, but he also thought that there was "ample evidence from which a jury could have concluded that there was reckless disregard by defendant of whether the article was false or not."[43] Upon determining (b) he had then to decide whether to grant a new trial or require a remittitur as to the excess.[44] The latter is a permissible course and does not infringe

---

43. The trial court said, in its April 7, 1964 opinion (see supra note 23, at 16), that:

"If it were conceded that plaintiff Butts was a 'public official', the case of New York Times Company v. Sullivan would not permit the vacating of this court's previous judgment, as the ruling in the Times case does not prohibit a public official from recovering for a defamatory falsehood where he proves 'actual malice'—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not. (Italics supplied). In the trial of this case, there was ample evidence from which a jury could have concluded that there was reckless disregard by defendant of whether the article was false or not. See the court's ruling on defendant's motion for a new trial dated January 14, 1964. Butts v. Curtis Publishing Company, 225 F. Supp. 916."

44. State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Company v. Scott, (5th Cir. 1952) 198 F. 2d 152.

Curtis cites Crowell-Collier Publishing Company v. Caldwell (5th Cir. 1948), 170 F. 2d 941, where this Court held that the refusal to set aside a libel verdict of $237,500 was an abuse of discretion. Judge Hutcheson found that "litigants, witnesses, lawyers and jury seemed to regard the contest as a sporting event, a wager by battle, in which the best battler ought to and would win;" that the trial judge "held himself a little too aloof from the trial . . ., with the result that the trial got out of hand;" and that "when counsel for defendant made vigorous objections to the argument as highly improper, inflammatory, and prejudicial, and requested the court to instruct the jury to disregard them, the court said merely: 'Objection overruled. Request denied. Exception noted'". Obviously, the same circumstances were not present in the instant case, where the judge was in complete control, the trial was conducted in an orderly, efficient and proper manner, and no objections whatever were made to the conduct of the trial, or to the arguments of counsel.

upon the Seventh Amendment's guaranty of a jury trial.[45] In making his determination as to (b), he pursued the correct standard of keeping the verdict "within the reasonable bounds considering the purpose to be achieved as well as the corporate defendant's wanton or reckless indifference to the plaintiff's rights."[46] Obviously, in deciding the matter the judge had to pick a dollar figure beyond which the law would not go. He selected the sum of $400,000 as the maximum which the law would accept to deter Curtis from repeating the trespass or to compensate the wounded feelings of Butts.[47] Although the reduction required, and the sum remaining, were each substantial, there was ample basis for the trial court's judgment.

To have granted a new trial might appear to have been an easier way out. But that is really no solution. On a retrial, the judge could not instruct the next jury as to the dollar maximum of any such verdict. So that jury would be pretty much on its own, under the unavoidably vague, elastic standards prescribed in the Code, as measured by the enlightened conscience of an impartial jury.[48] The 45. Arkansas Valley Land & Cattle Co. v. Mann, 1889, 130 U. S. 69, 9 S. Ct. 458, 32 L. ed. 854; International Paper Co. v. Busby, (5 Cir. 1950) 182 F. 2d 790; United States v. Certain Parcels of Land in Rapides Parish, La., (5 Cir. 1945) 149 F. 2d 81, 83.

---

46. Supra note 6, at 920.

47. Supra note 6, at 919. Butts, in arguing that the district court was far more lenient to Curtis in reducing the award than was justified, said: "The jury in the case at bar recognized that a 100 million dollar corporation with a circulation of between six and seven million copies and a readership of approximately 22,000,000 persons can be deterred by no less than three million dollars as a charge for its misuse of a cherished American freedom—the freedom of every man to live unthreatened by calumny. This jury believed that anything less than this amount would merely add to the audacious course of 'sophisticated muckraking' upon which the Curtis Publishing Company has admittedly set its sights." See also note 26, supra.

48. See notes 40 and 41, supra.

trial judge, on the second trial, would then be forced to repeat the process of testing for (a) and (b). If, as urged by Curtis, the determination by the judge that the amount is too much, necessarily means a new trial, it is quite possible that the case would never end. Georgia has prescribed the "punishment" for aggravated willful torts. The law ought not to frustrate the vindication of that policy by an unrealistic procedure. The jury verdict, as reviewed and reduced by the trial judge, is the tort-feasor's assurance that such damages will not exceed that which the law would tolerate to achieve the Georgia objective of deterring repetition or compensating wounded feelings.

Conclusion.

This is no ordinary libel case. The publication of the article by the Post, in the face of several specific appeals that it refrain from doing so, was part and parcel of a general policy of callousness, which recognized from the start that Butts' career would be ruined. The trial judge's appraisal of the evidence, with which we are in complete accord, was that it was sufficiently strong to justify the jury in concluding that what the Post did was done with reckless disregard of whether the article was false or not.

The case was fully developed during extensive pretrials, and in a jury trial lasting two weeks. The record itself comprises 1613 pages. We have given full consideration to the entire record, as well as to the more than 650 pages of briefs submitted by both parties, the numerous authorities cited therein, and the oral arguments of counsel. We think that Curtis has had its day in court. It apparently thought so too until the jury verdict was returned. This is attested by the fact that practically all of its present complaints were not even raised until after the trial.

Believing and so finding that the trial was fair, and that the judgment of the trial court was correct and proper in all respects, it is AFFIRMED.

In view of our holding, we have given no consideration to Butts' cross appeal.

RIVES, Circuit Judge, dissenting:

Wallace Butts, former Athletic Director of the University of Georgia, instituted this diversity action in the district court against the Curtis Publishing Company, publishers of The Saturday Evening Post. The complaint demanded $5,000,000 general and $5,000,000 punitive damages for an alleged libel contained in an article entitled, "The Story of a College Football Fix," which was published in the March 23, 1963, issue of the Post. The action resulted in a jury verdict against the defendant for $60,000 general damages and $3,000,000 punitive damages. The district court granted the defendant's motion for a new trial, conditioned upon the failure of the plaintiff to remit that portion of the award of punitive damages in excess of $400,000. The district court was of the opinion that the award of $60,000 for actual damages was not excessive, but the court concluded that the award for punitive damages was "grossly excessive." Pursuant to the district court's order, the plaintiff filed a remittitur and thereafter the district court overruled the defendant's motion for a new trial and entered judgment for the plaintiff in the amount of $460,000. Approximately six weeks after the district court entered judgment, the Supreme Court decided New York Times Co. v. Sullivan,[1] and the defendant filed its motion for new trial under Rule 60(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The defendant contended that the previous judgment should be vacated and a new trial ordered in light of the New York Times Co. case. The district court denied the motion.

1. 376 U. S. 254 (1964). See, generally, Berney, Libel and the First Amendment—A New Constitutional Privilege, 51 Va. L. Rev. 1 (1965).

It is my view that the district court erred in not granting a new trial in light of New York Times Co. If mistaken in that view, I am nonetheless convinced that the part of the judgment awarding $400,000 in junitive damages cannot stand in the light of the first, fifth and seventh amendments to the Constitution.

First, however, let me say that this record makes clear beyond controversy that the questions of fact are for the jury's determination. The district court denied the plaintiff's motion for a directed verdict. Plaintiff's counsel insisted and the following colloquy ensued:

"MR. LOCKERMAN:

"—on the point that the defendant had not, under the evidence that it has shown, proven the truth under the burden that it had of the things that it has said against the plaintiff in this article.

"THE COURT:

"Mr. Lockerman, I think it would [be] in error for this Court to withdraw that issue from the Jury."

In ruling on the motion for new trial, however, the district court commented: "The guilt of the defendant was so clearly established by the evidence in the case so as to have left the jury no choice but to find the defendant liable." The majority opinion quotes that comment and adds its "Amen" thus: "We heartily agree with that appraisal." I do not think that any such appraisal should be made. Even a casual reading of the record demonstrates that the questions of fact should be left to the jury.

I. Sullivan v. New York Times Co. necessitates reversal of the judgment in toto.

The Supreme Court in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan held that the Constitution limits state power, in a civil action brought by a public official for criticism of his official conduct, to an award of damages for a false statement made with "actual malice," that is with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not.[2] The district court did not think the New York Times Co. case governed the present action for the reason that the present plaintiff was not a "public official" as contemplated by the New York Times rule, and for the reason that ample evidence existed from which a jury could have concluded that there was reckless disregard by the defendant of whether the article was false or not. [R., pp. 1467-68.] The district court stated that "to hold plaintiff, an employee of the University Athletic Association, a public official would, in this Court's opinion, be extending the 'public official' designation beyond that contemplated by the ruling in the case of New York Times Company v. Sullivan. . . ." [R., p. 1467.] The plaintiff held to be a "public official" in New York Times Co. was Commissioner of Public Affairs, one of three elected Commissioners of the City of Montgomery, Alabama. His duties involved the supervision of the Police Department, Fire Department, Department of Cemetery and Department of Scales.[3] The Supreme Court noted:

> "We have no occasion here to determine how far down into the lower ranks of government employees the 'public official' designation would extend for pur-

2. 376 U. S. 254, 279-80 (1964); Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64, 67 (1964).

3. See New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 1964, 376 U. S. 254, 256.

poses of this rule, or otherwise to specify categories of persons who would or would not be included. Cf. Barr v. Matteo, 360 U. S. 564, 573-575. Nor need we here determine the boundaries of the 'official conduct' concept. It is enough for the present case that respondent's position as an elected city commissioner clearly made him a public official, and that the allegations in the advertisment concerned what was allegedly his official conduct as Commissioner in charge of the Police Department.[4]

It is clear that "public officials" as contemplated by New York Times Co. are not limited to elected officials. In Garrison v. Louisiana,[5] decided subsequent to New York Times Co., the District Attorney for Orleans Parish, Louisiana, was convicted of criminal libel for issuing a statement disparaging the judicial conduct of the eight judges of the Criminal District Court. The Supreme Court's decision, which brought the District Attorney's statement within the purview of criticism of the official conduct of "public officials" and entitled to the benefit of the New York Times Co. rule, did not hinge on whether the eight judges were elected officials. No mention was made of how the judges obtained their positions. Moreover, it is clear from the Court's statement in New York Times Co., quoted above, that the rule applies to "government employees." The question reserved by the Court was "how far down into the lower ranks of government employees the 'public official' designation would extend. . . ."[6] A precise formula for designation of "public officials" for the purpose of the New York Times rule was not attempted. Indeed,

4. Id. at 283, n. 23.

5. 379 U. S. 64 (1964).

6. New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 283, n. 23 (emphasis supplied).

it is clear from the background and reasons for the rule that to fashion and apply a precise formula for designation of "public officials" for the purpose of the New York Times rule would be a formidable, if not impossible, task.[7]

The first amendment secures freedom of expression upon public questions. The constitutional safeguard, the Supreme Court has said, "was fashioned to assure unfettered interchange of ideas for the bringing about of political and social changes desired by the people."[8] Similarly, "[I]t is a prized American privilege to speak one's mind, although not always with perfect good taste, on all public institutions."[9] Mr. Justice Brandeis has stated that "those who won our independence believed . . . that public discussion is a political duty; and that this should be a fundamental principle of the American government."[10] New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 1964, 376 U. S. 254, 269-70. As was said in Garrison v. Louisiana,[11] "the First and Fourteenth Amendments embody our 'profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open, and that it may well include vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials.' New York Times Co. v. Sullivan. . . ." It was against this background that the Supreme Court in New York Times Co. stated that the newspaper advertisement, which contained an inaccurate description of events occurring in Montgomery in connection with the civil rights movement, was an expression of grievance and protest on

7. Cf. Burton v. Wilmington Parking Authority, 1961, 365 U. S. 715, 722 (state responsibility under the Equal Protection Clause).

8. Roth v. United States, 1957, 354 U. S. 476, 484.

9. Bridges v. California, 1941, 314 U. S. 252, 270.

10. Whitney v. California, 274 U. S. 357, 375-76 (1927) (concurring opinion).

11. 379 U. S. 64, 75 (1964).

one of the major public issues of our time and would seem clearly to qualify for the constitutional protection.[12]

It is therefore necessary to examine the facts and weigh the circumstances to determine whether the allegedly defamed plaintiff is involved in the "conduct of the public business"[13] to an extent which attains constitutional significance.

The plaintiff held his position of Athletic Director of The University of Georgia by reason of a contract with the Board of Regents of the University System of Georgia, which hired him as an employee. [Brief for Appellee, p. 67.] The plaintiff supervised the scheduling and location of games, planned and budget, attended to the addition of new athletic facilities, supervised ticket sales and prepared plans for band trips and performances. Moreover, he generally supervised "the entire athletic program of the school." [R., pp. 654-55; Brief for Appellee, pp. 69-70.] The education of youth in the State of Georgia is unquestionably a matter of public concern. By his position the plaintiff is intricately involved with a significant public issue, that is, the education of the youth who attend The University of Georgia—a public institution. According to the Duke of Wellington, "The battle of Waterloo was won on the playing fields of Eton." The ever-increasing difficulties to be faced by this nation require the utmost integrity in the training of its youth. I think the plaintiff is a "public official" as contemplated by the New York Times Co. decision.

The article, which the defendant published under the subtitle, "How Wally Butts and Bear Bryant Rigged a Game Last Fall," concerned alleged information on Georgia plays given by Wallace Butts to Coach Paul Bryant relating to the University of Alabama and the University of Georgia football game played in Birmingham in September 1962. The article charged Wallace Butts with being corrupt and with betraying his players. It charged that the players were forced into the game like "rats in a maze" and "took a frightful physical beating." In an italicized preface to the article, "The Editors" stated that Wallace Butts and Coach Bryant were participants in the greatest and most shocking sports scandal since that of the Chicago White Sox in the 1919 World Series. In the same preface, Wallace Butts was relegated to a status worse than that of "disreputable gamblers" and a corrupt person who, employed to "educate and guide young men," betrays or sells out his pupils. [See R., pp. 88-89 (order granting motion for new trial.)]

12. See 376 U. S. at 271.

13. Garrison v. Louisiana, 1964, 379 U. S. 64, 73.

I think it clear that the defendant's statements are within the purview of criticism of the official conduct of public officials. As stated by the Supreme Court, "the public-official rule protects the paramount public interest in a free flow of information to the people concerning public officials, their servants. To this end, anything which might touch on an official's fitness for office is relevant. Few personal attributes are more germane to fitness for office than dishonesty, malfeasance, or improper motivation, even though these characteristics may also affect the official's private character.[14]

The district court charged the jury that general damages were recoverable absent proof of actual malice. The plaintiff argues that even if the New York Times rule is applicable, the district court's failure to charge that malice is a prerequisite for actual damages is harmless error since the district court charged that actual malice was required for an award of punitive damages and the jury awarded punitive damages. I do not agree that the district court's charge complies with the New York Times rule.

14. Garrison v. Louisiana, 1964, 379 U. S. 64, 76-77.

In dealing with the question of punitive damages, the district court charged the jury:

> "Where it is established that the defendant was inspired by actual malice in the publication of the defamatory matter, the jury, in its discretion, may, but is not required, to award punitive damages. As previously stated to you, actual malice encompasses the notion of ill will, spite, hatred and an intent to injure one. Malice also denotes a wanton or reckless indifference or culpable negligence with regard to the rights of others." [R., pp. 1356] (Emphasis supplied.)

I think it clear that the district court's charge does not embrace the New York Times Co. definition of actual malice, which is with knowledge that the statement was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not. The New York Times rule emphasizes "the knowingly false statement and the false statement made with reckless disregard of the truth,"[15] and not merely intent to injure the individual or negligent disregard of the rights of others. The necessary requisite to a showing of actual malice under the New York Times standard is proof that "the lie . . . [is] knowingly and deliberately published about a public official" or published "with reckless disregard of the truth."[16]

Since the jury might well have understood the district court's charge to allow recovery on a showing of intent to inflict harm or even the culpably negligent infliction of 15. Id. at 75 (emphasis supplied).

16. Ibid.

harm, rather than intent to inflict harm through falsehood, the charge does not comply with the New York Times standard.[17]

The majority of this Court have held that the defendant "has clearly waived any right it may have had to challenge the verdict and judgment on any of the constitutional grounds asserted in Times." While I respect the judgment of the majority, I do not share that judgment.[18] In short, I do not think the defendant may be said to have waived by "silence" a constitutional right not enunciated at the time; it was not even enunciated by the counsel who petitioned for certiorari in the New York Times Co. decision.

In the New York Times Co. case, the trial judge charged that the portions of the advertisement in issue were "libelous per se," that "general damages need not be alleged or proved but are presumed," that the plaintiff was entitled to recover both such "presumed" and punitive damages if the jury decided that the words related to and concerned him and that the damages awarded were not excessive. The jury awarded damages of $500,000. The questions presented to the Supreme Court in the petition for a writ of certiorari dealt with the award of $500,000, the sufficiency of the evidence and the lack of proof of special damages in light of the first amendment as embodied in the fourteenth.[19] Conspicuously absent is any

---

17. Henry v. Collins, 1965, 380 U. S. 356; see Garrison v. Louisiana, 1964, 379 U. S. 64, 73.

18. It seems to me that to constitute such a waiver there must have been "an intentional relinquishment or abandonment of a known right or privilege." Johnson v. Zerbst, 1938, 304 U. S. 458, 464; Fay v. Noia, 1963, 372 U. S. 391, 439.

19. In detail, the questions presented were:

"1. Whether, consistently with the guarantee of freedom of the press in the First Amendment as embodied in the Fourteenth, a state may hold libelous per se and actionable by an elected City Commissioner, without proof of special damage, statements critical of the suggestion that the first amendment, as embodied in the fourteenth amendment, requires that a public official must prove actual malice against critics of his official conduct.[20] Apparently this is due to the fact that the defendant's objections in the trial court were directed to the absence of a requirement of proof of special damages.[21] Only by looking at the New York Times Co. case in retrospect can it be said that the defendant has waived the great constitutional rights contemplated by the New York Times rule. But applying the same "retrospective look" to the present case,[22] it is also clear that had the defendant contended the same as did the defendant in the New York Times case, i.e., that the first and fourteenth amendments were "infringed by holding the publication libelous and actionable conduct of a department of the City Government under his jurisdiction which are inaccurate in some particulars.

---

"2. Whether there was sufficient evidence to justify, consistently with the guarantee of freedom of the press, the determination that statements, naming no individual but critical of the Police Department under the jurisdiction of the respondent as an elected City Commissioner, were defamatory as to him and punishable as libelous per se.

"3. Whether an award of $500,000 as 'presumed' and punitive damages for libel constituted, in the circumstances of this case, an abridgement of the freedom of the press." Petition for Writ of Certiorari, p. 2, New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 1964, 376 U. S. 254.

20. In three of the 105 pages of their petition for certiorari, counsel dealt with "the doctrine espoused by the court below . . . that a public official is entitled to recover 'presumed' and punitive damages for a publication critical of the official conduct of a governmental agency under his general supervision, if that publication tends to 'injure' him 'in his reputation' or to 'bring' him 'into public contempt' as an official—unless a jury is persuaded that it is entirely true." Except for the statement of the case and facts, malice was mentioned in one sentence. See Petition for a Writ of Certiorari to the Supreme Court of Alabama, p. 13, New York Times Co. v. Sullivan.

21. See Petition for a Writ of Certiorari to the Supreme Court of Alabama, p. 8, New York Times Co. v. Sullivan.

22. In football jargon, "by being Monday morning quarterbacks."

without proof of special damage,"[23] it would not have affected the trial of the present action; for the district court ruled, in dealing with the motion for new trial, that the New York Times rule was not applicable to the present plaintiff. [R., p. 1467.]

The fact that the present defendant offered no defense under Georgia law, which provides that communications concerning the "acts of public men in their public capacity" are deemed privileged under certain conditions, cannot be said to constitute a waiver of a defense that the plaintiff is a "public official" under the New York Times standard. As recognized by the plaintiff, members of the athletic department are, like members of the faculty, "employees" under Georgia law and are not considered in "public office" or "officers."[24] Thus, although the Georgia statute which grants a privilege to "comments upon the acts of public men in their public capacity and with reference thereto"[25] appears as broad, if not broader, than the "public official" as contemplated by New York Times Co., the plaintiff recognizes that the Georgia case law results in a narrow application of the privilege and the present plaintiff is not covered.

Moreover, I think that Henry v. Collins,[26] reflects that the Supreme Court does not intend to allow the great constitutional rights inherent in the New York Times rule to be ignored in a case such as the present one.

In Henry v. Collins, the most recent Supreme Court decision interpreting the New York Times rule, the Court reversed per curiam the judgments obtained by a county attorney and a chief of police in their libel actions against the petitioner. The petitioner had charged that his arrest

23. Ibid.
24. Brief for Appellee, pp. 67-69.
25. Ga. Code Ann., § 105-709(6).
26. 1965, 380 U. S. 356.

for disturbing the peace was the result of "a diabolical plot." The trial judge had charged "that malice does not necessarily mean hatred or ill will, but that malice may consist merely of culpable recklessness or a wilful and wanton disregard of the rights and interests of the person defamed." The Supreme Court reversed since the trial judge's instructions concerning malice did not comply with the New York Times rule. The trial of the plaintiff's suit and the decision of the Mississippi Supreme Court affirming the judgments occurred shortly before the Supreme Court handed down New York Times Co. Like the present defendant, the defendant in Henry raised his first amendment question by a motion for a new trial. However, the defendant in Henry filed a motion for a directed verdict at the same time which also raised the first amendment question. Both motions were overruled. Significant is the fact that the constitutional questions raised by the motions were raised for the first time after the close of the plaintiffs' case.[27]

Since the majority of this Court are not of the opinion that the judgment must be reversed, considerations of effective judicial administration do not require me to review the evidence in the present record to determine whether it could constitutionally support a judgment for the plaintiff should the plaintiff seek a new trial.[28]

In summary, I think the present diversity action was brought by a public official for criticism of his official conduct; therefore, he was limited to an award of damages for a false statement made with "actual malice"—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless dis-

27. See Petition for Writ of Certiorari to the Supreme Court of Mississippi, Henry v. Pearson, p. 6. Henry v. Pearson and Henry v. Collins were decided together. See Henry v. Collins, 1965, 380 U. S. 356.

28. New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 1964, 376 U. S. 254, 284-85.

regard of whether it was false or not. The present action was tried on a definitely stated theory which was fundamentally and constitutionally deficient. The present action should be tried on the theory set forth by the Supreme Court's decision supervening the district court's judgment, that is, New York Times Co. v. Sullivan. In such a situation, it has been held, as far back as 1937, that the duty of the district court is to grant the motion for a new trial.[29]

II. That part of the Judgment awarding $400,000 punitive damages violates the defendant's rights under the first, fifth and seventh amendments.

On the question so far discussed, that is, whether New York Times v. Sullivan necessitates reversal of the judgment in toto, I would concede that there is a debatable issue of waiver on which I differ from the majority. The questions hereafter discussed had their genesis in the jury's verdict and are unquestionably preserved for review by the defendant's first motion for new trial (R., pp. 46-48). As to the questions now to be considered, there can be no issue of waiver.

The punitive damages, either as found by the jury or as fixed by the court, are many times greater in amount than the general damages. Under the court's instructions to the jury, the general damages included compensation "for the mental anguish, pain, mortification, and humiliation he has experienced as a result of the publication." (R. 1354) The punitive damages included no element to which the plaintiff was entitled by way of compensation, but, accord-

29. Sulzbacher v. Continental Cas. Co., 8 Cir. 1937, 88 F. 2d 122.

It should be noted that the learned district judge in the present case did not deny the defendant's motion for a new trial on the basis that the defendant had "waived" the constitutional rights defined in New York Times Co., but, instead, considered the motion for new trial on its merits. [R. pp. 1464-68.]

ing to the court's instruction to the jury, "the purpose of punitive damages is to deter the defendant from a repetition of the offense and is a warning to others not to commit a like offense. It is intended to protect the community and has an expression of ethical indignation, although the plaintiff receives the award." (R. 1356) The statute which allows the jury to impose punitive damages is Georgia Code Annotated § 105-2002, which reads:

> "In every tort there may be aggravating circumstances, either in the act or the intention, and in that event the jury may give additional damages, either to deter the wrongdoer from repeating the trespass or as compensation for the wounded feelings of the plaintiff."

In the present case "compensation for the wounded feelings of the plaintiff" had been included in the general damages. [See R., p. 1354, quoted supra.] The trial court expanded considerably on the alternative purpose "to deter the wrongdoer from repeating the trespass"; it included also "a warning to others not to commit a like offense," the protection of "the community," and "an expression of ethical indignation." [See R., p. 1356, quoted supra.] The jury was bound to observe the instructions of the court. For the purpose of considering whether the jury's award of punitive damages exceeded constitutional bounds, it is of no moment that it may also have exceeded the limits set by the statute.[30] The court further instructed the jury that, ". . . if you decide to award punitive damages, the sum

30. According to the brief of the appellee, plaintiff (p. 86): "It is apparent that the purpose of this Code section in cases of defamation is to deter the defendant from republishing this one particular libel at a later date. It does not prevent the defendant from publishing any other matter, whether thought libelous of the plaintiff or not." (Emphasis the appellee's.)

you award need have no relationship to any amount that you may award for general damages. It may be greater or it may be less. That is a matter which rests in your sole discretion." [R., p. 1356.] The jury could reasonably infer that no limit was placed on the exercise of its discretion.

If the defendant corporation had been tried under the Georgia criminal libel statute,[31] it might have been punished by a fine "not to exceed $1,000."[32] As it is, the defendant stands subjected to a judgment of $400,000 for punitive damages, four hundred times the maximum fine for criminal libel. Evidently, the $400,000 sufficed to express the trial judge's sense of "ethical indignation" while that of the jurors swelled to $3,000,000—3,000 times the maximum fine which could have been imposed in a criminal prosecution.

Further, in a criminal proceeding, the defendant was subject to no fine unless proved guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, while here the judge charged the jury that "'. . . the defendant, Curtis Publishing Company, has the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that the statements contained in this article are true. . . .'" (R., p. 1347.)

I would not imply that the return of punitive damages in the ordinary case is constitutionally suspect, for more than a century ago the Supreme Court commented:

> "It is a well-established principle of the common law, that in actions of trespass and all actions on the case for torts, a jury may inflict what are called exemplary, punitive, or vindictive damages upon a defendant, having in view the enormity of his offence rather than the measure of compensation to the plaintiff. We are aware that the propriety of this doctrine

31. Ga. Code Ann. § 26-2101.
32. Ga. Code Ann. § 26-2101.

has been questioned by some writers; but if repeated judicial decisions for more than a century are to be received as the best exposition of what the law is, the question will not admit of argument. By the common as well as by statute law, men are often punished for aggravated misconduct or lawless acts, by means of a civil action, and the damages, inflicted by way of penalty or punishment, given to the party injured."

Day v. Woodworth, 1851, 54 U. S. (13 How.) 362, 370-71.

The theory of punitive damages involves a blending of the interests of society in general with those of the aggrieved individual in particular.[33] There can be no serious question but that the Georgia statute permitting "additional damages"[34] is constitutional upon its face.

However, as that statute was applied by (1) the court's instructions to the jury, (2) the jury's verdict, and (3) the reduced judgment ultimately entered by the court on motion for new trial, the award of punitive damages in the present case is tantamount to a criminal fine or penalty. As said in the very recent case of United States v. Archie Brown, U. S. Oct. Term, 1964, No. 399, decided June 7, 1965:

"It would be archaic to limit the definition of 'punishment' to 'retribution.' Punishment serves several purposes: retributive, rehabilitative, deterrent—and preventive. One of the reasons society imprisons those convicted of crimes is to keep them from inflicting future harm, but that does not make imprisonment any the less punishment."

---

33. Bryson v. Bramlett, Tenn. 1958, 321 S. W. 2d 555, 557; Margaret Ann Super Markets v. Dent, Fla. 1953, 64 So. 2d 291-92; Pratt v. Duck, Tenn. Ct. App. 1945, 191 S. W. 2d 562, 564-65; Foster v. Bourgeois, Tex. Civ. App. 1923, 253 S. W. 880, 885, aff'd 259 S. W. 917; 15 Am. Jur. Damages, § 266; 25 C. J. S. Damages, § 117.

34. Ga. Code Ann. § 105-2002, quoted supra, p. 47.

Similarly, in Trop v. Dulles, 1958, 356 U. S. 86, 96, it was said:

> "In deciding whether or not a law is penal, this Court has generally based its determination upon the purpose of the statute.[18] If the statute imposes a disability for the purposes of punishment—that is, to reprimand the wrongdoer, to deter others, etc.—it has been considered penal.[19] But a statute has been considered nonpenal if it imposes a disability, not to punish, but to accomplish some other legitimate governmental purpose.[20]

"18. Of course, the severity of the disability imposed as well as all the circumstances surrounding the legislative enactment is relevant to this decision. See, generally, Wormuth, Legislative Disqualifications as Bills of Attainder, 4 Vand. L. Rev. 603, 608-610; 64 Yale L. J. 714, 722-724.

"19. E.g., United States v. Lovett, supra [328 U. S. 303]; Pierce v. Carskadon, 16 Wall. 234; Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. 333; Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 277.

"20. E.g., Mahler v. Eby, 264 U. S. 32; Hawker v. New York, 170 U. S. 189; Davis v. Beason, 133 U. S. 333; Murphy v. Ramsey, 114 U. S. 15."

Footnote 18 to the text just quoted make clear that the enormity of the verdict and even of the final judgment are relevant factors to be considered in determining whether the punitive damages amount to a criminal fine. I submit that there is no difference in substance between the punitive damages imposed in the present case and criminal punishment—an ex post facto punishment 400 times as great as the defendant could have anticipated from the criminal libel statute,[35] and imposed without any of the procedural safeguards which are required in criminal proceedings by due process.[36]

35. Ga. Code Ann. § 26-2101; compare art. 1, sec. 9, clause 3 of the Constitution.

36. See amendment 5 to the Constitution.

If there should be any doubt that the award of $400,000 in damages strictly punitive violates the due process clause for lack of the safeguards required in criminal proceedings, there can be none, I submit, that it amounts to a prior restraint upon freedom of the press. The rule as announced in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 1964, 376 U. S. 254, 277-78, has clear application to the facts of this case:

> "What a State may not constitutionally bring about by means of a criminal statute is likewise beyond the reach of its civil law of libel. The fear of damage awards under a rule such as that invoked by the Alabama courts here may be markedly more inhibiting than the fear of prosecution under a criminal statute. See City of Chicago v. Tribune Co., 307 Ill. 595, 607, 139 N. W. 86, 90 (1923). Alabama, for example, has a criminal libel law which subjects to prosecution 'any person who speaks, writes, or prints of and concerning another any accusation falsely and maliciously importing the commission by such person of a felony, or any other indictable offense involving moral turpitude,' and which allows as punishment upon conviction a fine not exceeding $500 and a prison sentence of six months. Alabama Code, Tit. 14, § 350. Presumably a person charged with violation of this statute enjoys ordinary criminal-law safeguards such as the requirements of an indictment and of proof beyond a reasonable doubt. These safeguards are not available to the defendant in a civil action. The judgment awarded in this case—without the need for any proof of actual pecuniary loss—was one thousand times greater than the maximum fine provided by the Alabama criminal statute, and one hundred times greater than that provided by the Sedition Act. And since there is no double-jeopardy limitation applicable to civil lawsuits, this is not the only judgment that may be awarded against petitioners for the same publication. Whether or not a newspaper can survive a succession of such judgments, the pall of fear and timidity imposed upon those who would give voice to public criticism is an atmosphere in which the First Amendment freedoms cannot survive. Plainly the Alabama law of civil libel is 'a form of regulation that creates hazards to protected freedoms markedly greater than those that attend reliance upon the criminal law.' Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U. S. 58, 70." [37]

For yet another reason the award of $3,000,000 by the jury, or of $400,000 by the court, as punitive damages is unconstitutional and void. There was no semblance of definite standard or controlling guide to govern the award.[38] Can any standard be more vague or arbitrary than "an expression of ethical indignation" first on the part of the jury and then on the part of the trial judge? It must be remembered that stricter standards of permissible vagueness are applicable to a rule having a potentially inhibiting effect on freedom of the press than are applicable to rules relating to less important subjects.[39]

Still further, I submit that the remittitur violates the defendant's rights under the seventh amendment. The trial judge concluded "that the award for punitive damages in this case was grossly excessive. It is the court's considered opinion that the maximum sum for punitive damages that should have been awarded against Curtis Publishing Company should be $400,000.00." [R., p. 95]

37. See also Cantwell v. Connecticut, 1940, 310 U. S. 296, 306; Near v. Minnesota, 1931, 283 U. S. 697, 713-14, 720-23.

38. Staub v. City of Baxley, 1958, 355 U. S. 313, 322.

39. Smith v. California, 1959, 361 U. S. 147, 151; Crump v. Board of Public Instruction, 1961, 368 U. S. 278, 287.

In another part of his opinion on motion for new trial, the district judge commented: "The award for punitive damages in the case under consideration is more than seventeen times larger than the highest award for punitive damages ever sustained." [R., p. 93] The district judge's opinion is silent as to the underlying reason for such a grossly excessive verdict. The majority opinion says that ". . . the judge necessarily rejected the idea that this verdict had been infected by such destructive elements [as passion or prejudice]." [Majority opinion, p. 28.] With deference, I submit that that conclusion is not based on the record or on anything said by the trial judge. To the contrary, in colloquy with counsel, the judge may well have disclosed his view as to why the judgment was excessive: "Suppose the court should determine that probably a certain portion of the argument was improper, and therefore the verdict was excessive, and grant you a new trial on that ground, and then it was tried again. . . ." [R., p. 1373.]

The majority of this Court labors under a different impression. It several times refers to the defendant's new policy of "sophisticated muckraking" without benefit of what the defendant claimed that it meant by that expression [R., pp. 37-38, 1019.]:

> "Defendant admits that beginning in the latter part of 1962, The Saturday Evening Post adopted an editorial policy of 'sophisticated muckraking' in the sense of printing the truth about the grave dangers facing the country, including the threat from outside the country and the deterioration of moral values within the country." [R., pp. 37-38.]

It was, of course, for the jury to say whether the defendant's explanation was true. In any event, I agree with the majority that the expression "was by itself more than enough to inflame the jury." [Opinion, pp. 21-22.] If, as is impliedly conceded, the jury was "inflamed," then was not passion and prejudice the most probable cause for its grossly excessive verdict? The majority continues, "Counsel for Butts could only gild the lily." [Opinion, p. 22.] I am tempted to facetiously comment on their plentiful supply of "gilt," but, in a more serious vein, I must express my shock and surprise that this Court will leave standing what amounts to severe criminal punishment of the defendant in the face of the highly improper and prejudicial argument of plaintiff's counsel.

The majority says that "some of the argument was invited . . . ," but is not more specific as to the particular argument of defendant's counsel which amounted to an invitation. However, the appellee's brief (p. 93) refers to the following:

> "Mr. Cody's exact words were: (R. 1267)
>
> > " 'The point I want to make is that a man [plaintiff] that will go to one of your public officials [Comptroller General], bet enough to start into this business and a lot of other businesses while he is charged with the duty of Athletic Director, but it is worse, in order to obtain the license to do that, to misrepresent your financial condition.' (Emphasis added)."

In response, there is attached to appellant's reply brief as Exhibits A and B, the affidavit of Mr. Cody supported by the affidavit of Rufus L. Hixon, the official court reporter. The court reporter's affidavit is to the effect that "after deponent had examined his stenotype notes, he telephoned Mr. Bondurant to state that the word 'bad' had been used by Mr. Cody in his closing argument but that the word

'bet' had been erroneously transcribed." [Exhibit B, p. 8a, Appellant's Reply Brief.]

In addition, I would note that in beginning his argument, counsel for the defendant referred to his attachment to the University of Georgia and to the fact that the trial judge, opposing counsel, and he had received their training in that institution. The arguments of counsel are set forth in the record (pp. 1257-1341). They do not, in my opinion, disclose any invitation or provocation to justify or excuse the improper and inflammatory argument of plaintiff's counsel. The following excerpts are only samples of the objectionable parts of that argument, but, I submit, that they speak so loudly as not to require comment:

> "Since he talked to you about the University of Georgia and when he was there, I think I likewise have a right to mention to you briefly that I probably have known Wally Butts longer than any man in this case. I was at Mercer University with Wally Butts when he played end on the football team there. He was in some respects a small man in stature, but he had more determination and more power to win than any man that I have ever seen in my life. I would not stand before you in this case today arguing in his behalf if I thought that Wally Butts would not tell you the truth when he raises his hand on this stand and swears to Almighty God that what he is going to tell you is the truth. [R., p. 1289.]
>
> ". . . . . .
>
> "Somebody has got to stop them. There is no law against it, and the only way that type of, as I call it, yellow journalism can be stopped is to let the Saturday Evening Post know that it is not going to get away with it today, tomorrow, or any more hereafter, and the only way that lesson can be brought home to them, Gentlemen, is to hit them where it hurts them, and the only thing they know is money. They write about human beings; they kill him, his wife, his three lovely daughters. What do they care? They have got money; getting money for it.

". . . . . .

"I am looking to you for my protection. Heavens (sic) knows, if you let them out of this case for five million dollars or less, and boy, it's been worth it to them, I may be next, because they are not going to stop with that. You may be next; my wife; my children; yourself. We have got to stop them now, and you are the only twelve in the world that can stop them. [R., p. 1319.]

". . . . . .

"I say, Gentlemen, this is the time we have got to get them. A hundred million dollars in advertising, would ten percent of that be fair to Wallace Butts for what they have done to him? Would a fifty cent assessment on each of the twenty-three million issues which they wrote about him there, would that be a strain or a burden on them? I think it would teach them that we don't have that kind of journalism down here, and we don't want it down here, and we don't want it to spread from 666 Fifth Avenue any further than that building right now.

". . . . . .

"My time is up, I have done the best I can. I have lived in agony with this man since I got the first notice that this was what was going to happen, this Post article was coming out. I have seen him deteriorating even since it came out, and I have lived in agony along with him, and it may be that the personal first-hand knowledge that I have had since almost living with him and his family every day, I may have said some things or done some things or conducted myself in some manner that was displeasing to you. All I can say, I have done my best, and if I have done any of those things, don't hold it against Wallace Butts.

"You know, one of these days, like everyone else must come to, Wallace Butts is going to pass on. No one can bother him then. The Saturday Evening Post can't get at him then. And unless I miss my guess, They will put Wallace Butts in a red coffin with a black lid, and he will have a football in his hands, and his epitaph will read something like this: 'Glory, Glory to old Georgia.'" [R., pp. 1321-22.]

If this dissent serves no other purpose, it will at least preserve for posterity the colorful peroration last quoted. Seriously, it seems to me that "the public interest requires that the court of its own motion, as is its power and duty, protect suitors in their right to a verdict uninfluenced by the appeals of counsel to passion or prejudice." N. Y. Central R. R. Co. v. Johnson, 1929, 279 U. S. 310, 318. That would be true even if the prejudicial argument had not been followed by a grossly excessive verdict. I submit that the $3,000,000 punitive damage verdict was so clearly the result of passion and prejudice that it could not be cured by remittitur.[40]

It is difficult in any case to reconcile the practice of remittitur with the constitutional right of a defendant to trial by jury.[41] The logic of Professor Carlin's article on Remittiturs and Additurs (1942), 49 W. Va. LQ 1, 17, 18, quoted in 6 Moore F. P. (2d ed.) 3738-39, seems to me unanswerable.[42]

40. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. S. M. Ry. Co. v. Moquin, 1931, 283 U. S. 520; Brabham v. State of Mississippi, 5 Cir. 1938, 96 F. 2d 210; Ford Motor Co. v. Mahone, 4 Cir. 1953, 205 F. 2d 267; National Surety Co. v. Jean, 6 Cir. 1932, 61 F. 2d 197.

That logic is peculiarly applicable to the circumstances of this case, where only punitive damages are reduced and there is no rule or standard by which the judge can separate any good part of the verdict from the bad. In effect, the remittitur from $3,000,000 to $400,000 represents nothing more specific than the difference between the jury's and the judge's sense of "ethical indignation." The jury's verdict cannot be recognized in the final judgment.

I appreciate that in the federal courts the right to a jury trial is to be determined as a matter of federal law in diversity as well as other actions.[43] It is, however, both interesting and instructive to refer to Georgia law. The statute permitting the award of punitive damages,[44] says that "[. . . the jury may give additional damages. . . ." (Emphasis supplied.) Another statute prescribes: "The question of damages being one for the jury, the court should not interfere, unless the damages are either so small or so excessive as to justify the inference of gross mistake or undue bias." Ga. Code Ann. § 105-2015.

It has long been the law of Georgia that "the trial judge has no power to order that, as a condition to the 41. See Dimick v. Schiedt, 1935, 293 U. S. 474, 482-87.

42. See 6 Moore F. P. (2d ed.) ¶ 59.05(3); 3 Barron & Holtzoff ¶ 1305.1; 30 Am. Jur. New Trial, §§ 209, et seq.; 66 C. J. S. New Trial, §§ 209, et seq.

43. Simler v. Conner, 1963, 372 U. S. 221-22; Ammons v. The Franklin Life Ins. Co., 5 Cir., No. 21418, decided June 28, 1965. Nonetheless, it does seem anomalous for the federal courts to require the state courts to accord the strictest guaranty of jury trial when indicated by a federal statute (e.g., the Federal Employers' Liability Act), and then, in a diversity case to refuse to recognize the requirement of jury trial imposed by a state statute.

44. Ga. Code Ann. § 105-2002, quoted supra p. 47.

refusal of a new trial, a portion of the verdict shall be written off as excessive, except where from the application of the law to the evidence, the excess can be accurately ascertained." Syllabus 4 by the Court, Central of Ga. Ry. Co. v. Perkerson, 1901, 112 Ga. 923, 38 S. E. 365. That action was for the death of a railroad employee. The plaintiff recovered a verdict for $10,833.33. The trial court ordered a new trial conditioned on the plaintiff's consent to a remittitur of the part of the verdict in excess of $8,500.00, and, upon plaintiff's consent, entered judgment for that amount. On defendant's appeal, the Supreme Court of Georgia reviewed the authorities at length and reversed. A part of its opinion reads:

> "It is manifest that the verdict for $8,500 was rendered by the judge, and not by the jury, and it is impossible to ascertain from the evidence in the case how he arrived at that exact amount. It is evident from his order that he was dissatisfied with the verdict, as to the amount of damages found, and that, if he had not thought he had the power of remitting a portion of the damages, he would have set the verdict aside and granted a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was excessive. The judge may have the power to determine that a verdict is grossly excessive, and for that cause to order it set aside, and yet have no power to fix the exact amount for which it should stand. 'The power to control does not include the power to find. Like the executive veto, it arrests, but does not by its exercise bestow the power to enact.'"

Even more pertinent is a very recent case where the trial court, with plaintiff's consent, reduced the exemplary or punitive damages awarded by the jury from $4,000 to $1,500. The conditional judgment for new trial was reversed with directions that a new trial be granted. The Court said:

> "In determining punitive or exemplary damages it is impossible to lay down any fixed rules for a precise mathematical calculation; 'and in every such case the amount of the finding must be largely in the power of the jury, who have no other guide but their enlightened consciences. To say, therefore, in such cases that this finding should not have exceeded a certain sum, is to invade their peculiar province, and to assume their functions; and to require a portion of the amount so found by them to be remitted, and the balance to stand as their verdict, seems to us unauthorized either by the words of the law, or by the precedents and practice in such cases.' Savannah, Florida & Western Ry. v. Harper, 70 Ga. 119, 123-124 [citing many other authorities].
>
> "It is our wish to make it clear that nothing held here or in any of the authorities cited is subject to the inference that a trial judge is restricted in the exercise of his exclusive discretion to grant or deny a motion for new trial on the general grounds. We do emphasize that where the determining of the amount of a particular class of damages lies exclusively with the jury, the trial court must either grant or deny a new trial on the basis of the jury's award. The trial judge cannot condition the exercise of his discretion in granting or denying a new trial on an acceptance by the parties of a different sum selected by him."

City Motor Exchange v. Ballinger, Ga. App. 1964, 138 S. E. 2d 925, 926-27.

The seventh amendment guarantees a right of trial by jury to the defendant as well as to the plaintiff. I cannot escape the conviction that by the remittitur in this case that right has been denied to the defendant.

Both because New York Times v. Sullivan is convincing that this case was tried upon fundamentally erroneous principles of law, and because the enormous award of punitive damages and the remittitur violate the defendant's constitutional rights, I would reverse the judgment of the district court. I therefore respectfully dissent.

OPINION OF THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FIFTH CIRCUIT ON PETITION FOR REHEARING.

IN THE

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS

FOR THE FIFTH CIRCUIT.

No. 21491.

CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,

Appellant-Appellee,

versus

WALLACE BUTTS,

Appellee-Appellant.

(AND REVERSE TITLE)

APPEALS FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA.

(October 1, 1965.)

ON PETITION FOR REHEARING.

Before RIVES and BROWN, Circuit Judges, and SPEARS, District Judge.

PER CURIAM: As Curtis' petition for rehearing asserts that the waiver found by us is based on "alleged facts, most of which are outside the record", and upon "unsupported statements in Butts' brief, which for the most part are not true", we deem additional comment appropriate.

The burden of Curtis' brief, elaborated in the petition for rehearing, is that Times came like a bolt out of the blue, and no one either knew of, or could anticipate, that a state-created libel damage action was subject to or could be controlled by First Amendment freedom of speech constitutional limitations. Therefore, the argument runs, until Times there was no reason to assert the constitutional claim, and consequently it should not be held to the usual appellate consequence of failing properly to preserve the point.

Obviously this Court is not required to accept the mere assertions of Curtis. This Court has the duty of determining whether this contention of Curtis was well founded. While this partakes of factual evaluation in a sense, the question of waiver is a law problem—i.e., whether skilled counsel would reasonably think the contention to be plausible. Since Curtis did not seek to raise the constitutional issues before verdict and judgment, it was entirely proper to look to the sources discussed in our original opinion in order to ascertain the pertinent facts. Until the filing by Curtis of its petition for rehearing, the statements in Butts' brief, referred to by Curtis, had not really been disputed. And now, after having given full consideration to the affidavits and to all other matters presently submitted by Curtis, we are still of the firm opinion that when all of the acts and conduct of Curtis' attorneys are tested in the light of reason, Curtis cannot sustain the proposition that its counsel were ignorant of a constitutional claim so as to be totally excused for the complete absence of any timely assertion of it.

To its petition for rehearing, Curtis attaches affidavits made by Philip H. Strubing, whose Philadelphia, Pennsylvania law firm of Pepper, Hamilton & Scheetz, is general counsel for Curtis; by T. Eric Embry, whose Birmingham, Alabama law firm represented the New York Times Company in the case brought against it by Sullivan (Times case), and also represented Curtis in the related libel cases brought against it in the United States District Court by Coach Paul Bryant;[1] and by Welborn B. Cody, who was lead trial counsel for Curtis in the Butts case. In general, the affidavits assert that Mr. Embry and his partner, Roderick Beddow, Jr., attended the trial of this Butts case as spectators only, were not consulted concerning trial strategy, and did not advise Mr. Cody concerning the constitional questions they had raised in Times. Mr. Cody stated that "he was not aware of the constitutional issues being urged in (the Times) case."

There is no dispute that the lawyers who sat together at the Curtis counsel table during the Butts trial were representing Curtis either in this case or in the related Bryant libel suits pending in Alamaba, so presumably they were all on Curtis' payroll. Unusual as it would be for them not to consult with one another concerning strategy and tactics during the two-week trial, we accept the statement that neither Mr. Embry nor Mr. Beddow informed Mr. Cody of the constitutional questions being raised in the Times case.

But what about Mr. Strubing? In his affidavit he stated that he participated actively in the preparation of the Butts case for trial, and that he also worked actively with Mr. Embry in the preparation of the related Bryant cases. He is also on the brief in our case and participated in the arguments.

Butts' response to the petition for rehearing refers us to the records of this Court, of which, of course, we may also take judicial notice. In Cause No. 21,152, The Curtis Publishing Company v. Honorable H. H. Grooms, United

1. Civil Actions Nos. 63-2-W and 63-166, brought in the Western and Southern Divisions respectively, of the Northern District of Alabama.

States District Judge for the Northern District of Alabama Curtis sought a writ of mandamus to compel Judge Grooms to vacate his orders denying Curtis' motion for change of venue. That record reflects that on February 26, 1963 (one month before the Butts suit was filed) Mr. Strubing's law firm, together with the firm of which Mr. Embry and Mr. Beddow are members, signed and filed in the Alabama District Court a motion to dismiss the related libel action instituted by Bryant, on the grounds, among others, that:

> "To subject this defendant to liability in the circumstances complained of would abridge the freedom of speech and of press in violation of the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, made applicable to the states by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States . . .
>
> "To subject this defendant to liability in the circumstances complained of would be repugnant to the due process clause of the Fourtenth Amendment to the Constiution of the United States . . ."

In a later suit filed against Curtis by Bryant the same two law firms made identical contentions in a motion to dismiss signed and filed by each of them in the District Court on April 30, 1963, still more than three months before the trial of the Butts case.

If the First and Fourteenth Amendments were thought by Mr. Strubing and his law firm to be valid grounds for dismissal of the related Bryant cases in Alabama, why did they not assert them in the Butts case? By his own statement Mr. Strubing was an active participant in all three cases, so he certainly should have known what the rights of Curtis were. Although he now says that he was not aware of the constitutional defenses articulated by Times until that case was decided by the Supreme Court some six months after the trial of the Butts case, neither he nor his local counsel (Mr. Embry) considered a final decision in Times—or for that matter any other case—a necessary prelude to raising in the related Bryant cases, the constitutional claim previously asserted by Mr. Embry in Times.[2] And for good reason, at least ever since June 1962 when those who wished could see the handwriting on the wall, certainly as the moving finger followed the voice of Mr. Justice Black's celebrated "First Amendment 'Absolutes'; A Public Interview".[3]

---

2. That these constitutional claims were well preserved by these counsel in Times without the learning which was to come several years later through the words of the Times opinion is recognized by the Court itself: "The (Alabama trial) judge rejected petitioner's contention that his rulings abridged the freedoms of speech and of the press that are guaranteed by the First and Fourteenth Amendments." 376 U. S. 254, 263.

The Alabama Supreme Court also recognized the assertion of these constitutional claims for it "rejected petitioner's constitutional contentions with the brief statements that "the First Amendment of the U. S. Constitution does not protect libelous publications * * * 14 So. 2d at 40." 376 U. S. 254, 264.

3. Justice Black and First Amendment "Absolutes"; A Public Interview, Edmond Cahn and Mr. Justice Hugo L. Black, 37 NYU Law Review 549 (June 1962). The background of the interview was the Justice's lecture entitled "the Bill of Rights", delivered at the New York University School of Law, February 17, 1960, published at 35 NYU Law Review 865 (1960). See, e.g.:

> "CAHN: Do you make an exception in freedom of speech and press for the law of defamation? That is, are you willing to allow people to sue for damages when they are subjected to libel or slander?
>
> "JUSTICE BLACK: My view of the First Amendment * * * is that it said Congress should pass none of these kinds of laws. * * * I have no doubt myself that the provision * * * intended that there should be no libel or defamation law in the United States under the United States Government, just absolutely none so far as I am concerned. * * *" (557)
>
> "* * *
>
> "My belief is that the First Amendment was made applicable to the states by the Fourteenth. I do not hesitate, so far as my Granted that the extra-judicial statements of a single Justice do not an opinion make,[4] the Court itself in Times treats this newly announced rule as a natural development of the constitutional propositions long recognized by its extensive writings on First Amendment freedom of speech rights.[5] Thus, it emphasized that the "general proposition that freedom of expression upon public questions is secured by the First Amendment has long been settled by our decisions." 376 U. S. 254, 269. Announcing its rule, it referred to the "oft-cited statement of a like rule * * * adopted by a number of state courts * * * found in the Kansas case of Coleman v. MacLennan, 78 Kan. 711, 98 P. 281 (1908)"—a decision then nearly half a century old.

Whatever may have been the reasons for invoking the First Amendment claim in the Alabama suits while remaining silent in Georgia, Curtis cannot sustain the proposition that it was unaware that a defendant in a libel action might assert the constitutional claim as a defense. Counsel for Butts make a persuasive suggestion that Curtis own view is concerned, as to what should be and what I hope will sometime be the constitutional doctrine that just as it was not intended to authorize damage suits for mere words as distinguished from conduct as far as the Federal Government is concerned, the same rule should apply to the states.

---

"* * *

"I am for the First Amendment from the first word to the last. I believe it means what it says, and it says to me, '* * * Government shall not attempt to control the ideas a man has. * * * Government shall not abridge freedom of the press or speech. It shall let anyone talk in this country.' * * * Let them talk! In the American way, we will answer them." (563)

4. They were shortly to be announced ex cathedra in his concurring opinion in Times, 376 U. S. 254, 293, joined by Mr. Justice Douglas and substantially echoed by Mr. Justice Goldberg (with Justice Douglas), 376 U. S. 254, 297.

5. See the extended annotations, The Supreme Court and the Right of Free Speech and Press, 11 L. Ed. 2d 1116-1175; 2 L. Ed. 2d 1706; 93 L. Ed. 1151.

elected to defend this case on its plea of justification, rather than raise the jurisdictional, constitutional and other affirmative defenses [6] it had raised in the Alabama Bryant cases, in order to get the right to open and close the arguments.

Nor, as suggested in Judge Rives' dissenting opinion on denial of rehearing, do we consider that our action is at all inconsistent with the principle of law expressed for the Court by Judge Wisdom in Commissioner of Internal Revenue v. Chase Manhattan Bank, 5 Cir., 1958, 259 F. 2d 231, 238, cert. denied, 359 U.S. 913.[7]

---

6. These would include the conditional privilege recognized by § 105-709(6) of the Georgia Code concerning published statements relating to the "acts of public men in their public capacity". See Note 20, 376 U. S. 254 at 280.

7. Actually, in this tax case the theory later developed for the first time in this court had been raised in the bank's petition filed in the lower court and agreed upon by both parties at the trial. The Court, in deciding to consider the development of the theory, stated that the "tax liability as to the testamentary trust depends on whether Daniel's will put Marie to an election. The question is in the case. A just determination of the appeal requires us to decide it." (Emphasis supplied). This case involved the gift tax liability under three trusts created by the decedent, "Daniel", one of which was a testamentary trust of his residuary estate from which his wife, Marie, was to receive the income for life, the remainder to be divided among Daniel's descendants. In the Tax Court, the bank's petition stated that "the estate was still under administration and that 'no determination has yet been made as to whether or not the said Marie Elizabeth Moran has elected to take under the will' . . . that Marie's motive 'in not taking against the will was to benefit herself' ". At the trial the Commissioner and the bank agreed to assume that Daniel's will put Marie to an election and that Marie's receipt of income from the trust was sufficient to show that she had elected to take under the will. They differed only as to whether the effect of the election was that she had made a taxable gift. The Tax Court held that Daniel's will put Marie to an election and that Marie's "acquiescence" in the testamentary trust constituted a taxable gift. On appeal, for the first time in the case, the defendant made the assertion that Daniel's will did not purport to dispose of Marie's share and therefore she was not put to an election, thereby denying that Marie transferred her share of the community estate to the trust. In answer to the Commissioner's objection to the bank's new argument

In that case, the legal theories developed in this Court for the first time could be fairly disposed of on the record, and the opposing party was not prejudiced by the use of other theories.[8] However, here Curtis seeks a reversal so that a new record based on different theories may be made at another trial. The wholesome desire "to secure the just * * * determination of every action", neither dis-that Marie was not put to an election, and its contention that the taxpayer is not at liberty to urge as a ground for reversal a point not raised in the court below, the court states that "indeed, . . . the taxpayer invited error . . . worse, the invitation was accepted. But an appellant has no vested right in an opponent's error of law in the lower court—especially when the protesting appellant is the Commissioner of Internal Revenue . . . (who) owes a duty to all taxpayers . . . to see that the tax law is applied justly. . . . Federal procedure is moving away from what Pound calls 'the sporting theory of justice', Wigmore the 'instinct of giving the game fair play', and Arthur Vanderbilt the theory of procedure as 'a contest between two legal gladiators'. We are a court 'to secure the just * * * determination of every action'. Rule 1, Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U. S. C. A. Daniel's will is in the record and speaks for itself. '(W)here, as here, the case below was tried, not upon any misapprehension of the facts, but upon a misapprehension of the effects of those facts in law, appellant may not be prevented from pressing here for the application, to the proven facts, of the correct principles of law.' . . . 'We see no reason why we should make what we think would be an erroneous decision, because the applicable law was not insisted upon by one of the parties.'"

---

See also Jack Ammann Photogrammetric Engineers, Inc. v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, (5th Cir. 1965) 341 F. 2d 466, a tax case citing Commissioner of Internal Revenue v. Chase Manhattan Bank, in determining that since legal theories were there being urged "that can be fairly disposed of on the record before us. We do not consider that we should refuse to consider them merely because they were not urged in the Tax Court."

8. See Glavic v. Beechie, (5th Cir. 1964) 340 F. 2d 91. The majority refused to consider a question not presented for determination in the District Court. Judge Wisdom in his concurring opinion stated, in opposing this decision, that he "would allow either party on appeal to advance a new theory or to change his theory of the case—if: (1) all the relevant evidence is before the court, (2) the opposing party has had adequate time to brief the point, and (3) the opposing party is not prejudic(ed) by not having introduced evidence below that would have militated against the validity or effect of the new theory."

penses with the rules of procedure, nor forecloses the applicability of the doctrine of waiver when all of the elements which constitute that doctrine are present, as in the present case.

As to all other contentions in the petition for rehearing and supporting brief, we adhere without further comment to the holdings in our original opinion. Finding no error, see Rule 25(a) of this Court, the petition for rehearing is denied.

PETITION DENIED.

RIVES, Circuit Judge, Dissenting:

The majority undertakes to bolster its holding "that Curtis has clearly waived any right it might have had to challenge the verdict and judgment on any of the constitutional grounds asserted in Times."[1]

I.

As suggested in my earlier dissent,[2] that is not true as to the holding in Times that a state law of civil libel which sustains the imposition of extremely large awards of damages in libel actions may constitute a prior restraint on freedom of expression forbidden by the First and Fourteenth Amendments. New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 1964, 376 U. S. 254, 277, 278.

The enormous amount of the verdict in the present case could not have been anticipated. Curtis raised the

---

1. Slip Opinion, pp. 17 and 18.
2. Slip Opinion, pp. 46, 47, 52 and 53.

point seasonably as a ground for its first motion for new trial.[3]

In ruling on that motion the district court recognized that: "As far as this Court can ascertain, the largest award ever sustained for punitive damages by the Appellate Courts was an award of $175,000.00 in the case of Reynolds v. Pegler, D. C., 123 F. Supp. 36; 2 Cir., 223 F. 2d 429." 225 F. Supp. 916, at 919. Nonetheless, after the plaintiff filed his remittitur, the district court entered judgment against Curtis for $400,000 punitive damages plus $60,000 general damages, or a total of $460,000. Since that time, Curtis has lost no opportunity to insist that the $460,000 award, if sustained, is so large as to constitute a prior restraint upon freedom of the press within the rule announced in the Times decision. On that issue, there is, I submit, no debatable question of waiver. For reasons expressed in my prior dissent,[4] I would rule with Curtis on that issue.

As to the punitive damage award, the section of the Georgia Code quoted in my earlier dissent[5] and the oral charge to the jury,[6] make clear that the very purpose of

3. "That portion of the jury's verdict awarding the plaintiff $3,000,000 punitive damages, violates and abridges and cannot be sustained without violating and abridging the right of freedom of speech and of the press guaranteed by the First and Fourteenth Amendments of the United States Constitution because:

". . . . . .

"(e) The amount of punitive damages, in the circumstances of this case, was so excessive as to violate and abridge through excessiveness alone, the guarantees of free speech and press." (Record, pp. 46, 47.)

4. Slip Opinion, pp. 51, 52 and 53.

5. Section 105-2002, Georgia Code Annotated.

6. "The purpose of punitive damages is to deter the defendant from a repetition of the offense and is a warning to others not to commit a like offense. It is intended to protect the community and has an expression of ethical indignation, although the plaintiff receives the award."

punitive damages is to act as a deterrent to future conduct, which, in libel cases, means a prior restraint on freedom of expression. When that deterrent or restraint assumes proportions of the jury's verdict, $3,000,000, or even of the award made by the district court, $400,000, I submit that it is forbidden by the First and Fourteenth Amendments.[7]

The part of the Times opinion relating to prior restraints on freedom of expression was certainly not "new law." Nor was that part of the opinion limited to public officials. Clearly, I submit, whether Butts was a public official or not, the enormous award of damages must be set aside.

II.

The specific holding in Times, which had not theretofore been generally recognized, was that a State cannot under the First and Fourteenth Amendments award damages to a public official for defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves "actual malice"—that the statement was made with knowledge of its falsity or with reckless disregard of whether it was true or false. It was that principle to which I referred in my earlier dissent,[8] when I said "it was not even enunciated by the counsel who petitioned for certiorari in the New York Times Co. decision."[9] Now on petition for rehearing, counsel makes affidavit that: "The requirement of the New York Times case that general damages could not be awarded without the necessity of proof of actual malice on the part of the defendant was not specifically presented

7. See Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 1963, 372 U. S. 58, 70, cited in Times (376 U. S. at 278).

8. Slip Opinion, p. 42.

9. An opinion which I had reached from an examination of the petition and briefs on certiorari.

in the Alabama courts nor in the petition for certiorari to the United States Supreme Court."

In order properly to object[10] to the district court's instructions allowing recovery of general damages without proof of malice, and recovery of punitive damages on a definition of malice at variance with that prescribed in Times, counsel must have anticipated that specific holding of the Times decision.

Judge Morgan, the District Judge in the present case, recognized, at least impliedly, that Curtis had not waived that constitutional right by its failure to insist upon it at the trial, when, in denying the motion for new trial under Rule 60(b), Fed. R. Civ. P., he considered and ruled on the defense on its merits. Butts v. Curtis Publishing Co., N. D. Ga. 1964, 242 F. Supp. 390.

Based largely on facts dehors the present record, the majority held that Curtis' trial counsel had knowingly and intentionally waived the constitutional protections afforded by the Times case, by failing to raise them at the trial. In response to that holding, three of Curtis' attorneys have filed with this Court their sworn affidavits.[11] Now the majority goes still further beyond the present record and considers another case shown by the records of this Court but of which Judge Morgan could not have taken judicial notice when he considered and ruled on Curtis' section 60(b) motion. With deference, I submit that it is the function of this Court simply to review the ruling of the district court on the record before that court.

If, however, we are to resort to evidence outside the record and to bolster our judicial notice from records in

---

10. "No party may assign as error the giving or the failure to give an instruction unless he objects thereto before the jury retires to consider its verdict, stating distinctly the matter to which he objects and the grounds of his objection." Rule 51, Fed. R. Civ. P.

11. Ethically permissible "when essential to the ends of justice." A. B. A. Canons of Prof. Ethics No. 91.

other cases, those extraneous matters do not impugn the integrity and veracity of Curtis' trial counsel. It seems clear to me that, at the time of trial, counsel had no notice of the specific holding thereafter made in Times. It is impossible for me to believe that, if counsel had any such notice, they would have knowingly and intentionally waived the specific constitutional protection afforded by the Times case "in order to get the right to open and close the arguments," as suggested in the majority opinion.

It is too much to hold counsel to the duty of anticipating the specific holding of Times, because of general assertions of First Amendment defenses in other cases, or even because of Mr. Justice Black's view that the First Amendment ". . . intended there should be no libel or defamation law in the United States under the United States Government, just absolutely none so far as I am concerned. . . ." [12] The majority paints with such a broad brush as to require the assertion of a First Amendment defense in every libel or defamation case hereafter litigated.

With deference, I submit that it is the outworn sporting theory of justice [13] which leads the majority to convert this appeal into an unseemly trial of Curtis' lawyers. The function of this Court is not to decide a contest, but to administer justice. Curtis, not its lawyers, stands mulcted in damages to the extent of $460,000 as the result of a trial conducted on a fundamentally and constitutionally deficient theory of law.

---

12. Quoted in footnote 3 to the majority opinion on rehearing.

13. "Federal procedure is moving away from what Pound calls 'the sporting theory of justice,' Wigmore the 'instinct of giving the game fair play,' and Arthur Vanderbilt the theory of procedure as 'a contest between two legal gladiators'. We are a Court 'to secure the just * * * determination of every action'. Rule 1, Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U. S. C. A." Commissioner of Int. Rev. v. Chase Manhattan Bank, 5 Cir. 1958, 259 F. 2d 231, 238.

The resulting damage extends far beyond the monetary loss to Curtis. This Court's refusal to consider and decide whether constitutional standards were observed in adjudging Curtis liable is a grave reflection upon the administration of justice itself. Permitting such a libel judgment to stand will cause ". . . the pall of fear and timidity [to be] imposed upon those who would give voice to public criticism in an atmosphere in which the First Amendment freedoms cannot survive."[14]

A just determination requires this Court to consider and decide this appeal on its merits.[15] The altered situation created by the intervening decision of the Supreme Court makes that a compelling duty.[16]

I, therefore, respectfully dissent.

---

14. New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 1964, 376 U. S. 254, 278.

15. Hormel v. Helvering, 1941, 312 U. S. 552, 556, 557.

16. The Peggy, 1801, 5 U. S. (1 Cranch) 103, 110; Connor v. New York Times Co., 5 Cir. 1962, 310 F. 2d 133, 135, and cases there cited.

OPINION OF THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, NORTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA, ON PETITIONER'S MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
NORTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA
ATLANTA DIVISION.

CIVIL ACTION

No. 8311.

WALLACE BUTTS,

Plaintiff,

v.

CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,

Defendant.

The jury in this libel action returned a verdict for general damages against the defendant in the sum of $60,000.00 and for punitive damages in the sum of $3,000,000.00.

The defendant moves, under Rule 59 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U. S. C. A., to set aside the verdict for damages principally upon the ground of excessiveness, as set out in Ground 1 of the defendant's motion. Apart from defendant's contention that the verdict is excessive, the defendant sets out 23 other grounds in its motion for a new trial (Ground 5 of defendant's motion having been abandoned).

The cause of action by plaintiff arose by virtue of an article published by defendant in its March 23, 1963, issue of the Saturday Evening Post, said article having been principally written by one Frank Graham, Jr., but with assistance from others employed by the defendant. The article was entitled "The Story of a College Football Fix", with the subtitle "How Wally Butts and Bear Bryant Rigged a Game Last Fall". The article concerned alleged information on Georgia plays given by Butts to Coach Bryant relating to the Alabama-Georgia football game played in Birmingham, Alabama, in September, 1962.

The article charged Butts with being corrupt and with betraying his players, and that the players were forced into the game like "rats in a maze" and "took a frightful physical beating". The article charged, in an italicized editorial, Butts, along with Coach Bryant, with being a participant in the greatest and most shocking sports scandal since that of the Chicago White Sox in the 1919 World Series. In the same editorial Butts was relegated to a status worse than that of "disreputable gamblers", and a corrupt person who, employed to "educate and guide young men", betrays or sells out his pupils.

Plaintiff Butts had been Head Football Coach at the University of Georgia from 1939 until 1961, at which time he became Athletic Director. As a member of his profession, he had been president of the Football Coaches Association, and by invitation had coached the College All-Stars, the Blue-Gray All Star Game, and the North-South All Star Game. Butts has been a lecturer and speaker at clinics and banquets throughout the United States. Testimony adduced was that plaintiff had been offered employment by several college and professional football teams in the country and was negotiating with a Texas professional team when the article was published, but thereafter negotiations were discontinued.

Evidence was introduced that on March 18, 1963, Butts, through his attorney, notified the Curtis Publishing Company that the article was false and advised that the article not be published; and that thereafter, pursuant to Georgia law, Butts requested a retraction from Curtis, which was refused. It was admitted on the trial that one of Butts' daughters had telephoned long distance to a Saturday Evening Post official with a plea that the article be withheld from publication. The evidence of plaintiff showed that plaintiff was capable of earning a minimum of $12,000.00 per annum from his football activities, but that since the publication, all prior negotiations had been terminated.

The defendant filed its answer of justification and plead that the statements in the article were true. The defendant thus assumed the burden of proving the truth of the article. See Cox v. Strickland, 101 Ga. 482.

Curtis Publishing Company based its defense on certain notes taken by one George Burnett who made such notes to a telephone conversation alleged to have been overheard between Coach Bear Bryant, of the University of Alabama, and Butts, as Athletic Director of the University of Georgia, on a morning in September, a few days prior to the Alabama-Georgia game. By some mechanical defect, Burnett was connected by telephone to the conversation. These rough notes were kept by Burnett and revealed to Head Coach Johnny Griffith, of the University of Georgia, in late December, 1962, or early January, 1963. Curtis paid Burnett consideration for the story after the same was brought it its attention by Curtis' Birmingham, Alabama, lawyers, who were defending Curtis in a libel suit brought by Coach Bryant because of another article in the Saturday Evening Post.

The evidence presented showed that Frank Graham, Jr., the author of the article, and Davis Thomas, Senior Editor of the Saturday Evening Post, knew that Burnett had been convicted of "bad check writing". No representative of the Post looked at the notes before the article was published. According to Coach Griffith of Georgia, defendant's witness, "a good number of Burnett's notes were incorrect and didn't even apply to anything Georgia had". No effort was made by the Post to view the actual game film, although the Sports Editor of the Post, one Roger Kahn, considered that necessary.

Inserted in the article were the following direct quotations, which were subsequently denied under oath by the parties quoted:

(1) Graham wrote that Burnett had told him that Larry Rakestraw, Georgia quarterback, placed his feet in a certain position while on offense, thereby tipping off the defensive team as to whether the Georgia play would be a run or a pass. Burnett later testified under oath that he had not told Graham any such thing.

(2) Mickey Babb, another Georgia football player, specifically denied the quotation in the article attributed to him pertaining to knowledge by the Alabama team of the Georgia formations and plays. Babb was quoted in the article as saying the Alabama players knew Georgia's key play (eighty-eight pop) and knew when Georgia would use it. Babb testified Georgia had no "eighty-eight pop" play. This was confirmed by Coach Johnny Griffith.

(3) Sam Richwine, the Georgia trainer, specifically and categorically denied the quotation in the article attributed to him, which was also to the effect that Alabama knew Georgia's plays.

(4) Coach Johnny Griffith categorically denied three separate and distinct quotations in the article that were attributed to him.

(5) There were many other instances in which the individual, credited by Graham as giving Graham certain information which was included in the article, categorically denied under oath that any such information had been furnished.

Frank Graham, Jr., author of the article, and Charles Davis Thomas, the Managing Editor of the Saturday Evening Post, testified by deposition that they both knew that after the article was published plaintiff Butts' career would be ruined. The author of the article, Frank Graham, Jr., testified by deposition at the trial. Curtis' Editor-in-Chief, Clay Blair, Jr., and its Senior Editor, Davis Thomas, were present in court but testified by deposition. Furman Bisher, of Atlanta, who was paid to assist in the preparation of the article, testified by deposition.

The article was clearly defamatory and extremely so. The Saturday Evening Post had a circulation in excess of 6 million copies per issue. It claims readers of 22 million. Butts was unquestionably one of the leading figures in the national football picture. The jury was warranted in concluding from the foregoing incidents and the persistent and continuing attitude of the officers and agents of the defendant that there was a wanton or reckless indifference of plaintiff's rights. The guilt of the defendant was so clearly established by the evidence in the case so as to have left the jury no choice but to find the defendant liable.

This Court does not feel that the award of $60,000.00 for actual damages was excessive. The evidence showed plaintiff to be a man in his fifties, and that his earnings from his profession had been a minimum of $12,000.00 per annum.

The Court must now consider the amount of punitive damages awarded. What is the nature of punitive damages and for what purpose do we allow their imposition? The law of Georgia provides that in every tort there may be aggravating circumstances, either in the act or the intention, and in that event the jury may give additional damages to deter the wrong-doers from repeating the trespass. Sec. 105-2002, Georgia Code Annotated, 1933.

This Court, however, is greatly concerned with the size of the verdict as to punitive damages. An examination has been made of many cases and the awards made throughout the several jurisdictions of the United States, both in the Federal and the State Courts. As far as this Court can ascertain, the largest award ever sustained for punitive damages by the Appellate Courts was an award of $175,000.00 in the case of Reynolds v. Pegler, 123 F. Supp. 36, 223 F. 2d 429. Since the award in the case at hand, the New York Supreme Court, Appellate Division, October Term, in the case of Faulk v. Aware, Inc., and Hartnett, has reduced the award of punitive damages in the amount of $2,500,000.00 to $150,000.00. The award for punitive damages in the case under consideration is more than seventeen times larger than the highest award for punitive damages ever sustained. Reynolds v. Pegler, supra.

True, fixing the amount of damages is primarily in the province of the jury, and it has been said, with respect to libel cases, "the jury is generally considered to be the supreme arbiter on the question of damages". Lynch v. New York Times Company, 171 A. D. 399, 401. The Court, if possible, should try to avoid invading that field. However, a Court may not stand by idly when it is apparent that a verdict is excessive. In Sunray Oil Corporation v. Allbritton, 188 F. 2d 751 (5 Cir. 1951), Judge Hutcheson emphasized that a district judge has a duty to grant a new trial, not only when the jury's verdict is excessive as a matter of law, but also where "it is larger in amount than the judge thinks it justly ought to be". Thus, he said:

> "Whether, in the opinion of the district judge a verdict is excessive as a matter of fact, that is, though not contrary to right reason and, therefore not excessive as a matter of law, it is larger in amount than the judge thinks it justly ought to be, or is excessive as a matter of law, that is, is so monstrous or inordinate in amount as to find no support in right reason, he has the same power, the same duty, in the one case as in the other to relieve against the excessiveness by granting a new trial or requiring a remittitur in lieu."

As was held by the late Judge Parker in the case of Virginian Railway Company v. Armentrout, 166 F. 2d 400, 408:

> "The power and duty of the trial judge to set aside the verdict under such circumstances is well established, the exercise of the power being regarded as not in derogation of the right of trial by jury but one of the historic safeguards of that right. * * *
>
> "To the federal trial judge, the law gives ample power to see that justice is done in causes pending before him; and the responsibility attendant upon such power is his in full measure. While according due respect to the findings of the jury, he should not hesitate to set aside their verdict and grant a new trial in any case where the ends of justice so require."

In accordance with the cases cited above, this Court feels it is its duty to keep a verdict for punitive damages within reasonable bounds considering the purpose to be achieved as well as the corporate defendant's wanton or reckless indifference to the plaintiff's rights. In observance of such duty, this Court concludes that the award for punitive damages in this case was grossly excessive. It is the Court's considered opinion that the maximum sum for punitive damages that should have been awarded against Curtis Publishing Company should be $400,000.00.

Movant's Grounds 2, 3, and 4 assert that the right given by Section 105-2002, Georgia Code Annotated, 1933, to a jury to grant punitive damages violates the rights guaranteed by the Federal Constitution to freedom of speech and press and to substantive and procedural due process. These contentions are without merit. However, these constitutional questions are raised for the first time by this motion. No constitutional question concerning the statute was ever raised by movant's pleadings. The contention that a State statute is unconstitutional is an affirmative defense and must be so pleaded in defendant's answer. Kewanee Oil & Gas Company v. Mosshamer, 58 F. 2d 711, 712; White Cleaners & Dyers v. Hughes, 7 F. Supp. 1017 (D. C. La. 1934, 3 judges).

Movant's Ground 5 has been expressly withdrawn by defendant.

Grounds 6 through 13 of defendant's motion contend that error was committed in excluding certain evidence as to specific acts of misconduct by plaintiff, defendant contending that this evidence should have been permitted for the purpose of impeachment and in mitigation of damages. The first consideration is Section 38-202, Georgia Code Annotated, 1933, which provides as follows:

> "The general character of the parties, and especially their conduct in other transactions, are irrelevant matter, unless the nature of the action involves such character and renders necessary or proper the investigation of such conduct."

The defendant contends that under Rule 43(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, this evidence is admissible in Federal Court. Rule 43(a) provides that in determining admissibility of evidence where there is a conflict between the State and the Federal rule, the plaintiff is entitled to the benefit of the more favorable rule. Hambrice v. F. W. Woolworth Company, 290 F. 2d 557.

However, on the question with which this Court is concerned and without passing upon the question as to whether the matter is substantive or procedural, it appears that there is no conflict between the Georgia rule and the Federal rule as to the admissibility of the specific acts of misconduct on the part of the plaintiff.

Under the decision of Cox v. Strickland, 101 Ga. 482, it is held that the filing of a plea of justification in defense to an action of libel puts the plaintiff's character in issue, and a defendant has a right to show that the plaintiff's general character is bad, but cannot, in so doing, go into the proof of specific acts or resort to general rumors by hearsay.

Neither under the majority of federal decisions which this Court has studied would such tests be admissible. See Tribune Association v. Follwell, 107 F. 646; Sun Printing & Publishing Association v. Schenck, 98 F. 925; Morning Journal Association v. Duke, 128 F. 657.

As was said in the Schenck case, supra:

> "It is not a defense to a libel or slander that the plaintiff has been guilty of offenses other than those imputed to him or of offenses of a similar character; and such facts are not competent in mitigation of damages. The only tendence of such proof is to show, not that the plaintiff's reputation is bad, but that it ought to be bad."

As further authority sustaining the inadmissibility of such evidence, see Wigmore on Evidence, 3d Edition, Section 209, where it is stated that the reputed character of the plaintiff in an action of defamation is admissible in mitigation of damages so long as proof of character is made by reputation only; but particular acts of misconduct are irrelevant and such evidence is universally regarded as improper. Pertinent to this issue is the statement of Richards, C. B., in the case of Jones v. Stevens, 11 Price 235, 265:

> "I cannot . . . allow defendants to impeach all the transactions of a man's life who may have occasion to seek redress in courts of justice and throw on him the difficulty of showing a uniform propriety of conduct during all his existence. It would be impossible for any man to come prepared to meet such a charge."

Movant contends that this Court erred in refusing to charge Section 38-1806 of the 1933 Georgia Code Annotated. There was no showing that any witness wilfully and knowingly testified falsely, and this Court charged generally on the subject of impeachment. See Smaha v. George, 195 Ga. 412.

Ground 15 of defendant's motion is without merit. Ground 16 of movant's motion is without merit. See Smaha v. George, supra; and Branan v. LaGrange Truck Lines, Inc., 94 Ga. App. 829.

Grounds 17 and 18 of defendant's motion contend error in excluding evidence tending to impeach witness John Carmichael. Such evidence was offered by defendant to show that witness Carmichael had been convicted in 1933 while witness was a minor in Ohio. The Court, in its discretion, refused to admit such evidence because of the lapse of time. See Goddard v. United States, 131 F. 2d 220; Sinclair Refining Company v. Southern Coast Corporation, 195 F. 2d 626.

The alleged false statements for the purpose of obtaining licenses were inadmissible. A witness cannot be impeached by proving contradictory statements previously made by him as to matters not relevant to his testimony and to the case. Grant v. Hart, 197 Ga. 662; Haynes v. Phillips, 67 Ga. App. 574. Both Grounds 17 and 18 of the defendant's motion are without merit.

Grounds 19, 20, and 21 do not merit the granting of a motion for a new trial on any of the grounds as set forth.

Ground 22 of defendant's motion for a new trial asserts error because of arguments of plaintiff's counsel in the closing remarks to the jury. No objection nor complaint was ever raised to any portion of plaintiff's counsel's argument to the jury, although separate arguments were made by counsel for both parties on separate days of the trial. Arguments were begun on Friday by both counsel and completed on Monday. Much of the argument of which complaint is now made was offered on Friday, and yet on the following Monday, no objection was raised on this portion of counsel's summation. Counsel for defendant consisted of numerous counsel, and yet exception was only made on the filing of this motion. It is an elementary principle of federal law that a new trial will not be granted where a party seeks to raise for the first time, on a motion for a new trial, that opposing counsel was guilty of misconduct in his argument to the jury, where such conduct was not excepted to during the trial. See Travelers Insurance Company v. Bell, 5 Cir. 1951, 188 F. 2d 725; Thomson v. Boles, 123 F. 2d 487; Hobart v.

O'Brien, 243 F. 2d 735; Uhl v. Echols Transfer Company, 5 Cir. 1956, 238 F. 2d 760. For the reasons stated above, Ground 22 of defendant's motion is without merit.

Ground 23(a) (b) (c) (d) and (e) of defendant's motion for a new trial complained of errors in the Court's instructions to the jury. The instructions complained of in these grounds of defendant's motion were not objected to at the trial of the case. Rule 51 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provides in part as follows:

> "No party may assign as error the giving or the failure to give an instruction unless he objects thereto before the jury retires to consider its verdict, stating distinctly the matter to which he objects and the grounds of his objection. Opportunity shall be given to make the objection out of the hearing of the jury."

Opportunity was afforded counsel for defendant to make such objections before the jury was permitted to consider its verdict. Under the above-cited rule, the defendant may not now complain. See also Pruett v. Marshall, 5 Cir. 1960, 283 F. 2d 436; Williams v. National Surety Corporation, 5 Cir. 1958, 257 F. 2d 771; Moore v. Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, Inc., 5 Cir. 1955, 223 F. 2d 214.

Defendant's contention based on Ground 24 of defendant's motion for a new trial is without merit for the reasons stated in this Court's ruling on defendant's motion for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict this day filed with the Clerk of the Court.

All of the grounds set out in defendant's motion for a new trial, excepting Ground 1, are denied for the reasons stated above.

As to the first ground of the defendant's motion for a new trial, a federal trial court has authority to determine whether a verdict is excessive and to grant either a new trial or to require a remittitur. State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Company v. Scott, 5 Cir. 1952, 198 F. 2d 152.

An order in compliance with this opinion will be filed this date.

This the 14th day of January, 1964.

LEWIS R. MORGAN,
United States District Judge.

ORDER.

(Filed January 14, 1964.)

Now, this the 13th day of January, 1964,

IT IS ORDERED that the motion of the defendant, Curtis Publishing Company, for a new trial is granted unless the plaintiff, Wallace Butts, within twenty (20) days after the service of this order, shall, in a writing filed with the Clerk of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia, remit all the punitive damages awarded above the sum of $400,000.00; the award for general damages in the amount of $60,000.00 to remain undisturbed.

(Signed) LEWIS R. MORGAN,
Lewis R. Morgan,
United States District Judge.

OPINION OF THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, NORTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA, ON PETITIONER'S ADDITIONAL MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
NORTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA
ATLANTA DIVISION.

CIVIL ACTION
No. 8311.

WALLACE BUTTS,

Plaintiff,

v.

CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,

Defendant.

Defendant, on February 28, 1964, under Rule 60(b)(2), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U. S. C. A., filed a motion for a new trial upon the ground of the discovery of new evidence, contending that such evidence conclusively demonstrates the falsity of the testimony of two of the plaintiff's witnesses, Dr. Frank A. Rose and Coach Paul Bryant, and strongly supports the defense of justification. The motion is also based upon alleged conduct of plaintiff in attempting to avoid the conditions on which defendant's motion for a new trial was denied and a judgment in plaintiff's favor was granted.

Thereafter, defendant filed an additional motion for a new trial pursuant to Rule 60(b), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, because of a change in the law of libel and the constitutional restrictions placed upon an action for libel by virtue of the United States Supreme Court decision of March 9, 1964, in the case of New York Times Company v. Sullivan.

Even though a final judgment had been entered in the case at hand and an appeal from such judgment has been perfected by the filing of a notice of appeal, this District Court retains jurisdiction to consider and deny such motions under Rule 60(b). See Ferrell v. Trailmobile, Inc., (5 C. A., 1955) 223 F. 2d 697.

The gist of Part I of the first motion is that there is substantial variance between the testimony of Dr. Rose and Coach Bryant in their testimony at the trial of this case and depositions which were later given by Dr. Rose and his secretary, Mrs. Marian H. Park, in an action pending in the Northern District of Alabama in the case of Paul Bryant v. Curtis Publishing Company, Case No. 63-166, which testimony by deposition was taken on January 8, 1964.

In attempting to sustain its plea of justification, the defendant introduced at the trial of this case a letter dated March 6, 1963, written by Dr. Rose, as President of the University of Alabama, to Dr. O. C. Aderhold, as President of the University of Georgia. The letter concerns certain telephone calls relating to conversations on new football rule changes which had transpired between Coach Bryant and plaintiff Butts. At the trial, Dr. Rose in his testimony, in attempting to explain the contents of the Aderhold letter, stated that the letter was hurriedly dictated on the morning of March 6, 1963, and signed by his secretary, Mrs. Park, as he (Dr. Rose) was attempting to catch an early morning plane for Washington, D. C., to attend a meeting of the American Council on Education.

In the depositions taken in the Bryant case, defendant shows that Dr. Rose did not go to Washington, D. C., on the date of March 6, 1963, nor was the letter hurriedly dictated as there was a previous draft of Aderhold letter, dated March 5, 1963, which draft was substantially the same as the contents of the March 6, 1963, original letter mailed and received by President Aderhold.

The defendant further asserts that Dr. Rose, in his testimony at the trial testified that Coach Bryant told him he did not remember the call of September 16, 1962, to Coach Butts in Athens, Georgia, although he could have made it, and even though Rose had interrogated Bryant several times between February 24, 1963 and March 6, 1963. However, by a recently discovered letter, dated February 28, 1963, written by Bryant to Rose, Bryant, in this letter, informed Rose that he remembered the call to Butts in the middle of September very well, and that although Rose admitted receiving the letter dated February 28, 1963, prior to March 6, 1963, Rose still maintained throughout his testimony in said deposition that Bryant reported to him through all the investigation that he had no recollection of the Sunday, September 16, 1962, telephone call to plaintiff Butts.

Defendant contends that on the issue of the letter (Exhibit D-21) plaintiff was able to explain away the contents of the letter by means of Rose's characterization of Exhibit D-21 as a hasty, error-laden letter, and Bryant's total lack of recollection concerning the telephone call, when in fact the newly discovered evidence establishes that Bryant did recall the Sunday telephone call and that the letter was not a hasty, error-laden letter, but was a careful and thoughtful letter, and that someone received the draft of such letter dated March 5, 1963, prior to its final draft on March 6, 1963.

The phrase "newly discovered evidence" refers to evidence of facts in existence at the time of the trial of which the aggrieved party was excusably ignorant. In the case of Chemical Delinting Company v. Jackson, 193 F. 2d 123, 127, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals has held:

"The motion must show that the evidence was discovered since the trial; must show facts from which the court may infer reasonable diligence on the part of the movant; must show that the evidence is not merely cumulative or impeaching; must show that it is material; and must show that such evidence will probably produce a different result."

See also King v. Leach, (5 C. A., 1942) 131 F. 2d 8.

The evidence clearly shows that the letter from Bryant to Rose was in existence in the latter part of February, 1963. The evidence further shows that the draft of the letter from Rose to Aderhold was in existence prior to March 6, 1963. Under the liberal discovery rule provided by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the defendant could have obtained all of this evidence which it now has available prior to the trial of this case in August, 1963. No facts have been shown by the movant here from which this Court may infer reasonable diligence on its part.

Even assuming the evidence could not have been produced at the trial in August by due diligence—inferences not fairly conveyed by the record—the evidence now presented tends merely to affect the weight and credibility of the evidence of Dr. Rose and does not constitute a proper basis for a new trial. See English v. Mattson, (5 C. A., 1954) 214 F. 2d 406, 409; Grant County Deposit Bank v. Greene, 200 F. 2d 835.

After considering the "newly discovered evidence" presented in the motion at hand, and from this Court's review of all the evidence presented at the trial of the case, even if all the testimony entered at this hearing on the motion had been presented at the trial in August, this new evidence affecting the credibility of Dr. Rose would not have changed the verdict in this case. See Chemical Delinting Company v. Jackson, supra, and English v. Mattson, supra.

The second ground advanced by the defendant for a new trial under Rule 60(b) is to vacate the judgment entered against the defendant and to grant a new trial because after the plaintiff had filed his written consent to the remittitur (this consent still being on file) that, to the defendant's motion for a new trial, the plaintiff has filed a notice of cross-appeal. The question of the cross-appeal and the merits thereof are not for decision by this trial Court, but is a matter to be considered on appeal. See Woodworth v. Chesbrough, 244 U. S. 79, 61 L. Ed. 1005.

The thrust of defendant's additional motion for a new trial under Rule 60(b) is based upon the recent decision of the United States Supreme Court, rendered on March 9, 1964, in the case of New York Times Company v. Sullivan. The Supreme Court's ruling in the Times case, speaking through Mr. Justice Brennan, held:

> "The constitutional guarantees require, we think, a federal rule that prohibits a public official from recovering damages for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves that the statement was made with 'actual malice'—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not."

The contention of the defendant is that the Times case is controlling for the case at hand, and that under this motion the previous judgment should be vacated and a new trial granted. In order that a prior decision of a court shall govern, such prior decision must be in point, and as a test in determining whether the adjudicated case is a precedent, such case should be measured by a similarity to the second case in its controlling facts. See United States v. L. A. Tucker Truck Lines, Inc., 344 U. S. 33, 97 L. Ed. 54.

In the Times case, the Supreme Court held actual malice must be proved to recover general damages in actions of libel brought by public officials against critics of their official misconduct. However, the concurring opinion of Justices Goldberg and Douglas stated:

> "Purely private defamation has little to do with the political ends of a self-governing society. The imposition of liability for private defamation does not abridge the freedom of public speech."

In the present motion at hand, the defendant contends that plaintiff's action comes under the Times ruling in that plaintiff was a public official, and that the verdict and judgment was awarded plaintiff as damages for injury to his reputation as a football coach on account of a publication made by the defendant concerning plaintiff's actions while acting as Director of Athletics at the University of Georgia. In the trial of the case, movant defended the action by entering a plea of justification, and no defense was made or evidence introduced concerning Butts' position as Athletic Director or as a public official. Georgia law provides under certain conditions communications concerning the acts of public men in their public capacity and reference therewith to be deemed privileged. Georgia Code Annotated, Section 107-709(6). Just where in the ranks of government employees the "public official" designation extends, the Supreme Court in the Times ease did not determine.[1] The decision did determine that Sullivan, as an elected city commissioner of Montgomery, fitted into the category of public officials.

---

1. In Footnote 23 of the majority opinion, it was stated: "We have no occasion here to determine how far down into the lower ranks of government employees the 'public official' designation would extend for purposes of this rule, or otherwise to specify categories of persons who would or would not be included. Cf. Barr v. Matteo, 360 U. S. 564, 573-575. Nor need we here determine the boundaries of the 'official conduct' concept. It is enough for the present case that respondent's position as an elected city commissioner clearly made him a public official, ..."

Under Georgia law, members of the Board of Regents of the University System are public officials. Georgia Session Laws, 1931, Pages 7, 45. The evidence presented at the trial shows that plaintiff was Director of Athletics at the University for some two years prior to February, 1963, at which time he resigned. The article complained of was published in the defendant's issue of March 23, 1963. The Board of Regents at both the University of Georgia (located at Athens) and the Georgia School of Technology Board of Regents at both the University of Technology (located at Atlanta) control the athletic programs of the two institutions, but the details are handled at each institution by an athletic association composed of faculty members and alumni, and each is incorporated to facilitate such business transactions as improvement of athletic grounds and equipment at the two institutions. The schedule of athletic contests for each year is approved by the faculty and by the Regents. The separate athletic associations at both institutions are wholly under the control of the Regents and are their agents. For further details of the athletic setup, see Page v. Regents of University System of Georgia, 93 F. 2d 887, 891-892. As was stated in the Page case, the "coaches" are also members of the faculty.

Plaintiff Butts was Director of Athletics at the University. The Athletic Director, along with the various coaches in the Athletic Department, were employed by the separate incorporated athletic association. However, the defendant seeks by this motion to extend the category of "public officials" to one employed as agent by the University of Georgia Athletic Department. Even if plaintiff was a professor or instructor at the University, and not an agent of a separate governmental corporation carrying on "a business comparable in all essentials to those usually conducted by private owners"[2] he would not be a public officer or official. Under Georgia law, the position of a teacher or instructor in a State or public educational institution is not that of a public officer or official, but he is merely an employee thereof. Regents of the University System of Georgia v. Blanton, 49 Ga. App. 602(4); Board of Education of Doerun v. Bacon, 22 Ga. App. 72. To hold plaintiff, an employee of the University Athletic Association, a public official would, in this Court's opinion, be extending the "public official" designation beyond that contemplated by the ruling in the case of New York Times Company v. Sullivan, supra.

2. See Allen v. Regents of the Unversity System of Georgia, 304 U. S. 439, 451.

If it were conceded that plaintiff Butts was a "public official", the case of New York Times Company v. Sullivan would not permit the vacating of this Court's previous judgment, as the ruling in the Times case does not prohibit a public official from recovering for a defamatory falsehood where he proves "actual malice"—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not. (Emphasis supplied.) In the trial of this case, there was ample evidence from which a jury could have concluded that there was reckless disregard by defendant of whether the article was false or not. See the Court's ruling on defendant's motion for a new trial dated January 14, 1964. Butts v. Curtis Publishing Company, 225 F. Supp. 916.

For the reasons stated above, the defendant's motions under Rule 60(b) to vacate the judgment entered against the defendant are denied.

This the 7th day of April, 1964.

LEWIS R. MORGAN,
Lewis R. Morgan,
United States District Judge.

APPENDIX C.

Defendant's Additional Motion for New Trial Pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 60(b).

IN THE

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA

ATLANTA DIVISION.

CIVIL ACTION

No. 8311.

WALLACE BUTTS,

Plaintiff,

v.

CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,

Defendant.

Because of the drastic change in the law of libel and the constitutional restrictions placed upon an action for libel brought about by the Supreme Court's recent decision, on March 9, 1964, in the case of New York Times Company v. Sullivan, 32 U. S. Law Week 4184 (March 10, 1964), the defendant hereby moves this Court, pursuant to Rule 60(b)(6) to vacate the judgment entered against defendant in this action and to grant a new trial for the following reasons:

1. The verdict and judgment in this case awarded plaintiff damages for injury to his reputation as a football coach on account of statements made by defendant concerning plaintiff's actions while acting as Director of Athletics of the University of Georgia. The Director of Athletics of the University of Georgia is a public official: Page v. Regents of University of Georgia, 93 F. 2d 887 (5th Cir., 1937) (reversed in 304 U. S. 439 upon other grounds).

2. Said New York Times Company v. Sullivan case held that the constitutional guarantees provided by the First and Fourteenth Amendments prohibit a public official from recovering any "damages for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves that the statement was made with 'actual malice'—that is, with knowledge that it was false, or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not."

3. The following portions of the instruction given by the Court to the jury constitute error in that the Court stated that general damages could be recovered by the plaintiff without the plaintiff being required to prove the existence of "actual malice" on the part of the defendant:

> "I charge you that under Georgia law, a written publication which affects one injuriously in his trade or calling, such as the plaintiff Butts' coaching profession in this case under consideration, and contains imputations against his honesty and integrity, and which would, as its natural and probable consequence, occasion pecuniary loss, constitutes a cause of action and is libelous per se, and the right follows to such damages as must be presumed to proximately and necessarily result from such a publication." R. 1624,

"As the publication was libelous per se, I charge you that malice is to be inferred. However, the existence of malice may be rebutted by proof of the defendant which, in all cases, shall go in mitigation of damages.

"At this point, I think it is well that I should explain to you the meaning of malice under the law of defamation. Malice, in the law of defamation may be used in two senses. First, in a special or technical sense to denote absence of lawful excuse or to indicate absence of privileged occasion. Such malice is known as implied malice or malice in law. There is no imputation of ill will to injure with implied malice. Secondly, malice involving intent of mind and heart or ill will against a person is classified as express malice or malice in fact." R. 1630.

4. Applying the constitutional standards enunciated in the said New York Times Company v. Sullivan case, the proof presented in the instant case to show actual malice on the part of the defendant lacks the "convincing clarity", which such constitutional standards demand, and thus such evidence cannot sustain the judgment entered for the plaintiff. There was no evidence introduced in the instant case to prove that the statements made in the article defendant published in the March 23, 1963 issue of "The Saturday Evening Post" concerning plaintiff were made with knowledge on the part of the defendant that they were false, or with a reckless disregard of whether they were false or not. On the contrary, plaintiff proved in his own case that the Post editors responsible for the publication of the story—Blair and Thomas, R. 1024—were satisfied of the truthfulness and accuracy of the story. R. 1038, 1137-1138.

Therefore, the instant case was clearly tried upon unconstitutional assumptions, the correct principle unfortunately not being announced until after the trial by the Supreme Court's landmark decision in the New York Times Company v. Sullivan case. As Mr. Justice Goldberg recognized in that case, "we are writing upon a clean slate."

A hearing upon this Motion is respectfully requested.

WELBORN B. CODY,
Attorney for Defendant.

Of Counsel:

KILPATRICK, CODY, ROGERS,
McCLATCHEY & REGENSTEIN,
1045 Hurt Building,
Atlanta, Georgia 30303
Jackson 2-7420

GEORGIA VERSUS ALABAMA

THE STORY OF A COLLEGE FOOTBALL FIX

A SHOCKING REPORT OF HOW WALLY BUTTS AND

Not since the Chicago Wh
1919 World Series has th story as shocking as this one of one fixed game of college

Before the University of G University of Alabama las Wally Butts, athletic directo
Paul (Bear) Bryant, head co
Georgia's plays, defensive significant secrets Georgia possessed.

The corrupt here were ballplayers gone wrong, as in Sox scandal. The corrupt w table gamblers, as in the scan afflicting college basketball.
two men—Butts and Brya educate and to guide young

How prevalent is the fixin ball games? How often do their pupils? We don't kno we can only be appalled.

S ALABAMA

THE
OF EGE
ALL
FIX

ING REPORT

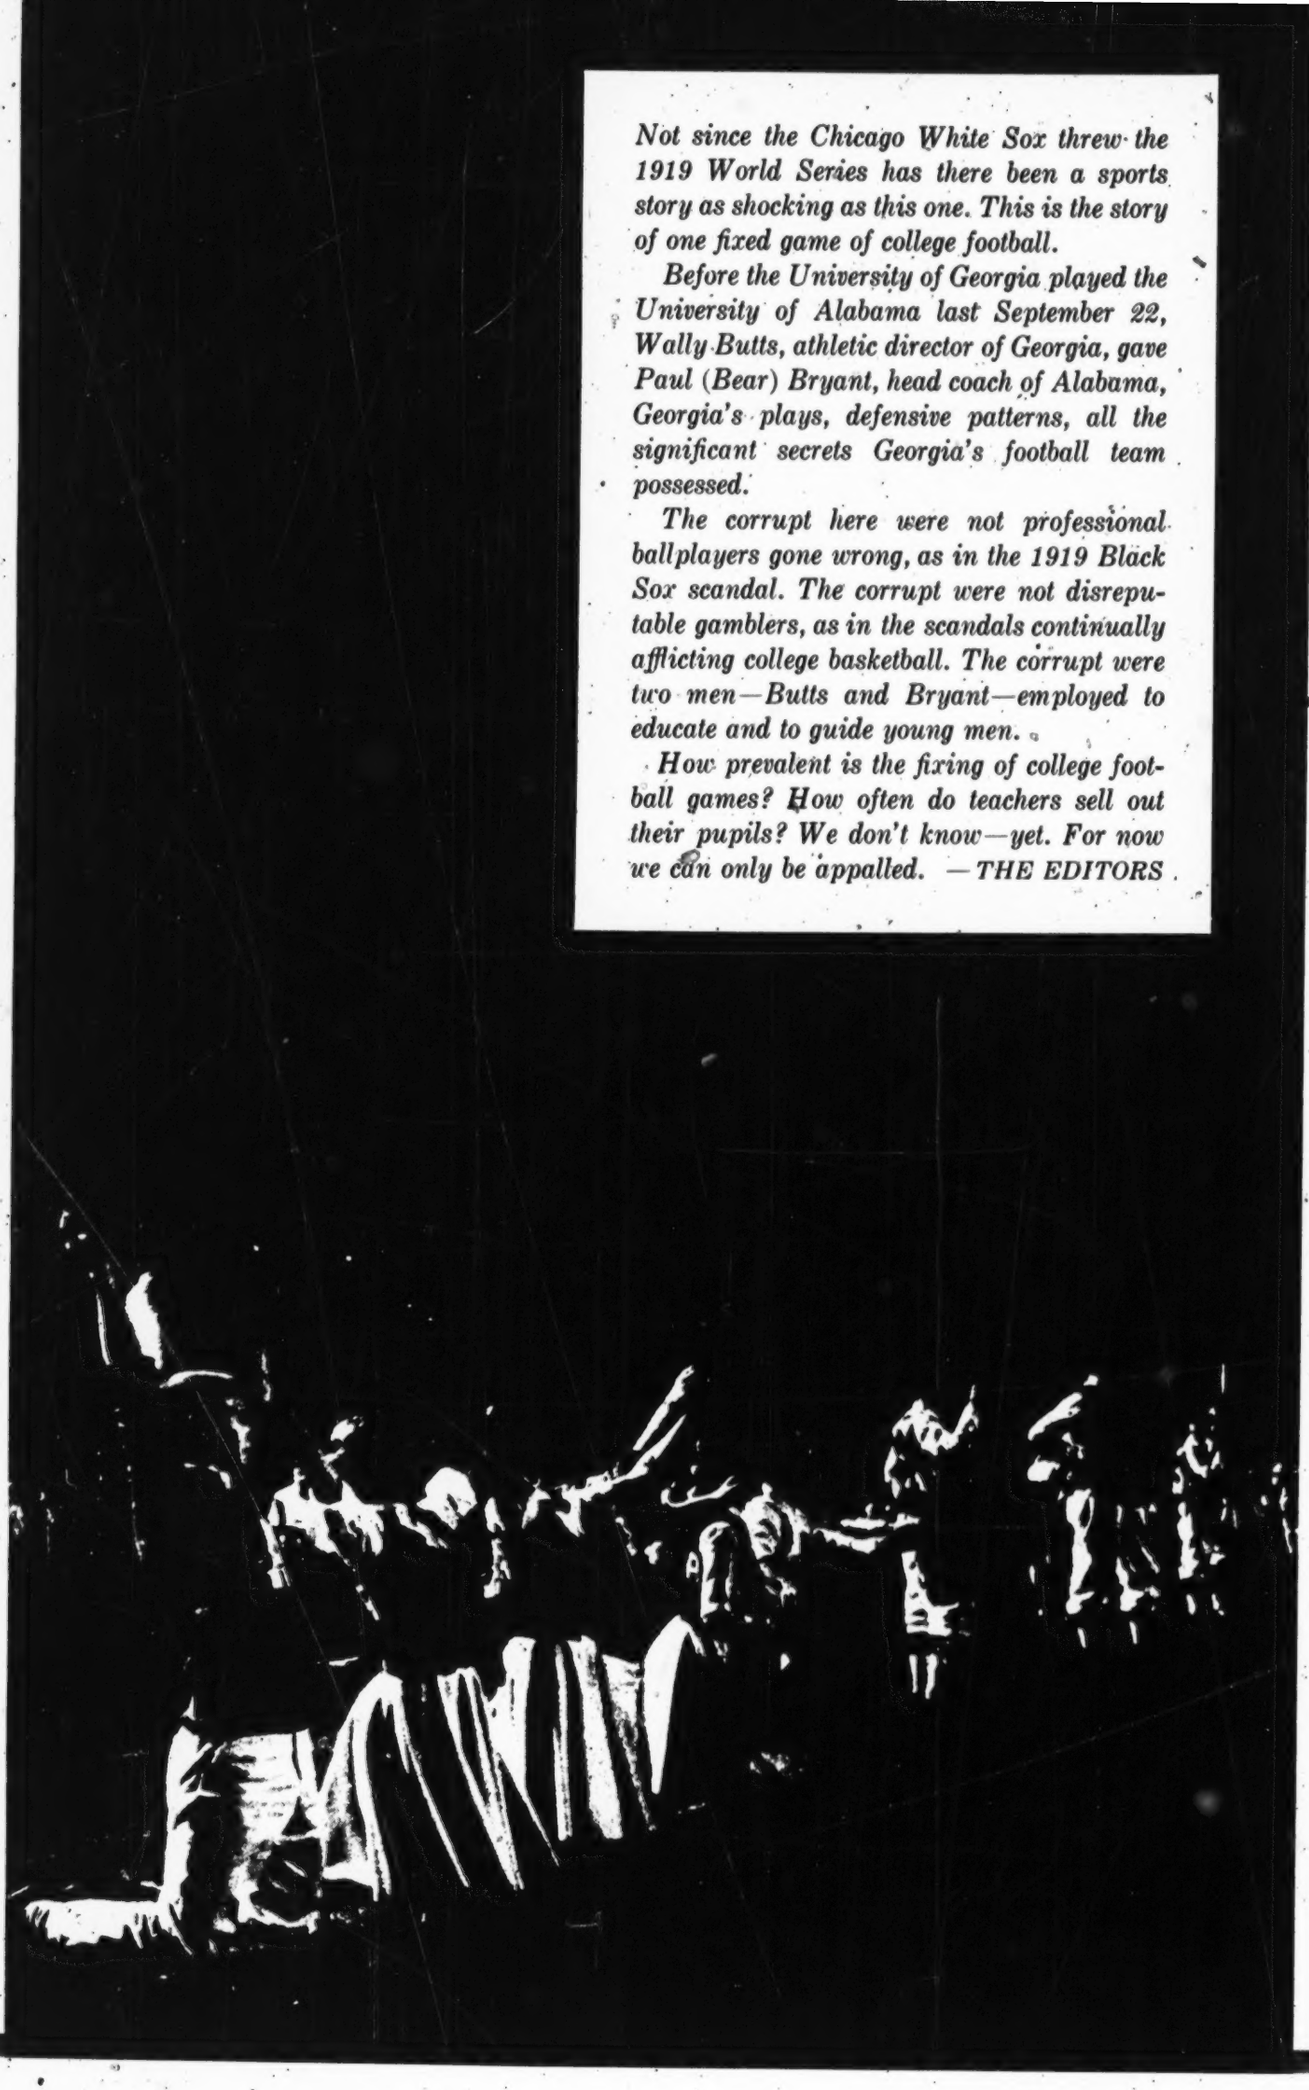
UTTS AND

Not since the Chicago White Sox threw the 1919 World Series has there been a sports story as shocking as this one. This is the story of one fixed game of college football.

Before the University of Georgia played the University of Alabama last September 22, Wally Butts, athletic director of Georgia, gave Paul (Bear) Bryant, head coach of Alabama, Georgia's plays, defensive patterns, all the significant secrets Georgia's football team possessed.

The corrupt here were not professional ballplayers gone wrong, as in the 1919 Black Sox scandal. The corrupt were not disreputable gamblers, as in the scandals continually afflicting college basketball. The corrupt were two men—Butts and Bryant—employed to educate and to guide young men.

How prevalent is the fixing of college football games? How often do teachers sell out their pupils? We don't know—yet. For now we can only be appalled. —THE EDITORS

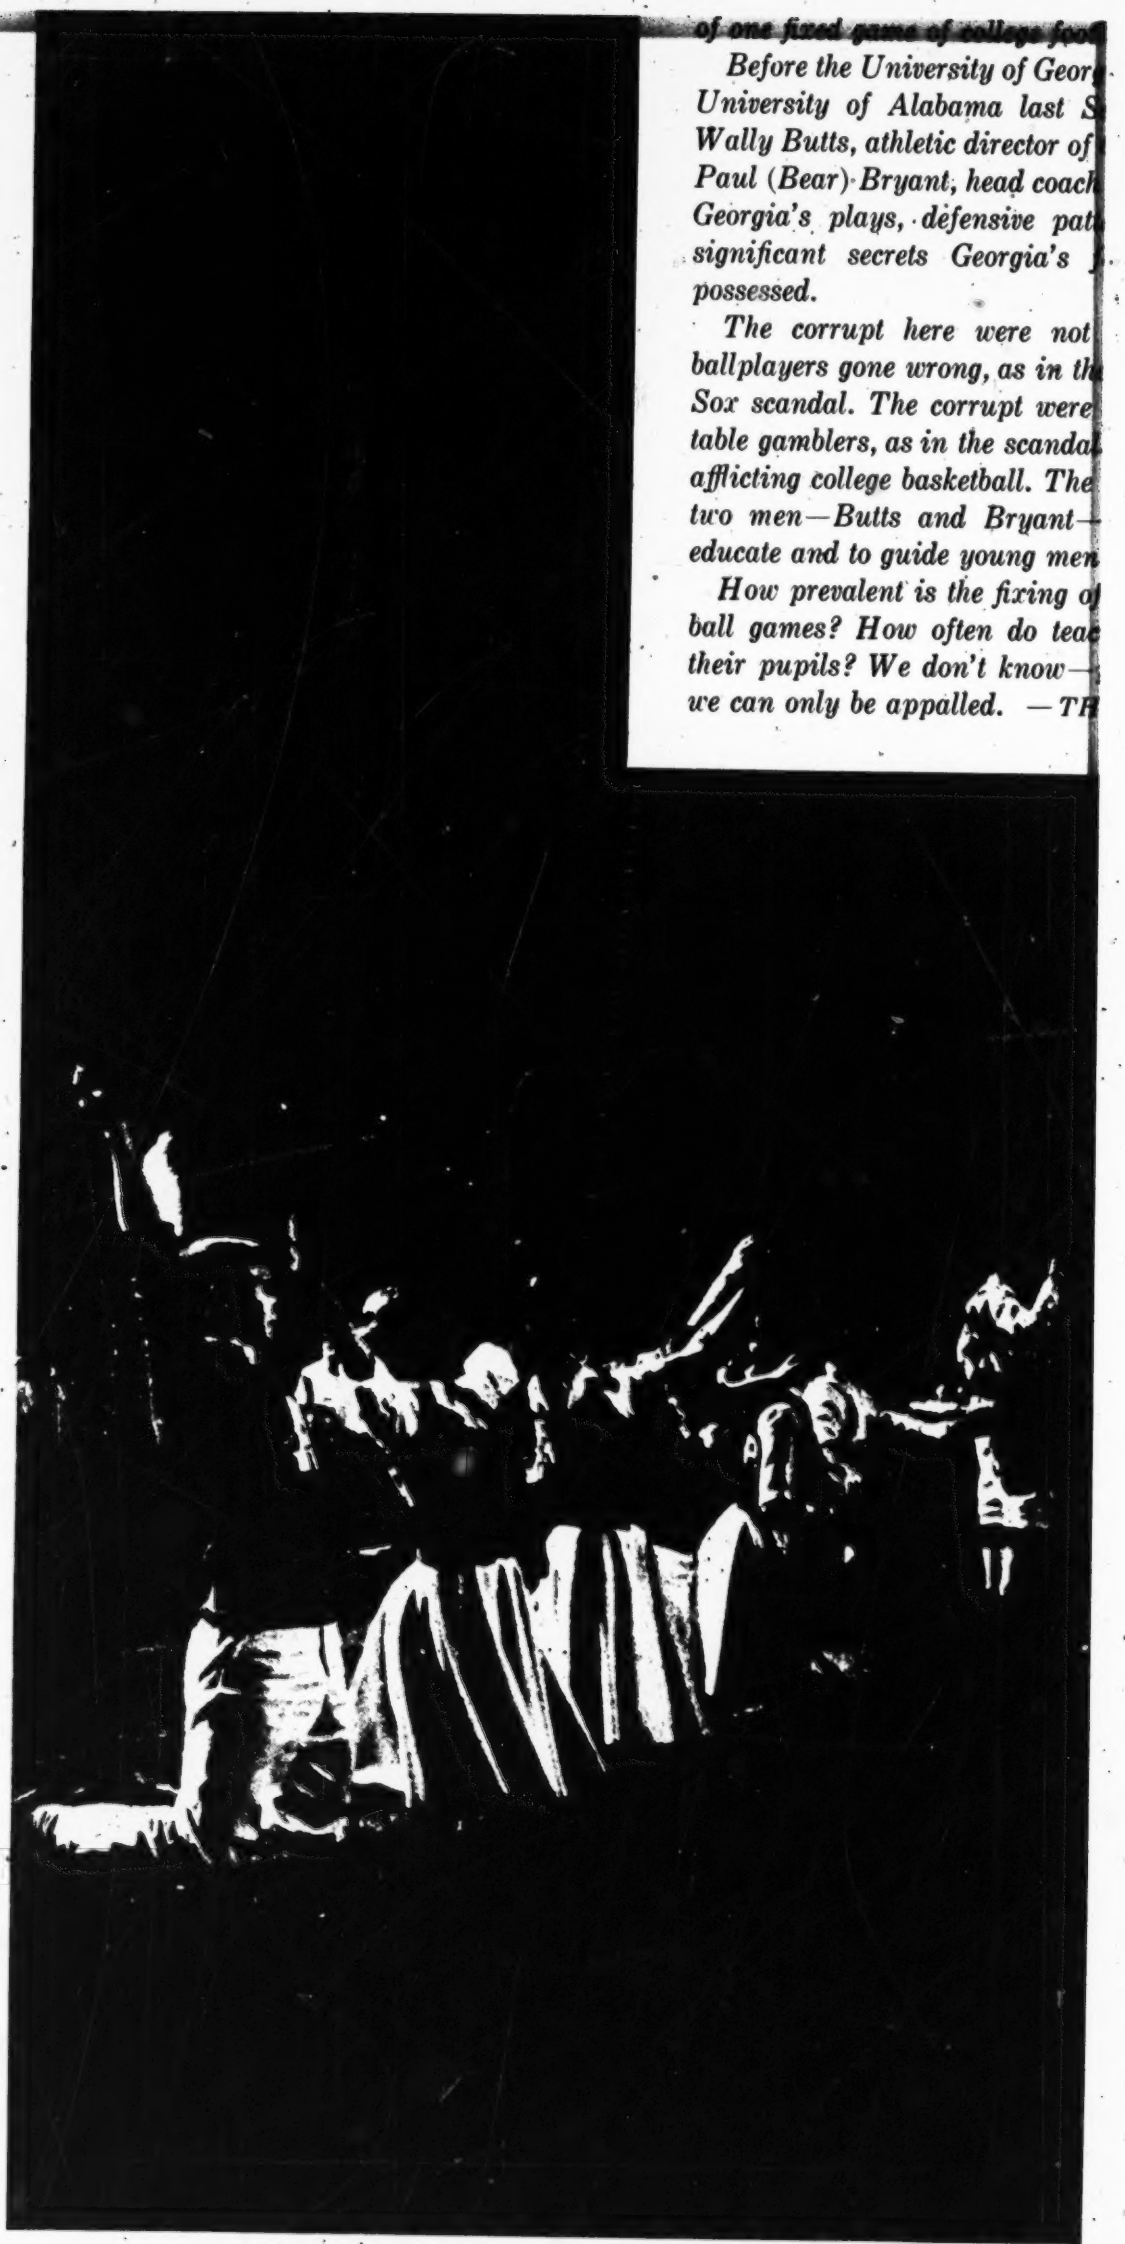


Appendix D

THE STORY OF A COLLEGE FOOTBALL FIX

A SHOCKING REPORT OF HOW WALLY BUTTS AND "BEAR" BRYANT RIGGED A GAME LAST FALL

By FRANK GRAHAM JR.



On their knees, Alabama cheerleaders plead for touchdown. Team sc of one fixed game of college foo

Before the University of Geor University of Alabama last S Wally Butts, athletic director of Paul (Bear) Bryant, head coach Georgia's plays, defensive pat significant secrets Georgia's possessed.

The corrupt here were not ballplayers gone wrong, as in th Sox scandal. The corrupt were table gamblers, as in the scandal afflicting college basketball. The two men—Butts and Bryant— educate and to guide young men

How prevalent is the fixing o ball games? How often do teac their pupils? We don't know— we can only be appalled. —TH

September 14,
salesman in At-
George Burnett
and dialed the
-relations firm.
5-3536. The line
t trying. On the had just dialed heard what he s of harsh elec-voice of a tele-

on the field, but Do you want to hall we call you ice: "I'll hold,

e age of four in s a football fan.
been hooked by nce circuit and ear a conversa-olossi of South-) Bryant is the director of the
, and Wallace
2 years the head
of Georgia and,
sation, the uni-Burnett ("I was t the phone to most incredible ke the most im-modern foot-

tt heard the op-yant was on the
to Coach Butts.
id.
have anything

tts began to give ation about the orgia would use
ght days later.
to be Alabama.
's offensive plays
m how Georgia st Alabama's at-oth players and lly Bryant asked sive or defensive ther answered in now about that.

asked," Burnett
w about quick
'Don't worry
don't have any-akestraw [Georakestraw] tipped do by the way he was behind the d drop back to r it meant he was d hand off. And Bryant was that oodward, a de-himself fast on ended, Bryant be at home on that he would.

'll call you there

ng conversation,
otes on a scratch
k. Some of the im—tackle Ray otted down as Mickey Babb's as jargon stranger that he heard.
hung up Burnett

still sat at his desk, stunned, and a little bit frightened.

Suddenly he heard an operator's voice: "Have you completed your call, sir?"

Burnett started. "Yes, operator. By the way, can you give me the number I was connected with?"

The operator supplied him with a number in Tuscaloosa, Alabama, which he later identified as that of the University of Alabama. The extension was that of the athletic department. Burnett then dialed Jackson 5-3536—the number he originally wanted. This time the call went through normally, and he reached a close friend and former business associate named Milton Flack.

"Is Wally Butts in your office now, Milt?" Burnett asked.

"Well, he's in the back office—making a phone call, I think. Here he comes now."

"Don't mention that I asked about him," Burnett said hurriedly. "I'll talk to you later."

Through some curious electronic confusion, George Burnett, calling his friend Milt Flack, had hooked into the call Wally Butts was making from a rear office in Flack's suite. He was the third man, the odd man. But he was not out.

Putting the pieces together

In the next few hours Burnett tried to piece together what he knew of Georgia football. Butts, a native of Milledgeville, Georgia, had joined the university coaching staff as an assistant in 1938. A year later he was named head coach. For 20 years he was one of the most popular and successful coaches in the South. Then prominent University of Georgia alumni abruptly soured on him, and on January 6, 1961, he was replaced by a young assistant coach named Johnny Griffith. Butts, filed away in the position of Georgia's athletic director (which he had held along with his coaching job for some years), was outspokenly bitter about his removal from the field.

Burnett knew, too, that Butts recently had been involved in a disastrous speculation in Florida orange groves. Butts had lost over $70,000 because, as someone put it, "you couldn't grow cactus on that land." One of his partners in the deal was also an associate of Milt Flack at a public-relations firm called Communications International, the office Burnett had been trying to call when he hooked into the Butts-Bryant conversation.

That afternoon Burnett told Flack what he had overheard. Both of them, though only slightly acquainted with the high-spirited, gregarious Butts, liked him, and they decided to forget the whole thing. Burnett went home in the evening and stuffed his notes away in a bureau drawer. He felt a great sense of relief. The matter, as far as he was concerned, was closed.

Eight days later, on September 22, the Georgia team traveled to Birmingham to play Alabama before a crowd of 54,000 people at Legion Field. Alabama hardly needed any "inside" information to handle the outmanned Bulldogs. Bryant, one of the country's most efficient and most ruthless coaches—he likes his players to be mean, and once wrote that football games are won by "outmeaning" the other team—had built a powerhouse that was in the middle of a 26-game winning streak. Alabama was the defending national champion, combining a fast-charging and savage-tackling defense with an effective attack built around a sensational sophomore quarterback named Joe Namath. The Georgia team was composed chiefly of unsensational sophomores.

Various betting lines showed Alabama favored by from 14 to 17 points. If a man were to bet on Alabama he would want to be pretty sure that his team could win by more than 17 points, a very uncertain wager when two major colleges are opening the season together and supposedly have no reliable line on the other's strengths and weaknesses.

Bryant, before the game, certainly did not talk to the press like a man who was playing with a stacked deck.

"The only chance we've got against Georgia is by scratching and battling for our life," he said, managing to keep a straight face. "Put that down so you can look at it next week and see how right it is."

The game itself would have been enjoyed most by a man who gets kicks from attending executions. Coach Bryant (he neglected to wear a black hood) snapped every trap. The first time Rakestraw passed, Alabama intercepted. Then Alabama quickly scored on a 52-yard pass play of its own. The Georgia players, their moves analyzed and forecast like those of rats in a maze, took a frightful physical beating.

"The Georgia backfield never got out of its backfield," one spectator said afterward. And reporter Jesse Outlar wrote in Atlanta's Sunday Journal the following day: "Every time Rakestraw got the ball he was surrounded by Alabama's All-American center Lee Roy Jordan and his eager playmates."

Georgia made only 37 yards rushing, completed only 7 of 19 passes for 79 yards, and made its deepest penetration (to Alabama's 41-yard line) on the next to the last play of the game. Georgia could do nothing right, and Alabama nothing wrong. The final score was 35–0, the most lopsided score between the two teams since 1923.

It was a bitter defeat for Georgia's promising young team. The 38-year-old Johnny Griffith, who was beginning his second season as head coach, was stunned. Asked about the game by reporter Jim Minter, he said: "I figured Alabama was about three touchdowns better than we were. So that leaves about fifteen points we can explain only by saying we didn't play any football."

Quarterback Rakestraw came even closer to the truth. "They were just so quick and mobile," he told Minter. "They seemed to know every play we were going to run."

Later other members of the Georgia squad expressed their misgivings to Furman Bisher, sports editor of the Atlanta Journal. "The Alabama players taunted us," end Mickey Babb told him. "'You can't run Eighty-eight Pop [a key Georgia play] on us,' they'd yell. They knew just what we were going to run, and just what we called it."

And Sam Richwine, the squad's trainer, told Bisher: "They played just like they knew what we were going to do. And it seemed to me a lot like things were when they played us in 1961 too." (Alabama walloped Georgia in 1961 by a score of 32–6.)

Only one man in the Georgia camp did not despair that day. Asked by reporter

George Burnett of Atlanta: He overheard critical long-distance call.

Wally Butts, former athletic director of Georgia: He gave away Georgia plays, defense patterns.

Head coach Paul (Bear) Bryant of Alabama. He took plays for his defending national champions.

remain in his job. On January 28 a report reached the newspapers that Butts had resigned. At first it was denied by Butts and the university. A few days later it was confirmed with the additional news—that Butts would remain as athletic director until June 1 so that he could qualify for certain pension benefits. Rumors flooded Atlanta. One of the wildest was that Butts was mysteriously and suddenly ill and had entered the state hospital at Athens. This was quickly scotched when Georgia University officials maintained that Butts merely went for the physical checkup required for his pension records. Shortly afterward he was seen in Atlanta at a Georgia Tech basketball game.

But if Butts was seen publicly, events involving him remained closely guarded secrets. Burnett was asked to come to the Atlanta office of M. Cook Barwick, an attorney representing the University of Georgia. There he met Dr. O. C. Aderhold, the university president. Burnett's story was carefully checked. He then agreed to take a lie-detector test, which was administered by polygraph expert Sidney McMain, in the Atlanta Federal building. Burnett passed the test to everybody's satisfaction.

Phone-company check

Next an official of the Southern Bell Telephone Company checked and found that a call had been made from the office of Communications International to the University of Alabama extension noted by Burnett on his scratch pad. This information corroborated Burnett's statement that the call had been made at about 10:25 in the morning and had lasted 15 or 16 minutes.

"I jotted down the time when the call was completed," Burnett said. "It was 10:40. This is an old navigator's habit, I guess. For instance, I know that I was shot down over Saint-Vith at exactly 10:21, because when the bombardier called 'Bombs away!' I looked at my watch and wrote down the time. A few seconds later we got hit."

University officials still nursed reservations about Burnett's story because of the fantastic coincidence that had enabled him to overhear Butts's call. Then, during one of the many conferences he attended in attorney Barwick's office in the Rhodes-Haverty Building, a second coincidence, equally odd, cleared the air. Barwick placed a call to Doctor Aderhold at the university. Suddenly, Barwick and Aderhold found themselves somehow braided into a four-way conversation with two unknown female voices. The two men burst into nervous laughter. Burnett's story gained a little more credence.

February 21 was a painful day for George Burnett. He was summoned once more to Barwick's office, because Bernie Moore, the commissioner of the Southeastern Conference, "wanted to ask some questions." On Burnett's arrival he found not only Moore but Doctor Aderhold, two members of the university's board of regents, and another man identified as Bill Hartman, a friend of Wally Butts.

From the start, Burnett sensed a mood of hostility in the air. The ball was carried by one of the members of the Georgia board of regents, who confronted Burnett with a report that he had been arrested two years before for writing bad checks and that he was still on probation when he overheard the conversation between Butts and Bryant.

"Is there anything else in your past you're trying to cover up?" the regents official demanded.

Burnett was frightened and angry. "'I didn't realize that I was on trial," he said. He went on to say that he had nothing to hide, that he had given university officials permission to look into his background, and that he had taken a lie-detector test, signed an affidavit that his testimony was true and permitted his statements to be recorded on tape. His notes had been taken from him and placed by Barwick in the safety-deposit vault of an Atlanta bank.

"I was arrested on a bad-check charge," Burnett admitted. "I was way behind on my bills and two of the checks I wrote—one was for twenty-five dollars and the other for twenty dollars—bounced. I was fined one hundred dollars and put on probation for a year. I think that anybody who is fair will find I got into trouble because I've always had trouble handling my financial affairs and not because I acted with criminal intent."

Burnett was shaken by this meeting. He felt that he had been candid with the university but that he had also angered many friends of Wally Butts. He signed a paper at the officials' request which gave the university permission to have his war records opened and examined. He cared about his reputation. He was proud to have been a navigator.

"Doctor Aderhold was always very kind to me at those meetings," Burnett said later, "but I didn't like the attitude of some of the others. I began to feel that I'd be hurt when and if these people decided to make this mess public. That's when I went to my lawyer, and we agreed that I should tell my story to The Saturday Evening Post."

Now the net closed on Wally Butts. On February 23 the University of Georgia's athletic board met hastily in Atlanta and confronted Butts with Burnett's testimony. Challenged, Butts refused to take a lie-detector test. The next day's newspapers reported that he had submitted his resignation, effective immediately, "for purely personal and business purposes."

"I still think I'm able to coach a little," Butts told a reporter that day, "and I feel I can help a pro team."

The chances are that Wally Butts will never help any football team again. Bear Bryant may well follow him into oblivion—a special hell for that grim extrovert—for in a very real sense he betrayed the boys he was pledged to lead. The investigation by university and Southeastern Conference officials is continuing; motion pictures of other games are being scrutinized; where it will end no one so far can say. But careers will be ruined, that is sure. A great sport will be permanently damaged. For many people the bloom must pass forever from college football.

"I never had a chance, did I?" Coach Johnny Griffith said bitterly to a friend the other day. "I never had a chance."

When a fixer works against you, that's the way he likes it. THE END

s and Bryant meet as friends, exchange warm gr
Butts gia-Alabama game at Legion Field, Birmingham, A Georgia

THE
OF EGE
ALL FIX

NG REPORT
BUTTS AND NT RIGGED
LAST FALL

GRAHAM JR.

of one fixed game of college football.

Before the University of Georgia played the University of Alabama last September 22, Wally Butts, athletic director of Georgia, gave Paul (Bear) Bryant, head coach of Alabama, Georgia's plays, defensive patterns, all the significant secrets - Georgia's football team possessed.

The corrupt here were not professional ballplayers gone wrong, as in the 1919 Black Sox scandal. The corrupt were not disreputable gamblers, as in the scandals continually afflicting college basketball. The corrupt were two men—Butts and Bryant—employed to educate and to guide young men.

How prevalent is the fixing of college football games? How often do teachers sell out their pupils? We don't know—yet. For now we can only be appalled. —THE EDITORS

On their knees, Alabama cheerleaders plead for touchdown. Team scored five.

On Friday morning, September 14, 1962, an insurance salesman in Atlanta, Georgia, named George Burnett picked up his telephone and dialed the number of a local public-relations firm. The number was Jackson 5-3536. The line was busy, but Burnett kept trying. On the fourth or fifth attempt he had just dialed the final number when he heard what he later described as "a series of harsh electronic sounds," then the voice of a telephone operator said:

"Coach Bryant is out on the field, but he'll come to the phone. Do you want to hold, Coach Butts, or shall we call you back?"

And then a man's voice: "I'll hold, operator."

Like most males over the age of four in Atlanta, George Burnett is a football fan. He realized that he had been hooked by accident into a long-distance circuit and that he was about to overhear a conversation between two of the colossi of Southern football. Paul (Bear) Bryant is the head coach and athletic director of the University of Alabama, and Wallace "Wally" Butts was for 22 years the head coach of the University of Georgia and, at the time of this conversation, the university's athletic director. Burnett ("I was curious, naturally") kept the phone to his ear. Through this almost incredible coincidence he was to make the most important interception in modern football history.

After a brief wait Burnett heard the operator say that Coach Bryant was on the phone and ready to speak to Coach Butts.

"Hello, Bear," Butts said.

"Hello, Wally. Do you have anything for me?"

As Burnett listened, Butts began to give Bryant detailed information about the plays and formations Georgia would use in its opening game eight days later. Georgia's opponent was to be Alabama.

Butts outlined Georgia's offensive plays for Bryant and told him how Georgia planned to defend against Alabama's attack. Butts mentioned both players and plays by name. Occasionally Bryant asked Butts about specific offensive or defensive maneuvers, and Butts either answered in detail or said, "I don't know about that. I'll have to find out."

"One question Bryant asked," Burnett recalled later, "was 'How about quick kicks?' And Butts said, 'Don't worry about quick kicks. They don't have anyone who can do it.'

"Butts also said that Rakestraw [Georgia quarterback Larry Rakestraw] tipped off what he was going to do by the way he held his feet. If one foot was behind the other it meant he would drop back to pass. If they were together it meant he was setting himself to spin and hand off. And another thing he told Bryant was that Woodward [Brigham Woodward, a defensive back] committed himself fast on pass defense."

As the conversation ended, Bryant asked Butts if he would be at home on Sunday. Butts answered that he would.

"Fine," Bryant said. "I'll call you there Sunday."

Listening to this amazing conversation, Burnett began to make notes on a scratch pad he kept on his desk. Some of the names were strange to him—tackle Ray Rissmiller's name he jotted down as "Ricemiller," and end Mickey Babb's as "Baer"—and some of the jargon stranger still, but he recorded all that he heard. When the two men had hung up Burnett still sat at his desk, stunned, and a little bit frightened.

Suddenly he heard an operator's voice: "Have you completed your call, sir?"

Burnett started. "Yes, operator. By the way, can you give me the number I was connected with?"

The operator supplied him with a number in Tuscaloosa, Alabama, which he later identified as that of the University of Alabama. The extension was that of the athletic department. Burnett then dialed Jackson 5-3536—the number he originally wanted. This time the call went through normally, and he reached a close friend and former business associate named Milton Flack.

"Is Wally Butts in your office now, Milt?" Burnett asked.

"Well, he's in the back office—making a phone call, I think. Here he comes now."

"Don't mention that I asked about him," Burnett said hurriedly. "I'll talk to you later."

Through some curious electronic confusion, George Burnett, calling his friend Milt Flack, had hooked into the call Wally Butts was making from a rear office in Flack's suite. He was the third man, the odd man. But he was not out.

Putting the pieces together

In the next few hours Burnett tried to piece together what he knew of Georgia football. Butts, a native of Milledgeville, Georgia, had joined the university coaching staff as an assistant in 1938. A year later he was named head coach. For 20 years he was one of the most popular and successful coaches in the South. Then prominent University of Georgia alumni abruptly soured on him, and on January 6, 1961, he was replaced by a young assistant coach named Johnny Griffith. Butts, filed away in the position of Georgia's athletic director (which he had held along with his coaching job for some years), was outspokenly bitter about his removal from the field.

Burnett knew, too, that Butts recently had been involved in a disastrous speculation in Florida orange groves. Butts had lost over $70,000 because, as someone put it, "you couldn't grow cactus on that land." One of his partners in the deal was also an associate of Milt Flack at a public-relations firm called Communications International, the office Burnett had been trying to call when he hooked into the Butts-Bryant conversation.

That afternoon Burnett told Flack what he had overheard. Both of them, though only slightly acquainted with the high-spirited, gregarious Butts, liked him, and they decided to forget the whole thing. Burnett went home in the evening and stuffed his notes away in a bureau drawer. He felt a great sense of relief. The matter, as far as he was concerned, was closed.

Eight days later, on September 22, the Georgia team traveled to Birmingham to play Alabama before a crowd of 54,000 people at Legion Field, Alabama hardly needed any "inside" information to handle the outmanned Bulldogs. Bryant, one of the country's most efficient and most ruthless coaches—he likes his players to be mean, and once wrote that football games are won by "outmeaning" the other team—had built a powerhouse that was in the middle of a 26-game winning streak. Alabama was the defending national champion, combining a fast-charging and savage-tackling defense with an effective attack built around a sensational sophomore quarterback named Joe Namath. The Georgia team was composed chiefly of unsensational sophomores.

Various betting lines showed Alabama favored by from 14 to 17 points. If a man were to bet on Alabama he would want to be pretty sure that his team could win by more than 17 points, a very uncertain wager when two major colleges are opening the season together and supposedly have no reliable line on the other's strengths and weaknesses.

Bryant, before the game, certainly did not talk to the press like a man who was playing with a stacked deck.

"The only chance we've got against Georgia is by scratching and battling for our life," he said, managing to keep a straight face. "Put that down so you can look at it next week and see how right it is."

The game itself would have been enjoyed most by a man who gets kicks from attending executions. Coach Bryant (he neglected to wear a black hood) snapped every trap. The first time Rakestraw passed, Alabama intercepted. Then Alabama quickly scored on a 52-yard pass play of its own. The Georgia players, their moves analyzed and forecast like those of rats in a maze, took a frightful physical beating.

"The Georgia backfield never got out of its backfield," one spectator said afterward. And reporter Jesse Outlar wrote in Atlanta's Sunday Journal the following day: "Every time Rakestraw got the ball he was surrounded by Alabama's All-American center Lee Roy Jordan and his eager playmates."

Georgia made only 37 yards rushing, completed only 7 of 19 passes for 79 yards, and made its deepest penetration (to Alabama's 41-yard line) on the next to the last play of the game. Georgia could do nothing right, and Alabama nothing wrong. The final score was 35–0, the most lopsided score between the two teams since 1923.

It was a bitter defeat for Georgia's promising young team. The 38-year-old Johnny Griffith, who was beginning his second season as head coach, was stunned. Asked about the game by reporter Jim Minter, he said: "I figured Alabama was about three touchdowns better than we were. So that leaves about fifteen points we can explain only by saying we didn't play any football."

Quarterback Rakestraw came even closer to the truth. "They were just so quick and mobile," he told Minter. "They seemed to know every play we were going to run."

Later other members of the Georgia squad expressed their misgivings to Furman Bisher, sports editor of the Atlanta Journal. "The Alabama players taunted us," end Mickey Babb told him. "'You can't run Eighty-eight Pop [a key Georgia play] on us,' they'd yell. They knew just what we were going to run, and just what we called it."

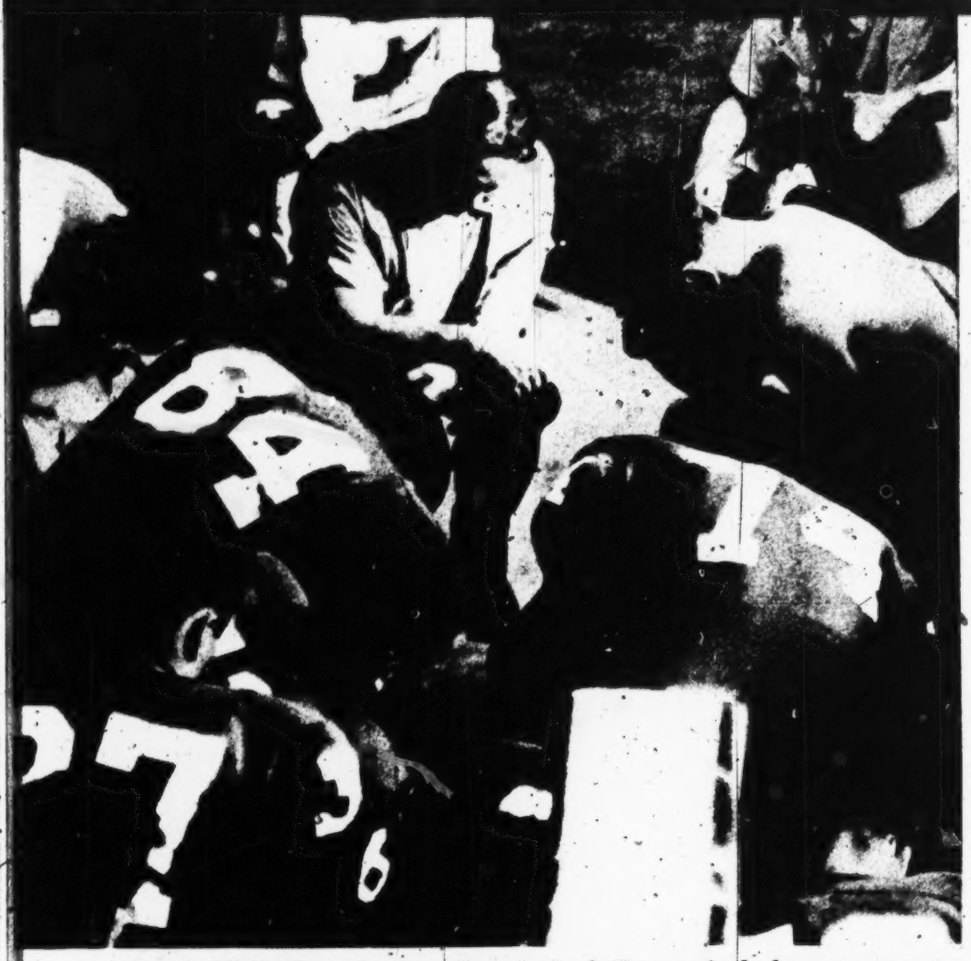
And Sam Richwine, the squad's trainer, told Bisher: "They played just like they knew what we were going to do. And it seemed to me a lot like things were when they played us in 1961 too." (Alabama walloped Georgia in 1961 by a score of 32–6.)

Only one man in the Georgia camp did not despair that day. Asked by reporter

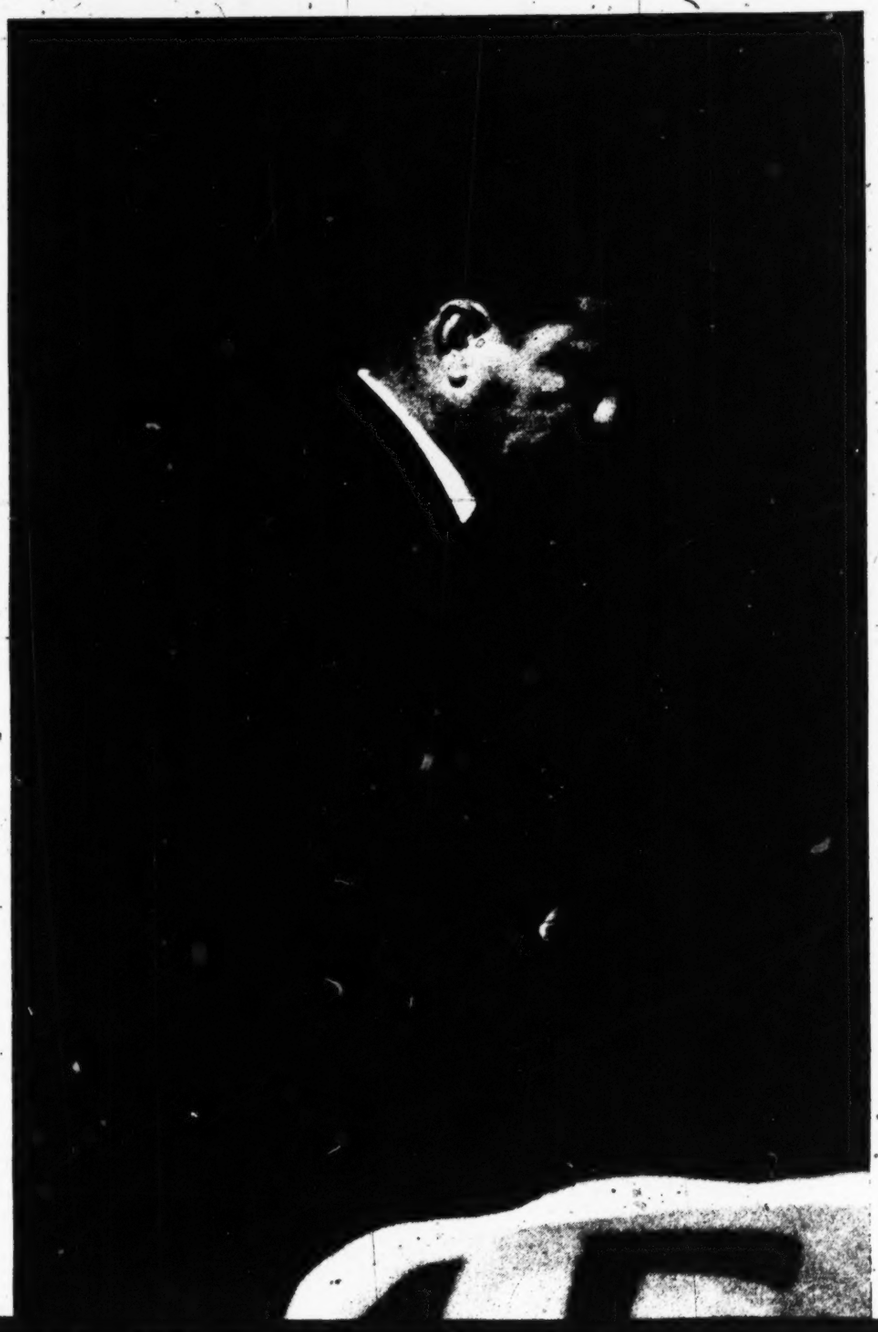
George Burnett of Atlanta: He overheard critical long-distance call.

Wally Butts, f rector of Georg Georgia plays,

Head coach Po of Alabama. H defending nat



Solemnly Wally Butts leads a Georgia football team in locker-room prayer.



Downcast coach Griffith slouches near bench as Georgia team is slaughtered.

John Logue about Georgia's disappointing performance, ex-coach Wally Butts nodded wisely and set him straight. "Potential is the word for what I saw," he said. "Unlimited potential."

The whole matter weighed heavily on George Burnett. He began to wonder if he had done the right thing when he had put the notes aside and kept his mouth shut. Now 41 years old, he was still struggling to support his large family. Among his five children were a couple of boys who played football. "How would I feel," Burnett asked himself, "if my boys were going out on the field to have their heads banged in by a stronger team, and then I discovered they'd been sold out?" He began to wake up at night and lie there in the dark, thinking about it.

In one sense Burnett knew it would be easiest to keep the notes in the drawer. While every citizen is encouraged to report a crime to authorities, the penalties against the man who talks are often more severe than those against the culprit. Burnett wasn't worried about physical retaliation. But there might be social and economic ones. Football is almost a religion in the South; the big-name coaches there are minor deities.

Butts no longer had his old-time stature, but many people were still intensely loyal to him (and he was a director of the small Atlanta insurance agency where Burnett worked). Bear Bryant was a national figure who had made impressive records at Texas A&M and Kentucky, and had more recently transformed Alabama from pushovers to national champions.

Burnett, protective toward his family, fearful of challenging deities, was troubled by a drive to do what was right. But what was right? To talk? To create furore, perhaps even national scandal? Or should he remain silent, ignoring wrong? That was a safe course, but one that might sit heavily on his conscience for all the rest of his days.

Living in his private misery, he thought about his past. Burnett himself had played high-school football in San Antonio, Texas, where he was born. During World War II he became a group navigator aboard a Martin B-26. On January 14, 1945, when his plane was shot down over Saint-Vith, Belgium, he was the only survivor. He lost part of his left hand, and spent the rest of the war in a German prison camp. Articulate and personable, he was now the division manager of the insurance agency.

On January 4 of this year he sat in his office with Bob Edwards, a longtime friend who was also an employee of the agency. Burnett knew that Edwards had played football with Johnny Griffith at South Georgia, a junior college.

"You know, Bob," Burnett said, after they had talked business for a while, "there's something that's been eating me up for a long while. I was going to tell you about it at the time, and then I decided to keep quiet. But I think you should know this, being a friend of Johnny Griffith."

After Edwards heard the story of the phone call, he asked if he could report it to Griffith. Burnett, still reluctant to get seriously involved, told Edwards to go ahead but to

it. Powerful fended if W
Burnett did own career ju ning to break

But like so that there is volvement. G and nervously dle of Januar
Griffith in th
Atlanta's Bilt
a general me Conference c
the Biltmore.

The Georg forgotten by athletic offici of conversati between Alab which Bryant been broken.

Alabama, trailed 7–6 w
minute to pl first down o line. Since Br goal kicker, have been to Tech's line, k goalposts an order a field-feated Georg goal in 1961.
back passed intercepted, ball during t
thus scoring

During the Biltmore, Br about that fi

Away from Griffith's ro
Georgia-Alab to Burnett's
Suddenly he

"I didn't b ute," he told thing in you possibly have about our pa from Wally and I gave i uses the old man. Wally

Suspicio

Griffith fin asked Burne
Burnett nod

"We knew to Alabama maybe to a played too.
Wally Butts. half of the kept coming 'Coach, we backers are we're still ca

Griffith ha
when he ha
notes, and B
"I don't thi
thinking wha
I didn't hav

Griffith w them what would resig

s a Georgia football team in locker-room prayer.

Downcast coach Griffith slouches near bench as Georgia team is slaughtered

John Logue about Georgia's disappointing performance, ex-coach Wally Butts nodded wisely and set him straight. "Potential is the word for what I saw," he said. "Unlimited potential."

The whole matter weighed heavily on George Burnett. He began to wonder if he had done the right thing when he had put the notes aside and kept his mouth shut. Now 41 years old, he was still struggling to support his large family. Among his five children were a couple of boys who played football. "How would I feel," Burnett asked himself, "if my boys were going out on the field to have their heads banged in by a stronger team, and then I discovered they'd been sold out?" He began to wake up at night and lie there in the dark, thinking about it.

In one sense Burnett knew it would be easiest to keep the notes in the drawer. While every citizen is encouraged to report a crime to authorities, the penalties against the man who talks are often more severe than those against the culprit. Burnett wasn't worried about physical retaliation. But there might be social and economic ones. Football is almost a religion in the South; the big-name coaches there are minor deities.

Butts no longer had his old-time stature, but many people were still intensely loyal to him (and he was a director of the small Atlanta insurance agency where Burnett worked). Bear Bryant was a national figure who had made impressive records at Texas A&M and Kentucky, and had more recently transformed Alabama from pushovers to national champions.

Burnett, protective toward his family, fearful of challenging deities, was troubled by a drive to do what was right. But what was right? To talk? To create furore, perhaps even national scandal? Or should he remain silent, ignoring wrong? That was a safe course, but one that might sit heavily on his conscience for all the rest of his days.

Living in his private misery, he thought about his past. Burnett himself had played high-school football in San Antonio, Texas, where he was born. During World War II he became a group navigator aboard a Martin B-26. On January 14, 1945, when his plane was shot down over Saint-Vith, Belgium, he was the only survivor. He lost part of his left hand, and spent the rest of the war in a German prison camp. Articulate and personable, he was now the division manager of the insurance agency.

On January 4 of this year he sat in his office with Bob Edwards, a longtime friend who was also an employee of the agency. Burnett knew that Edwards had played football with Johnny Griffith at South Georgia, a junior college.

"You know, Bob," Burnett said, after they had talked business for a while, "there's something that's been eating me up for a long while. I was going to tell you about it at the time, and then I decided to keep quiet. But I think you should know this, being a friend of Johnny Griffith."

After Edwards heard the story of the phone call, he asked if he could report it to Griffith. Burnett, still reluctant to get seriously involved, told Edwards to go ahead but to try to keep his name out of it. Powerful men in Georgia might be offended if Wally Butts was hurt, and Burnett did not want to jeopardize his own career just when things were beginning to break nicely for him.

But like so many others, Burnett found that there is no such thing as a little involvement. Griffith pressed to meet him, and nervously Burnett agreed. In the middle of January he met with Edwards and Griffith in the Georgia coach's room at Atlanta's Biltmore Hotel. Simultaneously a general meeting of the Southeastern Conference coaches was taking place at the Biltmore.

The Georgia-Alabama game had been forgotten by most of the coaches and athletic officials present. A popular topic of conversation was a late-season game between Alabama and Georgia Tech, in which Bryant's long winning streak had been broken.

Alabama, a five-point favorite, had trailed 7–6 with only a little more than a minute to play. Then Alabama made a first down on the Georgia Tech 14-yard line. Since Bryant had a competent field-goal kicker, the classic strategy would have been to pound away at the middle of Tech's line, keeping the ball between the goalposts and, on third or fourth down, order a field-goal try. (Alabama had defeated Georgia Tech on a last-minute field goal in 1961.) Instead, Bryant's quarterback passed on first down. The pass was intercepted, and Georgia Tech held the ball during the game's waning seconds, thus scoring last season's greatest upset.

During the January conference at the Biltmore, Bryant was frequently kidded about that first-down pass.

Away from the bars and the crowds, in Griffith's room the talk was only of Georgia-Alabama. Griffith listened grimly to Burnett's story, then read his notes. Suddenly he looked up.

"I didn't believe you until just this minute," he told Burnett. "But here's something in your notes that you couldn't possibly have dreamed up . . . this thing about our pass patterns. I took this over from Wally Butts when I became coach, and I gave it a different name. Nobody uses the old name for this pattern but one man. Wally Butts."

Suspicions confirmed

Griffith finished reading the notes, then asked Burnett if he could keep them. Burnett nodded.

"We knew somebody'd given our plays to Alabama," Griffith told him, "and maybe to a couple of other teams we played too. But we had no idea it was Wally Butts. You know, during the first half of the Alabama game my players kept coming to the sidelines and saying, 'Coach, we been sold out. Their linebackers are hollering out our plays while we're still calling the signals.'"

Griffith has since spoken of his feelings when he had finished reading Burnett's notes, and Burnett and Edwards had left. "I don't think I moved for an hour—thinking what I should do. Then I realized I didn't have any choice."

Griffith went to university officials, told them what he knew and said that he would resign if Butts was permitted to

of Georgia's beaten Bulldogs: "I never had a chance."

with a report that he had been arrested two years before for writing bad checks and that he was still on probation when he overheard the conversation between Butts and Bryant.

"Is there anything else in your past you're trying to cover up?" the regents official demanded.

Burnett was frightened and angry. "I didn't realize that I was on trial," he said. He went on to say that he had nothing to hide, that he had given university officials permission to look into his background, and that he had taken a lie-detector test, signed an affidavit that his testimony was true and permitted his statements to be recorded on tape. His notes had been taken from him and placed by Barwick in the safety-deposit vault of an Atlanta bank.

"I was arrested on a bad-check charge," Burnett admitted. "I was way behind on my bills and two of the checks I wrote—one was for twenty-five dollars and the other for twenty dollars—bounced. I was fined one hundred dollars and put on probation for a year. I think that anybody who is fair will find I got into trouble because I've always had trouble handling my financial affairs and not because I acted with criminal intent."

Burnett was shaken by this meeting. He felt that he had been candid with the university but that he had also angered many friends of Wally Butts. He signed a paper at the officials' request which gave the university permission to have his war records opened and examined. He cared about his reputation. He was proud to have been a navigator.

"Doctor Aderhold was always very kind to me at those meetings," Burnett said later, "but I didn't like the attitude of some of the others. I began to feel that I'd be hurt when and if these people decided to make this mess public. That's when I went to my lawyer, and we agreed that I should tell my story to The Saturday Evening Post."

Now the net closed on Wally Butts. On February 23 the University of Georgia's athletic board met hastily in Atlanta and confronted Butts with Burnett's testimony. Challenged, Butts refused to take a lie-detector test. The next day's newspapers reported that he had submitted his resignation, effective immediately, "for purely personal and business purposes."

"I still think I'm able to coach a little," Butts told a reporter that day, "and I feel I can help a pro team."

The chances are that Wally Butts will never help any football team again. Bear Bryant may well follow him into oblivion—a special hell for that grim extrovert—for in a very real sense he betrayed the boys he was pledged to lead. The investigation by university and Southeastern Conference officials is continuing; motion pictures of other games are being scrutinized; where it will end no one so far can say. But careers will be ruined, that is sure. A great sport will be permanently damaged. For many people the bloom must pass forever from college football.

"I never had a chance, did I?" Coach Johnny Griffith said bitterly to a friend the other day. "I never had a chance."

When a fixer works against you, that's the way he likes it. THE END

Butts and Bryant meet as friends, exchange warm greetings before the Georgia-Alabama game at Legion Field, Birmingham, Alabama, in 1960.

INDEX

Page

CITATIONS TO OPINIONS BELOW 1

QUESTIONS PRESENTED 1

ADDITIONAL STATUTES INVOLVED 2

COUNTER-STATEMENT 2

CURTIS' STATEMENT FAILS TO SET OUT THE FACTS AS TO WAIVER 2

Curtis Raised The Constitutional Defenses In Two Alabama Libel Suits 3

Curtis' Defensive Strategy 4

CURTIS' STATEMENT FAILS TO SET OUT THE FACTS WHICH ESTABLISHED MALICE . 5

Curtis' New Editorial Policy 5

Curtis Ignored Warnings That The Stories Were False 6

The District Court's Summary Of The Evidence In Respect Of Malice 8

The Circuit Court Approved The District Court's Appraisal Of The Evidence 12

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT 13

ARGUMENT 16

I. PETITIONER WAIVED THE RIGHT TO CHALLENGE THE VERDICT AND JUDGMENT ON ANY OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL GROUNDS ASSERTED IN TIMES V. SULLIVAN 16

Petitioner Chose The Strategy Of Which It Now Complains 16

INDEX (Continued)

Page

This Court's Decisions Relative To Waiver Support Respondent 20

This Court's Holding In Times v. Sullivan Affords No Excuse For Its Decision Not To Raise At The Trial The Constitutional Defenses Now Urged 21

Respondent Was Not A "Public Official" 24

II. UNLIKE TIMES V. SULLIVAN, THE UNDISPUTED EVIDENCE SHOWS CONCLUSIVELY THAT ACTUAL MALICE WAS PROVED 26

The Charge As To Malice Was Adequate 33

III. THE JUDGMENT FOR PUNITIVE DAMAGES VIOLATED NO CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS OF PETITIONER 34

CONCLUSION 42

APPENDIX A 43

APPENDIX B 45

TABLE OF CASES CITED (Continued)

Page

Ackerman v. U. S., 340 U.S. 193 (1950) 21

Augusta Evening News v. Radford, 91 Ga. 494, 17 S.E. 612 (1893) 17

Butts v. Curtis Pub. Co., 225 F. Supp. 916 (D.C. Ga., 1964) 31

Caldwell v. Crowell-Collier Pub. Co., 161 F. 2d 333 (5th Cir. 1947) 22

Cox v. Strickland, 101 Ga. 482, 28 S.E. 655 (1897) 37

Gandia v. Pettingill, 222 U.S. 452 (1912) 22

Hamm v. Rock Hill, 379 U.S. 306 (1964) 23

Kennedy v. Mid-Continent Telecasting, Inc., 394 P. 2d 400 (Kan. 1964) 23

New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964) 13

Page v. Regents of University System of Georgia, 304 U.S. 439 (1938) 24

Pape v. Time, Inc., _____ F. 2d _____ (7th Cir., 1966) 32

Pearce v. Brower, 72 Ga. 243 (1884) 17

Reynolds v. Pegler, 223 F. 2d 429 (2nd Cir. 1955) 41

Selalise v. National Utility Service, Inc., 120 F. 2d 938 (5th Cir. 1941) 40

Sikes v. Foster, 74 Ga. App. 350, 39 S.E. 2d 585 (1947) 40

Sweeney v. Schenectady Union Pub. Co., 122 F. 2d 288 (2nd Cir. 1941) 22

TABLE OF CASES CITED (Continued)

Page

United States v. Alabama, 362 U.S. 602 (1960) ... 23

United States v. Chambers, 291 U.S. 217 (1934) ... 23

United States v. Sorrentino, 175 F. 2d 721 (3rd Cir. 1949) ... 20

United States v. The Schooner Peggy, 1 Cranch 103 (1801) ... 23

Vandenbark v. Owens-Illinois Glass Co., 311 U.S. 538 (1941) ... 23

Wardman-Justice Motors v. Petrie, 39 F. 2d 512 (D.C. Cir. 1930) ... 41

Wilson v. Sullivan, 81 Ga. 238, 7 S.E. 274 (1888) ... 17

Yakus v. United States, 321 U.S. 414 (1944) ... 20

STATUTES AND AUTHORITIES CITED

Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Rule 51 ... 33

Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Rule 60(b) ... 13

Ga. Code Ann. §32-152 ... 25

Ga. Code Ann. §32-153 ... 25

Ga. Code Ann. §105-709(6) ... 17

IN THE
SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

OCTOBER TERM, 1965

CASE NO. 814

CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,
Petitioner,

versus

WALLACE BUTTS,
Respondent.

RESPONSE TO PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FIFTH CIRCUIT

CITATIONS TO OPINIONS BELOW

Petitioner[1] refers to the opinion of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit as unreported and reproduces a copy as Appendix B to its petition. This opinion is reported in 351 F. 2d 702 (5th Cir. 1965).

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

Respondent construes the questions presented to be as follows:

I. Under the facts of this case, did petitioner waive the right to challenge the verdict and judgment on any of the constitutional grounds asserted in New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964) by its decision not to assert any such grounds at or before the long and expensive trial?

---

[1]Petitioner is hereafter sometimes referred to as "Cu[illegible]".

II. Assuming that Times v. Sullivan does apply and the constitutional defenses were not waived, did the undisputed evidence show conclusively that actual malice was proved?

III. Under the facts of this case, did the amount of punitive damages constitute an abridgement of freedom of the press or the taking of property without due process of law?

ADDITIONAL STATUTES INVOLVED

In respondent's Appendix A are set forth additional statutory provisions involved.

COUNTER-STATEMENT

The questions must be determined in the light of the facts of the case. The statement in the petition for certiorari is deficient in many respects.

CURTIS' STATEMENT FAILS TO SET OUT THE FACTS AS TO WAIVER

Curtis fails to set out the background against which it made its decision as to the strategy it would employ in defending the case. This is of vital importance in determining the question of waiver. In considering the facts, the choice made by Curtis should be kept in mind, to wit, that it would rest its defense squarely and solely on a plea of justification under which it would obtain the right to open and conclude before the jury, and no other defenses would be relied on. Only when its strategy failed did Curtis seek some constitutional ground of defense, turning hopefully to New York Times v. Sullivan as a means of escape.

Curtis Raised The Constitutional Defenses In Two Alabama Libel Suits

One of a number of libel suits pending against Curtis when the article involved in this action was published was a suit filed in Alabama by Paul Bryant, head football coach of the University of Alabama, because of a previous article that had been published by the Post. A co-defendant with Curtis in that libel suit was Furman Bisher, Sports Editor of The Atlanta Journal, the author of the previous article. (R. 497-98). The Birmingham, Alabama law firm defending petitioner and Bisher in that libel suit steered the editors of the Post to one George Burnett in Atlanta from whom they bought the instant Butts-Bryant story. (R. 497-98). In that libel suit, as well as a later suit filed by Bryant because of the article here involved, Curtis raised the following constitutional defenses:

> "(f) To subject this defendant to libel in the circumstances complained of would abridge the freedom of speech and of the press in violation of the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, made applicable to the States by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

"(h) To subject this defendant to libel in the circumstances complained of would be repugnant to the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States."

(See respondent's Appendix B; petitioner's Appendix B, pp. 64a-65a).

Curtis' Defensive Strategy

Two days after publication, respondent filed suit against petitioner. (R. 1925). Petitioner filed its defensive pleadings, relying solely upon its plea of justification.

No constitutional questions of any kind were raised by Curtis in its answer, notwithstanding the following remarkable situation: Petitioner, represented by the same lawyers who defended The New York Times in Times v. Sullivan, raised the First and Fourteenth Amendment defenses in the first Bryant suit in Alabama and again in the second Bryant suit in Alabama. (Exhibits A and B to "Response To Petition For Re-Hearing En Banc" as filed in the Court of Appeals, Respondent's Appendix B). Curtis' General Counsel (through Mr. Strubing) actively participated in both Alabama cases, as well as in this case. Notwithstanding, no constitutional defenses were raised in this case. As pointed out by the Court of Appeals (351 F. 2d at 734; Pet. for Cert., App. B, p. 65a):

"If the First and Fourteenth Amendments were thought by Mr. Strubing and his law firm to be valid grounds for dismissal of the related > Bryant cases in Alabama, why did they not assert them in the Butts case? By his own statement Mr. Strubing was an active participant in all three cases, so he certainly should have known what the rights of Curtis were."

Even though given the full opportunity during the lengthy pre-trial proceedings and during the trial, which lasted fifteen days, petitioner chose not to raise any constitutional grounds of defense, and no such objections were made to the trial court's charge as to malice as required by Fed. R. Civ. P. 51.

CURTIS' STATEMENT FAILS TO SET OUT THE FACTS WHICH ESTABLISHED MALICE

Petitioner knew and admitted it knew when the article was published that its publication would "ruin the career of Wallace Butts" and "would result in his death in his chosen profession." (R. 915-16).

Curtis' New Editorial Policy

Prior to publication of the article in question, the Post's Editor-in-Chief, due to a severe and continuing loss of revenues (R. 935-36), had embarked upon a new editorial policy characterized by the Post's Editor as "sophisticated muckraking" — of conducting an "exposé type magazine," (R. 943) "of provoking people, making them mad." (R. 944). When Mr. Blair was asked in the taking of his testimony if he had not been facetious when he boasted on a previous occasion that he would change the image of the Post from that which everyone had learned to admire and respect to that of a "sophisticated muck-raker," Mr. Blair testified that he "was not being facetious," that he "meant it then" and "mean it now." (R. 939). When asked how the article which is the subject of this suit fitted in with the "new image," the Editor-in-Chief of the Post testified "I would say we have gone 25 per cent toward the goal of the magazine that I envision." (R. 940). Mr. Blair testified that he had in fact changed the image of the Post. (R. 940). On January 15, 1963, Clay D. Blair, Jr., as Editor-in-Chief, had written a memorandum to the staff of the Post congratulating them on "putting out one hell of a fine magazine," stating "the final yard stick: we have about six law suits pending, meaning that we are hitting them where it hurts, . . ." (R. 1376). When questioned in this case as to what kind of law suits he was referring to in that memorandum, Mr. Blair stated "all of these are libel suits." (R. 938). When asked whom he had reference to in his use of the phrase "hitting them where it hurts," Mr. Blair testified "'Them' is the general phrase to refer to the whole United States of America." (R. 938.)

Curtis Ignored Warnings That The Stories Were False

Eleven days before publishing the story petitioner was categorically informed by telegram and letter of the "absolute falsity of the charges" to be made in the proposed story. (R. 1023) (R. 947-48). Petitioner ignored those warnings and published the story knowing full well in advance that it would "ruin the career of Wallace Butts", "would result in his death in his chosen profession", and "that the careers of two men would be ruined as a result of the publication of the story." (R. 1014). Before publishing the article petitioner made no effort to contact either Wallace Butts or Coach Paul Bryant of the University of Alabama for any statement to be carried in the article by either of them as to whether the charges against them were true. (R. 897). The Post had a readership of twenty-two million (R. 1014-15) and neither respondent nor Coach Bryant was given any opportunity whatsoever for a retort before that forum. After the article was published respondent was further denied any voice before petitioner's forum of twenty-two million readers in that petitioner ignored a prompt and urgent demand by respondent that it publish a retraction of the defamatory statements against him. (R. 22, 26).

Petitioner paid George Burnett $5,000 for the story. (R. 1380-81). This was in February, 1963. The telephone call which Burnett claimed he had listened in on between respondent and Coach Bryant was in September, 1962. Petitioner and its writer, Frank Graham, Jr., knew when they bought the story from Burnett that he had been convicted of writing bad checks and was at that time on probation (R. 911, 912, 913). They further knew there were possibly other instances of "bad-check writing" by George Burnett. (R. 1016). Davis Thomas, a Senior Editor of the Post, knew the criminal background of George Burnett and testified that he considered one who wrote bad checks to be the same as a "liar." (R. 1016).

As will be shown, the record is replete with evidence of Curtis' malice, all of which was artfully ignored in Curtis' Statement of the Facts.

The District Court's Summary Of The Evidence In Respect Of Malice

The facts in respect of malice were summarized by the trial judge as follows:

> "The article charged Butts with being corrupt and with betraying his players and that the players were forced into the game like 'rats in a maze' and 'took a frightful physical beating.' The article charged, in an italicized editorial, Butts, along with Coach Bryant, with being a participant in the greatest and most shocking sports scandal since that of the Chicago White Sox in the 1919 World Series. In the same editorial Butts was relegated to a status worse than that of a 'disreputable gambler,' and a corrupt person who, employed to educate and guide the young men, betrays or sells out his pupils." (225 F. Supp. at 917; Pet. for Cert., App. B. p. 77a).

> "Curtis Publishing Company based its defense on certain notes taken by one George Burnett who made such notes to a telephone conversation alleged to have been overheard between Coach Bear Bryant, of the University of Alabama, and Butts, as Athletic Director of the University of Georgia, on a morning in September, a few days prior to the Alabama-Georgia game. By some mechanical defect, Burnett was connected by telephone to the conversation. These rough notes were kept by Burnett and revealed to Head Coach Johnny Griffith, of the University of Georgia, in late December, 1962, or early January, 1963. Curtis paid Burnett consideration for the story after the same was brought to its attention by Curtis' Birmingham, Alabama lawyers, who were defending Curtis in a libel suit brought by Coach Bryant because of another article in the Saturday Evening Post.

"The evidence presented showed that Frank Graham, Jr., the author of the article, and Davis Thomas, Senior Editor of the Saturday Evening Post, knew that Burnett had been convicted of 'bad check writing.' No representative of the Post looked at the notes before the article was published. According to Coach Griffith of Georgia, defendant's witness, 'a good number of Burnett's notes were incorrect and didn't even apply to anything Georgia had.' No effort was made by the Post to view the actual game film, although the Sports Editor of the Post, one Roger Kahn, considered that necessary.

"Inserted in the article were the following direct quotations, which were subsequently denied under oath by the parties quoted:

> (1) Graham wrote that Burnett had told him that Larry Rakestraw, Georgia quarterback, placed his feet in a certain position while on offense, thereby tipping off the defensive team as to whether the Georgia play would be a run or a pass. Burnett later testified under oath that he had not told Graham any such thing.

(2) Mickey Babb, another Georgia football player, specifically denied the quotation in the article attributed to him pertaining to knowledge by the Alabama team of the Georgia formations and plays. Babb was quoted in the article as saying the Alabama players knew Georgia's key play (eighty-eight pop) and knew when Georgia would use it. Babb testified Georgia had no 'eighty-eight pop' play. This was confirmed by Coach Johnny Griffith.

(3) Sam Richwine, the Georgia trainer, specifically and categorically denied the quotation in the article attributed to him, which was also to the effect that Alabama knew Georgia's plays.

(4) Coach Johnny Griffith categorically denied three separate and distinct quotations in the article that were attributed to him.

(5) There were many other instances in which the individual, credited by Graham as giving Graham certain information which was included in the article, categorically denied under oath that any such information had been furnished.

"Frank Graham, Jr., author of the article, and Charles Davis Thomas, the Managing Editor of the Saturday Evening Post, testified by deposition that they both knew that after the article was published plaintiff Butts' career would be ruined. The author of the article, Frank Graham, Jr., testified by deposition at the trial. Curtis' Editor-in-Chief, Clay Blair, Jr., and its Senior Editor, Davis Thomas, were present in court but testified by deposition. Furman Bisher, of Atlanta, who was paid to assist in the preparation of the article, testified by deposition.

"The article was clearly defamatory and extremely so. The Saturday Evening Post had a circulation in excess of 6 million copies per issue. It claims readers of 22 million. Butts was unquestionably one of the leading figures in the national football picture. The jury was warranted in concluding from the foregoing incidents and the persistent and continuing attitude of the officers and agents of the defendant that there was a wanton or reckless indifference of plaintiff's rights. The guilt of the defendant was so clearly established by the evidence in the case so as to have left the jury no choice but to find the defendant liable." (225 F. Supp. at 918-19; Pet. for Cert., App. B, pp. 78a-80a).

The Circuit Court Approved The District Court's Appraisal Of The Evidence

In affirming the trial court, the Court of Appeals stated:

> "This is no ordinary libel case. The publication of the article by the Post, in the face of several specific appeals that it refrain from doing so, was part and parcel of a general policy of callousness, which recognized from the start that Butts' career would be ruined. The trial judge's appraisal of the evidence, with which we are in complete accord, was that it was sufficiently strong to justify the jury in concluding that what the Post did was done with reckless disregard of whether the article was false or not.
>
> "The case was fully developed during extensive pre-trials, and in a jury trial lasting two weeks. The record itself comprises 1613 pages. We have given full consideration to the entire record, as well as to the more than 650 pages of briefs submitted by both parties, the numerous authorities cited therein, and the oral arguments of counsel. We think that Curtis has had its day in court. It apparently thought so too until the jury verdict was returned. This is attested by the fact that practically all of its present complaints were not even raised until after the trial.
>
> "Believing and so finding that the trial was fair, and that the judgment of the trial court was correct and proper in all respects, it is AFFIRMED." (351 F. 2d at 719-20; Pet. for Cert., App. B, pp. 38a-34a).

The jury's verdict of $60,000 as general damages and $3,000,000 as punitive damages was rendered on August 20, 1963. On August 29, 1963, Curtis filed its initial motion for new trial. (R. 46). On January 22, 1964, the District Court entered judgment in the case in the amount of $460,000, representing $60,000 general damages and $400,000 punitive damages. (R. 105)

Thereafter, petitioner filed under Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b) an additional motion for new trial on the alleged ground of recently discovered evidence, during the determination of which it developed that petitioner had paid Coach Paul Bryant $300,000 following the trial of this case rather than go to trial in his case based upon the same libelous article here involved. (R. 1456-57).

The Court of Appeals, in well reasoned opinions, rejected all of the arguments made by petitioner.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

I.

Curtis, which elected not to urge any constitutional grounds of defense before or during the trial, now contends that this Court's reliance on those grounds in New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), relieves it of the consequences of that election and permits it to raise those grounds for the first time on appeal. That Curtis knew of the constitutional defenses and elected not to use them in this case is established by the fact that it urged such defenses in two companion libel suits pending against it at the same time in Alabama and that its Alabama counsel were contemporaneously representing The New York Times in the Times case. The Court of Appeals was correct in holding that, for its own reasons of trial strategy, Curtis obviously decided to rely solely on its plea of truth in this case and thereby waived its right to raise additional defenses on appeal and has no right now to complain of its choice. Yakus v. U.S., 321 U.S. 414, 444 (1944); U. S. v. Sorrentino, 175 F.2d 721 (3rd Cir. 1949), cert. den. 338 U.S. 868 (1949); Ackerman v. U. S., 340 U.S. 193 (1950).

This Court's holding in Times v. Sullivan that proof of actual malice is required by a public official in a libel suit was no change in the law but merely gave confirmation to a principle which has long been the law. Gandia v. Pettingill, 222 U.S. 452, 457 (1912); Sweeney v. Schenectady Union Pub. Co., 122 F.2d 288 (2nd Cir. 1941), aff'd by equally divided court, 316 U.S. 642 (1942); Caldwell v. Crowell-Collier Pub. Co., 161 F.2d 333, 336 (5th Cir. 1947). Therefore, even without regard to Curtis' action in the companion cases and its knowledge of the proceedings in Times, the Times holding does not afford it an excuse for its failure to raise the constitutional defenses here urged.

Respondent was not a public official within the meaning of Times but an employee of a separate business entity, so Times could in no event be applicable. Georgia Code Sections 32-152 and 32-153; Regents of the University System of Georgia v. Blanton, 49 Ga. App. 602, 176 S.E. 673 (1934); Board of Education of Doerun v. Bacon, 22 Ga. App. 72, 95 S.E. 753 (1918);

Page v. Regents of the University System of Georgia, 304 U.S. 439, 452 (1938).

II.

In this case, as distinguished from the Times case, there was overwhelming proof of actual malice. The evidence established that Curtis had deliberately chosen a policy of "sophisticated muckraking," of "provoking people, making them mad," and measured its success by the number of libel suits against it. It intentionally ignored warnings received well in advance of publication that the story was false and made no effort to check the truth of the information it had obtained. It went on to add, guised as statements of fact, damaging charges for which there were no basis at all.

It would be useless to require another trial in view of the overwhelming evidence of malice.

The court's charge in respect to malice was adequate and met the standards set down in Times, and no objections were made by Curtis to the court's charge in respect to malice as required by Fed. R. Civ. P. 51.

III.

Curtis callously published the spectacular article here involved, knowing it would ruin respondent, for the purpose of improving its circulation. As such it was a "libeller for profit" and not entitled to the same protection under the United States Constitution against punitive damages as is the responsibly and objectively informative segment of the press.

Curtis having requested the trial judge, in open court, to reduce the size of the verdict, it cannot complain of the trial judge having done so. Curtis in its desire to profit from libel deliberately sought to squeeze from respondent his "breathing space . . . to survive," and cannot now complain that the $400,000.00 award of punitive damages deprives it of that "breathing space." There is no law in Georgia or the Federal courts that requires the existence of any relationship between compensatory and punitive damages.

ARGUMENT

I.

PETITIONER WAIVED THE RIGHT TO CHALLENGE THE VERDICT AND JUDGMENT ON ANY OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL GROUNDS ASSERTED IN TIMES V. SULLIVAN.

Petitioner Chose The Strategy Of Which It Now Complains

It is elementary that a litigant who claims a constitutional right must assert that right at an appropriate time in a litigation in order to rely on it on appeal.

Curtis cannot explain away its decision not to raise at the trial constitutional defenses of which it was fully aware and upon which it now relies on the ground that those defenses might have been overruled below. Nor should Curtis be heard to complain that it was under no duty to raise constitutional defenses below.

What was the situation faced by Curtis when it determined its trial strategy? At that very time there were pending against it in the Federal courts in Alabama the two libel suits brought by Bryant, in both of which it had set up the defenses of the First and Fourteenth Amendments (Pet. for Cert., App. B, pp. 64a-65a; Resp. App. B). In both Alabama suits it had also raised the "public man" defense granting the publisher a privilege conditional on the absence of actual malice in libel suits brought by public persons. (Resp., App. B). This "public man" defense, together with a number of other defenses raised in the Alabama cases, might have been raised here but Curtis elected not to do so.[2]

What was done by petitioner's counsel in this case is not difficult to understand. They merely chose the defense which they felt would be the most effective for their own use and chose not to rely on any other defenses.

The Circuit Court, in the first of its two decisions, after considering the affidavits filed in support of the petition for rehearing and the questions of law involved, reached the following conclusion relative to

---

[2]The "public man" rule as set out in Section 105-709(6) of the Georgia Code (Resp. App. A) provides a privilege, conditioned on the absence of actual malice, to publications commenting "upon the acts of public men in their public capacity. . . ." The statutory privilege has been construed to grant a complete defense to publications falling within its terms, even though the publications may have been false. See Pearce v. Brower, 72 Ga. 243 (1884); Wilson v. Sullivan, 81 Ga. 238, 7 S.E. 274 (1888); Augusta Evening News v. Radford, 91 Ga. 494, 17 S.E. 612 (1893). Certainly a full defense would have included Georgia Code Section 105-709(6).

Curtis' choice of trial strategy (351 F. 2d at 735; Pet. for Cert. App. B, p. 67a):

> "Whatever may have been the reasons for invoking the First Amendment claim in the Alabama suits while remaining silent in Georgia, Curtis cannot sustain the proposition that it was unaware that a defendant in a libel action might assert the constitutional claim as a defense. Counsel for Butts make a persuasive suggestion that Curtis elected to defend this case on its plea of justification, rather than raise the jurisdictional, constitutional and other affirmative defenses[6] it had raised in the Alabama Bryant cases, in order to get the right to open and close the arguments."

Again, the Circuit Court met Curtis' argument relative to its awareness of the constitutional defenses squarely by saying (351 F. 2d at 710; Pet. for Cert. App. B, pp. 15a-16a):

> "The Times case was decided by the Alabama Supreme Court on August 30, 1962. A petition for writ of certiorari presenting constitutional questions identical to those now being urged by Curtis, was filed in the United States Supreme Court on November 21, 1962, four months prior to the filing of the complaint in this case on March 25, 1963. Certiorari was granted in the Times case on January 7, 1963.

"[6]These would include the conditional privilege recognized by §105-709(6) of the Georgia Code concerning published statements relating to the 'acts of public men in their public capacity.' See Note 20, 376 U.S. 254 at 280."

The jury verdict in the instant case was returned on August 20, 1963, and the trial court's judgment thereon was entered the same day. A Birmingham, Alabama law firm, which represented the New York Times in the case brought against it by Sullivan, also, together with Curtis' General Counsel, represented Curtis in a libel suit Coach Bryant had filed against it in the United States District Court at Birmingham, Alabama. A member of this law firm had sent information to Curtis about the alleged telephone conversation between Butts and Bryant, and had talked with the author, Graham, about the matter prior to publication of the story. The same lawyer, together with another member of the firm, sat (as did the General Counsel for Curtis) at Curtis' Counsel table throughout the trial of this case.

"While it is true that the Supreme Court did not decide the Times case until March 9, 1964, it would be contrary to reason and common sense to assume that there had not been, at all times during the pendency of this case, full communication among Curtis' counsel, particularly concerning trial strategy. The facts more than justify our conclusion that Curtis was fully aware when this suit was instituted, and certainly no later than the beginning of trial, that the constitutional questions it now argues had been for some time, and were still being, vigorously asserted in Times."

Prominent among the questions which have been considered and passed on by this Court and by other courts during the last several decades have been cases involving the right of freedom of speech. It is inconceivable that petitioner, a publisher for over two hundred years of several magazines of nationwide circulation, should not have considered raising that question in this libel suit as it had in the Alabama suits.

This Court's Decisions Relative To Waiver Support Respondent

The doctrine of waiver, as applicable to the facts of this case, is classically stated by this Court in Yakus v. U. S., 321 U.S. 414, 444 (1944) as follows:

> "No procedural principle is more familiar to this court than that a constitutional right may be forfeited in criminal as well as civil cases by the failure to make timely assertion of the right before a tribunal having jurisdiction to determine it. [Citing cases]. Courts may for that reason refuse to consider a constitutional objection even though a like objection had previously been sustained in a case in which it was properly taken. [Citing cases]."

The waiver cases cited by Curtis are distinguishable because petitioner chose here, as a matter of strategy, to intentionally waive the constitutional grounds asserted in Times. Courts have long recognized that counsel may choose not to use certain defenses for strategic purposes and such choice will amount to an intentional relinquishment of a known right. U. S. v. Sorrentino, 175 F. 2d 721 (3rd Cir. 1949), cert. denied, 338 U.S. 868 (1949).

In Ackerman v. U. S., 340 U.S. 193 (1950), the Court held at page 198:

> "His choice was a risk, but calculated and deliberate in such as follows a free choice. Petitioner cannot be relieved of such a choice because hindsight seems to indicate to him that his decision . . . was probably wrong considering the outcome of the Elibar case. There must be an end to litigation someday, and free, calculated, deliberate choices are not to be relieved from."

It is of further interest to note that even Judge Rives, who dissented from the decision of the Court of Appeals relative to waiver, felt that the issue of waiver was a "debatable" one. (Pet. for Cert., App. B, p. 46a, 351 F. 2d 702, 726). Respondent respectfully submits that issue should be here decided in his favor as it was below and that this Court should decline to review this case.

This Court's Holding in Times v. Sullivan Affords Curtis No Excuse For Its Decision Not To Raise At The Trial The Constitutional Defenses Now Urged

An analysis of Times, upon which petitioner relies for a review by this Court, shows that it made no change of law but merely gave sanction to a long-standing rule of state law and federal constitutional law as enunciated by courts and urged by scholars.

The Times case did not create the First Amendment. In that decision, this Court emphasized that the "general proposition that freedom of expression upon public questions is secured by the First Amendment has long been settled by our decisions." 376 U.S. at 269.

This Court held in a libel case over fifty years ago that since the plaintiff was a "public officer [U. S. Attorney] in whose course of action connected with his office the citizens of Porto Rico had a serious interest . . ., anything bearing on such action was a legitimate subject of statement and comment . . . at least in the absence of express malice. . ." Gandia v. Pettingill, 222 U. S. 452, 457 (1912). Gandia stands for the proposition that a qualified privilege has long existed under federal law in libel cases where the plaintiff is a "public official."

The identical constitutional issue now insisted on was raised twenty-two years ago in Sweeney v. Schenectady Union Pub. Co., 122 F. 2d 288 (2nd Cir. 1941), aff'd by equally divided courts, 316 U.S. 642 (1942). Seventeen years ago the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals applied this specific defense in Caldwell v. Crowell-Collier Pub. Co., 161 F. 2d 333, 336 (5th Cir. 1947). The argument offered by counsel for that defendant (Crowell-Collier) was that since the publication in question "related to a public officer," it was privileged. The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals apparently dealt with this contention as a sound statement of law, holding that the privilege had been avoided by an allegation in the complaint that the publisher was guilty of "malice in fact."

This Court in Times recognized that a "like rule" has existed for many years in state courts. It stated at page 280 "an oft-cited statement of a like rule, which has been adopted by a number of state courts, is found in the Kansas case of Coleman v. MacLennan, 78 Kan. 711, 98 P. 281 (1908)." In a footnote at that point in its decision this Court cited eleven decisions from ten different states, as well as six scholarly works. The Kansas Supreme Court has stated since Times that Times requires no change in the law of that state since the principles found in Times have long been the law. Kennedy v. Mid-Continent Telecasting, Inc., 394 P. 2d 400 (Kan. 1964).

It is obvious from Times itself, Gandia, Sweeney, Caldwell, Coleman and the decisions from ten different states cited in the footnote at page 280 of this Court's decision in Times, as well as the six scholarly works there cited, that the defenses there discussed have long been recognized as being available to a defendant in a libel suit.

The decisions cited by Curtis for the proposition that this Court must apply any change in the law pending appeal are inapposite here. Those cases involve the effect of an intervening treaty in U. S. v. The Schooner Peggy, 1 Cranch 103 (1801); applicability of state law under the rules of decision statute in Vandenbark v. Owen-Illinois Glass Co., 311 U.S. 538 (1941); enactment of the Eighteenth Amendment repealing prohibition in U. S. v. Chambers, 291 U.S. 217 (1934); enactment of a statute in U. S. v. Alabama, 362 U.S. 602 (1960); enactment of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 in Hamm v. Rock Hill, 379 U.S. 306 (1964). We are not here concerned with a change in the law. Times v. Sullivan merely gave constitutional sanction to a long recognized legal principle.

Curtis' belated insistence "that Times came like a bolt out of the blue" (351 F.2d at 733) in granting constitutional protection in defamation cases is all the more incongruous when viewed in light of the fact that (although Curtis chose not to rely on those defenses at the trial) Curtis did raise First Amendment defenses in its initial motion for new trial, filed five months before the Times decision was rendered.

Respondent Was Not A "Public Official"

Respondent was employed by the Athletic Association to supervise the intercollegiate sports program of the University of Georgia. This Court described the supervision of that program as it relates to football and other activities from which revenue is derived, as the exercise of a proprietary rather than a governmental function. It held in Page v. Regents of University System of Georgia, 304 U.S. 439, 452 (1938):

> ". . . however essential a system of public education to the existence of the State, the conduct of exhibitions for admissions paid by the public is not such a function of state government as to be free from the burden of a . . . tax laid on . . . admissions. . .
>
> "The important fact is that the State, in order to raise funds for public purposes, has embarked in a business having the incidents of similar enterprises usually prosecuted for private gain."

The Athletic Association, respondent's employer, has, by a statute enacted in 1949, been declared to be a corporation and not an agency of the State. Georgia Code Annotated, Section 32-152 (See Resp., App. A) provides:

> "The Athletic Associations of the University of Georgia and the Georgia School of Technology are hereby declared to be corporations, incorporated under charter issued by the Superior Court of the county in which said Associations are located."

Section 32-153 of the Code provides:

> "The associations named are hereby declared, not to be agencies of the State. . ." (See Resp., App. A) Respondent submits, therefore, that he was not a "public official" as envisioned by Times v. Sullivan.

As the District Court held on this point:

> "Plaintiff Butts was director of athletics at the University. The Athletic Director, along with the various coaches in the Athletic Department, were employed by the separate incorporated athletic association. However, the defendant seeks by this motion to extend the category of "public officials" to one employed as agent by the University of Georgia Athletic Department. Even if plaintiff was a professor or instructor at the University, and not an agent of a separate governmental corporation carrying on "a business comparable in all essentials to those usually conducted by private owners" he would not be a public officer or official. Under Georgia law, the position of a teacher or instructor in a State or public education institution is not that of a public officer or official, but he is merely an employee thereof. Regents of the University System of Georgia v. Blanton, 49 Ga. App. 602(4); Board of Education of Doerun v. Bacon, 22 Ga. App. 72." (Pet. for Cert., App. B, pp. 95a-96a).

II.

UNLIKE TIMES V. SULLIVAN, THE UNDISPUTED EVIDENCE SHOWS CONCLUSIVELY THAT ACTUAL MALICE WAS PROVED

Even if it should be held that Times v. Sullivan does apply, the evidence in this case fully justifies the conclusion reached by the jury and affirmed by both the District Court and the Court of Appeals that actual malice was proved and, therefore, no useful purpose could possibly be served by granting the writ. A brief resume of the evidence follows.

(1) Curtis was informed of the falsity of the story eleven days prior to publication of the story as a result of the telegram, letter, and telephone call. (R. 22, 23, 26, 947-49).

(2) Although there was adequate time in which to do so, no investigation or any other action was carried out as a result of these communications. (R. 947-49, 1023).

(3) Prior to publication of the story, Curtis' advertising revenues had been falling drastically. (R. 935-36). In order to bolster these revenues Editor-in-Chief Blair undertook four months before publication of this story to "change the image" of the magazine. (R. 940). He initiated a policy of "sophisticated muckraking," of "exposé in the mass magazines." (R. 943). The new image was intended "to provoke people, make them mad." (R. 944). Blair testified that he "was not being facetious," that he "meant it then (November 1962)" and "mean it now (May 1963)." (R. 939).

(4) Only two months prior to publication of this story, Curtis' Blair wrote a memorandum (R. 1376) to his personnel (which found its way into another magazine's pages (R. 937)) complimenting them on their work under the new editorial policy and outlining "the final yardstick: we have about six law suits pending, meaning that we are hitting them where it hurts, with solid, meaningful journalism." (R. 1376). Blair later testified that the "them" who were being hit was everyone in the United States and the law suits were all libel suits. (R. 938).

(5) Editor Blair later considered the Butts issue as bringing the magazine "25 per cent toward the goal of the magazine that I envision." (R. 940).

(6) The sole source of the story was one George Burnett, a man known to Graham from the beginning as a bad-check artist. (R. 911-13). Managing Editor Thomas, who also knew of Burnett's bad check record, considered such a person to be a liar. (R. 1016).

(7) Neither author Graham nor anyone else with Curtis made any attempt to talk to John Carmichael, who was known to Graham to have been with Burnett when the latter allegedly overheard the telephone conversation. (R. 511, 1015-16). By performing this easy task, Graham would have learned at the outset that the whole story was a fabrication. (R. 850-51). Managing Editor Thomas admitted that "a responsible journalist" should rely on something more than the mere word of Burnett. (R. 1017).

(8) Although the story as written relied heavily on the supposed existence and contents of some "notes" which Burnett allegedly made of the telephone conversation, no Curtis representative ever saw or read the notes, notwithstanding the fact that Burnett told Graham that he needed the notes to refresh his memory (R. 212) and that he "couldn't remember anything definite about it without his notes." (R. 525). When the notes were finally analyzed, they turned out to be largely nonsensical. (R. 386-87).

(9) Before publishing the story, Curtis made no effort to view the game film, although Sports Editor Kahn considered that to be necessary (R. 970-71) and the collaborator, Furman Bisher, thought "it would have been a very good idea." (R. 1026).

(10) No effort was made to interview any member or coach of the Alabama team in order to determine whether any changes had been made in the game plans. (R. 1026).

(11) The patently outrageous story was never submitted to anyone familiar with the sport of football in order to get a knowledgeable reaction.

(12) Neither principal mentioned in the story was ever contacted before publication.

(13) After such a shockingly shoddy "investigation", Curtis published the story with full knowledge that it would ruin the career of Wallace Butts and "would result in his death in his chosen profession." (R. 915-16).

(14) Furthermore, certain direct quotations which were inserted in the article for the sole purpose of lending truth to the charges were denied under oath by the parties alleged to have been quoted.

(a) Graham wrote that Burnett had told him that Larry Rakestraw (University of Georgia quarterback) placed his feet in a certain position while on offense, thereby tipping off the defensive team as to whether the forthcoming Georgia play would be a run or a pass. (This, of course, would have been vital information for an opponent.) (R. 365-66). Petitioner was aware of the importance of this information and put it in its article to convince the readers of the truth of its indictment of Wallace Butts. (R. 1022). But Burnett denied under oath that he had told Graham any such thing. (R. 241). Georgia's Head Coach, Johnny Griffith, a witness for petitioner who was in a better position than anyone else to know whether in fact Rakestraw did this with his feet, testified that it was not true. (R. 366).

(b) Miekey Babb, University of Georgia all-conference end, specifically denied the quotation in the article attributed to him that the Alabama team knew the Georgia formations and plays. (R. 745). Babb was quoted in the article as saying the Alabama players knew Georgia's key play (described in the article as "eighty-eight pop") and knew when Georgia would use it. Babb testified Georgia had no "eighty-eight pop" play. (R. 746). This was confirmed by Coach Johnny Griffith. (R. 383).

(c) Sam Richwine, Georgia trainer, specifically and categorically denied (R. 752) the quotation in the article attributed to him to the effect that Alabama knew Georgia's plays.

(d) In its article petitioner wrote that Georgia Coach Griffith had stated: "We knew somebody had given our plays to Alabama and maybe to a couple of other teams we played too. But we had no idea that it was Wally Butts." Coach Griffith, appearing as a witness for petitioner, testified emphatically that he had said no such thing. (R. 369).

(e) The article states that "Griffith went to University officials, told them what he knew and said he would resign if Butts was permitted to remain on his job." At the trial Coach Griffith categorically denied having done or said that. (R. 369).

(f) The article quotes Coach Griffith as saying, "You know, during the first half of the Alabama game my players kept coming to the sideline and saying, 'Coach, we been sold out.' " Coach Griffith at the trial denied that. (R. 371).

(g). The article attributes the following direct quotation to Coach Griffith, " 'I never had a chance did I?' Coach Johnny Griffith said bitterly to a friend the other day. 'I never had a chance.' " Coach Griffith denied under oath having said that to anybody. (R. 372).

Considering the above evidence, the District Court held on April 7, 1964: (Pet. for Cert. App. B p. 96a)

"If it were conceded that plaintiff Butts was a 'public official', the case of New York Times Company v. Sullivan would not permit the vacating of this Court's previous judgment, as the ruling in the Times case does not prohibit a public official from recovering for a defamatory falsehood where he proves 'actual malice' — that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not. (Emphasis supplied.) In the trial of this case, there was ample evidence from which a jury could have concluded that there was reckless disregard by defendant of whether the article was false or not. See the Court's ruling on defendant's motion for a new trial dated January 14, 1964. Butts v. Curtis Publishing Company, 225 F. Supp. 916."

On review, the Fifth Circuit, after giving "full consideration to the entire record" held that: (351 F. 2d 702, 719, Pet. for Cert. App. B, p. 33a)

"The trial judge's appraisal of the evidence, with which we are in complete accord, was that it was sufficiently strong to justify the jury in concluding that what the Post did was done with reckless disregard of whether the article was false or not."

That reckless disregard as to whether printed statements are false constitutes malice was confirmed by the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit in Pape v. Time, Inc., No. 15101, C.A. 7, Dec. 28, 1965, wherein it was stated:

"As stated in our previous decision — '. . . Time took the risk when it reworded parts of the Commission's Report that it might go too far. . . .' We noted that Time had departed from fidelity to the Commission's Report in order to make the article more interesting and readable for its audience. Time's writers who prepared the article must have known the statements as to Pape's conduct were only allegations in a complaint in a civil suit. As we put it (318 F. 2d at page 655) — 'It is our opinion that a jury could read the Time article as stating that the Report said Pape and his follow [sic] officers did what the Commission Report merely said the Monroe complaint alleged they did.'

"We hold that a sufficient showing has been made so that a jury could find Time, Incorporated acted with reckless disregard as to whether or not the reworded statements, hereinbefore described, were true or false. There> fore, it was error for the District Court to grant defendant's motion for a summary judgment."

Respondent submits that since both the District Court and the Fifth Circuit have held unequivocally that actual malice was proved in the instant case, nothing really would be accomplished by remanding the case for further consideration in light of Times.

The Charge As To Malice Was Adequate

Petitioner complains that the District Court's charge on malice was insufficient in the light of Times v. Sullivan. When the District Court's charge is examined in toto, it will be found that it measures up to the standards laid down in Times v. Sullivan. It is particularly important to note that no exception was made by petitioner at the conclusion of the charge with reference to the instructions on malice, as required by Fed. R. Civ. P. 51. (Resp. App. A).

The definition of malice as given in the trial court's charge to the jury in this case was in effect the same as the definition of malice given in Times. The trial court charged (R. 1356-57):

> ". . . actual malice encompasses the notion of ill will, spite, hatred and an intent to injure one. Malice also denotes a wanton or reckless indifference or culpable negligence without regard to the rights of others. . . . The plaintiff charges that the column was written and published both with actual malice and in utter and wanton disregard of his rights. . . .

"Actual malice involves the state of one's mind, and your determination must be made from all the surrounding facts and circumstances.

"Further [whether] actual malice or wanton and reckless indifference has been established must be determined from all of the evidence in the case."

III.

THE JUDGMENT FOR PUNITIVE DAMAGES VIOLATED NO CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS OF PETITIONER

In Point III of its reasons for granting the writ, petitioner presents three arguments: First, the punitive damages awarded by the jury "contravened the First Amendment and entailed a deprivation of due process" (p. 17); Second, the jury verdict was not "saved by the remittitur required by the district court" (p. 19); and Third, the remittitur itself "is repugnant to the Constitution."

FIRST: Under this argument petitioner, after conceding arguendo that "a punitive award in libel cases, imposed as a deterrent to the defendant and to others and 'to protect the community', is not per se an unconstitutional method of regulating publications. . .," makes the astonishingly shortsighted statement that "the verdict was designed to put defendant out of business. . . ." (p. 18). It was less than two years ago that this same petitioner published "The Story Of A College Football Fix" which it stated at the time would put Wallace Butts "out of business." Petitioner's editor boasted to his staff that the Post had six law suits (all libel) pending, "meaning we are hitting them where it hurts." It strikes respondent that petitioner would urge this Court to substitute the laws of economics in place of ". . . the Constitution's concern for the essential values represented by 'our respect for the inviolability of the human personality and of the right of each individual to a private enclave where he may lead a private life. . . .' That privilege, like the guarantees of the Fourth Amendment, stands as a protection of quite different constitutional values — values reflecting the concern of our society for the right of each individual to be let alone." Tehan v. Shott, No. 52, decided by this Court January 19, 1966.

Respondent recognizes and will be the first to defend the constitutional provisions which guarantee freedom of the press and would never suggest that these rights be circumscribed. But freedom of the press does not include a license to publish untruthful and defamatory charges against another who has no means of retaliation except through the processes of the law, the cost of which to many can be prohibitive. Those who enjoy the freedom of the press must recognize that it includes a corresponding obligation and responsibility to print only that which is true and not that which holds individuals up to public hatred, scorn and ridicule by publishing untrue, malicious and defamatory charges about them.

The most valuable possession of the journalistic profession is unquestionably the constitutional provisions which protect its right to a free press. The most valuable possession of an individual is his good repu- tation and good character. Loss of career, health, reputation of any man in his declining years cannot be measured by a few dollars, nor by many. This is the true injury of a libel such as this one: it becomes an inescapably legacy of shame to all who follow in the line of blood. As the Court so aptly said in Tehan v. Shott, supra, citing Linkletter v. Walker, 381 U.S. 618:

> "the ruptured privacy. . . . cannot be restored."

The proof in this case conclusively shows that this "Story Of A College Football Fix" was an integral part of the new editorial philosophy adopted by petitioner to ameliorate the dramatic decline in its revenues. As stated before, petitioner felt that hitting famous people "where it hurt" and thereby inviting widely publicized libel suits would inure to its financial advantage. Historically, this type of libeller has been classified as a "libeller for profit." Certainly this type of libeller is not representative of the "American press" referred to by Mr. Justice Black in Times v. Sullivan as being "virile enough to publish unpopular views on public affairs and bold enough to criticize the conduct of public officials." (376 U.S. at 294). A "libeller for profit" has been characterized by the Georgia Supreme Court as follows:

> "A newspaper is a great power. There will doubtless appear no greater factor in the progress and development of our common country. Some men owe to the press the respect they exhibit for religion and morality; they fear its lash. The newspaper should discriminate; upon its lofty pedestal it should command respect for its high-toned thought, its justice, its conservatism and its moderation. The press should be free; it should not be deterred from its legitimate work. It leads thought; it moulds public opinion; it thinks for the people. Some men have illustrated this great calling; they have appreciated its duties and obligations; they have lent an ear to the right; their endeavors have kept time to the needs and necessities of the great millions who exemplify the virtue, religion and morality of this country.

"The man that sits in this high place, athirst for greed and gain; whose opinions depend upon the amount of money he gets in his wallet; who attacks private character when he is paid to do so, is an usurper and a public enemy. As well might Judas Iscariot exhibit the price of his perfidy as an excuse for his crime, as for a libeller to set up that he published the libel complained of for money. If this plaintiff is guilty of the acts published against him, these defendants had a right to publish them, and they did a public service in doing so. On the contrary, if he is not guilty, and if it is an effort to defame and degrade him, the law should not withhold its vindication." Cox v. Strickland, 101 Ga. 482, 495, 28 S.E. 655 (1897) (Emphasis added).

It is our position that our Constitution, laws and courts were not and are not designed for the protection of irresponsible libellers for profit who are concerned only with the character assassination of their victims. The more prominent the victim, the more sensational the libel, and the greater the profit will be.

SECOND: Petitioner argues here that the remittitur required by the District Court was unconstitutional as being "inescapably a 'fruit' of the illegal action of the jury." Let respondent state here and now that when petitioner first made this point in its brief on appeal to the Fifth Circuit, he was shocked and surprised. During the oral arguments before the District Court on petitioner's motion for new trial, the subject of the District Court's right to order a remittitur was discussed at length between the trial judge and counsel for petitioner. In his Fifth Circuit brief, respondent pointed out that "at the time (Curtis) filed its designation of parts of the Record to be printed (Butts) did not know that appellant intended to argue that the district court 'did not have the authority to "require" the remittitur'" and, therefore, respondent had not designated that portion of the transcript containing statements in open court by petitioner's counsel, which not only agreed that the trial judge had this authority, but even told the court that it would be his "responsibility and duty to write it down to the point where it does meet with your own conscience." At page 171 of respondent's brief in the Fifth Circuit, he set forth direct quotations from statements made by petitioner's attorneys at the hearing:

> "I understand Your Honor perfectly. . . . if in your own conscience you feel that this verdict is excessive, then in that situation you have the right and, as Judge Hutcheson said, the duty to change that verdict. . . . If the verdict is ex> cessive, you have the responsibility and the duty, to use the lawyers' expression, to write it down to the point where it does meet with your conscience. . . ."

In view of petitioner's position and statements made in open court, and having obtained the reduction it was seeking from the district court (which at the time was questioning its right to order a remittitur), this contention should receive the same treatment given it by the Court of Appeals.

THIRD: Petitioner argues here that the amount of the remittitur is repugnant to the Constitution and that it "impinges far too heavily and arbitrarily upon the freedom of the press to preserve the 'breathing space' required by the First Amendment freedom 'to survive.'" (p. 21). If the award of $400,000 in this case "impinges" as petitioner complains, how does petitioner explain its voluntary payment of $300,000 to Coach Paul Bryant without even a trial in this same matter? (R. 1456-57). How did that payment affect petitioner's "breathing space. . . . to survive?" Obviously petitioner did not consider its $300,000 payment to Coach Bryant would "put defendant out of business" or would affect its "breathing space to survive." Furthermore, what about the effect of petitioner's malicious libel upon respondent's "breathing space to survive" and its effect on "putting Wally Butts out of business?"

Is the Constitution to be construed and applied so as to safeguard only "the breathing space to survive" and the financial interests of that portion of the public press represented by petitioner and not to safeguard and protect those same factors as to an individual who is subjected to such a malicious libelous attack?

At this point we respectfully refer the Court to the Editor's block written by "The Editors" of the Post and superimposed on the picture on the first page of the article. (R. 1407). That editorial was not written by the author of the article but was signed and admittedly written by "The Editors" of the Post. It expressed the venom of petitioner's Editors — presumably all of them. There, the Editors did not raise the question of whether Wallace Butts had "fixed" and "rigged" the game referred to — the Editors stated unequivocally as a fact that he had "fixed" and "rigged" the game. The Editors said Wallace Butts was corrupt. They evaluated him as a fixer and a rigger. They tried him in absentia. They found him guilty and then sentenced him for the remaining days of his life to public hate, scorn, ridicule and oblivion with, in their own words, a "ruined career."

Petitioner argues further than an award of punitive damages must bear a reasonable relationship to the allowance of actual damages. It has always been the law in Georgia that nominal damages will support punitive damages and that no relationship is required. Sikes v. Foster, 74 Ga. App. 350 (39 S.E. 2d 585) and reverse title, 202 Ga. 122 (42 S.E. 2d 441). In the federal courts, punitive damages need not bear any relationship to actual damages. In Selalise v. National Utility Service, Inc., 120 F. 2d 938 (C.A. 5, 1941) it was said:

> "In Florida, as in the Federal courts, the giving of punitive damages is not dependent upon, nor must it bear any relation to, the > allowance of actual damages." (Emphasis added).

and in Wardman-Justice Motors v. Petrie, 39 F. 2d 512, 516 (D.C. Cir., 1930) the court stated:

> "In many states the rule prevails that actual damages must be established as a basis for the assessment of punitive damages, but this is not the Federal rule nor the rule applied in this district."

Attention is also called to the case of Reynolds v. Pegler, 233 F. 2d 429 (C.A. 2 1955), cert. den., 350 U.S. 846 (1955), which upheld an award of $1.00 compensatory damages and $175,000 punitive damages, a ratio of one hundred seventy-five thousand to one.

CONCLUSION

The Court of Appeals stated in its decision rendered in this case July 16, 1965:

> "We think that Curtis has had its day in Court." (351 F.2d 702, 719; Pet. for Cert., App. B, p. 33a).

For the reasons which prompted the Court of Appeals to that conclusion and for the foregoing reasons, the petition for writ of certiorari should be denied.

William H. Schroder
Allen E. Lockerman
Robert S. Sams
Tench C. Coxe
Milton A. Carlton, Jr.
Gerald P. Thurmond

Of Counsel:
Troutman, Sams, Schroder & Lockerman
1600 William-Oliver Building
Atlanta, Georgia 30303

APPENDIX A.

STATUTORY PROVISIONS INVOLVED

FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE.
RULE 51.

INSTRUCTIONS TO JURY: OBJECTION. "At the close of the evidence or at such earlier time during the trial as the court reasonably directs, any party may file written requests that the court instruct the jury on the law as set forth in the requests. The court shall inform counsel of its proposed action upon the requests prior to their arguments to the jury, but the court shall instruct the jury after the arguments are completed. No party may assign as error the giving or the failure to give an instruction unless he objects thereto before the jury retires to consider its verdict, stating distinctly the matter to which he objects and the grounds of his objection. Opportunity shall be given to make the objection out of the hearing of the jury."

GEORGIA CODE ANNOTATED.

§ 32-152.

ATHLETIC ASSOCIATIONS OF UNIVERSITY OF GEORGIA AND GEORGIA SCHOOL OF TECHNOLOGY DECLARED TO BE CORPORATIONS. — "The Athletic Associations of the University of Georgia and the Georgia School of Technology are hereby declared to be corporations, incorporated under charter issued by the superior court of the county in which said associations are located. (Acts 1949, p. 29.)" § 32-153.

ASSOCIATIONS AS NOT STATE AGENCIES: FINANCIAL OPERATION RULES AND REGULATIONS. — "The Associations named are hereby declared not to be agencies of the State and not subject to the limitations, restrictions and laws of general application imposed on State agencies by the Constitution of Georgia and the laws enacted by the General Assembly of Georgia in compliance with the Constitution of Georgia, and the Associations are authorized under their corporate charter issued by the superior court to make such rules and regulations for the financial operations of the Associations as they deem necessary: Provided, however, that this resolution shall not apply to any tax money appropriated by the State of Georgia. (Acts 1949, p. 29.)"

§ 105-709.

PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS. — "The following are deemed privileged communications: . . .

"6. Comments upon the acts of public men in their public capacity and with reference thereto."

APPENDIX B

EXHIBIT "A"

Filed: Feb. 26, 1963

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF ALABAMA
WESTERN DIVISION

PAUL BRYANT,

Plaintiff,

versus Civil Action No. 63-2-W

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,
A Corporation, and
FURMAN BISHER,

Defendants.

MOTION OF DEFENDANT,
THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,
A Corporation, TO DISMISS

Comes the defendant, The Curtis Publishing Company, a Corporation, and moves the Court as follows:

1. To dismiss this action because the complaint fails to state a claim against this defendant upon which relief can be granted.

2. To dismiss the action inasmuch as the same is brought improperly in the Western Division of the Northern District of Alabama.

3. To dismiss this action because the complaint fails to state a claim against this defendant upon which relief can be granted in the following particulars, separately and severally:

(a) For that the magazine article complained of is not libelous as a matter of law.

(b) The magazine article complained of is not libelous per se and there is no allegation of special damages.

(c) Part of the magazine article complained of and relied upon as libelous is not of and concerning the plaintiff.

(d) Part of the magazine article complained of and relied upon as libelous is alleged out of the context of the entire magazine article which is not libelous as a matter of law.

(e) To subject this defendant to liability in the circumstances complained of would impose an unreasonable burden upon interstate commerce in violation of Article 1, Section 8 of the Constitution of the United States.

(f) To subject this defendant to liability in the circumstances complained of would abridge the freedom of speech and of press in violation of the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, made applicable to the States by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

(g) To subject this defendant to liability in the circumstances complained of would be repugnant to Article 1, Section 6 of the Constitution of the State of Alabama in denying to this defendant due process of law.

(h) To subject this defendant to liability in the circumstances complained of would be repugnant to the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

(i) The magazine article complained of is not libelous as a matter of law in that it is fair comment concerning a personality who is famous throughout the United States and abroad.

PEPPER, HAMILTON & SCHEETZ
BEDDOW, EMBRY & BEDDOW
BY T. ERIC EMBRY
T. Eric Embry,
Attorneys for
The Curtis Publishing Company, A Corporation

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE

I hereby certify that I have served a copy of the above and foregoing Motion on Messrs. Pritchard, McCall and Jones, Attorneys for Plaintiffs in this cause, by mailing a copy of same to them at their office at the Frank Nelson Building, Birmingham, Alabama, United States postage prepaid.

This 26th day of February, 1963.

(Signed) T. ERIC EMBRY
Of Counsel

EXHIBIT "B"

Filed: Apr. 30, 1963

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF ALABAMA
SOUTHERN DIVISION

PAUL BRYANT,

Plaintiff,

versus Civil Action No. 63-166

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,
A Corporation,

Defendant.

MOTION OF DEFENDANT,
THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,
A Corporation, TO DISMISS

Comes the defendant, The Curtis Publishing Company, a corporation, and moves the Court as follows:

1. To dismiss this action because the complaint fails to state a claim against this defendant upon which relief can be granted.

2. To dismiss this action because the complaint fails to state a claim against this defendant upon which relief can be granted in the following particulars, separately and severally:

(a) For that the magazine article complained of is not libelous as a matter of law.

(b) The magazine article complained of is not libelous per se and there is no allegation of special damages.

(c) Part of the magazine article complained of and relied upon as libelous is not of and concerning the plaintiff.

(d) Part of the magazine article complained of and relied upon as libelous is alleged out of the context of the entire magazine article which is not libelous as a matter of law.

(e) To subject this defendant to liability in the circumstances complained of would impose an unreasonable burden upon interstate commerce in violation of Article 1, Section 8 of the Constitution of the United States.

(f) To subject this defendant to liability in the circumstances complained of would abridge the freedom of speech and of press in violation of the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, made applicable to the States by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

(g) To subject this defendant to liability in the circumstances complained of would be repugnant to Article 1, Section 6 of the Constitution of the State of Alabama in denying to this defendant due process of law.

(h) To subject this defendant to liability in the circumstances complained of would be repugnant to the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

(i) The magazine article complained of is not libelous as a matter of law in that it is fair comment concerning a personality who is famous throughout the United States and abroad.

PEPPER, HAMILTON & SCHEETZ
BEDDOW, EMBRY & BEDDOW
BY T. ERIC EMBRY
T. Eric Embry,
Attorneys for
The Curtis Publishing
Company, A Corporation

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE

I hereby certify that I have served a copy of the above and foregoing Motion on Messrs. Pritchard, McCall and Jones, Attorneys for Plaintiff in this cause, by mailing a copy of same to them at their office at the Frank Nelson Building, Birmingham, Alabama, United States postage prepaid.

This the 30th day of April, 1963.

(Signed) T. ERIC EMBRY
Of Counsel

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE

I do hereby certify that I am of counsel for Respondent in the above styled case and I have this day served a copy of the within and foregoing Response to Petition for A Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit upon Petitioner, Curtis Publishing Company, by mailing, in the United States Mail, a copy of same to its attorneys of record, HERBERT WECHSLER, ESQ., 435 West 116th Street, New York, New York 10027; PHILIP H. STRUBING, ESQ., PEPPER, HAMILTON & SCHEETZ, 123 South Broad Street, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania 19109 and KILPATRICK, CODY, ROGERS, McCLATCHEY & REGENSTEIN, 1045 Hurt Building, Atlanta, Georgia 30303, in an envelope properly addressed and with sufficient prepaid postage thereon, pursuant to Supreme Court Rule 33.

This _____ day of February 1966.

_____

Of Counsel for Respondent

INDEX

Page

I. The Instant Article Was Clearly Actionable And Aimed Unquestionably At Respondent Butts 1

II. There Was No Waiver In Rosenblatt 2

III. No Public Issue Was Involved In The Libel Here, Nor Was Butts A Public Official Within New York Times 2

IV. Actual Malice Within New York Times Was Conclusively Proven 7

V. The Charge Affords No Basis For Granting Certiorari 9

CONCLUSION 10

APPENDIX A 11

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE 11

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

All cases and authorities cited in this Further Response were referred to in the tables of the Initial Response, with the exception of Ga. Code Ann., §32-154, which is set out in Appendix A hereto.

IN THE
SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

Case No. 814

CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,
Petitioner,

versus

WALLACE BUTTS,
Respondent.

FURTHER RESPONSE IN LIGHT OF ROSENBLATT V. BAER

Pursuant to the Court's request, this response is filed in light of the opinion in Rosenblatt v. Baer, No. 38, October Term, 1965, decided on February 21, 1966.

I.

The Instant Article Was Clearly Actionable And Aimed Unquestionably At Respondent Butts

In Rosenblatt this Court announced a twofold basis for reversal and the grant of a new trial:

(1) "the column on its face contains no clearly actionable statement," and

(2) "no reference is made to respondent." (Slip Opinion, p. 3).

The article in the instant case is replete with clearly actionable statements and specific references to respondent Butts. He is named repeatedly; his photograph appears in three places; he is charged with being "corrupt" three times in an editorial block signed "The Editors" and superimposed on the first page of the article (R. 1407), and the article itself was entitled in bold letters "THE STORY OF A COLLEGE FOOTBALL FIX — A Shocking Report of How Wally Butts and 'Bear' Bryant Rigged A Game Last Fall."

The basis for the reversal in Rosenblatt does not exist in the instant case.

II.

There Was No Waiver In Rosenblatt

The Circuit Court here held there had been a waiver by petitioner of its constitutional defenses when it chose to rely on the sole defense of truth. The question of waiver was not involved in Rosenblatt.

III.

No Public Issue Was Involved In The Libel Here, Nor Was Butts A Public Official Within New York Times

This Court in Rosenblatt emphasizes the right of the public to discuss public issues and public officials who can significantly influence the resolution of those issues:

"The motivating force for the decision in New > York Times was twofold. We expressed a profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open and that [such debate) may well include vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials.' 376 U.S. at 270 (Emphasis supplied). There is, first, a strong interest in debate on public issues, and, second, a strong interest in debate about those persons who are in a position significantly to influence the resolution of those issues." (Slip Opinion, p. 9).

This Court next proceeded to make it clear that by "public issue" it meant an issue relating to government or a government operation, and that by "public official" it meant one responsible for government operations. Thus in that portion of Rosenblatt immediately following the language just quoted, the Court went on to say:

> "Criticism of government is at the very center of the constitutionally protected area of free discussion. Criticism of those responsible for government operations must be free, lest criticism of government itself be penalized. It is clear, therefore, that the 'public official' designation applies at the very least to those among the hierarchy of government employees who have, or appear to the public to have, substantial responsibility for or control over the conduct of governmental affairs." (Slip Opinion, pp. 9-10) (Emphasis added).

The "sell-out" of which Butts was accused was alleged to have occurred while he was Athletic Director at the University of Georgia. He was hired as Athletic Director by the Athletic Association of the University of Georgia, a separate entity denominated a private corporation, not an agency of the State, in the legislation pursuant to which it was created (Georgia Code, §§32-152, 32-153, cited in Appendix A of respondent's initial response). Its accounts were not subject to audit by the State, "as is required . . . in connection with the financial operations of State agencies" (Georgia Code, §32-154). The Athletic Association was thus not an arm of government. How could its employee, Butts, be engaged in government while performing its functions?

Contrast the position occupied by Butts as Athletic Director at the University of Georgia with that occupied by Baer. There was doubt that Baer was a public official within New York Times. There can be no doubt about Butts. The trial judge, who had the benefit of this Court's opinion in Times, found that he was not a "public official" as envisioned by that case. (Pet. for Cert., App. B, pp. 95a-96a).

As stated by this Court in Rosenblatt in respect of Baer in his capacity as Supervisor of the County Recreation Area, a facility owned and operated by the county (Slip Opinion, p. 2):

> "Respondent was employed by and directly responsible to the Belknap County Commissioners, three elected officers of the County government. During the 1950's, a public controversy developed over the way Respondent > and the Commissioners operated the Area; some protested that Respondent and the Commissioners had not developed Area's full potential, either as a resort for local residents or as a tourist attraction that might contribute to the County's taxes. The discussion culminated in 1959, when the New Hampshire Legislature enacted a law transferring control of the Area to a special five-man commission. At least in part to give this new regime a fresh start, Respondent was discharged."

The following distinctions stand out as between respondent Baer in Rosenblatt and respondent Butts here:

(1) Baer was hired by three elected county commissioners, who in their capacity as governors of the County were charged with the operation of its recreation area. Baer was their alter ego in this governmental operation. Butts was hired by a corporation, specifically declared in the legislation authorizing its existence not to be an arm of government, to operate an undertaking which therefore could not be classified as a government operation.

(2) A controversy had been in existence from 1950 to 1959, when Baer was discharged, as to the development and management of the County recreation area. There is no evidence of any issue in respect of Butts' performance of his duties as Athletic Director either before or after the publication of Curtis' article. As shown, there could have been no public issue.

When the instant article was published, however, there was a private issue being debated in court between Curtis and Bryant growing out of a half million dollar libel suit which Bryant had only recently filed against Curtis because of a previous article concerning him.

While that private court debate was in progress, one of Curtis' attorneys in that case arranged (R. 497-99) for Curtis to purchase (for $5,000.00) (R. 501-02, 1380-81) from a hot check artist, then on probation (R. 911-13, 1016), an alleged story that he listened in on a telephone conversation in which Bryant and Butts "rigged and fixed" the up-coming game between Alabama and Georgia.

It is thus obvious that petitioner, in publishing in its Saturday Evening Post the article out of which grew the action under review, was not engaging in a "debate on a public issue" and clearly the article was not a "criticism of government." Curtis had itself created the issue which was purely private and it was engaged in career assassination for a purely private purpose.

Times, Garrison and Rosenblatt each involved "debates on public issues" and "criticism of government." This case did not, and is therefore totally unlike those cases and not subject to constitutional protection given to public issue debates.

(3) Any defamation which existed in Rosenblatt related to the manner in which the management of the Area had performed its duties. Curtis' defamation of Butts did not relate to his conduct of his duties as Athletic Director. He was charged with a "sell-out" of information which was beyond the province of an Athletic Director to possess; according to the Record, he "had no idea about the game plan or the philosophy to be employed in the game" between Georgia and Alabama. (R. 682). The alleged sell-out pertained to matters handled by the football coach, not the Athletic Director (R. 681-82). Thus even if Butts had been a public official, the libel did not relate to his "official conduct" (376 U.S. at 706), and the New York Times rule does not apply.

The libel was simply a personal attack, charging that Butts and Bryant were "corrupt." Petitioner's charge of a "sell-out" by respondent Butts and that he and Bryant "fixed and rigged" a game (R. 681-82) was neither part of a debate of a governmental operation nor an attack on a public official within New York Times.

IV.

Actual Malice Within New York Times Was Conclusively Proven

While there was a serious question in Rosenblatt whether the alleged defamation even referred to Baer, rendering proof of malice difficult at the least, here actual malice within New York Times was conclusively proven. Thus even if Butts were a public official, nothing could be gained by sending the instant case back for a retrial. As stated by the trial judge (Pet. for Cert., App. B, p. 96a):

> "If it were conceded that plaintiff Butts was a 'public official,' the case of New York Times Company v. Sullivan would not permit the va> cating of this Court's previous judgment, as the ruling in the Times case does not prohibit a public official from recovering for a defamatory falsehood where he proves 'actual malice' — that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not. (Emphasis supplied). In the trial of this case, there was ample evidence from which a jury could have concluded that there was reckless disregard by defendant of whether the article was false or not."

In reviewing the trial court's judgment, the Fifth Circuit, after giving "full consideration to the entire record," held that:

> "The trial judge's appraisal of the evidence, with which we are in complete accord, was that it was sufficiently strong to justify the jury in concluding that what the Post did was done with reckless disregard of whether the article was false or not." 351 F. 2d 702, 719.

Any question this Court may have as to the basis upon which the jury, the trial judge and the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals found such convincing proof of malice in this case may be resolved by reference to the fourteen recitals of proven malice within the meaning of Times as set out at pages 20-31 of respondent's Initial Response.

If the evidence in this case does not establish actual malice, then it is impossible to conceive of that which does.

V.

The Charge Affords No Basis For Granting Certiorari

Unless this Court should find that the libel in this case involved the discussion of governmental operations and that respondent was a public official within the meaning of New York Times, it is unnecessary to consider whether the trial court's charge in this case is constitutionally sufficient under New York Times.

This Court in Rosenblatt found the trial court's charge insufficient as permitting a finding of actual malice based on "mere negligence." This is not true of the trial court's charge in this case. While not in the identical words suggested in New York Times, the language was sufficient to submit the question of actual malice to the jury within the scope of the Times definition.

The Court will recall that the sole defense made in this case was the truth of the article. When the trial court's charge was given petitioner made no objection to the charge as to actual malice, as required by the Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 51. This rule is based on sound practice and it should not be here disregarded.

CONCLUSION

We call the Court's attention to the refusal of petitioner in the instant case to make any further investigation as to the truth of the charges it was preparing to publish against respondent, even though eleven days prior to publication it was informed by telegram and letter of the "absolute falsity of the charges." Petitioner thus recklessly and deliberately ignored the warning.

This publication involves no discussion of public issues but a plain and outright career assassination for profit. Petitioner is not entitled to the constitutional protection which it is now seeking.

William H. Schroder

Allen E. Lockerman

Robert S. Sams

Tench C. Coxe

Milton A. Carlton, Jr.

Gerald P. Thurmond

Of Counsel:

TROUTMAN, SAMS, SCHRODER & LOCKERMAN
1600 William-Oliver Building
Atlanta, Georgia 30303

APPENDIX A.

GEORGIA CODE ANNOTATED
§ 32-154

"32-154. Audit of accounts of Associations not required of State Auditor. — The State Auditor of Georgia is not required to make an audit of the accounts of the Association as is required of him in connection with the financial operations of State agencies. (Acts 1949, p. 29)."

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE

It is hereby certified that a copy of this Further Response has been served upon counsel for the opposing party in the foregoing matter by depositing in the United States Mail a copy of same in a properly addressed envelope with adequate postage thereon.

This _____ day of April, 1966.

_____

Attorney for Wallace Butts,
Respondent

LIBRARY
SUPREME COURT, U. S.
MAY 18 1966
JOHN F. DAVIS, CLERK

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM 1966

No. ~~1330~~ 150

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,
Petitioner,

—against—

EDWIN A. WALKER,
Respondent.

PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE COURT OF CIVIL APPEALS FOR THE SECOND SUPREME JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS, OR, IN THE ALTERNATIVE, TO THE SUPREME COURT OF TEXAS

WILLIAM P. ROGERS
LEO P. LARKIN, JR.
STANLEY GODOFSKY
200 Park Avenue
New York, New York 10017

ARTHUR MOYNIHAN
50 Rockefeller Plaza
New York, New York 10020

J. A. GOOCH
SLOAN B. BLAIR
1800 First National Building
Fort Worth, Texas 76102

Attorneys for Petitioner
The Associated Press

INDEX

	PAGE
CITATIONS TO OPINIONS BELOW	1
JURISDICTION	2
QUESTIONS PRESENTED	2
CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS AND STATUTES INVOLVED	4
STATEMENT OF THE CASE	4
REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT	24
CONCLUSION	35

TABLE OF CASES CITED

Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U. S. 58	34
Brennan v. Associated Press, F. Supp. (D. Conn. 1966) (not yet reported)	29
Brian v. Harper, 144 La. 585, 80 So. 885 (1919)	25
Garner v. Louisiana, 368 U. S. 157	33
Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64	27
Gilberg v. Goffi, 21 App. Div. 2d 517, 251 N. Y. S. 2d 823 (2nd Dept. 1964), aff'd. 15 N. Y. 2d 1023, 207 N. E. 2d 620 (1965)	28
Gugert v. New Orleans Independent Laundries, 181 So. 653 (La. Ct. App., 1938) (not officially reported)	25
Heeb v. Codifer & Bonnabel, 162 La. 139, 110 So. 178 (1926)	25
Marcus v. Search Warrant, 367 U. S. 717	34
Meredith v. Fair, 199 F. Supp. 754 (S. D. Miss. 1961), aff'd. 298 F. 2d 696 (5th Cir. 1962); 202 F. Supp. 224 (S. D. Miss. 1962), motion denied, 305 F. 2d 341 (1962), rev'd. 305 F. 2d 343 (5th Cir. 1962), stay vacated 306 F. 2d 374 (5th Cir. 1962), cert. denied 371 U. S. 828, stays vacated 83 Sup. Ct. 10; 313 F. 2d 532 (5th Cir. 1962), 313 F. 2d 534 (5th Cir. 1962), cert. denied 372 U. S. 916	5

PAGE

New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254 ..... 2, 25, 26, 27, 28, 33, 34

Pauling v. National Review, Inc., Misc. 2d , N. Y. S. 2d (Sup. Ct. N Y Co 1966) (not yet reported) 28

Pauling v. News Syndicate Company, 335 F. 2d 659 (2d Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U. S. 968 27

Pearson v. Fairbanks Publishing Co., (Super. Ct., Alaska 4th Dist., 1964) (unreported), aff'd. on other grounds Alaska (April 28, 1966) (not yet reported) 28

Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U. S. 75 26

Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U. S. 479 34

Shuttlesworth v. Birmingham, 382 U. S. 87 33

Speiser v. Randall, 357 U. S. 513 34

Thompson v. Louisville, 362 U. S. 199 33

Universal C. I. T. Credit Corp. v. Jones, 47 So. 2d 359 (La. Ct. App. 1950) (not officially reported) .. 25

Walker v. Courier-Journal and Louisville Times Co., 246 F. Supp. 231 (W. D. Ky. 1965), app. pend'g 28, 29, 30, 31

AUTHORITIES

Berney, Libel and the First Amendment—A New Constitutional Privilege, 51 Va. L. Rev. 1 (1965) 31

Brennan, The Supreme Court and the Meikeljohn Interpretation of the First Amendment, 79 Harv. L. Rev. 1 (1965) 31

Kalven, The New York Times Case: A Note on the Central Meaning of the First Amendment, 1964 Sup. Ct. Rev. 191 31

PAGE

Pedrick, Freedom of the Press and the Law of Libel: The Modern Revised Translation, 49 Cornell L. Q. 581 (1964) 31

Comment, The Scope of First Amendment Protection for Good Faith Defamatory Error, 75 Yale L. J. 642 (1966) 31

19 Sw. L. J. 399 (1965) 31

16 Syracuse L. Rev. 132 (1964) 31

9 Vill. L. Rev. 534 (1964) 31

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS AND STATUTES CITED

U. S. Constitution, First Amendment 2, 3, 4, 22, 23, 32, 34

U. S. Constitution, Fourteenth Amendment 2, 3, 4, 22, 23, 34

28 U. S. C. Section 1257 (3) 2

Vernon's Texas Civil Statutes, Title 88, Article 5431 4

Vernon's Texas Civil Statutes, Title 88, Article 5432, subsections 4 and 5 4

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM 1965

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,
Petitioner,
—against—
EDWIN A. WALKER,
Respondent.

No. .....

PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE COURT OF CIVIL APPEALS FOR THE SECOND SUPREME JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS, OR, IN THE ALTERNATIVE, TO THE SUPREME COURT OF TEXAS

Petitioner respectfully prays that a writ of certiorari issue to review the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals for the Second Supreme Judicial District of Texas which was entered in the above entitled case on July 30, 1965, or, in the alternative, the order of the Supreme Court of Texas which denied a writ of error on February 9, 1966.

CITATIONS TO OPINIONS BELOW

The unreported opinion of the trial court, contained in a letter to counsel dated July 29, 1964, is printed in Appendix B, pp. 31-35.

The opinion of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals dated July 30, 1965, reported at 393 S. W. 2d 671, is printed in Appendix B, pp. 3-30.

JURISDICTION

The judgment of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals was entered on July 30, 1965 (Appendix D, p. 118). An application for rehearing was denied on September 17, 1965 (Appendix D, p. 119).

Petitioner's application to the Supreme Court of Texas for a writ of error was denied on February 9, 1966 (Appendix D, p. 120). Petitioner's motion for a rehearing on its application for a writ of error was denied by the Supreme Court of Texas on March 23, 1966 (Appendix D, p. 121).

The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under 28 U. S. C. Section 1257 (3).

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. Whether the doctrine enunciated by this Court in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, is limited to public officials or applies to other persons or circumstances:

A. Whether, consistent with the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Federal Constitution, state libel laws may be applied to news reports, made without actual malice, respecting events of profound political and social importance and national public interest, such as the riots resulting from the confrontation between Federal and State power which occurred at Oxford, Mississippi on September 30, 1962, particularly at the behest of one who, like General Edwin A. Walker, wilfully, aggressively and defiantly thrust himself into the vortex of that confrontation.

B. Whether, consistent with the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Federal Constitution, state libel laws may be applied to news reports, made without actual malice, respecting events of public interest and importance, such as the enforcement by the United States Government of judgments of United States courts and suppression of defiance thereof, particularly at the behest of one who, like General Edwin A. Walker, wilfully, aggressively and defiantly thrust himself into the vortex of the controversy.

C. Whether, consistent with the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Federal Constitution, state libel laws may be applied to news reports made without actual malice concerning the public activities of persons like General Walker in connection with controversies of profound political and social importance and national public interest, such as those presented by the Oxford confrontation, where such persons are actively attempting to influence the outcome of such controversies and where such persons are, or are generally regarded as being, by virtue of their stature and activities, in a position significantly to influence the resolution of the issues thus presented.

2. Whether an award of general damages of $500,000 for the publication, without actual malice or any proof of pecuniary or other loss, of reports of newsworthy events is so oppressive that it inhibits freedom of expression to an extent which violates the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Federal Constitution.

3. Whether the record in this case on the issues of "substantial truth" and "fair comment" is so lacking in evidentiary support for the judgment below that that judgment constitutes a denial of due process in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

4. Whether the defense of "fair comment," as construed and applied by the Texas courts in this case, is so limited as to violate the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Federal Constitution.

5. Whether the application of state libel laws to the publications here complained of and in the circumstances disclosed by this record constitutes a denial of the freedoms of speech and press guaranteed by the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Federal Constitution.

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS AND STATUTES INVOLVED

Involved herein are Amendment I and Amendment XIV, Section 1 to the United States Constitution and Vernon's Texas Civil Statutes, Title 88, Article 5431 and subsections 4 and 5 of Article 5432, the texts of which are reprinted in Appendix A, pp. 1-2.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

On the night of September 30, 1962, there occurred in Oxford, Mississippi, a fateful confrontation between Federal and State power which arrested the attention of the entire nation, and which has become a milestone in the century-long battle for racial equality.

This confrontation was the culmination of events arising out of an attempt by a single Negro—James Meredith—to gain admission to the then all-white student body of the University of Mississippi (S.F. 9),* and the attempt by the State of Mississippi and its highest elected officials to prevent such admission through invocation of the historically and judicially discredited doctrine of interposition (S.F. 810-811).*

*All citations designated "S.F." are to the Statement of Facts, which consists of the minutes of the trial.

The events surrounding this confrontation, now an important chapter in the nation's history, directly involved, at one time or another, the President of the United States (S.F. 866), the Justices of this Court (S.F. 767-768), the Judges of the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit and the Southern District of Mississippi (S.F. 769), the Attorney General of the United States (S.F. 776), the Governor and Lieutenant Governor of Mississippi (S.F. 775), the Trustees of the University of Mississippi (S.F. 771), the United States Army (S.F. 782-783), the Mississippi National Guard (S.F. 870), over 150 United States Marshals (S.F. 368), the Mississippi State Highway Patrol (S.F. 276), and local law enforcement officials (S.F. 271).

A central figure in the confrontation was General Edwin A. Walker, Respondent here. General Walker—a former General Officer of the United States Army (S.F. 612-613), the commander of the troops at a similar confrontation in Little Rock in 1957 (S.F. 89, 612), a man who had resigned his commission in order to be free to engage in political controversy (S.F. 741) and who thereafter lectured widely on public issues (S.F. 743-746), a man who had but recently been a candidate for nomination for Governor of Texas (S.F. 752), a man who had achieved national status and was a self-admitted person of political prominence with an organized political following all his own named the "Friends of Walker" (S.F. 751)—deliberately and with as much fanfare as he could trumpet thrust himself into the very vortex of the confrontation at Oxford. Yet General Walker now seeks to collect an award of $500,000 in general damages (although he proved no actual damages at trial) because—according to the Texas state courts—the Petitioner, Associated Press, acting in good faith, reported in two respects incorrectly* General Walker's public activities on the occasion of that confrontation (Tr. pp. 59-60; Supp. Tr. pp. 1-4, Appendix B, pp. 31-35; Appendix B, pp. 7-8).

---

*_Meredith_ v. _Fair_, 199 F. Supp. 754 (S. D. Miss. 1961), _aff'd._ 298 F. 2d 696 (5th Cir. 1962); 202 F. Supp. 224 (S. D. Miss. 1962), _motion denied_ 305 F. 2d 341 (1962), _rev'd._ 305 F. 2d 343 (5th Cir. 1962), _stay vacated_ 306 F. 2d 374 (5th Cir. 1962), _cert. denied_ 371 U. S. 828, _stay vacated_ 83 Sup. Ct. 10; 313 F. 2d 532 (5th Cir. 1962), 313 F. 2d 534 (5th Cir. 1962), _cert. denied_ 372 U. S. 916.

The news reports upon which this action is based were prepared by Petitioner on the basis of information supplied to Petitioner by Van Savell, a local employee of Petitioner (S.F. 1069).

The dispatches read in full text (Pl. Ex. 1a and 1b, Tr. pp. 11-14):

> "October 2, 1962 'Walker, who Sunday night led a charge of students against federal marshals on the Ole Miss Campus, was arrested on four counts including insurrection against the United States.'
>
> "October 3, 1962 (Editors Note: Former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, a key figure in the weekend battling over admission of a Negro to the University of Mississippi, was eating dinner Sunday night when he says he was told there was a 'scene of considerable disturbance' on the University of Mississippi Campus. He went there. Here is the story of

*The finding that the article was inaccurate is not supported by the evidence. To the contrary, the evidence affirmatively and conclusively establishes that the statements complained of were substantially true.

Citations designated "Tr." are to the Transcript. Citations designated "Supp. Tr." are to the Supplemental Transcript, which consists of the trial court's opinion.

Petitioner is a nonprofit, membership corporation engaged in the gathering and dissemination of news to its membership, which consists of newspapers and broadcasting stations.

Van Savell, 21, Associated Press newsman, who was on the scene and saw what happened.)

"By Van Savell: Oxford, Miss., October 3, 1962 (AP) 'Utilizing my youth to the fullest extent, I dressed as any college student would and easily milled among the several thousand rioters on the University of Mississippi Campus Sunday night.'

" 'This allowed me to follow the crowd—a few students and many outsiders—as they charged federal marshals surrounding the century old Lyceum Building. It also brought me into direct contact with former Army Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, who is now under arrest on charges of inciting insurrection and seditious conspiracy.

" 'Walker first appeared in the riot area at 8:45 p.m., Sunday near the University Avenue entrance about 300 yds. from the Ole Miss Administration Building.

" 'He was nattily dressed in a black suit, tie and shoes and wore a light tan hat.

" 'The crowd welcomed Walker, although this was the man who commanded the 101st Airborne Division during the 1957 school integration riots at Little Rock, Arkansas.

" 'One unidentified man queried Walker as he approached the group. "General, will you lead us to the steps?"

" 'I observed Walker as he loosened his tie and shirt and nodded "Yes" without speaking. He then conferred with a group of about 15 persons who appeared to be the riot leaders.

" 'The crowd took full advantage of the near-by construction work. They broke new bricks into several pieces, took survey sticks and broken soft drink bottles.

" 'Walker assumed command of the crowd, which I estimated at 1,000 but was delayed for several minutes when a neatly dressed, portly man of about 45 approached the group. He conferred with Walker for several minutes and then joined a group near the front.

" 'Two men took Walker by the arms and they headed for the Lyceum and the federal marshals. Throughout this time, I was less than six feet from Walker.

" 'This march toward tear gas and some 200 marshals was more effective than the previous attempts. Although Walker was unarmed, the crowd said this was the moral support they needed.

" 'We were met with a heavy barrage of tear gas about 75 yards from the Lyceum steps and went a few feet further when we had to turn back.

" 'Before doing so, many of the rioters hurled their weapons—the bricks, the bottles, rocks and wooden stakes—toward the clustered marshals.

" 'We fled the tear gas and the charging marshals—the crowd racing back to a Confederate soldier's statue near the grove entrance below the Lyceum.

" 'I went to a telephone. A few minutes later I returned and found Walker talking with several students. Shortly thereafter, Walker climbed halfway up the Confederate monument and addressed the crowd.

" 'I heard Walker say that Gov. Barnett had betrayed the People of Mississippi. "But don't let up now," he said, "You may lose this battle, but you will have been heard."

" 'He continued: "This is a dangerous situation. You must be prepared for possible death. If you are not, go home now."

" 'There were cheers. It was apparent that Walker had complete command over the group.

" 'By this time, it was nearly 11:00 p.m. and I raced to the telephone again. Upon my return, Walker was calmly explaining the "New Frontier Government" to several bystanders. He remained away from the rioting throughout the next few hours, but advised on several tactics.

" 'One Ole Miss student queried the former General, "What can we use to make the tear gas bombs ineffective? Do you know of any way that we can attack and do some damage to those damn Marshals?"

" 'Walker suggested the use of sand to snuff out the tear gas.

" 'This stuff works real well, but where can you get it?", he asked.

" 'At this time the rioters were using a University fire truck and fire extinguishers in an attempt to make the tear gas bombs ineffective.

" 'I left Walker and walked about 100 yards away where Molotov cocktails—gasoline, in bottles with a fuse—were being made.

" 'Again I left the area for a telephone. As I walked toward a Dormitory with George Bartsch of the Little Rock Associated Press Bureau, we were attacked by Marshals who mistook us for students. We were deluged by tear gas, manhandled, handcuffed and beaten with clubs during a 200 yard walk back to the Lyceum Building.

" 'Thanks to recognition from Chief Marshal James P. McShane, we were quickly released and given freedom in the Marshals' Headquarters.

" 'Within minutes rifle and shotgun fire erupted from the rioting crowd and two men—one a French newsman—were killed. We considered ourselves lucky to have been arrested and glad to be behind closed, heavily guarded doors.' "

The only statements in the foregoing dispatches which Walker ultimately asserted were libelous of him were:

1. "Walker, who Sunday night led a charge of students against federal marshals on the Ole Miss Campus, . . ." (October 2, 1962 report); and

2. "Walker assumed command of the crowd . . ." (October 3, 1962 report).

As could reasonably be anticipated, the record presents considerable conflict as to what transpired on the campus at Ole Miss during the dark, bloody, riot-filled night of September 30, 1962. However, for purposes of this petition, we rely solely on the testimony of General Walker and testimony of the witnesses called on his behalf and for whose credibility he has vouched. They establish, beyond question and without reference to the testimony of the witnesses called by Petitioner, that the conclusory statements of which Walker complains are substantially true and constitute fair comment upon his activities.

Underlying all of the events which transpired is the naggingly persistent question: Why was General Walker of Dallas, Texas at the campus of the University of Mississippi on the night of September 30, 1962?

The answer, we submit, may be found in General Walker's own words and actions at the time:

On September 26, 1962, over radio station KWKH at Shreveport, Louisiana, General Walker issued the following call to arms:

> "It is time to move. We have talked, listened and been pushed around far too much by the anti-Christ Supreme Court. Rise to a stand beside Governor Ross Barnett at Jackson, Mississippi. Now is the time to be heard. Ten thousand strong from every state in the Union. Rally to the cause of freedom. The battle cry of the Republic. Barnett, Yes, Castro, No. Bring your flags, your tents, and your skillets. It is time. Now or never. The time is when and if the President of the United States commits or uses any troops, Federal or State, in Mississippi. The last time in such a situation I was on the wrong side. That was in Little Rock, Arkansas, in 1957, and 1958. This time I am out of uniform and I am on the right side and I will be there." (S.F. 779-780; Def. Ex. 7).

Walker reiterated his call the next morning in a television broadcast from Dallas, during which the following colloquy took place:

Unidentified Voice:

> "General, if forces go, will you lead this force?"

General Walker:

> "This is a cause for freedom. This is Americans, patriotic Americans from all over the nation. It is a movement for Freedom. And I will be there. Rise to a stand beside Governor Ross Barnett at Jackson, Mississippi. Now is the time to be heard. Thousands strong from every state in the union. Rally to the cause of freedom." (S.F. 787-788).

The next evening, on September 28, 1962, General Walker took to the air from New Orleans (S.F. 803):

"INTERVIEWER: Do you have plans, sir, for rallies, if and when the Federal troops are entered into Mississippi, of a certain point in the state where all your followers will then meet with you to protest the integration if it does come about?

"GENERAL WALKER: I intend to join the movement. There are thousands of people, I am sure, already in Mississippi—probably hundreds of thousands there—that are already standing beside their Governor Barnett, The best place to do this would, of course, be at the capitol or at Oxford, at the University, since that is where the issue is involved, and I am sure that that is where most of the movement will move to, to show the grass roots of movement in this issue."

On September 29, 1962, the day before the riots, and with full knowledge that Governor Barnett had then been held in contempt by the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit (S.F. 762-763) but was continuing his course of opposition to the admission of James Meredith (S.F. 841), Walker proceeded to Jackson, Mississippi, where he held yet another press and television conference and said:

"I am in Mississippi—beside Governor Ross Barnett.

"I call for a national protest against the conspiracy from within.

"Rally to the cause of Freedom in righteous indignation, violent vocal protest and bitter silence under the Flag of Mississippi at the use of Federal troops.

"This today is a disgrace to the Nation in 'Dire Peril'—a disgrace beyond the capacity of anyone except its enemies. This is the conspiracy of the crucifixion by the anti-Christ conspirators of the Supreme Court in their denial of prayer and their betrayal of a nation." (Def. Ex. 8, S.F. 789, 790)

The next day—September 30, 1962—General Walker arrived at Oxford, and, consistent with his stated purpose to "stand beside Governor Barnett," volunteered his services to the County Sheriff (S.F. 839-840). At the time he made this offer, he knew that the Sheriff was under the jurisdiction of the Governor; that the Governor had previously used the police forces of the state, including the Sheriff, to prevent the admission of Meredith to the University; and that the Governor had not since changed his position (S.F. 840-841).

Late on the afternoon of September 30, 1962, at the Ole Miss Motel in Oxford, General Walker held still another press conference, during which he once again urged defiance of the orders of the Courts and of the Federal Government:

"As the forces of the New Frontier assemble to the north, let history be witness to the courage and determination that calls us to Oxford to support a courageous Governor. His lawful stand for state sovereignty is supported by thousands of people beyond the state borders now on their way to join you at Oxford." (Def. Ex. 11, S.F. 794-795).*

While eating dinner that evening in a restaurant in downtown Oxford, General Walker listened to President Kennedy's speech announcing that James Meredith was in residence on the campus of the University and calling upon the people of Mississippi to preserve law and order (S.F. 868 et seq.). General Walker's reaction: "Nauseating, nauseating" (S.F. 874-875).

Promptly on learning that there was "trouble" on the campus, Walker hurried there (S.F. 663-664).

"Trouble" was, to say the least, an understatement. By the time the General arrived at the campus, violent, widespread rioting was in progress (S.F. 162, 169, 192, 206, 294, 295-297, 420, 477). The riot, which was to rage throughout the night, resulted in the deaths of two persons and injuries to at least 50 others, the destruction of 16 automobiles, and the arrest of 160 rioters (S.F. 296, 939, 1349, 1350).

The crowd, which at times had the earmarks of a lynch mob (S.F. 258), engaged in an almost continuous series of furious physical attacks on the Federal marshals who were guarding the Lyceum, the school's administration building (S.F. 295-297). The marshals were attacked with sticks, bricks, bottles, stones, rocks, pieces of concrete benches and

---

*The General has also admitted that, during the week preceding his expedition to Oxford, he "probably" made the following statement when asked if he recommended that his volunteers go armed:

> "The Administration has indicated that it will do whatever is necessary to enforce this unconstitutional action. I have stated that whatever is necessary to oppose that enforcement and stand behind Governor Barnett should be done." (S.F. 828).

The General also admits that he "may" have said:

> "The decision for force will be made in Washington. Evidently it has not been made yet. When and if it is, it's their decision to make. We will move with the punches." (S.F. 829).

even "Molotov cocktails" (S.F. 158, 201, 373, 488, 555, 925, 1291) and were forced to defend themselves with tear gas. Gunfire eventually broke out (S.F. 480-481, 531, 556, 1352-1353) and the campus, in the words of one of Walker's witnesses, became "a battlefield" (S.F. 261).

Later that evening, as the rioting and wild confusion intensified, the mob attempted to charge the marshals with a firetruck and then a bulldozer (S.F. 703-705).

It was into this melee that General Walker voluntarily thrust himself, as he had promised he would (S.F. 800). So anxious was General Walker to be present in an official capacity, if possible, that, even after he had seen for himself the catastrophic results of the defiance of the Federal Government, he requested a Deputy Sheriff, whom he met on the campus by chance, to deputize him on the spot (S.F. 299-300, 886).

Is it any wonder, in the light of his widely publicized and highly intemperate and inflammatory statements, that the rioting students believed Walker had come to assist them and hailed him as their leader: "We have a leader" . . . "General, will you lead us up to the steps?" . . . "Will you get us organized, will you lead us?" (S.F. 882-883)*

And is it any wonder, when General Walker delivered a speech from the Confederate Monument to the assembled mob (S.F. 686) and offered expert advice on how to combat the tear gas with which the Federal marshals were then defending themselves (S.F. 919-920), that Van Savell concluded that Walker had indeed "assumed command of the crowd" which had so assiduously sought his leadership?

At the trial, General Walker purported to justify his speech as an attempt to calm the crowd (S.F. 687). Yet the General himself admits that when an Episcopalian minister, the Reverend Duncan Gray, pleaded with him to help stop the riot, he declined, telling Reverend Gray to his face that the minister's attitude made him ashamed to be an Episcopalian (S.F. 680, 897).

*It is conceded that General Walker was an object of attention (S.F. 419, 586, 675), and that, wherever he went, the crowds followed him and sought his advice (S.F. 373).

General Walker also admits that, in his speech, he congratulated the students on their "protest" (S.F. 918), telling them they had a right to "protest" (S.F. 913), could continue to "protest" (S.F. 902), and should "stand by your Governor" (S.F. 917-918)—all this at a time when Walker well knew that the "protest" consisted of a series of violent physical attacks on the Federal marshals (S.F. 917). He also admits telling the rioters that Colonel Birdsong, head of the Mississippi Highway Patrol, had betrayed them—a sentiment clearly calculated to incite and inflame his audience. Walker even went so far as to absolve the mob from responsibility for the havoc they were then creating: He told them that Governor Barnett had not abandoned them (S.F. 905), thus creating an aura of legality for their actions under the so-called interposition doctrine; that the responsibility for the violence was "on the hands of the Federal Government" (S.F. 902); and that the forces carrying out the mandate of the Federal Court should have been sent to Cuba, not Oxford (S.F. 422, 455, 479, 687).

Respondent's own witnesses further testified that General Walker also said "Protest, protest, all you want to, you have a right to protest and they may run out of gas" (S.F. 371); that he urged the crowd to continue their protest at a time when they were throwing Molotov cocktails and setting cars on fire (S.F. 373); and that he said "You may not win but you will be heard" (S.F. 1025-1026) and "Help is on the way, thousands are coming" (S.F. 371).*

We need not speculate as to whether other portions of the speech deprecating violence were merely pro forma statements for the record or "aesopian" restatements of Walker's claim that responsibility for the violence rested with the Federal Government. Overall, at least, Walker's statements—even his version of them—could reasonably have been interpreted as a call to renewed and increased violence, and many of those present obviously considered it such.

*Presumably the "thousands" to whom Walker referred were those whom Walker himself had previously summoned to Oxford with their "flags, tents and skillets" to stand beside Governor Barnett.

By virtue of his status as a former United States Major General who had commanded the Federal troops at Little Rock and because of the inflammatory nature of his widely publicized statements in support of Governor Barnett, General Walker, simply by his presence on the campus, became a central figure to whom the rioters looked for leadership. For this reason, the delivery of a speech such as that which even General Walker concedes he made, whether treated separately or taken in conjunction with his admitted conduct before and afterwards, establishes, we believe, the substantial truth and fairness of the conclusion that Walker "assumed command" of the crowd.

The second statement on which the $500,000 jury verdict was predicated was the statement that "Walker . . . led a charge" against the marshals. The trial court defined the term "charge" to mean "A movement toward the marshals, or a group or body of people moving toward an objective", and the term "led" to mean "Activities by a person who directs, moves to action, or encourages in some action or movement" (Tr. p. 59).

Measured by these definitions and giving to General Walker the benefit of every reasonable inference, the evidence in this case plainly establishes that on more than one occasion General Walker led a charge.*

*There are almost as many versions of the "charge" as there are witnesses. But this is to be expected in a situation where, as here, numerous witnesses attempt to recollect events which occurred in murky darkness, and in the midst of violence, bloodshed, tear gas and general confusion.

General Walker himself concedes that on at least two occasions during the evening he moved in a westerly direction from the area of the Confederate Monument toward the area of the flagpole (S.F. 676, 693-695). Since the Lyceum (where the Federal marshals were gathered) is west of the flagpole, it is obvious that on at least two occasions General Walker advanced toward the Federal marshals.

General Walker denied at trial (S.F. 696) that he was on either occasion "leading a charge", but here is what his own witnesses had to say on that subject:

Talmage Witt, a Deputy Sheriff who was called by the Plaintiff and who was with Walker substantially all of the time Walker was on the campus (S.F. 371-372), testified that Walker advanced toward the flagpole on two occasions. On the first occasion, prior to the speech, a small crowd followed him until they were dispersed by tear gas (S.F. 341).

The second occasion is succinctly described in Witt's written statement, which reads in relevant part (Def. Ex. 1):

> "After some of the crowd had asked Walker if he would lead them, he stepped down from the side of the monument and said: 'Keep protesting and see if we can get closer.' He then started towards the marshals and the crowd of at least a thousand by that time, followed him. This crowd was armed with sticks, rocks, coca cola bottles and other things, as I have heretofore stated. They seemed to have anything that they could get their hands on, and when they got close enough, they would throw towards the marshals. When the front of this crowd, which General Walker was with, got in about 200 feet of the marshals, they fired another blast of tear gas, and the crowd ran back, with General Walker with them. At all times during this, I was near or in sight of General Walker and stayed in sight of him until about 5 a.m. the next morning."

And further (ibid.):

> "On a number of occasions Walker would walk towards the marshals, or in that general direction, and whenever he did, a large crowd would fall in behind and follow him. In fact, wherever Walker went, the crowd followed. During the time after the first march towards the marshals with Walker in or near the lead, I heard different statements, many of which I cannot remember, but at one time, in talking with a group about the protest they were making, he said, 'good, good, keep it up.' I heard people asking how to snuff out or counteract the tear gas, and Walker told them to use water, and right after that they got a fire truck and hose and began to try to use that to stop the gas."

Charles May, another of Plaintiff's witnesses, testified that he saw Walker walking toward the flagpole with a crowd surrounding him (S.F 1231).

Danny Lee Hunter, who was called on behalf of the Plaintiff, testified that when Walker finished the speech at the Confederate Monument he exhorted his listeners: "Come on, let's go," or "Let's go up and see," and started walking toward the flagpole with practically the entire crowd—estimated at approximately 200 people—following him (S.F. 1050-1052).

Plaintiff's witness Edwin Leon Jackson testified that the General walked to the vicinity of the flagpole; that ten or fifteen people followed him; that twenty-five were with him; and that those in front of him were throwing rocks (S.F. 1020-1023).

Plaintiff's witness Henry Edwards testified that Walker approached the flagpole, accompanied by some fifty or sixty people (S.F. 597).

Plaintiff's witness Cecil Cox testified that Walker was in the middle of a group of about twenty-five or thirty people who walked up towards the marshals, some waving a flag of truce and demanding "we want that nigger" (S.F. 247, 250, 258). Following the speech at the Confederate Monument, Cox saw the General and fifteen or twenty others start toward the Lyceum building.

Richard Harvey Sweat, another witness for the Plaintiff, testified that Walker walked toward the Lyceum building before his speech with students around him (S.F. 168-170) and that he walked toward the flagpole a second time after his speech with about fifteen people, including some who had missiles in their hands (S.F. 221-231).

Finally, there is the testimony of Alfred Kuettner, a reporter for United Press International. His testimony is particularly significant because Respondent, at the trial, sought to contrast the "unfair" treatment accorded to him by Petitioner with the "fair" treatment accorded him by UPI (S.F. 1872; Tr. p. 19). Yet the UPI reporter, testifying for Plaintiff, said that Walker was "more than an interested observer" when he came onto the campus (S.F. 1289); that he gave advice to the rioters and was the focal point of student activity (S.F. 1292); and that he, Kuettner, personally saw Walker advance on the Lyceum with two men, one on each side of him (S.F. 1272-1273).

The inescapable conclusion which emerges from the welter of testimony is this: Whether Walker advanced toward the marshals with a small group or a large one, whether the mob was hurling missiles at the marshals or demanding "that nigger" under a flag of truce, whether the advance proceeded at slow march or double-time, it is beyond dispute, even on the testimony offered by the Plaintiff, that Walker, during the four to five hours he was on the campus (S.F. 279-280), did, in fact, lead at least two charges on the Federal marshals.*

Notwithstanding the foregoing, the jury returned a verdict for Respondent for $500,000 in general damages and $300,000 in punitive damages (Tr. pp. 61-62).

The trial court, however, finding that there was no evidence of malice, set aside the jury's verdict so far as related to punitive damages and entered judgment in favor of Respondent for $500,000 (Tr. p. 71).

An appeal to the Texas Court of Civil Appeals followed, where the judgment was affirmed per curiam (Appendix D, p. 118), 393 S. W. 2d 671 (1965), and an application for rehearing was denied (Appendix D, p. 119), 393 S. W. 2d 671 (1965).

An application for a writ of error was thereafter filed with, and duly denied by, the Supreme Court of Texas, the court finding no reversible error (Appendix D, p. 120). An application for rehearing in the Supreme Court of Texas was also denied (Appendix D, p. 121).

---

*In view of the resolution of the factual issues in the Plaintiff's favor, we have not heretofore adverted to the testimony of the Defendant's witnesses; but we note, in passing, that this testimony not only corroborates but amplifies the conclusion that General Walker did, in fact, "lead a charge" and "assume command of the crowd" (See e.g. S.F. 1615, 1620-1623, 1669-1670, 1692).

This testimony discloses, for example, that Walker, on arriving at the campus, agreed to lead the rioters in protesting (S.F. 1646-1647); that he called upon them to "riot, riot" (S.F. 1406-1407); and that he told them reinforcements were on the way to help them, and said there was "no stopping point" (S.F. 1414-1415). Defendant's witnesses also testified that Walker, using pronouns which would identify himself with the rioters, assured the mob that "we have got more people coming" (S.F. 1612), and that the reinforcements he had promised were "around town" and "we can bring them in if we need them" (S.F. 1726). Walker also told the rioters that there were "thousands" behind them and that they would "win in the end" (S.F. 1548), and that they should "give them protest" and "give them casualties" (S.F. 1729). Walker's general attitude on the occasion of the riots is evidenced by his comment on learning of the beating of a newspaper man: "Good, good" (S.F. 1612).

Throughout the proceedings, Petitioner has asserted its rights under the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Federal Constitution. Petitioner first raised the constitutional issues in its pleading (Tr. p. 35; Appendix C, pp. 36-47). It reasserted its rights in motions to the trial court for judgment notwithstanding the verdict (Tr. p. 66; Appendix C, pp. 48-49) and for a new trial (Tr. pp. 73, 78, 80; Appendix C, pp. 50-52); on appeal to the Court of Civil Appeals (Br. pp. 9 and 73-85 and Rep. Br. pp. 6-8 and 19-24; Appendix C, pp. 53-72); in its application for writ of error to the Supreme Court of Texas (Appl. pp. 1-46; Appendix C, pp. 75-115); and in the applications for rehearing (Appendix C, pp. 73-74 and 116-117). Those portions of the record wherein such questions were raised are set forth in Appendix C.

Petitioner's constitutional claims were uniformly rejected below. Since the Supreme Court of Texas rendered no opinion, we briefly advert, so far as relevant to the constitutional questions here presented, to the opinions of the trial court and the Texas Court of Civil Appeals.

The opinion of the trial court is set forth in a letter to counsel dated July 29, 1964, and poses the constitutional question as follows (Appendix B, p. 34):

> "Since I have determined that there is no actual malice in this case, the question arises as to whether the rule of New York Times vs. Sullivan (which prohibits a public official recovering damages for libel when there is no actual malice) should apply to a public figure such as plaintiff. If it does, then the entire jury verdict must be set aside, and judgment entered for defendant."

In holding the Sullivan doctrine inapplicable, the trial court said (Appendix B, pp. 34-35):

"The evidence is undisputed that General Walker was a public figure at the time of the riot on the Old Miss Campus.

"Freedom of the Press is perhaps the most important protection against tryanny that we find in a free society. Without it, the public could not know whether one's right to speak, to worship his creator as he chooses or to enjoy a fair trial had been abridged. Americans everywhere depend on news media of all types to provide accurate information on the daily affairs of men and nations. This imposes a great duty and responsibility on the news gathering and distributing agencies of this country, and they should be protected to the extent necessary for them to properly function.

"However, I see no compelling reasons of public policy requiring additional defenses to suits for libel. Truth alone should be an adequate defense. The Sullivan case is limited, and I feel it should be limited, in its application to public officials. It does not apply to this case."

The Texas Court of Civil Appeals affirmed, relying, as to the constitutional issues, solely on the authority of a thirty-seven year old law review article and some cases cited to support the proposition that the right of a citizen to defend his reputation "is zealously guarded". The Court said (Appendix B, pp. 21-22):

"We find no merit in appellant's contention that the reports, made without malice, are protected from the claim of libel by the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution.

* * *

"We find no application of the authorities cited by the appellant to the facts of this case."

Moreover, the Court held inapplicable the defenses of "substantial truth" and "fair comment", characterizing the latter defense as a "weak defense . . . subject to so many limitations that it is seldom completely applicable." (Appendix B, p. 19).

The Supreme Court of Texas declined even to hear the case, finding no reversible error in any of the rulings below (Appendix D, p. 120).

It is in this posture that the case comes to this Court.

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT

1. This case represents one of the most serious—and to date successful—attacks ever made on freedom of the press. What is here at stake is nothing less than the fundamental right of news media to publish and disseminate, without fear or favor, good faith reports and comment concerning events of national significance and of persons of political prominence who are involved and who involve themselves in such events.

This is but one of at least fifteen cases brought by General Walker against the Associated Press, its members, or both, arising out of news reports identical or similar to those now before this Court. In those fifteen cases, listed in Appendix F, Respondent seeks damages aggregating some $33,250,000.

These cases were for the most part filed in forums in Southern or border states where it could reasonably be anticipated that juries would share the belief, widely held in the South, that the South's position in the segregation controversy had been grossly falsified and maliciously reported by national news media, and would therefore be inclined, in determining the issues of liability and damages, to be influenced by the general feeling that "irresponsible outsiders" should be taught a lesson.

That this is what in fact occurred is demonstrated by this very case, in which the jury awarded some $300,000 in punitive damages on a record which the courts thereafter held, as a matter of law, was wholly devoid of any evidence of malice and by the further award of some $500,000 in general damages, although not one penny of actual damages was established or even claimed.

In the only other case heretofore tried—that in the Louisiana state courts—the jury returned a verdict of $3,000,000, although Respondent himself had only sought damages of $2,250,000* and punitive damages are not allowable in a civil action in Louisiana.

Thus, these cases are shocking examples of the effectiveness of the technique of converting the libel laws into weapons to punish those disseminating information about public controversies which arouse deep emotions—in this case the attempts by hard-core segregationists, in public office and out, to perpetuate a system of racial segregation which is patently unconstitutional.

The resultant threat to fundamental freedoms of speech and press is self-evident. As this Court said in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 278, in speaking of a libel award against the New York Times in Alabama, also for half a million dollars:

---

*The judgment, reduced to the amount demanded, has been appealed.

See, e.g., Gugert v. New Orleans Independent Laundries, 181 So. 653 (La. Ct. App., 1938) (not officially reported); Heeb v. Codifer & Bonnabel, 162 La. 139, 110 So. 178 (1926); Brian v. Harper, 144 La. 585, 588, 80 So. 885, 886 (1919); Universal C. I. T. Credit Corp. v. Jones, 47 So. 2d 359 (La. Ct. App., 1950) (not officially reported).

This technique is not novel. It is patterned, apparently, on that adopted by Alabama and its officials in attempting to punish the New York Times and the Columbia Broadcasting System for criticizing Alabama's conduct in the desegregation controversy (See New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 292).

> "Whether or not a newspaper can survive a succession of such judgments, the pall of fear and timidity imposed upon those who would give voice to public criticism is an atmosphere in which the First Amendment freedoms cannot survive."

2. The fundamental constitutional holding of the courts below is that Sullivan (376 U. S. 254) is "limited in its application to public officials." There is thus presented for decision the very question which this Court left open in Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U. S. 75, 86 (fn. 12), namely:

> ". . . whether there are other bases for applying the New York Times standards—for example, that in a particular case the interests in reputation are relatively insubstantial, because the subject of discussion has thrust himself into the vortex of the discussion of a question of pressing public concern."

One can scarcely imagine a factual situation which would present more clearly than this case the question thus left open. Here, not only did General Walker "thrust himself into the vortex" of the Oxford confrontation; by his intemperate statements and actions immediately preceding that confrontation, he became, in fact, a catalyst for the tragic events which occurred there.

It is of great national interest and significance—for many reasons—that a person of nationwide political prominence, a former general officer of the United States Army, still addressed as "General" even by court and counsel (See e.g. S.F. 7, 56, 87, 391, 973, 1244, 1509), had publicly called upon his fellow citizens to register their defiance of the Federal Government and had thereafter attended and encouraged violent acts of defiance. If the activities of General Walker in such a situation can be "blacked out" through an application of the libel laws, then the unconstitutionally inhibiting effects upon freedom of speech and press are, we believe, self-evident.

Finally, we observe that, since Governor Barnett and virtually all of the other principal participants in the Oxford confrontation are clearly within the ambit of the Sullivan doctrine, it would be a constitutional paradox to hold that a public figure* like General Walker, who openly rose to stand beside Governor Barnett in that same controversy, seeking with equal vigor and effect to rally public support for the Governor's cause, was not.

Such an anomaly could hardly be said to comport with the principle of "uninhibited, robust and wide-open" debate which, in Sullivan, this Court sought to assure. Accord, Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64, 75. As the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit said in Pauling v. News Syndicate Company, 335 F. 2d 659, 671 (2d Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U. S. 968:

> "Although the public official is the strongest case for the constitutional compulsion of such a privilege, it is questionable whether in principle the decision can be so limited. A candidate for public office would seem an inevitable candidate for extension; if a newspaper cannot constitutionally be held for defamation when it states without malice, but cannot prove, that an incumbent seeking reelection has accepted a bribe, it seems hard to justify holding it liable for further stating that the bribe was offered by his opponent. Once that extension was made, the participant in public debate on an issue of grave public concern would be next in line; thus, as applied to the case in hand, if a newspaper could not be held for printing Dr. Pauling's charges that a member of the Atomic Energy Commission had

*The trial court observed that General Walker's status as a public figure at the time of the riots was "undisputed" (Supp. Tr. p. 3).

> 'made dishonest, untrue and misleading statements to mislead the American people' and that a United States Senator is 'the greatest enemy * * * the United States has,' as the New York Times case decided, one may wonder whether there would be sound basis for forcing it to risk a jury's determination that it was only engaging in fair criticism rather than misstating facts if it printed, falsely but without malice, that in saying all this Dr. Pauling was following the Communist line. The 'profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open,' now applied to confer immunity on 'vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials,' 376 U. S. at 270, 84 S. Ct. at 721, may some day be found to demand still further erosion of the protection heretofore given by the law of defamation."

The question whether the holding of this Court in Sullivan (376 U. S. 254) is limited in application to public officials or applies to other persons or circumstances is of vital importance and should, we submit, now be resolved by this Court.

3. The decision below is in direct conflict with the following decisions of Federal and state courts: Walker v. Courier-Journal and Louisville Times Co., 246 F. Supp. 231 (W. D. Ky., 1965), app. pend'g; Gilberg v. Goffi, 21 App. Div. 2d 517, 251 N. Y. S. 2d 823 (2nd Dept., 1964), aff'd. 15 N. Y. 2d 1023, 207 N. E. 2d 620 (1965); Pauling v. National Review, Inc., Misc. 2d , N. Y. S. 2d (Sup. Ct. N. Y. Co. 1966) (not yet reported); Pearson v. Fairbanks Publishing Co. (Super Ct., Alaska, 4th Dist., 1964) (unreported), aff'd. on other grounds, Alaska (April 28, 1966) (not yet reported), and Brennan v. Associated Press, F. Supp. (D. Conn. 1966) (not yet reported).*

A more direct conflict between the decisions below and the decision of the District Court in the Courier-Journal case, supra, is almost impossible to imagine. Both cases involve the same plaintiff—General Walker—and the same subject matter, reports of General Walker's activities at Oxford, Mississippi, during the night of September 30, 1962. While the courts below rejected the Sullivan doctrine as wholly inapplicable, the District Court in the Courier Journal case reached the "inescapable conclusion" that Sullivan did, in fact, apply, saying (246 F. Supp. 233-234):

> "The Plaintiff, Walker, is of course not a 'public official' within the commonly accepted meaning of the words. However, he was, as he identifies himself in his own Complaint, a person of 'political prominence.' This Court takes judicial notice that Plaintiff Walker's public life is generally well known to the people of this Nation, that he was the subject of nationwide news reports while on duty as an Army General, and also as a candidate for Governor of Texas, and that he has in the past made vigorous public announcements on matters of public concern. Plaintiff was, by his own choosing, present in Oxford, Mississippi, on the occasion of the turmoil after announcing on radio and television his intention to be present there and having called upon others to join with him there in support of his publicly stated position on the matters of public concern there in issue.
>
> "Had not Plaintiff thereby become a 'public man'? Could he not have reasonably foreseen that his being a person of 'political prominence' his presence in Oxford would be taken cognizance of by the press? Had not Walker interwoven his personal status into that of a public one whereby he would become the subject of substantial press, radio and television news comment; thus magnifying the chance that his activities would be 'erroneously' reported? This Court so believes.

*Since three of the five opinions are unpublished and may not, therefore, be readily available, we have for the convenience of the Court annexed hereto as Appendix E the texts of all five opinions.

"I therefore reach the inescapable conclusion that the protective 'public official' doctrine of 'actual malice' announced in New York Times v. Sullivan is in common reason and should be applicable to a 'public man' as well, and that the Plaintiff, Walker, was such a 'public man' under the circumstances involved here. 'Public men are, as it were, public property.' "

And further (246 F. Supp. 234):

". . . I am perhaps 'plowing new ground' in legal effect, but also with the accompanying conviction that not to do so would negate the spirit of the Times Opinion which I believe to be a '. . . profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust and wide open . . .' Public debate cannot be 'unhibited, robust and wide open' if the news media are compelled to stand legally in awe of error in reporting the words and actions of persons of national prominence and influence (not 'public officials') who are nevertheless voluntarily injecting themselves into matters of grave public concern attempting thereby through use of their leadership and influence, to mold public thought and opinion to their own way of thinking. If any > person seeks the 'spotlight' of the stage of public prominence then he must be prepared to accept the errors of the searching beams of the glow thereof, for only in such rays can the public know what role he plays on the stage of public concern—often, regretfully, a stage torn in the turmoil of riot and civil disorder, whereon error in reported occurrence is more apt to become the rule rather than the exception.

>
> "This is particularly so here where open riot and turmoil with accompanying destruction of property, injuries and death turned portions of the University of Mississippi campus into a strife beset no man's land through the dark hours of the night."

The constitutional issues here presented have been the subject of widespread speculation and debate by bench and bar alike,* and this fact attests to the vital importance of those issues and the urgency of their resolution. This Court is the only tribunal which ultimately can resolve the conflict.

4. Petitioner contended throughout the proceedings below that the conclusory statements which were held to be libelous constituted "fair comment" on the activities of General Walker at Oxford. The Texas courts, however, have held otherwise. In so holding, those courts so truncated the doctrine of fair comment as to leave it meaningless.

---

*See, e.g., Brennan, The Supreme Court and the Meikeljohn Interpretation of the First Amendment, 79 Harv. L. Rev. 1 (1965); Pedrick, Freedom of the Press and the Law of Libel: The Modern Revised Translation, 49 Cornell L. Q. 581 (1964); Kalven, The New York Times Case: A Note on the Central Meaning of the First Amendment, 1964 Sup. Ct. Rev. 191; Berney, Libel and the First Amendment—a New Constitutional Privilege, 51 Va. L. Rev. 1 (1965); Comment, The Scope of First Amendment Protection for Good Faith Defamatory Error, 75 Yale L. J. 642 (1966); 19 Sw. L. J. 399 (1965); 9 Vill. L. Rev. 534 (1964); 16 Syracuse L. Rev. 132 (1964).

They thus violated the First Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

The relevant facts as set forth above, despite some conflict as to the details, are essentially undisputed. If on the basis of those facts a news medium cannot make the comment in good faith that General Walker "assumed command of the crowd" and "led a charge" of students on the Federal marshals without risking a libel judgment of $500,000, then the freedoms of press and speech guaranteed by the Federal Constitution become illusory.

It is no answer to assert, as have the courts below, that a news medium need have no fears if it but accurately reports the "facts." In this case, there was no finding that any of the underlying facts set forth in the articles were false, but rather that Petitioner's conclusion or opinion of Walker's role, based on the facts contained in the articles and developed at trial, was not a "fair comment." Obviously, any comment critical of Walker would not have been considered "fair" by a jury under all the circumstances of the trial.

Where, as here, the defense of "fair comment" is rejected by the Texas Court of Civil Appeals as a "weak defense . . . subject to so many limitations that it is seldom completely applicable," and where, as here, such limitations are invoked to impose a liability of half a million dollars, it is obvious that the libel laws have been used to achieve a result which the Federal Constitution prohibits.

If this decision is permitted to stand, the only prudent course for the press to follow would be to refrain from commenting on events—however significant and newsworthy—where such comments may reflect unfavorably upon a participant in a public controversy arousing deep emotional responses which differ in the various regions of our country. For all practical purposes, the doctrine of fair comment would be of no avail and useless as a protection to news media involved in such controversies.

This Court has already indicated that there are Federal Constitutional boundaries limiting the extent to which the states can circumscribe the availability and applicability of the defense of "fair comment." See New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 292. This case clearly raises the question whether those boundaries have here been violated.

5. Apart from the other constitutional questions which permeate this case, the fact remains that there is no more support for the jury's finding of falsity than there was for its finding of malice. To award half a million dollars where there is no evidence establishing the underlying cause of action is, of course, a denial of due process—indeed, one of the most obvious denials of due process that can be imagined. Shuttlesworth v. Birmingham, 382 U. S. 87; Garner v. Louisiana, 368 U. S. 157; Thompson v. Louisville, 362 U. S. 199. There is only one tribunal which can now restore to petitioner the constitutional rights which the Texas courts have so clearly denied it. We respectfully submit that this Court, as the ultimate guardian of the rights guaranteed by the Constitution, should grant certiorari to correct this grave injustice.

6. One of the most shocking features of this case is the inordinate and unconscionable size of the verdict—half a million dollars in "general" damages where no actual pecuniary or other damage was or could be shown.

Obviously, the $500,000 verdict was intended, not to compensate, but to punish and deter. Permitted to stand, it will, indeed, deter and prevent news gathering and disseminating institutions from performing the function, vital to any democratic form of government, of disclosure and discussion on controversial public issues and personalities. For what newspaper, what magazine, what wire service would, as a practical matter, disseminate a report unfavorable to General Walker or any other controversial political personality if the risk involved is a judgment for half a million dollars?

We respectfully submit that the inexplicably high verdict itself presents a substantial constitutional question under the First and Fourteenth Amendments. For the repressive effect of such an award upon freedom of expression is so patent, the inhibiting effect upon the presentation of conflicting and controversial political argument and discussion so plain, the punishment for such a presentation so burdensome and oppressive that this Court may not, consistent with the First Amendment, permit its imposition. Cf. New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254; Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U. S. 58; Marcus v. Search Warrant, 367 U. S. 717; Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U. S. 479; Speiser v. Randall, 357 U. S. 513.

CONCLUSION

For each of the foregoing reasons, it is respectfully submitted the petition for writ of certiorari should be granted.

Respectfully submitted,

WILLIAM P. ROGERS
LEO P. LARKIN, JR.
STANLEY GODOFSKY
200 Park Avenue
New York, New York 10017

ARTHUR MOYNIHAN
50 Rockefeller Plaza
New York, New York

J. A. GOOCH
SLOAN B. BLAIR
1800 First National Building
Fort Worth, Texas

Attorneys for Petitioner
The Associated Press

MAY 18 1966
JOHN F. DAVIS, CLERK

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM 1966

No. ~~1220~~ 150

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,
Petitioner,

—against—

EDWIN A. WALKER,
Respondent.

APPENDICES TO PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE COURT OF CIVIL APPEALS FOR THE SECOND SUPREME JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS, OR, IN THE ALTERNATIVE, TO THE SUPREME COURT OF TEXAS

WILLIAM P. ROGERS
LEO P. LARKIN, JR.
STANLEY GODOFSKY
200 Park Avenue
New York, New York 10017

ARTHUR MOYNIHAN
50 Rockefeller Plaza
New York, New York 10020

J. A. GOOCH
SLOAN B. BLAIR
1800 First National Building
Fort Worth, Texas 76102

Attorneys for Petitioner
The Associated Press

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	PAGE
APPENDIX A—Constitutional Provisions and Statutes Involved	1
U. S. Constitution, Amendment I	1
U. S. Constitution, Amendment XIV, § 1	1
Vernon's Texas Civil Statutes, Article 5431	1
Vernon's Texas Civil Statutes, Article 5432, Subsections 4 and 5	2
APPENDIX B—Opinions of the Courts Below	3
Opinion of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals	3
Opinion of the Trial Court	31
APPENDIX C—Portions of Record Raising Constitutional Questions Below	36
Paragraphs III, V, and VI of the Second Original Amended Answer of Defendant, The Associated Press, pp. 1 and 6-15 (Tr. pp. 1 and 26-35)	36
Defendant's Motion to Disregard the Jury's Verdict, and for Judgment Notwithstanding Said Verdict, pp. 1 and 4 (Tr. pp. 63 and 66)	48
Defendant's Original Motion for New Trial, p. 1 (Tr. p. 73)	50
Defendant's Amended Motion for New Trial, pp. 1 and 3 (Tr. pp. 78 and 80)	51
Brief of Appellant The Associated Press in the Texas Court of Civil Appeals, pp. 1, 9 and 73-85	53
Reply Brief of Appellant The Associated Press in the Texas Court of Civil Appeals, pp. 1, 6-8 and 19-24	66

PAGE

Motion of Appellant The Associated Press for Rehearing in the Texas Court of Civil Appeals, pp. 1 and 3 73

Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46 75

Motion of Petitioner The Associated Press for Rehearing in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 116

APPENDIX D—Judgments of the Courts Below 118

Judgment of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals ... 118

Judgment of the Supreme Court of Texas 120

APPENDIX E—Conflicting Opinions 122

1. Walker v. Courier-Journal and Louisville Times Co., 246 F. Supp. 231 (W. D. Ky. 1965), app. pend'g 122

2. Pauling v. National Review, Inc., Misc. 2d N. Y. S. 2d (Sup. Ct. N. Y. Co. 1966) (not yet reported) 132

3. Gilberg v. Goffi, 21 App. Div. 2d 517, 251 N. Y. S. 2d 823 (2nd Dept. 1964), aff'd. 15 N. Y. 2d 1023, 207 N. E. 2d 620 (1965) 148

4. Pearson v. Fairbanks Publishing Co., (Super. Ct. Alaska 4th Dist., 1964) (unreported), aff'd. on other grounds Alaska (April 28, 1966) (not yet reported) 164

5. Brennan v. Associated Press, F. Supp. (D. Conn. 1966) (not yet reported) 181

APPENDIX F—Libel Suits Brought by General Walker Arising Out of News Reports Identical Or Similar To Reports Here Complained Of 193

APPENDIX A

Constitutional Provisions and Statutes Involved

U. S. Constitution, Amendment I

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

U. S. Constitution, Amendment XIV, § 1.

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Vernon's Texas Civil Statutes, Article 5431

In any action for libel, in determining the extent and source of actual damage and in mitigation of exemplary or punitive damage, the defendant may give in evidence, if specially pleaded, all material facts and circumstances surrounding such claim of damage and the defense thereto, and also all facts and circumstances under which the libelous publication was made, and any public apology, correction or retraction made and published by him of the libel complained of, and may also give in evidence, if specially pleaded in mitigation of exemplary or punitive damage, the intention with which the libelous publication was made. The truth of the statement, or statements, in such publication shall be a defense to such action.

Vernon's Texas Civil Statutes, Article 5432, Subsections 4 and 5

The publication of the following matters by any newspaper or periodical shall be deemed privileged and shall not be made the basis of any action for libel.

* * *

4. A reasonable and fair comment or criticism of the official acts of public officials and of other matters of public concern published for general information.

5. The privilege provided under Sections 1, 2, 3, and 4, of this article shall extend to any first publication of such privileged matter by any newspaper or periodical, and to subsequent publications thereof by it when published as a matter of public concern for general information; but any re-publication of such privileged matter, after the same has ceased to be a matter of such public concern, shall not be deemed privileged, and may be made the basis of an action for libel upon proof that such matter had ceased to be of such public concern and that same was published with actual malice.

APPENDIX B

Opinions of the Courts Below

Opinion of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals

IN THE

Court of Civil Appeals

FOR THE
SECOND SUPREME JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS

No. 16624

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,
Appellant,

vs.

EDWIN A. WALKER,
Appellee.

FROM THE DISTRICT COURT OF TARRANT COUNTY

OPINION

This is a libel suit. The parties will be designated as they were in the court below or The Associated Press as the A. P. and Walker by name.

The following are the reports of which Walker complained:

"October 2, 1962 'Walker, who Sunday night led a charge of students against federal marshals on the Ole

Appendix B
Opinion of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals

Miss Campus, was arrested on four counts including insurrection against the United States.'

"October 3, 1962 (Editors Note: Former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, a key figure in the week-end battling over admission of a Negro to the University of Mississippi, was eating dinner Sunday night when he says he was told there was a 'scene of considerable disturbance' on the University of Mississippi Campus. He went there. Here is the story of Van Savell, 21, Associated Press newsman, who was on the scene and saw what happened.)

"By Van Savell: Oxford, Miss., October 3, 1962 (AP) 'Utilizing my youth to the fullest extent, I dressed as any college student would and easily milled among the several thousand rioters on the University of Mississippi Campus Sunday night.'

" 'This allowed me to follow the crowd—a few students and many outsiders—as they charged federal marshals surrounding the century old Lyceum Building. It also brought me into direct contact with former Army Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, who is now under arrest on charges of inciting insurrection and seditious conspiracy.

" 'Walker first appeared in the riot area at 8:45 p.m., Sunday near the University Avenue entrance about 300 yds. from the Ole Miss administration Building.

" 'He was nattily dressed in a black suit, tie and shoes and wore a light tan hat.

" 'The crowd welcomed Walker, although this was the man who commanded the 101st Airborne Division during the 1957 school integration riots at Little Rock, Arkansas.

" 'One unidentified man queried Walker as he approached the group. "General, will you lead us to the steps?"

Appendix B
Opinion of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals

" 'I observed Walker as he loosened his tie and shirt and nodded "Yes" without speaking. He then conferred with a group of about 15 persons who appeared to be the riot leaders.

" 'The crowd took full advantage of the near-by construction work. They broke new bricks into several pieces, took survey sticks and broken soft drink bottles.

" 'Walker assumed command of the crowd, which I estimated at 1,000 but was delayed for several minutes when a neatly dressed, portly man of about 45 approached the group. He conferred with Walker for several minutes and then joined a group near the front.

" 'Two men took Walker by the arms and they headed for the Lyceum and the federal marshals. Throughout this time, I was less than six feet from Walker.

" 'This march toward tear gas and some 200 marshals was more effective than the previous attempts. Although Walker was unarmed, the crowd said this was the moral support they needed.

" 'We were met with a heavy barrage of tear gas about 75 yards from the Lyceum steps and went a few feet further when we had to turn back.

" 'Before doing so, many of the rioters hurled their weapons—the bricks, the bottles, rocks and wooden stakes —toward the clustered marshals.

" 'We fled the tear gas and the charging marshals—the crowd racing back to a Confederate soldier's statue near the grove entrance below the Lyceum.

" 'I went to a telephone. A few minutes later I returned and found Walker talking with several students. Shortly thereafter, Walker climbed halfway up the Confederate monument and addressed the crowd.

Appendix B
Opinion of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals

" 'I heard Walker say that Gov. Barnett had betrayed the People of Mississippi. "But don't let up now," he said, "You may lose this battle, but you will have been heard."

" 'He continued: "This is a dangerous situation. You must be prepared for possible death. If you are not, go home now."

" 'There were cheers. It was apparent that Walker had complete command over the group.

" 'By this time, it was nearly 11:00 p. m. and I raced to the telephone again. Upon my return, Walker was calmly explaining the "New Frontier Government" to several bystanders. He remained away from the rioting throughout the next few hours, but advised on several tactics.

" 'One Ole Miss student queried the former General, "What can we use to make the tear gas bombs ineffective? Do you know of any way that we can attack and do some damage to those damn Marshals?"

" 'Walker suggested the use of sand to snuff out the tear gas.

" ' "This stuff works real well, but where can you get it?", he asked.

" 'At this time the rioters were using a University fire truck and fire extinguishers in an attempt to make the tear gas bombs ineffective.

" 'I left Walker and walked about 100 yards away where Molotov cocktails—gasoline, in bottles with a fuse—were being made.

" 'Again I left the area for a telephone. As I walked toward a Dormitory with George Bartsch of the Little Rock Associated Press Bureau, we were attacked by Marshals who mistook us for students. We were deluged by tear gas, manhandled, handcuffed and beaten with clubs during a 200 yard walk back to the Lyceum Building.

" 'Thanks to recognition from Chief Marshal James P. McShane, we were quickly released and given freedom in the Marshals' Headquarters.

" 'Within minutes rifle and shotgun fire erupted from the rioting crowd and two men—one a French newsman—were killed. We considered ourselves lucky to have been arrested and glad to be behind closed, heavily guarded doors.' "

The only two statements of the above quoted reports which were complained of by Walker as being libelous and which form the basis of special issues submitted by the Court were: (1) "Walker, who Sunday led a charge of students against federal marshals on the Ole Miss Campus" (October 2, 1962 report), and (2) "Walker assumed command of the crowd" (October 3, 1962 report). For the sake of brevity these two statements will hereinafter be referred to as the "charge" and "command" statements respectively.

In answer to special issues one through four, the jury found that the "charge" statement was not "substantially true", did not constitute fair comment, was not made in good faith and was actuated by malice. It found to the same effect in response to similar issues five through eight concerning the "command" statement.

In answer to issue No. 9 the jury found damages in the sum of $500,000.00 and having found that A. P. was actuated by malice in answer to special issues Nos. four and eight the jury, in response to special issues Nos. ten and eleven found that exemplary damages should be awarded and in the amount of $300,000.00.

Appendix B
Opinion of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals

Based upon the verdict of the jury, judgment was entered for Walker and against the A. P. in the sum of $500,000. The judgment recited that there is no evidence to support the jury's findings of malice and $300,000 for exemplary damages.

Appellant contends that the court erred in rendering judgment for appellee rather than it because (1) as a matter of law the evidence conclusively established that the "charge" and "command" statements were substantially true; (2) each statement was a fair comment about a matter of public concern published for general information and thus privileged under the provisions of Art. 5432, V. A. C. S.; (3) such statements made without malice are protected by the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States; (4) over objection appellee was permitted to testify that he did not assume command; (5) it held as a matter of law that the "charge" and "command" statements were libelous rather than submitting issues as to each; (6) the evidence conclusively established as a matter of law that the "charge" and "command" statements were made in good faith with reference to matters it had a duty to report to its members and thence to the public; (7) the amount of damages found were so grossly excessive as to be patently wrong and unjust and the findings in response to the damage issue No. 9 and to special issues one, two, three, five, six and seven are so against the weight and preponderance of the evidence as to be manifestly wrong and unjust and thus insufficient to support such answers; and (8) the evidence conclusively established as a matter of law that the jury was guilty of material misconduct which probably resulted in injury to the defendant.

We affirm.

Appendix B
Opinion of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals

EVIDENCE

In discussing the points relating to the quantity and quality of the evidence we have examined the complaints of the appellant in the light of the Article by Chief Justice Robert W. Calvert entitled, " 'No Evidence' and 'Insufficient Evidence' Points of Error", 38 Tex. Law Rev. 361 and authorities therein cited.

The evidence considered in its most favorable light in support of the findings of the jury and the judgment of the court is in essence as follows: At approximately 4:00 P. M. of the day in question, a ring of Federal marshals had encircled the Lyceum Building. Walker arrived on the campus about 8:45 P. M. At that time a loud, violent riot was in progress in an area of the campus known as the Circle. A crowd assembled in the Circle area, began taunting and jeering the marshals. By 8:00 P. M. a full scale riot had erupted which was to continue all night, destroy 16 automobiles, kill two people, injure 50. The rioters would form into groups and charge toward the marshals, throwing bricks, bottles, rocks, sticks and other missiles. The rioters attempted to charge the marshals with a fire truck and then with a bulldozer. "Molotov cocktails" were hurled at the marshals. Finally rifle fire erupted. The next morning the campus looked like a battlefield. Soon after his arrival, Walker, after some urging to say a few words, spoke from the steps of the Confederate Monument. While there is some dispute as to what he said, there is testimony that he told the assembled groups that while they had a right to protest that violence was not the answer. He was "booed" or "jeered" at this time and again when urging a cessation of violence. He and others walked in the direction of the Lyceum Building where the marshals were stationed but he never came closer to the marshals than the monument or the length of a football field. He was there to watch what happened. He wanted a peaceful demonstration as a protest. His presence there was not illegal or unlawful. He had the same right to come upon the campus and observe the activity as did the various members of the press who were there to observe and to report. He was one of the crowd. He was not in the forefront, never in front of the crowd. He never hurled any rock, brick or other missile in the direction of the marshals or otherewise. He did not participate in the riot. He never directed or suggested that others do so. He issued no directions nor did he counsel or suggest to others that they charge the marshals or take any other offensive action toward them. The crowd was disorganized. It was a leaderless group. Groups were milling aimlessly. No one, including Walker, made any effort to assume leadership. Walker did not run. He never got out of a slow walk; described as strolling, ambling, or "moseying" along. He never participated in the riot or violence in any manner. He made no effort to incite or move others to action or violence. When asked how to drive the marshals out, he said: "You don't."

Appendix B
Opinion of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals

Throughout the trial Walker maintained the firm position that because of his opposition to the use of Federal troops within a State, and his personal knowledge of the deviation between the occurrences at Little Rock where he was indeed in command and the newspaper stories of those occurrences, that he was at Oxford to see for himself at firsthand what was actually going on. He maintained that he did not assume command of the crowd, did not lead a charge, and did not participate in the rioting. He was present for the sole purpose of observing. The jury saw him, observed his demeanor, heard what he said, and believed him.

"'No evidence' points must, and may only, be sustained when the record discloses one of the following situations: (a) a complete absence of evidence of a vital fact; (b) the court is barred by rules of law or of evidence from giving weight to the only evidence offered to prove a vital fact; (c) the evidence offered to prove a vital fact is no more than a mere scintilla; (d) the evidence establishes conclusively the opposite of the vital fact." 38 Tex. Law Review, pp. 361, 362, supra.

Subdivisions (a) and (b) above have no application to the record or the facts in this case. As to (c) we have viewed the evidence in its most favorable light in support of the findings of the jury upon which the judgment of the Court is based, considering only the evidence and the inferences which support the findings and rejecting the evidence and the inferences which are contrary to the findings. In the application of this test we have determined that all of the findings of the jury, upon which the Court based its judgment, are supported by ample evidence. Having reached this conclusion it follows that we find no merit in the appellant's contention that the evidence establishes conclusively the opposite of what the jury found. We find that none of the situations discussed by Judge Calvert under (a), (b), (c) or (d) is disclosed by the record. Further we have concluded from our study and examination of the entire record that the findings of the jury upon which the Court based its judgment is not so contrary to the great weight and preponderance of the evidence as to be clearly wrong or unjust.

Appendix B
Opinion of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals

Jurors are the exclusive judges of the controverted issues of fact raised by the evidence, of the weight to be given the evidence, and the inferences to be drawn therefrom. They are the exclusive judges of the credibility of the witnesses. "The law does not attempt to tell jurors what amount or kind of evidence ought to produce a belief in their minds. They may believe a witness although he has been contradicted. They may believe the testimony of one witness and reject the testimony of other witnesses. They may accept part of the testimony of one witness and disregard the remainder." McCormick & Ray, Texas Law of Evidence, § 3; Austin Fire Ins. Co. v. Adams-Childers Co., 246 S. W. 365 (Tex. Com. App., 1923).

"The mere fact that a verdict is against the preponderance of the evidence will not authorize a reviewing court to set it aside, if there is some evidence to support it, or evidence that would support a verdict either way. The court of civil appeals will set aside the verdict and findings of a jury only in cases where they are so against such a preponderance of the evidence as to be manifestly unjust or clearly wrong, or where they show clearly that the finding or verdict was the result of passion, prejudice, or improper motive, or in such obvious conflict with the justice of the case as to render it unconscionable." 4 Tex. Jur. 2d, p. 395, § 838, and authorities cited therein.

"Where evidence is conflicting, a reviewing court will not disturb the jury's verdict or findings if there is evidence of probative value to support them, unless the evidence is so overwhelming against the verdict or findings as to shock the conscience or show clearly that the conclusion reached was wrong or was the result of passion, prejudice or improper motive.

Appendix B
Opinion of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals

"The findings on conflicting evidence are usually regarded as 'conclusive,' 'binding,' or 'decisive,' and will be 'adopted' or 'accepted' as the findings of the appellate court, unless some good reason is presented that would justify the court in taking some other view.

"A jury finding on facts will not be set aside because it does not appear to be clearly right; it must appear to be clearly wrong before the appellate court will disturb it.

"The fact that the appellate court would not have found as the jury did is not the test to be applied on appeal. The true test is that made by the jury, on firsthand evidence, adduced before them from living witnesses whose credibility and the weight to be given their testimony were determinable by the jury. Where the jury's findings are in accord with the testimony of different disinterested witnesses, the fact that there is other testimony to the contrary does not authorize the appellate court to overturn the verdict. . . ." 4 Tex. Jur. 2d 390, § 837, and authorities cited therein.

In the application of the rules of law and the authorities above referred to, we overrule all points of error relating to the quantity or quality of the evidence supporting the findings of the jury upon which the Court based its judgment.

We find no error on the part of the Court in permitting Walker to testify that he did not assume command of the crowd.

He testified that he became a professional soldier upon completing four years at West Point in 1931 when he was commissioned as a Second Lieutenant. He had combat experience in the Mediterranean, European and Asiatic Theatres during World War II and in Korea. He finally attained the rank of Major General. During the course of the trial Walker testified on several occasions without objection that during the Little Rock matter he took command of the troops, was assigned as commander or that the troops were under his command. In connection with the occasion in question at Ole Miss he was asked if he, "participated in any way in any activity of the crowd that was throwing things at the Marshals?" He answered without objection that he had not participated in any way. He was then asked if he assumed "any command over this crowd." Objection was made on the ground that the answer would be a conclusion on the part of the witness. The Court permitted Walker to answer and he stated, "I certainly did not" and in response to another question he answered without objection that he certainly knew what it meant to assume command. The news item in question had identified Walker as the former Major General who commanded the 101st Airborne Division at Little Rock followed by the statement, "Walker assumed command of the crowd."

The Article in question stated as a fact that Walker had "assumed command of the crowd." We think that Walker, subject of this remark, had the right to deny or affirm the truth of it. We think that the opinion in Goode v. Ramey, 48 S. W. 2d 719 (El Paso Civ. App., 1932, refused), is applicable. Therein it was stated, "We are not prepared to say under the record, as presented here, that it was error to admit the statement of the witness. The issue sought to be proved was not a mixed question of law and fact, but purely a fact question. We think the issue was one upon which a witness in possession of all the facts may properly state his opinion or conclusion to which such facts would fairly lead, notwithstanding the witness' answer may embrace the very issue to be submitted to the jury. The conclusion of the witness is then testified to like any other fact to be considered by the jury for what they may believe it to be worth. Scalf v. Collin County, 80 Tex. 514, 16 S. W. 314; Adkins-Polk Co. v. John Barkley & Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 297 S. W. 757; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Mills, 34 Tex. Civ. App. 127, 78 S. W. 11."

If we are mistaken in holding that the testimony of Walker was admissible we nevertheless overrule the point of error because we are of the opinion that the error, if any, in admitting the testimony, was harmless within the meaning of Rules 434 and 503, T. R. C. P.; Dallas Railway & Terminal Co. v. Bailey, 250 S. W. 2d 379, 151 Tex. 359 (Sup. Ct., 1952).

Fair Comment

The appellant contends that the "charge" and "command" statements constituted fair comment and thus were privileged under the provisions of Art. 5432, V. A. C. S. We find and hold that both the "charge" and the "command" statements were statements of fact and not of comment. "Walker, who Sunday night led a charge of students against federal marshalls . . . ." and "Walker assumed command of the crowd . . . .", (emphasis added) are positive statements of fact. Truth of the statements would constitute a complete defense. Appellant failed in its effort to establish this defense to the satisfaction of the jury which found that neither of the statements were substantially true.

Appendix B
Opinion of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals

In an article on "Fair Comment" by John E. Hallen, 8 Tex. Law Review 41 (1929-30), the author in discussing Art. 5432, V. A. C. S., states: "The 1927 Libel Law provides:

"'The publications of the following matters by any newspaper or periodical shall be deemed privileged and shall not be made the basis of any action for libel . . . .

"'4. A reasonable and fair comment or criticism of the official acts of public officials and of other matters of public concern published for general information.'

"Paragraph 4 was in no way changed by the 1927 amendments and has appeared exactly in that form since 1901.

". . . the right of fair comment was not created by the statute. It is well recognized by the common law. Every one has the right to comment on matters of public interest and general concern and within limits is not liable for stating his real opinion on such subjects, however severe the criticism may be. It is immaterial whether or not the criticism is sound, or whether the court or jury would agree with it, so long as it represents the honest opinion of the speaker upon a matter of recognized public interest.

"The statute expressly declares that fair comment by newspaper and periodicals is privileged. But since this right was enjoyed by everyone at common law, the statute gives the newspaper no added privileges. Nor is it to be construed as taking away the common law defense of individuals. . . . (p. 41)

"It should be remembered that there is a distinction between comment or criticism, which is the opinion of the speaker or writer upon certain facts, and the facts upon which that opinion is based. A misstatement of fact cannot ordinarily be justified by a plea of fair comment. . . . (p. 43)

"It has already been said that fair comment is a criticism, discussion, or expression of opinion upon existing facts and does not protect against a misstatement of the facts themselves. The question of what should be called fact and what comment is difficult. . . ." (p. 53)

"Texas has swung from its early holding in the Copeland Case (Express Printing Co. v. Copeland, 64 Tex. 354 (1885) that an untrue charge of crime, honestly and reasonably made, about a public officer, is privileged, to its present position that such a charge cannot be justified by a newspaper. In following its present doctrine Texas is supported by the weight of authority, and there are strong reasons for its holding." (p. 99)

An article under the heading of "Libel and Slander—Fair Comment—Statements of Opinion" by Tom J. Mays appears in 16 Tex. Law Review 87 (1937-38). He commences with, "A judicial warning to the press with respect to comment and criticism upon matters of public interest is discernable in the recent decision of Houston Printing Co. v. Hunter." 105 S. W. 2d 312 (Fort Worth Civ. App., 1937), affirmed 106 S. W. 2d 1043 (Tex. Sup., 1937). The article continues, "That fair comment and criticism upon such matters is qualifiedly privileged is quite generally recognized both at common law and in Texas by statute. On the other hand, where false allegations of fact are made regarding matters of public concern, the courts are not in accord. Perhaps a majority of the courts hold that false allegations of fact are not entitled to immunity even though made in good faith and without malice. . . . . Texas is clearly in line with the majority, holding that falsification of the facts is never privileged.

"Although the distinction between statements of fact and statements of opinion or comment has been freely recognized, it is generally conceded that distinguishing the two becomes a difficult problem in many cases." (p. 88)

"Most of the cases, it seems, wherein the words are held actionable as statements of fact, have found imputation of malfeasance, misconduct, or corruption in office, or imputations of evil or corrupt motives in the administration of duties. These being treated as statements of fact, then certainly a false imputation of crime committed by a public officer or candidate would be actionable as a statement of fact in Texas. (pp. 89-90) . . .

"It is manifest that some method is needed by which to distinguish between statements of fact and comment; and it is equally certain that no absolute test can be laid down. But it is submitted that more desirable and satisfactory results can be reached." (p. 90)

The author suggests the following test by which to distinguish statements of fact from comment, "Where the statements alleged to be libelous can be reasonably construed by the reader as an expression of opinion only, on the basis of facts either already known to the reader or else reasonably assumed by the person writing the statement to be known to the reader, then it should be regarded as fair comment. Where, however, the statement alleged to be libelous, as reasonably construed, conveys to the reader not only an expression of the writer's opinion, but also certain supposed information, and this information conveyed does not accord with the true facts, it is not comment, but should be treated as a statement of fact.

Appendix B
Opinion of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals

"Under this test, whether a publication will be treated as a statement of fact and libelous, if untrue, will depend upon the surrounding circumstances of each particular case. Under such a guidance, even an imputation of crime might be held to be merely an expression of opinion and not actionable." (p. 91)

In, "The Press and the Law in Texas" by Norris G. Davis, University of Texas Press, Austin, 1956, it is stated that, ". . . the right of fair comment is a weak defense in most libel suits. It is subject to so many limitations that it is seldom completely applicable. There are three groups of limitations. First, the comment must be limited to matters of public concern. Second, the article must be a statement of opinion—or comment—rather than a statement of fact, a very difficult distinction to make. Finally, the comment must be reasonable and fair and made in good faith, and this limitation is also difficult to define." (p. 65)

"Even if the subject matter and the person concerned are clearly matters of public concern, there remains two severe limitations. One of these, the requirement that the story or article must be comment, not a statement of fact, has caused by far the most trouble. The separation of comment from factual statements in most stories and articles is extremely difficult, and Court decisions have shown confusion on the point." (p. 67) "One important rule developed for separation of fact and comment is the theory that imputation of dishonest motives to a public official or imputation of an act constituting a crime under the law is a statement of fact and cannot be considered fair comment." (p. 68) San Antonio Light Pub. Co. v. Lewy, 113 S. W. 574 (CCA of Texas, 1908, Ref.); Forke v. Homann, 39 S. W. 210 (CCA of Texas, 1896, ref.). The author in reference to the article by Mays in 16 Tex. Law Review 87

(1937-38), states: "One writer who has studied the fair-comment cases in Texas and has found the same confusion illustrated here has offered the following definitions of 'opinion statements' and 'fact statements.'" (p. 73) He then quotes the test suggested by Mays and continues: "Certainly the courts should become aware of the need to distinguish statements of fact from opinion on a less arbitrary basis than is now customary. If the Supreme Court would adopt such a definition as the one quoted above, it would do much toward creating such an awareness. Actual differentiation of fact and opinion would still be difficult, but court decisions would be more just. (p. 74)

"Actually, it is clear that almost any story, editorial, or other type of news article must be a mixture of statements of fact and comment, even though the writer attempts to confine himself to comment. Any type of comment, in implication at least, must be based on fact; and newsmen know that the most effective comment is that based on startling and important statements of fact. Newsmen should therefore be prepared to prove the truth of any statement of fact and to rely on fair comment as defense only for the conclusions drawn from these true facts. They should strongly urge the courts also to make the distinction between fact and opinion rather than, as they so often do, plead all defenses to all parts of a story alleged to be libelous." (p. 74)

In our opinion the test suggested by Mr. Mays and favorably commented on by Mr. Davis is a good one. We think that its application to the facts in this case support our holding that the statements involved were statements of fact and that the appellant was not prepared to prove the truth of either statement. The information conveyed was not in accord with the true facts. Reference is made to the complete text of the articles above referred to and the authorities cited therein. See also 36 Tex. Jur. 2d Libel and Slander, §§ 87, 89, 92 and 171 together with cases cited under each.

We find no merit in appellant's contention that the reports, made without malice, are protected from the claim of libel by the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution. These Amendments prohibit Congress from making laws abridging freedom of speech and of the press and the State from making or enforcing laws of similar nature.

"The interest of the public in obtaining information about public affairs and of the defendant in discussing such matters is often brought directly in conflict with the plaintiff's claim to his own good name, and the law must draw a line between them. . . . (8 Tex. Law Rev. 41, p. 98)

"It is not true that false and derogatory statements about a man's character are today always actionable. If they were, the whole defense of privilege would be swept away. Nor is it true that everything may be justified under a defense of free speech or press. These rights as embodied in constitutions and statutes, were designed primarily to prevent interference by the government with a man's talking or writing, and not to do away with responsibility for what was said. If 'Freedom of the Press' always furnished a complete defense there could be no such tort as libel. . . ." (8 Tex. Law Rev. 56)

"It is submitted that any decision based entirely upon the right to an inviolate character or freedom of speech is unsound. Either doctrine given full sway would annihilate the other. . . ." (8 Tex. Law. Rev. 61)

"Articles 5430, 5431, 5432, and 5433, Vernon's Texas Civil Statutes, 1948, clearly declare the policy of this State regarding the question of libel. The law protects the right of a citizen to defend his reputation and good name from libelous publications, and this right is zealously guarded. Bell Pub. Co. v. Garrett Engineering Co., 141 Tex. 51, 170 S. W. 2d 197; Belo & Co. v. Looney, 112 Tex. 160, 246 S. W. 777; Express Pub. Co. v. Keeran, Tex. Com. App., 284 S. W. 913." Fitzjarrald v. Panhandle Pub. Co., 228 S. W. 2d 503 (Tex. Sup., 1950).

We find no application of the authorities cited by the appellant to the facts of this case.

LIBELOUS PER SE

Did the Court commit error in holding as a matter of law that the "charge" and "command" statements were libelous per se, rather than to submit same to the jury for its determination? We think not. The language contained in the statements is not ambiguous. There can be no doubt as to the meaning of either.

Each of the statements imputed to Walker the crime of insurrection against the United States. It is undisputed that the crowd on the Ole Miss Campus was engaged in rioting and by force intefering (sic) with the efforts of U. S. marshals to enforce an executive order of the President of the United States issued under sanction of law and of applicable statutes. Insurrection is punishable by fine or imprisonment or both.

The statements further imputed to Walker responsibility for the death of two men and of the wanton destruction of property, all accomplished by students and others under his leadership and direction. The onslaught of the riotous crowd "led" by Walker who had "assumed command" was such that Van Savell considered he was, "lucky to have been arrested and glad to be behind closed, heavily guarded doors."

It imputed that Walker, who "advised on several tactics," none of which were ever specified, directed or advised on the making and use of the molotov cocktails (gasoline bombs) and other offensive weapons used by the rioters.

"The court should construe the meaning of unambiguous language, pass on its defamatory character, and instruct the jury accordingly. But where the language is ambiguous or of doubtful meaning there is a question for the jury." 36 Tex. Jur. 2d 496, § 166; p. 482, § 156 of the same text and cases cited under each. Fitzjarrald v. Panhandle Pub. Co., supra.

"To charge a person with or impute to him the commission of any crime for which punishment by imprisonment in jail or the penitentiary may be imposed is slanderous or libelous per se." 36 Tex. Jur. 2d 288, § 7; H. O. Merren & Co. v. A. H. Belo Corp., 228 F. Supp. 515.

"Any written or printed language tending to degrade a person in the estimation of honorable people, or imputing to him disgraceful or dishonorable acts, is libelous per se." 36 Tex. Jur. 2d 297, § 13.

"The language claimed to be defamatory must be taken as a whole. Thus, a newspaper article must be considered in its entirety in determining the sense in which its language is used, and whether the article, or a particular statement therein, is libelous." 36 Tex. Jur. 2d 313, § 27.

" 'Libelous per se' means that written or printed words are so obviously hurtful to person aggrieved by them that they require no proof of their injurious character to make them actionable." Rawlins v. McKee, 327 S. W. 2d 633 (Texarkana Civ. App., 1959, ref., n.r.e.).

"Defamatory language may be actionable per se, that is, in itself, or may be actionable per quod, that is, only on allegation and proof of special damages. The distinction is based on a rule of evidence, the difference between them lying in the proof of the resulting injury. Language that necessarily, in fact or by a presumption of evidence, causes injury to a person to whom it refers is actionable per se. In other words, the defamatory words must be of such a nature that the court can presume as a matter of law that they will tend to disgrace and degrade the person or hold him up to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or cause him to be shunned and avoided. Where the language is actionable per se damages are conclusively presumed and need not be proved." 36 Tex. Jur. 2d 280, § 2.

"To be libelous a publication must be defamatory in its nature, and must tend to injure or impeach the reputation of the person claimed to have been libeled. The language used, taken in connection with the facts and circumstances alleged by way of innuendo, must be reasonably calculated to produce one or more of the results mentioned in the statutory definition; that is, it must have the effect of injuring or tending to injure the person to whom it refers to the extent of exposing him to public hatred, contempt, ridicule, or financial injury, or to impeach his honesty, integrity, or virtue.

"It is not necessary, however, that the language have all the injurious or pernicious tendencies enumerated in the statute; it is actionable if it has any of them. . . .

Appendix B
Opinion of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals

"A publication that tends to subject the plaintiff to public contempt, or that impeaches his integrity or reputation, is libelous though it does not charge him with a crime.

"The term 'public hatred,' as found in the statutory definition, signifies public or general dislike or antipathy." 36 Tex. Jur. 2d 285, § 6.

DAMAGES

In connection with special issue No. 9 the jury was instructed that it may take into consideration such damages, if any, to the reputation of the plaintiff and such mental anguish, if any, and humiliation, if any, and embarrassment, if any, which plaintiff may have sustained as a direct and proximate result of the statements inquired about. The jury awarded $500,000.00.

From our investigation and study of the record we are unable to find any legal justification to disturb the award of damages. If any improper influences were present they do not appear from the record. Under the pleadings the appellee sought damages, including exemplary damages, in the sum of $2,000,000.

"Mental suffering on the part of the person defamed is one of the direct results of a libel or slander. Accordingly, injury to the feelings, humiliation, and anguish of mind are proper elements of compensatory damages, provided they are the direct and proximate result of the defamation. This suffering is classed as general damages, that are presumed to have been sustained, and that, in actions for libel, are recoverable under a general averment, without specific proof that they were incurred, and, by virtue of statute, regardless of whether there was any other injury or damage, even though the publication was not libelous per se." 36 Tex. Jur. 2d 402, § 98.

"The plaintiff is entitled to compensation for injury to his character or reputation caused by the defamation. . . . It follows that the jury, in fixing the amount of recovery, may consider the loss of, or injury to, character or reputation, even though there is no proof thereof nor any proof of good character. . . ." 36 Tex. Jur. 2d 400 § 97.

"In other words, a general allegation of damages will admit evidence of those damages naturally and necessarily resulting from the defamation charged. It is unnecessary to itemize the elements of general damages; rather, the amount may be alleged in the aggregate. Thus, the plaintiff need not aver the nature, character or extent of the mental suffering caused, or even that he thereby suffered any agony, but it is sufficient to aver the damages he sustained by reason thereof. . . ." 36 Tex. Jur. 2d 445, § 126.

"Generally speaking, the damages resulting from a libel or slander are purely personal and cannot be measured by any fixed standard or rule. The amount to be awarded rests largely in the discretion of the jury, or the court in a case tried without a jury, and an appellate court will not disturb the verdict or award unless it appears from the record to be excessive or the result of passion, prejudice, or other improper influence. . . .

"In fixing the amount the jury may take into consideration the motives of the defendant, and the mode and extent of publication. . . ." 36 Tex. Jur. 2d 405, § 102.

EXEMPLARY DAMAGES

By counter-points the appellee contends the court erred in setting aside the findings of the jury in response to special issues Nos. 4, 8, 10 and 11, which related to malice and exemplary damages.

Issues Nos. 4 and 8 inquired if appellant was actuated by malice, and malice was defined, "you are instructed that by the term 'malice' is meant ill will, bad or evil motive, or that entire want of care which would raise the belief that the act or omission complained of was the result of a conscious indifference to the right or welfare of the person to be affected by it."

The appellee had the burden of proving that the appellant's act or acts were such as to fall within the above definition before he was entitled to a finding of malice and exemplary damages.

The statement of facts consists of eleven volumes and 2126 pages. The entire record has received our close and sustained attention.

In view of all the surrounding circumstances, the rapid and confused occurrence of events on the occasion in question, and in the light of all the evidence, we hold that appellee failed to prove malice as defined, and the trial court was correct in setting aside said findings.

We think there is yet another reason to support the Court's action in disregarding the jury's answers to the issue relating to malice and exemplary damages, namely, the lack of necessary pleadings and proof required under the holdings in Western Union Tel. Co. v. Brown, 58 Tex. 170 (Tex. Sup., 1882); Wortham-Carter Pub. Co. v. Littlepage, 223 S. W. 1043, p. 1046 (Fort Worth Civ. App. 1920, no writ hist.), and Fort Worth Elevators Co. v. Russell, 70 S. W. 2d 397 (Tex. Sup., 1934).

The record leaves some doubt as to whether A. P. is an incorporated or an unincorporated association. It does appear, however, that its composition, the manner in which it functions, and its organizational set-up is more akin to a corporation than not and that the holdings in the above cited cases would be applicable.

We think the record in this case will support our view. Certainly, A. P. is not an individual. Having no mind and being an entity only by a fiction of law, it must be held incapable of entertaining actual or express malice unless the requirements of the holdings in Fort Worth Elevators Co. v. Russell, Western Union Tel. Co. v. Brown and Worthan-Carter Publishing Co. v. Littlepage, supra, are complied with. A. P. is referred to as a corporation in the appellee's brief.

Jury Misconduct

We find no error in the action of the Court in overruling the appellant's amended motion for new trial because of alleged misconduct of the jury.

During a general discussion of the case a juror remarked that the A. P. (or news media generally) was always hurting someone by the printing of false or malicious reports or words to this effect. There was considerable discrepancy in the testimony of the five jurors called to testify on the motion for new trial as to whether the reference was to the A. P. or to news media generally. It was a casual statement. "Nobody made any comment at all" about it. It is undisputed that it was quickly dropped. Who made the statement, which jurors or how many probably heard it or specifically at what stage in the proceedings the statement was made was not shown. It was dropped and not again mentioned. The jury discussed and answered the issues in order. They were 11 to 1 on the issues preceding those relating to malice and exemplary damages. While discussing these issues a remark was made that the full amount should be awarded because the A. P. had plenty of money and it was mentioned "about the Georgia football coach (Wally Butts) collecting." The jurors were in dispute as to whether the statement concerning Butts was ever made. It is without dispute that the statements were made after the jury had already found damages in the sum of $500,000 and were considering the issues on malice and exemplary damages.

The juror who was the last to agree on the $500,000 was the juror who stopped the discussion as to how much money the Press had. He pointed out that it did not make any difference and was out of order. The matter was promptly dropped. The only answers which could have been influenced or affected by such statements, if any, were those to the issues on malice and exemplary damages and these findings of the jury were disregarded by the Court on other grounds in the rendition of judgment.

In order to justify a new trial under Rule 327, T. R. C. P., the movant has the burden of establishing to the satisfaction of the Court that it reasonably appears from the evidence both on the hearing of the motion and the trial of the case and from the record as a whole that injury probably resulted by reason of the alleged jury misconduct. The appellant failed to meet its burden under this rule.

The trial court in its findings of fact and conclusions of law found that none of the statements singly or collectively induced any juror to change an answer or vote differently than he would otherwise have done. That there was no showing of probable injury to the appellant because of such statements.

"When a trial court hears the testimony of jurors on an issue of misconduct, alleged to have occurred during the jury's deliberation upon its verdict, he is accorded the same latitude in passing upon the credibility of the witnesses and of the weight to be given to their testimony as the jury had upon the trial of the original cause. If there be any inconsistencies or contradictions in the testimony of a witness upon the hearing of a motion for new trial, it rests within the sound discretion of the trial court to harmonize and reconcile such conflicts so far as possible. A juror's testimony upon such hearing may be so contradictory and inconsistent that the trial court in exercising its privilege to pass upon the credibility of the witness may be justified in disregarding his entire testimony. Carl Construction Co. v. Bain, 235 Ky. 833, 32 S. W. (2d) 414." Monkey Grip Rubber Co. v. Walton, 122 Tex. 185, 53 S. W. 2d 770 (1932).

In our opinion the alleged improper statements, when viewed in the light of the evidence on the motion for new trial and on the trial of the case and on the record as a whole, did not probably result in injury to defendant. Rules 327 and 434 T. R. C. P.

Having considered each of the appellant's points of error and the cross-points raised by the appellee and having concluded that each should be they are each and all accordingly overruled, and the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

Per Curiam

July 30, 1965

APPENDIX B

Opinion of the Trial Court

CHAS. J. MURRAY
District Judge
17th Judicial District of Texas
Civil Courts Building
Fort Worth 2, Texas

July 29, 1964

Mr. C. J. Watts, Attorney
219 Couch Drive
Oklahoma City, Oklahoma

Mr. William Andress, Jr., Attorney
627 Fidelity Union Life Building
Dallas 1, Texas

Mr. J. A. Gooch, Attorney
1800 First National Bank Building
Fort Worth, Texas

Gentlemen:

I am entering judgment for the plaintiff on the jury verdict as to special issues one, two, three, five, six, seven and nine, and judgment for the defendant as to issues four, eight, ten and eleven.

At the time the charge to the jury was being prepared, you will recall I expressed the opinion that the alleged libelous statements contained in special issues one and five were statements of fact and not opinion, and, at least as to the statement set out in issue number one, was a charge of a commission of a crime. I submitted the defense of truth as to the statements, and the jury found that they were not substantially true. I believe there is evidence to support these findings. I now have some doubt as to whether I should have submitted the statement, "Walker assumed command of the crowd," because it does not accuse Walker of the commission of a crime. However, in view of my decision as to special issue number one, this is immaterial.

I submitted issues as to fair comment and good faith (despite my then expressed opinion that they did not constitute defenses to a statement of fact charging the plaintiff with commission of a crime) so as to get jury findings and thus avoid a new trial in the event an appellate court disagreed with my conclusions. Since the jury answered issues two, three, six and seven as they did, I concur with these answers as a matter of law.

Turning now to issues four, eight, ten and eleven, I find there is no evidence to support the jury's answers that there was actual malice by Associated Press in publishing the stories of October 2 and 3, 1962. As you will recall, I also expressed doubt when the charge was being prepared as to whether I should even submit malice and did so only to get a jury finding as I did on the defendant's claimed defenses of fair comment and good faith.

Under Texas Law, the news stories complained of are not of themselves evidence of malice without further proof. Plaintiff claims that malice is shown by the failure of the Associated Press to check the story written by its young reporter, Van Savell, because there was a conflict between the story as written, and as related by Savell to Thomas, an AP employee in its Atlanta office. This alleged conflict related only to whether General Walker led a charge against the federal marshals before rather than after his speech to the students on the Confederate Monument. I fail to ascertain how the failure to check such a minor discrepancy could be construed as that entire want of care which would amount to a conscious indifference to the rights of plaintiff. Negligence, it may have been; malice, it was not. Moreover, the mere fact that AP permitted a young reporter to cover the story of the riot is not evidence of malice. Wisdom and good judgment do not necessarily come with age, nor are they necessarily denied youth. In my opinion New York Times vs. Sullivan, 11 L. ed. 2nd 686; Wortham-Carter Publishing Company vs. Littlepage, 223 SW 1043 and Fitzjarrald vs. Panhandle Publishing Company, 228 SW 2nd 499, support these conclusions.

Plaintiff's (sic) urge that this case is comparable to United Press International, Inc. vs, Mohs (Eastland Court of Civil Appeals—unreported) decided on June 26, 1964. I do not agree. In the UPI case, Miller, the night editor of UPI, knew that another story had been written at and sent from his UPI office the same night as the second story found to be libelous. The first story contained no statement that Mohs had been ordered arrested and handcuffed; that Mohs had been caught lying or that he had been charged with any offense for landing his plane on White Rock Lake in Dallas. Between the time this first story was written and sent from UPI's office, someone in this office called the police headquarters and learned that as far as the police knew, Mohs had not been charged with any offense. Miller himself, nor anyone in his office, made any attempt to verify the facts of the landing on the lake, other than the call to police headquarters, yet Miller then distributed the second story which said that Mohs had been arrested, handcuffed and charged with violation of a city ordinance for landing on the lake. None of this was true. This second story was based on information received from one DeHarrow. Miller knew the story (the first one) previously written in his office was materially different from the story related by DeHarrow (the second story). He had many reasons to question the truth of the story attributed to DeHarrow, but made no attempt to check it. The Eastland Court found that these facts raised jury issues "as to whether there was such a want of care as could raise the belief that his acts (and thus the acts of UPI) were the result of a conscious indifference to the rights of Mohs."

As I have stated above, in the Walker case the only discrepancy was whether Walker led a charge before or after his speech on the monument, and not whether he did or did not lead a charge at all. This evidence falls short of that set out in the UPI vs. Mohs opinion.

Since I have determined that there is no actual malice in this case, the question arises as to whether the rule of New York Times vs. Sullivan (which prohibits a public official recovering damages for libel when there is no actual malice) should apply to a public figure such as plaintiff. If it does, then the entire jury verdict must be set aside, and judgment entered for defendant.

The evidence is undisputed that General Walker was a public figure at the time of the riot on the Old Miss Campus.

Freedom of the Press is perhaps the most important protection against tyranny that we find in a free society. Without it, the public could not know whether one's right to speak, to worship his creator as he chooses or to enjoy a fair trial had been abridged. Americans everywhere depend on news media of all types to provide accurate information on the daily affairs of men and nations. This imposes a great duty and responsibility on the news gathering and distributing agencies of this country, and they should be protected to the extent necessary for them to properly function.

Appendix B
Opinion of the Trial Court

However, I see no compelling reasons of public policy requiring additional defenses to suits for libel. Truth alone should be an adequate defense. The Sullivan case is limited, and I feel it should be limited, in its application to public officials. It does not apply to this case.

Jury findings as to issues four, eight, ten and eleven are set aside, and judgment will be entered for the plaintiff in the amount of $500,000.00 and costs.

Very truly yours,

/s/ CHAS. J. MURRAY
Charles J. Murray, Judge
17th District Court

CJM: oec

APPENDIX C

Portions of Record Raising Constitutional Questions Below

Paragraphs III, V and VI of the Second Original Amended Answer of Defendant, The Associated Press, pp. 1 and 6-15 (Transcript, pp. 21 and 26-35)

IN THE

DISTRICT COURT OF

TARRANT COUNTY, TEXAS

17TH JUDICAL DISTRICT

No. 31741-C

EDWIN A. WALKER

vs.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SECOND AMENDED ORIGINAL ANSWER OF DEFENDANT, THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Now comes defendant, The Associated Press, and makes and files this its Second Amended Original Answer directed to Plaintiff's Second Amended Petition, and says:

* * *

Appendix C

Paragraphs III, V and VI of the Second Original Amended Answer of Defendant, The Associated Press, pp. 1 and 6-15. (Transcript, pp. 21 and 26-35)

III.

By way of further answer herein, and without waiving any of the foregoing pleas, defendant, The Associated Press, would respectfully show to the Court and the jury that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover damages in this cause of any nature for each and all of the following reasons considering all the material facts and circumstances surrounding the plaintiff's alleged claim of damage:

(1)

Plaintiff by his own statements in pleadings filed in this cause has alleged that he resigned his Army Commission in order to speak out and install himself as a leader and public figure. Plaintiff, Edwin A. Walker, voluntarily injected himself into a situation of turmoil, resentment and excitement in Mississippi and of great national publicity and interest everywhere at the time he uttered certain public statements, more fully hereinafter alleged, on television, radio and to newsmen and by his subsequent trip to Jackson, Mississippi, and Oxford, Mississippi, at the very height of such tension and turmoil between September 10 and October 1, 1962.

(2)

The publications complained of in this action insofar as the same consist of comments were and are fair comments made in good faith upon facts which related to matters that were and are affairs of public interest, importance and concern and related to acts and utterances of plaintiff, a public figure, in public places and at public meetings.

Appendix C

Paragraphs III, V and VI of the Second Original Amended Answer of Defendant, The Associated Press, pp. 1 and 6-15 (Transcript, pp. 21 and 26-35)

(a) The background and events into which Walker injected himself are set forth in the following paragraphs.

(b) On or about May 31, 1961, one James H. Meredith, a colored person, filed a complaint in the United States District Court, Southern District of Mississippi, and on behalf of himself and all other colored students in the State of Mississippi similarly situated, against Charles D. Fair, President of the Board of Trustees of the State Institutions of Higher Learning in the State of Mississippi, and others connected with the University of Mississippi, seeking admission to said University. Thereafter, and on or about February 3, 1962, the United States District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi rendered a decision reported in 202 F. Supp. 224, denying Meredith rights of admission to the University of Mississippi.

Thereupon Meredith appealed to the United States Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit, at New Orleans, and on or about June 25, 1962, said Court rendered a decision (305 F. 2d 343) in which said Court reversed the decision of the United States District Court, thereupon remanding said action, with directions to the United States District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi to grant forthwith the relief prayed for by Meredith and to issue a permanent injunction against each and all of the defendants in said suit and all persons acting in concert with them, as well as all persons having knowledge of said decree, and directing and compelling admission of the said Meredith to the University of Mississippi as a student.

Appendix C

Paragraphs III, V and VI of the Second Original Amended Answer of Defendant, The Associated Press, pp. 1 and 6-15 (Transcript, pp. 21 and 26-35)

(c) Thereafter, and on or about July 26, 1962, the United States Court of Appeals, 5th Circuit, at New Orleans, vacated certain stay orders signed by Federal Judge Ben F. Cameron, and further directed the U. S. District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi to enter the judgment and the injunction as theretofore ordered (306 F. 2d 374). On July 28, 1962, the said United States Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit, at New Orleans, also entered a certain interim order to the same effect.

(d) Subsequently Judge Ben F. Cameron issued three other successive stays of execution of the mandate of the United States Court of Appeals, 5th Circuit, which ordered the admission of Meredith to the University of Mississippi, said stays to operate pending an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. On or about September 10, 1962, Mr. Justice Black of the U. S. Supreme Court entered an order (1) to vacate the orders of Judge Ben F. Cameron, and (2) that the judgment and mandate of the Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit at New Orleans should be obeyed and immediately carried out, and (3) that pending any appeal, the parties were enjoined from taking any steps to prevent enforcement of the Court of Appeals, 5th Circuit, judgment and mandate.

(e) On or about September 13, 1962, the United States Court for the Southern District of Mississippi as directed by the U. S. Court of Appeals, 5th Circuit, at New Orleans, issued an injunction and ordered that the said Meredith be admitted to the University of Mississippi forthwith.

Appendix C

Paragraphs III, V and VI of the Second Original Amended Answer of Defendant, The Associated Press, pp. 1 and 6-15 (Transcript, pp. 21 and 26-35)

(f) On or about September 20, 1962, the said Meredith appeared on the campus of the University of Mississippi accompained by U. S. Marshals for the purpose of registering as a student pursuant to the orders of the United States Courts above set forth, but the Governor of Mississippi, the Honorable Ross Barnett, then and there rejected the application of the said Meredith to the University of Mississippi.

(g) Again, and on or about September 25, 1962, the said Meredith appeared at the offices of the Board of Trustees of State Institutions of Higher Learning, at Jackson, Mississippi, for the purpose of registering as a student pursuant to the prior orders of the United States Courts. When Meredith sought to enter the offices, as aforesaid, the Honorable Ross Barnett, Governor of the State of Mississippi, and certain officers acting under his direction, again barred the said Meredith and denied him admission to the University of Mississippi. On or about September 26, 1962, the said Meredith sought to enter the campus of the University of Mississippi where he was barred from so entering by the Honorable Paul B. Johnson, Jr., Lieutenant Governor of the State of Mississippi, and certain state police acting under his orders, thereby denying the aforesaid Meredith admission to the University of Mississippi. On September 25, 1962, the United States Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit, at New Orleans, entered another restraining order against the Honorable Ross Barnett, Governor of the State of Mississippi, and other named officials in said State, and all persons in active concert or in participation therewith, from interfering with or obstructing in any manner the admission of the said Meredith to the University of Mississippi.

Appendix C

Paragraphs III, V and VI of the Second Original Amended Answer of Defendant, The Associated Press, pp. 1 and 6-15 (Transcript, pp. 21 and 26-35)

(h) Thereafter, on the same day, the United States Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit issued its orders requiring the aforesaid Ross Barnett, Governor of the State of Mississippi, and the Honorable Paul B. Johnson, Jr., Lieutenant Governor of the State of Mississippi, to appear before said Court and show cause why they should not be held in civil contempt for willfully disobeying the orders of the United States Courts and barring the admission of Meredith to the University of Mississippi, and on or about September 28 the said Court entered its judgment and order adjudging the said Ross Barnett and Paul B. Johnson, Jr. guilty of civil contempt and levied fines to continue on a daily basis unless on or before October 2, the said Governor and Lt. Governor should show to the Court that they had fully complied with all restraining orders of all the United States Courts, and that they had notified enforcement officers in the State of Mississippi to cease and desist from interfering with the orders of the aforesaid Courts and to cooperate with the officers and agents of the United States in the execution of all orders and injunctions to the end that Meredith would be permitted to register as a student at the University of Mississippi.

(i) That the attempts of the said James H. Meredith to enter the University of Mississippi and the actions of the authorities in Mississippi preventing his entry, and the actions of the various United States Courts in making and entering said injunctions and mandates, as above set forth in the preceding paragraphs, had all been given wide publicity throughout the United States by newspapers, radio and television, and were matters of general knowledge and affairs of great public interest and concern prior to September 30, 1962. The plaintiff in this cause knew, or reasonably should have known of the court orders, injunctions and mandates herein pleaded based on knowledge acquired from an ordinary reading of the newspapers and reports from other news media and he also knew of the defiance of Governor Ross Barnett, Governor of the State of Mississippi, and of the Lt. Governor towards the fulfillment of the court orders of the United States Courts above set forth.

Appendix C

Paragraphs III, V and VI of the Second Original Amended Answer of Defendant, The Associated Press, pp. 1 and 6-15 (Transcript, pp. 21 and 26-35)

(3)

The plaintiff, the former Major General of the Army of the United States, following his resignation therefrom for the stated purpose of speaking out in protest as a private citizen, had made frequent public statements and had made an unsuccessful venture into politics as a candidate for Governor of the State of Texas.

Plaintiff was a well known public figure because of his long military career, his commands and duties with the Army of the United States, his role as Commanding General of the troops in the Little Rock, Arkansas, integration crisis in 1957, his resignation from the Army of the United States with the rank of Major General with the avowed statement and purpose of being able to protest and take a stand and position in matters of public interest and affairs, and his candidacy for Governor of the State of Texas in 1962. With such background as a public figure, the plaintiff, during the critical times involved herein, between September 10, 1962 and October 1, 1962, injected himself into the Mississippi crisis with the request and/or notice for frequent press releases or conferences, from Dallas, Texas, Jackson and Oxford, Mississippi, and thereby invited comment as to his activities. His public utterances and statements were all in protest and opposition to duly constituted governmental and judicial authority and relating to the admission of Meredith to the University of Mississippi, and were in violation of the injunctive decrees issued by the United States Courts, as herein set forth, and in favor of the positions then being taken by Governor Ross Barnett and other officials in Mississippi who were seeking to obstruct Meredith's entry as a student at the University of Mississippi.

Appendix C

Paragraphs III, V and VI of the Second Original Amended Answer of Defendant, The Associated Press, pp. 1 and 6-15 (Transcript, pp. 21 and 26-35)

Notwithstanding such knowledge, the plaintiff by radio and other news media, beginning on or about September 27, 1962, and thereafter, called for Americans 10,000 strong from every State in the Union to go to Mississippi and rally behind Governor Barnett in his stand against admitting Meredith, saying, among other things, "It is now or never. Bring your flag, your tent and your skillet."

The plaintiff, Edwin A. Walker, further injected himself into the crisis in Mississippi by proceeding to Jackson, Mississippi, on or about September 29, 1962, when he made further press releases and statements, and by then proceeding to Oxford, Miss., where he held a further press conference on September 30, 1962, at all of which he reiterated his previous position.

Appendix C

Paragraphs III, V and VI of the Second Original Amended Answer of Defendant, The Associated Press, pp. 1 and 6-15 (Transcript, pp. 21 and 26-35)

At about 4:30 P. M. on the afternoon of September 30, 1962, the U. S. Marshals under orders to enforce the judgments, injunctions and mandates of the United States Courts for the enrollment of Meredith as a student at the University of Mississippi, proceeded on to the campus at Oxford, setting up a ring substantially around or in front of the Lyceum Building on the campus. At about the same time, Meredith was escorted to another part of the campus. Immediately after the arrival of the Marshals, students and others began to congregate in the Circle and in the streets adjacent to the Lyceum Building, facing the Marshals, at first taunting them with jeers and remarks, subsequently throwing lighted cigarettes and missiles at the Marshals and at the vehicles in which they arrived. The temper of the crowd became worse and more unruly, and at about 8:00 o'clock P. M. tear gas was fired. Thereafter, the rioting increased by the hour as the night progressed, resulting in injuries to many persons and much property damage to personal property, automobiles and to the campus itself.

While the plaintiff was in Oxford, Mississippi, and on or about September 30, 1962, at about 8:00 o'clock P. M., a proclamation was made by the then President of the United States to the effect that the Governor of the State of Mississippi and certain other officials and other persons had been and were willfully opposing and obstructing the enforcement of the injunctions, orders and judgments of the United

Appendix C

Paragraphs III, V and VI of the Second Original Amended Answer of Defendant, The Associated Press, pp. 1 and 6-15 (Transcript, pp. 21 and 26-35)

States Courts and the President thereupon commanded all persons engaged in such obstruction of court orders to cease and desist and to disperse and retire peaceably forthwith. In addition, the President of the United States made a TV and radio appearance on the same date at about 8 o'clock P. M. in which he sought in substance the same compliance with court orders. Notwithstanding said proclamation of the President of the United States and the appeal of the President, the said plaintiff immediately thereafter proceeded to the campus of the University of Mississippi, at Oxford, arriving there at approximately 8:45 P. M. on the night of September 30 and stayed on said campus for a period of several hours thereafter. Following the widespread dissemination of plaintiff Walker's statements in the press, TV and radio, not only in Mississippi but elsewhere, the plaintiff's very presence on the campus tended to increase the emotional excitement, the explosive condition, the courage, fervor and rage of the mob, thereby increasing the dangers and damage from what at first had been a demonstration, to a riot, mob violence, and to more organized and determined attacks upon the U. S. Marshals. At the time of the arrival of the plaintiff on the campus, there had already been violence and injury to persons and property, all of which was known to the plaintiff or should have been known in the exercise of ordinary observation on the campus. On the occasion in question, the plaintiff was welcomed by the crowd as its leader and he then and there made a speech which further excited and enraged the mob and, at least on one occasion, the plaintiff did proceed as a part of a

Appendix C

Paragraphs III, V and VI of the Second Original Amended Answer of Defendant, The Associated Press, pp. 1 and 6-15 (Transcript, pp. 21 and 26-35)

generalized movement towards the Marshals at the Lyceum Building accompanied or followed by a crowd of students and others shouting and yelling defiance, some of whom when close enough to the Marshals hurled missiles toward them. On many occasions during the night in question, plaintiff would move back and forth through the Circle (an area in the vicinity of and near the front of the Lyceum Building where the Marshals were stationed). He also offered advice on how to make the tear gas bombs ineffective, and otherwise complimented, encouraged and urged on the crowd of rioters to further protest and to keep up what they were doing, all of which resulted in continual opposition to duly constituted governmental and judicial authority including violation of the injunctive decrees heretofore referred to.

Therefore, each and all of the statements complained of by plaintiff herein are fair comment and are privileged.

* * *

V.

By way of further answer herein and adopting all the allegations heretofore made herein, this defendant, The Associated Press, denies that any malice was involved or intended on the part of this defendant in the publication of any one or all of the articles or dispatches complained of, but was occasioned only by an effort in good faith—actuated solely by a sense of duty growing out of the occasion—to report to its members and to the public what this defendant believed to be an accurate report of the plaintiff's activities in the Mississippi crisis, and to make fair comment thereon, all of which is privileged.

Appendix C

Paragraphs III, V and VI of the Second Original Amended Answer of Defendant, The Associated Press, pp. 1 and 6-15 (Transcript, pp. 21 and 26-35)

VI.

By way of further answer herein and adopting all of the allegations heretofore made herein, this defendant denies that it was or is guilty of any conduct which would authorize the allowance of any damages, punitive or otherwise, but would further say that the allowance of any damages herein would amount to a restraint and deterrent to the publication of news and the freedom of the press as required by the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States. The publications complained of were published and circulated by the defendant among the general public; the information contained therein is true; it concerns the plaintiff, a public figure, and was related to public affairs and matters of great public concern, and the publication was made so that the public should be informed, and the same was made in good faith and without malice, so that the same is privileged. Further, the allowance of any damages under and by virtue of any rule of law as applied by the courts of the State of Texas would be in violation of the foregoing Constitutional safeguards and would be constitutionally deficient for failure to permit freedom of speech and press which are guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States. The allowance of any damages herein also would be violative of the Constitution of the State of Texas which prohibits the abridgement of the freedom of the press in Article I, Paragraph 8 thereof.

APPENDIX C

Defendant's Motion to Disregard the Jury's Verdict, and for Judgment Notwithstanding Said Verdict, pp. 1 and 4 (Transcript, pp. 63 and 66)

IN THE

DISTRICT COURT OF

TARRANT COUNTY, TEXAS

17TH JUDICAL DISTRICT

No. 31741-C

EDWIN A. WALKER

vs.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DEFENDANT'S MOTION TO DISREGARD THE JURY'S VERDICT AND FOR JUDGMENT NOTWITHSTANDING SAID VERDICT

TO THE HONORABLE JUDGE OF SAID COURT:

Now comes the defendant, Associated Press, and moves the Court to set aside and disregard the verdict of the jury and each and every finding therein, and to render judgment for the defendant and against the plaintiff notwithstanding such verdict, and as grounds therefor would respectfully show as follows:

* * *

Appendix C

Defendant's Motion to Disregard the Jury's Verdict, and for Judgment Notwithstanding Said Verdict, pp. 1 and 4 (Transcript, pp. 63 and 66)

16.

Notwithstanding the verdict of the jury, the Court should render judgment for the defendant because any judgment awarding money damages to plaintiff against defendant would constitute a restraint and deterrent to the publication of news and a restraint, deterrent and denial of the freedom of the press as guaranteed to defendant by the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States of America.

APPENDIX C

Defendant's Original Motion for New Trial, p. 1
(Transcript, p. 73)

IN THE

DISTRICT COURT OF
TARRANT COUNTY, TEXAS
17TH JUDICIAL DISTRICT
No. 31741-C

EDWIN A. WALKER

vs.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DEFENDANT'S ORIGINAL MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL

TO THE HONORABLE JUDGE OF SAID COURT:

Now comes the defendant Associated Press, after entry of judgment herein on August 3, 1964, and makes and files this its Orginal Motion for New Trial, and moves the Court to set aside the judgment heretofore rendered against it and to grant a new trial herein, upon the following grounds, to-wit:

1.

The Court erred in overruling the motion for instructed verdict made by defendant after plaintiff had rested.

2.

The Court erred in overruling the motion for instructed verdict made by defendant after both sides had rested.

3.

The Court erred in overruling Grounds 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 12, 13, 16 and 17 of defendant's motion to disregard the jury's verdict, and for judgment notwithstanding said verdict.

APPENDIX C

Defendant's Amended Motion for New Trial, pp. 1 and 3 (Transcript, pp. 78 and 80)

IN THE

DISTRICT COURT OF

TARRANT COUNTY, TEXAS

17TH JUDICIAL DISTRICT

No. 31741-C.

EDWIN A. WALKER

vs.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DEFENDANT'S AMENDED MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL

TO THE HONORABLE JUDGE OF SAID COURT:

Now comes defendant, The Associated Press, and with leave of the Court first had and obtained makes and files this its Amended Motion for New Trial, and would respectfully show as follows:

I.

The Court erred in overruling Grounds 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 12, 13, 16 and 17 of Defendant's Motion to Disregard the Jury's Verdict and for Judgment Nothwithstand-

Appendix C

Defendant's Amended Motion for New Trial, pp. 1 and 3 (Transcript, pp. 78 and 80)

ing such Verdict for each and all of the reasons therein set forth, which said Grounds read as follows:

* * *

(16) Notwithstanding the verdict of the jury, the Court should render judgment for the defendant because any judgment awarding money damages to plaintiff against defendant would constitute a restraint and deterrent to the publication of news and a restraint, deterrent and denial of the freedom of the press as guaranteed to defendant by the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States of America.

APPENDIX C

Brief of Appellant The Associated Press in the Texas Court of Civil Appeals, pp. 1, 9 and 73-85

No. 16,624

IN THE

COURT OF CIVIL APPEALS

FOR THE SECOND SUPREME JUDICAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS
AT FORT WORTH

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS, Appellant

vs.

EDWIN A. WALKER, Appellee

FROM THE 17TH DISTRICT COURT OF TARRANT COUNTY, TEXAS

APPELLANT'S BRIEF

* * *

POINTS OF ERROR

* * *

5.

The trial court erred in rendering judgment for plaintiff because defendant's news reports, made without malice, are protected from the claim of libel by the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and such judgment therefore abridges defendant's rights thereunder.

Appendix C

Brief of Appellant The Associated Press in the Texas Court of Appeals, pp. 1, 9 and 73-85

(Page 73-85)

* * *

FIFTH POINT OF ERROR (Restated)

The trial court erred in rendering judgment for plaintiff because defendant's news reports, made without malice, are protected from the claim of libel by the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and such judgment therefore abridges defendant's rights thereunder. (Germane to Ground I(16) of the Amended Motion for New Trial).

ARGUMENT AND AUTHORITIES

Wide-Open Debate—A Profound National Commitment

In a series of public statements, already quoted in this brief, General Walker appealed to the world at large to rise and stand by Governor Barnett in Mississippi. When we are thus solicited by radio and television to help defy a court order and are informed that the Supreme Court of the United States consists of anti-Christ conspirators who have betrayed the Nation, we are not to suppose that this is double-barreled insurrection and calumny of the most dangerous and irresponsible sort. It is only General Walker exercising his constitutional rights to say what he pleases about others.

Appendix C

Brief of Appellant The Associated Press in the Texas Court of Appeals, pp. 1, 9 and 73-85

But any comment on his activities provokes the indignant cry of "foul", and it is then that we are to forget and ignore the public battle of national controversy into which he charged, calling with caustic invective for others to follow, and are to concentrate instead on the wounds with which he says he emerged from it.

And it is just such a claim to unilateral privilege of expression that is repugnant to, and underscores the wisdom of, our "profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open . . ." New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 11 L. Ed. 2d 686, 84 S. Ct. 710, 95 A.L.R. 2d 1412; Garrison v. Louisiana, . . . . . U. S. . . . . , 13 L. Ed. 125, 85 S. Ct. . . . . .

In the Times and Garrison cases, supra, the Supreme Court of the United States in 1964 held that truth may not be the subject of either civil or criminal sanctions where a discussion of public affairs is concerned. The court recognized that erroneous statement is inevitable in free debate, that it must be protected if the freedoms of expression are to survive, and that only false statements made with a high degree of awareness of their probable falsity may be the subject of either civil or criminal sanctions.

In the Garrison case, the Supreme Court, in applying its decision in the Times case to a criminal libel conviction, said, at page 133:

> ". . . Truth may not be the subject of either civil or criminal sanctions where discussion of public affairs is concerned. And since . . . erroneous statement is inevitable in free debate, and . . . it must be pro> tected if the freedoms of expression are to have the "breathing space" that they "need . . . to survive" . . .,' 376 U.S. at 271-272, 11 L. ed. 2d at 701, 95 ALR 2d 1412, only those false statements made with the high degree of awareness of their probable falsity demanded by New York Times may be the subject of either civil or criminal sanctions. For speech concerning public affairs is more than self-expression; it is the essence of self-government."

Appendix C
Brief of Appellant The Associated Press in the Texas Court of Appeals, pp. 1, 9 and 73-85

In the case at bar, there is no evidence of malice, and the trial court correctly so held. The court erred, however, in refusing to apply the Times rule and render judgment for defendant regardless of the jury findings as to the truth of the statements in question. The trial judge was of the view that the Times rule is limited to statements about public officials, and hence did not apply to the case at bar (Supp. Tr.). In this conclusion, we respectfully submit, the court erred.

The decision of the Supreme Court in Garrison v. Louisiana, rendered in November of 1964, was not before the trial court when it rendered judgment in the present action.

To be sure, the actual holding of the Times and Garrison cases applied to public officials since the persons alleged to have been libeled in those cases were public officials. It is manifest, however, from the reasoning underlying the decisions that they cannot be so limited. Moreover, to so restrict the Times and Garrison rule would create constitutional anomalies of the most serious kind and would, indeed, engender the very dangers that the rule was intended to avoid.

Appendix C

Brief of Appellant The Associated Press in the Texas Court of Appeals, pp. 1, 9 and 73-85

The touchstone of the Times and Garrison decisions was the premise that it is the purpose and philosophy of the First Amendment to insure free and uninhibited exchange of ideas on issues of public importance, even though such a freedom, like others, will result in some abuses. Quoting from Judge Learned Hand, the court in the Times case said that the First Amendment " 'presupposes that right conclusions are more likely to be gathered out of a multitude of tongues, than through any kind of authoritative selection. To many this is, and always will be, folly; but we have staked upon it our all.' " The court then quoted the "classic formulation" of the principle:

> " 'Those who won our independence believed . . . that public discussion is a political duty; and that this should be a fundamental principle of the American government. They recognized the risks to which all human institutions are subject. But they knew that order cannot be secured merely through fear of punishment for its infraction; that it is hazardous to discourage thought, hope and imagination; that fear breeds repression; that repression breeds hate; that hate menaces stable government; that the path of safety lies in the opportunity to discuss freely supposed grievances and proposed remedies; and that the fitting remedy for evil counsels is good ones. Believing in the power of reason as applied through public discussion, they eschewed silence coerced by law — the argument of force in its worst form. Recognizing the occasional tyrannies of governing

Appendix C
Brief of Appellant The Associated Press in the Texas Court of Appeals, pp. 1, 9 and 73-85

> majorities, they amended the Constitution so that free speech and assembly should be guaranteed.' "

Recognizing that "some degree of abuse is inseparable from the proper use of everything; and in no instance is this more true than in that of the press," the court then quoted from an earlier opinion as follows:

> "In the realm of religious faith, and in that of political belief, sharp differences arise. In both fields the tenets of one man may seem the rankest error to his neighbor. To persuade others to his own point of view, the pleader, as we know, at times, resorts to exaggeration, to vilification of men who have been, or are, prominent in church or state, and even to false statement. But the people of this nation have ordained in the light of history, that, in spite of the probability of excesses and abuses, these liberties are, in the long view, essential to enlightened opinion and right conduct on the part of the citizens of democracy."

In short, the holding of Times and Garrison is that, in the long run, freedom of expression on public matters is of overriding public importance regardless of the excesses and abuses that may occasionally result; and that the individual's claim for libel is pre-empted by the paramount public need for uninhibited debate on public issues.

Moreover, the court's heavy emphasis in the Times case on the opinion of the Kansas Supreme Court in Coleman v. MacLennan, 98 P. 281, leaves no doubt that the decision ex-

Appendix C

Brief of Appellant The Associated Press in the Texas Court of Appeals, pp. 1, 9 and 73-85 tends to all matters of great public concern. The court quoted with approval the following from the Supreme Court of Kansas:

> "In such a case the occasion gives rise to a privilege, qualified to this extent: any one claiming to be defamed by the communication must show actual malice or go remediless. This privilege extends to a great variety of subjects, and includes matters of public concern, public men, and candidates for office." 78 Kan. at 723.

In Pauling v. News Syndicate Co., 335 F. 2d 659 (2 Cir. 1964), an action for libel, the court said, as an alternative ground for its holding, that although the public official is the strongest case for the constitutional compulsion of the Times privilege with respect to the discussion of matters of public importance and concern, a candidate for public office would seem an inevitable candidate for extension, and that once that extension was made, the participant in public debate on an issue of grave public concern would be next in line.

In its opinion, the court said, at page 671:

> "Although the public official is the strongest case for the constitutional compulsion of such a privilege, it is questionable whether in principle the decision can be so limited. A candidate for public office would seem an inevitable candidate for extension; if a newspaper cannot constitutionally be held for defamation when it states without malice, but cannot

Appendix C
Brief of Appellant The Associated Press in the Texas Court of Appeals, pp. 1, 9 and 73-85 > prove, that an incumbent seeking re-election has accepted a bribe, it seems hard to justify holding it liable for further stating that the bribe was offered by his opponent. Once that extension was made, the participant in public debate on an issue of grave public concern would be next in line; thus, as applied to the case in hand, if a newspaper could not be held for printing Dr. Pauling's charges that a member of the Atomic Energy Commission had 'made dishonest, untrue and misleading statements to mislead the American people' and that a United States Senator is 'the greatest enemy . . . the United States has,' as the New York Times case decided, one may wonder whether there would be sound basis for forcing it to risk a jury's determination that it was only engaging in fair criticism rather than misstating facts if it printed, falsely, but without malice, that in saying all this Dr. Pauling was following the Communist line."

In Gilberg v. Goffi, 251 NYS 2d 823, an action for libel, the rule of the Times case was applied to a mayor's law partner, who was neither an officeholder nor a candidate for office, but who had entered a public controversy as to whether a municipal code of ethics was needed to bar the mayor and his law firm from practicing law in the city court.

In Pearson v. Fairbanks Publishing Co., Inc., (Superior Court of Alaska. Fourth District, No. 10,209), the action was to recover damages for libel. The alleged libel was the charge that the plaintiff, a newspaper and radio columnist, was the "Garbage Man of the Fourth Estate."

Appendix C

Brief of Appellant The Associated Press in the Texas Court of Appeals, pp. 1, 9 and 73-85

The court, in taking note of the Times decision and holding that the publication complained of was not actionable, said, in an opinion not yet published, that "Drew Pearson, a public figure and internationally known newspaper and radio columnist of no mean proportion, should occupy the same standing in the law of libel as Senator Gruening whose cause he was publicly supporting."

In the case at bar, there can be no doubt that the question of school integration that came to a head in the Mississippi crisis was a matter of grave national controversy and concern. It was one of the most dominant and widely debated issues of this century. In the Times case, the Supreme Court referred to the integration question as "one of the major public issues of our time . . .", (at 701). This is also conclusively established in the record. The plaintiff was a national public figure (S.F. 331, 486, 516) and a recent candidate for public office. He knew that the question of integration was a matter of national controversy and interest (S.F. 759); he knew that his going to Mississippi would create considerable publicity (S.F. 922); he sought that publicity; he knew that there was an explosive situation on the campus and that feelings were high in Mississippi (S.F. 922); and that the Chief Executive of the State was openly obstructing the mandate of the Fifth Circuit Court. His repeated television and radio addresses called attention to himself and solicited support for the cause that he championed. That he deliberately and publicly became part and parcel of the controversy is not open to question.

Appendix C

Brief of Appellant The Associated Press in the Texas Court of Appeals, pp. 1, 9 and 73-85

If the Times decision applies at all to matters of public concern and participants in debate on public issues, it clearly applies to plaintiff and his conduct in Mississippi. The publications complained of in the case at bar were not mere gossip about the plaintiff in some private capacity. The defendant was reporting the crucial events at Oxford, and plaintiff's voluntary presence brought him within the area of national controversy. As we have pointed out on pages 18-20 of this brief, prior to September 30, 1962 the U.S. Court of Appeals had rendered its judgment ordering the admission of James H. Meredith to the University of Mississippi. In furtherance thereof an injunction had been issued enjoining the school officials and all persons acting in concert with them, as well as all persons having knowledge of such decree, from interfering with Meredith's admission.

Despite these restraining orders, Governor Barnett continued to oppose the admission of Meredith to the University.

The plaintiff's declared purpose on the night of the riot —September 30, 1962—was to stand shoulder to shoulder with Governor Barnett in opposing the orders of the courts. He was in Oxford to support the Governor's position, and he occupied the same position from the standpoint of the law of libel as Governor Barnett, whose cause he was publicly supporting.

It would be a constitutional anomaly having neither substance nor shadow of basis in reason to hold on the one hand that Governor Barnett is within the Times rule, which

Appendix C
Brief of Appellant The Associated Press in the Texas Court of Appeals, pp. 1, 9 and 73-85

he clearly is, and yet to hold on the other hand that those who publicly rise to stand beside him, seeking with equal vigor and effect to rally public support for his cause, are not. Logically, the Constitutional protection, if it is to exist at all and have any fairness about it, must extend to the area of public debate and to those who participate in it.

If the Times rule were to be limited to public officials, a national press columnist or TV commentator could state falsely, but without malice, that a public official was a thief and clearly come within the ambit of the rule, but anyone who dared to enter the debate by publicly suggesting that the columnist or commentator was a liar in so stating, would be denied the same protection. This is scarcely wide-open debate. A defeated presidential candidate could spend the ensuing four years rallying public support by defamatory statements about the incumbent and enjoy the protection of the rule, but those who would criticize the challenger would have to do so without it. Such an anomaly can hardly be said to comport with the principle of uninhibited debate.

The Court can well imagine other examples, such as labor leaders, political party leaders, campaign managers, national magazines, and countless others who wield broad public power and have wide public support for themselves and those that they champion, but who hold no public office. Surely it would be unthinkable to hold that utterances made about them are to enjoy less protection than the clamor that they are free to utter about public officials under the Times rule. If the people are to be free to criticize the Government and those who comprise it, they must be free to criticize the critics within the same latitude and under the same rule of law. To hold otherwise would create an imbalance of the freedom of expression and could conceivably result in an atmosphere in which an administration could be toppled by a rising Castro who, by virtue of holding no office, enjoyed freedoms of expression about the Government that were denied to those who would criticize him.

The repressing effect of a half million dollar award upon freedom of expression is so patent, the inhibiting effect upon the presentation of conflicting and controversial political argument so plain, and the punishment for such presentation so burdensome and oppressive that this Court may not, consistent with the First Amendment, permit its imposition. As the court said in the Times case:

> "Whether or not a newspaper can survive a succession of such judgments, the pall of fear and timidity imposed upon those who would give voice to public criticism is an atmosphere in which the First Amendment freedoms cannot survive."

Cf. Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U. S. 58 (1963); Marcus v. Search Warrant, 367 U.S. 717 (1961); Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 470 (1960); Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513 (1958).

Finally, on this point, the import of the trial court's opinion is that though free press is important, so is accuracy, and that the need for accuracy "imposes a great duty and responsibility" on the press, in default of the discharge of which it forfeits its constitutional protection. (Supp. Tr.) We were unable to ascertain any rational basis for distingu-

Appendix C
Brief of Appellant The Associated Press in the Texas Court of Appeals, pp. 1, 9 and 73-85

ishing between "irresponsibility"—short of actual malice—in reporting on public officials and in reporting on other participants in public debate on public issues.

Moreover, while accuracy and responsibility of reporting are unquestionably desirable, they are not prerequisites to First Amendment protection. As the court said in New York Times:

> "Authoritative interpretations of the First Amendment guarantees have consistently refused to recognize an exception for any test of truth, whether administered by judges, juries, or administrative officials—and especially not one that puts the burden of proving truth on the speaker. * * * The constitutional protection does not turn upon 'the truth, popularity, or social utility of the ideas and beliefs which are offered.' "

The trial court's thesis would be persuasive if the press operated by license of the Government. The argument, however, overlooks the fact that we are concerned here with basic and fundamental constitutional rights that may not be forfeited, like a taxicab franchise, upon a supposed showing that a "great duty and responsibility" have not been discharged.

APPENDIX C

Reply Brief of Appellant The Associated Press, pp. 1, 6-8 and 19-24

No. 16,624

IN THE

COURT OF CIVIL APPEALS

FOR THE SECOND SUPREME JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS

AT FORTH WORTH

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS, Appellant

vs.

EDWIN A. WALKER, Appellee

REPLY BRIEF FOR APPELLANT

May It Please the Court:

* * *

Among other irrelevances, plaintiff seeks to bolster his argument on this and other points by revealing to the Court that defendant is a corporation that makes money, a state of affairs something less, we believe, than sinister, even if it were accurate, which it is not. Should the Court be interested in the organization and financial situation of the defendant, the cases in the margin explain that it is a member-

Appendix C
Reply Brief of Appellant The Associated Press, pp. 1, 6-8 and 19-24

ship corporation, whose members are the newspapers that subscribe to its services, and that it is not operated for profit.[1]

The point is really immaterial, however, because even if The Associated Press were a profit making corporation, that would have absolutely no bearing on any of the points involved in this litigation. Although the point plaintiff is trying to make is admittedly fuzzy in this regard, apparently plaintiff is attempting to infer that anyone who makes a profit from distributing news must be denied both the fair comment defense and the constitutional protection. Though, of course most everything that is written or published, including most of plaintiff's speeches, is for profit and, indeed, some publications even enjoy copyright protection, those facts have never had any bearing on the fair comment defense and the constitutional protection. Newspapers are sold like any other commodity, yet even plaintiff concedes that they are protected by Article 5432 and the Constitution. Just how or why it is the plaintiff regards The Associated Press as being in some unique category we cannot understand, and plaintiff does not explain. As the Supreme Court of the United States said in New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 11 L. Ed. 2d 686, 84 S. Ct. 710:

> "That the Times was paid for publishing the advertisement is as immaterial in this connection as is the fact that newspapers and books are sold."

---

[1] National Labor Relations Board v. Associated Press, 85 F. 2d 56, affirmed 301 U. S. 103, 81 L. Ed. 953; KVOS, Inc. v. Associated Press, 299 U. S. 269, 81 L. Ed. 183; the Opinion of the District Court in United States v. Associated Press, 52 F. Supp. 362, which was affirmed in 326 U. S. 1, 89 L. Ed. 2013; and International News Service v. Associated Press, 248 U. S. 215, 63 L. Ed. 211.

Appendix C
Reply Brief of Appellant The Associated Press,
pp. 1, 6-8 and 19-24

So, in the instant case, the fact, if it be a fact, that The Associated Press was paid for its news releases is as immaterial as is the fact that newspaper reporters are paid by the newspaper, or that the author of a magazine article is paid by the magazine.

If, as plaintiff would have it (Brief 3), defendant is in the same category as the supplier of printing ink to the newspaper, then of course defendant, like the ink supplier, would not be responsible for the publication by the newspaper of which plaintiff complains.

* * *

The Constitutional Protection

In his argument on the constitutional question, plaintiff continues his insistence that the defendant is without the scope of the First and Fourteenth Amendment protection because it receives compensation for its news releases. This point has already been discussed earlier in this reply, and we will not here elaborate on it beyond pointing out that the fact that news may be treated as a commodity, for some purposes at least, is as irrelevant here as is the fact that newspapers, books, and magazines are also commodities.

At page 47 of his brief, appellee reminds us again that The Associated Press is not engaged in the publication of anything, which again is completely irrelevant to the constitutional protection that is afforded to free expression of thought. That The Associated Press is the author, rather than the publisher, of the two reports in question has nothing to do with the constitutional questions involved.

Appendix C
Reply Brief of Appellant The Associated Press, pp. 1, 6-8 and 19-24

In our main brief, we attempted to analyze the Times and Garrison cases[2], and we predicated our argument upon the reasoning employed by the court in both cases. As we there pointed out, the underlying basis for both decisions was the premise that the purpose and philosophy of the First Amendment was to insure free and uninhibited exchange of ideas on issues of public importance and concern.

In response, plaintiff merely extracts from each opinion every reference to public officials and official conduct and parrots them in his brief. Plaintiff, of course, is entitled to argue that both decisions are inapplicable here, but the argument finds no support in the fact that the phrases "public officials" and "official conduct" appear frequently in the opinions. Such an argument is roughly analogous to contending that a case involving a super market has no application to a department store because of the frequent references in the opinion to super markets. We respectfully submit that one must at least examine the reasoning in any case to determine its applicability in another, and that plaintiff in this case has done nothing more than emphasize that public officials were involved in both the Times and Garrison cases, which hardly requires the three pages of brief that plaintiff devotes to it.

Plaintiff not only utterly ignores the rationale and the basis for the holdings in both cases, he affirmatively misstates the holding in Garrison when he states on page 51 of his brief that the court there held that "neither the court nor

---

[2]New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 11 L. Ed. 2d 686, 84 S. Ct. 710, 95 A. L. R. 2d 1412; Garrison v. Louisiana, ... U. S. ...., 13 L. Ed. 125, 85 S. Ct.

Appendix C
Reply Brief of Appellant The Associated Press, pp. 1, 6-8 and 19-24

the Constitution protected libelous publications, even in the case of public officials." It is obvious from a cursory inspection of either opinion that the court in each case held that the Constitution does protect libelous publications made about public officials, and indeed that that was the precise holding in each case. The only limitation suggested by the majority in both cases was that the Constitution does not protect malicious false statements, i.e., "false statements made with the high degree of awareness of their probable falsity demanded by New York Times . . ."; Garrison at page 133.

Moreover, in neither case did the court "draw the line" at public officials, as plaintiff tells us at page 53 of his brief, nor was the constitutional protection "strictly limited" to public officials, as plaintiff asserts at page 52 of his brief. Obviously, the court was not required to draw any lines because only public officials were involved in both cases. Courts draw lines in cases that involve situations determined to be beyond the scope of the concept involved.

We respectfully submit that this Court cannot read the opinions in Times and Garrison, and particularly the thorough and painstaking analysis of the historical background of free speech and press, without being deeply impressed with the Supreme Court's zealous determination to insure the preservation of one of the most fundamental and sacred safeguards that forms part of the very bedrock of this Republic. It is scarcely conceivable that one could study those opinions and find no more substance, no more depth, and no more principle in them than plaintiff professes in his brief to have discovered. That which plaintiff has missed has not escaped the attention of the courts in Pauling v. News Syndicate Co., 335 F. 2d 659 (2 Cir. 1964), Gilberg v. Goffi, 251 NYS 2d 823, and Pearson v. Fairbanks Publishing Co., Inc. (not yet reported), all cited in our main brief.

Appendix C
Reply Brief of Appellant The Associated Press, pp. 1, 6-8 and 19-24

The Times and Garrison opinions expound the Supreme Court's recognition of the absolute necessity for free and uninhibited exchanges of ideas on matters of public concern, particularly those involving government and the conduct of government, no matter how erroneous the ideas may be, in the absence of the known and deliberate lie. Stable self-government depends upon the freedom to comment on matters of public concern and persons who attempt to influence the course and destiny of the government, whether they be public officials or public interlopers. Such a concept does not and could not embrace baseball players, Beatles, and Fat Stock Show winners, as plaintiff suggests at page 52 of his brief. Being merely in the public eye, as plaintiff puts it, is not the same at all as attempting publicly to rally public support in a controversy involving the very essence of the respective powers and authorities of the United States, a State and the Federal Courts.

Obviously, a public official by virtue of his office can and does have a direct influence upon the government, but to contend that public officials are the only ones in that position is to ignore reality.

As the Second Circuit Court of Appeals observed in the Pauling case, it would be anomalous to hold that a newspaper which reported falsely, but without malice, that a public official had been bribed would not be liable for defamation to the official, but would be liable to the person who reportedly bribed him.

Appendix C
Reply Brief of Appellant The Associated Press, pp. 1, 6-8 and 19-24

In the instant case, plaintiff summoned the world at large to join plaintiff in rising to a stand beside Governor Barnett. There could be no possible reason or consistency whatever, and plaintiff suggests none, for holding that statements about Governor Barnett are within the Times rule, but that statements about those who rise to stand beside him are not. The object in either case is the same, the solicitation of public support is the same, the impact upon public opinion is the same, and the potential influence and effect on the outcome of the controversy is the same.

To illustrate the point we are making, suppose that the Governor of a State should determine that the State would secede from the Union. Surely private citizens who publicly solicited and sought to raise armies in support of such a movement would be subject to the same law of libel as the Governor.

Perhaps we have overlabored the point, but we trust that this Court will recognize that there is more involved here than plaintiff's assertion that we are contending for some sort of license to "peddle prevarication with impunity" (Brief 56), or that "anyone can be vilified for free". We are urging this Court's serious consideration of the constitutional thesis which applies the same law of libel to those who actively and publicly assist public officials as is applied to the public officials.

APPENDIX C

Motion of Appellant The Associated Press for Rehearing in the Texas Court of Civil Appeals, pp. 1 and 3

No. 16,624

IN THE

COURT OF CIVIL APPEALS

FOR THE SECOND SUPREME JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS

AT FORT WORTH

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,
Appellant,

vs.

EDWIN A. WALKER,
Appellee.

From the 17th District Court of Tarrant County, Texas

APPELLANT'S MOTION FOR REHEARING

TO THE HONORABLE COURT OF CIVIL APPEALS:

Now comes The Associated Press, the appellant in the above entitled and numbered cause, and respectfully moves the Court to set aside its judgment and opinion rendered herein on the 30th day of July, 1965, and to grant appellant

Appendix C

Motion of Appellant The Associated Press for Rehearing in the Texas Court of Civil Appeals, pp. 1 and 3

a rehearing, and upon such rehearing to reverse the judgment of the District Court and render judgment for appellant in all respects, or, in the alternative, to remand the case for a new trial, and as grounds therefor respectfully says:

* * *

The Court of Civil Appeals erred in overruling Appellant's Fifth Point of Error, which reads as follows:

> "The trial court erred in rendering judgment for plaintiff because defendant's news reports, made without malice, are protected from the claim of libel by the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and such judgment therefore abridges defendant's rights thereunder."

APPENDIX C

Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

No. A-11,069

IN THE

SUPREME COURT OF TEXAS

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,
Petitioner,

vs.

EDWIN A. WALKER,
Respondent.

APPLICATION FOR WRIT OF ERROR

TO THE HONORABLE SUPREME COURT OF TEXAS:

Petitioner, The Associated Press, respectfully submits this Application for Writ of Error to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Second Supreme Judicial District of Texas, at Forth Worth, to correct errors of law in the judgment and opinion of said Court in Cause No. 16,624, styled The Associated Press, Appellant v. Edwin A. Walker, Appellee, wherein the Court of Civil Appeals affirmed the judgment of the 17th District Court of Tarrant County, Texas.

Nomenclature

In this Application the parties will be designated either by name or as they appeared in the trial court.

Appendix C

Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

Statement of The Case

The per curiam opinion of the Fort Worth Court, affirming a half million dollar judgment against defendant, correctly states the nature and the result of this libel suit, and it accurately quotes from Texas Jurisprudence and the Texas Law Review. It ignores virtually all of the facts, most of which are undisputed, and in so doing fails even to recognize, much less analyze, the serious Federal Constitutional question that was presented. The length of this Application is due in large part to the necessity for setting out the undisputed facts that are omitted in the opinion of the court below.

The two news stories in question are correctly set forth in the opinion below. They were prepared by defendant and published by the Fort Worth Star-Telegram. They described plaintiff's participation in a riot of several thousand persons that occurred during most of the evening of Sunday, September 30, 1962, and the pre-dawn hours of the following Monday, on the campus of the University of Mississippi, at Oxford, in opposition to the efforts of United States marshals to secure the enrollment of a Negro in that university, pursuant to the mandate of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.

The plaintiff's presence in the midst of the riot for more than four hours is undisputed, as is also the incessant radio and television appeal with which he heralded his coming and summoned 500,000 volunteers to help protect the Nation against enforcement of the law of the land by assisting the Governor of Mississippi in pursuing a course that had already led him, to plaintiff's knowledge, in contempt of the Fifth Circuit Court for having personally and physically obstructed the execution of its mandate.

Appendix C
Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

In this Application we shall demonstrate, among other things, that the evidence conclusively established, as a matter of law, (1) that both statements* were substantially true; (2) that both were fair comment, and thus privileged by applicable Texas statutes; and (3) that in any event the defendant's news releases describing, as they did, a state of affairs in Mississippi that was of grave national interest and concern, involving issues of the utmost public importance, are protected by the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States against the claim of libel by this particular plaintiff, who the evidence conclusively establishes was, and for considerable time had been, a vociferous, publicity-seeking, prominent political figure and who, with clamorous public fanfare in advance, deliberately injected himself and his sentiments into the fray in Mississippi and into the limelight of public scrutiny that he knew was focused upon it.

* * *

Points of Error Relied Upon

1.

The News reports here involved, made without malice, concerning matters of grave national concern, are protected from the claim of libel by the First and *i.e., the "charge" and "command" statements as quoted in the opinion below.

Appendix C
Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and the judgment herein therefore abridges defendant's rights thereunder; and the Court of Civil Appeals erred in holding to the contrary.

* * *

First Point of Error Restated

1.

The news reports here involved, made without malice, concerning matters of grave national concern, are protected from the claim of libel by the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and the judgment herein therefore abridges defendant's rights thereunder; and the Court of Civil Appeals erred in holding to the contrary. (Germane to Ground 5 of Defendant's Motion for Rehearing.)

Preliminary Statement

Ordinarily, accepted briefing practice would dictate that a resume of the pertinent facts should precede the argument and authorities, because the Court, being generally familiar with the law, can readily determine the nature of the contention from the point of error, and should first have the facts in mind before attempting to apply the law.

Here, however, the point of error raises questions involving Federal Constitutional limitations in the field of libel under the First and Fourteenth Amendments that have been announced only recently by the Supreme Court of the United States, and accordingly this is a case of first impression in this Court. In addition, we have here the rare instance in which the same point has been decided by another court in a case involving the same plaintiff and the same subject matter.

We believe, therefore, that the Constitutional issue that we presented in the courts below, and are raising here, can best be demonstrated at the outset by quoting substantial portions of the opinion of the United States District Court, Western District of Kentucky, in Walker v. Courier-Journal et al, . . . F. Supp. . . , decided September 23, 1965.* We think more extensive quotation than usual is warranted here and will be helpful, because the case is not yet reported, and also because it is more than directly in point—it is virtually the same case, except insofar as the question of actual malice is concerned. The defendant here was not a party to that case, but the news reports are substantially the same. We respectfully ask the Court's indulgence in this departure from ordinary practice, believing it will be helpful to the Court in understanding the issue. Argument and additional authorities will follow.

The following is quoted from the opinion of the Court in Walker v. Courier-Journal et al:

> "This cause comes on before the Court on the Defendants' Motion to Dismiss the Plaintiff's Complaint, as amended.

*The entire opinion is reproduced in the Appendix.

Appendix C

Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

"On September 30, 1963, the Plaintiff, Edwin A. Walker, a former Army Major General, filed this action for actual and punitive damages for libel in the sum of Two Million Dollars, against the Defendants, Courier-Journal and Louisville Times Company and WHAS, Inc., Kentucky corporations, with their principal places of business in Louisville, Kentucky. Jurisdiction of the Court over this action is fixed by USC Title 28, Paragraph 1332.

"The Defendant corporations, on October 1, 1962, October 2, 1962 and October 3, 1962, published in their newspapers and/or broadcast over their radio and television facilities, various news items or stories concerning the rioting on the campus of the University of Mississippi, in the City of Oxford, Mississippi, which said published matter had been received by Defendants from national news gathering agencies to which Defendants were subscribers.

"The news items or stories so published and complained of by the Plaintiff stated in substance, that the Plaintiff, Walker, had led a charge of rioters against United States Marshals who were present on the University of Mississippi campus carrying out the orders of the United States Courts requiring integration of enrollment of whites and negroes at said University. Plaintiff, Walker, alleged that such items imputed to him that he was a 'trouble maker', that he was 'participating' in the occurrences taking place in Oxford, all in the context used of inciting of the students to riot, and that the publication reflected libelously on the honor, character and reputation of the Plaintiff.

Appendix C
Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

"This Court has considered the briefs and memoranda submitted by counsel for the parties and taking judicial notice of the public events relating thereto which were widely reported throughout the Nation and are matters of common knowledge, and further treating as true (for the purpose of passing upon this Motion to Dismiss) the factual allegations of the Complaint, as amended, arrives at the following conclusions which are the basis of its final Order entered herein.

"Following the filing of this action the Supreme Court of the United States handed down its Opinion in New York Times Company v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (October Term, 1963) wherein said Court in legal effect federally preempted the law of libel in matters of 'grave national concern' involving 'public officials' with the announced doctrine that

> '. . . Constitutional guarantees require, we think, a Federal rule that prohibits a public official from recovering damages for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves that the statement was made with "actual malice"—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was or not.'

Appendix C

Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

"There can be no question but that the serious occurrences at the University of Mississippi wherein the State of Mississippi and the Federal Government were locked in conflict as to the educational integration of the races was a matter of 'grave national concern.' The Supreme Court of the United States has classified the integration struggle as 'one of the major political issues of our time.'

"Thus, it can be seen that had the Plaintiff, Walker, been a 'public official' at the time of this occurrence, this Court's task would have been automatically relegated to a decision only of the one issue of whether or not the Defendants herein had published the statements attributed to them with 'actual malice', that is, with knowledge that the statements were false or with reckless disregard of whether or not they were false.

"However, the matter is not so simple, for this Court notes with significance that in laying down the doctrine of 'actual malice' in the Times case, the Supreme Court quoted with approval from the case of Coleman vs. McLennan, 78 Kans. 711, 98 P. 281 (1908) as follows:

> 'This privilege extends to a great variety of subjects and includes matters of public concern, public men and candidates for office.' (Emphasis added)

and in conclusion the Court stated:

Appendix C
Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

> 'We hold today that the Constitution delimits a State's power to award damages for libel in actions brought by public officials against critics of their official conduct. Since this is such an action, the rule requiring proof of actual malice is applicable.' (Page 283)

"In connection with the last above quoted language, the Supreme Court included a footnote to its Opinion (Footnote 23) in part, as follows:

> 'We have no occasion here . . . to specify categories of persons who would or would not be included.'

"From this language I believe the Supreme Court of the United States has served clear notice that the broad Constitutional protections afforded by the First and Fourteenth Amendments will not be limited to 'public officials' only, for to have any meaning the protections must be extended to other categories of individuals or persons involved in the area of public debate or who have become involved in matters of public concern. If the Supreme Court intended to limit its holdings to 'public officials' only, then why Footnote 23? I subscribe that Footnote 23 is of vast importance in understanding the intended scope of the Supreme Court's Opinion, for it is a departure from the Court's traditional rule of basing its decision on the narrowest Constitutional grounds and is interpreted by this Court as giving special significance to the broad language adopted in arriving at its decision.

Appendix C
Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

"The Plaintiff, Walker, is of course not a 'public official' within the commonly accepted meaning of the words. However, he was, as he identifies himself in his own Complaint, a person of 'political prominence.' This Court takes judicial notice that Plaintiff Walker's public life is generally well known to the people of this Nation, that he was the subject of nationwide news reports while on duty as an Army General and also as a candidate for Governor of Texas, and that he has in the past made vigorous public announcements on matters of public concern. Plaintiff was, by his own choosing, present in Oxford, Mississippi, on the occasion of the turmoil after announcing on radio and television his intention to be present there and having called upon others to join with him there in support of his publicly stated position on the matters of public concern there in issue.

"Had not Plaintiff thereby become a 'public man'? Could he not have reasonably foreseen that his being a person of 'political prominence' his presence in Oxford would be taken cognizance of by the press? Had not Walker interwoven his personal status into that of a public one whereby he would become the subject of substantial press, radio and television news comment; thus magnifying the chance that his activities would be 'erroneously' reported? This Court so believes.

Appendix C
Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

"I therefore reach the inescapable conclusion that the protective 'public official' doctrine of 'actual malice' announced in Sullivan v. New York Times is in common reason and should be applicable to a 'public man' as well, and that the Plaintiff, Walker, was such a 'public man' under the circumstances involved here. 'Public men are, as it were, public property.'

"My application of the doctrine of New York Times v. Sullivan to the facts here in issue finds authority not only in the logical dictates of Footnote 23 discussed above, but in the reasoning and philosophy underlying the Times Opinion and in the critical discussion in legal commentaries and recent decisions of other courts. The decision of Judge Friendly in Pauling v. News Syndicate Company, 335 F. 2d 659 at 671 (2d Cir. 1964), favorably presages the result here. See also Gilberg v. Goffi, 251 N.Y.S. 2d 823 (1964); Pearson v. Fairbanks Publishing Co., (Unreported, Superior Ct. of Alaska, 4th District, Nov. 25, 1964); and Pedrick, Freedom of the Press and the Law of Libel, 49 Cornell L.Q. 581, at 592 (1964); 9 Vill. L. Rev. 534 (1964).

"I adopt this position with full understanding of the fact that by such extension of the scope of word meaning I am perhaps 'plowing new ground' in legal effect, but also with the accompanying conviction that not to do so would negate the spirit of the

Appendix C
Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

Times Opinion which I believe to be a '. . . profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust and wide open . . .' Public debate cannot be 'uninhibited, robust and wide open' if the news media are compelled to stand legally in awe of error in reporting the words, and actions of persons of national prominence and influence (not 'public officials') who are nevertheless voluntarily injecting themselves into matters of grave public concern attempting thereby through use of their leadership and influence, to mold public thought and opinion to their own way of thinking. If any person seeks the 'spotlight' of the stage of public prominence then he must be prepared to accept the errors of the searching beams of the glow thereof, for only in such rays can the public know what role he plays on the stage of public concern—often, regretfully, a stage torn in the turmoil of riot and civil disorder, whereon error in reported occurrence is more apt to become the rule rather than the exception.

"This is particularly so here where open riot and turmoil with accompanying destruction of property, injuries and death turned portions of the University of Mississippi campus into a strife beset no man's land through the dark hours of the night."

The Federal Court then proceeded to consider the question of the existence of actual malice on the part of the defendants and, concluding that there was none, dismissed the complaint with prejudice.

Appendix C

Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

In marked contrast to the logical and analytical treatment of this serious, and we believe determinative, Constitutional question by the Federal Court in the above case is the opinion of the Fort Worth Court, wherein that court, presented with the same argument, authorities and set of facts, took no apparent notice of the significant, recent holdings of the Supreme Court of the United States, but resurrected instead, as the basis for its summary disposal of the question, a 1929 Law Review article written by a tort professor on the subject of fair comment. The critical facts of which the Federal Court took judicial notice upon motion to dismiss were not noticed at all by the Fort Worth Court, though they were undisputed in the record before it. This signal failure of the Texas intermediate court to come to grips with a crucial and timely Constitutional question requires, we respectfully submit, that this Court grant the writ of error upon the basis of the undisputed facts and the authorities that now follow.

The Undisputed Evidence

Background of the Mississippi Crisis

On June 25, 1962, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, reversing the District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi, directed the lower court to issue an injunction compelling the admission of James H. Meredith, a Negro, into the University of Mississippi. Meredith v. Fair, 305 F. 2d 343. The history of that litigation is set out in some detail in the opinion by Judge Wisdom. On July 17 the mandate of the Circuit Court issued,

Appendix C
Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

and on July 18 Judge Cameron of that Court signed an order staying the execution and enforcement of the mandate. (Def. Ex. 3).

On July 27, 1962, the Fifth Circuit Court entered an order vacating the stay order theretofore signed by Judge Cameron, and recalling the mandate for the purpose of clarifying it by amending it to provide that the injunction be issued forthwith by the District Court compelling the immediate admission of Meredith to the University (Def. Ex. 3).

On September 10, 1962, Associate Justice Hugo L. Black of the Supreme Court of the United States entered an order which (1) vacated Judge Cameron's stay order of July 18, as well as subsequent stay orders of July 28, July 31, and August 6, 1962, by the same circuit judge, and (2) ordered that the school officials be enjoined from preventing the enforcement of the Fifth Circuit's mandate (Def. Ex. 4). On September 13, 1962, the District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi, pursuant to the mandate of the Fifth Circuit and the mandate of Mr. Justice Black, granted permanent injunction commanding the immediate admission of Meredith into the University and enjoining the school officials from interfering with his admission (Def. Ex. 5).

On September 28, 1962, the Fifth Circuit Court, sitting en banc, rendered a judgment holding Ross R. Barnett, the Governor of Mississippi, in civil contempt of that court, and in the judgment recited findings of fact to the effect (1) that since the issuance of the injunction on September 13,

Appendix C
Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

1962, Ross R. Barnett, as Governor of the State of Mississippi, had issued a series of proclamations calling upon all officials of the State to prevent and obstruct the carrying out of the court orders; (2) that on September 25, 1962, the Fifth Circuit Court had entered temporary restraining orders restraining Barnett from interfering with or obstructing the court's order and the injunction of the District Court; (3) that at approximately 4:30 P.M. on September 25, 1962, the said Barnett, having full knowledge of the Fifth Circuit Court's temporary restraining orders, had confronted Meredith when he sought to enter the office where he was to enroll, had deliberately prevented him from entering, and had told him that his application for enrollment was denied by Barnett; and (4) that on September 26, 1962, Meredith sought to enter the campus of the University of Mississippi at Oxford, where he was denied entry by the Lieutenant Governor of the State of Mississippi, acting pursuant to the instructions and under the authorization of Governor Barnett (Def. Ex. 6).

According to the plaintiff's testimony and that of his witnesses, Governor Barnett, despite the restraining orders and the contempt judgment, was continuing to oppose the entry of Meredith into the University at the time of the riot on the campus, and his instructions to that effect, directed to the local sheriffs and the Mississippi Highway Patrol, continued in force (S.F. 840-841). According to plaintiff's evidence, the orders of the Fifth Circuit and the actions of Governor Barnett in opposition thereto were widely discussed (S.F. 759) and were known to plaintiff (S.F. 760-762, 809-810), and the integration question was a subject of national interest and national controversy (S.F. 759).

Appendix C

Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

Background of General Walker

According to the testimony of the plaintiff: He is a graduate of the United States Military Academy (S.F. 730, 734), and, until his resignation from the Army in 1961, he was a career soldier, having risen to the rank of Major General (S.F. 734). In 1957 he commanded the federal troops that were called into Little Rock, Arkansas, by President Eisenhower to enforce the integration of the Little Rock High School, as ordered by the Federal Courts (S.F. 611, 739). In 1959 he was ordered to Germany to assume command of the 24th Infantry Division (S.F. 617). While in Germany he was involved in an incident that resulted in his receiving national publicity (S.F. 617). He was relieved of command, and an investigation was conducted, which resulted in neither charges nor punishment (S.F. 620). Thereafter, the Army wanted him to retire, but ininstead he resigned (S.F. 740). By resigning, instead of retiring, he forfeited benefits amounting to approximately $15,000 per year (S.F. 626, 740). His purpose in resigning, thereby losing his retirement benefits, was to be able to speak out on matters of public importance and to be free to say whatever he chose without any strings attached (S.F. 741). At the time of his resignation in the fall of 1961 he received considerable publicity concerning his resignation and the events leading up thereto (S.F. 743). He decided to speak and talk to people, and he expected to receive some kind of remuneration for his speaking engagements (S.F. 743).

Appendix C

Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

His first speech after leaving the Army was in Dallas in December, 1961, for which he received remuneration (S.F. 744, 745). Since then he has been making speeches all over the country and there is a constant demand on his time for speaking engagements (S.F. 745).

He has been a member of the John Birch Society since 1958 or 1959 (S.F.749). Since his resignation from the Army he has also done a good deal of writing, and he sells what he writes (S.F. 749). He and another person operate the American Eagle Publishing Company in Dallas, which has some 250 or 300 regular subscribers, and the publications are sent to others who plaintiff feels might be interested (S.F. 750-751). His followers include an organization known as "Friends of Walker" throughout the Nation, and some of these groups make financial contributions to him (S.F. 751-752).

In the spring of 1962 he announced his candidacy for Governor of Texas and made an extensive campaign, receiving broad press coverage concerning his ideologies and ideas about the governorship (S.F. 752-753). Although the news media does not always print everything he has to say, he has been able, basically, to get press conferences whenever he wanted them. (S.F. 758).

Appendix C

Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

General Walker and the Mississippi Crisis

(The Crisis Did Not Come to Him)

In the latter part of September, 1962, as it became apparent that a crisis was developing over the admission of Meredith to the University, General Walker began to move. From his home in Dallas on Wednesday, September 26, 1962, he issued over Radio Station KWKH at Shreveport, Louisiana, the following statement to the world at large:

> "It is time to move. We have talked, listened, and been pushed around far too much by the anti-Christ Supreme Court. Rise . . . to a stand beside Governor Ross Barnett at Jackson, Mississippi. Now is the time to be heard. Ten thousand strong from every State in the Union. Rally to the cause of freedom. The Battle Cry of the Republic. Barnett, Yes! Castro, No! Bring your flag, your tent, and your skillet. It's time. Now or never. The time is when and if the President of the United States commits or uses any troops, Federal or State, in Mississippi.
>
> "The last time—in such a situation—I was on the wrong side. That was in Little Rock, Arkansas in 1957 and 1958. This time I am out of uniform and I am on the right side. And I will be there." (S.F. 778-780; Def. Ex. 7).

His selection of the Shreveport station was no happenstance. Broadcasts from the station reached over into Mississippi. (S.F. 834).

Appendix C

Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

The next night, September 27, 1962, General Walker appeared on television at his home in Dallas and reiterated substantially the same statement as quoted above (S.F. 787). On that occasion, in addition to the prepared text the following colloquy occurred between General Walker and the interviewer:

Interviewer:

"General, if forces go, will you lead this force?"

General Walker:

"This is a cause for freedom. This is Americans, patriotic Americans, from all over the Nation. It is a movement for freedom. And I will be there. Rise to a stand beside Governor Barnett at Jackson, Mississippi. Now is the time to be heard. Thousands strong from every State in the Union. Rally to the cause of freedom." (S.F. 787-788)

The next evening, September 28, 1962, over Radio Station WNOE of New Orleans, Louisiana, he asserted that there is no law that requires integration (S.F. 801), and he reported that he had been swamped with telephone calls from persons offering help and assistance and notifying him that people were moving to Mississippi to assist in any way possible (S.F. 802). Asked if there was a particular point in Mississippi where all of his followers would meet he replied that he intended to join the movement, that there are thousands of people, probably hundreds of thousands, in Mississippi standing beside Governor Barnett, and that the best place to assemble would be at the Capitol at Jackson, or at the University of Mississippi in Oxford (S.F. 803).

The next day, September 29, 1962, with full knowledge that Governor Barnett by then had been held in contempt of the Fifth Circuit Court (S.F. 762), but was continuing his course of opposition to its mandate (S.F. 841), General Walker proceeded by private plane to Jackson, Mississippi, where he held another press and television conference at the Sun & Sands Motel*. There, over television for all to hear who cared to listen, he said:

> "I am in Mississippi—beside Governor Ross Barnett.
>
> "I call for a national protest against the conspiracy from within.
>
> "Rally to the cause of Freedom in righteous indignation, violent vocal protest and bitter silence under the Flag of Mississippi at the use of Federal troops.
>
> "This today is a disgrace to the Nation in 'Dire Peril'—a disgrace beyond the capacity of anyone except its enemies.
>
> "This is the conspiracy of the crucifixion by the anti-Christ conspirators of the Supreme Court in their denial of prayer and their betrayal of a Nation." (Def. Ex. 8, S.F. 789, 790)

*He was not staying at the motel, but went there to meet the press.

Appendix C
Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

At the same press conference he was asked if he had been in contact with Governor Barnett, and he replied that he had been in contact with the Governor's office and hoped to see the Governor while in Jackson (S.F. 790-791).

That afternoon, General Walker began to hear reports that Meredith was being moved into the campus that day, and that military forces were being committed (S.F. 640). He canceled his plans to attend a football game that night in Jackson (S.F. 640), and proceeded by automobile to Oxford, Mississippi, with his fan Louis Leman, where he was registered in a motel under the name John Waters after a midnight drive through the campus (S.F. 648-649).

The next day, Sunday September 30, 1962, he went to the Sheriff's office in Oxford and offered to assist the Sheriff in any way he could (S.W. 839). At that time he knew that the Sheriff was under the jurisdiction of the Governor (S.F. 840); that the Governor had used the police forces of the State, including the Sheriff, to prevent the entrance of Meredith into the University, and that the Governor had not changed his position (S.F. 841).

At lunch that day in downtown Oxford, several reporters asked him for a statement, and he finally agreed to hold a press conference late that afternoon at the Ole Miss Motel where the reporters were staying (S.F. 656). As fortune would have it, he happened to have lying around an old speech that he had prepared by 9 o'clock that morning (S.F. 849), and it suited the occasion perfectly. That afternoon he delivered it to the press conference. Short and to the point, he said:

"As the forces of the New Frontier assemble to the North, let history be witness to the courage and determination that calls us to Oxford to support a courageous Governor. His lawful stand for State Sovereignty is supported by thousands of people beyond the State borders now on the way to join you at Oxford." (Def. Ex. 11, S.F. 794).

Appendix C
Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

At the same press conference he learned that U. S. Marshals and Meredith were on the campus (S.F. 658, 865).

Thus, for several days down to and including the day of the riot, General Walker had been quite vocal in the press, and was anxious to get his message out to those who cared to listen (S.F. 833-834).

That evening, September 30, 1962, about 8 o'clock, he and Louis Leman ate dinner in a downtown Oxford cafe, where they listened to President Kennedy's speech (S.F. 850) in which the President announced that Meredith was in residence on the campus of the University, and called upon the people to preserve law and peace. The President also stated that he had federalized the Mississippi National Guard as the most appropriate instrument to preserve law and order, if needed, to back up the United States marshals (S.F. 868, et seq.). Upon the conclusion of the President's speech, General Walker's comment was "Nauseating, Nauseating" (S.F. 874), which expressed his feelings toward the Federal Administration (S.F. 875).

He had finished dinner and was leaving the restaurant with Leman when he heard that there was trouble on the campus (S.F. 663-664). He and Leman then drove to the campus (S.F. 664).

Appendix C
Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

The Riot

General Walker and Louis Leman arrived on the campus about 8:45 that evening (S.F. 446), at which time a loud, violent riot was in progress in an area of the campus that is known as the Circle (S.F. 162, 169, 192, 206, 294, 295, 297, 420, 477), sometimes inaccurately referred to in the testimony as the Grove (Actually, the Grove is another area that lies to the northeast of the Circle). To assist the Court in following the evidence, we have attached a plot plan of the area to this Application. It is a reduced partial reproduction of Plaintiff's Exhibit 11.

As may be seen from the plot plan, University Avenue enters the campus from the east and then divides to form encircling drives around the Circle. At the east end of the Circle is a Confederate Monument referred to throughout the testimony as the Monument or the Statue. At the west end of the Circle and across the drive is the Lyceum Building. It is the center or the headquarters of the University (S.F. 1391). Slightly west of the center of the Circle is the flagpole, and it forms the intersection of crosswalks that traverse the Circle in North-South and East-West directions. The distance from the monument to the Lyceum Building is approximately 525 feet. The flagpole is approximately 275 feet west of the monument on a direct line between it and the Lyceum Building. Proceeding clockwise from the Lyceum Building, and to the north of the Circle, are Peabody Hall, the Fine Arts Building, and the Y. M. C. A. Building. Moving counter-clockwise from the Lyceum Building, and to the south of the Circle, are the

Appendix C
Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

Chemistry Building, Carrier Hall (the Engineering Building), and Hume Hall (the Science Building), which was under construction at the time of the riot.

By approximately 4 o'clock that afternoon a ring of federal marshals had encircled the Lyceum Building (S.F. 151), where Justice Department officials and for a time the head of the Mississippi Highway Patrol, a Colonel Birdsong, were located (S.F. 1368). A crowd had assembled in the Circle area and began taunting and jeering the marshals. Mississippi Highway Patrolmen stood between the marshals and the crowd in the Circle until the riot started. By approximately 8 o'clock that evening a full scale riot had erupted which was to continue all night, destroy 16 automobiles, kill two people, injure 50, and result in the arrest of 160 persons, including the plaintiff (S.F. 228, 296, 1349, 1350, 714).

By all accounts, including General Walker's, the riot was serious and violent by the time he arrived, and it got worse as the night wore on. The rioters would form into groups and charge toward the marshals, throwing bricks, bottles, rocks, sticks, and other missiles before being repulsed by the tear gas (S.F. 158, 201, 488, 555, 1291). As described by plaintiff's witness Kuettner, it was a full scale riot and a dangerous situation. (S.F. 1278); the movement of the crowd was an ebb and flow kind of surging, accompanied by loud cursing and yelling (S.F. 1290). Newsmen were also a target of the crowd's wrath (S.F. 193). Later in the evening, the rioters attempted to charge the marshals with a fire truck and then with a bulldozer (S.F. 1283-1285), both of which attacks were without success. At one point, according to General Walker's own testimony, someone queried him as to how to combat the tear gas, and he advised to use sand (S.F. 919), but stated "Where would you get sand?" (S.F. 920). The rioters would hurl "Molotov cocktails" at the marshals (S.F. 1294). These were soft drink bottles filled with gasoline and equipped with burning fuses (S.F. 1294). Walker was in the vicinity of the Molotov cocktails (S.F. 363). The bricks, stones, and other missiles were, for the most part, obtained from construction materials at the site of the new Science Building southeast of the Circle (S.F. 1215). The charges toward the marshals would originate near the monument, close to the supply of ammunition, and would proceed west toward the marshals.

Finally, rifle fire erupted, and by the following morning there were some 7 to 10 bullet holes in the front of the Lyceum Building (S.F. 1352-1353). The next morning the campus looked like a battle field (S.F. 1296, 261, Def. Ex. 20, 21, 23, 24, 25, 28). Concrete benches in the Circle along the sidewalks had been broken and used as missiles (S.F. 295).

General Walker and Leman had left the car several blocks east of the Circle (S.F. 875) and walked down University Avenue in a westerly direction toward the monument (S.F. 876), arriving, as hereinabove stated, about 8:45 P.M. According to General Walker's own testimony, as he approached the Circle from the east, people were moving along the sidewalks and he said to them "Come on", and waved across the street to a group that recognized him (S.F. 878). By the time he reached the monument he began hearing students saying "We have a leader" (S.F. 882), and asking him "Will you lead us up to the steps; will you get us organized; will you lead us?"; and that was the predominant question on the campus at that time, according to General Walker (S.F. 883). About that same time he met a deputy sheriff named Talmage Witt and requested the sheriff to deputize him, but the sheriff refused (S.F. 885, 886). Witt, who appeared at the trial as a plaintiff's witness, is 5'-11" tall and weighs 275 pounds (S.F. 314), and fits the description of the "portly" man described in the story by defendant's reporter, Savell.

Appendix C

Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

Other evidence which occupies literally hundreds of pages of the Statement of Facts, and which will be discussed under subsequent points of error, conclusively establishes as a matter of law that, applying correct principles of Texas law, both the "command" and "charge" statements were substantially true and were fair comment. Generally, such evidence shows without dispute that upon his arrival at the scene of the riot General Walker was hailed by the rioters as their leader, that he delivered at least one speech to the rioters in which he told them that they had a right to continue protesting, and that he moved toward the federal marshals on one or more occasions surrounded by rioters. However, for the purpose of argument under this point of error, the truth or falsity of the statements is immaterial because the First and Fourteenth Amendment protection under the rule laid down in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 11 L. Ed. 2d 686, 84 S. Ct. 710, 95 A. L. R. 2d 1412, and Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64, 13 L. Ed. 2d 125, 85 S. Ct. ...., does not depend upon truth or falsity.

Appendix C
Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

Argument and Authorities

To be sure, the actual holding of the Times and Garrison cases applied to public officials, since the persons alleged to have been libeled in those cases were public officials. It is manifest, however, from the reasoning underlying the decisions that they cannot be so limited. Moreover, to so restrict the Times and Garrison rule would create constitutional anomalies of the most serious kind and would, indeed, engender the very dangers that the rule was intended to avoid.

The plaintiff's declared purpose on the night of the riot —September 30, 1962—was to stand shoulder to shoulder with Governor Barnett in opposing the orders of the courts. He was in Oxford to support the Governor's position, and he occupied the same position from the standpoint of the law of libel as Governor Barnett, whose cause he was publicly supporting.

It would be a constitutional anomaly having neither substance nor shadow of basis in reason to hold on the one hand that Governor Barnett is within the Times rule, which he clearly is, and yet to hold on the other hand that those who publicly rise to stand beside him, seeking with equal vigor and effect to rally public support for his cause, are not. Logically, the Constitutional protection, if it is to exist at all and have any fairness about it, must extend to the area of public debate and to those who participate in it.

Appendix C

Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

The question before this Court, then, is whether the Times and Garrison cases laid down a narrow, technical rule, strictly limited to public officials, as held by the trial court and apparently by the Court of Civil Appeals, or whether they announced a broad constitutional policy of real substance which applies to matters of serious public concern and to public men of political prominence who inject themselves into political controversies seeking to sway public opinion and gain public support for their cause, as held by the Federal Court in the Courier-Journal case.

A question of equal significance is whether the severe limitations upon the defenses of substantial truth and fair comment, as enunciated and applied by the court below, afford the safeguards for freedom of speech and press required by the Times and Garrison decisions.

In this argument we will show that the philosophy and reasoning underlying the Times and Garrison opinions, the holdings and statements by other courts that have considered the question subsequent to those decisions, and the great weight of comment by legal writers, clearly support the holding of the Federal Court in the Courier-Journal case; and that the restrictive interpretation of the defenses of substantial truth and fair comment as applied by the court below would, if permitted to stand, effectively inhibit and preclude the various news media from reporting, in good faith, events of profound national significance, thus creating a form of censorship through fear of libel actions that is the direct antithesis of the spirit and holding of the Times and Garrison cases.

Appendix C
Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

The touchstone of the Times and Garrison decisions was the Supreme Court's recognition of the existence and wisdom of our "profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open . . .", and the premise that it is the purpose and philosophy of the First Amendment to insure free and uninhibited exchange of ideas on issues of public importance, even though such a freedom, like others, will result in some abuses.

Quoting from Judge Learned Hand, the court in the Times case said that the First Amendment " 'presupposes that right conclusions are more likely to be gathered out of a multitude of tongues, than through any kind of authoritative selection. To many this is, and always will be, folly; but we have staked upon it our all.' " The court then quoted the "classic formulation" of the principle:

> " 'Those who won our independence believed . . . that public discussion is a political duty; and that this should be a fundamental principle of the American government. They recognized the risks to which all human institutions are subject. But they knew that order cannot be secured merely through fear of punishment for its infraction; that it is hazardous to discourage thought, hope and imagination; that fear breeds repression; that repression breeds hate; that hate menaces stable government; that the path of safety lies in the opportunity to discuss freely supposed grievances and proposed remedies; and that the fitting remedy for evil counsels > is good ones. Believing in the power of reason as applied through public discussion, they eschewed silence coerced by law—the argument of force in its worst form. Recognizing the occasional tyrannies of governing majorities, they amended the Constitution so that free speech and assembly should be guaranteed.' "

Appendix C
Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

Recognizing that "some degree of abuse is inseparable from the proper use of everything; and in no instance is this more true than that of the press," the court then quoted from an earlier opinion as follows:

> "In the realm of religious faith, and in that of political belief, sharp differences arise. In both fields the tenets of one man may seem the rankest error to his neighbor. To persuade others to his own point of view, the pleader, as we know, at times, resorts to exaggeration, to vilification of men who have been, or are, prominent in church or state, and even to false statement. But the people of this nation have ordained in the light of history, that in spite of the probability of excesses and abuses, these liberties are, in the long view, essential to enlightened opinion and right conduct on the part of the citizens of democracy."

In short, the holding of Times and Garrison is that, in the long run, freedom of expression on public matters is of overriding public importance regardless of the excesses and abuses that may occasionally result; and that the individual's claim for libel is pre-empted by the paramount public need for information on public issues.

Moreover, the court's heavy emphasis in the Times case on the opinion of the Kansas Supreme Court in Coleman v. MacLennan, 98 P. 281, leaves no doubt that the decision extends to all matters of great public concern. The court quoted with approval the following from the Supreme Court of Kansas:

> "In such a case the occasion gives rise to a privilege, qualified to this extent: any one claiming to be defamed by the communication must show actual malice or go remediless. This privilege extends to a great variety of subjects, and includes matters of public concern, public men, and candidates for office." 78 Kan. at 723. (Emphasis added)

In Pauling v. News Syndicate Co., 335 F. 2d 659 (2 Cir. 1964), an action for libel, the court said, as an alternative ground for its holding:

> "Although the public official is the strongest case for the constitutional compulsion of such a privilege, it is questionable whether in principle the decision can be so limited. A candidate for public office would seem an inevitable candidate for extension; if a newspaper cannot constitionally be held for defamation when it states without malice, but cannot prove, that an incumbent seeking re-election has accepted a bribe, it seems hard to justify holding it liable for further stating that the bribe was offered by his opponent. Once that extension was made, > the participant in public debate on an issue of grave public concern would be next in line; thus, as applied to the case in hand, if a newspaper could not be held for printing Dr. Pauling's charges that a member of the Atomic Energy Commission had 'made dishonest, untrue and misleading statements to mislead the American people' and that a United States Senator is 'the greatest enemy . . . the United States has,' as the New York Times case decided, one may wonder whether there would be sound basis for forcing it to risk a jury's determination that it was only engaging in fair criticism rather than misstating facts if it printed, falsely but without malice, that in saying all this Dr. Pauling was following the Communist line." (671)

In Gilberg v. Goffi, 251 NYS 2d 823, an action for libel, the rule of the Times case was applied to a mayor's law partner, who was neither an officeholder nor a candidate for office, but who had entered a public controversy as to whether a municipal code of ethics was needed to bar the mayor and his law firm from practicing law in the city court.

In Pearson v. Fairbanks Publishing Co., Inc. (Superior Court of Alaska, Fourth District, No. 10,209), the action was to recover damages for libel. The alleged libel was the charge that the plaintiff, a newspaper and radio columnist, was the "Garbage Man of the Fourth Estate." The court, in taking note of the Times decision and holding that the publication complained of was not actionable, said, in an opinion not yet published, that "Drew Pearson, a public figure and internationally known newspaper and radio columnist of no mean proportion, should occupy the same standing in the law of libel as Senator Gruening whose cause he was publicly supporting."

Appendix C

Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

In the case at bar, there can be no doubt that the question of school integration that came to a head in the Mississippi crisis was a matter of grave national controversy and concern. It was one of the most dominant and widely debated issues of this century. In the Times case, the Supreme Court referred to the integration question as "one of the major public issues of our time . . .", (at 701). This is also conclusively established in the record. The plaintiff was a national public political figure (S.F. 331, 486, 516) and a recent candidate for high public office. He knew that the question of integration was a matter of national controversy and interest (S.F. 759); he knew that his going to Mississippi would create considerable publicity (S.F. 922); he sought that publicity; he knew that there was an explosive situation on the campus and that feelings were high in Mississippi (S.F. 922); and that the Chief Executive of the State was openly obstructing the mandate of the Fifth Circuit Court. His repeated television and radio addresses called attention to himself and solicited support for the cause that he championed. That he deliberately and publicly became part and parcel of the controversy is not open to question.

If the Times decision applies at all to matters of public concern and participants in debate on public issues, it clearly applies to plaintiff and his conduct in Mississippi. The publications complained of in the case at bar were not mere gossip about the plaintiff in some private capacity. The defendant was reporting the crucial events at Oxford, and plaintiff's voluntary presence brought him within the area of national controversy.

If the Times rule were to be limited to public officials, a national press columnist or TV commentator could state falsely, but without malice, that a public official was a thief and clearly come within the ambit of the rule, but anyone who dared to enter the debate by publicly suggesting that the columnist or commentator was a liar in so stating, would be denied the same protection. This is scarcely wide-open debate. A defeated presidential candidate could spend the ensuing four years rallying public support by defamatory statements about the incumbent and enjoy the protection of the rule, but those who would criticize the challenger would have to do so without it.

The Court can well imagine other examples, such as labor leaders, political party leaders, campaign managers, national magazines, and countless others who wield broad public power and have wide public support for themselves and those that they champion, but who hold no public office. Surely it would be unthinkable to hold that utterances made about them are to enjoy less protection than the clamor that they are free to utter about public officials under the Times rule. If the people are to be free to criticize the Government and those who comprise it, they must be free to criticize the critics within the same latitude and under the same rule of law. To hold otherwise would create an imbalance of the freedom of expression and could conceivably result in an atmosphere in which an administration could be toppled by a rising Castro who, by virtue of holding no office, enjoyed freedoms of expression about the Government that were denied to those who would criticize him.

The repressing effect of a half million dollar award upon freedom of expression is so patent, the inhibiting effect upon the presentation of conflicting and controversial political argument so plain, and the punishment for such presentation so burdensome and oppressive that this Court may not, consistent with the First Amendment, permit its imposition. As the court said in the Times case:

> "Whether or not a newspaper can survive a succession of such judgments, the pall of fear and timidity imposed upon those who would give voice to public criticism is an atmosphere in which the First Amendment freedoms cannot survive."

Cf. Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U. S. 58 (1963); Marcus v. Search Warrant, 367 U. S. 717 (1961); Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U. S. 470 (1960); Speiser v. Randall, 357 U. S. 513 (1958).

In a comment at 19 Southwestern Law Journal 399, concerning the Times and Garrison cases, the author, discussing the scope of the protection afforded by those cases, concluded as follows:

> "Frequently, protection of statements made against controversial public figures is more important than protection of those made against public officials. Discussion concerning particular minor officials is much less significant than discussion concerning important public figures, such as corporation executives. Thus, protection of statements against all public officials, whatever the echelon, seems unnecessary, while protection of statements against some controversial public figures seems highly desirable. Thus, a rule strictly applicable only to defamation against public officials seems unwise. A more appropriate solution would be to apply the rule when the public interest in the dissemination of truth requires it, whether the individual is a public official or a private citizen. The public interest is the correct test, not the popularity or notoriety of the individual involved. The social utility in protecting statements made against popular entertainers would be very slight. On the other hand, there would seem to be a great utility in protecting statements made against labor leaders, who, though not so well known, are closely connected with governmental affairs." (407)

It would be difficult, if not impossible, to conceive of a matter in which the public would have a greater interest than in reports on the activities of a person, already politically prominent, who has taken to the airwaves and called for tens of thousands of persons to leave their homes and join him at a scene of civil disorder and crisis in a distant State, there to stand beside and assist another political leader who is openly defying the orders of the Federal Courts. There could be no possible reason or consistency whatever in holding that Governor Barnett is within the Times rule, but that one who rises to stand beside him is not. The object in either case is the same, the solicitation of public support is the same, the impact upon public opinion is the same, the potential influence and effect on the outcome of the controversy are the same, and consequently the interest of the public is the same. A distinction based merely upon the fact that the one holds office and the other does not would have no reason and would serve no purpose that can be imagined.

Similar comment by legal writers can be found in 9 Villanova Law Review 534, 537; 48 Marquette Law Review 128, 133; 10 New York Law Forum 249; 42 Texas Law Review 1080, 1084; 16 Syracuse Law Review 132, 135; 26 Montana Law Review 110, 115; 39 Tulane Law Review 355, 362; and 49 Cornell Law Quarterly 581.*

It is beyond dispute that General Walker publicly summoned his followers to journey to Oxford, with their flags, tents and skillets, to record their opposition to and demonstrate against federal authority; that in the very shadow of the Mississippi State capitol, he announced, at a nationally televised press conference, that he was in Mississippi to stand "beside Governor Ross Barnett" in his defiance of the President and the Federal Courts; that he thereafter arrived at the "Ole Miss" campus at a time when violent rioting was already in progress;

*We suggest that legal commentary written after the Times and Garrison decisions is more profitable reading in considering the question at hand than the article relied on by the Court of Civil Appeals, which pre-dated those decisions by over a third of a century.

that, upon his arrival, General Walker was hailed by the rioters as their "leader"; that he condemned an Episcopal minister for trying to persuade the rioters to disperse; that he gave advice to the rioters on how to combat the tear gas which the federal marshals had used to defend themselves; that he delivered a speech to the rioters in which he told them, by his own admission, that they had a right to protest and that they should continue to protest —this at a time when he had personally observed scores of rioters throwing rocks and bricks at the federal marshals; that he had approached the Lyceum Building—where federal marshals were defending themselves—surrounded by rioters (See pp. 50-77, infra).

If, upon these facts and the hysteria and confusion surrounding the event, a news medium cannot, without risk of a $500,000 libel judgment, report that General Walker "assumed command" of the crowd and "led a charge" on the Lyceum Building, then the Constitutional freedoms contained in the First and Fourteenth Amendments are rendered virtually meaningless; for, if such reporting, in good faith, is not to be protected by the defenses of substantial truth or fair comment, or both, then a news medium's only prudent recourse is to refrain altogether from reporting significant, news-worthy events, even those which arrest the attention of the entire nation.

Plainly, the holding below constitutes a substantial encroachment upon freedom of speech and consequent freedom of debate on the many issues posed by events such as those which occurred at Oxford.

It is no answer to any of the foregoing to assert, as does the plaintiff (and, apparently, the court below), that a reporter need have no fears if he reports only the "facts". In the pressure of events and the time limitations inherent in the transmission of news, it would manifestly be impractical—even if possible—to report a myriad of "facts", as contrasted with conclusions of fact based on the rapidly unfolding panorama of events and sensations.

Even assuming that a reporter, in the heat and confusion of the moment, could comprehend and apply a distinction difficult of application even for trained lawyers and judges in an atmosphere far removed from the events themselves, imposition of such restrictions and limitations would virtually prohibit the reporting of the event itself. It is like saying that the A.P. can report the detailed events of a battle—so long as it makes no errors—but if it transmits the conclusion of fact that the battle was lost, it does so only at the risk of suits by the Commanding General.

It is of great national interest and significance—for many reasons—that a former General Officer in the United States Army, the Commander of the troops at Little Rock, and one who had but recently campaigned for high public office, had publicly called upon his fellow citizens to register their defiance of Federal authority and had thereafter, at least apparently, participated in and encouraged violent acts of defiance themselves. If the ostensible activities of General Walker in this situation can be "blacked out" or censored through application of the law of libel, coupled with a restrictive interpretation of the defenses of substantial truth and fair comment, then the unconstitutionally inhibiting effects of the libel laws upon news media, and upon freedom of speech and press generally, are self-evident. It would be impossible, in reporting a riot, to distinguish with precision those persons who were moving toward the objective in a charge from those who were moving toward the objective just to "watch what happened," particularly where, as in this case, both movements appeared identical and charges of that very kind were occurring all night and were the rule, not the exception.

It is significant that, outlining the scope of the "fair comment" defense in Texas, the starting point of the Fort Worth Court's analysis was the proposition that a charge, made in good faith and without malice, that a public official is guilty of a crime is actionable under the libel laws. (Opin. pp. 13-14). Thus, the very keystone of that court's opinion is in direct and irreconcilable conflict with the holding in Times and Garrison.

Nor is it wholly without significance that the defense of "fair comment" which was raised in the Times case appears to have been substantially identical to that enunciated by the Court of Civil Appeals here. See New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, supra., p. 267.

Where, as here, the defense of "fair comment" is so truncated as to make it, in the adopted words of the court below, a "weak defense" . . . "subject to so many limitations that it is seldom completely applicable," and where, as here, such limitations are invoked to impose a liability of half a million dollars for reporting in good faith the facts as they appeared to be, it becomes obvious that the libel laws are here being used to achieve a result which the Federal Constitution prohibits.

Under the rule of the Times and Garrison cases, the constitutional protection can be denied only upon a showing of actual malice, i.e., a showing that the statement was made with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not. As correctly held by both courts below, there is no evidence of malice in the case at bar. Indeed, the trial court, by written opinion, expressly recognized that since there was no actual malice the rule of the Times case, if applicable, would require that judgment be rendered for the defendant (Supp. Tr.) The trial court's error was in holding that the rule of the Times case was limited to public officials. Since the Times case cannot be so limited, and since there was no evidence of actual malice, judgment should now be rendered for defendant.

Appendix C
Application for Writ of Error of Petitioner The Associated Press in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-46

APPENDIX C

Motion of Petitioner The Associated Press for Rehearing in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-2

No. A-11069

IN THE

SUPREME COURT OF TEXAS

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,
Petitioner

vs.

EDWIN A. WALKER,
Respondent

PETITIONER'S MOTION FOR REHEARING ON APPLICATION FOR WRIT OF ERROR

TO THE HONORABLE SUPREME COURT OF TEXAS:

Petitioner, The Associated Press, respectfully submits this Motion for rehearing and reconsideration of its Application for Writ of Error heretofore filed herein, and which was refused, no reversible error, by this Court on February 9, 1966, and as grounds therefor respectfully shows as follows:

Appendix C

Motion of Petitioner The Associated Press for Rehearing in the Supreme Court of Texas, pp. 1-2

1.

This Court erred in overruling Petitioner's First Point of Error, which reads as follows:

> "The news reports here involved, made without malice, concerning matters of grave national concern, are protected from the claim of libel by the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and the judgment herein therefore abridges defendant's rights thereunder; and the Court of Civil Appeals erred in holding to the contrary."

because the publications here in question are privileged and protected under the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States as interpreted in the cases of New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 11 L. Ed. 2d 686, 84 S. Ct. 710, 95 A. L. R. 2d 1412, and Garrison v Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64, 13 L. Ed. 2d 125, 85 S. Ct.

* * *

APPENDIX D

Judgment of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
16624
vs.
EDWIN A. WALKER

(No. 31,741-C)
July 30, 1965

From the District Court of Tarrant County.

Opinion Per Curiam.

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record and the same having been reviewed, it is the opinion of the Court that there was no error in the judgment. It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that the judgment of the trial court in this cause be and it is hereby affirmed.

It is further ordered that appellee, Edwin A. Walker, do have and recover of and from appellant, The Associated Press, and its surety on its supersedeas bond, Houston Fire and Casualty Insurance Company, the amount adjudged below, with interest thereon at the rate of six per cent per annum from August 3, 1965, together with all costs in this behalf expended, both in this Court and in the trial court, for which let execution issue, and that this decision be certified below for observance.

Appendix D

Judgment of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
17887-16624
vs.
EDWIN A. WALKER

September 17, 1965

This day came on to be heard the motion by appellant for a rehearing in this cause and said motion having been duly considered by the Court is hereby overruled.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
17888-16624
vs.
EDWIN A. WALKER

September 17, 1965

This day came on to be heard the motion by appellees (sic) for a rehearing in this cause and said motion having been duly considered by the Court is hereby overruled.

Appendix D

Judgment of the Supreme Court of Texas

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF TEXAS

No. A-11,069
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
vs.
EDWIN A. WALKER

February 9, 1966

From Tarrant County, Second District.

Application of The Associated Press, as well as the conditional application of Edwin A. Walker, for writs of error to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Second Supreme Judicial District having been duly considered, and the Court having determined that same present no error requiring reversal of the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals, it is ordered that said applications be, and hereby are, refused.

It is further ordered that applicant, The Associated Press, and its surety, Houston Fire & Casualty Insurance Company, and applicant, Edwin A. Walker, each pay all costs incurred on their respective applications for writs of error.

Appendix D

Judgment of the Supreme Court of Texas

No. A-11,069
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
vs.
EDWIN A. WALKER

March 23, 1966

From Tarrant County, Second District.

Motion of The Associated Press for rehearing of its application for writ of error having been duly considered, it is ordered that such motion be, and hereby is, overruled.

APPENDIX E

Conflicting Opinions

1. Walker v. Courier-Journal and Louisville Times Co., 246 F. Supp. 231 (W. D. Ky., 1965)

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
WESTERN DISTRICT OF KENTUCKY
LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY

EDWIN A. WALKER Plaintiff vs. COURIER-JOURNAL AND LOUISVILLE TIMES COMPANY, INC. WHAS, INC. Defendants	Civil Action No. 4639

OPINION

This cause comes on before the Court on the Defendants' Motion to Dismiss the Plaintiff's Complaint, as amended.

On September 30, 1963, the Plaintiff, Edwin A. Walker, a former Army Major General, filed this action for actual and punitive damages for libel in the sum of Two Million Dollars, against the Defendants, Courier-Journal and Louisville Times Company and WHAS, Inc., Kentucky corporations, with their principal places of business in Louisville, Kentucky. Jurisdiction of the Court over this action is fixed by USC Title 28, Paragraph 1332.

Appendix E

Walker v. Courier-Journal and Louisville Times Co.

The Defendant corporations, on October 1, 1962, October 2, 1962 and October 3, 1962, published in their newspapers and/or broadcast over their radio and television facilities, various news items or stories concerning the rioting on the campus of the University of Mississippi, in the City of Oxford, Mississippi, which said published matter had been received by Defendants from national news gathering agencies to which Defendants were subscribers.

The news items or stories so published and complained of by the Plaintiff stated in substance, that the Plaintiff, Walker, had led a charge of rioters against United States Marshals who were present on the University of Mississippi campus carrying out the orders of the United States Courts requiring integration of enrollment of whites and negroes at said University. Plaintiff, Walker, alleged that such items imputed to him that he was a "trouble maker", that he was "participating" in the occurrences taking place in Oxford, all in the context used of inciting of the students to riot, and that the publication reflected libelously on the honor, character and reputation of the Plaintiff.

This Court has considered the briefs and memoranda submitted by counsel for the parties and taking judicial notice of the public events relating thereto which were widely reported throughout the Nation and are matters of common knowledge, and further treating as true (for the purpose of passing upon this Motion to Dismiss) the factual allegations of the Complaint, as amended, arrives at the following conclusions which are the basis of its final Order entered herein.

Following the filing of this action the Supreme Court of the United States handed down its Opinion in New York Times Company v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254 (October Term, 1963) wherein said Court in legal effect federally pre-empted the law of libel in matters of "grave national concern" involving "public officials" with the announced doctrine that

> ". . . . Constitutional guarantees require, we think, a Federal rule that prohibits a public official from recovering damages for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves that the statement was made with 'actual malice'—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was or not."

There can be no question but that the serious occurrences at the University of Mississippi wherein the State of Mississippi and the Federal Govenment were locked in conflict as to the educational integration of the races was a matter of "grave national concern." The Supreme Court of the United States has classified the integration struggle as "one of the major political issues of our time."

Thus, it can be seen that had the Plaintiff, Walker, been a "public official" at the time of this occurrence, this Court's task would have been automatically relegated to a decision only of the one issue of whether or not the Defendants herein had published the statements attributed to them with "actual malice", that is, with knowledge that the statements were false or with reckless disregard of whether or not they were false.

However, the matter is not so simple, for this Court notes with significance that in laying down the doctrine of "actual malice" in the Times case, the Supreme Court quoted with approval from the case of Coleman v. McLennan, 78 Kans. 711, 98 P. 281 (1908) as follows:

> "This privilege extends to a great variety of subjects and includes matters of public concern, public men and candidates for office." (Emphasis added)

and in conclusion the Court stated:

> "We hold today that the Constitution delimits a State's power to award damages for libel in actions brought by public officials against critics of their official conduct. Since this is such an action, the rule requiring proof of actual malice is applicable." (Page 283)

In connection with the last above quoted language, the Supreme Court included a footnote to its Opinion (Footnote 23) in part, as follows:

> "We have no occasion here . . . to specify categories of persons who would or would not be included."

From this language I believe the Supreme Court of the United States has served clear notice that the broad Constitutional protections afforded by the First and Fourteenth Amendments will not be limited to "public officials" only, for to have any meaning the protections must be extended to other categories of individuals or persons involved in the area of public debate or who have become involved in matters of public concern. If the Supreme Court intended to limit its holdings to "public officials" only, then why Footnote 23? I subscribe that Footnote 23 is of vast importance in understanding the intended scope of the Supreme Court's Opinion, for it is a departure from the Court's traditional rule of basing its decision on the narrowest Constitutional grounds and is interpreted by this Court as giving special significance to the broad language adopted in arriving at its decision.

The Plaintiff, Walker, is of course not a "public official" within the commonly accepted meaning of the words. However, he was, as he identifies himself in his own Complaint, a person of "political prominence." This Court takes judicial notice that Plaintiff Walker's public life is generally well known to the people of this Nation, that he was the subject of nationwide news reports while on duty as an Army General and also as a candidate for Governor of Texas, and that he has in the past made vigorous public announcements on matters of public concern. Plaintiff was, by his own choosing, present in Oxford, Mississippi, on the occasion of the turmoil after announcing on radio and television his intention to be present there and having called upon others to join with him there in support of his publicly stated position on the matters of public concern there in issue.

Had not Plaintiff thereby become a "public man"? Could he not have reasonably foreseen that his being a person of "political prominence" his presence in Oxford would be taken cognizance of by the press? Had not Walker interwoven his personal status into that of a public one whereby he would become the subject of substantial press, radio and television news comment; thus magnifying the chance that his activities would be "erroneously" reported? This Court so believes.

I therefore reach the inescapable conclusion that the protective "public official" doctrine of "actual malice" announced in Sullivan v. New York Times is in common reason and should be applicable to a "public man" as well, and that the Plaintiff, Walker, was such a "public man" under the circumstances involved here. "Public men are, as it were, public property."

My application of the doctrine of New York Times v. Sullivan to the facts herein issue finds authority not only in the logical dictates of Footnote 23 discussed above, but in the reasoning and philosophy underlying the Times Opinion and in the critical discussion in legal commentaries and recent decisions of other courts. The decision of Judge Friendly in Pauling v. News Syndicate Company, 335 F. 2d 659 at 671 (2d Cir. 1964), favorably presages the result here. See also Gilberg v. Goff, 251 N. Y. S. 2d 823 (1964); Pearson v. Fairbanks Publishing Co. (Unreported, Superior Ct. of Alaska, 4th District, Nov. 25, 1964); and Pedrick, Freedom of the Press and the Law of Libel, 49 Cornell L. Q. 581, at 592 (1964); 9 Vill. L. Rev. 534 (1964).

I adopt this position with full understanding of the fact that by such extension of the scope of word meaning I am perhaps "plowing new ground" in legal effect, but also with the accompanying conviction that not to do so would negate the spirit of the Times Opinion which I believe to be a ". . . . profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust and wide open. . . ." Public debate cannot be "uninhibited, robust and wide open" if the news media are compelled to stand legally in awe of error in reporting the words, and actions of persons of national prominence and influence (not "public officials") who are nevertheless voluntarily injecting themselves into matters of grave public concern attempting thereby through use of their leadership and influence, to mold public thought and opinion to their own way of thinking. If any person seeks the "spotlight" of the stage of public prominence then he must be prepared to accept the errors of the searching beams of the glow thereof, for only in such rays can the public know what role he plays on the stage of public concern—often, regretfully, a stage torn in the turmoil of riot and civil disorder, whereon error in reported occurrence is more apt to become the rule rather than the exception.

This is particularly so here where open riot and turmoil with accompanyiig destruction of property, injuries and death turned portions of the University of Mississippi campus into a strife beset no man's land through the dark hours of the night.

Therefore, having applied the doctrine of the Times case to this action, this Court moves on to a consideration of this record, upon the sole remaining question: whether or not these defendants have been guilty of "actual malice" in their publications of data furnished them by national news gathering agencies.

Plaintiff, Walker, is bound to show that the defamatory falsehoods relied upon were not just that "erroneous statement. . . . inevitable in free debate" noted by Justice Brennan, New York Times v. Sullivan, supra at 271-272) but that they were made with knowledge that they were false or with a reckless disregard of their falsity. The question of the existence of actual malice from the facts taken as true is a matter of law to be determined by the Court.

An examination of the record reflects that the information published by Defendants was furnished to them by national news gathering agencies to which they subscribed and was furnished in the ordinary course of news dissemination and published routinely by defendants in the ordinary course of their business endeavors—the dissemination of news to the general public.

Everyone knows that news of any matter of public concern possesses a limited lifetime for to be news it must be published with promptness and dispatch in order that the public be kept informed as to the actions of "public men" and their activities in connection with "matters of public concern." There is just no such thing as interesting and saleable old news.

This Court is of the opinion that the Defendants had the right to rely upon the reputable national news sources which furnished them the news items in issue here, and further that the republication of those items by the Defendants, with the errors therein, within the time limits and under the circumstances (ordinary course of dissemination) was not unreasonable. Defendants, in their newspaper and radio and television publications, could not be deemed in reasonableness by the Plaintiff or the public to be warranting the authenticity of the republication of events transpiring from places far distant, nor to be assuming the burden of verifying in advance the items reported to them from an atmosphere of violence and turmoil by established news gathering agencies, while at the same time meeting the public need and demand for prompt publication and dissemination of news on matters of "public concern."

We must have an informed society. The reliance upon or republications by defendants of the reports of national news gathering agencies as here occurred is, in this Court's opinion, insufficient to establish a "reckless" disregard of the facts, or knowledge of falsity, now Constitutionally necessary to support an action for libel of the kind stated herein.

Indeed, the Plaintiff's very actions have established the facts negativing that "actual malice" which is required to sustain his action. This Court cannot be deemed not to know that which is known widely and generally to the public at large.

This Plaintiff has filed actions, seeking recovery for libels substantially similar to those alleged here, against the Associated Press in Texas, Colorado, Louisiana and Mississippi; against newspapers in Texas, Louisiana, Georgia, Florida, Missouri, Colorado and Wisconsin; and against Newsweek Magazine in Oklahoma.

Furthermore, the news stories complained of were furnished by national news gathering agencies to, and republished by, the principal newspapers, news magazines and radio and television stations throughout the United States.

In addition to the Court's judicial notice, the geographical scope and number of Plaintiff's suits and the virtual universality of the publication of the stories complained of, is proof positive of the extensive republication by news sources throughout the Country of the releases challenged here.

These facts clearly negative the possible attribution of "actual malice" to any single publisher.

If, possession of contrary information in the New York Times' own files would support "at most a finding of negligence in failing to discover the misstatements, and is Constitutionally insufficient to show the recklessness that is required for a finding of actual malice", I can conceive of no basis for a finding of actual malice in the reliance upon and republication of news reports supplied here by reputable news gathering agencies. At most, such reliance could only be that "Constitutionally insufficient" negligence referred to by the Court. New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 US 254, at 287-288, 84 S. Ct. 710. Consistent with the later statement of the Supreme Court in Garrison v. State of Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64, 85 S. Ct. 209, 13 L. Ed.2d 125 at 133 (1964), I find that under the facts alleged here the statements in issue cannot have been "made with the high degree of awareness of their probable falsity demanded by New York Times."

Accordingly, it is this Court's opinion that the doctrine proclaimed by the New York Times case is dispositive of all the issues here presented and, therefore, Defendants' Motion to Dismiss is sustained and the Plaintiff's Complaint is dismissed with prejudice, by separate Order contemporaneously issued herewith.

September 23, 1965.

JAMES F. GORDON
James F. Gordon, Judge
United States District Court

For the Plaintiff:

Mr. Richard C. Oldham
Mr. Clinton R. Burroughs
312 S. Fifth Street
Louisville, Kentucky-40202

For the Defendants:

Mr. Wilson W. Wyatt
Mr. Edgar A. Zingman
M. E. Taylor Building
Louisville, Kentucky-40202

APPENDIX E

2. Pauling v. National Review, Inc.
(Not yet reported)

SUPREME COURT
NEW YORK COUNTY
SPECIAL AND TRIAL TERM—PART X
(Feb. Term, Cont'd.)

LINUS C. PAULING,

Plaintiff,

—against—

NATIONAL REVIEW, INC., WILLIAM A. RUSHER, and WILLIAM F. BUCKLEY, JR.,

Defendants.

SILVERMAN, J.:

This is a motion to dismiss the complaint at the close of the plaintiff's case in the trial of an action for libel.

Plaintiff, Dr. Linus C. Pauling, is a world famous scientist, winner of a Nobel Prize for chemistry and of a Nobel Peace Prize. Defendants are the corporate owner, and the individual publisher and editor of a fortnightly magazine called National Review.

There are two causes of action based on two articles, one in the National Review of July 17, 1962 and one in the issue of September 25, 1962.

The first article says, among other things:

> "The Collaborators
>
> What are we going to do about those of our fellow citizens who persist in a course of collaboration with the enemy who has sworn to bury us?
>
> * * *

Appendix E
Pauling v. National Review, Inc.

"Take, second, Professor Linus Pauling of the California Institute of Technology, once more acting as megaphone for Soviet policy by touting the World Peace Conference that the Communists have called for this summer in Moscow, just as year after year since time immemorial he has given his name, energy, voice and pen to one after another Soviet-serving enterprise. Or * * * Or * * * who a couple of months ago, along with Linus Pauling and a dozen others, attached their signatures to one more in a decades-long series of Communist-aiding fronts: this time, an Open Letter not only calling for the liquidation of South Vietnam's President Ngo Dinh Diem but condemning the presence of American personnel in that country as imperialist aggression (hence, by implication, more than justifying the Vietcong for killing Americans).

"Are such persons Communists? Some such undoubtedly are, but there is not publicly at hand the full proof, of the kind demanded by the courts, that they are Communists in the total, deliberate, disciplined organizational sense. But whether they are Communists are not in the legal sense, the objective fact is that these persons we have named, and many others like them, have given aid and comfort to the enemies of this country. They have done so not once or twice, by what might have been a special impulse, quirk or personal attachment, but time and again, over a period of years and decades; and some of these acts are saved from falling under the constitutional definition of treason only by the historical chance that our government has not yet decided to give direct legal recognition to the fact that our present enemies are our enemies, and that we are at war.

"

"So we repeat: what are we going to do about these people? If it is proper that for the time being they should be immune from legal sanction, does it also follow that they should continue to receive public respect, honor and rewards?

* * *

"This soft and complacent public attitude toward the collaborators amounts, at bottom, to a general collusion in the sabotage of the nation's will, and in the moral nihilism that their actions express. If our standards have so far dissolved that there is no longer anyone on whom we will turn our backs, then we as a people are ready for suicide."

The second article sued on reads, in part, as follows:

"Are You Being Sued
By Linus Pauling?

We are (or so his lawyer tells us). And so are other well-behaved papers and people throughout the country.

* * *

"Dr. Pauling is chasing after all kinds of people, even the formidable Sam Newhouse, owner of twenty-odd daily newspapers. His victory signal is the check or two he has wrested from publishers—who may indeed have libeled him, in which case they should pay up; but who may simply have been too pusillanimous to fight back against what some will view as brazen attempts at intimidation of the free press by one of the nation's leading fellow-travelers."

Appendix E

Pauling v. National Review, Inc.

Approximately a year and a half after this suit was instituted, the United States Supreme Court in New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254 (1964) enunciated a new doctrine in the law of libel, as affected by the First Amendment. And the critical question on the present motion is whether that doctrine should be extended to apply to the present case, and, if so, whether plaintiff has proved a prima facie case under that doctrine.

In New York Times v. Sullivan, supra, the Supreme Court held that:

> "The constitutional guarantees [of the First and Fourteenth Amendments] require, we think, a federal rule that prohibits a public official from recovering damages for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves that the statement was made with 'actual malice'—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not." (376 U. S. at p. 279.)

Plaintiff is not a public official, and so the first question is whether New York Times v. Sullivan has any applicability to his case at all. The Supreme Court has certainly not excluded that possibility. In the New York Times case it said (376 U. S. at 283, Fn. 23):

> "We have no occasion here to determine how far down into the lower ranks of government employees the 'public official' designation would extend for purposes of this rule, or otherwise to specify categories of persons who would or would not be included" (Italics added).

Appendix E
Pauling v. National Review, Inc.

In its last pronouncement on the point, the Supreme Court said:

> "We are treating here only the element of public position, since that is all that has been argued and briefed. We intimate no view whatever whether there are other bases for applying the New York Times standards—for example, that in a particular case the interests in reputation are relatively insubstantial, because the subject of discussion has thrust himself into the vortex of the discussion of a question of pressing public concern. Cf. Salinger v. Cowles, 195 Iowa 873, 889, 191 N. W. 167, 173-174 (1922); Peck v. Coos Bay Times Publishing Co., 122 Ore. 408, 420-421, 259 P. 307, 311-312 (1927); Coleman v. MacLennan, 78 Kan. 711, 723-724, 98 P. 281, 285-286 (1908); Pauling v. News Syndicate Co., 335 F. 2d 659, 671 (C. A. 2d Cir. 1965)." Rosenblatt v. Baer, decided February 21, 1966, Fn. 12 to Opinion of Brennan, J., 86 S. Ct. 669, 676.

The underlying policy adopted by the Supreme Court in the New York Times case would seem to favor extending the doctrine of that case at least to a private person who "has thrust himself into the vortex of the discussion of a question of pressing public concern".

In Rosenblatt v. Baer (supra), Mr. Justice Brennan, speaking for the court, said:

> "The motivating force for the decision in New York Times was twofold. We expressed 'a profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-> open and that [such debate] may well include vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials.' 376 U. S., at 270. (Emphasis supplied.) There is, first, a strong interest in debate on public issues, and, second, a strong interest in debate about those persons who are in a position significantly to influence the resolution of those issues. * * * (86 S.Ct. at 675)

>
> * * *
>
> "Society has a pervasive and strong interest in preventing and redressing attacks upon reputation. But in cases like the present, there is tension between this interest and the values nurtured by the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The thrust of New York Times is that when interests in public discussion are particularly strong, as they were in that case, the Constitution limits the protections afforded by the law of defamation. * * *" (86 S.Ct. at 676)

In determining the relative importance and protection to be given to the interest in public discussion, on the one hand, and the safeguarding of individual reputation on the other, the Supreme Court, in the New York Times case, has shifted the balance sharply in favor of the freedom of public discussion. Logically, of course, limitations on the law of libel as a protection of public persons may discourage private persons (viewed as possible libel plaintiffs) from speaking out on issues when to do so may expose them to attacks on their own reputation. But, conversely, viewing these speakers as possible defendants in libel suits, such limitations may encourage them to speak out. And the Supreme Court apparently believes that the latter consideration outweighs the former. In New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. at 271, the Court quoted with approval the following from Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U. S. 296, 310:

> "In the realm of religious faith, and in that of political belief, sharp differences arise. In both fields the tenets of one man may seem the rankest error to his neighbor. To persuade others to his own point of view, the pleader, as we know, at times, resorts to exaggeration, to vilification of men who have been, or are, prominent in church or state, and even to false statement. But the people of this nation have ordained in the light of history, that, in spite of the probability of excesses and abuses, these liberties are, in the long view, essential to enlightened opinion and right conduct on the part of the citizens of a democracy."

In Gilberg v. Goffi, 21 A D 2d 517, 527 (1964), affirmed 15 N Y 2d 1023 (1965), the Appellate Division, Second Department, applying New York Times v. Sullivan, said:

> "Within the periphery of the new body of case law, we hold, on a balancing of interests, that democratic government is best served when citizens, and especially public officials and those who aspire to public office, may freely speak out on questions of public concern, even if thereby some individual be wrongly calumniated * * * ."

The Supreme Court, in the New York Times case, quoted Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U. S. 250, 263, that

Appendix E
Pauling v. National Review, Inc.

"public men, are, as it were, public property" (376 U. S. 268).

Again, referring to the risk of successive libel judgments against a newspaper, the Court said, at 376 U. S. 278:

> "Whether or not a newspaper can survive a succession of such judgments, the pall of fear and timidity imposed upon those who would give voice to public criticism is an atmosphere in which the First Amendment freedoms cannot survive.".

These considerations, stated by the Court with reference to public officials, would seem to be equally applicable to a private person who publicly, prominently, actively, and as a leader, thrusts himself (however properly) into a public discussion of public and exceedingly controversial questions.

In Gilberg v. Goffi, 21 A D 2d 517 (1964), affirmed 15 N Y 2d 1023 (1965), the New York State courts applied the New York Times doctrine to a law partner of the mayor of a city, who sued a rival candidate for mayor, for libel, when the latter said that the mayor's law firm (of which plaintiff was, of course, a partner) was practicing law under conditions which showed a conflict of interest. The Court said that, although plaintiff was not a public official, "plaintiff's action is so closely related to criticism of a public official that the Times case is determinative" (21 A D 2d at 520). Cases in other jurisdictions have applied the New York Times doctrine to private persons who actively engage in a public controversy. (See, e.g., Walker v. Courier-Journal, 246 F. Supp. 231 [W. D. Ky. 1965].)

Finally, the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit has indicated very strongly its view that Dr. Pauling is a person to whom the rule of New York Times

v. Sullivan should apply. In Pauling v. News Syndicate Company, 335 F. 2d 659, 671 (C. A. 2, 1964), the Court said, with reference to the doctrine of the New York Times case:

> "Although the public official is the strongest case for the constitutional compulsion of such a privilege, it is questionable whether in principle the decision can be so limited. A candidate for public office would seem an inevitable candidate for extension; * * * . Once that extension was made, the participant in public debate on an issue of grave public concern would be next in line; thus, as applied to the case in hand, if a newspaper could not be held for printing Dr. Pauling's charges that a member of the Atomic Energy Commission had 'made dishonest, untrue and misleading statements to mislead the American people' and that a United States Senator is 'the greatest enemy * * * the United States has,' as the New York Times case decided, one may wonder whether there would be sound basis for forcing it to risk a jury's determination that it was only engaging in fair criticism rather than misstating facts if it printed, falsely but without malice, that in saying all this Dr. Pauling was following the Communist line."

In the case at bar, Dr. Pauling testified that after he read the Smythe Report on atomic energy, about 1946, he became greatly concerned about the destructive effects on our civilization of a possible nuclear war. He began to accept invitations as a speaker on this subject; he became interested in educating his fellow Americans as to this danger; he further testified that this has been a dominating interest with him for over twenty years and, during that period, he has given some 750 addresses, lectures, talks, etc., with respect to atomic weapons, the need to control them, the need to prevent war, and the need for settling disputes by international law. He has traveled about the world and spoken on these subjects. He has pressed his views on heads of state, ambassadors, and other public officials. His efforts have gained him such prominence in this field that he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. By the same token, however, he has from time to time found himself—as was his right as a citizen—in public and active opposition to persons and policies that he deemed inconsistent with his views; and quite frequently his publicly-expressed views on many questions—not merely those relating to his efforts for world peace—have been contrary to those expressed by the more conservative or right-wing elements in this country. On June 8, 1962, he had joined in a call for a World Peace Conference to be held in Moscow that summer. A few months earlier he had joined in "An Open Letter to President John F. Kennedy against U. S. military intervention in South Vietnam", which letter was published as a paid advertisement in the New York Times.

The matters he has discussed are, of course, matters of the gravest and most widespread public importance; they concern the foreign policy of the United States, the military operations now going on, and the future of civilization itself. And at each step there have been many who disagree with Dr. Pauling.

It is clear that if any private citizen has, by his conduct, made himself a public figure engaged voluntarily in public discussion of matters of grave public concern and controversy, Dr. Pauling has done so.

Finally, the criticisms made of him in the alleged libelous articles are not criticisms of his private life; they are criticisms of his public conduct and of the motives for that public conduct. This applies even to the intimation in the second article that by his libel suits he is attempting to intimidate the press; for the freedom of public discussion is itself a public issue and one that is properly a subject of public discussion.

Accordingly, I hold that, in order for Dr. Pauling to recover, it would be necessary for him to meet the standards of New York Times v. Sullivan.

The basic principle of New York Times v. Sullivan is that, in the cases to which it applies, there can be no recovery for even a defamatory falsehood unless the plaintiff proves that the statement was made "with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not". (376 U. S. at 280.)

This kind of "actual malice" " 'is not presumed but is a matter for proof by the plaintiff' " (376 U. S. at 284; and see 376 U. S. at 279, quoted supra).

In the case at bar, there is no real evidence that defendants knew that the statements they made were false. A four-year-old conversation with an editor, who did not himself have anything to do with the writing of the allegedly libelous articles, is no more sufficient to show knowledge of falsity than were the new stories in the Times files in New York Times v. Sullivan. As the Court there said, "the state of mind required for actual malice would have to be brought home to the persons in the Times' organization having responsibility for the publication" of the alleged libel (New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. at 287).

Plaintiff argues that he has shown "reckless disregard" by the defendants of whether the article "was false or not".

But all the plaintiff's evidence on this phase of the case amounts to, giving it the most favorable inferences, is that defendants relied on unreliable sources, and that if they had checked in a reasonable manner, they would have ascertained that their statements were false. Assuming these facts to be true, that is still not a showing of "reckless disregard of whether it was false or not", in the New York Times v. Sullivan sense. As the Supreme Court pointed out in Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64, 79 (1964):

> "The reasonable-belief standard * * * is not the same as the reckless-disregard-of-truth standard. * * * The test which we laid down in New York Times is not keyed to ordinary care; defeasance of the privilege is conditioned, not on mere negligence, but on reckless disregard for the truth."

Reckless disregard of whether a statement is false or not, in the New York Times sense, is to be contrasted with the "utterances honestly believed" (Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. at 73) which are to be protected. Such reckless disregard must be the equivalent of the "calculated falsehood" (ibid. at 75), which is not protected.

The evidence presented by plaintiff does not meet this standard.

In this aspect of the case, perhaps the most vulnerable passage in the libelous articles is this:

> "Are such persons Communists? Some such undoubtedly are, but there is not publicly at hand the full proof, of the kind demanded by the courts, that they are Communists in the total, deliberate, disciplined organizational sense."

Assuming that this could be read as referring to plaintiff, it could be argued that this is a charge that plaintiff is a Communist, with an admission that the writer has no evidence of it; and therefore that the charge is made with reckless disregard of whether it is false or not.

But of course the admission in the article that there is no legal evidence to support the charge—assuming it to apply to plaintiff—itself limits the charge. To hold that this statement is not protected under New York Times v. Sullivan would risk the very danger that the Supreme Court gave us a ground for rejecting a rule that defendants be required to prove truth:

> "Under such a rule, would-be critics of official conduct may be deterred from voicing their criticism, even though it is believed to be true and even though it is in fact true, because of doubt whether it can be proved in court or fear of the expense of having to do so. They tend to make only statements which 'steer far wider of the unlawful zone'. * * * The rule thus dampens the vigor and limits the variety of public debate. It is inconsistent with the First and Fourteenth Amendments." N. Y. Times v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. at 279.

Neither knowledge of falsity nor reckless disregard of whether the statements were false or not has been shown with the "convincing clarity which the constitutional standard demands", and thus a judgment based on such evidence would not be permitted to stand (New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. at 285-286). And it is for the Judge in the first instance to decide whether that standard has been met (Ibid., and compare Rosenblatt v. Baer, 86 S. Ct. at 677, Feb 21, 1966, slip opinion, page 12).

Appendix E

Pauling v. National Review, Inc.

The record of this trial is extremely voluminous. So I should make clear that on the basis of pre-N. Y. Times v. Sullivan law, plaintiff would have proved a prima facie case. The articles on their face are libelous, i.e., defamatory if untrue; the defenses of truth, fair comment without malice, etc., to the extent thus far gone into, all present questions of fact for the jury. Publication of the article by the corporate defendant, with the active participation and approval of the individual defendant editor, are (sic) conceded. While the participation by the individual defendant-publisher, Mr. Rusher, is perhaps marginal, enough has been shown of his participation to present a question for the jury as to his responsibility. The suggestion that damage has been conclusively disproved by plaintiff's own reputation witnesses is unfounded; to begin with, that issue was not fully explored with those witnesses and properly so under Linehan v. Nelson, 197 N. Y. 482 (1910); and in any event the testimony of the reputation witnesses was limited to plaintiff's reputation in the academic and scientific communities and was not conclusive.

But, applying New York Times v. Sullivan, I hold that plaintiff has failed to prove a prima facie case, and the complaint must be dismissed.

Lest there be any misunderstanding, I do not hold that the charges against Dr. Pauling, made in the articles, are true or justified. It is clear that in all his actions Dr. Pauling acted well within his legal rights. And if his conscience required him to take the actions and pursue the course of conduct that he has pursued for the last twenty years, then he has acted in accordance with his moral duty. Accepting plaintiff's testimony, presumably his work for public education and world peace has imposed certain sacrifices on Dr. Pauling. Dr. Pauling has added the prestige of his reputation to aid the causes in which he believes. I merely hold that by so doing he also limited his legal remedies for any claimed libel of his reputation. And perhaps this can be deemed another sacrifice that he is making for the things he believes in.

I should finally mention one matter of judicial economy. When plaintiff rested late Friday afternoon, and defendants moved to dismiss the complaint, I reserved decision and indicated that I was going to send the case to the jury ultimately. We were then in the sixth week of trial. (Actually, because of intervening religious holidays, etc., there had been about five weeks of testimony.) If I were to grant the motion to dismiss now, and an appellate court disagreed with me, the appellate court would have no choice but to order a new trial, and the weeks of trial that we have thus far had would have to be done over again. On the other hand, if I reserved decision on the motion to dismiss and let the case go to a jury verdict, then, even if I should thereafter dismiss the complaint, and the appellate court were to disagree with me, the appellate court would not have to order a new trial, but could merely enter the appropriate final judgment. Recognizing that the law in this area is still evolving and that the appellate courts might hold the New York Times case inapplicable, I thought it wiser to reserve decision and thus minimize the risk of retrial. But over the weekend I reconsidered this question, and, accordingly, I inquired of counsel as to how much longer the case would take, and I required them, as officers of the court, to make representations to me as to what additional evidence they expected to produce and by what witnesses. Counsel's estimate as to the future length of the trial varied, but both sides agreed that there are still a number of weeks to go. My own guess is that probably the remainder of the case would take about as long to try as plaintiff's case has taken thus far. Thus, if I were now not to grant the motion to dismiss, but were to reserve decision, and the appellate courts should agree with me that the doctrine of New York Times v. Sullivan applies, I would have subjected the parties, the court, and the jurors to about as much additional unnecessary trial as I would if I were to grant the motion to dismiss, now, and the appellate courts disagreed with me. This seems to me too high a premium to pay as insurance against the ever-present risk of error on my part. It is for these reasons that I am not reserving decision.

The motion to dismiss the complaint is granted.

Dated, April 19, 1966.

S. J. SILVERMAN
J. S. C.

APPENDIX E

3. Gilberg v. Goffi, 21 App. Div. 2d 517, 251 N. Y. S. 2d 823 (2d Dept. 1964) aff'd 15 N. Y. 2d 1023, 207 N. E. 2d 620 (1965)

DAVID C. GILBERG, Respondent, v.

FERRER F. GOFFI, Appellant.

Second Department, July 9, 1964.

APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at Special Term (JOHN J. DILLON, J.), entered January 29, 1964 in Westchester County, which (1) denied plaintiff's motion for summary judgment and defendant's cross application for summary judgment, (2) struck the third defense and portions of the second defense, and otherwise denied the motion to strike defenses, and (3) limited the disclosure and discovery required of plantiff by defendant, and directed that such disclosure and discovery proceed. The appeal, as limited by defendant's brief, is from so much of said order as struck the third defense, and as denied defendant's cross application for summary judgment of dismissal of the complaint.

Harry Krauss for appellant.

David C. Gilberg, respondent in person.

SAMUEL RABIN, J. This appeal turns upon the extent of immunity to be accorded to the campaign utterances, oral and written, of a candidate for public office.

The learned Special Term held that the complaint stated a case for recovery in defamation, and that questions of fact were raised incident to the defenses of privilege and justification. In our opinion, the evidentiary showing made by each party establishes facts which are sufficient, under two landmark decisions rendered after the Special Term's decision, to warrant the granting of summary judgment in defendant's favor.

Appendix E
Gilberg v. Goffi

By reason of these recent pronouncements, the issues at bar may no longer be evaluated solely by the prior controlling precedents in the law of defamation. Now, all utterances addressed to public officials, when challenged in a civil libel action, must be accorded the constitutional safeguards for freedom of speech inherent in the First and Fourteenth Amendments of the Federal Constitution (New York Time Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 264-265). The privilege of a citizen to criticize official conduct is part of the evolving body of the law of libel which now recognizes that public officials, in the performance of their duties, enjoy a concomitant immunity when they speak out on matters of public concern, even if a particular citizen be defamed in the process (Sheridan v. Crisona, 14 N Y 2d 108). The threat of a damage suit should not be permitted to inhibit or curtail the freedom of expression of either the citizen or the public servant (New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, supra, pp. 282-283).

In the New York Times case, the following principles were authoritively declared:

(1) The ancient doctrine that the Constitution does not protect libelous publications may no longer be utilized where its application would serve to impose sanctions upon criticism of the official conduct of public officers (pp. 268-269);

(2) Expressions of grievance and protest on a public issue do not lose their constitutional protection by reason of a combination of falsity of factual statement and of defamatory content (p. 273);

(3) Public officials, like Judges, are expected to be "'men of fortitude'" when assailed by half-truth, misinformation, charges of gross incompetence, disregard of public interest, communist sympathies, hints of bribery, embezzlement and the like, especially when such charges are hurled in the heat of a political campaign (pp. 272-273);

(4) In cases involving criticism of public officials, a new principle of qualified privilege in the law of libel is to be applied, namely (pp. 279-280): "The constitutional guarantees require, we think, a federal rule that prohibits a public official from recovering damages for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves that the statement was made with 'actual malice'—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not."

(5) This new principle is to be tested by the facts of each particular case in order to ascertain whether the alleged libelous statements were prompted by actual malice (pp. 284-286);

(6) On weighing the evidence, the court is to avoid such result as might suggest " 'that prosecutions for libel on government have any place in the American system of jurisprudence' "(p. 291); and

(7) The court is likewise to avoid the thwarting of the free expression of impersonal attack on government by investing the remarks with a personal significance (p. 292).

In the New York Times case the plaintiff was a Police Commissioner who sought damages in libel by attributing to himself certain false statements which had been published in an advertisement in the Times newspaper with respect to the Montgomery (Alabama) local police force which he headed. Plaintiff's money judgment was reversed for lack of demonstration of direct reference to him in the publication and for lack of proof of defendants' actual malice.

Appendix E
Gilberg v. Goffi

In our opinion, the same deficiencies rendered insufficient the present plaintiff's cause of action. While the plaintiff claims that he was not a public official, it is our opinion, based upon the proof adduced on the defendant's cross motion for summary judgment, that plaintiff's action is so closely related to criticism of a public official that the Times case is determinative and that the plaintiff has no justiciable claim.

The pertinent facts here may be briefly stated:

The Mayor of the City of Mount Vernon was a reputable lawyer who assumed and functioned in his office of Mayor during the period 1960 to 1963. Since June 1, 1960, plaintiff, likewise a lawyer of good reputation and standing, has been a partner in the Mayor's law firm.

Before the Mayor assumed his office, and during his tenure, the Daily Argus, a newspaper published in the City of Mount Vernon, reported in various news articles that the question of the adoption and enforcement of municipal conflicts- of-interest rule had been locally advanced. In March and April, 1958, the Argus reported that Alderman Kendall had advocated passage of a local law dealing with conflicts of interest. In September, 1962, additional articles with reference to such a local law appeared in the Argus. In November, 1962, the Argus published a news article to the effect that one Bornstein, who had been feuding with the Mayor on municipal and political matters, had filed a "complaint" with this court in which he challenged the right of plaintiff Gilberg to represent clients in the local City Court while his law partner was Mayor of the City. In the same month, the Argus further reported that one Zimmerman had sent a letter to the local Common Council urging that a local law be adopted so as to bar a Mayor or his law firm from practicing law in the City Court or before municipal agencies and that the Common Council had referred the letter to the local bar association.

In the Fall of 1963, the defendant, a faithful reader of the Argus, became an independent candidate for the office of alderman, election to which position would make him a member of the local Common Council. His rival candidates were two incumbent Republican Aldermen (one of whom was Alderman Kendall) and two Democratic candidates. In the ensuing election campaign the defendant was associated with Bornstein and other opponents of the Mayor who was seeking re-election to that office.

On the night of October 22, 1963, defendant together with Bornstein appeared on the public platform, and both made speeches before an audience. The defendant read his speech from a prepared typewritten manuscript, copies of which had been signed by him and distributed earlier to the press for publication. In his address, in the part now relevant, the defendant made the following remarks:

"One of my opponents claimed credit for being the sponsor of a Conflicts of Interests code. We read in the papers of the charges that the mayor's law firm was practicing in the City Court of Mount Vernon, under conditions which show a clear conflict of interests. Yet, neither of them called for any investigation. Is it that they did not care or that they did not dare?

"They have failed to show any courage as aldermen. There has not been a dissenting vote among them in so long a time that it is difficult to remember when any such thing happened. No group can think so much alike for so long a time on so many subjects.

"It would seem as though someone else is doing the thinking for them and that they are merely the 'Yes' men for this individual. By being 'Yes' men, they have allowed our city to become disgraced among all of the cities of our nation.

"Of my Democratic opponents, both are lackeys of the Democratic mayoralty candidate * * *

"Our mayoralty candidate * * * is a man of recognized decency and integrity. He is our one hope to bring back our city to the sphere of respectability. To do this, he needs aldermen who are prepared to act for him when action is necessary. As members of his team, my running mate and I will see to it that he gets the legislation he needs to carry out his purpose."

The defendant's address was reported in the Daily Argus in its issue of October 23, 1963. Orally on the following day, and by copy of a letter sent to such newspaper on October 25, 1963, the plaintiff informed defendant that his (defendant's) statements about the Mayor's law firm were false and defamatory; and plaintiff called upon defendant either to justify publicly his remarks or to avow his error. Plaintiff's written communication stated that he was not a "politician"; that he sought no public office; that no law, rule or regulation prohibited his law firm from practicing in the City Court; and that his firm had appeared in no case "where a conflict of interests may or might arise."

Defendant proffered no formal retraction. In lieu thereof, on October 28, 1963 he sent a letter to the Argus, the substance of which it printed in a news article. In such letter defendant referred to the publication in the Argus on November 19, 1962 of an article reciting the filing of the Bornstein "complaint" to this court, and then went on to state:

"This fully supports my statement. I have no interest in Mr. Gilberg's method of practicing law, except insofar as it concerns the conduct of the Common Council. I have said and still argue that it was the duty of the Common Council, who on previous occasions, had voiced itself as in favor of a strong conflict of interests law, to have instituted an investigation of the matter. * * * If Mr. Bornstein's charges are sustained in an investigation by the Common Council, it would fall upon that body to adopt appropriate rules for correcting the situation.

"As a candidate for the office of Alderman, it is my privilege and duty to present the issues to the people, and in that sense, I have brought this forth as such an issue."

The instant action was thereafter commenced on the theory that the oral address of October 22 which had been reduced to writing, and the writing of October 28, constituted both a slander and a libel of the plaintiff. In his complaint, plaintiff charges in substance that defendant uttered false statements to the effect that the law firm, of which plaintiff is a partner, had practiced law in the local City Court under conditions which showed a conflict of interests; and that, by innuendo, the defendant had suggested that the law firm had thereby violated some precept which precluded its practice in that court. The complaint neither pleads special damages, nor avers that the defendant's impugning remarks were uttered with malice.

In his answer, the defendant pleaded a general denial, and, inter alia, defenses of lack of malice, qualified privilege, and justification. He also set out the various mentioned publications of the Daily Argus relating to a municipal conflicts-of-interest law and the presentations made thereon to this court and to the Common Council; and pleaded that his campaign remarks were not aimed at plaintiff but at his incumbent aldermanic adversaries for the purpose of drawing to the attention of the voters their failure to proceed "with relation to the charge publicly made by the said Bornstein."

In support of his second defense of justification, defendant pleaded that the Mayor's official status as a Magistrate empowered him to act in the City Court and to appoint an acting City Court Judge. Defendant also referred to the Mayor's power of appointment of the Corporation Counsel and various other municipal functionaries, including the local Police Commissioner, and pleaded that these latter appointees appeared in the City Court in the prosecution or defense of divers actions involving the municipality and local law enforcement.

Upon the motions of the respective parties* for summary judgment, the Special Term held that the evidentiary showing as to the defenses of qualified privilege and justification (as corrected) entitled defendant to a trial. The Special Term further held that the issue was not whether defendant had read something in a newspaper, but whether his charge of conflict of interests was objectively true.

On the present appeal, only the defendant seeks review of the denial of summary judgment in his favor. If defendant is correct in his contention that he was entitled to summary judgment on the evidentiary showings, his appeal from so much of the order under review as struck out the defense of truth is moot.

Under the current practice, a motion for summary judgment should be granted where, on the papers and proof submitted, a cause of action or defense "shall be established sufficiently to warrant the court as a matter of law in directing judgment in favor of any party;" and the motion should be denied where any party shows the existence of any issue of fact, other than an issue as to the amount or extent of damages, sufficient to require a trial (CPLR 3212, subds. [b], [c]). In effect, defendant's cross motion for summary judgment was a motion to dismiss the complaint for failing, on an evidentiary showing, to state a cause of action (CPLR 3211, subd. [a], par. 7). The plaintiff's motion for summary judgment, in effect, was an application to dismiss the pleaded defenses for want of substance (CPLR 3211, subd. [b]).

*Defendant did not by cross notice formally move for summary judgment in his favor. He requested such judgment, however, in his affidavit in opposition to plaintiff's motion for summary judgment.

Applying the principles of the New York Times case (376 U. S. 254, supra) to the facts and pleadings at bar, it is patent first and foremost that the alleged defamatory words of defendant's October 22, 1963 address, set out in paragraph 12 of the complaint, contain no direct reference to plaintiff Gilberg either by name or association with the Mayor's law firm. Construed in the context of indulging in "a clear conflict of interests," defendant's said speech and his press release thereon were limited to practice in the City Court by "The Mayor's law firm." The only proof in this record that such words were susceptible of reference to the plaintiff personally lies in plaintiff's subjective interpretation of the words and in the alleged coincidence that, on October 23, 1963, plaintiff received a number of unidentified telephone messages calling attention to the newspaper article published that day "and the implication of the statement, as the same affected the ethics and legality of law practice in the City Court on my part, [and] my being a member of the 'Mayor's law firm'." Plaintiff's proof on this issue is therefore precisely the same as the complaint's evidence in the New York Times case (supra). As there stated, the alleged defamatory words "did not on their face make even an oblique reference" to the complainant "as an individual"; and any proof "that he had in fact been so involved" rested "solely on the unsupported assumption that, because of his official position, he must have been" (New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, supra, p. 289).

In the Times case, the position of the complainant was even stronger, since presumably everybody in the City of Montgomery knew or should have known that he was the Commissioner in charge of the police department; and yet the innuendo that the alleged defamatory matter assailing the police applied to him individually was rejected as unavailing on the "assumption" that he was personally involved in any generic criticism of police action. At bar, although plaintiff stated that his position as the active partner of the Mayor's law firm in charge of City Court cases, was known to Bench and Bar and to most litigants, proof is lacking that defendant knew of this situation or that he even knew the plaintiff. In fact, the proof is that plaintiff and the defendant had never met, and that defendant was attacking the Common Council and his incumbent rivals for membership in that body.

Plaintiff's proof utterly fails to connect the defendant with knowledge, actual or constructive, that plaintiff was a member of the "Mayor's law firm." In the absence of proof of such knowledge and in the absence of specific reference in the alleged defamatory statements to the actual name of such law firm or to the particular individuals who comprised it, it is our opinion that plaintiff has failed at the outset to establish that he was personally included in the law firm claimed to have been defamed by defendant. Paraphrasing the language of Mr. Justice BRENNAN in the New York Times case (supra), the proof adduced as to defendant's utterances of October 22 may be taken as referring to "the Mayor's law firm," but they did not on their face "make even an oblique reference" to plaintiff as an individual; and support for such conclusion rests only on plaintiff's "assumption" and those of his unidentified telephone informants—assumptions that cannot properly be drawn directly from the specific words used in the defendant's text.

Nor is plaintiff's case for personal calumny in any way aided by defendant's writing issued on October 28, 1963 to the Daily Argus in lieu of a personal retraction to plaintiff and in justification of his October 22 speech and press release. This later writing mentions plaintiff specifically by name for the first time; but, in our opinion, it does not, by reason of such identification, serve to strengthen the plaintiff's case, as urged by plaintiff. That later writing of October 28 made no charge of any unprofessional activity against the plaintiff personally. It merely emphasized defendant's reliance: (a) upon the Daily Argus' publication concerning Bornstein's complaint to this court which "had challenged the right of Mr. Gilberg to represent clients in City Court while his law partner is Mayor of the City;" and (b) upon the fact that such complaint constituted a proper reason why the Common Council should have inquired into the necessity for a code of ethics.

Accordingly, on the proof adduced, we are of the opinion that plaintiff has failed to establish that he had been personally vilified for a lack of professional propriety by any utterance, oral or written, ascribable to the defendant. Plaintiff has established only that the "Mayor's law firm" had been impugned by defendant on a pre-existing claim of conflict of interests which had already appeared in the public press.

In view of the fact that defendant was a candidate for public office; that he was talking about another office-holder's law firm; and that he was calling upon the Common Council to investigate Bornstein's and Zimmerman's pre-existing charges, as already published, with respect to such law firm, it is our opinion that defendant's utterances can fairly be construed only as part and parcel of a debate on the public issue as to whether Mount Vernon required a code of ethics to govern the practice of law in the City Court by a firm, or a member thereof, in which a partner occupied the office of Mayor. The statement by the defendant that Bornstein's and Zimmerman's presentations of that issue had been published in the papers and that he (the defendant) had read the published article was not false, but in fact true.

Nor is it of any avail to plaintiff to claim that he was not a candidate for any public office and that he was outside the political arena. Obviously the law firm, of which he was a member, had generated the public issue on which the the defendant made comment. In our opinion, having entered the fray as champion of that law firm, plaintiff made himself as much a part of the local political campaign as did his law partner, the Mayor. It would be anomalous to hold that the Mayor, as a public office holder, was precluded by the New York Times case from suing in libel on a conflict of interest issue affecting his law firm, but that his law partner was individually free to do so on the same subject matter.

Upon the basis of all the proof adduced, it is our opinion that the doctrine proclaimed in the New York Times case is dispositive of all the legal issues, actual or potential, here presented. Accordingly, invoking such doctrine, we may summarily dispose of those issues.

On the issue of malice, the plaintiff was bound to show that the defamatory falsehood relied upon, growing out of the Mayor's conduct as a public official, was made with "actual malice." Plaintiff was required to show that the defendant's utterances were made with knowledge that they were false or with a reckless disregard as to their falsity. Examining the proof tendered on this issue, it is our view that plaintiff produced no evidence that defendant was aware of any erroneous statements or that he was in any way reckless in that regard. At best, it might be said that defendant was negligent in failing to ascertain the truth or accuracy of the details supporting the prior claims of Bornstein and Zimmerman to the effect that the Mayor's law firm had indulged in the practice of law in circumstances involving a conflict of interests. However, as noted in the Times case, a finding of negligence in failing to discover misstatements is "constitutionally insufficient to show the recklessness that is required for a finding of actual malice" (376 U. S. 254, 288).

On the issue of privilege, as previously indicated it is plaintiff's contention that defendant could derive no immunity for his utterances, since plaintiff was neither a public officer nor a political candidate. But that contention, as already noted, is untenable. It is our opinion: (a) that in submitting "the Mayor's law firm" as an actionable issue, plaintiff has inextricably interwoven his personal and individual status with that of the firm; (b) that the firm was a proper subject for comment in the public domain; and (c) that in the context of the utterances made, plaintiff and the firm necessarily constituted one and the same juridical person.

Appendix E
Gilberg v. Goffi

Accordingly, and solely because the plaintiff's papers fail to make out an actionable wrong, it is our conclusion that the defendant's cross motion for summary judgment should be granted. We see no need, therefore, to discuss defendant's alternative point that his third defense of truth was erroneously dismissed.

In reaching this conclusion, we express no opinion on the underlying controversy which plaintiff has sought to bring to the surface, i.e., the charge that the Mayor's law firm had offended any professional standards of conduct. In our opinion, the propriety of the firm's conduct, or of plaintiff's individual conduct, is not a question for judicial determination in the instant action. The only justiciable questions properly here are: (a) whether such conduct had become a public question; and (b) whether, within the limitations laid down in the Times case, the defendant as a candidate had the right to comment thereon as he did. It appears to us that the defendant had such right, and that plaintiff and his law firm must find solace in the philosophy that men in public life must be "men of fortitude" who must endure exposure to the vicissitudes of argument in the public forum, where half-truths, misinformation, and worse, are not uncommon in the furor and in the tempo of a political campaign. In sum, it is our view that discussion of a need for a municipal code of ethics to bar certain activities on the part of a public official and his associates is not tantamount to saying that the activities sought to be prohibited are, prior to the adoption of such code, wrongful per se. In that light, plaintiff's failure to prove his individual defamation and defendant's actual malice are omissions which are fatal to plaintiff's case.

Within the periphery of the new body of case law, we hold, on a balancing of interests, that democratic government is best served when citizens, and especially public officials and those who aspire to public office, may freely speak out on questions of public concern, even if thereby some individual be wrongly calumniated (Sheridan v. Crisona, 14 N Y 2d 108, supra; Spalding v Vilas, 161 U.S. 483, 498; Matson v. Margiotti, 371 Pa. 188; Manceri v. City of New York, 12 A D 2d 895). If by reason of such utterances a defendant is immune from liability, he does not lose his immunity when the utterances are passed on to the press for publication in the same text as previously delivered (Barr v. Matteo, 360 U.S. 564, 574-575; Mellon v. Brewer, 18 F. 2d 168; Glass v. Ickes, 117 F. 2d 273).

Accordingly, the order under review, insofar as appealed from and insofar as it denied defendant's cross motion for summary judgment, should be reversed, without costs; such cross motion should be granted, dismissing the complaint; and the appeal, insofar as it relates to the plaintiff's motion to strike out the third defense should be dismissed as moot.

CHRIST, BRENNAN and HOPKINS, JJ., concur with RABIN, J.; BELDOCK, P. J., dissents and votes to affirm the order, with the following memorandum: In my opinion, the decision in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan (376 U. S. 254) is distinguishable from the case at bar. That case concerned the alleged criticism of the official conduct of a public official. The instant case concerns criticism of a public official's private practice of the law. That the plaintiff here was known by the defendant to be a law partner of the public official, clearly appears from the fact that plaintiff's name was included in the name of the law firm and from the fact that the November 19, 1962 article which appeared in the Daily Argus, and which was defendant's basis for his October 22, 1963 speech, specifically mentioned plaintiff by name. In my opinion, defendant's speech accuses the Mayor and his law partners of unethical conduct in their practice of law. Therefore, it was sufficient to defeat defendant's cross motion for summary judgment dismissing the complaint.

Order, insofar as appealed from and insofar as it denied defendant's cross motion for summary judgment, reversed, without costs; such cross motion granted and the complaint dismissed, without costs. Appeal, insofar as it relates to the plaintiff's motion to strike out the third defense, dismissed as moot.

APPENDIX E

4. Pearson v. Fairbanks Publishing Co. (unreported), aff'd on other grounds Alaska (1966)

IN THE

SUPERIOR COURT FOR THE STATE OF ALASKA

FOURTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT

DREW PEARSON,
Plaintiff,
—vs—
FAIRBANKS PUBLISHING CO., INC. and C. W. SNEDDEN, Defendants.

No. 10,209

MEMORANDUM OPINION

Warren A. Taylor and Robert A. Parrish, Fairbanks, Alaska, for plaintiff.

Robert J. McNealy, Fairbanks, Alaska, and Henry J. Camarot, Springfield, Oregon, for defendants.

Plaintiff Drew Pearson is and has been at all times pertinent herein the author of an internationally published column entitled the Washington-Merry-Go-Round. Defendants Fairbanks Publishing Co., Inc. and C. W. Snedden are and have been at all times pertinent herein a newspaper printing company and publisher respectively of a Fairbanks newspaper entitled The Daily News Miner. Plaintiff complains in this action that defendants libeled him in two editorials, published July 8 and August 15, 1958, wherein plaintiff was called the "Garbage Man of the Fourth Estate." The defendants defend principally upon true fact and fair comment. The pertinent Pearson column and the News Miner editorials are set out in the appendix to this opinion.

At the outset of this opinion the Court desires to point up a difference in the respective parties (sic) theory as to the controlling factors of the suit. Plaintiff contends that the four corners of the alleged libelous publication alone constitute the yardstick for fact finding; that the words "Garbage Man of the Fourth Estate" are defamatory and libelous per se (supporting presumed substantial damages). Plaintiff then proceeded to adduce proofs that he is a man of good international reputation, that he routed crooks and misfits out of government, sponsored charity projects of large proportion, and generally bent his efforts to effect good will of mankind; that his few errors bore insignificant relation to the thirty odd thousand columns that he had authored, and that generally the designation of "The Garbage Man of the Fourth Estate" could not truthfully or fairly characterize one of such standing, asserting in this regard that such label has grave personal connotation over and above any technical application by the working press.

Defendants on the other hand offer a very broad base for fact finding, asserting and endeavoring to prove that plaintiff is a public figure of international proportion, is a controversial figure, has a reputation among the working press of publishing leftovers and inaccurate material, that he injects himself, however subtly, into local political arenas and did so in the matter at bar, that the word garbage is generally understood as a literary designation of trash and has no personal connotation; and besides, defendants sum up— "how many garbage pails must a person empty to be called a garbage man".

The foregoing summary is necessarily an over simplification of the extensive matters actually presented during the eight day trial, in which, incidentally, the orderly processing of each side was hopelessly overwhelmed by the accommodation to out of town and out of state witnesses (the plaintiff himself left the Court and the State before the trial was half finished) all of which made evidence relevancy a meaningless phrase and materiality an indefinable term. However shaded in grays most of the propositions appear, certain significant facts can be considered as established:

(1.) There was a political atmosphere in the Territory of Alaska at the times of the plaintiff's column and the defendant's editorial comment. (July-August 1958)

(2.) That plaintiff's column contained political implications of supporting Democrat Ernest Gruening for political office. (See Appendix A)

(3.) That defendant's editorials contained political implications of supporting Republican Mike Stepovich for political office. (See Appendix B)

From the foregoing alone it would be accurate to conclude that at least eventually these two members of the working press, Mr. Pearson and Mr. Snedden, would come to contest. And literary weapons usually include name calling. Apparently the Court is asked to decide not only under rule of privilege who is entitled to the first hurl but also the delicacy (or extravagance) the rule of fair comment dictates. These are not easy decisions.

Appendix E
Pearson v. Fairbanks Publishing Co.

I am further disheartened with a growing acceptance of incredulity that once proud and fierce free press advocates should succumb to judicial determination of controversies between themselves. The fact of this lawsuit seems to be the most difficult fact of all to reconcile. It precipitates speculation as to what the plaintiff contended the law was or should be in those many suits wherein he was defendant, (see Defendant Exhibit I, entitled "Confessions of an S.O.B."); interesting however scandulous (sic) herein.

What is the law of libel as applied herein? Plaintiff urges Reynolds v. Pegler 223 F2d 429. Defendant urges Pauling v. News Syndicate Co., Inc. (No. 301 Sept. term 1963, U. S. Court of Appeals 2nd Circuit). This Court is most strongly attracted to New York Times v. Sullivan 376 U S 254, 84 S. Ct. 710, 11 L. ed (sic) 2d 686 (1963) which contains an amazing collection of authoritative statements concerning libel and the freedom of the press on matters of public concern. A study of this material could scarely leave doubt as to the historical and contemporary attitudes on this subject, as for example in 1794 (pg. 703).

> "In every State, probably in the Union, the press has exerted a freedom of canvassing the merits and measures of public men, of every description, which has not been confined to the strict limits of common law. On this footing the freedom of the press has stood; on this foundation it yet stands".

and again later,

> "In the realm of religious faith and in that of political belief, sharp differences arise. In both fields > the tenets of one man may seem the rankest error to his neighbor. To persuade others to his own point of view, the pleader, as we know, at times resorts to exaggeration, to vilification of men who have been, or are, prominent in the church or state, and even to false statement. But the people of this nation have ordained in the light of history, that in spite of the probability of excesses and abuses these liberties are, in the long view, essential to enlightened opinion and right conduct on the part of the citizens of a democracy. (310 U. S. 296)"

While the above historical references had application primarily to public officials, this category has been extended to candidates for public office[1] and this Court finds no reasonable basis to exempt those who presume to speak for such candidates, particularly those public figures of international stature. Restated with facts at bar the plaintiff Drew Pearson, a public figure and internationally known newspaper and radio columnist of no mean proportion, should occupy the same standing in the law of libel as Senator Gruening whose cause he was publicly supporting[2]. There can be little question that candidate Gruening could have been so assailed with impunity.

The foregoing is an application of State and Federal constitutional protection of free speech and press given to the publication. I also hold that the case law, developed prior to the Times case, leads with persuasive logic to the same result.

---

[1]See Bingham v. Buckley—NY 2d—(Sup. Ct. July 30, 1964)

[2]For example as to a candidate see Phoenix v. Choisser, 82 Ariz. 271, 276, 277, 312 P. 2d 150, 154 (1957), Coleman v. MacLannen 78 Kans. 711, 98 P. 281 (1908).

Turning to the evidence I find that the innuendoes of fact in the editorial are false.[3] However these statements are privileged.

The restatement of torts provides in section 598 that:

> An occasion is conditionally privileged when the circumstances induce a correct or reasonable belief that,
>
> (a) facts exist which affect a sufficiently important public interest, and
>
> (b) the public interest requires the comunication of the defamatory matter to a public officer or private citizen and that such person is authorized or privileged to act if the defamatory matter is true.

The evidence indicates that Mr. Snedden, who caused the offending editorials to be published, honestly believed that Mr. Pearson was inaccurate. The occasion for the first publication has been explained. If Senator Gruening could be attacked, so could one of his outspoken supporters.

As previously mentioned, Mr. Pearson interjected himself into Alaskan politics; his reputation for accurate analysis was accordingly a matter of public concern. The July 8th editorial was related to this area of public concern as was the August 15th editorial, the latter also citing the reason for dropping the column.

---

[3]July 8, 1958. Statements of fact include "almost everything he has said about Alaska has been inaccurate either in whole or in detail". August 15, 1958. "He is careless with the facts". The Court cannot separate these facts from the editorial expression of opinion. The entire editorial suggests that the publisher is presenting his opinion rather than objective findings.

Restatement of torts § 606 (1) applies to public figures:

> (1) Criticism of so much of another's activities as are matters of public concern is privileged if the criticism, although defamatory,
>
> (a) is upon,
>
> (i) a true or privileged statement of fact, or
>
> (ii) upon facts otherwise known or available to the recipient as a member of the public and
>
> (b) represents the actual opinion of the critic, and
>
> (c) is not made solely for purpose of causing harm to the other.

If the phrase "Garbage Man of the Fourth Estate" disparages the private character of the author in the mind of the reader then the rule provides:

> (2) Criticism of the private conduct or character of another who is engaged in the activities of public concern, in so far as his private conduct or character affects his public conduct, is privileged, if the criticism, although defamatory, complies with the requirements of Clauses (a), (b) and (c) of sub-section (1) and, in addition, is one which a man of reasonable intelligence and judgment might make.

Another relevant Restatement of torts right in point is Sect. 610 (3) and comments f and g:

(3) The privilege of criticism stated in § 606 includes criticism of another's participation in public activities.

(f) One who as a citizen or as a representative of some voluntary group or association participates in matters of public concern and importance is subject to criticism and comment which is privileged under the rule stated in § 606. So too, one who by his activities and by written or spoken language attempts to influence public opinion in any way is subject to the free and honest criticism of his efforts by members of the public. Thus, lobbyists and other persons attempting to influence prospective legislation, propagandists seeking public support for their causes, and various persons who participate in civic and state activities, not as office holders or candidates therefor, but merely as private citizens, are subject to the free expression of the opinion of those comentators who honestly but disparagingly pass judgment upon their activities.

(g) A man may, by writing letters or articles for newspapers or magazines, appeal to the public either to expose what he regards as abuses on the part of governmental officials or others or to direct attention to real or supposed grievances of himself, a third person or a class. Under such circumstances, his conduct in making such an appeal is exposed to the judgment of the public, and, having started a newspaper war, he cannot complain if he gets > the worst of it, so long as the expression of opinion, however disparaging, is honestly given. So too, a critic who attacks a book, play or public institution must expect that his criticism will in turn become the object of counter attacks.

The following are some of the cases that the Court relied on to illustrate the Restatement policy. Fetens v. Sokolsky 51 N. Y. S. 2d 240 (1944) which held that when a writers (sic) work is submitted to the public, caustic criticism is privileged. Such attacks may be fantastic and still privileged. Berg v. Printers Ink, 54 F Supp 795 (1943). An opinion must however be published in good faith and not for the sole purpose of harming the author. Parmalee v. Hearst Publishing Co., 93 N E 2d 512, 515 (1950). To say plaintiff wrote disgusting and depraved books is fair comment; Reynolds v. Pegler 223 F 2d 429, 433 (1955) (good faith test applied).

Fair comment exists here since there was a legitimate interest in a reporters (sic) accuracy and the publication was in part:

> "for the bona fide purpose of giving the public the benefit of comment which it is entitled to have, rather than for any ulterior motive of causing harm to the plaintiff". Prosser on Torts (2nd Ed) pg. 623.

In conclusion, while reasonable men may find this editorial to be false and in bad style, this does not mean it is unfair. It has been held to be no libel to call a newspaper "the most vulgar, ignorant and scurrilous journal ever published" Great Britain Hariot v. Stewart, cited in Cherry v. Des Moines Leader, 86 N W 323, 325 (Iowa 1901). (A drama critic in describing a performance wrote "Effie is an old jade, Addie a capering monster. . . . Strange creatures with painted faces and hideous mien.["] This was fair comment.)

The defendant's editorial was privileged, and as held by our Supreme Court and the Supreme Court of the United States, the privilege aforementioned is lost only by a showing of actual malice. Plaintiff contends evil motives, ill will and emnity are the only reasonable motivations that could attend the publishing of such otherwise purposeless name calling, not calculable under any stretch of the imagination to correct believed misstatement of fact concerning Gruening and Stepovich; that the use of the term "Garbage Man of the Fourth Estate", imputing as it is contended the lowest form of human endeavors, inherently establishes malice, all, a priori, indelibly impressed by a repeated publication in the same language.

In connection with purposelessness this Court believes it reasonable to infer that to strike down ones lauder is to strike down the lauded and this defeats the conclusiveness of plaintiff's first contention, i.e., there could have been constructive purpose. In connection with the imputation of "Garbage Man of the Fourth Estate" this Court accepts the defendant's definition of garbage as literary trash which definition is both reasonable and accruate, however inappropriate for the purposes sought to be achieved by its use. Such definition hardly supports the contention of inherent malice. The fact of repeating the use of this phrase a month later, while outraging all sense of propriety and purpose, must necessarily be accepted and judged by the same standard and test as the first publication; it also falls short of stripping the privilege the Constitution and common law affords. As a parting comment on this last subject the Court finds, when coupled with the matter of the telegrams, sufficient reason and basis to refuse defendant's request for attorney fees and costs. It may well be that this "one for good measure" constituted such "salt in the wound" as to have precipitated this lawsuit. Accordingly, each party shall bear its own costs and attorney fees.

Let findings of fact and conclusions of law and judgment be drawn by defendant not inconsistent with this opinion.

DATED at Fairbanks, Alaska this 25th day of November, 1964.

EVERETT W. HAPP
Superior Court Judge

Appendix E

"Appendix A" to Opinion in Rearson v. Fairbanks Publishing Co.

Pearson v. Fairbanks Publishing Co.

Civil Case No. 10,209

The following column appeared in the Fairbanks Daily News Miner—Monday, July 7, 1958

Drew Pearson's WASHINGTON
Merry-go round. . . . .

WASHINGTON—A lot of Johnny-come-latelies such as Gov. Mike Stepovich are now claiming credit for making Alaska the 49th state in the Union. But the man who unobtrusively, but consistently, badgered senators, buttonholed congressmen, maneuvered in the smoke-filled rooms to bring statehood to Alaska is an ex-newspaperman named Ernest Gruening. He more than anyone else is the father of the 49th state.

Gruening first came to Washington in 1933 as chief of insular affairs division of the Interior Department organized under the late great Harold Ickes. As such, he guided the destinies of such American stepchildren as the Virgin Islands, Puerto Rico, Hawaii and Alaska.

Gruening had taken a degree at Harvard Medical School, but spent much of his time as a newspaperman, and was editing the Portland, Maine, Evening Express when he came to Washington to nurse American territories. After battling their causes before Congress, he was made governor of Alaska in 1939, and as such did a revolutionary thing.

He went all over that far flung territory, visiting every Eskimo village, every island in the Aleutians, every backwoods settlement, getting to know the people and their problems. By a rickety plane, and even by canoe, he toured the northwest territory.

Appendix E
"Appendix A" to Opinion in Pearson v.
Fairbanks Publishing Co.

Back in Washington when Congress was in session, he called on congressmen to plead for Alaskan problems. For 14 years, longer than any other man in history, he remained the governor of Alaska. Then when Eisenhower failed to reappoint him in 1953, the people of Alaska elected him unofficial senator and he moved to Washington to undertake a 24-hour-a-day lobbying campaign for the territorys (sic) statehood.

Shortly before this, however, a great tragedy struck Ernest Gruening's family which, though it brought grief to him, probably hastened the day when Alaska became the 49th state.

His son, Peter, a correspondent for the United Press, was killed in Australia, and his grief-stricken father more than ever threw all his heart and soul into the battle for Alaskan statehood. In effect he made Alaska his child.

That is the real story of the No. 1 lobbyist for Alaska and how statehoood was achieved.

In some respects the state of Texas probably had most to lose by admission of Alaska as the 49th state. But Sen. Lyndon Johnson put national interest ahead of state interest and worked quietly behind the scenes for Alaska. Without his potent support the bill would have been delayed.

Alaska, with 587,000 square miles against Texas' 267,000, now becomes the biggest state in the Union. California can no longer boast the highest peak in the U. S. A., for Mt. McKinley in Alaska is 6000 feet higher than Mt. Whitney in California. And Yellowstone is no longer the biggest national park. McKinley National Park is the biggest.

Finally, a new crop of Texas jokes will have to be told.

Appendix E

"Appendix B" to Opinion in Pearson v. Fairbanks Publishing Co.

Pearson v. Fairbanks Publishing Co.

Civil Case No. 10,209

The following editorial appeared in the Fairbanks Daily News Miner—Tuesday, July 8, 1958

GARBAGE MAN OF THE FOURTH ESTATE

Drew Pearson irritates us often. On days like yesterday he infuriates us. It isn't so much because of his opinions, which frequently are so biased they almost tilt out of the page, as it is because his facts are so cockeyed.

In yesterday's Washington-Merry-Go-Round column printed on the News Miner's editorial page, Mr. Pearson credited Ernest Gruening with being "more than any one else the father of the 49th state." This is a matter of opinion. We think Drew Pearson is not in the best of all possible positions to draw such a conclusion. Without wishing in the least to deprecate the fine contribution of former governor Gruening, we feel that the columnist is somewhat off the beam there. That, of course is our opinion.

But in describing the statehood efforts of our former governor—real and imaginary—we think it was wholly unnecessary for Mr. Pearson to start his piece by describing our present governor as a "Johnny-come-lately" and stating that Governor Stepovich is "now claiming credit for making Alaska the 49th state".

Mike Stepovich, born in Fairbanks, can hardly be described accurately as a Johnny-come-lately. He has too much of an understanding of the cooperative endeavor which the gaining of statehood was, and too much to do, to be claiming credit for that accomplishment. To the best of

Appendix E
"Appendix B" to Opinion in Pearson v.
Fairbanks Publishing Co.

our knowledge, Mike Stepovich hasn't been claiming a thing.

No one can dispute that Ernest Gruening, over a long period of years, was dedicated to the statehood cause. It is true he threw himself heart and soul into the battle. In fact, he threw himself in on many occasions when it would have served the cause of statehood vastly better for him to have kept himself out.

We are reminded here of a description given by one who is familiar with the Washington scene as Drew Pearson—and immensely more familiar with the details of the Alaska statehood struggle there. This man said, "It's a good thing the people of Alaska sent down two other Tennessee Plan representatives, and had Bob Bartlett on the job, because it has taken practically the full time efforts of three men for the past two years patching up the damage Gruening did."

One word in Mr. Pearson's column about Ernest Gruening sticks out like a sore thumb. The word says he worked "unobtrusively" in Washington. It sticks out because it is so devastatingly inappropriate. If you ever see anybody being unobtrusive, you won't have to ask his name to be sure it is not Ernest Gruening.

It is too bad that Drew Pearson was stimulated to write the things he did about our former governor and our present one, because they are going to hurt Mr. Gruening in Washington and in Alaska, where he is all too well known.

Yesterday's column deepens a doubt we already had in our mind about the usefulness of Drew Pearson on the national scene. Almost every single thing he ever said about

Appendix E

"Appendix B" to Opinion in Pearson v. Fairbanks Publishing Co.

Alaska has been inaccurate either in whole or in detail. Long before yesterday this raised for us the question of whether he is as irresponsible in all fields and on all subjects as he is in respect to Alaska. If he is, he is doing a distinct dis-service to the American republic, which being a democracy can only function wisely to the extent its citizens are well and fairly informed by the press.

Does Mr. Pearson so inform his readers? Not on matters Alaskan, of our certain knowledge; and not on much of anything else, in the opinion of his Washington colleagues, one of whom the other day described him as "the garbage man of the fourth estate."

This would seem to raise the point—which frankly has bothered us from time to time in the past—of why we should give space in our newspaper to the printing of garbage. We have worried about that. Even though the Washington Merry-Go-Round is the most popular and widely read column sent out from Washington, the question worries us right now.

For the time being we'll get a clothespin for our editorial nose while we decide what to do about this free-wheeling garbage man of the fourth estate.

The following editorial appeared in the Fairbanks Daily News Miner—Friday, August 15, 1965

EXIT DREW PEARSON

For some years the News-Miner has carried the Washington column by Drew Pearson called "Washington Merry-Go-Round". Since Aug. 1 it has not appeared in our paper and several subscribers have telephoned or written to ask what happened to Pearson.

Appendix E

"Appendix B" to Opinion in Pearson v. Fairbanks Publishing Co.

The Pearson column has been discontinued. This was not an action which we took lightly or without a good deal of thought, as the "Washington Merry-Go-Round["] is undeniably a popular feature in many newspapers.

We have known for a long time that on subjects having to do with Alaska Mr. Pearson has been so inaccurate as to be very disturbing to us. It was not until the publisher of the News-Miner recently spent several months in Washington, however, that the general reputation of this columnist was fully appreciated.

That reputation is summed up in the comment of a member of the working press in the nation's capital that Pearson is "the garbage man of the fourth estate."

Not wishing to distribute garbage with our newspaper, we have dropped Pearson. We will not be parties to publishing what we know to be inaccurate and misleading.

Since the early part of this year, while our publisher and other Alaskans have been in Washington in connection with the statehood bill, they have observed at first hand some of the happenings on which Drew Pearson commented i. his column. We do not mean things connected with statehood, but other events in Washington. We are sorry to have to say that, in our opinion, Pearson's accounts were not very closely related to the real events.

It is not because Mr. Pearson is allegedly "liberal" or "anti-Republican" that we are dropping him. It is just because he is so everlastingly careless with the facts.

Another Washington column, whose writer deals accurately with the great problems of the day in our nation, will soon start in the News-Miner.

APPENDIX E

5. Brennan v. Associated Press (not yet reported)

IN THE
UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF CONNECTICUT

E. GAYNOR BRENNAN,
Plaintiff,
—against—
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,
Defendant.

Civil Action
No. 7728

Before: HON. LEONARD P. MOORE, *U. S. C. J.

Appearances:

Philip R. Shiff, New Haven, Connecticut, for the Plaintiff.

Curtiss K. Thompson of Thompson, Weir & Barclay, New Haven, Connecticut (William M. Mack of New Haven, Connecticut, and Arthur Moynihan and Nicholas Vazzana, both of New York, New York, of counsel on the brief), for the Defendant.

MOORE, Circuit Judge

This is a libel action arising out of an allegedly defamatory account in a news dispatch of what took place at a public hearing before the liquor control committee of the Connecticut legislature on March 14, 1957.

*Of the Second Circuit, sitting by designation.

Appendix E
Brennan v. Associated Press

The plaintiff, E. Gaynor Brennan, was and is a successful lawyer living in Stamford. He had served in both houses of the Connecticut legislature, having been elected to the House in 1933 and to the Senate in 1935 and 1937. In 1939 he had been appointed Chairman of the Liquor Control Commission, in which capacity he served until 1941 or 1942. He had been prominent in the Republican Party of Connecticut, having been chairman of its platform committee in 1938. He had held numerous other positions in the state and municipal governments, including the offices of prosecutor of the City Court of Stamford from 1933 to 1937 and Judge of the same court from 1937 to 1939.

Brennan appeared at the hearing on March 14, 1957 as a representative of the Connecticut Wholesale Liquor Dealers Association. Before appearing, he fully complied with the laws of Connecticut pertaining to such appearances by filing with the Secretary of State the name of his principal and a brief description of the legislation in connection with which he was to appear.

During the course of the Committee hearing, William H. Veale, secretary of the United Temperance Society, addressed the Committee in part as follows:

> "Our program is one of education. We don't try to pull any political pressure upon you. We condemned in 1955 the fact that two members of the law firm of the State Democratic Chairman registered as liquor lobbyists and we're condemning in this assembly that a brother of a Republican county leader in Fairfield is registered as a liquor lobbist."

Veale's remarks were apparently directed towards the plaintiff Brennan, whose brother at the time was County Chairman of the Republican Party in Fairfield County.

Appendix E
Brennan v. Associated Press

Brennan spoke next. After identifying the capacity in which he appeared, he said:

> "... I could assure the previous speaker that as a counsel and member of the bar, I am certainly aware of the ethics of my profession and know that I would not appear here if any member of my family were a member of the General Assembly. I would feel disqualified. My position with the Connecticut Wholesale Liquor Dealers Association is on a contract to see that they obey the law. I resent the remarks of the last speaker and I condemn his ignorance."

A representative of the defendant, The Associated Press (AP), a New York corporation with its principal place of business in New York, was present at the hearing. He subsequently prepared a news dispatch describing the hearing, for publication in defendant's member papers on the morning of March 15, 1957. Plaintiff does not claim that this dispatch, which is set forth as Appendix A to this opinion, is libelous of him.

On the night of March 14-15, 1957, the original dispatch was rewritten in defendant's New Haven office for publication in defendant's member papers in Connecticut on the afternoon of March 15. Defendant's rewrite editor did not know Brennan personally, though he may have read about him in Connecticut newspapers in the brief period since the rewrite editor moved to defendant's New Haven office from defendant's New York office in January 1957. The purpose of the rewrite editor was to give the original dispatch a new freshness, so that the afternoon papers would not be running word for word the same story that had appeared in the morning papers. The rewritten story is reproduced as Appendix B to this opinion.

The principal change made by the rewrite editor was in the lead paragraph. Instead of describing the interchange between Veale and Brennan as a clash "on the issue of whether there is a tie-up between political leaders and the liquor industry," as the original dispatch had done, the rewrite began:

> "A charge of illicit lobbying was hurled at a lawyer for the Connecticut Wholesale Liquor Dealers Assn. at a state capitol public hearing yesterday."

It is this lead paragraph, published in the afternoon editions of five Connecticut newspapers with an aggregate circulation of approximately 103,000, which underlies the present suit.

Brennan never asked AP to retract or correct the rewrite. Instead, he brought suit against AP in the Fairfield County Superior Court on February 25, 1959, nearly two years after the publication of the rewrite. The action was subsequently removed to this court upon petition by the defendant.

The essence of the complaint is that the rewrite was false and malicious, in that no one ever accused Brennan of "illicit lobbying" at the hearing. In his original complaint, Brennan alleged that "his practice of law has diminished, whereby he has sustained heavy pecuniary loss," and that "he has been irreparably injured in his profession as a practising attorney." Both allegations were withdrawn by subsequent amendments. No actual damages were alleged in the complaint as amended for trial, and none were proven at trial.

Plaintiff maintains that he can recover without proof of actual damages, on the grounds that the rewritten story was libelous per se, both because it indicated falsely that he had been accused of a crime involving moral turpitude and because it tended to injure him in the practice of his profession as a lawyer. Brennan relies for the first proposition on two Connecticut criminal statutes which make certain kinds of lobbying illegal, and which provide for fines and imprisonment (up to one year under one statute; up to five years, under the other), in case of violation. Conn. Gen. Stat. § 2-45 (1958); § 53-150 (1958). See also Conn. Gen. Stat. § 53-152 (1958). For his second proposition, Brennan relies on Canon 26 of the Connecticut Canons of Professional Ethics, which indicates that certain kinds of lobbying by an attorney are "unprofessional" and would be grounds for disbarment.

Had AP made the charge that Brennan was an "illicit lobbyist", without qualification, the various dictionary synonyms probably would not have saved the words from being libelous per se. The reading public would more than likely attribute the connotation of "illegal" to "illicit" rather than "unauthorized" or "improper". However, these two words cannot be taken out of the entire article, divorced from it and made the sole foundation of a liability claim. Although Veale did not at any time call Brennan an "illicit lobbyist", the article in its entirety makes it abundantly clear what Veale was condemning in Brennan's appearance before the Committee, namely, the fact that Brennan and a political leader were brothers.

Appendix E
Brennan v. Associated Press

There was nothing in Veale's remarks, as quoted at length in the AP story, from which it could be inferred that Brennan had failed to register as a lobbyist, had violated any provision of the lobbying laws or had offended against any canon of professional ethics. Veale's sole criticism as revealed by the article was limited to the brotherly relationship. Brennan, as an experienced and skillful lawyer, could hardly have thought that "as a result thereof that plaintiff [he] was subject to criminal prosecution and disbarment proceedings." There was no suggestion of any such consequence in the article and no proof of even such a possibility produced upon the trial.

Whether a given statement is defamatory or not often turns on the context of the statement. To call a merchant a "crook", without qualification, might well be slanderous per se, because the imputation of dishonesty would tend to injure him in the practice of his livelihood. But to say that a merchant is a crook, because he owes money, is not slanderous per se, since "the appellation is explained away by a specification which does not support the charge." Herman v. Post, 98 Conn. 792, 793-94, 120 Atl. 606 (1923). See Yakavicze v. Valentukevicious, 84 Conn. 350, 353-54, 80 Atl. 94, 95-96 (1911). The same principle applies equally to libel:

> "The whole of the reported article must be considered in determining whether it is actionable and whether it transcends a substantially true statement of the facts."

Rose v. Indianapolis Newspapers, Inc., 213 F. 2d 227, 229 (7th Cir. 1954). See also Schy v. Hearst Publ. Co., 205 F. 2d 750, 752 (7th Cir. 1953); Dorney v. Dairymen's League

Co-op Ass'n., 149 F. Supp. 615, 619 (D. N. J. 1957); Paris v. New York Times Co., 170 Misc. 215, 9 N. Y. S. 2d 689 (Sup. Ct. 1939), affirmed without opinion, 259 App. Div. 1007, 21 N. Y. S. 2d 512 (1940); Restatement, Torts § 563, comment d (1938).

Here, as in Herman v. Post and Paris v. New York Times Co., supra, the context clarifies and removes any misapprehension which might have been caused by the initial statement, so that there is no defamation per se. This being so, the absence of any allegation or proof of actual damages is fatal to the plaintiff's case under general principles of the law of defamation. See Proto v. Bridgeport Herald Corp., 136 Conn. 557, 72 A. 2d 820 (1950).

Even if Brennan had been able to demonstrate the existence of libel per se, Conn. Gen. Stat. 52-237 (1958) permits the plaintiff in a libel action to recover only "such actual damage as he may have specially alleged and proved" unless the plaintiff proves either "malice in fact" on the part of the defendant, or failure by the defendant to withdraw the libelous charge upon plaintiff's timely request. Since the plaintiff here did not request a retraction of the statement complained of, and since he neither pleaded nor proved special damages, he can recover only upon proof of malice in fact. Sandora v. Times Co., supra; Wynne v. Parsons, 57 Conn. 73, 17 Atl. 362 (1888).

> "This expression 'malice in fact,' however, does not necessarily mean hatred, spite or ill-will against the plaintiffs, but that there must have been some improper or unjustifiable motive in publishing the article. The defendant must have been actuated from some other motive than a bona fide intention > of printing an article merely as news in which it believed the public was interested. It is not for the defendant to establish any want of such improper motive on his part. The burden is upon the plaintiffs to establish by a fair preponderance of the evidence such improper or unjustifiable motive on the part of the defendant, ..."

Sandora v. Times Co., 113 Conn. 574, 580, 155 Atl. 819, 822; see Proto v. Bridgeport Herald Corp., supra.

Upon all the facts and appropriate inferences therefrom, I find that the plaintiff has not sustained his burden of proving that the defendant acted for "some improper or unjustifiable motive." The purpose of defendant's rewrite editor was to give the story a new freshness for the afternoon papers. This purpose may be contrasted with the purpose of the defendants in Hogan v. New York Times Co., 313 F. 2d 354 (2d Cir. 1963) (purpose to ridicule plaintiffs for the entertainment of the public); Proto v. Bridgeport Herald Corp., 136 Conn. 557, 72 A. 2d 820 (1950) (apparent intent to ridicule plaintiff); and Wynne v. Parsons, 57 Conn. 73, 17 Atl. 362 (1888) (purpose "to incite the plaintiff to pay [a] claim, and to amuse the public").

The rewrite editor may well have been careless in his choice of words in rewriting the story. "Improper lobbying" would have been a fair characterization of Veale's charges against the plaintiff; "illicit lobbying" was not. But this carelessness did not rise to the level of a reckless indifference to truth or falsity, sufficient to show malice or abuse of privilege. See Charles Parker Co. v. Silver City Crystal Co., 142 Conn. 605, 116 A. 2d 440 (1955). This is not a case in which a newspaper printed a story without making adequate inquiry of eye-witnesses, as was true in Hogan v. New York Times Co., supra, and Corsello v. Emerson Bros., 106 Conn. 127, 137 Atl. 390 (1927). The rewrite was based on an eyewitness account: that of the writer of the original dispatch. As a result, there would have been little or no point in checking the story out with Veale or with the plaintiff. The only negligence on the part of the defendant was in Bender's choice of the word "illicit", and this choice was not so inaccurate as to be reckless.

Similarly, the plaintiff has not proven actual malice within the meaning of New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254 (1964), which held that the Constitution:

> prohibits a public official from recovering damages for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves that the statement was made with "actual malice"—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not.

376 U. S. at 279-80.

A preliminary problem under the Times case is whether the plaintiff is sufficiently akin to a "public official" so that he cannot recover without proof of actual malice. This question may be definitively answered when the Supreme Court decides Rosenblatt v. Baer, 106 N. H. 26, 203 A. 2d 723 (1964), cert. granted, 380 U. S. 941 (1965). However, such cases as have now been decided under Times suggest that the defendant may invoke the protection of the Times rule. Judge Friendly in Pauling v. News Syndicate Co., 335

Appendix E
Brennan v. Associated Press

F. 2d 659, 671 (2d Cir. 1964), cert. denied, 379 U. S. 968 (1965), indicated that it would be easy to extend the Times privilege from attacks on public officials to attacks on candidates for public office and thence to participants in public debate on issues of grave public concern. In Gilberg v. Goffi, 21 App. Div. 2d 517, 251 N. Y. S. 2d 823 (2d Dep't 1964), aff'd without opinion, 15 N. Y. 2d 1023, 260 N. Y. S. 2d 29 (1965), a New York court held within the scope of the Times rule a lawyer in practice with a town mayor, where the allegedly defamatory statement charged that the mayor's law firm was practising in the town under circumstances showing a conflict of interest. Another New York court has held that a police lieutenant charged with needlessly killing a colored boy in a case which attracted widespread public attention was a "public official," and therefore had to prove actual malice before he could recover for libel. Gilligan v. King, 34 U. S. L. Week 2243 (N. Y. Sup. Ct. Oct. 29, 1965). In Walker v. Courier-Journal, 34 U. S. L. Week 2176 (Sep. 23, 1965), the District Court for the Western District of Kentucky held that General Edwin A. Walker, who had gone to the University of Mississippi during racial disorders there after making public appeals for support, became sufficiently a public figure so that he could recover for inaccurate reporting of his activities there only upon proof of actual malice. See also Nusbaum v. Newark Morning Ledger Co., 86 N. J. Super. 132, 206 A. 2d 185 (1965) (raising but not deciding the issue whether a private witness who had voluntarily appeared before a congressional subcommittee investigating a matter of public concern could recover for inaccurate reporting of events related to that investigation without proof of actual malice). But see Fignole v.

Appendix E
Brennan v. Associated Press

Curtis Publishing Co., 34 U. S. Law Week 2297 (S. D. N. Y. Nov. 23, 1965) (Times rule does not apply to Haitian politician); Clark v. Pearson, 34 U. S. L. Week 2338 (D. D. C. Dec. 20, 1965) (lobbyist need not prove malice in libel action against columnist).

The Supreme Court in the Times case stressed "the profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open. . . ." 376 U. S. at 270. The public interest in full and free reporting of the activities of lobbyists need not be belabored. The plaintiff had gone before the state legislature as a paid representative of a group who would be affected by proposed legislation in order to voice the opinion of that group as to the proposed legislation. There is no question as to the legality of the plaintiff's conduct. Enlightened law-making can result only from a full presentation of the views of all interested parties. But there is a strong public interest which requires that this presentation of views be freely reported, to minimize the danger of clandestine influence, and to inform the public of this important stage of the legislative process. To paraphrase the Times opinion, a rule compelling the reporter of legislative hearings to guarantee the truth of all his assertions upon pain of libel judgments would deter the making of honest characterizations of lobbying activity which the public had a right to hear. A description of the behavior of lobbyists at a legislative hearing, in short, is qualitatively different from descriptions of activities not closely related to government, which classification, if inaccurate, may serve as the basis for damage recovery without proof of actual malice. See Butts v. Curtis Publishing Co., 242 F. Supp. 390 (N. D.

Ga. 1964) (football coach at state university held not a public officer); Faulk v. AWARE, Inc., 14 N. Y. 2d 954, 253 N. Y. S. 2d 990 (1964), cert. denied, 380 U. S. 916 (1965) (radio and television performer held not a public officer under the Times case).

As we have seen, the rewrite editor's choice of words may well have been careless. But as the Supreme Court said in Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64, 79 (1964), "the test . . . laid down in New York Times is not keyed to ordinary care; defeasance of the privilege is conditioned, not on mere negligence, but on reckless disregard for the truth." The Times case itself tells us that proof of malice must be made "with convincing clarity." 376 U. S. at 285-86 (1964). Such proof is lacking here. Defendant's rewriter intended to freshen the original story for the afternoon papers; and if he erred in his nocturnal zeal, and unjustly cast aspersions on the plaintiff, his error was not of the magnitude to serve as the basis for the recovery of damages.

Judgment for the defendant. The findings of fact and conclusions of law appearing herein shall constitute the findings and conclusions as required by Rule 52(a) of the Rules of Civil Procedure.

APPENDIX F

Libel Suits Brought by General Walker Arising Out Of News Reports Identical Or Similar To Reports Here Complained Of

Name of case	Court in which filed and docket number	Damages demanded in complaint
I. Cases Naming Associated Press as a Defendant
Walker v. The Associated Press	District Court, Tarrant County, Texas, No. 16624	$2,000,000
Walker v. The Associated Press	Circuit Court of Duval County, Florida, Civil Action No. 64-246-L; removed to U. S. District Court, Middle District of Florida, No. 64-267-Civil-J	$2,000,000
Walker v. The Associated Press	Circuit Court of Pulaski County, Arkansas, No. 58859; removed to U. S. District Court, Eastern District of Arkansas, No. LR-65-C-178	$1,000,000
Walker v. Associated Press and Times-Picayune Publishing Corporation	District Court, Caddo Parish, Louisiana, Number 160,536	$2,250,000
Walker v. The Denver Post, Inc. and The Associated Press	District Court, City and County of Denver, Colorado, Civ. No. B66072	$1,000,000
Walker v. The Kansas City Star Company and The Associated Press	Circuit Court, Jackson County, Missouri, No. 133,768	$1,000,000
Walker v. Savell and The Associated Press*	Circuit Court, Lafayette County, Mississippi, No. 7137; removed to U. S. District Court, Northern District of Mississippi, No. W-C-34-62	$2,000,000

*Subsequently dismissed as to Associated Press for lack of jurisdiction.

Appendix F

Name of case	Court in which filed and docket number	Damages demanded in complaint
II CASES NOT NAMING ASSOCIATED PRESS AS A DEFENDANT
Walker v. Courier-Journal and Louisville Times Company, Inc. and WHAS, Inc.	U. S. District Court, Western District of Kentucky, Civil Action 4639	$2,000,000
Walker v. Times Publishing Company	Circuit Court, Pinellas County, Florida, No. 17,694-L	$2,000,000
Walker v. The Pulitzer Publishing Company	U. S. District Court, Eastern District of Missouri, Eastern Division, No. 63 C 361(1)	$2,000,000
Walker v. Atlanta Newspapers, Inc. and Ralph McGill	U. S. District Court, Northern District of Georgia, Civ. No. 8590	$10,000,000
Walker v. The Journal Company	U. S. District Court, Eastern District of Wisconsin, Civ. No. 64-C-270	$2,000,000
Walker v. The Journal Company	U. S. District Court, Eastern District of Wisconsin, Civ. No. 64-C-276	$2,000,000
Walker v. The Gazette Publishing Company, Inc.	Circuit Court, Pulaski County, Arkansas, Civ. No. 58857	$1,000,000
Walker v. Arkansas Democrat Company	Circuit Court, Pulaski County, Arkansas, Civil No. 58858	$1,000,000
	Total	$33,250,000

SUPREME COURT, U. S.

Office-Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
JUN 17 1966
JOHN F. DAVIS, CLERK

In the

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM 1965

No. ~~1950~~ 150

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,

Petitioner,

against

EDWIN A. WALKER,

Respondent.

RESPONSE TO PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

WILLIAM ANDRESS, JR.,
Fidelity Union Life Building,
Dallas, Texas,

CLYDE J. WATTS,
219 Couch Drive,
Oklahoma City, Oklahoma.

WARLICK PRESS, INC.—2363 VALDINA STREET—DALLAS—NE 1-3130

INDEX

	Page
Jurisdiction	1
Statement of Case	2
Questions Presented	15
Reasons for Denying the Writ	18
Argument	19
I.	19
II.	25
III.	31
IV.	31
Conclusion	47

Page

Associated Press v. Taft-Ingalls Corporation (6 Cir. 65), 340 F. 2d 753, 766 23

Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 89 Law Ed. 2013 44

Associated Press v. Walker, 393 S.W. 2d 671 26

Burt v. Lochhausen, 151 Tex. 289, 249 S.W. 2d 194 26

Clark v. Drew Pearson (USDC, Dist. of Col. 1965), 248 Fed. Supp. 188 23

Davis v. Etter & Curtis (Tex. Civ. App., no writ history), 243 S.W. 603 12

Garrison v. Louisiana, (1964) 379 U.S. 64, 13 L. Ed. 2d 125 ..... 19, 35, 37, 38

In re King's Estate, 150 Tex. 662, 244 S.W. 2d 660 26

International News Service v. Associated Press, 248 U.S. 215, 63 Law Ed. 211 44

New York Times v. Sullivan, (1964) 376 U.S. 254, 11 L. Ed. 2d 686 ..... 19, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46

Norton Company v. Department of Revenue, 340 U.S. 534, 538, 95 L. Ed. 517 1

Pennekamp v. Florida, 328 U.S. 331, 345, 90 L. Ed. 1295 1

Pollard v. Lyon, 91 U.S. 225, 23 Law Ed. 308 35

Renfro Drug Company v. Lawson, 144 S.W. 2d 417 (Tex. Civ. App., no writ history) 35

Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75, 15 Law Ed. 2d 597 ..... 35, 37, 39, 43

Washington Post Company v. Chandler, 250 U.S. 290, 63 Law Ed. 987 35

18 U.S.C. §§ 2383 and 2384 ..... 34, 43

28 U.S.C. 1257(3) 1

33 Am. Jur. 44, Libel & Slander, § 11 35

In the

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM 1965

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,

Petitioner,

against

EDWIN A. WALKER,

Respondent.

RESPONSE TO PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

Respondent respectfully responds to the Petition for Writ of Certiorari by The Associated Press as follows:

JURISDICTION

Jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. 1257(3) should not permit re-examination of questions of fact decided by a jury in the trial court as to the truth or falsity of Petitioner's publication that Respondent had committed a crime, and as to measure of damage. Norton Company v. Department of Revenue, 340 U.S. 534, 538, 95 L. Ed. 517; Pennekamp v. Florida, 328 U.S. 331, 345, 90 L. Ed. 1295.

Petitioner published, as an "eye-witness report" by its Newsman ("who was on the scene and saw what happened"), a report that Respondent "assumed command of a mob" and "led a charge against U. S. Marshals" * * * criminal acts, in violation of Federal Statutes. A jury has specifically found that the report was false. The jurisdictional question is whether such a false report, knowingly made by an eye-witness, is privileged under Constitutional Freedom of the Press, and whether Texas Law may be applied to redress the wrong.

STATEMENT OF CASE

As part of its reporting of events involved in the riot upon the campus of Mississippi University on the night of September 30, 1962, Petitioner published, over its world wide wire service, reports that Respondent had committed criminal acts * * * assuming command of a riotous mob and leading a charge against U. S. Marshals. These reports by a self-styled eye-witness, employee of Petitioner, were found by the jury to be false.

The defamatory reports, quoted in full in the Associated Press Petition herein, included detailed, sensational and dramatic statements, as follows:

> "October 2, 1962 'Walker, who Sunday night led a charge of students against federal marshals on the Ole Miss Campus, was arrested on four counts including insurrection against the United States.'
>
> "October 3, 1962 (Editors Note: Former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, * * * was eating dinner Sunday night * * * was told there was a 'scene of considerable disturbance' on the University of Mississippi Campus. He went there. Here is the story of Van Savell, 21, Associated Press newsman, who was on the scene and saw what happened.)

"By Van Savell: Oxford, Miss., October 3, 1962 (AP) 'Utilizing my youth to the fullest extent, I dressed as any college student would and easily milled among the several thousand rioters on the University of Mississippi Campus Sunday night.

"This allowed me to follow the crowd—a few students and many outsiders—as they charged federal marshals surrounding the century old Lyceum Building. It also brought me into direct contact with former Army Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, who is now under arrest on charges of inciting insurrection and seditious conspiracy.

"Walker first appeared in the riot area at 8:45 p.m., Sunday near the University Avenue entrance about 300 yds. from the Ole Miss Administration Building.

* * * * *

"The crowd welcomed Walker, although this was the man who commanded the 101st Airborne Division during the 1957 school integration riots at Little Rock, Arkansas.

" 'One unidentified man queried Walker as he approached the group. "General, will you lead us to the steps?"

" 'I observed Walker as he loosened his tie and shirt and nodded "Yes" without speaking. He then conferred with a group of about 15 persons who appeared to be the riot leaders.

" 'The crowd took full advantage of the near-by construction work. They broke new bricks into several pieces, took survey sticks and broken soft drink bottles.

" 'Walker assumed command of the crowd, which I estimated at 1,000 but was delayed for several minutes when a neatly dressed, portly man of about 45 approached the group. He conferred with Walker for several minutes and then joined a group near the front.
" 'Two men took Walker by the arms and they headed for the Lyceum and the federal marshals. Throughout this time, I was less than six feet from Walker.

"'This march toward tear gas and some 200 marshals was more effective than the previous attempts. Although Walker was unarmed, the crowd said this was the moral support they needed.

"'We were met with a heavy barrage of tear gas about 75 yards from the Lyceum steps and went a few feet further when we had to turn back.

"'Before doing so, many of the rioters hurled their weapons—the bricks, the bottles, rocks and wooden stakes—toward the clustered marshals.

"'We fled the tear gas and the charging marshals—the crowd racing back to a Confederate soldier's statue near the grove entrance below the Lyceum.

"'I went to a telephone. A few minutes later I returned and found Walker talking with several students. Shortly thereafter, Walker climbed half-way up the Confederate monument and addressed the crowd.

"'I heard Walker say that Gov. Barnett had betrayed the People of Mississippi. "But don't let up now," he said, "You may lose this battle, but you will have been heard."

* * * * *

"There were cheers. It was apparent that Walker had complete command over the group.

"'By this time, it was nearly 11:00 p.m. and I raced to the telephone again. Upon my return, Walker was calmly explaining the "New Frontier Government" to several bystanders. He remained away from the rioting throughout the next few hours, but advised on several tactics."

After hearing all evidence of Petitioner as to the truth of the above reports, and the evidence of Respondent as to the falsity thereof, the jury returned its verdict as follows (Respondent's Appendix A):

Special Issue No. 1:

"Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the statement 'Walker, who Sunday led a charge of students against Federal Marshals on the Ole Miss Campus' was substantially true?

Answer: No.

Special Issue No. 2:

"Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the statement 'Walker, who Sunday led a charge of students against Federal Marshals on the Ole Miss Campus', complained of by plaintiff, constitutes fair comment describing the plaintiff's activities on or about September 30, 1962, at the places described in the evidence and under the then attendant circumstances?

Answer: No.

Special Issue No. 3:

"Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the statement inquired about in special issue No. 1 was made in good faith in reference to a matter in which the defendant had a duty to report to its members and thence to the public?

Answer: No.

Special Issue No. 5:

"Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the statement 'Walker assumed command of the crowd' was substantially true?

Answer: No.

Special Issue No. 6:

"Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the statement 'Walker assumed command of the crowd' complained of by plaintiff, constitutes fair comment describing plaintiff's activities on or about September 30, 1962, at the places described in the evidence and under the then attendant circumstances?

Answer: No.

Special Issue No. 7:

"Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the statement inquired about in special issue No. 5 was made in good faith in reference to a matter in which the defendant had a duty to report to its members and thence to the public?

Answer: No.

I. The lengthy background and intemperate statements which Petitioner includes in its petition, for the twenty pages of its "Statement of the Case", do not present a constitutional issue; and merely show that the trial jury, charged with final determination of disputed facts, could have believed the Associated Press witnesses. But the jury did not believe the Associated Press. They were not presented with all the facts by the Associated Press, which elected to try the case without Van Savell, who wrote the false story, or any other of its employees appearing before the jury; and the supported decision of the jury on the facts is final under our ancient right of Trial by Jury, as cherished constitutionally as Freedom of Speech and Freedom of the Press.

Petitioner's somewhat extravagant "Statement of the Case," at page 20 of its Petition, includes the following:

"The inescapable conclusion which emerges from the welter of testimony is this: whether Walker advanced toward the marshals with a small group or a large one, whether the mob was hurling missiles at the marshals or demanding 'that nigger' under a flag of truce, whether the advance proceeded at slow march or double-time, it is beyond dispute, even on the testimony offered by the plaintiff that Walker, during the four to five hours he was on the campus (S.F. 279-280), did, in fact, lead at least two charges on the federal marshals."

There was practically nothing undisputed in this lengthy record, replete with eye-witness accounts of a hectic night. Throughout the Petition, the Associated Press makes continuous use of the terms "unequivocal", 'uncontradicted," and "undisputed". Respondent challenges every such use of the terms, because very little was undisputed and the jury with ample evidence to decide found that Petitioner's report was false, that it was not fair comment, that it was not published in good faith.

The great weight and preponderance of the evidence is that:

(1) Walker was on the Campus on the night in question;

(2) He was an "observer", not a "participant" in the riots;

(3) On the few occasions when he mingled with the crowd, he did not "lead a charge";

(4) He did not "assume command of the crowd";

(5) The jury's findings were based upon evidence reasonably supporting its verdict;

(6) Petitioner's claim that "it is beyond dispute that Walker did, in fact, lead at least two charges on the Federal Marshals" is not supported by the evidence. In fact, a view of the evidence will overwhelmingly repel such a conclusion. In order to conclude that Walker "assumed command" and "led a charge", completely overturning the jury's verdict, this Honorable Court, on Petition for Certiorari must disregard evidence as follows:

(a) Walker (S.F. 605-976): Testified in great detail as to his every action on the campus; and, in answer to repeated questions as to whether he "led anybody" his answers were, "No, I certainly did not". His answers to extensive questions on direct, and piercing cross-examination, were consistently that he was on the campus only to observe, and not to participate in the activities of the crowd. He refused requests of the students to "be our leader". He never got out of a walk during the entire night. In his language, "I never have had anything to do with the activities of the students toward the Marshals". (S.F. 706). When the Highway Patrol started to leave, the students became excited, with cries, "Barnett has sold us out". At this point, he agreed, for the first time, to speak, and advise the crowd that Barnett had not sold them out, that the Highway Patrol Chief, Birdsong, had let Meredith on the campus. He further advised them that "Nobody came to Mississippi for violence, No violence was intended." (At which time, the students began to 'boo'.) He further told them "You can protest, you have a right to protest, but this is not the place for violence" (All of which was in accord with the United Press report). After the speech, the crowd dispersed, and he moved slowly up near the flagpole in the center of the University Circle. (S.F. 684-700). He specifically described the "sporadic" activity of the crowd at the times when Petitioner contends that "it is beyond dispute that Walker did, in fact, lead two charges"; and, when asked, "Did you participate in any activities of the crowd", his answer was, "I certainly did not". (S.F. 700.) In order to accept Petitioner's assertion that Walker, beyond dispute led two charges, this Honorable Court must assume that he deliberately lied, under oath, in the presence of the jury, and that the testimony of defendant's witnesses, which included neither Savell nor any other employee of Petitioner, "corroborated and amplified the conclusion that Walker did, in fact, lead a charge and assume command of the crowd, as argued at Page 21 of the Petition, and this, without hearing such witnesses, observing their demeanor, and feeling the impact of conflicts in their evidence.

(b) Gwinn Cole: Assistant Director, Miss. Highway Patrol, testified that there was no violence until the U. S. Marshals fired tear gas into the backs of the Highway Patrol, who were separating students from the Marshals, and into the face of the students; and that, thereafter, there was no "organized charge", but only sporadic activity, with small groups, not more than 7 or 8, coming out of the crowd and throwing missiles toward the Marshals, until the time he left at 9:50, which was coincident with the timing of Walker's speech from the Monument. (S.F. 1332, 1333).

(c) Louis Leman: A responsible young businessman, of Houston, Texas, who was with Walker the entire evening, and testified, positively, that Walker, at no time, participated in the activity of the crowd, assumed command, or led a charge. He covered the speech on the Monument, and described Walker's actions, both before and after, including his refusal to "lead the students," and his demeanor, which included at no time any movement faster than a slow walk. (S.F. 394-468).

(d) Cecil Holland: A reporter for the Washington Star, with 30 years experience. Testified that he was in the vicinity of the Campus Circle, and near the Marshals. He described sporadic activity of the crowd. He saw Walker at one time southwest of the Monument. He saw him lead no charge, or participate in any other activity of the crowd. In fairness, however, the witness did not testify that his visibility was such that he must necessarily have seen him. (S.F. 491-549).

(e) Al Kuettner: Testified that he was United Press newsman, at a point east of the Monument on University Avenue, as Walker was entering the Campus about 9:00 p.m. He saw him again on the Monument, and heard his speech. After hearing the speech, he reported, over the United Press Wire Service that, "during a lull in the rioting, General Edwin A. Walker mounted a Confederate Statue on the Campus and begged the students to avoid their violence." He also stated that Walker's speech was met with jeers. He described the events involved in the riot, but saw Walker take no part therein. (Again, he was not keeping a constant watch; but it is significant that, if anything so sensational as a charge having been led by a former Major General in the United States Army had occurred, no such report appeared upon the wire service of United Press.) (S.F. 1242-1304). When he saw Walker come on the Campus, with two men abreast, it was when he first arrived, and the witness did not say that the other persons, ahead of him and behind him, appeared to be in his party. (S.F. 1303-1304).

(f) Talmage Witt: A Deputy Sheriff of Pontotoc County, Mississippi, was with Walker practically all of the time involved. He testified postively that Walker took no part in any of the violence. (S.F. 383). He also described Walker's activities, as walking slowly about the Campus, without leading the charges on the Marshals or participating in the activities of the crowd. He refuted a portion of a written statement that had been given to one of the AP counsel, at a time when that counsel was representing him in a legal matter, and testified, positively, under oath, that Walker never did lead a charge, or participate in any act of violence. (S.F. 270-382).

(g) Ben Thomas: An AP newsman, who took the original telephone report from Savell. He testified postively that Savell had reported only sporadic activity before Walker's speech from the Monument, and that Walker got down from the Monument after completing his speech, and then led a charge against the Marshals. (S.F. 121-138).

(h) Other witnesses: Plaintiff offered the testimony of witnesses, Sweatt (S.F. 140), Cox (S.F. 245) May (S.F. 1198) Hunter (S.F. 1027) Carrington (S.F. 549), MacFarland (S.F. 554), Watkins (S.F. 564), McRae (S:F. 576), Snyder (S.F. 582), Edwards (S.F. 584), whose testimony completely accounted for all of the time that Walker was on the Campus, and effectively refuted defendant's contention that Savell was "substantially" telling the truth when he reported that he had seen Walker assume command of the crowd and lead a charge. Although the Savell report, and his testimony by deposition, fixed the time of the charge as before Walker's speech from the Monument, the witnesses all testified positively that Walker led no charge and had no command over the crowd, either before or after the speech.

II. Associated Press did not bring to Court its "eye-witness" Van Savell, so that the jury could compare, from the witness stand, his sincerity, demeanor, and candor with that of the respondent, Walker, as part of its necessary evaluation as to who was telling the truth. He was not there to tell the jury by way of explanation that perhaps he was excited and upset during the midst of the riot, that he did the best that he could, and that if he misinterpreted what General Walker did, it was an honest misinterpretation on his part. It is generally held that when a party fails to produce a witness who is under its control, that failure may be considered as evidence against it, and the jury may properly infer that he was not produced because his testimony would have been harmful, and that general rule prevails in Texas. Davis v. Etter & Curtis, (Tex. Civ. App., no writ. history), 243 S.W. 603. With "malice" defined as "knowingly false" or in "reckless disregard of the truth" if Savell, claiming to have been less than six feet from Walker, reported that he saw "two men take him by the arms and they headed for the federal marshals", the report was either true or knowingly false. Without Savell having appeared, the jury found the report false. Petitioner claims a Constitutional right to publish the false report, accusing Respondent of a crime."

III. At page 10 of its Petition the Associated Press asks the "naggingly persistent" question: "Why was General Walker of Dallas, Texas, at the campus of the University of Mississippi?" and thereupon proceeds to recite public statements of Respondent on prior occasions which were used before the jury in an obvious attempt to prejudice the Respondent's case to the point of obscuring the real issues. These statements, though appearing intemperate in retrospect, provide no proof, as a matter of law, that Respondent assumed command of the mob or led a charge. Furthermore, they are not pertinent to any defense of "fair comment", which was found against the Associated Press, because the deposition of the youth who wrote the story admits that he was not familiar with what had been going on, did not even know about Walker's prior statements, and so he could not be actuated by them at all (S.F. 1072, 1125).

The "question" as propounded by Petitioner at page 2 is "whether State libel laws may be applied to this case * * * particularly at the behest of General Walker." The answer is that this Honorable Court, committed by tradition and precedent to equal justice under the law, will ignore this emotional appeal to prejudice and consider solely the legal issue as to whether Petitioner has been deprived of its Constitutional Freedom of the Press, whether Associated Press is immune from liability for publishing as a fact this false report of its newsman that he saw Walker committing a crime, which the jury has found that Walker did not commit.

Walker himself explained why he was there, and without contradiction. He said that before he resigned from the Army he had been in command of the troops at Little Rock, and that the news stories of the events up there were so distorted and bore so little resemblance to the facts, that he wanted to see for himself what was actually occurring in Mississippi rather than relying upon the press. If the public statement should be considered as debate, "uninhibited, robust and wide open", and if Walker's presence in Mississippi should be considered, as obviously intended, as his "demonstration" against the use of troops in Mississippi, then in fairness to the record his sworn testimony as to this purpose in going to Mississippi becomes material:

> "Q. (by Mr. Gooch) Now, General, just what was your purpose in going to Mississippi?

"A. I thought it was absolutely wrong to use military forces, troops, American troops in a strictly civilian problem.

"Q. All right.

"Mr. Watts: Let him finish.

"A. And I wanted to see for myself exactly what happened. I wanted to know from first hand information. And I did not trust the press reporting of it in any form, since I had been at Little Rock and seen that exaggerated out of all proportions, and I intended to see for myself." (S.F. 805).

It is respectfully suggested that, except for the purpose of slanting the evidence, Walker's "purpose" in going to Mississippi is not material and provides no basis for overturning the verdict of the jury, which specifically found that: 1) Walker did not "assume command of the crowd" or "lead a charge against federal marshals"; 2) the statements were not fair comment; 3) such statements were not made in "good faith" by petitioner.

The issue that was decided by the jury, upon sharply conflicting evidence, involved Walker's actions, not his purpose in going to Mississippi. His purpose could involve a right or freedom, equally important, under the Constitution, as the Freedom of the Press. His actions, however, if in violation of the criminal statutes, as falsely charged by Associated Press, could result in arrest and imprisonment. The Constitutional question herein presented, and the only one, is whether the Press is immune from liability under state law for falsely reporting that "I saw Walker commit a crime," which a jury of 12 American Citizens has found that he did not commit. In short, the Press has a Constitutional right to report the news, but not to make the news. Inaccuracy in good faith in reporting the news is protected. A known falsehood in making the news is not. Savell "was there and saw what happened." His report was either true or knowingly false. At six feet an "honest mistake" is incredible.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

At pages 2 through 4 of its Petition, Associated Press presents purported questions involved in this proceeding. Respondent respectfully suggests that the questions, themselves, are slanted to be "self-answering" and are not decisive of the real issues in this case. Respondent suggests alternate questions conforming to the record as follows: (Petitioner's questions are in regular type, Respondent's suggested questions are in heavier type)

1. Whether the doctrine enunciated in * * * Sullivan, is limited to public officials or applies to other persons or circumstances:

1. This Question is Proper.

A. Whether, consistent with * * * constitution, state libel laws may be applied to news reports, made without malice, respecting events of profound * * * importance * * *, such as riots * * * at Oxford 1 , particularly at the behest of one who, like General Walker, wilfully, aggressively, and defiantly thrust himself into the vortex of that confrontation.

A. Whether the common law of libel may be applied in a State Court to a news agency which sells knowingly false stories imputing treasonable activities to a private citizen who is exercising his same right to informed observation of events of public interest as is the news agency.

B. Whether, consistent with * * * constitution, state libel laws may be applied to news reports, made without actual malice, respecting events of public * * * importance, such as enforcement * * * of judgments of U. S. Courts * * *, particularly at behest of one who, like General Walker, wilfully, aggressively and defiantly thrust himself into the vortex of the controversy.

B. Does the Constitution relieve the press from liability for libel, where a jury has found that the defamatory statement accusing Respondent of a crime was false, was not fair comment, and was not made in good faith?

C. Whether, consistent with the * * * constitution, state libel laws may be applied to news reports made without actual malice concerning public activities of persons like General Walker in connection with controversies of profound * * * national interest * * *, where such persons are actively attempting to influence the outcome of such controversies and * * * are regarded * * * by virtue of their stature and activities, in a position significantly to influence the resolution of the issues thus presented.

C. Whether, when a jury has found that Walker did not lead a charge nor assume command of the mob, and that such charges were false, not fair comment, and not made in good faith, the Associated Press can use disputed fact issues found against it to misrepresent to this Court that Walker was actively attempting to influence the outcome of such controversies.

2. Whether an award of general damages of $500,000.00 for the publication, without actual malice or any proof of pecuniary or other loss, of reports of newsworthy events is so oppressive that it inhibits freedom of expression to an extent which violates the * * * constitution.

2. Is a $500,000.00 verdict for damages for libel constitutionally oppressive, where the defendant the largest and most powerful news media on earth has knowingly and falsely charged Respondent with sedition and insurrection against the government that he had sworn to defend, which resulted in his arrest and imprisonment in a mental prison, and the creation of a false public image around the world as a lunatic and criminal, after having risen to the rank of Major General in the U. S. Army, with background as an effective combat Commander.

3. Whether the record in this case on the issues of "substantial truth" and "fair comment" is so lacking in evidentiary support for the judgment below that that judgment constitutes a denial of due process in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution.

3. Whether the record contains competent evidence supporting the jury's verdict that the defamatory statements were false, not fair comment, and not made in good faith.

4. Whether the defense of "fair comment", as construed and applied by the Texas Courts in this case, is so limited as to violate the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution.

4. Under the guise of "fair comment", can the Press publish with immunity a false report that a person had been actually seen committing a crime?

5. Whether the application of State Libel Laws to the publications here complained of and in the circumstances disclosed by this record constitutes a denial of the freedoms of speech and press guaranteed by the * * * Constitution.

5. Does the constitutional freedom of the press to "report the news" permit it, with immunity to "make the news" by publication of an alleged eyewitness report that a person committed a crime that he did not commit?

REASONS FOR DENYING THE WRIT

I.

The Constitution, as interpreted by this Honorable Court, does not extend to the Press immunity from the Law of Libel for defamatory invasion of the Civil Rights of a citizen to his good reputation, by falsely and in bad faith accusing him of a crime, even though he may be a "public figure", involved in matters of public concern.

II.

The jury's verdict and the trial court's judgment in this case are supported by the evidence in the record.

III.

The verdict was reasonable under the circumstances, and certainly does not violate the Constitution.

IV.

The Sullivan rule does not apply when the defamed individual falsely accused of crime is not a public official, but is a private citizen, even though he is a figure of public interest.

ARGUMENT

I

The Constitution, as interpreted by this Honorable Court, does not extend to the Press immunity from the Law of Libel for defamatory invasion of the Civil Rights of a citizen to his good reputation, by falsely and in bad faith accusing him of a crime, even though he may be a "public figure", involved in matters of public concern.

The Petition in the instant case seeks to extend the perimeter of two vital decisions by this Honorable Court.

New York Times v. Sullivan, (1964) 376 U.S. 254, 11 L. Ed. 2d 686

"* * debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide open, and it may well include vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on Government and public officials

"The constitutional guarantees require, we think, a federal rule that prohibits a public official from recovering damages for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves that the statement was made with 'actual malice'—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not. * *"

Garrison v. Louisiana, (1964) 379 U.S. 64, 13 L. Ed. 2d 125

"The use of calculated falsehood, however, would put a different cast on the constitutional question. Although honest utterance, even if inaccurate, may further the fruitful exercise of the right of free speech, it does not follow that the lie, knowingly and deliberately published about a public official, should enjoy a like immunity.

"Hence the knowingly false statement and the false statement made with reckless disregard of the truth, do not enjoy constitutional protection."

In simple and stark reality, the Associated Press pleads for a Constitutional Right to publish with impunity, and around the world, a statement that its newsman had seen Walker commit a crime that he did not commit, according to the verdicts of two juries.* In the instant case, after an extended trial involving sharply conflicting evidence, the jury found that the Associated Press report, that Walker assumed command of the crowd and led a charge against U.S. Marshals" was: 1) False, 2) Not fair comment, 3) Not made in good faith.

The Associated Press, "dealing in a highly salable commodity * * * NEWS, published, for hire and around the world, the sensational report of its newsman, Van Savell, 21, "who was on the scene and saw what happened". Savell, who, as we have said, did not appear in Court to testify, wrote a dramatic, sensational and detailed report that Walker, under arrest for insurrection and seditious conspiracy, had entered the campus, assumed command of the crowd, led a charge against U.S. Marshals, and then made an inflammatory speech to the crowd.

Under the trial court's instructions, which fully protected Petitioner from liability for an "honest mistake" of its reporter, the element of "malice" is implicit in the jury's verdict.

* See p. 25, of Petition for Writ, referring to Louisiana Case.

If the report was false, as the jury found, it was also, by definition and of necessity, knowingly false.

Either Savell saw Walker "assume command of the crowd and lead a charge", or he did not * * * there is no middle ground for this newsman of the Associated Press, who purports to have reported what he had actually seen, from a distance of six feet. If the report was false, neither Savell, nor his employer, Associated Press, who for profit was willing to malign around the world the reputation of an outstanding American soldier and citizen upon the unsupported statement of its inexperienced 21 year old newsman, can contend that the statements therein were other than knowingly false. Under the circumstances presented by the record in this case, either Walker assumed command of the crowd and led a charge, or Savell and Associated Press have falsely and deliberately accused him of a crime. If, as the jury found, Walker had not assumed command of the crowd and had not led a charge, and Savell and Petitioner falsely reported that he had done so, the Court is confronted with a deliberate misstatement * * * not an "erroneous" misstatement, within the protection of the First Amendment, as construed by this Honorable Court, hereafter discussed.

In addition to the issue as to whether the report was "knowingly false", the record supports a finding that the publication by Associated Press of the Savell report was in reckless disregard of the truth. Testimony of the Associated Press newsman, B. R. Thomas, by deposition, was that Savell had first reported to him, at the newsroom in New Orleans, that Walker had made a speech to the students from the monument, stating that "if they retreated and went home, they would be cowards, that they should stand up and fight", and that Walker then got down from the monument and "led the group of yelling, screaming, brick throwing" (S.F. 134, 138) students as close to the marshals as they could get, until they were turned back by tear gas.

Savell's "eye-witness" report, and his testimony by deposition, outlined in striking detail the actions of Walker in assuming command of the crowd and leading a charge before the speech on the monument.

In addition to the above notice to Associated Press that Savell was at least mixed up in the timing of his report, Associated Press also had access to the report of United Press that, "during a lull in the rioting, General Edwin A. Walker mounted a Confederate statue on the campus and begged the students to avoid their violence. He was met with one massive jeer." (S.F. 1249).

After the Associated Press senior newsman, Relman Morin, arrived in Oxford on the day after the riots, he, also, wrote a dramatic story about Walker leading a charge against the marshals. (S.F. 1113). He was forced to admit that the only source of his information was Savell. (S.F. 1108).

The question as to whether this performance by the most powerful news media in America would amount to "reckless disregard for the truth" seems self-answering.

The far flung and powerful facilities of the Associated Press are supported by the American people at a cost approximating forty million dollars per year to provide a source of current and reliable news. Its mission is to assemble, collate and disseminate accurate information. Its resources have extended almost to the point of monopoly. Associated Press v. Taft-Ingalls Corporation, (6 Cir. 65), 340 F. 2d. 753, 766.

Such power implies an equivalent duty, with commensurate standards of accuracy and integrity. It should not be a violation of the Constitution that reasonable standards, which would preclude falsely charging a citizen with commission of a crime, should be recognized by law, rather than left to the whim of Associated Press. In fact, such a legal duty may enhance public confidence in the Associated Press, which may have been shaken by recent events.

In Clark v. Drew Pearson (USDC, Dist. of Col. 1965), 248 Fed. Supp. 188, District Judge Holtzoff, has presented a most scholarly analysis of the importance of the Law of Libel as a safeguard of the civil rights of a citizen as against an all powerful press. Pertinent language is as follows:

> "The arguments * * * included a plea for drastic changes in the law of libel, in a manner that would radically devitalize and impair the protection that it affords against defamatory publications. In view of this circumstance, it seems appropriate to make a few observations on the basic status of the law of libel in Anglo-American jurisprudence.
>
> "The common law sedulously guarantees to every individual various civil rights, such as the right of personal freedom, the right of personal safety, and the right of property. Another civil right safeguarded by the common law is the right to one's reputation. * * * (248 F. Supp. 190-191)

"The current trend in the law is to enhance and augment the protection of individual civil rights. No reason appears for making an exception as to the right to reputation. * * Most civil actions relate only to money, while actions for libel or slander involve honor and reputation, which are to be considered on a higher level. . . . (248 F. Supp. 191)

"Counsel for the defendants in this case urge the Court, however, to apply the principle of the Sullivan case to all public figures or public persons, including those in private life, and to abrogate the limitation to public officials. In effect, they seek to transform two specific exceptions carved out by a process of erosion into an extensive demolition and destruction of the law by an act of avulsion. This Court perceives no reason in principle or in justice for radically undermining the law of libel, in this manner, nor does it find any precedents for doing so. The law of libel, as has been shown, is a vital and important aspect of the law of torts. It is one of the branches of law that safeguard individual civil rights. It should not be whittled away. (Emphasis added) * * *

If the wire services, Associated Press and United Press engage in open competition, with salability of their news product related to its sensational and dramatic content, and with no legal responsibility to those victimized by false defamation, the efforts of competing newsmen will inevitably be directed more to sensation than to accuracy, with the result that public confidence in the news would eventually be undermined.

It does not seem an undue hardship, and certainly not deprivation of a constitutional right, that a wire service should be required to defend, in Court, a report that its newsman had actually seen a citizen committing a crime.

The reciprocal hardship upon the citizen, facing criminal prosecution because of such false reports, without legal remedy, would involve the loss of his most precious rights, his liberty and good reputation, without due process of law.

Such Freedom of the Press, without legal responsibility, could deteriorate into a license to destroy reputations and careers and rigidly control the development of political and governmental leadership.

It would appear that, in the instant case, the submission to the jury by the trial court of the question of substantial truth, fair comment, and good faith should have been amply sufficient to protect the constitutional freedom of Petitioner from responsibility for false statements that were not knowingly made or made in reckless disregard for the truth.

It is respectfully submitted that Petitioner's constitutional rights were protected in the trial of this case, and that it has not been held liable for a good faith comment upon facts which were substantially true.

II.

The jury's verdict and the trial court's judgment in this case are supported by the evidence in the record.

Under Question No. 3, Petitioner raises the issue as to whether the record before the trial court involving "substantial truth" and "fair comment" is so lacking in evidentiary support that the trial court's judgment constitutes a denial of due process of law. Under "Reasons for Granting the Writ", Petitioner asserts that Respondent's case represents one of the most "serious and successful attacks ever made on the freedom of the press," with the fundamental right of the news media "to publish and disseminate, without fear or favor, good faith reports and comment concerning events of national significance and persons of political prominence".

At the start of this issue, it is respectfully suggested to the Court that the State procedure involves not only the answering of special issues by unanimous verdict of a jury, but review of the jury's verdict by a Court of Civil Appeals, which is required to search and review the record to ascertain if the verdict is "against the weight and preponderance of the evidence and is manifestly unjust". See in re King's Estate, 150 Tex. 662, 244 S.W. 2d 660; Burt v. Lochhausen, 151 Tex. 289, 249 S.W. 2d 194.

In Associated Press v. Walker, 393 S.W. 2d 671, the Court of Civil Appeals, Second Supreme Judicial District of Texas, reviewed and affirmed the findings of fact by the jury and the trial court. Even a casual review of the record which was available to that Court will reveal that these appellate courts did not lightly put their stamp of approval upon a judgment and verdict so lacking in evidentiary support as to constitute a denial of due process of law.

As set forth in Respondent's summary of evidence, supra, there is massive evidence in the record that Respondent was, at most, an observer of the events upon the campus, and did not participate in the violent activities of the crowd. Comparison of the purported summary of evidence under Petitioner's "Statement of the Case" with the citations to the record will reveal that, when the statements are read in their true perspective, without slanting and in proper sequence and the context, the overwhelming weight of the evidence is that Walker did not assume command of the crowd, and did not lead a charge, and that the jury's finding that such statements by Petitioner were not "substantially true" is supported by the record.

The purported summary of the evidence at pages 11-24 of the Petition for Writ leads off with Walker's public statements, obviously providing no proof as to his actions on the campus, and, at most, providing a prejudicial background for the subsequent summary of the facts and evidence.

At pages 14 and 15, the background of the riot is summarized from the witness Cox as including violence, in which the evidence referred to in the record conclusively establishes Walker had no participation (S.F. 258; Petition, page 14). But this same witness, Cox on re-direct examination testified.

"Q. During the time you saw him, did you see him lead a charge?

"A: No, sir."

Another typical example of distortion of the evidence appears at page 19 of the Petition, where the statement of the witness, Charles May (S.F. 1231), that he saw Walker "walking toward the flag pole with a crowd surrounding him" is presented as indicating that Walker was leading a charge. A review of the complete testimony of this witness reveals that his testimony was specific that Walker did not lead a charge. Typical is the statement of this witness (S.F. 1213): "A. I asked him, I said, 'General Walker, do you think if you were in charge here, you could stop the riot?' and he said, 'hell, if I had been in charge here we wouldn't have had a riot'. Well, anyway, he was moving around at this time, sort of moseying back and forth in front of the statue." A fair appraisal of the entire testimony of this witness is that he described Walker as merely "walking around the area, shaking hands, and observing."

The witness, Hunter, (P. 19, Petition) is referred to as having testified that Walker 'exhorted his listeners: 'come on, let's go' or 'let's go up and see,'. The actual testimony of the witness was:

> "A. Yes, sir, right after making a speech, he stepped down and people were still shaking hands with him and talking to him and he talked to a few of them and came over in the direction where I was and he says, 'let's walk up here and see what's going on' or something like that." (S.F. 1040, 1050)

(This is typical of the evidence relied upon by Petitioner to establish that Walker "led a charge".)

The testimony of the witness, Jackson, is also cited (Petition, 19) as indicating that Walker "led a charge". The statements relied upon being that "the General walked to the vicinity of the flag pole; that 10 or 15 people followed him; that 25 were with him; and that those in front of him were throwing rocks."

The witness actually testified that he and other students had requested Walker to lead them, that Walker had refused to answer, and walked with them, at a very slow gait, to the vicinity of the flag pole in the center of the circle (S.F. 1007-8). The witness was asked if Walker participated in the riot in any way, and answered "no, sir." (S.F. 1010-1011). He also testified that Walker "stood there and looked several minutes, just at the marshals. He stood there." (S.F. 1008). He testified that the students around Walker were not close enough to throw a missile at the marshals (S.F. 1011). From the entire testimony of this witnes, it is obvious the reference in the Petition, "that those in front of him were throwing rocks" did not involve any one close to Walker, and that this statement is made by Petitioner, completely out of context.

Again, at page 20, Petitioner referred to the testimony of the witness, Edwards (S.F. 597) as establishing that "Walker approached the flag pole, accompanied by some fifty or sixty people." The testimony of this witness, immediately following that referred to by the Petitioner was:

> "Q. Did that fifty or sixty go with him?
>
> "A. They weren't following him. He wasn't leading any group."

This witness testified (S.F. 588) that Walker remained near the monument for some ten/twenty minutes, after his speech, which squarely contradicted testimony of several of the Petitioner's witnesses, that Walker moved toward the Lyceum immediately after the speech. He described Walker's movement as a "slow casual walk up there". The tenor of the entire testimony of this witness was that Walker participated in no way in the violent activities of the crowd.

Also at page 20 of the Petition, testimony of the witness, Cox, is summarized as having Walker in the middle of a group walking toward the Marshals, some waving a flag of truce and demanding, "we want that nigger". A review of the actual testimony of this witness (S.F. 247) will reveal that this movement toward the marshals had nothing whatever to do with Walker, and that the students who went on forward were endeavoring to talk with the marshals, but were not in any way associated with Walker. The comment about the "nigger" is obviously another attempt to inject a sly element of prejudice against Respondent, in no way supported by the evidence.

Again, at page 20 of the Petition, the testimony of the witness, Sweat, is referred to as supporting the conclusion that Walker "led a charge," in that he "walked toward the flag pole a second time after his speech with about fifteen people, including some who had missiles in their hands." Without further encumbering this already lengthy discussion, Respondent respectfully suggests that, if the entire testimony of this witness, Sweat, can reasonably be construed to establish that Walker actually led a charge or charges against the U. S. marshals, the argument of Petitioner is sound. On the other hand, if the testimony of this typical witness can reasonably be construed as evidence that Walker did not assume command of the crowd or lead a charge against the marshals, there must, of necessity, be sufficient evidence after review of the entire record to support the verdict of the jury, and the judgment of the trial court, affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals. We respectfully invite the attention of the Court to the entire testimony of this witness, (S.F. 140-244) as typical of the evidence offered by Respondent to refute the charges by Petitioner that Respondent had assumed command of the crowd and led a charge.

Respondent respectfully submits that the evidence in the record supports the verdict of the jury that: 1) the publication of Petitioner that Walker assumed command of the crowd and led a charge against U. S. marshals was not substantially true, 2) that the publication did not constitute "fair comment", 3) that the publication was not made in good faith.

III.

The verdict was reasonable under the circumstances, and certainly does not violate the Constitution.

As pointed out in the trial of this case, the issues involved are even bigger than the parties. The largest news media on earth published, around the world, a false statement that Respondent, a man of international reputation, had committed an act of sedition and insurrection against the government which he had sworn to defend, as a Major General in the United States army. The Respondent, as a result of the false charge, will bear to his grave a public image as a criminal and a lunatic. In addition, he suffered for six dismal days and nights imprisonment in a mental prison hospital, amid an atmosphere of criminal insanity. His long-time comrade in arms, Colonel Dornblaser testified that, when he read of Walker leading a charge of students against U. S. marshals, he thought he had "really lost his marbles" and that "an army officer that had been trained as he, with his reputation, could not possibly have led a bunch of unarmed students against armed marshals."

The Associated Press had gambled, by releasing the report of its newsman, before Walker had been charged by federal authorities with a crime, for the highest stakes known to human conflict * * * human reputation and liberty. They lost, when their premature publication was not later supported by an arrest, trial, and conviction of Walker.

The frustration, degradation and humiliation incident to this publication was a proper element of consideration by the jury.

The amount of damages to an individual similarly situated to Respondent is almost beyond measure in dollars and cents. It is the end of Justice that no one shall suffer wrong. Respondent has suffered. Petitioner has properly been required to compensate.

Certainly, for an organization as wide spread and powerful as the Associated Press, the damages do not represent a ruinous amount.

As to the contention that such an award of damage would preclude the news media from fairly and accurately reporting the news, it is respectfully submitted that the Associated General Walker, simply, thoroughly, and accurately that Press could have reported the events at Oxford involving

* * * 1) Walker issued public statements, 2) he came to the campus during the riot, 3) he mingled with the crowd, 4) he made a speech, 5) he remained in the area after the speech.

If Walker had actually assumed command of the crowd and led a charge, as reported by the Associated Press, and if the government had charged him with a crime, the Petitioner could have reported such facts, after the charge, with immunity and privilege. Where they elected, however, to publish upon the unsupported statement of a 21 year old boy, whose reports were conflicting in time and fact as they came into the New Orleans news room, that Walker had committed a crime, they gambled human liberty and reputation against a highly sensational and salable news story. Had the government indicted and convicted Walker, their gamble would have paid off. Without such indictment and conviction, however, the Associated Press was properly required to answer in a Court of Justice and Law as to the accuracy and good faith of its reporter.

That the jury has returned a verdict of $500,000.00, affirmed by two appellate courts, is no ground for a judicial determination that the hasty, irresponsible and improvident action of Associated Press should be protected by a constitutional shield to be created for its benefit, at the expense of the rights of an American citizen, If verdicts of this size for defamation will hamper free dissemination of the news, the answer is very simple—don't lie.

It is respectfully submitted, that the verdict of the jury in this case, in amount, does not invade the constitutional rights of Petitioner.

IV.

The Sullivan rule does not apply when the defamed individual falsely accused of crime is not a public official, but is a private citizen, even though he is a figure of public interest.

It is now determined by all of the Courts in Texas, that under the common law rules of libel, which were not codified into statutes until 1901, the Associated Press is guilty per se in charging Walker, a private citizen, a resigned Major General drawing no government retirement pay, with insurrection and inciting a riot against the United States marshals, statutory crimes under the Acts of Congress sounding in treason. Unless that determination of the Texas Courts under common law libel is in conflict with the constitution of the United States, that sovereign determination should not be disturbed, and this Court should not exercise its jurisdiction to overturn the Texas construction of the common law as adopted in Texas.

Under 18 U.S.C. §§2383 and 2384, the chapter pertaining to rebellion, insurrection, and seditious conspiracy, one guilty of opposing by force the authority of the federal government or using force to prevent, hinder, or delay the execution of the laws of the United States, is subject to fines ranging from $10,000.00 to $20,000.00, or imprisonment ranging from 10 to 20 years, or both, and becomes incapable of holding any office under the United States.

The libelous story of the Associated Press, after accusing Walker of assuming command of a mob rioting against the marshals, and leading a charge, mentions his arrest on charges of inciting insurrection and seditious conspiracy.

Imputation of crime is libel per se in almost every English speaking jurisdiction, and the cases are collated in 33 Am. Jur. 44, Libel & Slander, §11. The rule was recognized by this Court in Pollard v. Lyon, 91 U.S. 225, 23 Law Ed. 308, and Washington Post Company v. Chaloner, 250 U.S. 290, 63 Law Ed. 987.

The libel laws of Texas were first enacted into statute in 1901, and did no more than codify the historical definitions of libel under the common law, which had been adopted in Texas on 20 January 1840, by Article 1 of the Statutes. Renfro Drug Company v. Lawson, 144 S.W. 2d 417 (Tex. Civ. App., no writ history).

In other words, the respondent here does not rely upon any statute peculiar to Texas, but only upon the common law, which creates a distinction, as we shall hereinafter point out, with such cases as the Sullivan case relied upon by the petitioner.

The petitioner presents five questions for review, but then relies almost entirely upon imploring this Court to change its construction of New York Times Company v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 11 Law Ed. 2d 686, as repeated in Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64, 13 Law Ed. 2d 125, and Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75, 15 Law Ed. 2d 597.

But there are at least four major distinctions between this case and Sullivan, distinctions which by their nature would inhibit rather than enlarge Sullivan. Let us state them, and then return to argue them.

First and foremost, Sullivan was confined to public officials exclusively, and this respondent is a private citizen who, by his outstanding military career and his outspoken convictions and principles, is concededly a figure of public interest.

Second, Sullivan did not impute a crime, a libel per se under general principles of law, but here a resigned Major General was charged with insurrection against his country.

Third, in Sullivan the defendant was a newspaper, with the normal privileges of the press. Here, the Associated Press is not a newspaper, but a merchant of news selling its commodity, its stock in trade, and not producing a periodical for public persual within the definition of a newspaper or the press.

Fourth, and finally, in Sullivan the statutes of Alabama inhibited the Freedom of the Press by the creation of presumptions and changing the burden of proof facilitating recovery by plaintiff. No such situation exists here, and there is no action by the State of Texas in any manner infringing the Fourteenth Amendment, but the Texas Courts simply follow the common law of libel.

With regard to the fact that the respondent is not a public official, and therefore not within the scope of Sullivan, we must reluctantly impose upon the Court's patience by repeating what it has seen many times before: excerpts from Sullivan, Garrison, and Rosenblatt. The emphasis has been added by us throughout.

> "We are required in this case to determine for the first time the extent to which the constitutional protections for speech and press limit a State's power to avoid damages in a libel action brought by a public official against critics of his official conduct." 376 U.S. 256.
>
> "We hold that the rule of law applied by the Alabama Courts is constitutionally deficient for failure to provide the safeguards for freedom of speech and of the press that are required by the First and Fourteenth Amendments in a libel action brought by a public official against critics of his official conduct." Page 264.
>
> "The question before us is whether this rule of liability, as applied to an action brought by a public official against critics of his official conduct, abridges the freedom of speech and of the press that is guaranteed by the First and Fourteenth Amendments." Page 268.
>
> "The right of free public discussion of the stewardship of public officials was thus, in Madison's view a fundamental principle of the American form of government." Page 275.
>
> "A rule compelling the critic of official conduct to guarantee the truth of all of his factual assertions * * *" Page 279.
>
> "Under such a rule, would be critics of official conduct may be deterred from voicing their criticism * * *" Page 279.
>
> "The constitutional guarantees require, we think, a federal rule that prohibits a public official from recovering damages for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves that the state—ment was made with 'actual malice'—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not." Page 279.

"Such a privilege for criticism of official conduct is appropriately analogous to the protection accorded a public official when he is sued for libel by a private citizen." Page 281.

"It would give public servants an unjustified preference over the public they serve, if critics of official conduct did not have a fair equivalent of the immunity granted to the officials themselves." Page 282.

"We hold today that the Constitution limits a State's power to award damages for libel in actions brought by public officials against critics of their official conduct. Since this is such an action, the rule requiring proof of actual malice is applicable." Page 283.

"We have no occasion here to determine how far down into the lower ranks of government employees the 'public official' designation would extend for purposess of this rule, or otherwise to specify categories of persons who would or would not be included. Nor need we here determine the boundaries of the 'official conduct' concept. It is enough for the present case that respondent's position as an elected city commissioner clearly made him a public official, and that the allegations in the advertisement concerned what was allegedly his official conduct as commissioner in charge of the police department." Page 283.

Shortly thereafter Mr. Justice Brennan wrote the opinion in Garrison, and reiterated the Sullivan doctrine, expressly stating that it was limited to a public official:

"In New York Times Company vs. Sullivan, * * * we held that the Constitution limits State power in a civil action brought by a public official for criticism of his official conduct, to an award of damages for the false statement 'made with actual malice—that is with knowledge that it was false or not.' At the outset, we must decide whether in view of the differing history and purposes of criminal libel, the New York Times rule also limits State power to impose criminal sanctions for criticism of the official conduct of public officials. We hold that it does." 379 U.S. 67.

"We held in New York Times that a public official might be allowed the civil remedy only if he establishes that the utterance was false and that it was made with knowledge of its falsity or in reckless disregard of whether it was false or true." Page 74.

Then, in order to cover a situation just exactly like the instant case, Justice Brennan repeated what the Supreme Court had already said some time before, saying:

"For the use of the known lie as a tool is at once at odds with the premises of democratic government and with the orderly manner in which economic, social, or political change is to be affected. Calculated falsehood falls into that class of utterances which 'are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality * * *" Chaplinsky vs. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568, 572, 86 L. Ed. 1031, 1035, 62 S. Court 766. Hence the knowingly false statement and the false statement made with reckless disregard of the truth, do not enjoy constitutional protection." Page 75.

In Rosenblatt Mr. Justice Brennan speaking for the Court once again reiterated the limitation of Sullivan to public officials:

"We there held that under the First and Fourteenth Amendments a State cannot award damages to a public official for defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless the official proves actual malice." 15 Law Ed. 600.

In this case "we granted certiorari and requested the parties to brief and argue, in addition to the questions presented in the petition for certiorari, the question whether respondent was a 'public official' under New York Times and under our decision in Garrison vs. Louisiana." Page 601.

"The question is presented, however, whether that theory of recovery is precluded by our holding in New York Times that in the absence of sufficient evidence that the attack focused on the plaintiff, an otherwise impersonal attack on government operations cannot be utilized to establish a libel of those administering the operations." Page 602.

"To allow the jury to connect the statements with Sullivan on that presumption alone was, in our view, to invite the spectre of prosecutions for libel on government, which the Constitution does not tolerate in any form." Page 603.

"A theory that the column cast indiscriminate suspicion on members of the group responsible for the conduct of this governmental operation is tantamount to a demand for recovery based on libel of government, and therefore is constitutionally insufficient." Page 604.

"Even accepting respondent's reading, the column manifestly discusses the conduct of operations of government." Page 604.

"The question is squarely presented whether the 'public official' designation under New York Times applies." Page 604.

"'We held in New York Times that a public official might be allowed the civil remedy only if he establishes that the utterance was false and that it was made with knowledge of its falsity or in reckless disregard of whether it was false or true.' Garrison." Page 604.

"Turning, then, to the question whether respondent was a 'public official' within New York Times, we reject at the outset his suggestion that it should be answered by reference to State law standards." Page 604.

> "Criticism of government is at the very center of the constitutionally protected area of free discussion. Criticism of those responsible for government operations must be free, lest criticism of government itself be penalized. It is clear, therefore, that the 'public official' designation applies at the very least to those among the hierarchy of government employees who have, or appear to the public to have, substantial responsibility for or control over the conduct of governmental affairs." Page 605.

Because the case was tried before Sullivan, it was remanded to determine whether the plaintiff was a public official, and whether there was a jury question of malice.

In a concurring opinion Mr. Justice Stewart said that the Sullivan rule should not be applied "except where a State's law of defamation has been unconstitutionally converted into a law of seditious libel. The First and Fourteenth Amendments have not stripped private citizens of all means of redress for injuries inflicted upon them by careless liars." He then went on to make clear, that "the preventive effect of liability for defamation serves an important public purpose, for the rights and values of private personality far transcend mere personal interests. Surely if the 1950's taught us anything, they taught us that the poisonous atmosphere of the easy lie can infect and degrade a whole society."

To use Mr. Justice Stewart's language, the Associated Press just plain lied about Respondent. When they said that he led a charge, that was false, and the jury found it was false. When they said that he assumed command of a rioting crowd in insurrection against the authority he had respected all of his life, that was false, and the jury found it was not even substantially true.

The Associated Press says that the First and Fourteenth Amendments gave them a license to tell these lies about Respondent, because he was in the public eye, even though their mendacious reporter didn't know it. The Associated Press says that unless they are free to "criticize" Walker by making false statements about him, the public policy will be destroyed and the purpose of the First and Fourteenth Amendments will fail. This suit does not inhibit fair criticism of Edwin A. Walker or of any other person. It does prohibit the Associated Press from making false statements of fact about Walker and other persons, but not their criticism or fair comment on the true facts. The First and Fourteenth Amendments do not give the Associated Press a license to lie, and they never have. Falsification of the facts is never privileged. The statement in the Associated Press story that Savell, claiming to have been less than six feet from Walker, reported that he saw "two men take him by the arms and they headed for the federal marshals" was either true or knowingly false. It is not comment—it is a statement of facts, and it could not be accidentally made.

The fallacy of the contention that Sullivan should be extended to all persons in the public eye is very obvious when its logical extreme is considered. Could the Associated Press defend charging Willie Mays falsely with taking a bribe to throw a baseball game because he is constantly in the press as a public figure and each new home run adds to a National League record? Could they defend on a charge that Zsa Zsa Gabor was compelled to get married quickly, merely because, although she is a private citizen, she is such a public figure that her marital status is of such tremendous public interest that she can be lied about with impunity? The fallacy reveals itself promptly.

With reference to the second distinction, in neither Sullivan nor Rosenblatt was the plaintiff mentioned by name. In each instance the reference was to the holder of an official position, and the ancient innuendoes came into play to show who was meant. The defamatory statements did not charge the plaintiff with having committed any kind of crime specifically, but again by innuendo charged them with malfeasance in office.

But in the instant case, Walker by name and by the courtesy title of General still appurtenant after his resignation, was specifically charged with crimes defined in the federal statutes, 18 U. S. C., §§2383-4, Insurrection & Seditious Conspiracy. These constitute libel per se at common law, and do not require any State statute to implement them. Under almost universal principles of law, damages are presumed to flow from libels per se, and they are compensable as such without the necessity of showing malice. Respondent's right of recovery, then, was not dependent upon any State action or State statute. It is the action of the State that is inhibited under the Fourteenth Amendment.

Regarding our third distinction, in Sullivan the defendant was the New York Times, undoubtedly one of the outstanding newspapers in the country. While that fact did not appear to have much bearing upon the decision, it was pointed out that, in a large newspaper, management and the editorial staff could have no great knowledge of the contents of advertising offered to the business office, which was the substance of the libel. In Texas, by statute, certain additional privileges are granted to newspapers, the Texas statute as enacted in 1901 being substantially the Sullivan rule. Article 5432, Vernon's Annotated Civil Statutes of Texas, provides that "the publication of the following matters by any newspaper or periodical shall be deemed privileged and shall not be made the basis of any action for libel: * * * 4. A reasonable and fair comment or criticism of the official acts of public officials and of other matters of public concern published for general information."

The Associated Press is not a newspaper nor is it a periodical. As its long time general manager, Kent Cooper, said in his book Barriers Down, "the prime business of news agencies is to collect and distribute news to newspapers."

This Court has discussed at length the nature of the corporate business of the Associated Press and the selling of its commodity, news. International News Service v. Associated Press, 248 U.S. 215, 63 Law Ed. 211; Associated Press v. United States, 326 U. S. 1, 89 Law Ed. 2013.

As a merchant of news, therefore, although that is one of the components essential to its customers, and also its member newspapers, the Associated Press has no greater right to falsify about outsiders than would the merchants supplying newspapers with their rolls of newsprint, or the manufacturers of type-setting machines and printing presses, and the Associated Press has no greater exemption from defamation or negligence in the sale of its products than would they.

When the Associated Press sent out false statements over the entire world, as it did on June 6 of this year, reporting that James Meredith had been shot and murdered in Mississippi, or as it did in October of 1962, reporting to the entire world that "General Walker had led a charge against the marshals and assumed command of a "rioting mob," it is responsible for those injured as a result. The Associated Press prides itself upon the fact that the world depends upon it for news, but the world depends upon it for true news, and there is an obligation of accuracy. Otherwise, we are susceptible to the Big Lie technique perfected by Goebbels when he managed a similar news agency for Hitler in the Third Reich. A responsible press is as essential to a democracy as a free press, and the way to keep it responsible is to make it answerable for its falsehoods.

The fourth distinction is that in Sullivan there was considerable reliance upon the fact that the Alabama law created presumptions and burdens of proof in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant which inhibited open criticism of official conduct. In the instant case we have no State action at all. None of the respondent's right to recovery here is based upon any State statute which alters the ancient common law rules fundamental in almost every American jurisdiction. The only State action was the furnishing of a court room and a judge for the determination of the rights, and even the definitions given to the jury were those requested by the Associated Press and not necessarily prescribed by Texas law. (See Appendix A.)

The Fourteenth Amendment applies to action by a State, and there has been no action by the State in this case other than the providing of a forum for trial and appeal.

The second, third, fourth, and fifth questions presented at pages 3 and 4 of the petition in an attempt to bring this case within the Procrustean bed of the Sullivan case rather remind us of the physician who superinduced pneumonia in his cold patient because he could cure pneumonia but couldn't cure a cold. It would be a novel construction indeed of the Fourteenth Amendment if the action of twelve citizens comprising a jury without instruction limiting their determination of damages could constitute a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment.

As a practical matter, this Court has set up the only sane line of demarcation: that between public official and private citizen. If the contention of the Associated Press is sustained, and if the Sullivan rule is extended to private citizens merely because they are figures of public interest, we have wiped out any fixed rule of law, any firm standard by which one may know in advance what his rights are, and substituted instead a fluid and fluctuating basis. How much public interest must a figure excite before he can be lied about with impunity. If the Associated Press can lie about a national figure as it did in 1962 about Walker and again in 1966 about Meredith, can the Possum Hollow Weekly lie about the winner of a spelling bee at the school house because she is a figure of public interest in the village? That way madness lies!

We respectfully submit that this Court should stand its ground and limit the Sullivan doctrine to public officials.

CONCLUSION

The Petition should therefore be denied, because there is no true constitutional question. No portion of the Constitution protects the perpetrator of the known falsehood from financial responsibility for his wrongdoing. There is no State action infringing the Constitution when a State Court upholds the common law, and a jury verdict pursuant to the constitutional right of trial by jury does not infringe the Constitution. The decisions of this Court do not protect knowingly false statements about a private citizen neither holding nor offering for public office.

Accordingly, this Court should not exercise any jurisdiction, and we therefore respectfully pray that the writ sought be denied.

Respectfully submitted,

WILLIAM ANDRESS, JR.,
627 Fidelity Union Life
Building,
Dallas, Texas,

CLYDE J. WATTS,
219 Couch Drive,
Oklahoma City, Oklahoma.

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE

I certify that a copy of the foregoing reply was served by depositing a copy of the same in a United States mail box with air mail postage prepaid addressed to William P. Rogers, Leo P. Larkin, Jr., and Stanley Godofsky, 200 Park Avenue, New York, New York 10017, and to Arthur Moynihan, 50 Rockefeller Plaza, New York, New York 10020; and with first class postage prepaid addressed to J. A. Gooch and Sloan B. Blair, 1800 First National Building, Fort Worth, Texas 76102, Counsel of record for Petitioner on June ....., 1966.

.....

Of Counsel

APPENDIX A

Charge and Verdict of the Jury

No. 31,741-C

In the

DISTRICT COURT OF TARRANT COUNTY, TEXAS,
17th JUDICIAL DISTRICT.

EDWIN A. WALKER

v.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHARGE OF THE COURT

Ladies and Gentlemen of the Jury:

This case is submitted to you in the form of questions which are called special issues. You are to answer these questions by unanimous consent.

Do not let bias, prejudice, sympathy, resentment, or any other such emotion play any part in your deliberations.

During your deliberations be careful not to mention or discuss any personal knowledge you may have about the facts in the case. Your duty is to answer these questions from the evidence you have heard in this trial and from that alone.

Do not speculate on matters not shown by the evidence, and about which you are not asked any questions. Remember that you cannot guess your way to a just and correct verdict.

Do not return a quotient verdict, by adding together figures, dividing by the number of jurors, and agreeing to be bound by the result.

Do not do any trading on your answers—that is, some of you agreeing to answer certain questions one way if others will agree to answer other questions another way.

Do not decide who you think should win and then try to answer the questions accordingly. If you do this your verdict will be worthless.

You are the sole judges of the credibility of the witnesses and the weight to be given their testimony, but in matters of law you must be governed by the instructions in this charge.

The following definitions are given you by the Court. Whenever any of the terms so defined are used in any of the special issues, you will refer to the appropriate definition and be guided thereby in considering your answer:

By the term PREPONDERANCE OF THE EVIDENCE is meant the greater weight and degree of the credible evidence before you.

DEFINITIONS

In answer to Special Issue No. 1 you are instructed that by the term "led" is meant activities by a person who directs, moves to action, or encourages in some action or movement, and that by the term "charge" is meant a movement toward the marshals, or a group or body of people moving toward an objective.

In answering the issues in this charge in which the term "substantially true" is used, you are instructed that in order for a statement to be "substantially true" it is not necessary that the exact facts or the most minute details of the plaintiff's activities be completely accurate. Mere inaccuracies not affecting the substance of the report of plaintiff's activities are immaterial. You are further instructed that in answering special issues in which the term "substantially true" is used that the publication must be considered as a whole, giving to all the words contained therein (except those hereinabove defined for you) their ordinary meaning as read and understood by the average reader.

In answering the issues in these instructions in which the term "fair comment" is used, you are instructed that the interest of the public requires that all acts and matters of a public nature, and of public concern published for general information may be freely published and discussed with reasonable comments thereon. You are further instructed that by said term is meant a statement which represents the honest opinion of the writer and constitutes reasonable inferences to be drawn from the attendant facts and circumstances whether literally true or not, or whether all reasonable persons would agree with the opinions or conclusions based thereon.

Special Issue No. 1:

Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the statement "Walker, who Sunday led a charge of students against Federal marshals on the Ole Miss campus" was substantially true?

Answer "Yes" or "No".

Answer: No.

Special Issue No. 2:

Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the statement "Walker, who Sunday led a charge of students against Federal marshals on the Ole Miss Campus", complained of by plaintiff, constitutes fair comment describing the plaintiff's activities on or about September 30, 1962, at the places described in the evidence and under the then attendant circumstances?

Answer "Yes" or "No".

Answer: No.

Special Issue No. 3:

Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the statement inquired about in special issue No. 1 was made in good faith in reference to a matter in which the defendant had a duty to report to its members and thence to the public?

Answer "Yes" or "No".

Answer: No.

Special Issue No. 4:

Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that in publishing the statement set forth in special issue No. 1 the defendant, Associated Press, was actuated by malice as that term is hereinafter defined.

In connection with the above issue, you are instructed that by the term "malice" is meant ill will, bad or evil motive, or that entire want of care which would raise the belief that the act or omission complained of was the result of a conscious indifference to the right or welfare of the person to be affected by it.

Answer "Yes" or "No".

Answer: Yes.

Special Issue No. 5:

Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the statement "Walker assumed command of the crowd" was substantially true?

Answer "Yes" or "No".

Answer: No.

Special Issue No. 6:

Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the statement "Walker assumed command of the crowd" complained of by plaintiff, constitutes fair comment describing plaintiff's activities on or about September 30, 1962, at the places described in the evidence and under the then attendant circumstances?

Answer "Yes" or "No".

Answer: No.

Special Issue No. 7:

Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the statement inquired about in special issue No. 5 was made in good faith in reference to a matter in which the defendant had a duty to report to its members and thence to the public?

Answer "Yes" or "No".

Answer: No.

Special Issue No. 8:

Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that in publishing the statement set forth in special issue No. 5 the defendant, Associated Press, was actuated by malice as that term is hereinafter defined?

In connection with the above issue, you are instructed that by the term "malice is meant ill will, bad or evil motive, or that entire want of care which would raise the belief that the act or omission complained of was the result of a conscious indifference to the right or welfare of the person to be affected by it.

Answer "Yes" or "No".

Answer: Yes.

Special Issue No. 9:

Question: If you have answered either special issue No. 1 or special issue No. 5 "No", then answer:

What sum of money, if paid now in cash, do you find from a preponderance of the evidence would fairly and reasonably compensate the plaintiff for the damages, if any, sustained by him as a direct and proximate result of the statements inquired about in special issues Nos. 1 and 5?

In connection with this issue you are instructed that you may only award damages, if any, for statements, if any, inquired about herein which you have found to be false.

In connection with the foregoing issue you are instructed that you may take into consideration such damages, if any, to the reputation of the plaintiff and such mental anguish, if any, and humiliation, if any, and embarrassment, if any, which plaintiff may have sustained directly and proximately solely as a result of the statements hereinabove set forth, if you have found the same to be false.

Answer in dollars and cents, if any.

Answer: $500,000.00.

Special Issue No. 10:

If you have answered either special issue No. 4 or special issue No. 8 "yes", then answer:

Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that this is a case in which exemplary damages should be awarded to plaintiff?

In connection with the above issue you are instructed that the term "Exemplary damages" as used herein means a sum of money awarded as a punishment for any malice, if any, you have found to exist in this case. "Exemplary damages", if any are allowed, are to be no part of the damages which may be allowed as compensation (if compensation has been allowed) but only in the nature of a penalty allowed by law at your discretion, and any amount which you find hereunder, if you see fit to make such a finding, should be reasonably proportionate to the actual damages, if any, you may allow plaintiff herein.

Answer "Yes" or "No".

Answer: Yes.

Special Issue No. 11:

If you have answered the above special issue No. 10 "Yes", and only in that event, then answer:

Question: From a preponderance of the evidence, what amount of money, if any, do you find should be awarded to plaintiff as exemplary damages?

Answer in dollars and cents, if any.

Answer: $300,000.00.

/s/ CHARLES J. MURRAY

Judge presiding.

VERDICT OF THE JURY

We, the jury, have answered the above and foregoing special issues, as herein indicated, and herewith return same into court as our verdict.

.....

Foreman.

FILED
JUL 11 1966
JOHN F. DAVIS, CLERK

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM 1965

No. [redacted]150

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,
Petitioner,

—against—

EDWIN A. WALKER,
Respondent.

REPLY BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF PETITION FOR CERTIORARI

WILLIAM P. ROGERS
LEO P. LARKIN, JR.
STANLEY GODOFSKY
200 Park Avenue
New York, New York 10017

ARTHUR MOYNIHAN
50 Rockefeller Plaza
New York, New York

J. A. GOOCH
SLOAN B. BLAIR
1800 First National Building
Fort Worth, Texas
Attorneys for Petitioner
The Associated Press

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM 1965

No. 1330

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,

Petitioner,

—against—

EDWIN A. WALKER,

Respondent.

REPLY BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF PETITION FOR CERTIORARI

Preliminary Statement

We deem it both inappropriate and unnecessary to direct specific attention to the misstatements of fact and misquotations contained in the Response filed in opposition to the Petition for Certiorari. We think it equally unnecessary, in this Court, to demonstrate how frivolous are Respondent's contentions of law (a) that the judgment below does not constitute "state action" (Resp. pp. 45-46) and (b) that the First Amendment is inapplicable because Petitioner is "not a newspaper" but "merely a merchant of news." (Resp. pp. 44-45).

There exists one contention in the Response, however, which is so startlingly erroneous, so often repeated and so basic to Respondent's argument that we feel compelled to reply: Responent's claim that the Sullivan doctrine is here inapplicable because the jury found against Petitioner on the issue of malice.

I.

Respondent correctly asserts, and it is beyond dispute, that the jury found that Petitioner had acted with "malice," albeit under a definition of "malice" more favorable to Respondent than that which the Federal Constitution permits. But nowhere in his forty-seven page Response does Respondent even advert to the fact that this very finding of malice on which he so heavily and repeatedly relies was overturned by the trial court for lack of evidence and that the trial court's ruling on that issue has since been upheld by every court which has reviewed the question.

A. The issue was squarely presented to the trial court when the jury returned a verdict of $300,000 in punitive damages, based upon the determination that Petitioner had acted with "malice." In setting aside the verdict the trial court held (App. B. p. 32a):

> "Turning now to issues four, eight, ten and eleven, I find there is no evidence to support the jury's answers that there was actual malice by Associated Press in publishing the stories of October 2 and 3, 1962."

B. In sustaining the ruling of the trial court on this point, the Texas Court of Civil Appeals held (App. B. p. 27a):

> "Issues Nos. 4 and 8 inquired if appellant was actuated by malice, and malice was defined, 'you are instructed that by the term "malice" is meant ill will, bad or evil motive, or that entire want of care which would raise the belief that the act or omission complained of was the result of a conscious indifference to the right or welfare of the person to be affected by it.'

"The appellee had the burden of proving that the appellant's act or acts were such as to fall within the above definition before he was entitled to a finding of malice and exemplary damages.

"The statement of facts consists of eleven volumes and 2126 pages. The entire record has received our close and sustained attention.

"In view of all the surrounding circumstances, the rapid and confused occurrence of events on the occasion in question, and in the light of all the evidence, we hold that appellee failed to prove malice as defined, and the trial court was correct in setting aside said findings."

Respondent's motion for rehearing on the issue of malice was denied by the Texas Court of Civil Appeals on September 17, 1965 (App. D. p. 119a).

C. Respondent thereafter conditionally applied to the Supreme Court of Texas for writ of error on the issue of malice. The writ of error was refused (App. D. p. 120a). Respondent did not move for rehearing in the Supreme Court of Texas nor did he file a petition for certiorari.

In this posture of the record, we find plaintiff's reliance on the jury's now discredited finding of "malice" almost as inexplicable as his failure to advise this Court that that finding had, in fact, been overturned.

II.

Since the filing of the Petition, the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit has rendered an opinion in Pauling v. Globe-Democrat Publishing Company (June 21, 1966) squarely holding that the Sullivan doctrine is applicable to persons such as Respondent, who, though not elected public officials, are prominent personalities voluntarily involved in a matter of widespread political and public interest.* The new Pauling case, like the cases cited at pages 28-30 of the Petition, is squarely in conflict with the rulings of the Courts below and thus constitutes an additional reason for the granting of the writ.

Respectfully submitted,

WILLIAM P. ROGERS
LEO P. LARKIN, JR.
STANLEY GODOFSKY
200 Park Avenue
New York, New York 10017

ARTHUR MOYNIHAN
50 Rockefeller Plaza
New York, New York

J. A. GOOCH
SLOAN B. BLAIR
1800 First National Building
Fort Worth, Texas

Attorneys for Petitioner
The Associated Press

*Since Pauling has not yet been reported, the text of the opinion is annexed hereto as Appendix 1.

Appendix 1

Pauling v. Globe-Democrat Publishing Company

United States Court of Appeals

FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

No. 18,082

LINUS PAULING,
Appellant,

v.

GLOBE-DEMOCRAT PUBLISHING COMPANY, a Corporation,
Appellee.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri.

[June 21, 1966.]

Before VOGEL, Chief Judge, and BLACKMUN and GIBSON, Circuit Judges.

BLACKMUN, Circuit Judge.

A jury returned a verdict for the defendant in this diversity civil libel action instituted in September 1961 by Linus Pauling against the corporation which publishes the newspaper known as the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. The plaintiff appeals.

Pauling, for many years a professor of Chemistry at the California Institute of Technology, is a man of international repute. His status as a scholar and as a scientist is not questioned. His awards include many honorary degrees, recognition by the United States government for meritorious service during World War II, the 1954 Nobel Prize in Chemistry, and, more recently, the Nobel Peace Prize.

The alleged libel grew out of a controversy over Pauling's efforts to promote a nuclear test ban treaty. The libel is claimed to exist in the following three sentences of the defendant newspaper's editorial, entitled "Glorification of Deceit", published in its issues of October 10, 1960, in respect to an appearance by Pauling before a subcommittee of the United States Senate's Committee on the Judiciary:

> "Pauling contemptuously refused to testify and was cited for contempt of Congress. He appealed to the United States District Court to rid him of the contempt citation, which that Court refused to do. The appeal from the lower court's affirmation of contempt is expected to be handed down by the Supreme Court today."

The defendant's editorial in its entirety is attached as an appendix to this opinion.

A review of some of the factual background culminating in the challenged editorial may be enlightening:

Prior to 1960 Professor Pauling evinced concern about nuclear testing. In January 1958, he submitted to the United Nations a petition "urging that an international agreement to stop the testing of nuclear bombs be made now". This was prepared and signed by Pauling and had appended to it a list of the names of 9,234 other scientists from throughout the world. An additional list of 1,803 was submitted by him in July. The two lists, with Pauling, made a total of 11,038 names. The original signatures were retained by Pauling and did not accompany the petition.

Also, about this time, the professor and other United States citizens and some non-resident aliens sought, in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, to enjoin the Secretary of Defense and the Atomic Energy Commission from detonating nuclear weapons. Judge Keech dismissed the complaints on the grounds that they failed to state a justiciable controversy and that none of the plaintiffs had standing to sue. Pauling v. McElroy, 164 F. Supp. 390 (D.D.C. 1958). The Court of Appeals affirmed, 278 F. 2d 252 (D.C. Cir. 1960). The Supreme Court denied certiorari, 364 U.S. 835.

Dr. Pauling's efforts in this direction came to be a matter of interest to the Judiciary Committee's Subcommittee on Internal Security. Hearings on his activity were held on June 21 and October 11, 1960. Pauling was subpoenaed and testified on both occasions.[1]

At the June 21 hearing the subcommittee manifested a desire to obtain three things from Dr. Pauling: The signatures to the petition; the names of the persons to whom Pauling had written requesting assistance in obtaining signatures; and the letters with which the signatures were transmitted to Pauling. Although he agreed to produce the signatures and a list of the persons to whom he had written for assistance in their collection, he refused a request to supply a list of persons who had transmitted signatures to him. His refusal was essentially on the

1. Reports of these hearings were made and printed for the use of the Committee on the Judiciary. The Report of the June 21, 1960, hearing contains, at pp. 79,355, the 11,038 names on the two lists.

Appendix 1

Pauling v. Globe-Democrat Publishing Company

grounds that this would expose the participants to reprisals and would violate a trust they had reposed in him. At the conclusion of the hearing on June 21 the subcommittee ordered Dr. Pauling to appear on August 9 and to bring with him all signatures to the petition presented to the United Nations and all letters of transmittal with which those signatures came to him. The hearing so scheduled for August 9 was thereafter postponed to October 11.

In the meantime, Pauling instituted an action in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia against Senators Eastland and Dodd (the subcommittee's chairman and vice-chairman, respectively), the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia, and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate. In his complaint Pauling alleged that the subcommittee's order of June 21 was violative of his rights under the First and Fourth Amendments and called for the production of papers not pertinent to any lawful inquiry; he expressed willingness, however, to produce the signatures of United States residents who had signed the petition. Pauling requested a declaratory judgment as to his rights and duties with respect to the subcommittee's order and as to its validity. He also sought injunctive relief against enforcement of the order and against his being prosecuted for any failure to comply with it. Judge McGarraghy, on August 23, 1960, granted the defense motion to dismiss. He did so on the grounds that the challenged order was not subject to judicial review in that action; that the plaintiff had an adequate remedy at law in the event of proceedings against him; and that the relief sought would require an unauthorized interference with the legislative branch. Again the Court of Appeals affirmed, Pauling v. Eastland, 288 F.2d 126 (D. C. Cir. 1960), and the Supreme Court denied certiorari, 364 U.S. 900.

While that appeal was pending Pauling advised the Court of Appeals by letter that he was ready to submit the original signatures to the subcommittee. During the pendency of the petition for certiorari a request was made that the subcommittee postpone further hearing until the Supreme Court acted. This request was denied and the second hearing took place on October 11. At that time Dr. Pauling produced the signatures. A week earlier he had sent the subcommittee a list of the persons, about 1200 in number, whose assistance he had requested. He continued to refuse, however, to comply with that part of the order which called for the production of the transmittal letters. He renewed his contention that to do so would subject the participants to reprisals. At the end of the hearing Dr. Pauling was excused from the subpoena.

At this point we note, parenthetically, that Pauling, together with over 100 United States nationals and more than 100 aliens, subsequently insituted still another suit in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia to restrain the Secretary of Defense and the Atomic Energy Commission from detonating any nuclear weapon. This time Judge McLaughlin granted the defense motion to dismiss. He did so on the grounds that the plaintiffs had no standing to sue; that the complaint failed to state a justiciable controversy; that the actions and powers challenged were plainly authorized by law and the Constitution; and that the matter was res judicata by the earlier holding in Pauling v. McElroy, supra. The Court of Appeals, in a vigorous opinion, affirmed and said that the district court "was plainly correct on all points". Pauling v. McNamara, 331 F.2d 796, 798 (D. C. Cir. 1963). Certiorari was denied, 377 U. S. 933.

We now return to the present case. The plaintiff by his complaint asserts that the statements in the editorial's three sentences quoted above were false in that Pauling was not cited for contempt of Congress, in that he did not appeal to any court to rid himself of any contempt citation, and in that no appeal from a court's affirmation of contempt was expected because there had been no such affirmation. Pauling also alleges that the defendant published the quoted statements when it knew or should have known that they were false. He seeks both compensatory and punitive damages.

The defendant newspaper, by its amended answer, admits that Pauling had not been cited for contempt of Congress and had not appealed to any court to rid himself of a contempt citation, and that the editorial's contrary statements "are literally false", but it denies that in "the context in which they appeared they were false in substance and effect." The defendant further alleges "that the gist and thrust" of the publication was that Pauling "was contemptuous of the authority of the Congress of the United States" in that he had contemptuously refused to testify as to the identity of the persons who had helped him collect the petition; that he had unsuccessfully invoked federal judicial power to prevent his being punished for his contemptuous actions; that "the gist and thrust of the publication was and is true"; and [as amended at the trial] that Pauling "voluntarily sought public expression of his views on national policy and invited public comment thereon".

Appendix 1
Pauling v. Globe-Democrat Publishing Company

Pauling's motions for summary judgment and for a directed verdict on the issue of liability were denied. As above noted, the case was submitted to the jury and the jury brought in a general verdict for the defendant.

On this appeal Pauling renews his argument that the defendant is liable as a matter of law and that the trial court should have instructed the jury to that effect and allowed it to pass only on the issue of damages. Pauling also urges error in the instructions, in the admission of evidence, and in other aspects of the conduct of the trial.

The defendant in response argues that the trial court's refusal to grant the plaintiff a summary judgment or directed verdict on the issue of liability was proper because this was prohibited under the terms of the Missouri Constitution, Article I, § 8, and by the First Amendment; there was a genuine issue of substantial truth; the subject of the challenged publication was a matter of grave national interest; and the essential ingredient of defendant's liability, namely, actual malice, was not alleged and was insufficiently proved. It also argues that there was no reversible error in the instructions, in the admission of evidence, or in the trial's conduct. It finally urges a failure to plead and prove a claim for relief for libel under constitutional standards recently enunciated by the Supreme Court.

We go directly to this last argument of the defense. The trial in the district court took place March 16-19, 1964. Seven days before the trial began the Supreme Court decided New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254 (1964). It is obvious from the record that it was because of the promulgation of the opinions in New York Times that the defendant further amended its answer, by leave during the trial, to add the allegation, above noted, that

Appendix 1
Pauling v. Globe-Democrat Publishing Company

Pauling "voluntarily sought public expression of his views on national policy and invited public comment thereon"; indeed, the New York Times decision was specifically pleaded. The district court refused to instruct the jury on the New York Times issue but allowed the amendment in order to preserve the point for appeal.

New York Times reaches the question whether the freedom of speech and of the press guarantees of the First and Fourteenth Amendments limit state power to award damages to a "public official" for defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct. The answer is that the amendments do limit such state power unless the plaintiff "proves that the statement was made with 'actual malice'—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not". Pp. 279-80 of 376 U. S.

The advertisement which was the subject of that litigation is really not dissimilar to the editorial with which we are now concerned. Both bore upon controversial public issues. Each was generally true; each was partially false. The Alabama courts had held that the statements in the advertisement were "libelous per se" against a Montgomery city commissioner charged with the supervision of the police department, and the Alabama jury was so instructed. The Supreme Court held, pp. 269-88 of 376 U. S., that libel, as such, is not immune from constitutional limitations but "must be measured by standards that satisfy the First Amendment"; that there has been "a profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open, and that it may well include vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials"; that constitutional protection does not turn upon the truth or popularity of the ideas and beliefs offered; that erroneous statement is "inevitable in free debate, and that it must be protected if the freedoms of expression are to have the 'breathing space' that they 'need . . . to survive' "; that neither factual error nor defamatory content removes "the constitutional shield from criticism of official conduct"; that the allowance of the defense of truth does not save the state libel rule; that public discussion of official conduct enjoys a privilege under the First and Fourteenth Amendments in the absence of actual malice; that the Alabama rule which presumes malice, where general damages are concerned, is inconsistent with constitutional limitations; that the Court had the duty to review the evidence to see whether it could constitutionally support a finding of actual malice; that a statement by the newspaper's officer that he thought the advertisement was substantially correct was at least a reasonable opinion and there was no evidence to impeach his good faith in holding it; that under the circumstances the failure to retract was not adequate evidence of malice for constitutional purposes; and that the evidence at most supported a finding of negligence which fell short of actual malice. At footnote 23, on p. 283 of 376 U. S., the Court significantly observed:

> "We have no occasion here to determine how far down into the lower ranks of government employees the 'public official' designation would extend for purposes of this rule, or otherwise to specify categories of persons who would or would not be included. Cf. Barr v. Matteo, 360 U.S. 564, 573-575. Nor need we here determine the boundaries of the 'official conduct' concept. It is enough for the present case that respondent's position as an elected city commissioner > clearly made him a public official, and that the allegations in the advertisement concerned what was allegedly his official conduct as Commissioner in charge of the Police Department."

Mr. Justice Black, with Mr. Justice Douglas joining him, concurred separately on the ground that the First and Fourteenth Amendments "completely prohibit" a state from awarding damages to public officials against critics of their official conduct and that the defendants "had an absolute, unconditional constitutional right to publish . . . their criticisms of the . . . agencies and officials". P. 293 of 376 U.S. Mr. Justice Goldberg, with Mr. Justice Douglas joining him, separately concurred and stated his "belief that the Constitution affords greater protection than that provided by the Court's standard to citizen and press in exercising the right of public criticism". P. 298 of 376 U.S. Yet he carefully pointed out, p. 301, that "This is not to say that the Constitution protects defamatory statements directed against the private conduct of a public official or a private citizen".

The companion question as to whether the rule of New York Times "also limits state power to impose criminal sanctions for criticism of the official conduct of public officials" promptly presented itself in Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64, 67 (1964). That case concerned remarks made by a district attorney about judges of the criminal district court of his Louisiana parish. The Court's answer to the question was flatly in the affirmative:

> "The constitutional guarantees of freedom of expression compel application of the same standard to the criminal remedy. . . . [O]nly those false statements made with the high degree of awareness of their probable falsity demanded by New York Times may be the subject of either civil or criminal sanctions. For speech concerning public affairs is more than self-expression; it is the essence of self-government. . . .

"The use of calculated falsehood, however, would put a different cast on the constitutional question. . . . Hence the knowingly false statement and the false statement made with reckless disregard of the truth, do not enjoy constitutional protection." Pp. 74-75 of 379 U.S.

In answering the suggestion that the alleged defamatory statement was an attack upon the judges' personal integrity, rather than on their official conduct, the Court held that the rule of New York Times "is not rendered inapplicable merely because an official's private reputation, as well as his public reputation, is harmed". P. 77 of 379 U. S. Justices Black, Douglas, and Goldberg each filed a concurring opinion reflecting views about as expressed in New York Times.

The Court made the same ruling in Moity v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 201 (1964), concerning alleged defamation of a district attorney of a Louisiana parish (see State v. Moity, 245 La. 546, 159 So. 2d 149 (1963)), and in Henry v. Collins, 380 U. S. 356 (1965), concerning a statement relating to a Mississippi county attorney and chief of police.

The Supreme Court's most recent expression on this subject is Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U. S. 75 (1966). This was a New Hampshire civil libel action against the author of a newspaper column for allegedly defamatory and false comment concerning the plaintiff's performance when he was a supervisor of a county recreation area. The plaintiff was employed by elected county commissioners. The trial antedated the Supreme Court's decision in New York Times.

The Court held that the question whether the plaintiff was a "public official" within New York Times was not to be answered under state law standards. It made specific reference to its footnote 23 in New York Times and here, too, observed that "No precise lines need be drawn for the purposes of this case" in determining the reach of the "public official" concept. It stated,

> "There is, first, a strong interest in debate on public issues, and, second, a strong interest in debate about those persons who are in a position significantly to influence the resolution of those issues. . . . It is clear, therefore, that the 'public official' designation applies at the very least to those among the hierarchy of government employees who have, or appear to the public to have, substantial responsibility for or control over the conduct of governmental affairs." [footnote omitted] P. 85 of 383 U. S.

The Court noted, p. 86, the tension between society's interest in preventing and redressing attacks upon reputation, on the one hand, and, on the other, "the values nurtured by the First and Fourteenth Amendments" and stated that "when interests in public discussion are particularly strong . . . the Constitution limits the protections afforded by the law of defamation". Because New York Times had not been decided when Baer's case went to trial, the Court felt his presentation was not shaped to the "public official" issue. The case, accordingly, was remanded and Baer was given an opportunity to prove that he was outside New York Times or, if not, that he presented a jury question of malice. Again, a significant feature is the Court's footnote 12 on p. 86 of 383 U. S.:

> "We are treating here only the element of public position, since that is all that has been argued and briefed. We intimate no view whatever whether there are other bases for applying the New York Times standards—for example, that in a particular case the interests in reputation are relatively insubstantial, because the subject of discussion has thrust himself into the vortex of the discussion of a question of pressing public concern."

Mr. Justice Clark, without comment, concurred in the result. Mr. Justice Douglas separately concurred and said, p. 90, "I cannot relate [the term 'public official'] only to those who, by the Court's standard, are deemed to hold public office"; he asked the question, "But since freedom of speech is now the guideline, do state libel laws have any place at all in our constitutional system, at least when it comes to public issues?" Mr. Justice Stewart separately concurrred with the observation that this and the New York Times and Garrison cases turn on the proposition that state defamation laws cannot constitutionally be converted into laws against seditious libel but that the First Amendment is not "the only guidepost in the area of state defamation laws". Pp. 91-92. Mr. Justice Black, with Mr. Justice

Douglas joining him, concurred in the reversal but dissented as to the new trial direction. He repeated his observation in New York Times that "An unconditional right to say what one pleases about public affairs is what I consider to be the minimum guarantee of the First Amendment". He would not allow "the right to criticize a public agent engaged in public activities" to depend upon his being "arbitrarily labeled a 'public official' ". P. 95. Mr. Justice Harlan dissented from a part of the opinion with which we are not here concerned. Mr. Justice Fortas dissented on the ground that the writ of certiorari had been improvidently granted.

It is of interest to note that the New York Times principle was extended by the Court through the path of preemption into the field of labor relations in a case decided the same day as Rosenblatt v. Baer. Linn v. United Plant Guard Workers, 383 U.S. 53, 65 (1966).

We feel that the majority opinions in these Supreme Court cases (all of which were written by Mr. Justice Brennan except, possibly, the per curiams in Moity v. Louisiana and Henry v. Collins) establish for us the following: (1) The Court recognizes as a national "principle" the desirability of uninhibited debate about public issues. (2) It also recognizes "a strong interest in debate about those persons who are in a position significantly to influence the resolution of those issues". (3) In the absence of malice, the First and Fourteenth Amendments afford a privilege to public discussion of official conduct even though it has some factually erroneous or defamatory content. (4) Malice, in this connection, equates with knowledge of the falsity of the statement or with reckless disregard of whether it is false or not. (5) The Court thus far has specifically refrained from fixing a limit for its concept of "public official", either among the ranks of government employees "or otherwise". (6) It has, however, included within the term a city commissioner, a trial judge, a prosecutor, and a chief of police, and it has not excluded a recreation supervisor appointed by elected county commissioners. (7) Similarly, the Court has not yet fixed a boundary for its "official conduct" concept. (8) At least two present members of the Court feel that the majority's standard for privilege falls short of appropriate constitutional protection. (9) The Court thus far has also refrained from expressing a view as to "whether there are other bases" for applying the standards of New York Times, specifying, as a possible example, the subject who "has thrust himself into the vortex of the discussion of a question of pressing public concern". (10) The Court has applied the New York Times principle by analogy in the labor field.

These Supreme Court cases, therefore, may not take us so far as the facts of the present case or provide incontestably controlling precedent for us here; rather, we are concerned with the express reservations of the New York Times and Rosenblatt footnotes. Concededly, Dr. Pauling was not a public official and the Globe-Democrat editorial, therefore, was not one in criticism of official conduct in the governmental sense.

We feel, however, that the implications of the Supreme Court's majority opinions are clear. Professor Pauling, by his public statements and actions, was projecting himself into the arena of public controversy and into the very "vortex of the discussion of a question of pressing public concern". He was attempting to influence the resolution of an issue which was important, which was of profound effect, which was public and which was internationally controversial. Because of his world prominence—a factor stressed by his counsel in the present case—he was in a position of some influence on the problem's resolution. He obviously deemed himself influential and he was undertaking to provide leadership among academic and scientific people and to bring forces from many nations of differing political ideologies to bear upon the problem. Although Dr. Pauling did not take the stand himself, the record here clearly establishes, by evidence adduced primarily by the plaintiff, his preparation of the petition to the United Nations, his taking the lead in soliciting supporting signatures, his devotion of a substantial portion, "perhaps a third", of his time to attracting public attention to the problems of nuclear testing, his speaking and writing widely on the subject, and even his participation in sign carrying and picketing on the issue near the White House and elsewhere. His instigation of the several lawsuits we have described above is a self-evident additional factor.

We recognize that it is arguable that the New York Times rule should not be extended beyond governmental officials. One may point out that many public officials enjoy either an absolute or conditional privilege as to statements made in the line of duty and that the Supreme Court recognized this in New York Times, p. 282 of 376 U.S., and in Garrison, p. 74 of 379 U.S., and used it in support of its conclusions in those cases, namely, to avoid giving "public servants an unjustified preference over the public they serve". One may say, too, that, while the public interest requires free and open discussion of the qualifications, conduct and views of public officials, there is no comparable need as to the attributes of private citizens, however much public attention they have succeeded in acquiring. We feel, however, that the Supreme Court's use of the undesirable preference argument is not a significant part of the rationale of its cases and that it was employed only as a final or clinching factor. Indeed, in Rosenblatt v. Baer, footnote 10, pp. 84-85 of 383 U.S., the Court specifically denies that it ties the New York Times rule to the rule of official privilege. "The public interests protected . . . are interests in discussion, not retaliation. . . ." And the Court itself has pointed out that the reciprocal privileges are not congruent.

We also feel that a rational distinction cannot be founded on the assumption that criticism of private citizens who seek to lead in the determination of national policy will be less important to the public interest than will criticism of government officials. A lobbyist, a person dominant in a political party, the head of any pressure group, or any significant leader may possess a capacity for influencing public policy as great or greater than that of a comparatively minor public official who is clearly subject to New York Times. It would seem, therefore, that if such a person seeks to realize upon his capacity to guide public policy and in the process is criticized, he should have no greater remedy than does his counterpart in public office.

We hold that the principle of New York Times and its companion cases is applicable here and that these particular activities of this particular plaintiff fall into that area where the First and the Fourteenth Amendments of the

Appendix 1
Pauling v. Globe-Democrat Publishing Company

Constitution of the United States afford privilege to critical comment which is free from malice.

We note nothing significantly to the contrary to all this in the developing law in the state and lower federal courts. The application of the New York Times principle seems to be an expanding and not a restricting one. It has been applied, over opposition, to appointed as well as to elected officials. Rosenblatt v. Baer, supra (semble); Pape v. Time, Inc., 354 F.2d 558, 559-60 (7 Cir. 1965), cert. denied ... U.S. ... (deputy chief of detectives and lieutenant of police); Gilligan v. King, 48 Misc.2d 212, 264 N.Y.S.2d 309 (Sup. 1965) (police lieutenant); Thompson v. St. Amant, 184 So.2d 314, 321 (La. App. 1966) (deputy sheriff); McNabb v Tennessean Newspapers, Inc., ... Tenn. App. ..., 400 S.W.2d 871 (1965) (chairman of County Democratic Primary Board); Rives, C.J., dissenting in Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 351 F.2d 702, 721 (5 Cir. 1965), petition for cert. pending. See Application of Levine, 97 Ariz. 88, 397 P.2d 205, 211 (1964) (director of the FBI). Contra, Butts v. Curtis Publishing Co., 242 F.Supp. 390, 394 (N.D. Ga. 1964) (university athletic director), affirmed on other grounds, Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, supra, pp. 709-13 of 351 F.2d.

It has been applied to candidates for office as well as to incumbents. Block v. Benton, 44 Misc.2d 1053, 255 N.Y.S.2d 767 (Sup. 1964); State v. Browne, 86 N.J. Super. 217, 206 A.2d 591, 598-99 (App. Div. 1965). See Pauling v News Syndicate Co., 335 F.2d 659, 671 (2 Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 968; Gilberg v. Goffi, 21 App. Div.2d 517, 251 N.Y.S.2d 823 (Sup. 1964), aff'd 15 N.Y.2d 1023, 207

N.E.2d 620, 260 N.Y.S.2d 29 (1965); Clark v. Allen, 415 Pa. 484, 204 A.2d 42, 44 (1964). This view is afforded substance by the quotations from Coleman v. MacLennan, 78 Kan. 711, 98 Pac. 281 (1908), which appear in the New York Times opinion itself, pp. 280-82 of 376 U.S.

And the principle has also been applied to persons in their private capacities. Two cases concerning private citizens arose out of an election contest and affected the plaintiff by virtue of his relationship to the candidate. Gilberg v. Goffi, supra (partner in mayor's law firm), and, as a matter of state common law, Pearson v. Fairbanks Publishing Co., ... Alaska ..., 413 P.2d 711, 714 (1966). Compare, however, Powell v. Monitor Publishing Co., ... N.H. ..., 217 A.2d 193 (1966). But there are at least two flat holdings that the principle applies where a person of prominence involves himself in a matter of great public concern. Walker v. Courier-Journal & Louisville Times Co., 246 F.Supp. 231 (W.D. Ky. 1965); Pauling v. National Review, Inc., ... Misc.2d ..., 269 N.Y.S.2d 11 (Sup. 1966). Judge Friendly's dictum in Pauling v. News Syndicate Co., supra, p. 671 of 335 F.2d, displays the logical application of the principle to this situation. Compare Nusbaum v. Newark Morning Ledger Co., 86 N.J. Super. 132, 206 A.2d 185, 198-99 (App. Div. 1965). Contra, Associated Press v. Walker, 393 S.W.2d 671, 680 (Tex. Civ. App. 1965), an opinion with no citation of New York Times. Negative implications also appear to be present in Clark v. Pearson, 248 F.Supp. 188, 195 (D.D.C. 1965), and in Harper v. National Review, Inc., 33 L.W. 2341 (N.Y. Sup. 1964), aff'd 263 N.Y.S.2d 292 (App. Div. 1965).

Appendix 1

Pauling v. Globe-Democrat Publishing Company

There are, of course, fact situations where the courts understandably have refused to apply the principle. These include cases where the subject, although perhaps a public figure, did not conduct himself or speak out on a matter of public import, Dempsey v. Time, Inc., 43 Misc. 2d 754, 252 N. Y. S. 2d 186, 189 (Sup. 1964), aff'd 22 App. Div. 2d 854, 254 N. Y. S. 2d 80 (1964) (prizefighter); Spahn v. Julian Messner, Inc., 43 Misc. 2d 219, 250 N. Y. S. 2d 529, 535 (Sup. 1964), aff'd 23 App. Div. 216, 260 N.Y.S. 2d 451 (1965) (baseball pitcher); Faulk v. Aware, Inc., 14 N.Y.2d 954, 202 N.E.2d 372, 253 N.Y.S.2d 990 (1964), cert. denied 380 U.S. 916 (radio and television performer); Lorillard v. Field Enterprises, Inc., 65 Ill.App.2d 65, 213 N.E.2d 1, 7 (1965) (socialite), or where the subject was a person prominent only in another country, Pignole v. Curtis Publishing Co., 247 F.Supp. 595 (S.D.N.Y. 1965) (Haitian political figure); Youssoupoff v. Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc., 48 Misc.2d 700, 265 N.Y.S.2d 754, 756-59 (Sup. 1965) (Russian political figure). Some of these cases assume an invasion of privacy posture.

As indicated above, however, once the principle of New York Times is accepted—and our only choice is to accept it—logic commands that it be applied to a person such as Dr. Pauling when, as here, he has projected himself into the arena of public policy, public controversy, and "pressing public concern".

This brings us to the issue of malice in the present case. As has been noted, New York Times has an exception and affords no protection for a false statement "made with 'actual malice'—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not", pp. 279-80 of 376 U.S., or, as said in Garrison v. Louisiana, p. 74 of 379 U.S., "with the high degree of awareness of [its] probable falsity demanded by New York Times".

Does the record here conclusively reveal this type of malice, or if not, does justice require that the case be remanded for a new trial as the Supreme Court ordered in Rosenblatt v. Baer, supra? We arrive at a negative answer to both questions.

First, we repeat our observation that, although at the time of the trial of this case New York Times had just been decided, it nevertheless had appeared before the trial began and its presence was known to both counsel and to the trial court. The defendant newspaper, at the commencement of the trial, moved to amend its answer to incorporate a defense based on New York Times. Prior to the submission of the case to the jury this motion was granted. The answer, as then amended, made specific reference to the New York Times decision and its controlling precedent in the absence of actual malice. The district court stated that, although it felt New York Times was not applicable here, the amendment would serve to preserve the point for appeal. The issue, therefore, was obviously before court and counsel at the trial and we cannot assume that the case was not framed and tried, or need not have been so framed and tried, under the hovering presence of New York Times.

Further, the plaintiff asserts that he alleged and proved malice. The complaint did refer to malice, although perhaps only in the pre-New York Times and state law sense. It described the accused editorial as "malicious" and it asserted that it was published "when defendant knew or should have known that [its accused statements] were false". Plaintiff's counsel referred to malice in his opening statement and in his argument to the jury. The claimed proof of malice consisted of the defendant's publication in its newspaper of letters to the editor, a cartoon, and a series of adverse editorial comments on Dr. Pauling both before and after the editorial of October 10; a deposition concession by the defendant's editor that "We felt he was about to be cited, he wasn't"; and the fact the accused material was an editorial rather than a paid advertisement, as in New York Times, or something furnished by a national agency, as in Walker, supra.

Our conclusion is that these factors of asserted proof add up to something far less than the definition of actual malice prescribed for the New York Times exception and fall short of "the convincing clarity which the constitutional standard demands". Pp. 285-86 of 376 U.S. Singly or in the aggregate, these factors might possibly be found to constitute reportorial negligence or antagonism or contempt for Dr. Pauling and his views and methods. Yet, each and all of these have been held to be less than "actual malice". New York Times, p. 288 of 376 U.S. (negligence); Garrison v. Louisiana, pp. 73 and 78-79 of 379 U.S. (hatred, ill will, negligence); Henry v. Collins, p. 357 of 380 U.S. (intent to inflict harm); Rosenblatt v. Baer, p. 84 of 383 U.S. (negligence).

In any event, the jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant and did so on instructions more favorable to the plaintiff than instructions based on New York Times could have been.[2] The instructions given were based on the

[2]The court instructed the jury that the offending statement was susceptible of two meanings; that the jury was to determine which of the two meanings an ordinary reader would give the material; that under the first possible meaning, if the statement did not directly impute a crime, then, for the publication to be libelous,

> "you must also find that the article was a malicious defamation of the plaintiff. . . . By malice is meant malice in fact as dis-pre- and ex-New York Times Missouri law of libel. See Riss v. Anderson, 304 F.2d 188, 194-95, 198 (8 Cir. 1962) and cases cited. The burden of proof, of course, is on Pauling. New York Times, p. 284 of 376 U.S.; Pape v. Time, Inc., supra, p. 560 of 354 F.2d. The jury by its verdict has found that this burden was not sustained even on the less stringent standards enunciated by the trial court.

We therefore find on this record nothing parallel to the factors which prompted the Supreme Court to remand Rosenblatt v. Baer for a new trial. This case was tried after New York Times. The exception to the rule was there for the plaintiff to see and to meet if he could, was apparent tinguished from presumed malice, that is, the actual presence of an improper motive on the part of the defendant implying the purpose and desire to injure. It may, and in common acceptation does, denote that the defendant was actuated by spite or ill will towards the plaintiff, but in its legal significance such degree of personal hostility is not in all events essential. On the contrary, it is the willfullness or evil intent of the act—the wanton disregard of the rights and interests of the party injured—which suffices to render the act malicious in its legal sense; and hence the usual definition that by malice is meant the intentional doing of a wrongful act without just cause or excuse. It is likewise a wrong motive, which would tend to show malice to state something as the truth without knowing whether it is true, recklessly, and without any reasonable attempt to find out about it or with complete disregard of other known facts"; that under the second possible meaning, namely, a violation of 2 U.S.C. § 192, the statement was libelous per se by directly imputing a crime; and that then "The Court further instructs the jury that it is libelous to maliciously defame any person by publishing falsely in a newspaper of and concerning such person that he has been cited for contempt of Congress, and that there has been an affirmation of contempt of Congress by a United States Court. Such a publication is said to be actionable per se or of itself. By this is meant that such publication if false is presumed to be malicious, and it is not necessary to prove any express malice in order to warrant a verdict for the plaintiff . . ."

---

and known by counsel, and, by the jury's verdict, was not met.

This makes it unnecessary for us to consider the plaintiff's claimed errors as to instructions, evidence, and trial conduct. The judgment dismissing the action on the merits is affirmed.

A true copy.

Attest:

Clerk, U. S. Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit.

APPENDIX

Saint Louis Globe-Democrat editorial in its issues of October 10, 1960:

"GLORIFICATION OF DECEIT.

"The petition of 140 members of the Washington University faculty in support of the defiance of Linus Pauling of the United States Senate dangerously compromises the good name and patriotism of that great University.

"As might be expected, among the first 16 organizers and signers are Edward U. Condon, once described by a House Committee as the 'weakest link in America's security chain,' and Barry Commoner, a man who has consistently fought every attempt to keep America sufficiently strong in the nuclear field to maintain peace by deterring aggression.

"The background of the present attempt of the Senate to defend its own integrity and that of the nation is this: Three years ago, Pauling organized a petition which obtained a number of signatures calling for the United Nations to bar nuclear testing. At the very least, the petition was identical with Russian policy then and now, which calls for cessation of nuclear testing and disarmament without the safeguards of inspection.

"The United States national policy agrees on the desirability of both aims, but insists upon the wholly realistic safeguard of foolproof inspection. This same approach recognizes the utter folly of trusting the Russians to keep their word on anything, considering the overwhelming evidence of their consistent cheating on every commitment they have made in the past 40 years.

"The Senate Internal Security Subcommittee very properly felt that a movement of this sort, which if successful might have laid America and the Free World bare to attack and defeat by the Communists, might have been Communist inspired.

"The Senate subcommittee called Pauling to testify as to who helped him collect the petitions. Pauling contemptuously refused to testify and was cited for contempt of Congress. He appealed to the United States District Court to rid him of the contempt citation, which that Court refused to do. The appeal from the lower court's affirmation of contempt is expected to be handed down by the Supreme Court today.

"It would be idle to guess as to that decision, but we cannot but note that the Supreme Court has been woefully weak in upholding the basic right of the nation to defend itself against the Communist conspiracy in recent years.

"The basic issue, regardless of a Supreme Court decision which might, like others, have to be repaired by the Congress, is whether Pauling or anyone else should testify as to his accomplices. Pauling insists that he is a better judge than the Congress or any court as to what is right and what is wrong. The Senate does not concur in this view.

"The Washington University group clothes their defense of Pauling in self-righteous and ringing phrases—'historic service to humanity,' 'highest patriotism,' 'constitutionally guaranteed freedoms' and 'civic duties.'

"These great words are, like the phrases of the Communists, a prostitution of the best and most meaningful words in our language in their present connection, for their own purposes.

"The basic question is whether the Senate can inquire into matters concerning the defense of the nation, and whether the United States should be able to defend itself by any and all means at its disposal against threats or the well-founded fears of threats against its own security.

"We believe it should. We believe that the Senate acted in good conscience in investigating a proposal which might have wrecked the strength and security of the state.

"Much is made of the fact that Pauling is a Nobel Prize winner. That is no guarantee of anything more than proficiency in chemistry. It certainly is no guarantee of either patriotism or correctness in foreign policy. It above all does not cloak him with an immunity to defy the Senate and to decide on his own prerogative what is best for America.

"A great St. Louis institution is being badly used, nor is it the first time, by a group which glorifies deceit and evasion in the outrageous guise of freedom of speech and conscience."

Office-Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
SEP 1 1966
JOHN F. DAVIS, CLERK

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

October Term, 1966.

No. 37.

CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,
Petitioner,

v.

WALLACE BUTTS,
Respondent.

On Petition for a Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.

SUPPLEMENTAL STATEMENT OF PETITIONER.

HERBERT WECHSLER,
435 West 116th St.,
New York, N. Y. 10027

PHILIP H. STRUBING,
123 South Broad St.,
Philadelphia, Penna. 19109
Attorneys for Petitioner,
Curtis Publishing Company.

PEPPER, HAMILTON & SCHEETZ,
Philadelphia, Penna.,

KILPATRICK, CODY, ROGERS,
McCLATCHEY & REGENSTEIN,
Atlanta, Ga.,
Of Counsel.

International, 711 So. 50th St., Phila., Pa. 19143—Tel. SA 7-8711 Area Code 215

INDEX.

	Page
SUPPLEMENTAL STATEMENT OF PETITIONER	1
I. The Publication Was Entitled to the Privilege Established by the Rule of New York Times, as Explained and Applied in Rosenblatt v. Baer	1
II. Respondent's Argument That "Actual Malice Within New York Times Was Conclusively Proven" Is Both Legally Immaterial and Wholly Unsupported by the Record	13
CONCLUSION	20
APPENDIX	21
Summary of Evidence	21
1. The Butts-Bryant Telephone Conversation	21
2. Georgia Preparations for and Play in the Alabama Game	34
3. Evidence by Football Coaches and Players on Value of Burnett Notes	37
4. The Investigation, Preparation and Publication of the Article	40

TABLE OF CASES CITED.

	Page
Allen v. Regents of the University System, 304 U.S. 439 (1938)	6, 7
Associated Press v. Walker, No. 150, October Term, 1966 (petition for certiorari filed May 18, 1966)	13
Burnet v. Wilmington Parking Authority, 365 U.S. 715 (1961)	7
Coleman v. MacLennan, 78 Kan. 711 (1908)	9, 10
Evans v. Newton, 382 U.S. 296 (1966)	7
Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64 (1964)	8, 14
Henry v. Collins, 380 U.S. 356 (1965)	14
New York Times Co. v. Connor, No. 22362, decided August 4, 1966, Slip Opinion, p. 22	18
New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254	2, 3, 5, 7, 9, 10, 13, 14, 15, 18, 19
Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75	1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, 14
Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147 (1959)	9
Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513 (1958)	9
Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234 (1957)	9
Time Inc. v. Hill, No. 22, October Term, 1966, reargument ordered June 20, 1966, 384 U.S. 995	13

STATUTES AND AUTHORITIES CITED.

	Page
Bertelsman, Libel and Public Men, 52 A.B.A.J. 657 (1966)	10
Education in a Divided World (1948)	11
Georgia Code:
§ 32-101	4
§ 32-104	4
§ 32-112	4
§ 32-113	4
§ 32-153	4
§ 32-154	4

STATUTES AND AUTHORITIES CITED (Continued).

	Page
§ 40-1805	5
§ 40-1805(c)	6
§ 40-1808	5
§ 40-1902	5
§ 40-1906.1	5
§ 40-1921.1	5
§ 40-2001	5
Georgia Const. Sec. IV, par. I	4
Guthrie, No More Football for Us!, Sat. Ev. Post, Oct. 13, 1951	12
Higher Education Facilities Act of 1963 (77 Stat. 363)	11
Kalven, The New York Times Case: A Note on "The Central Meaning of the First Amendment", 1964 Sup. Ct. Rev. 191	10
Miller, The Truth About Big Time Football (1953)	12
Morrill Act of 1862	11
Northwest Ordinance of 1787	11
Pedrick, Freedom of the Press and the Law of Libel: The Modern Revised Translation, 49 Cornell, L.Q. 581 (1964)	10
Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States, 1963	11
Savage, American College Athletics (Carnegie Bulletin No. 23)	6, 12
The Educational Record, Council Action on Athletic Policy, vol. xxxiii, p. 246	6, 11

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States.

OCTOBER TERM, 1966.

No. 37.

CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,
Petitioner,

v.

WALLACE BUTTS,
Respondent.

ON PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FIFTH CIRCUIT.

SUPPLEMENTAL STATEMENT OF PETITIONER.

In accordance with the request of the Court, communicated by the Clerk on August 4, petitioner submits this supplemental statement addressed to the bearing on petitioner's contentions of the decision and opinion of the Court in Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75.

I.

The Publication Was Entitled to the Privilege Established by the Rule of New York Times, as Explained and Applied in Rosenblatt v. Baer.

The judgment was reversed in Rosenblatt on two distinct grounds: first, that the instructions of the trial court contravened the First Amendment in permitting the jury "to find liability merely on the basis of" the plaintiff's "relationship to the government agency, the operations of which were the subject of discussion" and "without regard to evidence that the asserted implication of the column was made specifically of and concerning him" (383 U.S. at 82); and, second, that the plaintiff as Supervisor of the Belknap County Recreation Area, a facility owned and operated by the County principally as a ski resort, "may have held" a position as a "public official" (383 U.S. at 87), within the meaning of the New York Times rule, and thus be barred from a recovery for defamation by a publication critical of his performance of his duties, without proof of malice as defined by New York Times. Though the first ground of reversal is irrelevant, the second has important bearing on this cause.

First: We recognize that Rosenblatt did not definitively hold that if the publication implying dishonesty in the financial management of the Ski Area could be found to make a reference to Baer the privilege of New York Times must necessarily apply. What the opinion states explicitly is that Baer's theory "that his role in the management of the Area was so prominent and important that the public regarded him as the man responsible for its operations"—the theory advanced at the trial to establish that the article referred to him—"at the least, raises a substantial argument that he was a public official", within the limitation of the rule of New York Times (383 U.S. at 87). How substantial that argument was thought to be is indicated, in our view, by the Court's statement that one of the reasons for not foreclosing Baer from "attempting retrial of his action" was that the record, made before the New York Times decision, left "open the possibility that respondent could have (emphasis supplied) adduced proofs to bring his claim outside the New York Times rule" (383 U.S. at 87). The "proofs" referred to must, we think, envisage evidence showing that the scope of Baer's responsibility was less extensive than he sought to show at the first trial.

The disposition is, therefore, instinct with affirmation that if Baer was, indeed, responsible for the management of the Ski Area, the privilege would apply to a publication that impugned his efficiency or honesty in the performance of that task.

No other view appears to us to be consistent with the general criteria embodied in the Court's opinion, namely, that "the 'public official' designation applies at the very least to those among the hierarchy of government employees who have, or appear to the public to have, substantial responsibility for or control over the conduct of governmental affairs" (383 U.S. at 85); and that where "a position in government has such apparent importance that the public has an independent interest in the qualifications and performance of the person who holds it, beyond the general public interest in the qualifications and performance of all government employees" (383 U.S. at 86), malice in the New York Times sense must be proved. It was not doubted that the operation of the publicly-owned Ski Area involved the "conduct of governmental affairs" and could not have been doubted that if Baer's position involved "substantial responsibility" for the management of the Area, the public had "an independent interest" in his "qualifications and performance . . . beyond the general public interest in the qualifications and performance of all government employees." Such reservation as there was in the Court's ruling must, therefore, be understood as a reflection of uncertainty as to whether and how far Baer was in fact involved in those aspects of the management of the Ski Area attacked by the challenged publication, not as a legal doubt that if he was responsibly involved he must prove malice to recover.

On this analysis, the Rosenblatt decision plainly supports petitioner's submission in this cause. Here, as in Rosenblatt, the official status of the plaintiff was not litigated as such at the trial. But there was no dispute, and could have been none, that as Athletic Director respondent had, in his own words, "responsibility for . . . general supervision of the entire athletic program at the University of Georgia" (R. 654), including the "big business" (R. 655) of college football. If actual or apparent responsibility for the management of a public recreation area suffices to accord the privilege to charges of malfeasance in performance of that function, there can be no basis for a contrary result when the responsibility to which the charge relates entails the supervision of the program of athletics of a University established, maintained and supported by the State. There surely is no smaller or no less legitimate a public interest in the conduct of athletics as an aspect of a State-conducted public education program than in the use of public land and facilities for purposes of recreation. The "scope of the privilege is to be determined," as the Court said in Rosenblatt "by reference to the function that it serves" (383 U.S. at 85, n.). In the one case no less than in the other, the privilege is necessary to protect the freedom of the press to criticize the way in which a public trust has been discharged, a freedom that the First Amendment surely was designed to make secure.

Second: Respondent's answer to the patent parallel between this case and Rosenblatt is that he was not employed as Athletic Director by the Board of Regents of the University System, the governing body of the University (Ga. Const. Sec. IV, par. I; Ga. Code §§ 32-101, 32-104, 32-112, 32-113) but rather by the Athletic Association of the University, a separate corporate entity composed of a Board of faculty members and alumni (R. 262, 1161-1165), which a statute of 1949 declares "not to be" an agency of the State and the accounts of which the statute exempts from the State audit required "in connection with the financial operations of State agencies" (Ga. Code §§ 32-153, 32-154). The Athletic Association, it is urged "was thus not an arm of government" and the respondent as its employee could not "be engaged in government while performing its functions" (Further Response of Respondent, p. 14).

We submit that the distinction is without significance for purposes of measuring the ambit of the privilege established by the principle of New York Times. The statutory declaration that the Athletic Associations of the State Universities are "not to be agencies of the State" can obviously have no greater import in determining how far freedom to criticize their operations or the operations of their managerial employees is protected by the First Amendment than the State definitions of the term "public official," held to be irrelevant in Rosenblatt v. Baer. The one denomination no less than the other was developed "for local administrative purposes, not the purposes of a national constitutional protection", with the result that it is "at best accidental" if the State-law standard should "reflect the purposes of New York Times" (383 U.S. at 84).

That this State terminology is wholly unrelated to the purpose of the privilege is very clear. The fact that the Athletic Association or, as it is often called, Athletic Board, is exempted from State-imposed procedures governing expenditures, contracting and accounting (e.g., Ga. Code § 40-1805, 1808, 1902, 1906.1, 1921.1, 2001) does not detract from the fact that its sole function is to play a part in the management and government of the State University, subject to the ultimate responsibility and control of the President and Board of Regents (R. 262). The athletic program, of which the detailed administration was governed by the Board, was the program of the University. The position of Director of Athletics, though the incumbent was chosen and paid, at least in major part,[1] by the Association, was that of Director of Athletics of the University of Georgia.

1. The record shows that respondent received a salary of $12,000 per annum from the Association (R. 1162, 1165). The President of the University testified, however, that "part of his salary was paid by the University and therefore that part was subject to teacher retirement" (R. 1123). The additional amount involved is not established on the record. A question by his counsel sought, however, to bring out that he received $6,500 a year from the Georgia Student

The role of the Association as an organ of administration of the University has not, indeed, significantly changed since the Board of Regents and the State contended in this Court that "public education is a governmental function" and that "the holding of athletic contests is an integral part of the program of public education conducted by Georgia" (Allen v. Regents of the University System, 304 U.S. 439, 449 ([1938])). The President of the University is Chairman ex officio of the Association and Chairman of the Executive Committee (R. 262, 1070, 1092, 1104, 1161-1163). The Comptroller and Treasurer of the University is Treasurer of the Association (R. 1153). A majority of the members of the Board are members of the faculty, as required by the Southeastern Athletic Conference[2] to which Georgia belongs, and they are chosen by the President (R. 783, 161, 1162). In short, nothing distinguishes the Athletic Association from any other entity responsible for the administration of the programs of the University except that it has a larger measure of financial autonomy and that there is minority participation of alumni. To accord these differentia constitutional signifi-

---

Educational Fund (R. 1165). The State Department of Audits Report of Examination of the University of Georgia for the year ended June 30, 1963, a document that Georgia law requires to be filed for public information (Ga. Code § 40-1805(c)), shows (p. 211) payments by the University to respondent as Athletic Director of $1,666.64 for the eight months before his resignation.

2. This requirement tends to comply with the first recommendation of the Report of the Special Committee on Athletic Policy of the American Council on Education, approved by the Executive Committee of the Council in 1952, that as "in all other educational activities, the control of athletics should be held absolutely and completely by those responsible for the administration and operation of the institution." See Council Action on Athletic Policy, The Educational Record, vol. xxxiii, pp. 246, 249 (1952). A study by the Carnegie Foundation, published in 1929, listed Georgia as an institution in which "genuine faculty control" of the regulation of college athletics had been found. Savage, American College Athletics, p. 101 (Carnegie Bulletin No. 23).

cance would trivialize the principle of New York Times. The considerations that preclude a State from avoiding the limitations of the Fourteenth Amendment by the delegation of its public functions are even more plainly applicable here. Cf. Burnet v. Wilmington Parking Authority, 365 U.S. 715 (1961); Evans v. Newton, 382 U.S. 296 (1966).

Third: In his original response to the petition, respondent sought to draw strength from this Court's decision in the Allen case that State immunity to Federal taxation did not extend to gate receipts for public admission to athletic contests of the University, since the exhibition of such contests is "a business having the incidents of similar enterprises usually prosecuted for private gain" (304 U.S. at 452). Response to Petition, p. 24. The District Court accorded weight to this submission in denying the petitioner's motion for new trial (R. 1467; Petition, Appendix B, p. 95a).

It is enough to point to Rosenblatt to answer this contention. The conduct of a public recreation area, charging admission fees, also involves a "business comparable in all essentials to those usually conducted by private owners" (304 U.S. 439, 451), yet no importance was attributed to that fact in considering if New York Times applied. The reason is entirely obvious. The fact that government undertakes enterprise similar to that in which non-governmental entities engage does not diminish, and at times may well increase, the need for freedom of discussion of the way in which the public enterprise is run and of the honesty or the efficiency of those who have it in their charge. The policies that govern the extent of governmental tax immunity have no relationship at all to those that measure the extent of the protection conferred by the First Amendment.

Fourth: There is no greater merit in other distinctions the respondent seeks to draw between this case and Rosenblatt.

The suggestion (Further Response, p. 5) that there was no issue as to Butts' performance of his duties as Athletic Director prior to the instant publication is not true[3] and, even if it were, would be irrelevant. What is decisive is the scope of his responsibility for supervising the entire athletic program of the University. If that position was "one which would invite public scrutiny and discussion of the person holding it" (383 U.S. at 87, n.), as we submit it plainly was, the privilege must necessarily apply to the first published criticism of his official conduct, no less than to the later publication of a criticism previously made.

Nor is there force in the submission that the criticism here involved "did not relate to his conduct of his duties as Athletic Director" (Further Response, pp. 6-7) because the Football Coach, not the Director, was responsible for formulating the team's plan and strategy. It was because he was Director that respondent had access to the team's secret practice sessions (R. 405). It was as Director that he was responsible for scheduling the game with Alabama (R. 580) and, perforce, for safeguarding its full integrity as a scholastic competition. It might as well have been contended in Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64 (1964) that the defendant's insinuation that the judges were subject to "racketeer influences" (379 U.S. at 66) did not relate to their official conduct since they were not authorized by their commissions to pervert the course of justice.

Fifth: Our contention that respondent as Director of Athletics was a public official for the purpose of the rule of New York Times does not necessarily imply that every member of the faculty or of a State University is in the same position. For one thing, a member of the faculty is not as such charged with a supervisory or managerial responsibility to which the principle declared in Rosenblatt would easily apply. But more than this, freedom of teaching, research and scholarship is itself protected by the First Amendment. Cf. Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234, 250-251, 261-263 (1957). To the extent that liability for defamation unqualified by a privilege safeguards academic freedom in conducting such activity, it may be argued that it also serves "the values nurtured by the First and the Fourteenth Amendments" and may thus avoid the "thrust of New York Times" (383 U.S. at 86). That proposition must be weighed against the argument per contra that the accommodation that resolves the "tension" (383 U.S. at 86) between First Amendment values and the social interest in protecting reputation is no less appropriate in dealing, in addition, with conflicting interest in the freedom of expression. Weighing that dilemma it may still be the conclusion that the privilege applies to any statement challenged as a defamation if it relates to a subject on which freedom of expression is protected by the First Amendment. Cf. Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147 (1959); Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513 (1958); Coleman v. MacLennan, 78 Kan. 711, 723 (1908); Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. at 89 (concurring opinion).

3. Burnett reported his story to the University authorities before he disclosed it to petitioner and his charges were being investigated by a member of the Georgia Athletic Board, the President of the University, the Chancellor of the University System, the Chairman of the Board of Regents of the University system, the Commissioner of the Southeastern Athletic Conference and the President of the University of Alabama. R. 194, 259, 266-267, 1125, 1215-1216. See Appendix, infra pp. 28, 29, 31.

For reasons previously stated, a less subtle problem is presented by this case. The respondent was responsible for supervision of the University's athletic program. Neither that program nor its supervision involves modes of self-expression comprehended in the freedom that the First Amendment guarantees. But since the management of a State University is plainly a governmental enterprise, criticism of the operation of the program of the quality or the integrity of its direction "is at the very center of the constitutionally protected area of free discussion" (383 U.S. at 85). The social "interest in preventing and redressing attacks upon reputation" must, accordingly, yield place to the "values nurtured by the First and Fourteenth Amendments" (383 U.S. at 86) to the extent required by the privilege of New York Times.

Sixth: It should be added that the public interest in the quality and the integrity of the respondent's conduct as Director of Athletics does not derive only from the fact that Georgia is a State University, decisive as that fact is to invoke the privilege of New York Times. The integrity of college football, whoever the participants, is in itself a matter of important and legitimate concern, as an activity on public exhibition and a phase of higher education. This public interest in the subject matter of the publication would, we think, suffice to gain it the protection of the First Amendment, even if it were not otherwise within the rule of New York Times.

"Criticism of government is at the very center of the constitutionally protected area of free discussion" (383 U.S. at 85) but it is plain that this is not the only subject on which freedom of expression is protected by the First Amendment. We think the safeguard comprehends discussion of all public issues, in the sense of any subject as to which the public has important and legitimate concern. See, e.g., Kalven, The New York Times Case: A Note on "The Central Meaning of the First Amendment", 1964 Sup. Ct. Rev. 191, 221; Pedrick, Freedom of the Press and the Law of Libel: The Modern Revised Translation, 49 Cornell L.Q. 581, 591-595 (1964); Bertelsman, Libel and Public Men, 52 A.B.A.J. 657, 661 (1966); Coleman v. MacLennan, 78 Kan. 711, 723 (1908). It was, indeed, said by the Court in New York Times, and repeated in the subsequent decisions, that our "profound national commitment" is to "the principle that debate on public issues (italics supplied) should be uninhibited, robust and wide-open . . ." (376 U.S. at 270).

That this publication was addressed to such a public issue, we submit is wholly clear. James Bryant Conant is not alone in the belief that the "strength of this republic is . . . intimately connected with the success or failure of our system of public education" (Education in a Divided World (1948) p. 1). As President Kennedy stated in his Special Message to the Congress proposing the measure that became the Higher Education Facilities Act of 1963 (77 Stat. 363), "from every point of view, education is of paramount concern to the national interest as well as to each individual" (Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States, 1963, p. 106). Because of the magnitude of that concern, Congress, as President Kennedy put it in an earlier message (id., 1962, p. 111), "has repeatedly recognized its responsibility to strengthen our educational system without weakening local responsibility," citing enactments reaching back to the Northwest Ordinance of 1787 and the Morrill Act of 1862.

To affirm public concern in education is, of course, to affirm such concern in all the problems it confronts, which never were of greater moment than they are in our time. The maintenance of the integrity of the athletic programs of the colleges and universities that engage in intercollegiate competition does not pose the largest issue in the field of higher education but it has presented an important problem through the years. Its importance is attested by the Report of the Special Committee on Athletic Policy of the American Council on Education, composed of eleven Presidents or Chancellors under the chairmanship of John A. Hannah of Michigan State, which was unanimously approved by the Executive Committee of the Council in 1952. The Report (Council Action on Athletic Policy, The Educational Record, vol. xxxiii, pp. 246-255) states, inter alia:

> American colleges and universities engage in intercollegiate athletics because of a deep conviction that when properly administered they make an important contribution to the total educational services of the institution. There is an increasingly widespread awareness, however, that athletics may become so severely infected with proselyting, subterfuge, and distorted purpose as to more than neutralize the benefits. Certainly the abuses and suspicion of abuse now associated with the conduct of intercollegiate athletics foster moral apathy and cynicism in our students—those young men and women who increasingly share responsibility for this country's strength and freedom.

The urgency of the problem is even more apparent in the context of current external and internal threats to our society. In the last analysis, the strength of our free society depends not only upon armaments but also upon the integrity of our institutions and our people.

This committee, after consulting competent authorities, has reluctantly reached the conclusion that in intercollegiate athletics as now conducted, despite the adherence by many institutions to the highest standards, serious violations not only of sound educational policies but also of good moral conduct are not in fact uncommon. Wherever these exist, they can only be injurious to athletics, to our schools and colleges, and especially to our youth.

The present situation has been brought about by external pressures and internal weaknesses evident during a considerable period. The rewards in money and publicity held out to winning teams, particularly in football and basketball, and the desire of alumni, civic bodies, and other groups to see the institutions in which they are interested reap such rewards, have had a powerful influence on many colleges and universities. The influence has been magnified when control of athletic policy has been permitted to slip from the hands of the faculty and central administration.[4]

4. Cf. Savage, op. cit. supra note 2, p. 32: "Whatever the reason, it is certain that the seriousness with which college athletics are nowadays taken has driven certain well-recognized abuses under cover, but at the same time has propagated and intensified them." See also, e.g., Miller, The Truth About Big Time Football (1953) passim; Guthrie, No More Football for Us!, Sat. Ev. Post, Oct. 13, 1951, p. 24.

We submit that an honest statement charging conduct constituting one of these abuses is protected by the First Amendment; and that the privilege this Court has deemed essential to safeguard the honest criticism of all governmental operations (New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 279-280) is no less required to protect a publication of this kind. In a society in which the relationship between government and private enterprise assumes as many diverse forms as in our own, including the extent of public subsidy, it would be a grave misfortune if the freedom that the Constitution deems most vital for correction of abuses were confined by any artificial lines. Cf. Associated Press v. Walker, No. 150, October Term, 1966 (petition for certiorari filed May 18, 1966); Time Inc. v. Hill, No. 22, October Term, 1966, reargument ordered June 20, 1966, 384 U.S. 995.

II.

Respondent's Argument That "Actual Malice Within New York Times Was Conclusively Proven" Is Both Legally Immaterial and Wholly Unsupported by the Record.

In the effort to avoid review and reversal of this enormous judgment, respondent argues that malice in the sense of New York Times was "conclusively proven". Further Response, p. 7; Response, p. 26. The argument is legally immaterial and wholly unsupported by the record.

First: The argument is legally immaterial because, respondent notwithstanding (Response, p. 33; Further Response, p. 9), the instructions to the jury did not call on it to make a finding that comports with the requirements of New York Times.

As we pointed out in our petition, the District Court charged (R. 1356) that "actual malice encompasses the notion of ill will, spite, hatred and an intent to injure one" and "also denotes a wanton or reckless indifference or culpable negligence with regard to the rights of others." It is too plain for argument that this statement does not condition the punitive award on finding that a false statement was made "with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not" (New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 280) or make clear that "only those false statements made with the high degree of awareness demanded by New York Times" may be the basis of recovery. The charge, precisely like those held erroneous in Times, Garrison, Henry v. Collins, 380 U.S. 356 (1965) and Rosenblatt (383 U.S. at 83-84), allowed "recovery on a showing of intent to inflict harm rather than intent to inflict harm through falsehood"[5] (380 U.S. at 357) or even short of this, a merely "negligent misstatement" (383 U.S. at 84). The grounds for reversal in the previous decisions are, accordingly, presented here.

By the same token, it is wholly immaterial that the District Court gave as ground for the denial of the motion for new trial that "there was ample evidence from which a jury could have concluded that there was a reckless disregard of whether the article was false or not" (R. 1467-1468, Petition, Appendix B, p. 96a), or that the majority of the Court of Appeals was "in complete accord" with that conclusion (Petition, Appendix B, p. 33a). The simple and decisive fact is that the question was, at most, for the decision of the jury under an appropriate instruction. It was not decided by the jury since no issue was submitted in these terms.

Second: There is no support for the contention that knowledge of falsity or reckless disregard was "conclusively proven" at the trial.

We note in limine that this is an entirely paradoxical submission since, as we observed in our petition, the trial court's ruling that there was a jury question on defendant's plea of truth despite the burden of persuasion placed on the defendant (R. 480-488) and its statement in the charge that there "has been a sharp conflict in the testimony in this case" (R. 1360) applies a fortiori if the plaintiff must establish falsity and reckless disregard. Indeed, the syllogism is not only valid with respect to the issue of truth, as to which Times would shift the burden to the plaintiff. It is also valid on this record with respect to reckless disregard, since the defendant's evidence of truth was, apart from small detail, the very evidence that led the publisher to think the story true when it was published. How the same evidence that would have justified a jury verdict that the statement was essentially the truth could fail to justify the publisher's conviction of its truth, the respondent as yet has not explained.

5. That petitioner was well aware that the publication threatened harm to the respondent was, of course, readily admitted (R. 945, 1014).

It is, in short, entirely plain that on the record as evaluated by the courts below a jury correctly instructed as to the burden of proving falsity and the required proof of malice could have reasonably found for the defendant. Indeed, the record in this case, which we have summarized in the Appendix, yields a graphic demonstration of the difference in defending libel actions between the criterion of liability enunciated at the trial and that prescribed by New York Times.

For the reasons stated we believe reversal is required whether or not the evidence would have sustained a jury finding that the publication was malicious; and that the Court is not, therefore, obliged to make its own appraisal of the record. But were the evidence to be considered, we should strongly urge that far from the conclusive proof to which respondent has referred, it lack entirely "the convincing clarity which the constitutional standard demands" (New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. at 285-286).

As we show in detail in the Appendix (pp. 28-29, 40-44), petitioner in publishing the article relied essentially on Burnett's sworn statement as to what he had overheard and a number of circumstances tending to corroborate his story. Those circumstances were ascertained in the course of the Post's investigation prior to the publication, an investigation conducted by Frank Graham, an experienced sports writer who subsequently wrote the article, and Furman Bisher, sports editor of the Atlanta Journal, who had independently called the attention of the Post to Burnett's charges.

Among the corroborating circumstances were the facts that Burnett before talking to the Post, and at a time when he had no motive to falsify, had reluctantly reported his charges to Coach Griffith and consented to Griffith's laying them before the University authorities, who had promptly initiated an investigation; that Milton Flack, whom Burnett claimed to have told about the conversation on the day that it occurred, confirmed that he had done so; that Burnett had voluntarily submitted to a lie detector test requested by the University authorities and passed; that the records of the Southern Bell Telephone Company confirmed the fact that a call had been made by Butts to Bryant on September 13, 1962;[6] that Burnett claimed to have taken notes while he listened to the conversation; that the notes had been seen by Flack and Griffith; that the notes, together with Burnett's charges, were believed by Coach Griffith to be sufficiently important to report them to the University authorities; that on the occasion when Burnett saw Griffith, Griffith indicated that he had a suspicion that someone had been giving information to Alabama; that when Butts was called before the University authorities he refused to take a lie detector test and the next day submitted his resignation as Director of Athletics (R. 915); that the Georgia-Alabama game was a fiasco for Georgia; that Furman Bisher, purporting to have talked to people at the University, called Graham on March 1 and reported statements that he claimed were made by Georgia player Babb, Georgia

6. At the trial it was established that the September 13 call lasted 15 minutes and 2 seconds and was charged to the credit card of the Georgia Athletic Association (R. 165-167). It was also proved that Bryant had called Butts at his home the following Sunday, as Burnett claimed he said he would, the call lasting 67 minutes and charged to the credit card of Bryant (R. 169, 300, 1417).

trainer Richwine, and Coach Griffith, all of which tended to support the proposition that the Alabama team was familiar with Georgia's plays and formations; that two weeks before the Post issue went on sale, the completed story was sent to Bisher by Graham and Bisher made no comments or suggestions.

On the basis of this information Clay Blair, Jr., the Post's then editor-in-chief, and Davis Thomas, its managing editor, whose testimony the respondent took by deposition, swore that they were satisfied of the truth of the assertions in the publication.

Against the foregoing circumstances of corroboration, the respondent points to the fact that no representative of the Post saw Burnett's notes before the article was published, efforts to obtain them from the University authorities proving unavailing; that the Post knew that at a meeting with the University authorities on February 21, 1963, Burnett was confronted with the fact that he had been convicted and placed on probation on a charge of cashing two checks totalling $45 against insufficient funds (a dereliction the respondent's counsel charitably asserts establishes that he was known "as a bad-check artist" [Response, p. 27]); that the Post did not interview John Carmichael, Burnett's office associate, to whom Burnett claimed he had reported the Butts-Bryant conversation immediately after overhearing it on September 13 (a report very substantially confirmed by Carmichael in his testimony at the trial), because it was known that Carmichael had opposed Burnett's disclosure and would not be cooperative; that the Post did not review the film of the Alabama-Georgia game, though its sports editor wished to do so; that neither Butts nor Bryant was interviewed in the Post's investigation; that some of the quotations of statements of Georgia players and football staff, given Graham by Furman Bisher, were used without interviewing the quoted parties, who denied at the trial that they had made them; that the Post did not interview any coach or member of the Alabama team; that seven days before the publication date of the story, the respondent's counsel sent a telegram and letter to the Post stating without specification that the proposed content of the article was false; that during the week before the publication the respondent's daughter telephoned Clay Blair and tearfully requested him to forego publication; and, finally, that a demand for a retraction was presented and ignored.

We submit that this evidence affords no basis for concluding that petitioner's agents published the Graham article knowing that its essential statements were false or with a "high degree of awareness of their probable falsity". The important statements were derived in every instance from informants on whose truthfulness and accuracy the Post editors had reason to and did rely.

As another panel of the court below has recently observed in reversing a libel judgment, a "reporter . . . may rely on statements made by a single source even though they reflect only one side of the story without fear of libel prosecution by a public official" (New York Times Co. v. Connor, No. 22362, decided August 4, 1966, Slip Opinion, p. 22). It may be argued that the petitioner's investigation was in some respects inadequate. But even if the argument should be sustained, we think it clear that the inadequacy claimed shows negligence and nothing more.

Respondent's statement that "Curtis was informed of the falsity of the story" by his counsel's telegram and letter and his daughter's phone call (Response, p. 26), is, of course entirely disingenuous. If a denial unaccompanied by information or a mere appeal for sympathy suffices to defeat the privilege of New York Times, the great principle of that decision would be nullified at once in application. The opinion happily makes clear that it was not envisaged that such nullification should prevail (376 U.S. at 286-288).

It remains to add that the respondent drew great strength before the jury, and seeks to draw strength here, from statements by Clay Blair, Jr., the Post's editor-in-chief that he wished to change the image of the Post (R. 940) to "restore the crusading spirit, the sophisticated muckraking, the expose in mass magazines" (R. 943) and that in November, 1962 he had circulated a congratulatory staff memorandum stating that "the final yardstick" of this policy was that "we have about six lawsuits pending, meaning that we are hitting them where it hurts, with solid, meaningful journalism" (P. 6, R. 1376, 946-947). He also described the issue containing the publication here involved, as "a step in the right direction", adding that with this issue "we have gone twenty-five per cent toward the goal of the magazine I envision" (R. 940).

This is admittedly language that invites inflammatory misconstruction. Read in connection with the evidence we have detailed, we do not think that it permits a finding that petitioner embarked on a policy of grave indifference to the truth and that the instant publication was a product of such reckless disregard. The "high degree of awareness" of the "probable falsity" of challenged statements, demanded by the rule of New York Times calls, in our submission, for a judgment based upon the sources of the publication and their actual impact on the minds of those responsible for the derogatory statements made. Judged in these terms, we think the evidence makes clear this was a wholly honest publication, reflecting the conviction of the agents of the Post that Burnett was a credible informant, whose story was sufficiently confirmed to be believed.

CONCLUSION.

For the foregoing reasons, as well as on the other grounds set forth in the petition for a writ of certiorari (pp. 17-21), the petition should be granted and the judgment be reversed. A summary reversal on the authority of Rosenblatt v. Baer would be a proper disposition.

Respectfully submitted,

HERBERT WECHSLER,
PHILIP H. STRUBING,
Attorneys for Petitioner,
Curtis Publishing Company.

PEPPER, HAMILTON & SCHEETZ,
KILPATRICK, CODY, ROGERS, MCCLATCHEY & REGENSTEIN,
Of Counsel.

Appendix.

SUMMARY OF EVIDENCE.

1. The Butts-Bryant Telephone Conversation.

George Burnett, an Atlanta insurance man, testified that on Thursday, September 13, 1962, he was in the office of the Institute of Oral Hygiene on 11th Street in Atlanta, Georgia, attempting to call a business associate at the office of Communications International in the Rhodes-Haverty Building (R. 178), Jackson 5-3536 (R. 190-91). After four or five attempts, he heard "funny noises and electronic sounds" (R. 178), and then heard the operator say to a party whom she identified as Coach Butts:

> "Coach Bryant is out on the field but is on his way to the phone. Do you want to hold or do you want him to return the call?"
>
> "I will hold." Coach Butts replied (R. 178-179).

After a brief pause, a man, whom the operator identified as Coach Bryant, was heard on the line (R. 179). After the usual amenities (R. 179), Coach Bryant asked:

> "Do you have anything for me, Wally?" (R. 206).

Respondent then began to give Bryant information about the offensive and defensive plays to be used by the University of Georgia in its opening game with the University of Alabama on September 22 (R. 179, 205-206).

As the conversation progressed, Burnett began to make notes (R. 180, Def. Ex. 12, R. 1413), writing as he could get the words (R. 181), abbreviating as best he could (R. 185-86, 210), missing some portions of the conversation (R. 226-27).

According to Burnett, respondent told Bryant that Georgia lineman Reismueller was one of the best in the history of the school (R. 181), that Georgia's leading pass receiver, end Mickey Babb (Griffith—R. 316; Pearce—R. 434), "catches everything they throw" (R. 188), and that halfback Don Porterfield was the best back at Georgia since Trippi (R. 186). Respondent said that Georgia safety-man Woodward committed himself fast on pass defense (R. 183), and that Georgia's pass defense was so weak that Alabama could pass in anybody's direction except Blackburn's (R. 184), Georgia's best defensive back (Griffith—R. 312).

One play was identified by a name (29-O Series) (R. 188), which was not recognized by the Georgia coaching staff (Griffith—R. 316, 359; Pearce—R. 474), but which was readily identified by Bill Hartman, respondent's former backfield coach (Hartman—R. 984, 989, 997-98), as an abbreviation of "29 overpass," the name of a play used by respondent during his tenure as head coach (Hartman—R. 997-98). Burnett quoted respondent as having said:

> "You remember my old 29-O series?" Butts asked. "Georgia uses that" (R. 188).

Burnett testified that respondent said that the formation Georgia played until they got close to the goal line was a slot to the right with the ends normal—split out about three yards (R. 186). Burnett did not remember what respondent said about "slot right, left end out 15 yards," other than what he wrote down (R. 189). These were the two basic offensive formations which were to be used by Georgia in the Alabama game (Griffith—R. 306-307, 317; Inman—R. 393; Pearce—R. 432-434). According to Burnett, Bryant was also told that when Georgia would get near the goal line "Baer (end Mickey Babb) goes on a hook" (R. 186).

Burnett further reported that respondent told Bryant that on "optional left pass," if Georgia can block the man on the corner, they keep running—if not, they will pass (R. 181). Although the optional left pass terminology has been originated by respondent during his tenure as head coach (Griffith—R. 309-310; Butts—R. 662), Georgia had used that terminology only once since Johnny Griffith became head coach in 1961 (Griffith—R. 328), and it was not used in 1962 (Griffith—R. 309-10, 328; Pearce—R. 466).

On defense, Georgia would drop the end off and contain with its tackle, respondent said (Burnett—R. 189), and on sweeps (end runs) Georgia would pull its on side guard (R. 183). Assistant coach Pearce confirmed that on sweeps Georgia pulled its on side guard against certain defenses (R. 426, 428).

Burnett reported that at intervals during the conversation, Bryant asked respondent questions about the Georgia team (R. 190). One particular question which Burnett remembered was:

> "How about quick kicks?"
> "Don't be worried about—", Coach Butts said "Don't be worried about quick kicks, they haven't got anybody that can." (Burnett—R. 187-188).

In fact, the Georgia team did not have anyone who could quick kick from its normal offensive formation (Griffith—R. 314-15; Pearce—R. 434), although a substitute quarterback could quick kick from a special formation (Hartman—R. 982).

During the conversation, according to Burnett, respondent was unable to answer some of Bryant's questions, but replied:

> "I don't know."
> "Can you find out?" Bryant asked.
> "I will try." Butts replied (R. 204).

As the conversation ended, Bryant asked Butts:

> "Will you be home Sunday, Wally?"
> Butts replied, "Yes, I will."
> Bryant said, "I'll give you a call then."
> "All right." (Burnett—R. 189, 203).

Burnett testified that after the call ended, he remained on the line and spoke to the operator (R. 189). However, the court ruled that what Burnett said to the operator, as well as what the operator replied, would be hearsay, and sustained an objection to it (R. 189-90).

Burnett, a former navigator, made a notation of the time and date as a matter of habit—"641[1] Athletic Office, 10:40 A.M., September 13, 1962, Jackson 5-3536." (Burnett —R. 189-90, Def. Ex. 12, R. 1415). According to Burnett, he sat there for twenty or thirty seconds and then dialed the number which he had originally called, Jackson 5-3536, and spoke to Milton Flack at the office of Communications International (R. 191). Again, Burnett was prevented from testifying as to what he said to Flack on the ground it was hearsay (R. 191).

Records of the Southern Bell Telephone Company confirmed that the call had been made (Flemming—R. 165-67). The toll card (Def. Ex. 13, R. 1416) showed that a long distance call had been placed by Wallace Butts to Paul "Brince" at the Athletic Department of the University of Alabama in Tuscaloosa at 10:29 A. M. on the morning of September 13. The call lasted 15 minutes 2 seconds and was charged to the credit card of the University of Georgia Athletic Association (Flemming—R. 165-67).

Burnett stated that later on the same day he discussed what he had overheard with his two business associates, Milton Flack and John Carmichael and showed them his notes (R. 201).

Carmichael testified for respondent and denied parts of Burnett's story (R. 810-868). He stated he came into the office of the Institute of Oral Hygiene, which was his company, about 10:30 on the morning of September 13, 1962 (R. 812). He found Burnett at Carmichael's desk with the telephone to his ear (R. 813). When Burnett put his finger to his mouth, Carmichael walked outside the door to where there was a secretary's desk and began looking through the morning mail (R. 813). He was six to eight feet from where Burnett was seated (R. 814). After five or six minutes, during which there was no conversation by Burnett over the phone, Burnett called him into the office and said "John—I heard a conversation between Coach Wally Butts and Coach 'Bear' Bryant—and I made some notes about it." (R. 814-815). He stated that if Burnett had said anything into the phone receiver, he would have heard it (R. 815). He specifically denied that Burnett spoke to the operator, or Milton Flack or anyone else (R. 816).

1. This number was identified as one of Coach Bryant's extensions at the University of Alabama Athletic Department (Bryant—R. 563).

Carmichael testified further that Burnett related that in the telephone conversation respondent had said that some football player was a great football player and that Georgia had two new coaches; and that Bryant had asked respondent if he was going to be home Sunday (R. 817-818). Outside of that, said Carmichael, there was nothing particularly involved in the Butts-Bryant conversation as reported by Burnett except general conversation (R. 818). Carmichael testified further that Burnett related the same thing to Milton Flack and himself that afternoon (R. 819-820); that Flack told Burnett he didn't think there was anything to it (R. 820); and that they both told Burnett to forget it (R. 820).

Carmichael also testified that the notes produced at the trial were not the notes shown him by Burnett on September 13 (R. 851, 1068).

On Sunday, September 16, 1962, Coach Bryant called respondent at his home in Athens. Although both respondent and Bryant testified that they were unable to remember the call (Bryant—R. 529; Butts—R. 776), long distance telephone records (R. 1417) showed that a call was placed from the University of Alabama at 8:51 p.m. and lasted for sixty-seven minutes (Flemming—R. 169). It was billed to the credit card of Paul W. Bryant (Flemming—R. 169; Gorday—R. 300).

Respondent testified he had known Bryant since Bryant was a player at Alabama (R. 643) and that he had talked to Bryant on numerous occasions (R. 645, 647). Specifically, he called Bryant in the summer of 1962 to inform him that respondent had learned that the enforcement of certain rules would be improved (R. 645). He had never turned down anyone who asked him a "coaching point" (R. 643-644). He talked to Bryant at least three times prior to and throughout the 1962 football season (R. 647). On many occasions he talked with other coaches (R. 652-654).

Respondent could not identify the telephone calls of September 13 and 16, 1962 (R. 648, 776). He emphatically denied that in the call of September 13 or at any other time, he gave Bryant information relating to secret plays, formations and defenses which the University of Georgia had in its game plan for the Alabama game (R. 647-648, 652). He stated he had never known the game plan of Coach Griffith for any game (R. 651).

The first time he learned of the September 13 call was when John Carmichael called him from Alabama when he was attending a funeral in Philadelphia, on January 30, 1963, (R. 648-650) to warn him that Burnett had told his story (Carmichael—R. 844-845). He had known Carmichael for a number of years (R. 650).

Respondent denied that he discussed with Bryant the subjects reflected in the notes produced by Burnett (R. 658-681). He said he did not know what plays or formations Georgia planned to use in the Alabama game (R. 681, 682).

Bryant had no recollection of whether respondent called him on September 13, nor, if the call was made, of what was said (R. 529). He flatly denied that respondent at any time gave him information relating to the plays, formations, or defenses to be used by Georgia against Alabama (R. 529-532). He also indicated that if respondent had given him such information, he would not have believed it (R. 532). Bryant further testified that Alabama was not properly prepared for one formation Georgia used in the game (R. 542-545), and made no significant changes in Alabama's defensive plan between September 13 and the day of the game, September 22 (R. 547). He attacked Burnett's statement that the operator on the September 13 call said, "Coach Bryant is out on the field, but he'll come to the phone. Do you want to hold, Coach Butts, or shall we call you back?" by stating that the practice field at Alabama is three blocks from the office having extension 641, and morning practices had been discontinued by September 13 (R. 563-564). He pointed out that according to phone company records he had not only talked to respondent for 67 minutes on September 16, but also to the University of Texas coach for 37 minutes (R. 568). He stated that during September, 1962 he discussed a number of matters with respondent, such as schedules, whether to play the game in Tuscaloosa or in Birmingham, for Georgia to buy and install lights, tickets, the bank situation, what time the Georgia team wanted to work out, the investment they were both interested in, enforcement policies of certain rules, football in general, and respondent's passing game (R. 569-571).

Burnett testified he did nothing about the call which he had overheard until January 4, 1963 when, unable to restrain himself any longer, he told his close friend, Bob Edwards, about it (Burnett—R. 192; Graham—R. 899). Burnett was prevented from testifying as to what he told Edwards, on the ground it was hearsay (Court—R. 192). Edwards communicated the information to Griffith, and in January, 1963, Burnett and Edwards met Griffith at his room at the Atlanta Biltmore Hotel, where Griffith was attending a meeting of the Southeastern Conference. (Burnett R. 193, 211, 252; Griffith—R. 304).

Griffith testified that during the 1962 season he had suspected that someone had been giving Georgia's plays and formations to her opponents (R. 376), and that he said to Burnett "I figured somebody had been giving information to Alabama." (R. 369).

Griffith called J. D. Bolton, Comptroller of the University of Georgia, and Treasurer of its Athletic Board, who was also at the meeting at the Biltmore, (Bolton—R. 262). Bolton went to Griffith's room and was shown Burnett's notes (Bolton—R. 263). Upon his return to Athens on Saturday, January 26, 1963, Griffith turned the notes over to University President O. C. Aderhold (Bolton—R. 263; Griffith—R. 304). That night the notes were delivered to Cook Barwick, a member of the Georgia Athletic Board at his home in Atlanta (Bolton—R. 263-64).

During the following week, Burnett and Edwards met with Dr. Aderhold, J. D. Bolton, and Barwick (Burnett—R. 19[illegible] 259). Burnett consented to a recording of the meeting (Burnett—R. 259). Ten days later, Burnett again met with the University officials at Barwick's office, where he signed an affidavit (Burnett—R. 195) and agreed to take a lie-detector test administered by an expert selected by the University (Burnett—R. 195). In compliance with this request, during the first week of February, Burnett took such a polygraph test (Burnett—R. 196). On February 21, 1963, Burnett was asked to meet with officials of the University and with Bernie Moore, Commissioner of the Southeastern Conference. At this meeting, Burnett was confronted with the fact that he had been arrested and was on probation on a bad check charge involving two checks totalling $45 (Graham—R. 909-911, 914). Frightened and angry (Graham—R. 913), Burnett sought the advice of his attorney, Pierre Howard (R. 224), and for the first time told Howard of the call which he had overheard (Burnett—R. 231, 234). Howard told Burnett that representatives of the Post were in Atlanta and recommended that he tell them his story before he was maligned (Burnett—R. 232, 233). Howard called Graham and arranged an appointment (Burnett—R. 233-234). Burnett agreed to give his story to the Post and a contract was arranged by Howard (R. 501) under which Burnett was to receive $2,000 for telling his story and $3,000 additional if the Post story turned out to be an exclusive (R. 1387). Pierre Howard (Pl. Ex. 11, R. 1880) and Milton Flack (Pl. Ex. 8, R. 1377) were each paid $500 by the Post (Graham—R. 502).

Respondent was asked to attend a meeting at Cook Barwick's office in Atlanta on Friday, February 22 (Butts—R. 684-86). Upon his arrival, he found not only Dr. Aderhold, J. D. Bolton and Barwick, but also Harmon Caldwell, Chancellor of the University System; James Dunlap, Chairman of the Board of Regents; Bernie Moore, Commissioner of the Southeastern Conference, and a close friend and former coaching assistant, Bill Hartman (Bolton—R. 266-67). After brief prefatory remarks by Dr. Aderhold (Aderhold—R. 1100-1102), Cook Barwick explained the nature of the charges made by Burnett and the results of the investigation (Aderhold—R. 1101). Respondent was handed a copy of the Burnett notes (Bolton—R. 267, 1154; Butts—R. 684; Aderhold—R. 1101). After reading them briefly, respondent said, according to Bolton:

> "No doubt the guy heard what he said he heard. I don't blame him for placing the interpretation that he did on this conversation. If I had been in his place, I probably would have thought the same thing, but he is mistaken. It's just conversation, ordinary football talk among coaches, and that you know I would never give old Bryant anything to help him and hurt Georgia. . . . If I did give any information to hurt Georgia it was not intentional." (R. 267, 277).

Dr. Aderhold testified that respondent "indicated that the call was made, and that these items were probably discussed, but they did not mean what Mr. Burnett had indicated that they did mean." (Aderhold—R. 1101-1102). Respondent testified that, on being shown the notes, "I said such a telephone call might have been overheard. I did not evaluate the notes." (Butts—R. 684). Hartman testified that respondent stated: "it was possible that a telephone conversation could have been overheard . . . but that it had been misconstrued." (Hartman—R. 977).

According to Dr. Aderhold and Bolton, respondent was asked to take a lie-detector test and sign an affidavit as Burnett had done (Bolton—R. 273; Aderhold—R. 1103). Respondent and Hartman testified that respondent was not asked to sign an affidavit (Butts—R. 685; Hartman—R. 980). Butts testified that he was requested to take the lie-detector test and that he refused to do so because he considered it more or less an insult (Butts—R. 789-90).

On the following day, Saturday, February 23, respondent went to the office of University President Aderhold, and resigned as Athletic Director effective February 28 (Bolton—R. 267; Butts—R. 686), stating in his resignation:

> "During the past two years, I have developed business interests. I find that I am having to devote more time to these interests. It is for this reason that I submit my resignation as athletic director of the University of Georgia effective February 28, 1963." (Butts—R. 771).

Respondent testified he resigned because Bolton advised him his resignation would be reported in the press and that would be embarrassing to Dr. Aderhold (R. 769-770) Bolton denied so advising respondent (R. 1124-1125).

As permitted by Georgia law (R. 1071-1072), six persons connected with the University of Georgia testified for petitioner with respect to respondent's credibility. Dr. Aderhold, who had been president of the University for 13 years and who was Chairman of the Athletic Board, said that the general character of respondent was bad (R. 1094-1095). J. D. Bolton, Comptroller and Treasurer of the University and Treasurer of the Georgia athletic association, said that respondent's character in the community was bad and that he would not believe respondent under oath (R. 1153). Similar testimony was given by four members of the Athletic Board: Harold Heckman, head of accounting and professor of accounting at the University (R. 1069, 1071-1072); William Bradshaw, an alumnus and former player (R. 1076, 1087); R. H. Driftmier, head of both the department and the division of agricultural engineering (R. 1088-1089); and Dr. Hugo Mills, an associate professor in the Education School of the University (R. 1142).[2]

Three or four days before February 24, Dr. Aderhold called the President of the University of Alabama, Dr. Frank A. Rose, and arranged a meeting in Birmingham (Rose—R. 1214). On Sunday, February 24, Dr. Aderhold, accompanied by Cook Barwick, met Dr. Rose and Bernie Moore at the latter's office in Birmingham (Aderhold—R. 1125; Rose—R. 1214-15) and advised Dr. Rose of the information disclosed by their investigation (Aderhold—R. 1125-26). Dr. Rose was specifically asked to investigate to determine whether respondent had given Bryant plays and detailed information about the Georgia team and whether this information helped Alabama in the game (Rose—R. 1248-49).

Upon his return to Tuscaloosa, Dr. Rose discussed the matter with Coach Bryant for approximately three hours (Bryant—R. 581; Rose—R. 1215). Bryant was unable to remember either the September 13 or the September 16 conversation (Bryant—R. 584), but, according to Rose, told Rose that he and respondent had talked on a number of occasions about rules interpretations, ticket sales and investments (Rose—R. 1216-17).

Dr. Rose talked to Coach Bryant on two or more occasions (Rose—R. 1217), and on March 6, wrote Dr. Aderhold advising him of the results of his investigation (Def. Ex. 21, R.—1420-1422);

---

2. Proferred evidence that respondent had charged personal expenses to the Athletic Association was excluded (R. 822-835).

"University of Alabama
Unversity, Alabama

Office of The President

March 6, 1963
Confidential

Dr. O. C. Aderhold, President
The University of Georgia
Athens, Georgia

Dear Aderhold:

I have spent a great deal of time investigating thoroughly the questions that were raised during our meeting in Birmingham and have talked with Coach Bryant at least on two occasions. As best as I can ascertain, this is the information that I have received.

Coach Butts has been serving on the football rules committee, and at a meeting held last summer of the Rules Committee the defenses used by Coach Bryant, L.S.U. and Tennessee were discussed at length and new rules were drawn up that would severely penalize these three teams unless the defenses were changes, [sic] particularly on certain plays.

Coach Butts had discussed this with Coach Bryant and the two were together at some meeting where Coach Butts told Coach Bryant that the University of Georgia had plays that would severely penalize the Alabama team and not only would cause LeRoy Jordan, an Alabama player, to be expelled from the game, but could severely injure one of the offensive players on the Georgia team.

Coach Bryant asked Coach Butts to let him know what the plays were, and on September 14 he called Coach Bryant and told him. There was a question about another one of the offensive plays of the Georgia team that could seriously penalize the Alabama team and bring on additional injury to a player. Coach Bryant asked Coach Butts to check on that play, which he did, and called back on September 16.

It was then that Coach Bryant changed his defenses and invited Mr. George Gardner, Head of the Officials of the Southeastern Conference, to come to Tuscaloosa and interpret for him the legality of his defenses. This Mr. Gardner did the following week.[2] The defenses were changed and Coach Bryant was grateful to Coach Butts for calling this to his attention.

Coach Bryant informs me that calling this to his attention may have favored the University of Alabama football team, but that he doubts it seriously. He did say that it prevented him from using illegal plays after the new change of rules.

I have checked into other matters that were discussed and can find no grounds for Mr. Bisher's accusations, and as I understand it he has now decided for lack of information to drop the matter.

Dr. Aderhold, this continues to be a serious matter with me, and if you have any additional information I would appreciate your furnishing me with it as I am not only anxious to work with you but to satisfy my own mind.

Thanking you for coming to Birmingham to meet with me and for sharing this information, I am

Most cordially yours,
Frank A. Rose,
President."

2. Dr. Rose admitted at the trial that George Gardner had visited the University of Alabama before the September 13 call, at the request of Bryant, and, therefore, Bryant did not invite Gardner to the University after the call as stated in the letter (Rose—R. 1224).

Dr. Rose testified he had dictated the letter hurriedly on the morning of March 6 before catching an 8:40 A.M. plane to attend a meeting of the American Council on Education in Washington and that it was mailed without his having read it (Rose—R. 1219). In the letter, he used the word "plays" when he intended to have used the word "techniques" (Rose—R. 1222-23). He also testified that the information contained in the letter was obtained from Coach Bryant (Rose—R. 1247). Bryant testified that although he discussed the matter with Dr. Rose, Rose had not accurately reported Bryant's remarks (Bryant—R. 582-583). Rose did testify that Bryant informed him that he was unable to remember either the September 13, or the Sunday, September 16 call (Rose—R. 1238), a fact repeatedly asserted by Bryant at the trial (Bryant—R. 529, 548, 568, 584).[3]

2. Georgia Preparations for and Play in the Alabama Game.

On September 13, Georgia Coach John Griffith was preparing his team for its opening game against Alabama on September 22. Georgia, which had an unusual number of sophomores (Griffith—R. 321; Pearce—R. 413), held

3. Subsequent to the trial, petitioner took the depositions of Dr. Rose and his secretary, Mrs. Marian Park, with respect to this letter. At the deposition of Dr. Rose, it was disclosed that Bryant had written a letter to Dr. Rose on February 28, three days after his return to Tuscaloosa from the meeting with Dr. Aderhold, Cook Barwick and Bernie Moore in Birmingham (R. 1429-1430, 1454-1455, 1524-1525) in which Bryant stated, inter alia, that he remembered the call to respondent of September 16, 1962. In addition, Dr. Rose admitted that he had been incorrect in testifying at the trial that he had to catch an 8:40 A.M. plane to Washington or that he went to Washington at all on March 6 (R. 1531-1533). He further testified that the letter to Dr. Aderhold had not been written on March 6 but on the preceding day, March 5 (R. 1530-1539). He was unable to remember whether he was in Tuscaloosa on that date (R. 1539) but his expense records showed no trips on March 4, 5 or 6 (R. 1539).

Mrs. Park testified that the March 6 letter to Dr. Aderhold was dictated slowly and thoughtfully by Dr. Rose as the fifth in a series of 32 letters, which took approximately an hour and a half to dictate (R. 1583-1584). Dr. Rose's correspondence file was found to contain a carbon copy of what appeared to be an earlier draft of the letter of March 6, dated March 5, which differs slightly from the March 6 letter (R. 1429, 1451). Although Mrs. Park testified that no draft had been prepared, her stenographic notes corresponded more nearly to the March 5 draft than to the letter of March 6 (R. 1581-1583).

secret practices behind a walled practice field, from which the public was excluded (Inman—R. 405; Pearce—R. 413). Respondent, as Athletic Director, was a frequent visitor at these practices (Inman—R. 405; Pearce—R. 444; Gregory—R. 628). As an additional safeguard for the secrecy of the plays, the Georgia team was divided into three groups—the ends, the backs and the linemen. Only that portion of each play which pertained to their respective positions was distributed to each group, so that should a player's copy of the plays fall into the wrong hands, it would be useless without the other two sections. Only the quarterbacks had a complete picture (Pearce—R. 414).

Georgia's offense consisted of two basic formations, the "slot right" with the right end split 3 yards from the tackle (Griffith—R. 306-307; Inman—R. 391; Pearce—R. 432), and the "pro set," in which the slot was also to the right, but with the left end split 15 yards (Griffith—R. 306-307; Inman—R. 390; Pearce—R. 434). The Georgia staff considered the width of the slot to be of major importance to the success of the formation and practiced it diligently in order to make sure that the ends lined up exactly the right distance (Pearce—R. 432). Advance knowledge of the distance the Georgia ends would be split would be of tremendous advantage to an opponent (Inman—R. 391-396; Pearce—R. 432). End Mickey Babb denied that the split was a fixed distance, testifying that he varied his split according to field position (R. 741-742).

Georgia's passing attack was built around end Mickey Babb, the team's leading pass receiver, who was to be used as the split end in all of Georgia's offensive formations (Griffith—R. 316), and as quarterback Larry Rakestraw's primary target (Pearce—R. 434). When Georgia neared the goal line, it was usually planned that Babb run a "hook" pass pattern (Griffith—R. 356).

Defensively, Georgia planned to use a "loose-six" defense against Alabama, in which Georgia would drop its ends off and contain with its tackles (Griffith—R. 317). Attempts were being made to correct the tendency of Georgia safety-man Brigham Woodward to commit himself too fast on pass defense (Griffith—R. 311; Pearce—R. 429).

Alabama entered the September 22 game a 14 to 17 point favorite (Pearce—R. 415; Graham—R. 513). Georgia gained probably less than 100 yards offensively, which is bad (Griffith—R. 381), probably completed 11 out of 18 or 19 passes (R. 381-382), and never got closer to the Alabama goal line than the 40-yard line (R. 382). The final score of 35-0 shocked and stunned Coach Griffith (R. 376). He denied that his players had taken "a frightful physical beating" (R. 376).

During the game, according to Griffith, Georgia players came to the sidelines and said to him:

> "They know what we are running; they are even calling out our plays!"
>
> "What are we going to do?" (R. 377)

As already noted, Coach Bryant testified that Alabama was not properly prepared for one formation Georgia used during the game (R. 542-545). This was corroborated by Alabama players Jordan (R. 711) and Sharp (R. 585-586). Bryant also stated that Alabama made no significant changes in its defensive plan between September 13 and the day of the game, September 22 (R. 547). Pell testified to the same effect (R. 595-596), and added that during the period from September 1 to September 22, Alabama did not concentrate on any particular two or three formations (R. 600). Sharp testified that during the game he heard no player on Alabama's team call out such things as "you can't run eighty-eight pop on us" (R. 589).

Charley Trippi, Georgia's assistant coach in charge of offense, who called ninety percent of the plays used by Georgia from the press box (R. 722), said he saw nothing indicating that Alabama knew anything about what Georgia was going to do in the game; the only thing he saw was that Alabama blocked, tackled and ran harder than Georgia did (R. 726).

Respondent also produced three Georgia players who played in the game, Robert Wallace Williamson (R. 733), Mickey Babb (R. 740) and Brigham Everett Woodward (R. 756). Woodward testified that Georgia players in that game did not take a frightful physical beating as stated in the article (R. 758). Williamson testified that there was nothing done or said by the Alabama players during the game which indicated that they knew what Georgia was going to do (R. 734). He also said that the statement in the article that the Georgia players took a frightful physical beating was not true (R. 735). Babb testified that the Georgia players did not take a frightful physical beating (R. 744) and that as a player in the game he did not feel that their moves were being analyzed by the Alabama team (R. 745). He specifically denied having told the Post's source, Furman Bisher, that the Alabama players had taunted them by yelling out "you can't run eighty-eight pop on us," as he was quoted in the article (R. 745).

3. Evidence by Football Coaches and Players on Value of Burnett Notes.

None of the football authorities called as witnesses were examined on the value of the information which Burnett testified he overheard respondent give Bryant. The testimony of all such witnesses was directed to the Burnett notes.

In head coach Johnny Griffith's opinion, the Burnett notes contained meaningful information for an opposing coach about the Georgia team, the most important of which was the two formations Georgia intended to use in the Alabama game (Griffith—R. 307-317). Under cross-examination, he stated that a good number of the notes were inaccurate and didn't apply to anything Georgia had, and that the only two things he saw in the notes that might have been of benefit to an opposing coach were the two formations (R. 386-387). The knowledge that only two specified formations would be used by Georgia would free practice time which would otherwise have been devoted to preparation against other formations Georgia might possibly use (Griffith—R. 317). Georgia assistant coaches, Inman and Pearce, were of the opinion that the information contained in the notes could have been helpful to Alabama (Inman—R. 394-395; Pearce—R. 411-437). Assistant coach Gregory, testifying for respondent, maintained that the notes were either wrong or meaningless (R. 622-632). On cross-examination he admitted signing a letter to the Assistant Attorney General of Georgia, dated March 26, 1963, stating that, ". . . it is my opinion . . . that if such information was given to Coach Bryant before the opening game of the season, it contained vital and important information with respect to the offensive and defensive plays, patterns and formations that could have been of value to the University of Alabama football team, and could have effective [sic] the outcome of the game on September 22, 1962" (R. 634). He testified he signed the letter because he was afraid his job would be jeopardized if he did not (R. 636-638).

Bryant denied that the Burnett notes reflected any information that would have been helpful to him (R. 551-563). While Bryant testified there may have been a couple of things in Burnett's notes that he would rather have known than not known (R. 572), the things he would be interested in about another team would be their game plan —what they planned to do in certain field positions and on specified downs (R. 573-575).

Charles Trippi testified that the notes produced by Burnett were baseless and that the first thing that he would do with the notes would be to tear them up (R. 723-24). He further stated that based upon his experience as a college football player, as well as a professional football player, the outcome of a college football game definitely cannot be pre-arranged, fixed or rigged without the participation of the players, or some of the players, themselves (R. 727). Trippi further testified:

> "I have studied these (Burnett) notes, and I believe I expressed my opinion of these notes when they first were announced; and I still contend there's nothing in here to substantiate anything of value in football planning." (R. 728)

He further stated:

"We give more information to the press every week to promote the game than is being expressed in these notes right here." (R. 727)

Leroy Jordan testified that in his opinion even if an opposing coach knew what formations were going to be employed by the offensive team, such information would be of no value to the coach (R. 713). With reference to the Burnett notes, he stated that there was nothing in them which the University of Alabama specialized in defensively before its game with the University of Georgia (R. 715-16). He further testified that in his opinion as a football player, the outcome of a football game cannot be rigged or fixed without participation of the football players themselves (R. 716). He stated further that in his opinion there is no way that two coaches can rig or fix the outcome of a football game without the players' knowledge (R. 717).

Alabama player Pell testified that in his opinion for Alabama to have known in advance formations and plays which any team such as the University of Georgia was going to use would be of no advantage since they would have needed to know almost a thousand other things before they could have used any such information (R. 601-02). Witness Pell also testified that in his opinion as a football player a football game cannot be rigged or fixed without the individual players knowing about it and without the individual players participating in the rigging and fixing (R. 604).

Also testifying for the respondent was William C. Hartman, Jr., former Assistant Coach of the University of Georgia (R. 973). He testified that in his opinion the information contained in the Burnett notes would not be of any assistance at all to the University of Alabama in preparing for its game with the University of Georgia, that the information concerned nothing more than basic "T" formations, and that the University of Alabama and everyone else had all that information in their own offense. He stated that the University of Alabama must have previously seen at least three or four movies of Georgia games showing the same information (R. 982-983).

4. The Investigation, Preparation and Publication of the Article.

News of the Butts-Bryant affair reached Roger Kahn, sports editor of the Post, in New York on Tuesday, February 10, 1963 (Kahn—R. 950). The information had come from an attorney in Birmingham, Alabama, Roderick Beddow, who was representing petitioner in a libel suit brought there by Bryant against petitioner and Furman Bisher (R. 497-498). Kahn selected Frank Graham, whom he knew to be an experienced sports writer, to go to Atlanta to investigate the matter (Kahn—R. 952). If, in Graham's judgment, there was a story there, he was to proceed (Kahn—R. 952). The Post was interested in getting to the truth of the entire matter (Kahn—R. 957). Graham was to move with all deliberate speed (Kahn—R. 956) to do a complete investigation, without any time limitation (Kahn—R. 957). He was to go to Atlanta and make a thorough investigation to get all available facts (Kahn—R. 952-53), an affidavit from Burnett (Kahn—R. 954), and, if possible, a copy of his notes (Kahn—R. 954). Kahn cautioned Graham to be careful, that this was a big story (Kahn—R. 957).

Graham arrived in Atlanta late on the night of Wednesday, February 20th (Graham—R. 498). On the following morning, he met Beddow and they went to the office of Pierre Howard (Graham—R. 497-499). Shortly after their arrival at Howard's office, the group was joined by Milton Flack. Howard and Flack recounted the story told by Burnett (Graham—R. 499-500). One of the things they thought Burnett had said was that respondent told Bryant that Georgia quarterback Larry Rakestraw tipped off what he was going to do by the way he held his feet (Graham—R. 871-72).[2] They also filled Graham in on the background of the Georgia football situation as they knew it (Graham—R. 500). Howard told Graham that in 1961, respondent had resigned as head coach of the University of Georgia after prominent University alumni had soured on him (Graham—R. 879), and since that time, respondent had been outspokenly bitter about his removal (Graham—R. 879-80).[3] Graham was also told by Flack and Howard that respondent had lost approximately $80,000 in a Florida orange grove speculation (Graham—R. 880-81). He was also told that it was rumored that respondent had entered a hospital in Athens (Graham—R. 906-907). Bisher later informed Graham that the rumor was groundless (Graham—R. 907).

At 7:00 P.M. on the evening of February 21, Burnett, Howard and Flack met Frank Graham at his room in the Heart of Atlanta Motel and Burnett told his story (Burnett—R. 233). After relating what had transpired at the meeting with the officials of the University earlier that day (Graham—R. 506). Burnett told Graham of the call which he had overheard between respondent and Bryant, as it was subsequently reported by Graham in the Post article (Graham—R. 521-27), except that the item about Rakestraw was not given Graham by Burnett (Burnett—R. 241).

On the following morning, Graham again met Burnett at Howard's office (Graham—R. 508). Graham asked

2. Graham learned of the error after publication of the article, when Burnett advised a representative of the Post that he did not recall overhearing this statement (Graham—R. 872).

3. About eighteen months after respondent's resignation as coach, his close friend, Bill Hartman, began to hear reports that respondent was making speeches in which he was openly caustic of the entire Georgia coaching staff (Hartman—R. 990-91; Bradshaw—R. 1087). Respondent's antagonism toward the University increased to such extent that he made critical remarks every time the Athletic Board met (Driftmier—R. 1089-90). Reports of respondent's repeated criticisms of Coach Griffith and his staff also reached President Aderhold (Aderhold—R. 1114).

Howard for a copy of Burnett's notes (Graham—R. 510-11). Howard promised to obtain a copy for him from Cook Barwick, and rush them to Graham by air (Graham—R. 510-11); however, this was never done (Graham—R. 510-11). At Graham's request, an affidavit was prepared and signed by Burnett (Graham—R. 494-508).

Frank Graham spent Saturday morning at the Atlanta Public Library, studying the newspaper reports of events leading up to and following that Georgia-Alabama game on September 22 (Graham—R. 513). George Burnett and Milton Flack drove Graham to the airport and spent about three and a half hours with him (Burnett—R. 236; Graham—R. 515). Before leaving Atlanta, Graham read in the Atlanta Journal that respondent had resigned as Athletic Director (Graham—R. 879).

On Monday, February 25, Roger Kahn, sports editor of the Post, was contacted in New York by Furman Bisher, sports editor of the Atlanta Journal (Kahn—R. 966). Bisher told Kahn that he had a major story involving colossi of southern football (Kahn—R. 966-67). Kahn called Graham (Graham—R. 492) and arranged a meeting with Bisher at his hotel later that evening (Graham—R. 493). Bisher told Graham substantially what Graham had learned in Altanta, much of which was contained in the affidavit which George Burnett had signed for the Post (Graham—R. 494), information which Bisher had apparently learned from Cook Barwick (Graham—R. 494).

Kahn knew Bisher to be a good reporter (Kahn—R. 966). Because he had more entrees to people in Atlanta, it was decided that Bisher would complete the investigation (Graham—R. 494, 517). Bisher was to accumulate every bit of useful information, particularly in talking to University authorities (Graham—R. 912), and forward it to Graham. Kahn suggested that films of the game be reviewed, but believed Bisher said they were unavailable (Kahn—R. 970). Bisher testified he had no recollection of a discussion about viewing of the films at that meeting, but there might have been and he would have said it would have been a very good idea (R. 1025-1026).

On the following Friday, March 1, 1963, Bisher called Graham in New York, stating that he had talked to people at the University and gave Graham quotes from Mickey Babb (Graham—R. 893-94), the trainer, Sam Richwine (Graham—R. 895), and Coach Griffith (Graham—R. 517-18, 894-95; Kahn—R. 972). Babb and Richwine denied at the trial having made the statements attributed to them by Bisher (Babb—R. 745, Richwine—R. 752). Bisher specifically quoted Griffith as having said that "Nobody ever used that name for that play but one man" (Graham—R. 902) and that he didn't move for an hour after reading Burnett's notes (Graham—R. 904). Griffith did not deny these facts. Griffith was also quoted by Bisher as having said "I never had a chance." After publication of the article, Griffith denied having made such a statement (Griffith—R. 372; Kahn—R. 972). According to Graham, Bisher supplied additional background information for the article (Graham—R. 878) and reaffirmed that respondent had been very bitter about his removal as head coach (Graham—R. 878). Bisher denied giving Graham the latter piece of information (R. 1027-1028). Bisher told Graham that records of Southern Bell confirmed the September 13 call (Graham—R. 909). The following week, an advance copy of the story was sent to Furman Bisher, who made no corrections or suggestions (Graham—R. 513).[4]

Frank Graham wrote the article and submitted it to Davis Thomas, managing editor of the Post (Thomas—R. 1021). Because of the nature of the charge made in the article, the Post made sure that great care had been exercised (Thomas—R. 1015) and that every significant source of information had been checked (Thomas—R. 1014, 1021) in advance of publication. In approving the article for publication, Thomas attached great significance to the affidavit executed by Burnett, which supported his belief in the truth of the statements contained in the article (R. 1015). Thomas took into consideration the fact that Burnett had been arrested and convicted of passing bad checks (R. 1016). The Post knew that the University had made a full investigation of Burnett (Graham—R. 911) and that the Burnett notes had been convincing to Griffith and University authorities (Thomas—R. 1024).

4. Furman Bisher was paid $1,000 by the Post for his investigation (Pl. Ex. 10, R. 1379).

The article was then submitted to Clay Blair, Jr., Editor-in-Chief of Curtis Publishing Company, for his approval. The article was approved for publication only after Blair was satisfied that the statements contained in the article had been thoroughly checked as to their truthfulness and accuracy (Blair—R. 945-46).

Blair was interested in changing the "image" of the Post (R. 940); he had said in an interview with Newsweek magazine, in November, 1962, that he intended to "restore the crusading spirit, the sophisticated muckraking, the expose in mass magazines" (R. 943). Although he said that by adding the word "sophisticated" he intended to alter the most common usage of the term "muckrake", the term "sophisticated muckraking" was not clearly defined by him (R. 940-944). On January 15, 1963, he had circulated a congratulatory memorandum to his staff which stated (facetiously, according to his testimony) (R. 939) that "the final yardstick" of this policy was that "we have about six lawsuits pending, meaning that we are hitting them where it hurts, with solid, meaningful journalism" (P. 6, 1376, R. 946-47). The number of lawsuits stated was inaccurate (R. 947). He also described the issue containing the article here involved as "a step in the right direction", adding that with this issue "we have gone twenty-five percent toward the goal of the magazine that I envision" (R. 940). Both he and Davis Thomas knew that when the editorial accompanying the article stated, "But careers will be ruined, that is sure," it was applicable to respondent (Blair—R. 945, Thomas—R. 1014).

Prior to publication of the article, Curtis' advertising revenues had been falling drastically (R. 935-936). Blair was not asked if this was the reason for the editorial policy he adopted.

Under date of March 11, 1963, seven days before the publication date of March 18, respondent's counsel sent a telegram and a letter to petitioner stating without specification, that the proposed content of the article was false (R. 22-23, 1023). Sometime during the week prior to publication, respondent's daughter called Blair and, without claiming the article to be false, requested him not to publish it (R. 947-949).

Following the publication of the article, a demand for a retraction was made by the plaintiff and ignored by the Post (R. 22-23, 26-27).

JOHN F. DAVIS, CLERK

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM 1966

No. 150

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,
Petitioner,

—against—

EDWIN A. WALKER,
Respondent.

SUPPLEMENT TO PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

WILLIAM P. ROGERS
LEO P. LARKIN, JR.
STANLEY GODOFSKY
200 Park Avenue
New York, New York 10017

ARTHUR MOYNIHAN
50 Rockefeller Plaza
New York, New York

J. A. GOOCH
SLOAN B. BLAIR
1800 First National Building
Fort Worth, Texas
Attorneys for Petitioner
The Associated Press

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM 1966

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,
Petitioner,
—against—
EDWIN A. WALKER,
Respondent.

No. 150

SUPPLEMENT TO PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

The Petition herein was filed on May 18, 1966. Thereafter, on August 15, 1966, the Supreme Court of Colorado, in still another of Respondent's libel actions against Petitioner, held squarely that the doctrine of New York Times v. Sullivan is applicable to Respondent, General Walker, upon the very facts involved in the present case. Walker v. Associated Press, Colo. , P. 2d . In its unanimous opinion (with one Justice not sitting), the Colorado court said:

> "The problem is whether the rule announced in the New York Times Company case, where a public official was involved, applies with equal force to a public figure who has voluntarily thrust himself into the vortex of the public discussion of an issue which is of pressing public interest and concern. Plaintiff in the instant case is not a public official, but he admittedly is a public personage who did voluntarily go from his home in Texas to Mississippi at the time when James Meredith, a colored person, was being enrolled in the University of Mississippi, and under such circumstances he most certainly did thrust himself into the vortex of the discussion of a matter of great public concern.

"We now hold that the rule of New York Times Company v. Sullivan, supra, applies to the instant controversy to the end that even though the news release be libelous per se, plaintiff still cannot recover unless he is able to show actual malice, as defined in the New York Times Company case, on the part of Associated Press."

Since the decision of the Supreme Court of Colorado is not yet reported, the full text of the opinion is annexed hereto as Appendix 1. The new Walker decision is in direct conflict with the rulings of the courts below in the instant case, and thus constitutes an additional reason for the granting of the writ.

Respectfully submitted,

WILLIAM P. ROGERS
LEO P. LARKIN, JR.
STANLEY GODOFSKY
200 Park Avenue
New York, New York 10017

ARTHUR MOYNIHAN
50 Rockefeller Plaza
New York, New York

J. A. GOOCH
SLOAN B. BLAIR
1800 First National Building
Fort Worth, Texas

Attorneys for Petitioner
The Associated Press

APPENDIX 1

No. 21732

EDWIN A. WALKER,
Plaintiff in Error,

v.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,
Defendant in Error.

ERROR TO THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF DENVER

HON. SAUL PINCHICK, Judge

EN BANC

JUDGMENT AFFIRMED IN PART AND REVERSED IN PART.

EARL J. HOWER,
CLYDE J. WATTS,
Attorneys for Plaintiff in Error.

WINNER, BERGE, MARTIN & CAMFIELD,
Attorneys for Defendant in Error.

MR. JUSTICE MCWILLIAMS DELIVERED THE OPINION OF THE COURT.

Edwin A. Walker, hereinafter referred to as the plaintiff, brought a libel action against the Associated Press, a New York corporation, and The Denver Post, Inc., a Colorado corporation. In this writ of error we are concerned only with plaintiff's three claims for relief against the one defendant, Associated Press.

After permitting the plaintiff to amend his complaint on several occasions, the trial court eventually granted a motion to dismiss filed by the Associated Press, and judgment of dismissal followed. It is this judgment of dismissal which the plaintiff now seeks to have reversed.

In order to better understand this matter it becomes necessary to analyze with some degree of particularity the several complaints, and amendments thereto, filed by the plaintiff. This action was commenced by the plaintiff on September 30, 1963 with the filing of a complaint. In his original complaint the plaintiff claimed to have been libeled in the following publications: (1) an editorial appearing in The Denver Post on October 1, 1962; (2) a news article appearing in The Denver Post on October 2, 1962; and (3) an Associated Press news release of October 3, 1962, which was forwarded by the Associated Press to the Denver Post.

Our examination of the original complaint leads us to conclude that by the words used in this complaint plaintiff intended to charge, and did charge, the Associated Press with only one allegedly libelous publication, i.e., its news release of October 3, 1962, and that it was The Denver Post which was said to have libeled plaintiff in its editorial of October 1, 1962 and in its news article of October 2, 1962. Be that as it may, in our view on November 14, 1963 plaintiff cleared up any possible doubt on this particular matter by quite definitely charging Associated Press with only one libelous publication, namely its news release of October 3, 1962.

Thereafter, on February 17, 1964, the trial court granted the motion to dismiss filed by Associated Press, and the plaintiff was granted time within which to file a second complaint. This the plaintiff did on March 11, 1964, in what he chose to denominate as an "Amended Complaint." This amended complaint contained what plaintiff labeled as counts one, two and three. Count one related to The Denver Post editorial of October 1, 1962, but in this pleading both The Denver Post and the Associated Press were charged with this particular publication.

Count two of the amended complaint related to The Denver Post news article of October 2, 1962, and again in this amended complaint both the Associated Press and The Denver Post were charged with this publication.

Count three of the amended complaint was directed solely against the Associated Press, and it concerned the press release of October 3, 1962.

To this amended complaint Associated Press again filed a motion to dismiss alleging, as to counts one and two, that "such alleged claims . . . did not accrue within one year prior to the filing of the amended complaint."

The trial court agreed with this contention of Associated Press, and dismissed these particular counts on the ground that they were barred by the one year statute of limitation. C. R. S. 1963, 87-1-2. In our handling of this writ of error we shall first concern ourselves with the propriety of this particular ruling, laying aside for a moment a consideration of the third count in the amended complaint.

Counsel apparently agree that if counts one and two represent "new" claims against Associated Press, then each is barred by the applicable statute of limitation. Plaintiff argues, however, that counts one and two are not really new claims, but on the contrary relate back to the original complaint. Being, then, merely an enlargement upon the averments in the original complaint, plaintiff urges that counts one and two are therefore not barred by the one year statute of limitation. See Platte Valley Motor Co. v. Wagner, 130 Colo. 365, 278 P. 2d 870; Smith v. La Forge, 170 Kans. 677, 228 P. 2d 509; and Doyle v. Okla. Press Pub. Co., 206 Okla. 254, 242 P. 2d 155.

Associated Press argues, to the contrary, that counts one and two represent new claims as to it, even though not to The Denver Post. In other words, it is pointed out that the Associated Press, as opposed to The Denver Post, was never charged with the publication of The Denver Post editorial of October 1, 1962 or The Denver Post news article of October 2, 1962 until March 11, 1964, the date when the amended complaint was filed.

In the original complaint it would appear that The Denver Post was charged with two libelous publications, i.e., its editorial of October 1, 1962 and its news article of October 2, 1962, and that the Associated Press was charged with only one libelous publication, i.e., its news release of October 3, 1962, which it is observed occurred subsequent to the dates of the allegedly libelous publications of The Denver Post.

If, however, there be doubt as to which defendant was charged with libelous publication, the matter in our mind was, as already mentioned, fully cleared up by the plaintiff himself when he filed his Amendment to Complaint on November 14, 1963. In that pleading it is quite evident that Associated Press is charged with only one libelous publication, namely its press release of October 3, 1962. Hence, when plaintiff in his Amended Complaint of March 11, 1964 avers that the Associated Press also published the allegedly libelous editorial and news article appearing in The Denver Post, he truly is setting forth "new" claims, "new" at least as to the one defendant, the Associated Press.

These three separate publications, of course, constitute separate and distinct claims. See Hartmann v. Time, Inc., 60 N. Y. S. 2d 209. Accordingly, we conclude that counts one and two in the amended complaint constitute "new" claims against the Associated Press, and not having been asserted against Associated Press within one year after the cause of action accrued, are now barred by the provision of C. R. S. 1963, 87-1-2. See Evans v. The Republican Publishing Company, 20 Colo. App. 281, 78 Pac. 311 and Spears Free Clinic v. Maier, 128 Colo. 263, 261 P. 2d 489.

We shall now proceed to a consideration of count three in the amended complaint. In all of his various pleadings the plaintiff alleged only general—as opposed to special—damages. And this was so even though he was given more than adequate opportunity by the trial court to amend his several complaints in this regard. However, he chose not to so do, and the trial court eventually dismissed count three of the amended complaint for this failure on the part of plaintiff to allege special damages. The reasoning of the trial court was that the allegedly libelous press release was only libelous per quod, and that in such event the plaintiff had to allege special damages, and the mere allegation of general damages was legally insufficient.

Plaintiff admits that he only alleged general damages, but contends that such is sufficient because, contrary to the determination made by the trial court, the news release—he claims—was libelous per se. So, this particular problem narrows down to a determination as to whether the press release of Associated Press under the date of October 3, 1962 is libelous per se, or per quod.

Plaintiff's overall position in this regard is that the Associated Press release of October 3, 1962 falsely charges him with the commission of a crime, namely a violation of 18 U. S. C. A. 111, which provides that he who "assaults, resists, opposes, intimidates or interferes" with, among other persons, a United States Marshal while engaging in the performance of his official duties shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than three years, or both.

Plaintiff and Associated Press agree that if the latter in its press release of October 3, 1962 falsely charged the plaintiff with the commission of a crime, then the publication is libelous per se. See Cinquanta v. Burdett, 154 Colo. 37, 388 P. 2d 779, 1 A. L. R. 3rd 840 and O'Cana v. Espinosa, 141 Colo. 371, 347 P. 2d 1118. Associated Press contends, however, that its press release of October 3, 1962 does not charge plaintiff with having committed a crime, and that it is only by innuendo that such could ever be "read into" this particular release.

Our study of this news release of October 3, 1962 leads us to the conclusion that this particular publication is libelous per se in that it does charge the plaintiff with the commission of a crime. At the very least this news release charges plaintiff with taking the "command" of a theretofore unorganized mob which was resisting and interfering with United States Marshals who were about their official business by "charging" them, by hurling "bricks, bottles, rocks and wooden stakes toward the clustered marshals." One can, of course, be charged with the commission of a crime even though it is not done in the exact language of the statute. From our reading of the news release plaintiff was clearly charged with resisting and interfering with U. S. Marshals who were about their official business, and was also charged with aiding and abetting others who were similarly engaged in various acts constituting resistance and interference. If the language used in this press release doesn't equate to "resistance" and "interference", then it would be difficult to know what would. Hence, we hold the press release in question as libelous per se.

The Associated Press goes on to argue that even though its press release be deemed libelous per se, count three of the amended complaint is still subject to a motion to dismiss on the basis of New York Times Company v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 84 S. Ct. 710, 11 L. Ed. 2d 686, 95 A. L. R. 2d 1412. In our view of this matter the rule laid down in the New York Times case does have application to the instant controversy, but, as will be developed, such does not justify an outright dismissal of count three of the amended complaint on a motion to dismiss.

In the New York Times Company case the Supreme Court of the United States rather severely limited the right of public officials to recover for libelous newspaper articles by holding that the constitutional safeguards regarding freedom of speech and press require that a public official in a libel action against a critic of his official conduct must show actual malice on the part of such critic before the public official can make any recovery, and that such is true even though the statements are libelous per se.

The problem is whether the rule announced in the New York Times Company case, where a public official was involved, applies with equal force to a public figure who has voluntarily thrust himself into the vortex of the public discussion of an issue which is of pressing public interest and concern. Plaintiff in the instant case is not a public official, but he admittedly is a public personage who did voluntarily go from his home in Texas to Mississippi at the time when James Meredith, a colored person, was being enrolled in the University of Mississippi, and under such circumstances he most certainly did thrust himself into the vortex of the discussion of a matter of great public concern.

We now hold that the rule of New York Times Company v. Sullivan, supra, applies to the instant controversy to the end that even though the news release be libelous per se, plaintiff still cannot recover unless he is able to show actual malice, as defined in the New York Times Company case, on the part of Associated Press.

We recognize that there is authority from other jurisdictions which looks away from such a holding. See, e.g., Fignole v. The Curtis Publishing Company, 247 F. Supp. 595. But in our considered view the rationale of New York Times Company v. Sullivan, supra, clearly suggests that the rule announced therein should apply to one in the position of this plaintiff. And there is authority from other jurisdictions which supports our conclusion in this regard. Accordingly, we subscribe to the reasoning found, for example, in Walker v. Courrier-Journal & Louisville Times Co., 246 F. Supp. 231. See, also, Pauling v. National Review, Inc., 269 N. Y. S. 2d 11; Pauling v. News Syndicate Company, Inc., 335 F. 2d 659 and Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U. S. 75, 86 S. Ct. 669, 15 L. Ed. 2d 597.

Even though the rule of New York Times Company v. Sullivan, supra, does have applicability to the instant matter, such determination does not justify a dismissal of count three of the amended complaint on a motion to dismiss. Plaintiff in count three of his amended complaint alleges that the Associated Press published its press release of October 3, 1962 with actual malice, and his pleading in this regard is, therefore, sufficient to bring him even within the narrow rule announced in New York Times Company v. Sullivan, supra.

Associated Press finally argues that plaintiff has made a judicial admission that the Associated Press acted without actual malice by amending his pleading so as to incorporate by reference plaintiff's libel action brought in Texas against the Associated Press, which action was apparently based on the same press release of October 3, 1962. See Associated Press v. Walker, Tex. App. , 393 S. W. 2d 671. Without belaboring this point, we are of the view that the position of Associated Press in this regard is not well-taken and that this matter cannot be injected in this manner into the instant proceeding.

The judgments of dismissal as to counts one and two of the amended complaint are affirmed. The judgment of dismissal as to count three of the amended complaint is reversed and the cause is remanded with directions that further proceedings in connection therewith be consonant with the views herein expressed.

Mr. Chief Justice Sutton not participating.

LIBRARY

Office-Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
SEP 8 1966
JOHN F. DAVIS, CLERK

In the

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

OCTOBER TERM 1966

No. 150

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,
Petitioner,

VERSUS

EDWIN A. WALKER,
Respondent.

REPLY TO SUPPLEMENT TO PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

WILLIAM ANDRESS, JR.
627 Fidelity Union Life Building
Dallas, Texas

CLYDE J. WATTS
219 Couch Drive
Oklahoma City, Oklahoma

Attorneys for Respondent,
Edwin A. Walker

September, 1966

UTTERBACK TYPESETTING CO., 13 SO. WALKER, OKLAHOMA CITY, PH. CE 5-0030

INDEX

	PAGE
Statement	1
Argument	3
Proposition I: As an "eye-witness" report, the Savell story was either true or knowingly false	3
Proposition II: Under standards of accuracy and integrity reasonably applicable to Associated Press, the false report of Walker assuming command of a mob and leading a charge against U. S. Marshals, a crime against the Government of the United States, was published in reckless disregard for the truth	5
Conclusion	13
Certificate of Service	15

AUTHORITIES

CASES:

Associated Press v. Taft-Ingalls Corp. (6 Cir. 1965), 340 F.2d 753	13
Garrison v. State of Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64, 13 L.Ed.2d 125	4
New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 84 S.Ct. 710, 11 L.Ed.2d 686, 95 A.L.R.2d 1412	1, 3
Miranda v. State of Arizona (U.S. Sup. 6/13/66), 86 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1602	11
Walker v. Associated Press (Tex. Ct. of Civ. App., 1965), 393 S.W.2d 671	5-8

In the

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM 1966

No. 150

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,
Petitioner,

VERSUS

EDWIN A. WALKER,
Respondent.

REPLY TO SUPPLEMENT TO PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

May It Please the Court:

By Supplemental Brief, the Associated Press has presented to this Honorable Court a recent (15 Aug. 1966) decision by the Supreme Court of Colorado in Walker v. The Associated Press, wherein the Court squarely held that the Rule of New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 84 S.Ct. 710, 11 L.Ed.2d 686, 95 A.L.R.2d 1412, applies to this epic battle between Walker and The Associated Press, "to the end that even though the news release be libelous per se, plaintiff still cannot recover unless he is able to show actual malice,"[1] as therein defined.

---

[1] From page 7: "We now hold that the Rule of New York Times Company v. Sullivan, supra, applies to the instant controversy to the end that even though the news release be libelous per se, plaintiff still cannot recover unless he is able to show actual malice, as defined in the New York Times Company case, on the part of Associated Press."

We appreciate this opportunity to bring into actual focus the Sullivan Rule, if applied to General Walker as a "public figure."

The Rule of Sullivan is precise and simple: The First Amendment to the Constitution protects the Press from libel, unless a defamatory statement is published with ACTUAL MALICE which is defined as:

> "1) KNOWINGLY FALSE, or 2) IN RECKLESS DISREGARD FOR THE TRUTH."

Under this Rule, malice is established, simply and conclusively, by the language of Associated Press in its news report:

> "Walker assumed command of the crowd, which I estimated at 1,000 * * *."
>
> "Two men took Walker by the arms and they headed for the Lyceum and the Federal Marshals. Throughout this time, I was less than six feet from Walker."

The jury found that this report, charging plaintiff with a felony, was false; and, implicit in its verdict, is the finding that it was knowingly false and published in reckless disregard for the truth.[2]

With the Savell report having been issued and sold under an "Editor's Note," "Here is the story of Van Savell, 21, Associated Press newsman, who was on the scene and saw what happened," and with the author of the report

---

[2] See Answer to Special Issues (Respondent's Brief, Apx. A, wherein jury held that the Savell report that Walker led a charge: a) was not substantially true, b) was not fair comment, c) was not made in good faith.

claiming to have seen, from a distance of six feet, a criminal act on the part of Walker, which the jury found that Walker did not commit, the report cannot be less than KNOWINGLY FALSE.

In addition, such falsity on the part of the greatest news media on earth, when measured by necessary standards of accuracy and integrity, as contrasted with the loose and heedless actions by which plaintiff was branded as a criminal and a lunatic, amount to RECKLESS DISREGARD FOR THE TRUTH, and not "reportorial negligence" which could be argued as being within the protection of Sullivan.

The Associated Press reported to the world that plaintiff, a former Major General in the United States Army, had "ASSUMED COMMAND" of a mob and led a charge against United States Marshals. The jury found that the report was false. It is respectfully submitted that a fair evaluation of the evidence in this case will reflect that the report was "knowingly false" and "in reckless disregard for the truth."

Proposition I

As an "eye-witness" report, the Savell story was either true or knowingly false.

Before New York Times v. Sullivan, a false charge of a crime was libelous per se; and the only defense was TRUTH. The "Sullivan Rule" has changed the law, however, and has extended to the Press the awesome privilege of defamation, limited only by the element of MALICE. Even the concept of malice has been changed from actual ill-will, which is almost impossible to prove, to a simple standard of "knowingly false" or "reckless disregard of the truth." As stated in Garrison v. State of Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64, 13 L.Ed.2d 125:

> "Hence the knowingly false statement and the false statement made with reckless disregard of the truth, do not enjoy constitutional protection."

In the instant case, Associated Press elected to publish an eye-witness report by its newsman that he had seen Walker committing a crime, thus breaking a highly sensational and saleable news report well in advance of Walker's actual arrest, which could have been published with absolute immunity . . . if and when Walker had been charged with a crime and arrested. The possibility remains that he may never have been charged and arrested, had not Associated Press issued its false report.

The jury has specifically found, upon ample evidence, that Savell did not see Walker commit the crime with which he was charged. Having accepted and reported to the world that their newsman was an eye-witness, the Associated Press is in no position to side-step responsibility for his false reporting, and the jury's determination of such falsity, by claiming that it was not knowingly false.

It is respectfully submitted that the jury's finding of falsity of the Associated Press report that Plaintiff had been seen by its newsman committing a crime would preclude the defendant from contending that the report was not knowingly false.

Proposition II

Under standards of accuracy and integrity reasonably applicable to Associated Press, the false report of Walker assuming command of a mob and leading a charge against U. S. Marshals, a crime against the Government of the United States, was published in reckless disregard for the truth.

Neither Sullivan nor subsequent decisions from either the United States Supreme Court, or other Federal Courts, have established guide lines for determination of "reckless disregard for the truth." Obviously a question of fact, it would appear that a jury in determining whether a false publication resulted from simple negligence, or reckless disregard for the truth, must consider two basic elements: 1) The nature of the duty owed by the author, to the public and to the victim of the false report, and 2) How the duty was, in fact, performed . . . i.e., how and why a false report was published.

This issue has previously been litigated in the Texas Courts between the parties to this action; and, in support of our concept of the nature of the profound and vital duty owed by Associated Press to the public, as well as to an individual who may have become the subject of one of its news reports, we quote from Appellee's Brief in Walker v. Associated Press (Tex. Ct. of Civ. App., 1965), 393 S.W.2d 671, as follows:

(p. 1) " 'ONCE AGAIN, CONFLICTING IDEOLOGIES ARE LOCKED IN DESPERATE RIVALRY FOR THE KEY TO HUMAN DESTINY.'

"Thus, Mr. Gil Robb Wilson, Editor of FLYING Magazine challenges his fellow Americans to the stark reality of the current global stuggle. The issues at stake involve the survival of Freedom as we know it.

"Comparison of the Objectives, the Strategies and the Tactics of the two ideologies may reveal that the 'KEY' is . . . INTEGRITY . . . of which the basic element is TRUTH.

"Vital decisions under one ideology are made by ruthless rulers, who use propaganda, with its components of deceit, fabrication and falsehood for human motivation. Its concepts of Justice are shaped solely for enhancement of the power of the ruling oligarchy . . . never by the rights of the individual.

"The other ideology preserves both Freedom and Justice upon a broad base of individual knowledge and is devoted to a concept of Equal Justice Under the Law. The indispensable element of true knowledge is timely and accurate information, for which the American citizen is completely dependent upon a highly organized system of gathering and disseminating news.

"Against this background, the issues now before this Honorable Court transcend the interest, of the respective parties, and involve principles vital to the survival of our form of Government.

"In the jet-propelled and supercharged orbit of modern civilization, and particularly with electronic communication facilities which can encircle the world at fantastic speed, words have become the most lethal weapons known to man.

"They can start and stop wars, create or destroy illusions, depict or deny reality, imprison or release a citizen and launch or finish a career.

"By a fabulous network of communications, the Associated Press has acquired an ultimate capability in word usage . . . for the shaping of thoughts and knowledge of the people of America, and perhaps the whole world.

"Such power implies an equivalent duty with commensurate standards of accuracy and integrity. Upon faithful performance of this duty, Freedom depends.

"In the instant case, the unsupported and unverified report of an inexperienced 21 year old reporter has created of the Appellee, Walker, a false public image as a lunatic and insurrectionist. Upon Savell's report that Walker had assumed command of a crowd of rioters and led a charge against U. S. Marshals, Walker was arrested, and, without notice, counsel or hearing, and, upon affidavit of a psychiatrist who had never seen him, he was committed to a Government mental prison.

"The accuracy, the integrity and the motivation of the Associated Press in publishing this report has been weighed in the balance of jury trial, and, by unanimous verdict, has been found wanting. Appellant seeks to overturn this verdict by an appellate review of the evidence and a claim of privilege.

* * * * * *

"The soundness and logic of the above rule of the Texas Courts is forcefully illustrated by the facts in the instant case, and the wrong suffered by Walker in terms of false imprisonment and being branded as a lunatic and insurrectionist, as the result of the false charge that he had assumed command of a riotous group of students and others, and had led a charge against U. S. Marshals, who represented the authority of the Government.

"There is no amount of comment or criticism that would have caused his imprisonment. Even if the Associated Press had owed to its subscribers a duty of commenting upon Walker's activities, which the Associated Press has repeatedly pointed out is beyond the type of service which it provided, it would only have criticized his statements and activities. Such criticism or comment, even though caustic and derogatory, could come within the protection of privilege. But, when the statement is one of fact, and particularly of such serious nature as to impute a crime, the author of the statements must, under the law, be prepared to prove the truth of the statement.

"Publication of false facts can produce prosecution!

"Publication of comment, whether true or false, cannot!"

When measured by the awesome responsibility concurrent with its vast power, the performance of Associated Press in publishing this false report concerning plaintiff requires the conclusion that it was more than "reportorial negligence," and was published "in reckless disregard for the truth." Facts which establish the conduct of Associated Press as reckless disregard for the truth, rather than reportorial negligence, include the following:

1) The report was FALSE, as found by the jury.

2) Appellant relied solely upon the unsupported telephone report of an inexperienced 21-year-old cub reporter, completely unsupported by any other informant or evidence.

3) Associated Press should have been on notice of the falsity of Savell's story, when he first reported to A-P newsman, B. R. Thomas at New Orleans, that Walker had made an inflammatory speech from a Confederate Monument, and then led a charge against U. S. Marshals. Further verification should have been required when Savell later reported that Walker first entered the campus, assumed command of the crowd, led a charge of 1,000 people, and then fell back to the Monument and made his speech.

4) For many days after the incident, Associated Press continued to issue republications and repetitions of the original false report, without any effort toward further investigation or verification of Savell's story. A typical example appears from the deposition of "ace" AP newsman, Relman Morin, who admitted that Savell was "the only one I can specifically remember," who had reported seeing Walker lead a charge.

5) A most flagrant example of slanting of the news concerning Walker is reflected by the testimony of AP Newsman, Louis Milliner, who admitted that he had reported to his New Orleans news room that a Government psychiatrist, Guttmacher, had testified that he found evidence of mental deterioration on the part of Walker, and also reported to the same news room that the court-appointed psychiatrist, Stubblefield, had found that Walker was "functioning at the superior level of intelligence." Associated Press published the report of Walker's mental deterioration on its "A" Wire, with circulation around the world. The Stubblefield report of superior intelligence was put on the "B" Wire, with restricted local coverage.

The record is replete with evidence refuting the contention of defendant, as allegedly supported by its witnesses, that Walker actually led a charge.

Defendant rests its whole contention that Savell and Associated Press were guilty only of "reportorial negligence" rather than reckless disregard for the truth, upon testimony of its own witnesses. A review of the defendant's evidence will reveal shocking conflict in the testimony of defense witnesses, for example, Rev. Duncan Gray refuted the testimony of witnesses, Gregory and Savell, that Walker led a charge before his speech from the monument. The conflict between testimony of various witnesses for defendants, and the implausible stories of others leaves the impact of their testimony almost as unbelievable as the fabricated Savell story published by AP. The quality of their testimony, singly and collectively, is not such as would convince a jury that Savell even thought he saw what he reported. In fact, it is probable that the lack of candor and consistency in their testimony, together with absence of Savell from the courtroom, caused the jury to lose confidence in the entire defense of Associated Press.

In furtherance of Principles of Justice, the disparity in power between Associated Press and a private citizen should be weighed and considered in determining "reckless disregard for the truth." Once an individual is falsely reported to have committed a criminal act, or to be of deficient mentality, he is powerless to correct the false image, regardless of his innocence or sanity. His reputation and public image are completely at the mercy of the news media, and he can look only to the law for reasonable protection and vindication of his record.

With reputation more precious than wealth, and the citizen in no postion to debate with a newspaper, and certainly not Associated Press, a realistic protection against defamation is a critical necessity under the Sullivan Rule. Such protection must recognize the helplessness of the victim.

Recent decisions of this Honorable Court have well protected against official "overbearing" the rights of one accused of a crime. As illustrated in Miranda v. State of Arizona (U.S. Sup. 6/13/66), 86 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1602:

From page 1611:

> "* * * basic rights that are enshrined in our Constitution—that 'No person * * * shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself,' and that 'the accused shall * * * have the Assistance of Counsel'—rights which were put in jeopardy in that case through official overbearing. These precious rights were fixed in our Constitution only after centuries of persecution and struggle. And in the words of Chief Justice Marshall, they were secured 'for ages to come * * * designed to approach immortality as nearly as human institutions can approach it.'"

Rights of a citizen must be protected from those holding superior power.

If the conduct of the Associated Press in the instant case is condoned as simply a negligent misstatement, rather than reckless disregard for the truth, the right of a citizen to secure vindication for defamation as a question of fact for injury will be destroyed as a matter of law.

Equal weight and consideration should be given to the Duty and Responsibility of the Press, as well as to Freedom of the Press. Without a legal duty and responsibility, clearly defined and recognized, Freedom of the Press can degenerate into oppression. The privilege of the Press can sink into license . . . to smear . . . to create false images . . . to slant news . . . to propagandize. Once this cycle is started, we can expect competition between different wire services, between different newspapers and between different types of news media, for the most senational and saleable items of news. In such competition, the one least restrained by concepts of accuracy, integrity and responsibility would have a substantial competitive advantage over the other. The dividing line between fact and fiction in the news will become more obscure. The news media will become more and more inclined to make the news, rather than to report the news. Public confidence in all of them will deteriorate in a manner most unfortunate for public welfare.

It would create a most dangerous precedent for the Court to hold in this case, as a matter of law, and contrary to the verdict of the jury, that the Associated Press report was not published in reckless disregard for the truth. It seems inconceivable that an expert and highly organized news gathering agency could fail to observe a "red flag" when telephone reports from a cub reporter contain hopeless and irreconcilable conflict as to time and place while relating the occurrence of an event so sensational as leading the charge of a mob against U. S. Marshals by a former Major General in the U. S. Army. Further investigation must have disclosed the facts, as related by defendant's witness, Rev. Duncan Gray, that there was no generalized charge of any kind before Walker's speech on the monument, and that a 1,000-man charge, such as described by Savell would literally have run over the Rev. Duncan Gray, and many other witnesses offered by the appellant. Such a charge did not happen, and the slightest investigation by Associated Press after the original discrepancy appeared between the report of Savell to Thomas and the subsequent reports by Savell would have revealed that the charge described so dramatically and so extensively by Savell in his eye-witness report was a figment of his imagination. It would not be unreasonable for a jury to consider such action upon the part of Associated Press as reckless disregard for the truth, when the falsity of this report had been proved under the circumstances involved in this case.

It is respectfully submitted that the verdict of the jury in this case is supported by evidence of reckless disregard for the truth, as well as publication of a false report with knowledge of its falsity.

CONCLUSION

The Associated Press has expanded and been organized to the point where it has almost a monopoly upon nationwide and worldwide news gathering facilities for informing the people of this country as to current developments in the news. [Associated Press v. Taft-Ingalls Corp. (6 Cir. 1965), 340 F.2d 753, 766.] Upon the accuracy and integrity of this constant flow of information depends the current knowledge of the people and their confidence in their security, their social and business affairs and their Government.

Like "Caesar's Wife" these news media must be above suspicion, or even question; and it will eventually become a disservice even to Associated Press if it were relieved of legal responsibilities for a false news report that accuses a citizen of a crime and causes his imprisonment. Unless the Associated Press is able, willing and required to lay on the line its financial responsibility as a guarantee of accuracy and integrity of reporting such news, "news slanting" and "image making" will become even more rampant than they are today; and the reputation of all whose names may be projected into the news as "public figures" will depend solely upon the whim of newsmen, even down to "cub reporters," under a law which recognizes that they can do no wrong.

The present greatness of our country has evolved, to a large extent, from the "pendulum action" of the public opinion of its citizens. With information available to them, accurately, adequately, timely and honestly, the swinging of the pendulum, from left to right and right to left assumes a gyroscopic effect upon the thought processes of the people, and particularly upon their ability to govern themselves. It is, therefore, of vital importance that the pendulum swing freely, and that information and knowledge be gathered and disseminated with the utmost care, concern and integrity.

The slanting of news, for any purpose, or without purpose, can only warp public opinion and freeze the free-swinging of the pendulum.

For many years, the rule has universally been recognized that false accusation of a crime is libelous per se. Under Sullivan, it is libelous only where malicious (knowingly false or in reckless disregard for the truth).

As recognized by the jury in this case, the facts present a flagrant example of false reporting by Associated Press.

It is respectfully submitted that the jury's verdict is supported by the evidence, both as to knowledge of falsity and reckless disregard for the truth on the part of Associated Press, and should not be disturbed by certiorari from this Honorable Court.

Respectfully submitted,

WILLIAM ANDRESS, JR.
627 Fidelity Union Life Building
Dallas, Texas

CLYDE J. WATTS
219 Couch Drive
Oklahoma City, Oklahoma

Attorneys for Respondent,
Edwin A. Walker

September, 1966

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE

I certify that a copy of the foregoing reply was served by depositing a copy of the same in a United States mail box with air mail postage prepaid addressed to William P. Rogers, Leo P. Larkin, Jr., and Stanley Godofsky 200 Park Avenue, New York, New York 10017, and to Arthur Moynihan, 50 Rockefeller Plaza, New York, New York 10020; and with first class postage prepaid addressed to J. A. Gooch and Sloan B. Blair, 1800 First National Building, Fort Worth, Texas 76102, Counsel of record for Petitioner on September 7, 1966.

Counsel for Respondent

LIBRARY
SUPREME COURT, U. S.
SEP 20 1966
JOHN F. DAVIS, CLERK

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1966

No. 37

CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,
Petitioner,

versus

WALLACE BUTTS,
Respondent.

RESPONSE TO PETITIONER'S SUPPLEMENTAL STATEMENT AND ADDITIONAL REASON WHY CERTIORARI SHOULD BE DENIED

William H. Schroder
Allen E. Lockerman
Robert S. Sams
Tench C. Coxe
Milton A. Carlton, Jr.
Gerald P. Thurmond
Attorneys for Respondent, Wallace Butts

Troutman, Sams, Schroder & Lockerman
1600 William-Oliver Building
Atlanta, Georgia 30303

INDEX

Page

I. Response to Petitioner's Supplemental Statement 1

II. Johnson v. New Jersey 3

CONCLUSION 6

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE 7

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

All cases and authorities cited herein were referred to in the tables of the Initial Response or the Further Response, with the following exceptions:

Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964) 3

Johnson v. New Jersey, 384 U.S. 719 (1966) 1, 3

Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966) 3

Young Mens Christian Ass'n v. Bailey, 112 Ga. App. 684, 711, 146 S.E.2d 324, 343 (1965) 2

Bryant, Black Days After A Black Charge, Sports Illustrated, September 5, 1966 6

IN THE
SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 37

CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,
Petitioner,

versus

WALLACE BUTTS,
Respondent.

RESPONSE TO PETITIONER'S SUPPLEMENTAL STATEMENT AND ADDITIONAL REASON WHY CERTIORARI SHOULD BE DENIED

At the time the Court requested petitioner to file a supplemental statement discussing its contentions in light of Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75 (1966), respondent was preparing to file a supplemental response in light of Johnson v. New Jersey, 384 U.S. 719, decided June 20, 1966. Respondent decided to await the filing of petitioner's supplemental statement. This has now been filed.

I.

Response To Petitioner's Supplemental Statement

In its Supplemental Statement, petitioner contends that actual malice "is both legally immaterial and wholly unsupported by the record" and attaches thereto an appendix purporting to be a "summary of evidence." First, respondent does not agree that it is legally immaterial that actual malice was conclusively proven and, second, respondent points out that petitioner's so-called summary of evidence is replete with inaccuracies and argument and omits undisputed evidence showing conclusively that actual malice was proved as found by the trial judge and concurred in by the Court of Appeals. We respectfully call the Court's attention to the fourteen undisputed instances of malice as set out at pages 26 through 31 of respondent's initial Response, the statement of the trial court showing actual malice as quoted on page 31 of the Response, and the Court of Appeals' affirmance thereof as quoted at the top of page 32 of the Response. Most of these fourteen points were conspicuously omitted from petitioner's purported summary of evidence.

Respondent cannot agree that the overwhelming proof of actual malice is legally immaterial as claimed by petitioner. It is strange indeed that, having applied for the writ on the basis of the constitutional requisites of factual proof enunciated in New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), petitioner now seeks to exclude from consideration the answer to the question its contention raises. Whether or not actual malice was proven is, indeed, the primary relevant question if and when the Court gets to the stage of applying the Times decision. Certainly the petitioner would not have this Court require the parties and the lower courts to perform again a long and expensive trial for no reason.[1]

---

[1]The Georgia Court of Appeals has stated it well: "It is of the utmost importance that the weary river of litigation should 'wind somewhere to the sea', and it is with extreme reluctance that the appellate courts will retrace its course to find for it another channel than the one over which it has already flowed. We hope its perturbed spirit will now enter into unbroken rest." Young Men's Christian Ass'n v. Bailey, 112 Ga. App. 684, 711, 146 S.E.2d 324, 343 (1965).

Furthermore, as stated in respondent's Further Response on page 9: "The Court will recall that the sole defense made in this case was the truth of the article. When the trial court's charge was given petitioner made no objection to the charge as to actual malice, as required by the Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 51. This rule is based on sound practice and it should not be here disregarded."

II.

Johnson v. New Jersey

In the Johnson case, the Court decided that two landmark decisions announcing constitutional rights of persons accused of crime should not be applied retroactively to cases tried before the decision dates, even where appeals were pending on such dates and the judgments had not become final. The decisions in question are Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964), and Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966).[2]

---

[2]In Escobedo, it was held that defendant's rights to counsel under the Sixth Amendment had been denied by the police in refusing his request for counsel during interrogation by the police, thereby making inadmissible in the subsequent state criminal trial any incriminating statements elicited during the interrogation. In Miranda, the Court in each of four criminal cases held that the defendants' constitutional right against self-incrimination guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment had been violated in that statements had been obtained from the defendants under circumstances that did not meet constitutional standards for protection of the privilege against self-incrimination. The Court held that such statements had been wrongfully received in evidence. The majority opinion goes to great lengths in spelling out the procedures which should be employed to safeguard the right of the accused against self-incrimination.

In reaching its decision against retroactive application, the Court noted that it had the right to confine rules promulgated concerning constitutional claims to subsequently tried cases " 'where the exigencies of the situation require such an application.' " 384 U.S. at 726-27. Mr. Chief Justice Warren commented, "to reiterate what was said in Linkletter, we do not disparage a constitutional guarantee in any manner by declining to apply it retroactively." 384 U.S. at 728. The Court noted that retroactive application would seriously disrupt the administration of the criminal laws and found no persuasive reason to do so.

In the instant case, a comparable situation is presented, for the case was tried before the Court's decision in Times. The Court noted in both Escobedo and Miranda that its decisions had been foreshadowed by earlier cases. This was equally true of its decision in Times (see Response, pp. 21-24).

There are no special considerations requiring that Times be made retroactive so that a retrial can be ordered for the purpose of determining if this case can be brought within the scope of Times. On the contrary, there are special and compelling reasons why certiorari should be denied.

In Rosenblatt, the Court did give retroactive application to Times, but the facts and circumstances of that case are substantially different from those in this case as pointed out in the Further Response. The circumstances of each case must determine what application is to be made of Times.[3]

Rosenblatt (and Times) were concerned with "debate on a public issue" of long standing. No public issue as to the "rigging and fixing" of the game by Butts and Bryant existed at the time of publication of the magazine article here found to be libelous. Thus, there is no justification for remanding this case for a retrial on the question of whether Butts was a public official within the meaning of Times (as was done in Rosenblatt). Furthermore, it is quite obvious that Butts was not a "public official" under the law as it existed at the time of the trial and, as has been shown, it would require a substantial stretching of Times and Rosenblatt to regard him as such. Indeed, the question was raised after the Times decision and it was decided by the trial judge that Butts was not a public official.

Even had Butts been held by the trial judge to have been a public official under Times, there is no need for a retrial on the question of whether actual malice existed. The evidence clearly supports a finding of actual malice and it was so found by the trial court whose findings were approved by the Court of Appeals.

---

[3]As stated by Justice Fortas in urging that the writ in Rosenblatt be vacated as improvidently granted: "The trial below occurred before this Court's decision in New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254. As a result, the factual record in this case was not shaped in light of the principles announced in New York Times. Particularly in this type of case it is important to observe the practice of relating our decisions to factual records. They serve to guide our judgment and to help us measure theory against the sharp outlines of reality. Especially where our decision furnishes a necessarily Procrustean bed for state law, I think, with all respect, that we should insist upon a relevant factual record. A subsequent trial may conceivably help respondent, but it will be too late to be of assistance to us." 383 U.S. at 100-01.

Finally, it is submitted that if a person convicted of "felony murder" prior to Escobedo and Miranda may not obtain the benefit of the constitutional rights as interpreted in those decisions, certainly petitioner is not entitled to a new trial because of the subsequent decision in Times.

CONCLUSION

Some three years have elapsed since the case was tried, during which time Curtis has settled with Bryant for $300,000.00.[4] (R. 1456-57). In fairness to Butts, no further delay should be countenanced.

For the reasons herein set forth, in addition to those previously stated and upon which respondent still insists, the application for writ of certiorari should be denied.

Respectfully submitted,

William H. Schroder

Allen E. Lockerman

[4]Petitioner has cited a number of periodicals in which college football is discussed, including an old issue of The Saturday Evening Post. If the Court is interested in reviewing this application for certiorari on such a basis, respondent suggests it examine Bear Bryant's article giving his version of the facts out of which respondent's suit arose, appearing in the September 5, 1966 issue of Sports Illustrated, copies of which have been sent to the Clerk of this Court.

Robert S. Sams

Tench C. Coxe

Milton A. Carlton, Jr.

Gerald P. Thurmond

Of Counsel:
Troutman, Sams, Schroder & Lockerman
1600 William-Oliver Building
Atlanta, Georgia 30303

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE

It is hereby certified that a copy of this Response To Petitioner's Supplemental Statement And Additional Reason Why Certiorari Should Be Denied has been served upon counsel for the opposing party in the foregoing matter by depositing in the United States Mail a copy of same in a properly addressed envelope with adequate postage thereon.

This _____ day of September, 1966.

Attorney for Wallace Butts, Respondent

SUPREME COURT, U. S.

JAN 4 1967

JOHN F. DAVIS, CLERK

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

October Term, 1966.

No. 37.

CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,

Petitioner,

v.

WALLACE BUTTS,

Respondent.

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.

BRIEF FOR THE PETITIONER

HERBERT WECHSLER,
435 West 116 Street,
New York, N. Y. 10027

PHILIP H. STRUBING,
123 South Broad Street,
Philadelphia, Penna. 19109

Attorneys for Petitioner
Curtis Publishing Co.

PEPPER, HAMILTON & SCHEETZ,
Philadelphia, Penna.,
KILPATRICK, CODY, ROGERS,
McCLATCHEY & REGENSTEIN,
Atlanta, Ga.,
Of Counsel.

International, 711 So. 50th St., Phila., Pa. 19143—Tel. SA 7-8711 Area Code 215

INDEX.

	Page
OPINIONS BELOW	1
JURISDICTION	2
QUESTIONS PRESENTED	2
CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS INVOLVED	2
STATEMENT	3
1. The Publication	3
2. The Evidence	10
The Butts-Bryant Conversation	10
Burnett's Disclosure and the Investigation by the University Authorities	18
The Significance of the Information Reflected in Burnett's Notes and the Alabama-Georgia Game	24
The Circumstances of the Publication	28
3. The Rulings and Judgment of the District Court	33
4. The Decision of the Court of Appeals	36
SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT	39
ARGUMENT	45
I. The Constitutional Limitations Enunciated by This Court in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan and Subsequent Decisions Govern the Review of a Verdict and Judgment Rendered Prior to the New York Times Decision, Although the First Amendment Was Not Invoked at the Trial	45
II. The Publication Was Protected by the First Amendment and Entitled to the Privilege Established by the Rule of New York Times	51
A. The Plaintiff Was a "Public Official" Under the Criteria Established by This Court in Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U. S. 75 (1966)	51
B. The Public Interest in the Subject Matter of the Publication Requires That the Privilege Apply	60

INDEX (Continued).

Page

III. Respondent's Argument That "Actual Malice Within New York Times Was Conclusively Proven" Is Both Legally Immaterial and Wholly Unsupported by the Record 65

IV. The Award of Punitive Damages Violates the First and Fifth Amendments 71

CONCLUSION 76

APPENDIX A 77

APPENDIX B 85

TABLE OF CASES CITED.

	Page
Abernathy v. Patterson, 295 F. 2d 452 (5th Cir. 1961)	49
Aetna Insurance Co. v. Kennedy, 301 U. S. 389 (1937)	48
Afro-American Publishing Co. v. Jaffe, 366 F. 2d 649 (D. C. Cir. 1966)	61, 74
Alaska Juneau Gold Mining Co. v. Robertson, 331 U. S. 793 (1947)	46
Allen v. Regents, 304 U. S. 439 (1938)	35, 56, 57
Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U. S. 58 (1963)	73
Barwick v. Wind, 203 Ga. 827 (1948)	50
Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U. S. 516 (1960)	73
Bay Ridge Operating Co. v. Aaron, 334 U. S. 446 (1948)	46
Brabham v. Mississippi, 96 F. 2d 210 (5th Cir. 1938)	74
Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Virginia, 377 U. S. 1 (1964)	60
Burton v. Wilmington Parking Authority, 365 U. S. 715 (1961)	56, 57
Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U. S. 296 (1940)	72
Coleman v. MacLennan, 78 Kan. 711 (1908)	61
Commonwealth ex rel. Ensor v. Cummings, 416 Pa. 510 (1965)	47
Commonwealth v. Jacobs, 346 Mass. 300 (1963)	47
Day v. Woodworth, 13 How. 363 (1851)	72, 74
Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494 (1951)	64
Dillon v. Peters, 341 F. 2d 337 (10th Cir. 1965)	47
Dimick v. Schiedt, 293 U. S. 474 (1935)	74
England v. Louisiana State Board of Medical Examiners, 375 U. S. 411 (1964)	48, 50
Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U. S. 478 (1964)	48, 49
Evans v. Newton, 382 U. S. 296 (1966)	57
Fay v. Noia, 372 U. S. 391 (1963)	48, 50

TABLE OF CASES CITED (Continued).

	Page
Fay v. Parker, 53 N. H. 342 (1872)	72
Ford Motor Co. v. Mahone, 205 F. 2d 267 (4th Cir. 1953)	74
Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U. S. 51 (1965)	73
Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64 (1964)	58, 66
Gondeck v. Pan American World Airways, Inc., 382 U. S. 25 (1965)	51
Green v. United States, 355 U. S. 184 (1957)	50
Griffin v. California, 380 U. S. 609 (1965)	46, 48
Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U. S. 233 (1936)	72
Hamm v. Rock Hill, 379 U. S. 306 (1964)	45
Helvering v. Richter, 312 U. S. 561 (1941)	45, 47
Henry v. Collins, 380 U. S. 356 (1965)	66
Henry v. Mississippi, 379 U. S. 443 (1965)	47
Herndon v. Georgia, 295 U. S. 441 (1935)	49
Hoeppner v. Dunkirk Printing Co., 254 N. Y. 95 (1930)	61
Hormel v. Helvering, 312 U. S. 552 (1941)	45, 49
Jackson v. Denno, 378 U. S. 368 (1964)	46
Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U. S. 184 (1964)	60
Johnson v. New Jersey, 384 U. S. 719 (1966)	46, 49
Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U. S. 458 (1938)	48
King v. State, — Del. —, 212 A. 2d 722 (1965)	48
Kingsley International Pictures Corp. v. Regents, 360 U. S. 684 (1959)	60
Kirkland v. Constitution Publishing Co., 38 Ga. App. 632 (1928), aff'd by equally divided court, 169 Ga. 264 (1929)	50
Kuchinic v. McCrory, 422 Pa. 620 (1966)	48
Life & Casualty Co. v. McCray, 291 U. S. 566 (1934)	43, 73
Linkletter v. Walker, 381 U. S. 618 (1965)	46
Linn v. United Plant Guard Workers, 383 U. S. 53 (1966)	65
Lowe v. News Publishing Co., 9 Ga. App. 103 (1911)	50
Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U. S. 1 (1964)	47
Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U. S. 643 (1961)	47
Massey v. United States, 291 U. S. 608 (1934)	45

TABLE OF CASES CITED (Continued).

Page

Minneapolis, St. P. & S. S. M. Ry. v. Moquin, 283 U. S. 520 (1931) 74
Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U. S. 436 (1966) 49
Murphy v. Waterfront Commission, 378 U. S. 52 (1964) 51
N. A. A. C. P. v. Alabama, 357 U. S. 449 (1958) 72, 73
National Surety Co. v. Jean, 61 F. 2d 197 (6th Cir. 1932) 74
New York Times Co. v. Connor, 365 F. 2d 567 (5th Cir. 1966) 70
O'Connor v. Ohio, — U. S. —, 87 Sup. Ct. 252 (1966) 46, 47
149 Madison Avenue Corp. v. Asselta, 331 U. S. 795 (1947), modifying 331 U. S. 199 (1947) 46
People v. Kitchens, 46 Cal. 2d 260 (1956) 47
People v. Hillery, 62 Cal. 2d 692 (1965) 48
People v. Loria, 10 N. Y. 2d 368 (1961) 47
People v. McLucas, 15 N. Y. 2d 167 (1965) 48
People v. Roberts, 63 Cal. 2d 84 (1965) 48
Pólites v. United States, 364 U. S. 426 (1960) 47, 49, 50
Reynolds v. Pegler, 223 F. 2d 429 (2d Cir. 1955) 75
Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U. S. 75 (1966) 40, 41, 46, 47, 49, 51, 52, 54, 55, 57, 59, 64, 66
Ruppert v. Ruppert, 134 F. 2d 497 (D. C. Cir. 1942) 48
Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U. S. 479 (1960) 43, 72
Smith v. California, 361 U. S. 147 (1959) 64, 73
Speiser v. Randall, 357 U. S. 513 (1958) 43, 64, 72
State v. Clifton, 240 Ore. 378 (1965) 48
State v. Lanzo, 44 N. J. 560 (1965) 48
State v. Smith, 37 N. J. 481 (1962) 47
Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U. S. 234 (1957) 59
Sulzbacher v. Continental Casualty Co., 88 F. 2d 122 (8th Cir. 1937) 48
Tehan v. Shott, 382 U. S. 406 (1966) 46
The New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254 (1964) 2, 35, 36, 37, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 70, 71, 74, 75

TABLE OF CASES CITED (Continued).

	Page
Thomas v. Collins, 323 U. S. 516 (1945)	60
Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U. S. 88 (1940)	60
Uebersee Finanz-Korp. v. McGrath, 343 U. S. 205 (1952)	45, 47
United Brotherhood of Carpenters v. United States, 330 U. S. 395 (1947)	51
United States ex rel. Angelet v. Fay, 333 F. 2d 12 (2d Cir. 1964), aff'd, 381 U. S. 654 (1965)	48
United States ex rel. Carafas v. LaVallee, 334 F. 2d 331 (2d Cir. 1964), cert. denied, 381 U. S. 951 (1965)	47
United States ex rel. Dalton v. Myers, 342 F. 2d 202 (3d Cir. 1965)	47
United States ex rel. Durocher v. LaVallee, 330 F. 2d 303 (2d Cir. 1964)	48
United States ex rel. West v. LaVallee, 335 F. 2d 230 (2d Cir. 1964)	47
United States v. Alabama, 362 U. S. 602 (1960)	45
United States v. Chambers, 291 U. S. 217 (1934)	45
United States v. O'Connor, 237 F. 2d 466 (2d Cir. 1956)	48
United States v. Ohio Power Co., 353 U. S. 98 (1957)	51
United States v. Schooner Peggy, 1 Cranch 103 (1801)	45
United States v. Tynen, 11 Wall. 88 (1870)	45
Vandenbark v. Owens-Illinois Glass Co., 311 U. S. 538 (1941)	45, 46
Washington Post Co. v. Keogh, 365 F. 2d 965 (D. C. Cir. 1966)	70
White v. Maryland, 373 U. S. 59 (1963)	46, 47
Whitney v. California, 274 U. S. 357 (1927)	73
Whitus v. Balkcom, 333 F. 2d 496 (5th Cir. 1964)	50
Wieman v. Updegraff, 344 U. S. 183 (1952)	64
Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U. S. 471 (1963)	75
Yakus v. United States, 321 U. S. 414 (1944)	46

STATUTES AND AUTHORITIES CITED.

	Page
Bertelsman, Libel and Public Men, 52 A. B. A. J. 657 (1966)	60, 61
Comment, Defamation of Public Officials—Free Speech and the New Constitutional Standard, 12 U. C. L. A. L. Rev. 1420 (1965)	61
Council Action on Athletic Policy, The Educational Record, vol. xxxiii, p. 246 (1952)	56, 62
Education in a Divided World (1948) p. 1	61
Federal Rules of Civil Procedure:
Rule 8(e)	50
Rule 12(b)	50
Rule 12(f)	50
Field, Damages (1876) § 72 et seq.	72
Georgia Code Annotated:
§ 26-2101	73
§ 27-2506	73
§ 32-101 et seq.	35, 54
§ 32-153	55
§ 32-154	55
§ 40-1805(c)	55
§ 40-1805(c)	36
§ 40-1808	55
§ 40-1902	55
§ 40-1906.1	55
§ 40-2001	55
§ 105-709	50
§ 105-710	50
§ 105-1801	50
Ga. Const. Sec. IV, par. I	54
Greenleaf, Evidence (Lewis ed. 1896) § 253, n. 2, p. 294 et seq.	72
Guthrie, No More Football for Us!, Sat. Ev. Post, Oct. 13, 1951, p. 24	63
Higher Education Facilities Act of 1963 (77 Stat. 363)	61

STATUTES AND AUTHORITIES CITED (Continued).

Page

Kalven, The New York Times Case: A Note on the "Central Meaning of the First Amendment," 1964 Sup. Ct. Rev. 191 60

Miller, The Truth About Big Time Football (1953) 63

Morris, Punitive Damages in Tort Cases, 44 Harv. L. Rev. 1173 (1931) 72

Noel, Defamation of Public Officers and Candidates, 49 Colum. L. Rev. 875 (1949) 50

Note, New York Times Co. v. Sullivan—The Scope of a Privilege, 51 Va. L. Rev. 106 (1965) 61

Note, The Scope of First Amendment Protection for Good-Faith Defamatory Error, 75 Yale L. J. 642 (1966) 61

Pedrick, Freedom of the Press and the Law of Libel: The Modern Revised Translation, 49 Cornell L. Q. 581, 591-595 (1964) 60

Prosser, Torts § 110 (3d ed. 1964) 61

Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States, 1963, p. 106 61

Restatement of Torts § 606 et seq. (1938) 61

Savage, American College Athletics, p. 101 (Carnegie Bulletin No. 23) 56, 63

Sayer, The Law of Damages (1792) p. 218 et seq. 72

Theodore Sedgwick, Measure of Damages (8th ed. 1891) § 348 et seq. 72

28 U. S. C. § 2106 49

28 U. S. C. § 1352(a)(1) 2

United States Constitution:

First Amendment 34, 37, 40, 41, 43, 44, 47, 48, 51, 52, 57, 59, 60, 61, 63, 64, 75, 76

Fifth Amendment 34, 71

Seventh Amendment 38

Fourteenth Amendment 48

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

October Term, 1966

No. 37

CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,
Petitioner,

v.

WALLACE BUTTS,
Respondent.

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FIFTH CIRCUIT.

BRIEF FOR THE PETITIONER.

OPINIONS BELOW.

The opinions of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit (R. 1251-1305, 1380-1393) are reported in 351 F. 2d 702. The opinion of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia on petitioner's motion for new trial (R. 70-80) is reported in 225 F. Supp. 916. The opinion of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia, denying petitioner's motions for new trial under Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b) (R. 1118-1125), is reported in 242 F. Supp. 390.

JURISDICTION.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was entered on July 16, 1965 (R. 1306). A petition for rehearing en banc, filed August 4, 1965 (R. 1307), was denied on October 1, 1965 (R. 1380). The petition for a writ of certiorari was filed December 11, 1965 and was granted October 10, 1966. The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under 28 U. S. C. § 1254(1).

The District Court had jurisdiction by virtue of diversity of citizenship under 28 U. S. C. § 1352(a)(1).

QUESTIONS PRESENTED.

1. Whether the constitutional limitations on the standard of liability in libel actions, enunciated by the decision of this Court in The New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254 (1964), may be disregarded in reviewing a verdict and judgment rendered prior to the New York Times decision, on the ground that the constitutional question was not raised by the defendant at the antecedent trial.

2. Whether a publication charging, in substance, that the athletic director of a State University gave to the football coach of another State University confidential information calculated to affect the outcome of a forthcoming football game between the two schools is protected by the First Amendment, as interpreted by this Court in New York Times and subsequent decisions.

3. Whether an award of $400,000 as punitive damages for libel, after a jury verdict of $3,000,000 in punitive damages, constituted, in the circumstances, an abridgement of the freedom of the press or a taking of property without due process of law.

CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS INVOLVED.

The constitutional and statutory provisions involved are set forth in Appendix A, infra, pp. 79-83.

STATEMENT.

This is a libel action instituted by respondent against the petitioner on March 25, 1963 in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia, demanding $5,000,000 in general damages and $5,000,000 punitive damages for the alleged defamation of respondent by an article published in The Saturday Evening Post of March 23, 1963 (R. 14-19).

1. The Publication.

The article (R. 1071-1074; Appendix B, infra, pp. 87-90), entitled "The Story of a College Football Fix" and sub-titled "A Shocking Report of How Wally Butts and 'Bear' Bryant Rigged a Game Last Fall," reported that on September 14, 1962, eight days before the opening game of the football season between the University of Georgia and the University of Alabama, George Burnett, an insurance salesman in Atlanta, while dialing the telephone number of a local public relations firm, was accidentally connected into a long distance telephone call from respondent at that local number to Paul Bryant in Tuscaloosa, Alabama. Respondent, the former head coach of the football team of the University of Georgia, was then athletic director of the University. Bryant was the athletic director and head coach of the football team of the University of Alabama.

The article told the story of the telephone call, as follows (R. 1072-1074; Appendix B, infra p. 88):

> . . . the voice of a telephone operator said:
>
> "Coach Bryant is out on the field, but he'll come to the phone. Do you want to hold, Coach Butts, or shall we call you back?"
>
> And then a man's voice: "I'll hold, operator."
>
> . . . .

After a brief wait Burnett heard the operator say that Coach Bryant was on the phone and ready to speak to Coach Butts.

"Hello, Bear," Butts said.

"Hello, Wally. Do you have anything for me?"

As Burnett listened, Butts began to give Bryant detailed information about the plays and formations Georgia would use in its opening game eight days later. Georgia's opponent was to be Alabama.

Butts outlined Georgia's offensive plays for Byrant and told him how Georgia planned to defend against Alabama's attack. Butts mentioned both players and plays by name. Occasionally Bryant asked Butts about specific offensive or defensive maneuvers, and Butts either answered in detail or said, "I don't know about that. I'll have to find out."

"One question Bryant asked," Burnett recalled later, "was 'How about quick kicks?' And Butts said, 'Don't worry about quick kicks. They don't have anyone who can do it.'

"Butts also said that Rakestraw [Georgia quarterback Larry Rakestraw] tipped off what he was going to do by the way he held his feet. If one foot was behind the other it meant he would drop back to pass. If they were together it meant he was setting himself up to spin and hand off. And another thing he told Bryant was that Woodward [Brigham Woodward, a defensive back] committed himself fast on pass defense."

As the conversation ended, Byrant asked Butts if he would be at home on Sunday. Butts answered that he would.

"Fine," Bryant said, "I'll call you there Sunday."

Listening to this amazing conversation, Burnett began to make notes on a scratch pad he kept on his desk. Some of the names were strange to him—tackle Ray Rissmiller's name he jotted down as "Ricemiller," and end Mickey Babb's as "Baer"—and some of the jargon stranger still, but he recorded all that he heard. When the two men had hung up Burnett still sat at his desk, stunned, and a little bit frightened.

Suddenly he heard an operator's voice: "Have you completed your call, sir?"

Burnett started. "Yes, operator. By the way, can you give me the number I was connected with?"

The operator supplied him with a number in Tuscaloosa, Alabama, which he later identified as that of the University of Alabama. The extension was that of the athletic department. Burnett then dialed Jackson 5-3536—the number he originally wanted. This time the call went through normally, and he reached a close friend and former business associate named Milton Flack.

"Is Wally Butts in your office now, Milt?" Burnett asked.

"Well, he's in the back office—making a phone call, I think. Here he comes now."

"Don't mention that I asked about him," Burnett said hurriedly. "I'll talk to you later."

. . . .

That afternoon Burnett told Flack what he had overheard. Both of them, though only slightly acquainted with the high-spirited, gregarious Butts, liked him, and they decided to forget the whole thing. Burnett went home in the evening and stuffed his notes in a bureau drawer. He felt a great sense of relief. The matter, as far as he was concerned, was closed.

The article proceeded to describe the Alabama-Georgia game, which Alabama, a 14 to 17 point favorite in the "betting lines", won 35-0, stating inter alia:

Bryant, before the game, certainly did not talk to the press like a man who was playing with a stacked deck.

"The only chance we've got against Georgia is by scratching and battling for our life," he said, managing to keep a straight face. "Put that down so you can look at it next week and see how right it is."

The game itself would have been enjoyed most by a man who gets kicks from attending executions. Coach Bryant (he neglected to wear a black hood) snapped every trap. The first time Rakestraw passed, Alabama intercepted. Then Alabama quickly scored on a 52-yard pass play of its own. The Georgia players, their moves analyzed and forecast like those of rats in a maze, took a frightful physical beating.

. . . .

Georgia made only 37 yards rushing, completed only 7 of 19 passes for 79 yards, and made its deepest penetration (to Alabama's 41-yard line) on the next to the last play of the game. Georgia could do nothing right, and Alabama nothing wrong. The final score was . . . the most lopsided score between the two teams since 1923.

It was a bitter defeat for Georgia's promising young team. The 38-year-old Johnny Griffith, who was beginning his second season as head coach, was stunned. Asked about the game by reporter Jim Minter, he said: "I figured Alabama was about three touchdowns better than we were. So that leaves about fifteen points we can explain only by saying we didn't play any football."

Quarterback Rakestraw came even closer to the truth. "They were just so quick and mobile," he told Minter. "They seemed to know every play we were going to run."

Later other members of the Georgia squad expressed their misgivings to Furman Bisher, sports editor of the Atlanta Journal. "The Alabama players taunted us," end Mickey Babb told him. " 'You can't run Eighty-eight Pop [a key Georgia play] on us,' they'd yell. They knew just what we were going to run, and just what we called it."

And Sam Richwine, the squad's trainer, told Bisher: "They played just like they knew what we were going to do. And it seemed to me a lot like things were when they played us in 1961 too." (Alabama walloped Georgia in 1961 by a score of 32-6.)

According to the article, the "whole matter weighed heavily on George Burnett" and he "began to wonder if he had done the right thing when he had put the notes aside and kept his mouth shut." On January 4, he told his friend Bob Edwards, whom he knew to be a friend of Johnny Griffith, his story of the phone call. Edwards asked if he could report the story to Griffith and Burnett told him to go ahead but try to keep his name out of it. Griffith pressed to meet Burnett and a meeting was arranged in the middle of January in Griffith's room at the Atlanta Biltmore Hotel, where Griffith was attending a meeting of the Southeastern Conference coaches.

. . . Griffith listened grimly to Burnett's story, then read his notes. Suddenly he looked up.

"I didn't believe you until just this minute," he told Burnett. "But here's something in your notes that you couldn't possibly have dreamed up . . . this thing about our pass patterns. I took this over from Wally Butts when I became coach, and I gave it a different name. Nobody uses the old name for this pattern but one man. Wally Butts."

Griffith finished reading the notes, then asked Burnett if he could keep them. Burnett nodded.

"We knew somebody'd given our plays to Alabama," Griffith told him, "and maybe to a couple of other teams we played too. But we had no idea it was Wally Butts. You know, during the first half of the Alabama game my players kept coming to the sidelines and saying, 'Coach, we been sold out. Their linebackers are hollering out our plays while we're still calling the signals.'"

The article then reported that Griffith "went to University officials, told them what he knew and said that he would resign if Butts was permitted to remain in his job"; that Burnett was asked to come to the Atlanta office of M. Cook Barwick, an attorney representing the University, where he met Dr. Aderhold, the president of the University; that his story was carefully checked and he was asked to take a lie-detector test, which he passed; that an official of the Southern Bell Telephone Company checked and found that a call had been made from the Atlanta number to the University of Alabama extension noted by Burnett at the time when Burnett claimed he overheard the conversation; that on February 21, Burnett was summoned once again to Barwick's office, because "Bernie Moore, the commissioner of the Southeastern Conference, 'wanted to ask some questions' "; that at this meeting, attended by Moore, Dr. Aderhold, two members of the University's Board of Regents, and "another man identified as Bill Hartman, a friend of Wally Butts," Burnett "sensed a mood of hostility in the air" and was confronted with an accurate report that he had been arrested two years before for writing two bad checks—one for twenty-five and the other for twenty dollars—and that he was still on probation on that charge; that Burnett, who "felt that he had been candid with the University but that he had also angered many friends of Wally Butts," began to feel that he would be hurt "when and if these people decided to make this mess public"; that he then went to his lawyer and they agreed that he should tell his story to The Saturday Evening Post.

The article concluded, as follows:

> Now the net closed on Wally Butts. On February 23 the University of Georgia's athletic board met hastily in Atlanta and confronted Butts with Burnett's testimony. Challenged, Butts refused to take a lie-detector test. The next day's newspapers reported that he had submitted his resignation, effective immediately, "for purely personal and business purposes."

"I still think I'm able to coach a little," Butts told a reporter that day, "and I feel I can help a pro team."

The chances are that Wally Butts will never help any football team again. Bear Bryant may well follow him into oblivion—a special hell for that grim extrovert—for in a very real sense he betrayed the boys he was pledged to lead. The investigation by university and Southeastern Conference officials is continuing; motion pictures of other games are being scrutinized; where it will end no one so far can say. But careers will be ruined, that is sure. A great sport will be permanently damaged. For many people the bloom must pass forever from college football.

"I never had a chance, did I?" Coach Johnny Griffith said bitterly to a friend the other day. "I never had a chance."

When a fixer works against you, that's the way he likes it.

In an editorial accompanying the article (R. 1071), the Post's editors asserted:

> Not since the Chicago White Sox threw the 1919 World Series has there been a sports story as shocking as this one. This is the story of one fixed game of college football.
>
> Before the University of Georgia played the University of Alabama last September 22, Wally Butts, athletic director of Georgia, gave Paul (Bear) Bryant, head coach of Alabama, Georgia's plays, defensive patterns, all the significant secrets Georgia's football team possessed.
>
> The corrupt here were not professional ball players gone wrong, as in the 1919 Black Sox scandal. The corrupt were not disreputable gamblers, as in the scandals continually afflicting college basketball. The corrupt were two men—Butts and Bryant—employed to educate and to guide young men.

How prevalent is the fixing of college football games? How often do teachers sell out their pupils? We don't know—yet. For now we can only be appalled.

The petitioner admitted publication of the article but denied that it was published "wilfully, maliciously and falsely," as averred by the respondent (R. 20, 16). It also pleaded truth as a defense (R. 20), a plea that the trial court ruled imposed on the defendant the burden of proving the "sting of the libel" by a preponderance of evidence (R. 34, 1019, 1021). The jury was instructed that the "sting of the libel" was "the charge that the plaintiff rigged and fixed the 1962 Georgia-Alabama game by giving Coach Bryant information which was calculated to or could have affected the outcome of the game," in the sense that it "could have caused one team to win or lose, or could have increased the number of points by which the game was won" (R. 1021).

2. The Evidence.

At the trial, there was conflicting testimony as to whether Butts gave Bryant any information about Georgia's team, formations and plays and as to the value of the information that Burnett, according to his testimony, notes and prior statements, heard Butts give. Some of the incidental affirmations in the article were shown to be inaccurate. There also was dispute as to the adequacy of the Post's investigation prior to its publication of the article and as to the publication policy followed by the Post under its recently changed command.

The evidence, in detail, was as follows:

The Butts-Bryant Conversation.

The defendant proved by records of the Southern Bell Telephone Company that a long distance call had been placed by Wallace Butts to Paul "Brince" at the Athletic Department of the University of Alabama in Tuscaloosa at 10:29 a.m. on the morning of September 13, that the call lasted for 15 minutes, 2 seconds and that it was charged to the credit card of the University of Georgia Athletic Association (R. 119-121). It was also proved that a call billed to the credit card of Paul W. Bryant was placed from the University of Alabama to the home of Wallace Butts in Athens, Georgia at 8:51 p.m. on Sunday, September 16, 1962, and that it lasted for sixty-seven minutes (R. 122-124, 214).

Burnett's testimony substantially confirmed and elaborated his account of the Butts-Bryant phone call of September 13,[1] as it was reported in the Post.

Burnett said that after the parties had identified themselves (R. 129) and Bryant had asked "Do you have anything for me, Wally?" (R. 130), Butts answered "Yes" and began to give Bryant information about the offensive and defensive plays of the University of Georgia (R. 129-130, 150). Since the opening game with Alabama was to take place on September 22, Burnett inferred that the statements related to the plays that Georgia would be using in that game (R. 151). After the conversation had progressed for a minute or a minute and a half Burnett began to make notes (R. 130), writing as he could get the words (R. 131, 134), abbreviating when he could (R. 152, 164), missing things that were said (R. 132, 152, 164). The notes, spread over seven pages (R. 1077-1079), contained at the beginning the names "Bear Bryant" and "Wally Butts" (R. 1077) and at the end the words "Give Wally Ring Sunday," "641—Athletic Office," "10-40 A. M. —Sept. 13, 1962" and "Ja. 5-3536"[2] (R. 1079). Between

---

1. The article inaccurately fixed the date of the call as September 14, but Burnett's testimony (R. 128, 155) and his notes (R. 1079) both fixed the date correctly as September 13.

2. Bryant testified that 641 was one of his extensions at the University of Alabama Athletic Department (R. 420-421). Ja. [Jackson] 5-3536 was the telephone number of Communications International, the number Burnett was attempting to reach (R. 128, 138).

these entries there were some twenty-one references to the capacity or the behavior of members of the Georgia team or to football formations or plays, representing Burnett's sometimes cryptic record of what he had heard Butts say. Having no independent memory of the details of many of these statements, Burnett used the notes to refresh his recollection (R. 130) and they also were admitted in evidence (R. 178).

According to Burnett's testimony and his notes, respondent told Bryant that Georgia lineman "Reismuller" (as his name was spelled in the notes, though it was actually Rissmiller [R. 130, 220; see also R. 234]) was one of the best in the history of the school (R. 130); that Mickey Babb (referred to in the notes as "Baer") an end who, according to Coach Griffith (R. 227) and Assistant Coach Pearce (R. 319), was Georgia's leading pass receiver, "catches everything they throw" (R. 136); and that halfback Don Porterfield was the best back at Georgia since Trippi (R. 134). Butts also said that Georgia safety-man Woodward (spelled "Woodard" in the notes) committed himself fast on pass defense (R. 132) (a tendency of his which Griffith and Pearce testified they had been attempting to correct [R. 222, 315]); and that Georgia's pass defense was weak and passes could be thrown in anybody's direction, except Blackburn, who was strong on pass defense (R. 133). Griffith testified that Georgia "had counted on" halfback Blackburn "being our best defensive back" but "he was sick off and on before the Alabama game, and didn't get the work he needed actually to be ready to play against Alabama" (R. 223).

Further, Burnett testified that Butts said that the formation Georgia played until they got close to the goal line was a slot to the right with the ends normal—split out about three yards (R. 135), and he also had noted "Slot right, left end out 15 yards" but remembered nothing more about that than the words that he wrote down (R. 136). The Georgia coaches testified, however, that these were the two basic offensive formations that Georgia planned to use and used in the Alabama game (Griffith, R. 219, 227; Inman, R. 286-287; Pearce, R. 317-318). Butts also said that when Georgia was on the goal line " 'Baer' goes on a hook," a statement that was unintelligible to Burnett (R. 135) but was correct, according to Coach Griffith, assuming "Baer" to refer to Babb (R. 258). Butts also spoke of an "optional left pass"—if they can block the man on the corner, they keep running, if not, they pass (R. 131). This optional left pass terminology had been originated and used by Butts as head coach (Butts, R. 499; Griffith, R. 221), but was no longer used by Georgia in 1962 (Griffith, R. 221, 236; Pearce, R. 343). Butts also asked Bryant "You remember my old 29-0 series?" and said that Georgia used that (R. 136). Neither Griffith nor Pearce knew any Georgia play so designated (R. 226, 261, 350), but former backfield coach Hartman recognized the reference as an abbreviation of "29 overpass", a play that Butts had used during his tenure as head coach (R. 747, 751, 757-8).

Other notations, reflecting statements Burnett heard, included "On side guard pulls on sweep" (R. 1078, 132) and "Ga. Drop End off, contain with tackle (Defense)". (R. 1079, 137). Griffith (R. 222) and Pearce (R. 312-314) testified that on sweeps (end runs) Georgia pulled its on-side guard against certain defenses and Griffith confirmed that it was part of his defensive training for the Alabama game to "drop our ends off and contain with a six loose defense" (R. 227). Burnett did not remember what his notation "long count left half in motion" was in reference to (R. 134), but both Griffith (R. 223-224, 258) and Pearce (R. 316) discerned a meaning in relation to a Georgia play. Another notation "Right halfback on fly, Left halfback, quarterback gives to left half, left guard pulling blocks on corner" had a meaning to Burnett that he was not permitted to explain (R. 135), but meant no more to Griffith than that Georgia "put the right halfback on fly", which is a common practice (R. 258-259). The entry "Slot Rt—Rt Half on Fly Screen to Him" (R. 1079) reflected a statement by Butts (R. 136), but was unintelligible to the coaches unless "him" referred to the left halfback rather than the right (R. 226, 260, 309-310, 325, 349-350).

A few of the entries in the notes meant nothing to Burnett or to the coaches.[3] Neither Griffith nor Pearce subscribed to an appraisal of the Georgia team as a "well disciplined ball club" (R. 256, 311-312) but Burnett testified that Butts had used those words and that he had also said, "This is no thanks to Johnny Griffith because they added two coaches" (R. 179, 131), as Georgia had, namely, Pearce and Inman (R. 230, 312).

It was also Burnett's testimony that during the conversation Bryant asked Butts questions about the Georgia team (R. 138, 148). One of these questions was "How about quick kicks?", to which Butts replied "Don't be worried about quick kicks; they haven't got anybody that can" (R. 135-136, 1079). According to Griffith (R. 225-226) and Pearce (R. 318-319, 352-354) the Georgia team had no one who could quick kick from its normal offensive formation, though a substitute quarterback could kick from a special formation. See also R. 745 (Hartman).

In response to several of Bryant's questions, Butts replied, according to Burnett, "I don't know." A "couple of times" Bryant then said "Can you find out?" and Butts answered "I will try." The conversation ended with Bryant asking "Will you be home Sunday, Wally?" Butts said "Yes" and Bryant said "I will give you a call then" (R. 148, 137).

On one point Burnett testified that the article was in error in its report of the conversation that he overheard. Butts did not say that Rakestraw "tipped off what he was going to do by the way he held his feet" or make any statement on that subject (R. 157, 158). Burnett did not tell the author of the article that such a statement had been made (R. 175), and according to Coach Griffith it was not correct (R. 266).

3. They were: "Rakestraw to right", as to which see R. 131, 254, 343; "Baer slot Rt/Split Rt End out," as to which see R. 133, 223, 345; "Don't over shift", as to which see R. 132, 180, 256, 340, 470.

When the Butts-Bryant conversation ended, Burnett testified that he did not hang up immediately, that the operator spoke and he asked "to what number——." He was not permitted to complete his sentence or report his conversation with the operator, the Court ruling that it would be hearsay and sustaining an objection (R. 137, 146). After twenty or thirty seconds, Burnett dialed Jackson 5-3536, the number he had originally tried to reach, and spoke to Milton Flack at the office of Communications International. Again, he was prevented from testifying as to what he asked Flack or what Flack said, on the ground that it was hearsay (R. 138, 146).

According to Burnett, his office associate John Carmichael, whom he had been trying to locate when he dialed the Jackson number, came into the office thirty minutes to an hour and a half after he heard the conversation (R. 166). Burnett discussed the contents of his notes with him (R. 146). Later in the afternoon Flack came by and the three of them renewed the discussion (R. 146). Both Carmichael and Flack advised Burnett to "forget about the whole thing" and he tried to do so, putting the notes away in a dresser drawer at home (R. 146-147).

Carmichael, who testified for the respondent, confirmed and contradicted Burnett's story in some part. He stated that he came into the office about 10:30 on the morning of September 13 and found Burnett at Carmichael's desk with the telephone to his ear. When Burnett put his finger to his mouth, Carmichael walked outside the door to where there was a secretary's desk and began looking through the morning mail (R. 617-618). He was six or eight feet from where Burnett was seated (R. 619). After five or six minutes during which Burnett did not speak into the phone, Burnett called him into the office and said "John—I heard a conversation between Coach Wally Butts and Coach 'Bear' Bryant. Seems funny to me that one coach or athletic director would be calling another one before game time. I made some notes about it" (R. 620). He stated that if Burnett had said anything into the phone he would have heard it (R. 620) and specifically denied that Burnett spoke to the operator or to Milton Flack (R. 620-621).

Carmichael testified further that Burnett told him that in the telephone conversation Butts had said that some football player was a great football player and that Georgia had two new coaches and that Bryant had asked Butts if he was going to be home on Sunday. Beyond that, there was nothing involved in the Butts-Bryant conversation, as Burnett reported it to him, except general conversation (R. 622). According to Carmichael, Burnett related about the same thing to Milton Flack in his presence that afternoon (R. 623) and Flack reported that Butts had in fact been at the office of Communications International that morning (R. 624). In response to Burnett's question whether, in view of the conversation, they should bet on the Alabama game, both Carmichael and Flack said there was nothing there to indicate which side to bet on and that the best thing for Burnett to do was "to forget it" (R. 622, 624). Carmichael also swore that he had seen, though he had not handled, the notes that Burnett had on September 13 and they were not the notes in evidence at the trial (R. 644, 645-646, 789-791, 805-806).

Both Butts and Bryant testified, disclaiming any recollection of the telephone calls of September 13 and 16, but neither denied that the calls were made (Butts, R. 487, 590-591; Bryant, R. 393).

Butts acknowledged that he had talked to Bryant often through the years (R. 487), as he had talked with other coaches (R. 490-492). He specifically recalled calling Bryant in the summer of 1962 to inform him that the enforcement of certain rules would be improved (R. 485). But he denied that in the call of September 13 or at any other time he gave Bryant any secret information (R. 487, 490) or that he gave Bryant before the Alabama game any of the information embodied in the entries in Burnett's notes (R. 514) or that he ever gave any coach information about Georgia's plans in a forthcoming game (R. 516). He stated that he did not know Coach Griffith's game plan for the Alabama game (R. 514) and had never known his plan for any game (R. 490, 514). The first time he learned of the September 13 call was when John Carmichael, whom he had known for a number of years (R. 489), telephoned him in Philadelphia on January 30 to tell him of Burnett's disclosure to University officials (R. 487-488; see also Carmichael, R. 638-642).[4]

Bryant flatly denied that Butts in any conversation gave him information relating to Georgia's plays, formations or defenses (R. 393-395). He testified that Alabama was not properly prepared for one formation Georgia used in the game (R. 404-405) and that there was no significant change in Alabama's defensive plan between September 13 and the day of the game (R. 407). He attacked Burnett's statement that the operator on the September 13 call said "Coach Bryant is out on the field, but he'll come to the phone. Do you want to hold, Coach Butts, or shall we call you back?" by stating that the practice field at Alabama is three blocks from the office having extension 641 and that morning practice had been discontinued by September 13 (R. 420-421). He pointed out that according to phone company records he had not only talked to Butts for sixty-seven minutes on September 16 but also to the University of Texas coach for thirty-seven minutes (R. 424). He said that during September 1962, he discussed a number of matters with Butts both personally and by telephone, such as schedules, whether to play the game in Tuscaloosa or in Birmingham, getting Georgia to buy some lights to make it possible to play at night, tickets, the band situation, the investment in which they both were interested, a new interpretation of the butting rules, football in general and particularly Butts' passing game (R. 424-427, 409).

4. As permitted by Georgia law (R. 808-809), Dr. Aderhold testified as to Butts' general character, stating that it was bad (R. 825). Five other witnesses connected with the Unversity and members of the Georgia Athletic Board also so testified and said they would not believe him under oath (Bolton, R. 868; Heckman, R. 808-809; Bradshaw, R. 818-819; Driftmier, R. 821; Mills, R. 861).

Burnett's Disclosure and the Investigation by the University Authorities.

Burnett testified that he did nothing about the call that he had overheard until January 4, 1963, when, unable to restrain himself any longer, he told a close friend, Bob Edwards, about it (R. 139, 147). He was not permitted to testify to what he said to Edwards, on the ground that it was hearsay (R. 139).[5] He subsequently showed his notes to Edwards, who asked him to meet with Coach Griffith (R. 153), to whom Edwards had reported what Burnett had told him (R. 280, 779).[6] On January 24 (R. 190), Burnett, Edwards and Griffith met in Griffith's room at the Atlanta Biltmore Hotel, where Griffith was attending a meeting of the Southeastern Conference (R. 140, 153, 183, 217). Burnett turned the notes over to Griffith (R. 140). Though Griffith was not permitted to describe his reaction to the notes (R. 220), he did testify that he perceived in them references to the two formations Georgia planned to use and used in the Alabama game (R. 219); that in the 1962 season he thought "that somebody had given the Georgia plays or formations to other teams" (R. 274); and that he made the statement to Burnett "I figured somebody had been giving information to Alabama" (R. 268). According to Burnett, Griffith "made the remark that 'we knew something had happened,' that somebody had given away their plays; 'sold them out' is the words" (R. 159), and also said if this were allowed to continue in football he was going to get out of it (R. 159, 160).

---

5. Respondent's witness, Carmichael, did testify, however, to what Burnett told him he had said to Edwards on this occasion. See R. 638.

6. Griffith's recollection differed on the date when Edwards first called him about Burnett's disclosure. He thought it was "before Christmas in 1962" (R. 280).

After examining the notes, Griffith telephoned J. D. Bolton, Comptroller of the University of Georgia and Treasurer of its Athletic Board, who was also registered at the hotel for the meeting at the Biltmore (R. 190, 217). Bolton went to Griffith's room and was shown Burnett's notes (R. 190). Upon his return to Athens on Saturday, January 26, Griffith turned the notes over to O. C. Aderhold, President of the University (R. 217, 191). That night they were delivered to Cook Barwick, a member of the Georgia Athletic Board, at his home in Atlanta (R. 191). Burnett did not have them again until the trial (R. 140, 186).

During the following week, Burnett and Edwards met with Dr. Aderhold, J. D. Bolton and Barwick in Barwick's office (R. 140, 187, 191). Burnett consented that the meeting be recorded (R. 187, 161). Ten days later, at a second meeting in Barwick's office, Burnett signed an affidavit (R. 141, 187) and agreed to take a lie-detector test, which he took in the first week in February (R. 142). On February 21, Burnett attended another session at which Bernie Moore, Commissioner of the Southeastern Conference, was present (R. 370, 373, 688, 845). On this occasion he was confronted with the fact that, contrary to his earlier statement that he had no record (R. 161), he was on probation on a bad check charge involving two checks, one for $20 and one for $25 (R. 692, 689). Sensing hostility in the meeting (R. 688-689), Burnett was frightened and disturbed (R. 162, 169). That afternoon he went to the office of his lawyer, Pierre Howard, and told him what had happened (R. 168). Burnett did not know that Howard had learned about the phone call previously from Carmichael (R. 170, 188), that he and Flack had actually been approached the day before by representatives of the Post interested in obtaining Burnett's story and that Howard had been trying to reach him by phone while he was in Barwick's office (R. 368-373). Howard told Burnett that the Post people were in town and, on his advice, Burnett decided "it was time for me to get this story out before people were trying to malign me totally in a different way" (R. 170). Howard arranged an appointment that evening, Burnett told his story (R. 170, 374) and the next day in Howard's office Burnett dictated and signed an affidavit, which was given to Frank Graham of the Post (R. 375-376). Howard, acting for Burnett, agreed to Graham's proposal that the Post would pay Burnett $2,000 for the affidavit and, if the story were published and proved to be a Post exclusive, $3,000 after publication (R. 370-371, 376, 1051). These payments were made to Howard for Burnett (R. 1044, 1045), and Howard and Flack were each paid $500 by the Post (R. 1044, 1041). Burnett paid Howard $1,000 as a legal fee to represent him "in the things" he knew "were going to come from this" (R. 163).

On February 22, the day after Burnett's last meeting with the University authorities, Butts was asked to attend a meeting at Barwick's office (R. 192, 516, 829). On his arrival, he found not only Dr. Aderhold and Bolton, with whom he drove to Atlanta (R. 193), but also Harmon Caldwell, Chancellor of the University System; James Dunlap, chairman of the Board of Regents; Bernie Moore of the Southeastern Conference; and Bill Hartman, a close friend and former coaching assistant (R. 193, 829, 739-740). After brief prefatory remarks by Dr. Aderhold (R. 829), Barwick explained the nature of the Burnett story (R. 829, 740). Butts was handed a copy of the Burnett notes (R. 830, 740). After looking at the notes, he said, according to Bolton (R. 193-194):

> ". . . No doubt the guy heard what he said he heard. I don't blame him for placing the interpretation that he did on this conversation. If I had been in his place, I probably would have thought the same thing, but he is mistaken. It's just conversation, ordinary football talk among coaches, and that (sic) you know I would never give old Bryant anything to help him and hurt Georgia, and I wouldn't do anything to hurt Georgia. If I did give any information to hurt Georgia it was not intentional."

Dr. Aderhold testified that Butts "indicated that the call was made, and that these items were probably discussed, but they did not mean what Mr. Burnett had indicated that they did mean" (R. 831). Butts testified that, on being shown the notes, "I said such a telephone call might have been overheard. . . . I did not evaluate the notes" (R. 517). Hartman testified that what Butts said was "it was possible that a telephone conversation could have been overheard . . . but that it had been misconstrued" (R. 741).

According to Dr. Aderhold and Bolton, Butts was asked to sign an affidavit and to take a polygraph test, as Burnett had done, and he refused (R. 831, 197-198). Both Butts and Hartman denied that he had been asked to sign an affidavit (R. 517, 744). Butts testified that he refused to take a lie-detector test because he considered it "more or less, an insult" (R. 600).

Butts had previously been the target of unfavorable criticism by alumni of the University (R. 583, 812-813, 832, 839) and, on January 28, had asked to be retired as athletic director on the following June 30 (R. 585, 833-834, 840). On February 23, the day following the meeting, he resigned effective February 28, his letter to Dr. Aderhold stating that during the past two years he had "developed business interests" to which he was "having to devote more time" (R. 585, 1083). Butts' explanation of the resignation was that he had heard the night before that a newspaper story was about to be published stating that he would resign the following week instead of in June, that Bolton had told him that this would "be embarrassing to the President" and that to avoid that embarrassment he resigned (R. 584). Aderhold testified, however, that though Butts had mentioned the prospective publication and asserted that he had not authorized it, he had not given "those reasons" when he resigned (R. 847).

On February 24, Aderhold and Barwick met with Dr. Frank Rose, President of the University of Alabama, at Bernie Moore's office in Birmingham (R. 848-849, 918-919). They told Rose "that there had been a telephone conversation or telephone conversations between Coach Bryant and Coach Butts regarding the coming football game" (R. 919). Rose, "greatly disturbed" (R. 919), undertook his own investigation, beginning by interrogating Bryant for about three hours that evening (R. 919). He talked to Bryant twice again (R. 921) and on March 6, he wrote to Dr. Aderhold, as follows (R. 1084-1085):

> I have spent a great deal of time investigating thoroughly the questions that were raised during our meeting in Birmingham and have talked with Coach Bryant at least on two occasions. As best as I can ascertain, this is the information that I have received.
>
> Coach Butts has been serving on the football rules committee, and at a meeting held last summer [of], the Rules Committee the defenses used by Coach Bryant, L. S. U. and Tennessee were discussed at length and new rules were drawn up that would severely penalize these three teams unless the defenses were changes [sic], particularly on certain plays.
>
> Coach Butts had discussed this with Coach Bryant and the two were together at some meeting were Coach Butts told Coach Bryant that the University of Georgia had plays that would severely penalize the Alabama team and not only would cause LeRoy Jordan, an Alabama player, to be expelled from the game, but could severely injure one of the offensive players on the Georgia team.
>
> Coach Bryant asked Coach Butts to let him know what the plays were, and on September 14 he called Coach Bryant and told him. There was a question about another one of the offensive plays of the Georgia team that could seriously penalize the Alabama team and bring on additional injury to a player. Coach Bryant asked Coach Butts to check on that play, which he did, and called back on September 16.

It was then that Coach Bryant changed his defenses and invited Mr. George Gardner, Head of the Officials of the Southeastern Conference, to come to Tuscaloosa and interpret for him the legality of his defenses. This Mr. Gardner did the following week. The defenses were changed and Coach Bryant was grateful to Coach Butts for calling this to his attention.

Coach Bryant informs me that calling this to his attention may have favored the University of Alabama football team, but that he doubts it seriously. He did say that it prevented him from using illegal plays after the new change of rules.

I have checked into other matters that were discussed and can find no grounds for Mr. Bisher's accusations, and as I understand it he has now decided for lack of information to drop the matter.

Dr. Aderhold, this continues to be a serious matter with me, and if you have any additional information I would appreciate your furnishing me with it as I am not only anxious to work with you but to satisfy my own mind.

At the trial, Dr. Rose conceded that Bryant's invitation to Gardner and Gardner's visit to the University of Alabama to discuss the new rules interpretations had occurred "before the telephone conversations that Coach Bryant had had" (R. 926, 938), i.e., before September 13. Though he had stated in his pre-trial deposition that the information in his letter had been "obtained from Coach Bryant" (R. 944), his testimony at the trial was that the letter contained only his "interpretation" of what Bryant said "he could have talked about" with Butts (R. 925, 931, 944); that when he used the words "plays" and "defenses" in the letter, he should have said offensive or defensive "techniques" (R. 925, 933, 938); that Bryant, when he talked to him, "did not recall specific telephone calls at first" but said that "he had had many telephone conversations with all the coaches and athletic directors with whom we play", that "this was nothing unusual, that coaches talk about many things before a ball game" (R. 920); and that Bryant had told him he did not remember calling Butts back on September 16 (R. 936-937). Rose also testified that he had dictated the letter of March 6 hurriedly before taking a plane to Washington and did not have a chance to read it before it was signed and mailed by his secretary, who was supposed to clear it with Bryant but had been unable to do so (R. 922).[7]

The Significance of the Information Reflected in Burnett's Notes and the Alabama-Georgia Game.

The Alabama-Georgia game opened the 1962 football season and Georgia had an abnormal number of sophomores on its team (R. 230, 218). These facts, in the opinion of Coaches Griffith and Pearce, limited the information Alabama could have had through scouting and exchange of films about Georgia's plans (R. 232, 306-307). Practice, which began September 1, was conducted behind a walled practice field from which the public was excluded (R. 296-297, 303). Butts as athletic director had access to the practice sessions, and prior to the Alabama game had attended some, including the session on September 15 (R. 297, 326, 472). To protect the secrecy of its plays, the Georgia team was divided into three groups, the ends, the backs and the linemen, and only that portion of each play which pertained to their respective positions was distributed to each group, except for the quarterbacks who had a complete picture (R. 303-304).

In the opinion of Coach Griffith, the Burnett notes contained meaningful information for an opposing coach

---

7. Evidence refuting this testimony, including a letter from Bryant to Dr. Rose, dated February 28 (R. 1111), was not discovered by petitioner until after the trial. It was one of the grounds of petitioner's motion for new trial under Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b) (R. 1090-1106). See R. 1119-1121.

about the Georgia team which might affect the result of the game, of which the most important was the description of the two principal formations Georgia planned to use (R. 227, 281). The notes did not "disclose just general football talk" (R. 231). On cross-examination, Griffith stated that a good number of the notations were inaccurate and that the only things of value were the references to the two formations (R. 281-282). That knowledge, he thought, would free practice time which otherwise would have to be devoted to preparation against other formations Georgia possibly might use (R. 228).

Assistant Coaches Inman and Pearce were also of opinion that the information in the notes could have been helpful to Alabama. Inman thought that "any information in football from a reliable source would be valuable to any coach" (R. 288). Pearce, in addition to referring to the two formations (R. 305-306), thought that it would be helpful to know who the best opposing lineman was (R. 311), that the on side guard might pull on a sweep (R. 312-313), that the pass defense was generally weak (R. 316), that the size of the slot right was three yards (R. 317), that Georgia could not quick kick from normal formation (R. 318-319) and that Woodward committed fast (R. 330).

Assistant Coach Gregory, testifying for respondent, viewed most of the entries in Burnett's notes as an inaccurate description of Georgia's formations and plays or as inconsequential (R. 468-476). He had, however, signed a letter to the Assistant Attorney General of Georgia stating that "if such information was given to Coach Bryant before the opening game of the season, it conveyed vital information with respect to the offensive and defensive plays, patterns and formations that could have been of value to the University of Alabama football team . . ." (R. 477). He testified that this was a statement that Griffith told him the Attorney General had sent over; that it was typed in Dr. Aderhold's office; and that he had signed it because he was afraid that his job would otherwise be jeopardized (R. 478, 480).

Charles Trippi, Georgia offensive backfield coach in 1962 (R. 545), testified that if the notes "had to do with a team" he "was preparing to play", the "first thing" he "would do is tear them up because they are baseless; there is nothing in here that indicates any tendencies" (R. 546), "nothing in here to substantiate anything of value in football planning" (R. 550). He also expressed the opinion, based upon his "experience as a college football coach and a professional football coach," that "the outcome of a college football game" cannot "be pre-arranged, fixed, or rigged without the participation of the players, or some of the players, themselves" (R. 549-550).

William C. Hartman, Jr., a former Georgia assistant coach (R. 738), testified that he did not think that the Burnett material "would be of any significance at all" to him if he were coaching Alabama "because most of the technical information in these notes are basic T-formation plays" and the University of Alabama "or anybody else, anybody in the United States, somewhere in their offense has all of these plays" (R. 746). He would rely on his "own scouting information" he had "gotten through statistical study" (R. 747). He also thought that Alabama "must have seen at least three or four movies" showing that Georgia used a slot-right in 1961 and, if they did so, would have had to use it in the opening game of 1962 (R. 746).

In Bryant's testimony, he denied that any of the information reflected in Burnett's notes would have been helpful to him, though he said that there may have been a couple of things that he would rather have known than not known (R. 427-428). He insisted that what would be of interest to him about another team would be its game plan, what they planned to do in specific circumstances, such as certain field positions or on particular downs (R. 428-430).

LeRoy Jordan, who was captain of the Alabama team in 1962 and had become a professional player (R. 534) did not think it would mean anything to a defending coach to know the offensive formations of an opponent; what he would want to know is when he is going to run a particular play (R. 538-539). Charles Pell, who also played for Alabama in 1962 (R. 445), expressed the same opinion (R. 446-454). Both Jordan and Pell thought that a football game could not be rigged without the knowledge and participation of the players (R. 541, 454).

Though Alabama entered the Georgia game a 14 to 17 point favorite (R. 304), the score was 35-0 and Georgia never got closer than the 40-yard line to the Alabama goal (R. 278), gaining less than a hundred yards in its offensive plays (R. 277). There was no evidence, however, that related Alabama's strategy or performance in the game to specific information in the Burnett notes and there was some to the effect that Alabama did not take advantage in its play of points that the notes revealed (Pearce, R. 330-333, 345; Butts, 509). Bryant testified, as previously noted (p. 17, supra), that Alabama was unprepared for one formation Georgia used. Jordan (R. 537) and another Alabama player, Jimmy Sharp (R. 438-439), gave the same testimony. Bryant, Jordan and Sharp also testified that Alabama made no significant change in its defensive plans between September 13 and the day of the game (R. 407, 541, 441). Trippi, Georgia's assistant coach in charge of offense, who called eighty (R. 264) to ninety per cent of the plays used by Georgia (R. 545), said he saw nothing to indicate that Alabama knew anything about what Georgia was going to do in the game; the only thing he saw was that Alabama blocked, tackled and ran harder than Georgia (R. 549).

Coach Griffith, who was "stunned . . . to a certain extent" by the score (R. 274), testified that during the game one or two players came off the field "with a statement along these lines, that 'they know what we are running; they are even calling out our plays. What are we going to do?' or something along those lines" (R. 274, 270).

Griffith denied that his players had taken "a frightful physical beating," as stated in the article (R. 273) and Georgia players Robert Wallace Williamson, Mickey Babb and Brigham Everett Woodward also testified that this was not the case (R. 557, 563, 575). Williamson also testified that there was nothing said or done by the Alabama players which indicated that they knew what Georgia was going to do (R. 556). Babb said that as a player in the game he did not feel that their moves were being analyzed by the Alabama team (R. 564) and he specifically asserted that he was inaccurately quoted in the article as having told Furman Bisher that the Alabama players "knew just what we were going to run and just what we called it" and taunted them by yelling out "you can't run eighty-eight pop on us," (R. 564); any statements that he made to Bisher had referred to the 1961 game (R. 568). Sharp also testified that he had not heard any Alabama player calling out "you can't run eighty-eight pop on us" (R. 442); and there was proof that Georgia had no play designated by those words (R. 279).

The Circumstances of the Publication.

News of the Butts-Bryant affair reached Roger Kahn, sports editor of the Post, in New York on Tuesday, February 19, 1963 (R. 719-720). The information came from an attorney in Birmingham, Alabama, Roderick Beddow, who was representing petitioner in a libel suit brought there by Bryant against petitioner and Furman Bisher, based on an article by Bisher in the Post (R. 367). Kahn selected Frank Graham, an experienced sports writer (R. 361-362), to go to Atlanta to investigate the matter (R. 721, 366). If, in Graham's judgment, there was a story there, he was to proceed (R. 721). The Post was interested in getting to the truth of the entire matter (R. 726). Graham was to move with all deliberate speed (R. 725) to do a complete investigation, without any time limitation (R. 725). He was to go to Atlanta to get all the available facts (R.

722), an affidavit from Burnett (R. 723) and, if possible, a copy of his notes (R. 723). Kahn cautioned Graham to be careful, that this was a big story (R. 725).

Graham arrived in Atlanta late on the night of Wednesday, February 20 (R. 368). On the following morning, he met Beddow and they went to the office of Pierre Howard (R. 368-369). Shortly after their arrival there, the group was joined by Milton Flack. Howard and Flack recounted the story told by Burnett (R. 369). They also filled Graham in on the background of the Georgia football situation as they knew it (R. 369). Howard told Graham that Butts had resigned as head coach of the University of Georgia in 1961, after prominent alumni had soured on him (R. 662), and that, since that time, Butts had been outspokenly bitter about his replacement (R. 663). Graham was also told by Flack and Howard that Butts had lost approximately $80,000 in a Florida orange grove speculation (R. 663-664). He was also told that it was rumored that Butts had entered a hospital in Athens (R. 686) but Bisher later informed him that the rumor was unfounded (R. 686).

At 7:00 p.m. on the evening of February 21, Burnett, Howard and Flack met Graham at his room in The Heart of Atlanta Motel and Burnett told his story (R. 170, 374). After relating what had transpired at the meeting with the University officials earlier that day (R. 374), Burnett told Graham of the call he had overheard, as it was subsequently reported by Graham in the article (R. 386-391), except for the statement that Rakestraw tipped off what he was going to do by the way he held his feet, which Graham had heard from Howard and Flack, who thought that they had heard it from Burnett (R. 657-658, 175).[8]

On the following morning, Graham again met Burnett at Howard's office and asked Howard for a copy of Burnett's notes (R. 378-379). Howard promised to obtain a copy for him from Cook Barwick and rush it to Graham by air, but this was never done (R. 378). Burnett did, however, repeat his story in an affidavit that was delivered to Graham, in accordance with the agreement with Howard (see p. 20, supra).

8. Graham did not learn of his error on this point until after publication of the article, when Burnett advised a representative of the Post that he did not recall overhearing such a statement (R. 657-658).

Graham spent that morning at the Atlanta Public Library, studying the newspaper reports of events leading up to and following the Georgia-Alabama game (R. 379-381). Burnett and Flack drove him to the airport, spending about three and a half hours with him there (R. 381, 172). Before leaving Atlanta, Graham read in The Atlanta Journal that Butts was to resign at once as athletic director (R. 662).

On Monday, February 25, Furman Bisher called Roger Kahn in New York, telling him that he had a major story involving colossi of southern football (R. 732-733). Kahn called Graham and arranged a meeting with Bisher at his hotel later that evening (R. 363, 733). Bisher told Graham substantially what Graham had already learned in Atlanta, much of which was contained in Burnett's affidavit for the Post (R. 364-366)—information that Bisher had apparently obtained from Cook Barwick (R. 364).

Kahn knew Bisher to be a good reporter (R. 732). Since he had more entrees to people in Atlanta, it was decided that Bisher would complete the investigation there (R. 365). He was to accumulate every bit of useful information, particularly through talking to the University authorities (R. 691), and forward it to Graham. Kahn suggested that films of the game should be reviewed but believed that Bisher said they were unavailable (R. 736). Bisher testified that he had no recollection of a discussion at that meeting about viewing the films but that there might have been and he would have said it would have been a very good idea (R. 779).

On March 1, the Friday after his meeting in New York, Bisher telephoned Graham from Atlanta, stating that he had talked to people at the University. He gave Graham the quotations of Mickey Babb (R. 674-675) and the trainer, Sam Richwine (R. 676), that Graham used in the article—statements that Babb and Richwine denied at the trial that they had made (R. 564, 570). Bisher was also the source of some of the quotations of Coach Griffith in the article (R. 682-684), including the statement "I never had a chance" (R. 737) that Griffith testified at the trial he never said (R. 270-271). Bisher also confirmed to Graham Burnett's statement that the Southern Bell Telephone Company had checked and that its records showed that a call had been made by Butts to Bryant on September 13 (R. 687-688).

Graham wrote the article, relying for his sources on Burnett's affidavit and oral statements in Atlanta (R. 386-391, 661, 678-681, 685, 688-689, 692), what he was told by Flack and Howard (R. 657, 661, 662, 664, 673, 685), his study of the newspaper stories relating to the Alabama-Georgia game (R. 380, 668, 671, 672, 676) and the information furnished him by Furman Bisher (R. 383, 661, 662, 674-676, 682-684, 688, 698). On Monday, March 4, he sent a copy of his draft to Bisher in Atlanta and Bisher offered no suggestions or corrections (R. 384). The Post paid Bisher $1,000 for his work (R. 1043).

The decision to publish the Graham article was made by Davis Thomas, managing editor of the Post, and approved, after a reading of the copy, by Clay Blair, Jr., then editor-in-chief of Curtis Publishing Company (R. 706). Portions of their testimony, taken by deposition by respondent, were introduced in evidence (R. 703-718; 769-778). Both of them knew that Butts' career might be ruined by the story (R. 715, 770). Thomas stated that he made certain that "every significant source" was "thoroughly investigated" and that "the most particularityness of care" was exercised (R. 770-771). Blair was concerned that the matter "be checked out thoroughly" as "to the truth of the article" (R. 716). Thomas expected his writer to "get the real facts" (R. 772) and said that it was not the practice of the Post to submit an article to persons mentioned in it, but rather to "rely" on its "reporters" (R. 774-775). He believed that Burnett was telling the truth, attaching "a great deal of significance to the affidavit" and taking "into consideration" the fact that he had been arrested and convicted of passing the bad checks (R. 771-772). Though the Post "would have liked to see" the Burnett notes, it published without seeing them, since they "knew the notes existed" (R. 773). The quotations of Griffith in the article were believed to be accurate at the time when they were published (R. 775). If Griffith had wanted to write a letter to the Post correcting the quotations, "We would have been happy to publish it in the 'Letters' column of the magazine" (R. 775). Graham had not thought it necessary to interview Carmichael because he had been told he would not talk to him (R. 666-667). Thomas was aware of this (R. 699-700, 771) and apparently supported Graham's decision (R. 774).

Blair wanted to change the "image" of the Post (R. 711) and in an interview with Newsweek in November 1962, he had said that he intended to "restore the crusading spirit, the sophisticated muckraking, the expose in mass magazines" (R. 714). He testified, however, that he did not use the term "muckraking" in the sense in which the dictionary describes its use by President Theodore Roosevelt—to refer to unjust and sweeping charges—but rather in the sense of expose; and that by "sophisticated" he did not mean sophistical (R. 712-714). Blair also had circulated a congratulatory memorandum to his staff on January 15, 1963 (R. 1040), in which he stated, facetiously according to his testimony (R. 710), that the "final yardstick" of the improvement in the magazine was that "we have about six lawsuits pending, meaning that we are hitting them where it hurts, with solid, meaningful journalism." By "them" he meant "the whole United States" (R. 709). He was inaccurate, however, about the number of lawsuits; there were less (R. 710). Blair also testified that in his opinion the issue containing the Butts' article was "a step in the right direction", saying that "with this issue . . . we have gone 25 per cent toward the goal of the magazine that I envision" (R. 711).

Blair also acknowledged that the Curtis Publishing Company showed a loss of about $1.1 million for the first quarter of 1963, compared to $4.7 million for the same quarter of 1962; that from 1960 to 1961 advertising revenue had declined $20 million and about the same amount from 1961 to 1962; that advertising revenue is affected by the size and nature of circulation; and that he "would be hopeful we could have more advertising revenue in the Post" (R. 707-708).

Under date of March 11, 1963, seven days before the publication date of the article, respondent's counsel sent a telegram and registered letter to the Post, stating without specification that the charges contained in the proposed article were false (R. 777). Sometime during the week prior to publication, respondent's daughter telephoned Blair and tearfully asked him not to publish (R. 717-718). Following the publication of the article, a demand for a retraction was made by the respondent and ignored by the Post (R. 17, 20).

3. The Rulings and Judgment of the District Court.

The District Court held that petitioner's evidence in support of its plea of truth sufficed to present a question for the jury, declining to direct a verdict for the plaintiff on that issue (R. 354-359). It charged the jury, as stated above (supra, p. 10), that the defendant had the burden of proving the truth of the "sting of the libel" by a preponderance of evidence (R. 1019, 1021); that unless the defendants proved the statements to be true, they were libelous per se (R. 1020, 1022, 1023); that malice was "to be inferred" (R. 1023); and that "the law will presume that anyone so libeled must have suffered damage" (R. 1023). The jury also was instructed that where "it is established that the defendant was inspired by actual malice in the publication of the defamatory matter, the jury, in its discretion, may, but is not required, to award punitive damages" (R. 1026); that "the burden of proof to establish the facts of actual malice is upon the plaintiff . . . by a fair preponderance of the evidence" (R. 1026); and that "actual malice encompasses the notion of ill will, spite, hatred and an intent to injure one" and "also denotes a wanton or reckless indifference or culpable negligence with regard to the rights of others" (R. 1026). The "purpose of punitive damages," the jury was told, "is to deter the defendant from a repetition of the offense and is a warning to others not to commit a like offense." Such an award "is intended to protect the community and has an expression of ethical indignation . . ." (R. 1026) and the sum awarded as punitive damages "need have no relationship to any amount" that the jury might "award for general damages" (R. 1025).

On August 20, 1963, the jury returned a verdict in favor of respondent, awarding him $60,000 general damages and $3,000,00 punitive damages (R. 1036). Petitioner filed a timely motion for new trial (R. 36-66), contending inter alia that the verdict for punitive damages was invalid under the First, Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution (R. 36-38). On January 14, 1964, the District Court denied petitioner's constitutional claims, viewing them as an attack on the Georgia statute allowing punitive damages and holding that such a contention "is an affirmative defense and must be so pleaded in defendant's answer" (R. 76; 225 F. Supp. at 920). However, the court found the amount of the punitive damages awarded by the jury to be "grossly excessive," expressed the "considered opinion" that the "maximum . . . that should have been awarded" is $400,000 (R. 76) and granted petitioner's motion for new trial unless respondent within 20 days should remit the punitive damages in excess of $400,000 (R. 81; 225 F. Supp. at 922). Respondent filed the remittitur (R. 82) and on January 22, 1964, the District Court entered judgment against petitioner for $460,000 (R. 83). Petitioner filed a notice of appeal to the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit on January 24, 1964 (R. 84).

On February 28, 1964, petitioner moved again for a new trial under Rule 60(b)(2) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure on the ground of newly discovered evidence (R. 1090-1112). While this motion was pending, this Court, on March 9, 1964, decided New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254. Thereafter, on March 23, 1964, petitioner filed an additional motion for new trial under Rule 60(b) (R. 1115-1118), contending that the respondent as director of athletics of the University of Georgia was a public official within the meaning of the New York Times decision and thus precluded from recovering for a statement relating to his official conduct without proof that the statement was published with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not; that the definition of "actual malice" given the jury by the District Court did not conform to this requirement; and that the evidence at the trial did not suffice to prove malice in this sense with the "convincing clarity" required by the Times decision.

Though the issue had not been litigated as such at the trial, the record showed or it was subject to judicial notice that the University of Georgia is a state institution operated by the Board of Regents of the University System (GA. CODE ANN. § 32-101 et seq.); that Butts was employed as the director of athletics of the University by the separately incorporated Athletic Association, a fifteen member Board of which the president of the University was chairman ex officio (R. 807, 823, 832, 189, 874-875), composed of a majority of faculty members appointed by the president and a minority selected from alumni (R. 874-875, 769, 189); that the Association is an agent of and employed by the Board of Regents to supervise the University athletic program (R. 189; see Allen v. Regents, 304 U. S. 439, 443, 452 [1938]); that Butts received a salary of $12,000 from the Association (R. 875, 877), with some addition paid by the University subject to teacher retirement [9] (R. 846); and that his duties were to supervise the entire athletic program of the University, including the scheduling and location of intercollegiate games in all sports, planning and budgeting, the adding of new athletic facilities and ticket sales (R. 492-493, 425). According to the opinion of the District Court, by virtue of his position the respondent also was a member of the faculty (R. 1124).

The District Court denied the motions for new trial on April 7, 1964 (R. 1118-1125), ruling both that the respondent was not a public official within the principle of the New York Times decision and that "there was ample evidence from which a jury could have concluded that there was reckless disregard by defendant of whether the article was false or not" (R. 1124-1125; 242 F. Supp. at 395). Petitioner filed a notice of appeal from this decision on April 10, 1964 (R. 1125).

4. The Decision of the Court of Appeals.

On appeal from the judgment and the order denying the motion for new trial under Rule 60(b), petitioner urged the constitutional contentions rejected by the District Court on the motions for new trial and argued, in addition, that the judgment entered on the remittitur was repugnant to the Constitution.

The Court of Appeals affirmed the judgment by divided vote (R. 1251-1306). The majority (Judge Spears, with the concurrence of Judge Brown) declined to rule upon petitioner's contentions based upon the New York Times decision on the ground that petitioner's failure to raise at the trial the constitutional questions that some of its attorneys knew were being litigated in the Times case "clearly waived any right it may have had to challenge the verdict and judgment on any of the constitutional grounds asserted in Times" (R. 1265-1266; 351 F. 2d at 713). Ignoring the constitutional attack on the verdict, the Court also held that there was "ample basis for the trial court's judgment" in selecting "the sum of $400,000 as the maximum which the law would accept to deter Curtis from repeating the trespass or to compensate the wounded feelings of Butts" (R. 1278; 351 F. 2d at 719); and that the requirement of the remittitur of the punitive damages held to be excessive was "a permissible course" that "does not infringe upon the Seventh Amendment's guaranty of a jury trial" (R. 1277-1278; 351 F. 2d at 718-719).

---

9. The additional amount involved is not established by the record. A question by respondent's counsel sought, however, to bring out that he received $6500 a year from the Georgia Student Educational Fund (R. 877). The State Department of Audits Report of Examination of the University of Georgia for the year ended June 30, 1963, a document that Georgia law requires to be filed for public information (GA. CODE § 40-1805(c)), shows (p. 211) payments by the University to respondent as athletic director of $1,666.64 for the eight months before his resignation.

Judge Rives dissented on all points. In his view the respondent was a public official and the publication related to his official conduct, within the principle of New York Times (R. 1281-1286; 351 F. 2d at 720-723); the trial court's instruction did not comply with the New York Times standard since it permitted "recovery on a showing of intent to inflict harm or even the culpably negligent infliction of harm, rather than intent to inflict harm through falsehood" (R. 1286-1287; 351 F. 2d at 723); it was the duty of the District Court to give effect to the supervening decision of this Court by granting the motion for new trial (R. 1291; 351 F. 2d at 725) and the defendant may not be "said to have waived by 'silence' a constitutional right not enunciated at the time" (R. 1287; 351 F. 2d at 724).

Apart from the constitutional deficiency of the criterion of malice embodied in the District Court's instruction to the jury, Judge Rives also concluded that the $400,000 punitive award was a deprivation of property without due process and a prior restraint forbidden by the First Amendment; and that the jury verdict of $3,000,000 so reflected passion and prejudice that it could not be cured by the remittitur consistently with the Seventh Amendment. These grounds, Judge Rives thought, were all properly presented in petitioner's attack upon the verdict and upon the District Court's denial of the motions for new trial (R. 1291-1298; 351 F. 2d at 726-729).

A petition for rehearing before the Court of Appeals en banc, filed under Fifth Circuit Rule 25(a), was denied by the same panel of the Court by the same divided vote, the majority and the minority reiterating their positions in further opinions (R. 1380-1393; 351 F. 2d at 733-739).

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT.

I.

The Court of Appeals was plainly wrong in holding that by failing to invoke the First Amendment at the trial petitioner had waived the right to challenge the standard of liability, applied by the District Court, under the supervening ruling of this Court in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan.

Ever since the early days of the Republic this Court has affirmed the duty of the courts of the United States to decide cases in accordance with the law prevailing at the time when they are called upon to render judgment, including, in the case of an appellate court, the time of the appellate judgment. That the rule governs when the change of law derives from a revised interpretation of the Constitution by this Court, except in the rare case where the revision is expressly given a more limited prospective operation, is not an open question, so long as the case is on direct review.

The judicial duty defined by these decisions is not qualified by a requirement that supervening change in law must have been anticipated by the litigant who claims its benefit at stages of the litigation prior to the time when it occurred. It is, moreover, immaterial in this connection that the decision of the court below was cast in terms of finding "waiver" by petitioner. If there was no duty to anticipate the ruling of this Court in New York Times there was no basis for finding a waiver in the failure to advance before the Times decision the constitutional grounds that were asserted in that pending case. A right is not "known" to exist if it is merely known to be asserted in another litigation.

Even if the absence of an anticipatory objection at the trial engendered a discretion to apply or disregard the supervening judgments of this Court, such discretion was abused by the decision to ignore the constitutional submission. For here the issue was presented in the District Court at the first reasonable opportunity following this Court's decision; the District Court decided it upon the merits, its ruling making clear that any earlier submission would have had no influence on the result; and only the unfounded ground of waiver was adduced to justify withholding an adjudication.

II.

The publication was protected by the First Amendment and entitled to the privilege established by the rule of New York Times.

A. Under the criteria laid down by this Court in Rosenblatt v. Baer, the plaintiff was a "public official" and the publication was concerned with his misconduct in performance of his duties.

Rosenblatt did not definitely hold that if the publication implying dishonesty in the financial management of the Belknap County Recreation Area could be found to make a reference to Baer, the constitutional privilege must necessarily apply. The disposition is, however, instinct with the affirmation that if Baer was, indeed, responsible for the financial management of the Area, the privilege would attach to statements that impugned his honesty or his efficiency in the performance of that task. No other conclusion is consistent with the general criteria embodied in the Court's opinion. It was not doubted that the operation of the publicly-owned Area involved the "conduct of governmental affairs" and could not have been doubted that if Baer's position involved "substantial responsibility" for its management, the public had "an independent interest" in his "qualifications and performance . . . beyond the general public interest in the qualifications and performance of all government employees."

If actual or apparent responsibility for the management of a public recreation area suffices to accord the privilege to charges of malfeasance in performance of that function, there can be no basis for a contrary result when the responsibility to which the charge relates entails the management of the program of athletics of a University established, maintained, and supported by the State. In the one case no less than in the other, the privilege is necessarily to protect the freedom of the press to criticize the way in which an important public trust has been discharged, a freedom that the First Amendment surely was designed to make secure.

It is immaterial in this connection that the respondent was not employed as Athletic Director by the Board of Regents of the University System but rather by the Athletic Association of the University, a separate corporate entity composed of a Board of faculty members and alumni, which a statute declares "not to be" an agency of the State and the accounts of which are exempted from State audit. These statutory provisions have no greater import than the State definitions of the term "public official" that were held to be irrelevant in Rosenblatt. What is decisive is that the Athletic Association is an organ of the management and government of the University. Its status as a separate corporation is wholly unrelated to the purpose of the First Amendment and the privilege defined by New York Times.

B. The public interest in the quality and the integrity of the respondent's conduct as Director of Athletics does not derive only from the fact that Georgia is a State University, decisive as that fact is to accord the privilege of New York Times to statements critical of his discharge of his official duties. The integrity of college football is a matter about which the public has important and legitimate concern, whoever the participants, because it is a phase of higher education. This public interest in the subject matter of the publication suffices, we contend, to gain it the protection of the First Amendment and the privilege prescribed by New York Times.

The qualified privilege of New York Times embodies an accommodation of the conflicting interests in protecting reputation and protecting freedom of expression. Its principle is similar to that which elsewhere has been deemed to be essential to sustain a curb on speech or publication, assimilating the criteria of libel law in this respect to those demanded by the Constitution in related fields. We see no reason why this same accommodation should not govern liability for statements that reflect on non-official persons, if the same conflicting interests are involved.

In a society in which the relationship between government and private enterprise assumes as many diverse forms as in our own, including the magnitude of private power and the extent of public subsidy, the freedom that the Constitution deems most vital for correction of abuses ought not to be circumscribed by artificial lines.

III.

The respondent's argument that "actual malice within New York Times was conclusively proven" is both legally immaterial and wholly unsupported by the record.

The argument is legally immaterial because the District Court's instructions to the jury did not call on it to make a finding that comports with the requirements of Times. The charge, precisely like those held erroneous in Times and later decisions, allowed "recovery on a showing of intent to inflict harm, rather than intent to inflict harm through falsehood" or, even short of this, a merely "negligent misstatement". The grounds for reversal in the previous decisions are accordingly presented here.

Nor is there support for the contention that knowledge of falsity or reckless disregard was "conclusively proven" at the trial. Such an assertion is entirely inconsistent with the trial court's ruling that there was a jury question on defendant's plea of truth despite the burden of persuasion placed on the defendant and its statement in the charge that there "has been a sharp conflict in the testimony in this case." The defendant's evidence of truth was, apart from small detail, included in the evidence that led the publisher to think the story true when it was published.

If this Court should undertake to make its own appraisal of the record, we contend that far from the conclusive proof to which respondent has referred, it lacks entirely "the convincing clarity which the constitutional standard demands." We think the evidence makes clear that this was an entirely honest publication, reflecting the conviction of the agents of the Post that Burnett was a credible informant, whose story was sufficiently confirmed to be believed.

IV.

Whether or not the rule of liability applied in the District Court is consistent with the First Amendment, the verdict and the judgment are repugnant to the Constitution.

The jury verdict of $3,000,000 punitive damages for a publication causing "actual damages", including mental anguish and humiliation, assessed at $60,000, was not only "grossly excessive", as the District Court found; it contravened the First Amendment and entailed a deprivation of due process.

Even though a measure burdening the freedom of expression serves a valid end, it must be tested by "close analysis and critical judgment" (Speiser v. Randall, 357 U. S. 513, 520 [1958]) and "viewed in the light of less drastic means for achieving the same basic purpose." Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U. S. 479, 488 (1960). Apart from the protection of the First Amendment, this Court has held that a penalty or money judgment deprives of property without due process if it is "so extravagant in amount as to outrun the bounds of reason and result in sheer oppression." Life & Casualty Co. v. McCray, 291 U. S. 566, 571 (1934). It takes no argument to show that the $3,000,000 verdict "unduly" infringed the "protected freedom" and inflicted "sheer oppression". The verdict supplies what Mr. Justice Black concurring in New York Times called "dramatic proof" . . . that state libel laws threaten the very existence of an American press virile enough to publish unpopular views on public affairs . . ." (376 U. S. at 294). The only way that threat can be removed is to hold that a punitive award must be shaped by such objective factors as the fine imposable upon conviction of criminal libel, the reasonable costs of litigation or, at most, a modest multiple of the actual damages sustained. This verdict did not comport with these or any other rational criteria and thus was tainted by a violation of the Constitution.

If the verdict was unconstitutional it was not saved by the remittitur required by the District Court. It is well established that a verdict based upon the jury's prejudice cannot be cured. A verdict violative of the Constitution is no less incurably defective. The vice of such a verdict is shown plainly in this case, since its magnitude exerted a substantial influence upon the Court's determination that the maximum sum that "should have been awarded . . . should be $400,000."

Even if the judgment must be tested by the District Court's award, without regard to the invalid verdict of the jury, the punishment imposed is repugnant to the Constitution. The District Court employed no standard other than its search for the highest punitive award that an appellate court had thus far sustained and, finding that statistic, more than doubled the top figure that it found. It neither sought nor used any objective standard in the measurement of the amount. Deeming the publication unprotected by the First Amendment, the Court took no account of the effect of the award, and of the threat of like awards in other cases, on the freedom the Amendment guarantees. The assessment was, therefore, entirely arbitrary and unprincipled and offensive to the Constitution on that ground. The offense was compounded by the size of the award which, as this Court said of the jury verdict in New York Times, creates "an atmosphere in which the First Amendment freedoms cannot survive" (376 U. S. at 278).

ARGUMENT.

I.

The Constitutional Limitations Enunciated by This Court in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan and Subsequent Decisions Govern the Review of a Verdict and Judgment Rendered Prior to the New York Times Decision, Although the First Amendment Was Not Invoked at the Trial.

The Court of Appeals held that by failing to invoke the First Amendment at the trial petitioner had waived the right to challenge the standard of liability applied by the District Court under the supervening ruling of this Court in New York Times. Its decision on this point was plainly wrong.

Ever since the early days of the Republic this Court has affirmed the duty of the courts of the United States to decide cases in accordance with the law prevailing at the time when they are called upon to render judgment, including, in the case of an appellate court, the time of the appellate judgment. United States v. Schooner Peggy, 1 Cranch 103 (1801). The doctrine applies to "nisi prius and appellate tribunals alike" (Vandenbark v. Owens-Illinois Glass Co., 311 U. S. 538, 543 [1941]) and has been reaffirmed repeatedly upon a supervening change in the law governing the cause, whether the change was worked by treaty, as in Schooner Peggy, by constitutional amendment, as in United States v. Chambers, 291 U. S. 217 (1934); Massey v. United States, 291 U. S. 608 (1934), by the repeal or the enactment of a statute, as in United States v. Tynen, 11 Wall. 88 (1870); United States v. Alabama, 362 U. S. 602 (1960); Hamm v. Rock Hill, 379 U. S. 306 (1964), by a novel interpretation of a statute, as in Hormel v. Helvering, 312 U. S. 552 (1941); Helvering v. Richter, 312 U. S. 561 (1941); Uebersee Finanz-Korp. v. McGrath, 343 U. S. 205, 212-213 (1952) or by a judicial alteration of a rule of common law (Vandenbark v. Owens-Illinois Glass Co., supra). That the rule governs when the change in law derives from a revised interpretation of the Constitution by this Court, except in the rare case where the revision is expressly given a more limited prospective operation (Johnson v. New Jersey, 384 U. S. 719 [1966]), assuredly is not an open question. O'Connor v. Ohio, — U. S. —, 87 Sup. Ct. 252 (1966); Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U. S. 75 (1966); Tehan v. Shott, 382 U. S. 406, 409, n. 3 (1966); Linkletter v. Walker, 381 U. S. 618, 622-629 (1965); see also, e.g., Griffin v. California, 380 U. S. 609 (1965); White v. Maryland, 373 U. S. 59 (1963); Jackson v. Denno, 378 U. S. 368 (1964). Whether or not the change will be accorded retrospective operation on collateral attack upon a final judgment, it will, as this Court said in Linkletter "be given effect while a case is on direct review" (381 U. S. at 627).

The judicial duty thus defined by these decisions is not qualified by a requirement that supervening change in law must have been anticipated by the litigant who claims its benefit at stages of the litigation prior to the time when it occurred. Such a condition would be patently unthinkable in cases where the change is wrought by legislative action, since no ruling could be premised upon unenacted legislation. Cf. 149 Madison Avenue Corp. v. Asselta, 331 U. S. 795 (1947), modifying 331 U. S. 199 (1947); Alaska Juneau Gold Mining Co. v. Robertson, 331 U. S. 793 (1947); Bay Ridge Operating Co. v. Aaron, 334 U. S. 446, 477 (1948). The situation is no different when the change is brought about by a decision modifying the hitherto prevailing rule. Here, too, a lower court must make its rulings prior to the change under the law that is established at that time. A litigant wishing himself to challenge the previously authoritative rule may, to be sure, be asked to lay the groundwork of that challenge in the lower court, futile though his effort there may be. Cf. Yakus v. United States, 321 U. S. 414, 444-445 (1944). The higher court will thus obtain the benefit of ventilation of the issue in the court below before it must confront the novel question raised.[10] But neither this nor any other purpose of the legal system is subserved by insisting that a litigant anticipate a change he does not seek to bring about, under penalty of forfeiting its benefit if it should subsequently be ordained, while his case is still pending in the courts.

Even a State rule of procedure must be shown to serve a valid interest of the State judicial system if it is relied on to foreclose consideration of a federal contention. Henry v. Mississippi, 379 U. S. 443 (1965). A federal court can surely have no greater freedom to decree a forfeiture of constitutional protection on a ground that serves no useful purpose in administration of the law. Since the District Court, in ruling on petitioner's motion for new trial under Rule 60(b), held that the First Amendment as construed in New York Times did not protect the instant publication, it is clear that the anticipation of that issue at the trial by an objection to the charge would not in fact have served the slightest purpose.

That there was no anticipatory objection in O'Connor, Rosenblatt, Griffin, White, Helvering or Uebersee (supra, pp. 45-46) is, we submit, decisive of the proposition that it may not be required as a pre-condition to invoking supervening judgments of this Court.[11] It is, moreover, im-

10. Petitioner's motion for new trial, filed under Rule 60(b) promptly following the New York Times decision and before this judgment became final (cf. Polites v. United States, 364 U. S. 426, 433 [1960]), afforded the District Court an opportunity to rule on the effect of that decision prior to the Court of Appeals' review.

11. Accord, e.g., as to Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U. S. 643 (1961): United States ex rel. Carafas v. LaVallee, 334 F. 2d 331 (2d Cir. 1964), cert. denied, 381 U. S. 951 (1965); United States ex rel. West v. LaVallee, 335 F. 2d 230 (2d Cir. 1964); Dillon v. Peters, 341 F. 2d 337 (10th Cir. 1965); United States ex rel. Dalton v. Myers, 342 F. 2d 202 (3d Cir. 1965); People v. Loria, 10 N. Y. 2d 368 (1961); State v. Smith, 37 N. J. 481 (1962); Commonwealth ex rel. Ensor v. Cummings, 416 Pa. 510 (1965); cf. Commonwealth v. Jacobs, 345 Mass. 300 (1963); People v. Kitchens, 46 Cal. 2d 260, 262-263 (1956); as to Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U. S. 1 (1964) and material in this connection that the decision of the court below was cast in terms of finding "waiver" by petitioner. For the sole ground of "waiver" was the failure to advance in the trial court before this Court's decision in New York Times "the constitutional grounds asserted in Times" to the knowledge of one of petitioner's co-counsel (R. 1259-1264, 1380-1386; 351 F. 2d at 709-711, 713, 733-735). If, as we submit, there was no duty to anticipate the ruling of this Court in Times, there was no basis for the finding made. See, e.g., United States ex rel. Angelet v. Fay, 333 F. 2d 12, 16 (2d Cir. 1964), aff'd, 381 U. S. 654 (1965); United States ex rel. Durocher v. LaVallee, 330 F. 2d 303, 309-310 (2d Cir. 1964); Cf. England v. Louisiana State Board of Medical Examiners, 375 U. S. 411, 422 (1964); Aetna Insurance Co. v. Kennedy, 301 U. S. 389, 393 (1937). The reference to a "known right or privilege" in Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U. S. 458, 464 (1938) and Fay v. Noia, 372 U. S. 391, 439 (1963) envisages, of course, a right known to exist, not one merely asserted in another litigation. Indeed, the Circuit Court's concern with "waiver" added to the forfeiture that it decreed the spectacle of an inquiry into the extent to which the various attorneys for petitioner were aware of the issues tendered in the pending suit against The New York Times. Far from supporting the determination of the Court, that "unseemly trial of Curtis' lawyers" (Rives, J., dissenting, R. 1392; 351 F. 2d at 739) adds further reason for its disapproval here.

That the New York Times decision broke new ground in holding that the First and Fourteenth Amendments impose limits on State libel law, as well as in its formulation

---

Griffin v. California, 380 U. S. 609 (1965); People v. Roberts, 63 Cal. 2d 84 (1965); State v. Lanzo, 44 N. J. 560 (1965); People v. McLucas, 15 N. Y. 2d 167 (1965); as to Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U. S. 478 (1964): People v. Hillery, 62 Cal. 2d 692 (1965); King v. State, — Del. —, 212 A. 2d 722 (1965); State v. Clifton, 240 Ore. 378 (1965). For other Court of Appeals decisions giving effect to supervening rulings not anticipated by an earlier submission, see, e.g., Sulzbacher v. Continental Casualty Co., 88 F. 2d 122 (8th Cir. 1937); Ruppert v. Ruppert, 134 F. 2d 497 (D. C. Cir. 1942); United States v. O'Connor, 237 F. 2d 466, 471 (2d Cir. 1965). See also Kuchinic v. McCrory, 422 Pa. 620 (1966).

of the nature of the limits they impose, is not a point we feel obliged to labor in this Court. See New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 268, 279, 283, 297, 299 (1964). The doubt on this score entertained by the majority of the court below (R. 1259-1260; 351 F. 2d at 709) hardly comports with that court's previous position. See, e.g., Abernathy v. Patterson, 295 F. 2d 452, 456 (5th Cir. 1961).

We also are content with a short answer to the argument of the respondent (Response to Petitioner's Supplemental Statement, pp. 3-6) that Johnson v. New Jersey, 384 U. S. 719 (1966), calls for limiting the application of the rule of New York Times to trials begun after the date of that decision. This Court has held the contrary in cases subsequent to Times, most recently in Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U. S. 75 (1966). It is, moreover, clear that Johnson was the product of the most exceptional considerations, namely, the justifiable reliance of law enforcement authorities on the earlier decisions of this Court and the "unjustifiable burden on the administration of justice" (384 U. S. at 733) involved in the reversal of all convictions obtained prior to Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U. S. 478 (1964), or Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U. S. 436 (1966), and still pending on appeal. No similar considerations are presented here.

For the foregoing reasons, we submit that the Court of Appeals was legally obliged to test this judgment in the light of this Court's rulings in the New York Times and subsequent decisions; and that its compatibility with those decisions is, accordingly, a question open for consideration here. But even if the absence of an anticipatory objection at the trial engendered a discretion to apply or disregard the supervening judgments of this Court "as may be just under the circumstances" (28 U. S. C. § 2106; see Hormel v. Helvering, 312 U. S. 552, 556-557 [1941]), we think it clear that such discretion was abused by the decision to ignore the constitutional submission. For here the issue was presented in the District Court at the first reasonable opportunity following this Court's decision in New York Times (cf. Herndon v. Georgia, 295 U. S. 441, 444 [1935]; Polites

v. United States, 364 U. S. 426 [1960]); the District Court decided it upon the merits, its ruling making clear that any earlier submission would have had no influence on the result;[12] and only the unfounded ground of waiver was ad-

12. The Court of Appeals regarded as "persuasive" the respondent's suggestion that petitioner pleaded truth as a defense "rather than" raise a constitutional defense or invoke the privilege provisions of the Georgia Code (§ 105-709) "in order to get the right to open and close the arguments" (R. 1385-1386; 351 F. 2d at 735).

The right to open and close was, however, a concomitant of the burden of proof which Georgia law placed on the defendant if the plea of truth was made (R. 34; GA. CODE ANN. § 105-1801). There is no support whatever for the view that if that plea had been coupled with additional affirmative defenses, the burden would have shifted to the plaintiff under Georgia law. Moreover, if the defendant had advanced a constitutional defense, either separately or in conjunction with the plea, it presumably would have been stricken upon motion under Rule 12(f).

If the respondent meant by his suggestion that a plea of truth could not be coupled with affirmative defenses, so that defendant was required to elect between them, it is clear from Rules 8(e) and 12(b) that he is wrong. Indeed, if he were right, and the defendant had to choose between a plea that it thought valid and an as yet unestablished federal defense, its choice to rely upon the plea would not establish waiver of the federal protection. Cf. Fay v. Noia, 372 U. S. 391, 439 (1963); Green v. United States, 355 U. S. 184, 192-194 (1957); England v. Louisiana State Board of Medical Examiners, 375 U. S. 411, 422 (1964); Whitus v. Balkcom, 333 F. 2d 496 (5th Cir. 1964).

It is true that GA. CODE ANN. § 105-709 provides that "Comments upon the acts of public men in their public capacity and with reference thereto" are "deemed privileged communications," unless "the privilege is used merely as a cloak for venting private malice, and not bona fide in promotion of the object for which the privilege is granted" (GA. CODE ANN. § 105-710). As in most states, however, the privilege does not protect a publication "if untrue and libelous"; the statements made must be "supported by the facts." Barwick v. Wind, 203 Ga. 827, 831 (1948); Kirkland v. Constitution Publishing Co., 38 Ga. App. 632 (1928), aff'd by equally divided court, 169 Ga. 264 (1929); Lowe v. News Publishing Co., 9 Ga. App. 103 (1911); see Noel, Defamation of Public Officers and Candidates, 49 COLUM. L. REV. 875, 896, n. 102 (1949). Here, as in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, claiming the statutory privilege would have added nothing to the plea of truth. Cf. 376 U. S. at 267, 278-280. The test of "malice" under § 105-710 is, moreover, different from the New York Times standard.

duced to justify withholding an adjudication. Even after a plea of nolo contendere, this Court has been astute to grant an opportunity to a defendant to present a possible defense established by a subsequent decision. United Brotherhood of Carpenters v. United States, 330 U. S. 395, 411-412 (1947); cf. United States v. Ohio Power Co., 353 U. S. 98 (1957); Murphy v. Waterfront Commission, 378 U. S. 52 (1964); Gondeck v. Pan American World Airways, Inc., 382 U. S. 25 (1965). No less solicitude is due to a defendant who has not confessed to judgment, when enormous punishment has been imposed and the supervening ruling goes to First Amendment rights.

II.

The Publication Was Protected by the First Amendment and Entitled to the Privilege Established by the Rule of New York Times.

The District Court in ruling on the motion for new trial under Rule 60(b) held that the publication here in suit was not protected by the ruling of this Court in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan because the respondent was not a "public official" within the meaning of the rule this Court laid down. The only other judge who passed upon the issue, Judges Rives dissenting in the court below, squarely rejected this conclusion. We submit that the principle of New York Times applies and that the publication was entitled to the privilege defined by that decision.

A. The Plaintiff Was a "Public Official" Under the Criteria Established by This Court in Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U. S. 75 (1966).

In Rosenblatt, the plaintiff, who had been employed by County Commissioners as Supervisor of the Belknap County Recreation Area, a public recreation facility operated by the County principally as a ski resort, obtained a judgment of $31,500, based upon a publication held to libel him by impugning the honesty of those in charge of the financial operation of the Area during the period of his incumbency. The judgment was reversed by this Court on two grounds: first, that the instructions of the New Hampshire trial court contravened the First Amendment in permitting the jury "to find liability merely on the basis of" the plaintiff's "relationship to the government agency, the operations of which were the subject of discussion" and "without regard to evidence that the asserted implication of the column was made specifically of and concerning him" (383 U. S. at 82); and, second, that the plaintiff as Supervisor of the Area "may have held" a position as a "public official" (383 U. S. at 87) within the meaning of the New York Times rule, and thus be barred from a recovery for defamation by a publication critical of his performance of his duties, without proof of malice as defined by Times. Though the first ground of reversal is irrelevant, the second is decisive of this cause.

First: We recognize that Rosenblatt did not definitively hold that if the publication implying dishonesty in the financial management of the Area could be found to make a reference to Baer, the privilege of New York Times must necessarily apply. What the opinion states explicitly is that Baer's theory "that his role in the management of the Area was so prominent and important that the public regarded him as the man responsible for its operations"—the theory advanced at the trial to establish that the article referred to him—"at the least, raises a substantial argument that he was a 'public official' " within the limitations of the rule of New York Times (383 U. S. at 87). How substantial that argument was thought to be is indicated, in our view, by the Court's statement that one of the reasons for not foreclosing Baer from "attempting retrial of his action" was that the record, made before the New York Times decision, left "open the possibility that respondent could have [emphasis supplied] adduced proofs to bring his claim outside the New York Times rule" (383 U. S. at 87-88). The "proofs" referred to must, we think, envisage evidence showing that the scope of Baer's responsibility was less extensive than he sought to show at the first trial. The disposition is, therefore, instinct with affirmation that if Baer was, indeed, responsible for the management of the Ski Area criticized by the publication, the privilege would attach to statements that impugned his honesty or his efficiency in the performance of that task.

No other conclusion appears to us to be consistent with the general criteria embodied in the Court's opinion, namely, that "the 'public official' designation applies at the very least to those among the hierarchy of government employees who have, or appear to the public to have, substantial responsibility for or control over the conduct of governmental affairs" (383 U. S. at 85); and that where "a position in government has such apparent importance that the public has an independent interest in the qualifications and performance of the person who holds it, beyond the general public interest in the qualifications and performance of all government employees" (383 U. S. at 86), malice in the New York Times sense must be proved. It was not doubted that the operation of the publicly-owned Ski Area involved the "conduct of governmental affairs" and could not have been doubted that if Baer's position involved "substantial responsibility" for the management of the Area, the public had "an independent interest" in his "qualifications and performance . . . beyond the general public interest in the qualifications and performance of all government employees." Such reservation as there was in the Court's ruling must, therefore, we submit, be understood as a reflection of uncertainty as to whether and how far Baer was in fact involved in those aspects of the management of the Area that were attacked by the challenged publication, not as a legal doubt that if he was responsibly involved, he must prove malice to recover.

On this analysis, the Rosenblatt decision plainly governs disposition of this cause. Here, as in Rosenblatt, the official status of the plaintiff was not litigated as such at the trial. But there was no dispute, and could have been none, that as Athletic Director respondent had, in his own words, "responsibility for . . . general supervision of the entire athletic program at the University of Georgia" (R. 492), including the "big business" (R. 492) of college football. See p. 36, supra. If actual or apparent responsibility for the management of a public recreation area suffices to accord the privilege to charges of malfeasance in performance of that function, there can be no basis for a contrary result when the responsibility to which the charge relates entails the management of the program of athletics of a University established, maintained and supported by the State. There surely is no smaller or no less legitimate a public interest in the conduct of athletics as an aspect of a State-conducted public education program than in the use of public land and facilities for purposes of recreation. The "scope of the privilege is to be determined," as the Court said in Rosenblatt, "by reference to the functions it serves" (383 U. S. at 85, n.). In the one case no less than in the other, the privilege is necessary to protect the freedom of the press to criticize the way in which an important public trust has been discharged, a freedom that the First Amendment surely was designed to make secure.

Second: Respondent's answer to the patent parallel between this case and Rosenblatt is that he was not employed as Athletic Director by the Board of Regents of the University System, the governing body of the University (Ga. Const. Sec. IV, par. I; Ga. Code Ann. §§ 32-101, -104, -112, -113), but rather by the Athletic Association of the University, a separate corporate entity composed of a Board of faculty members and alumni (see p. 35, supra), which a statute of 1949 declares "not to be" an agency of the State and the accounts of which the statute exempts from the State audit required "in connection with the financial operations of State agencies" (GA. CODE ANN. §§ 32-153, -154). The Athletic Association, it is urged, "was thus not an arm of government" and the respondent as its employee could not "be engaged in government while performing its functions" (Further Response, p. 4).

We submit that the distinction is without significance for purposes of measuring the ambit of the privilege established by the principle of New York Times. The statutory declaration that the Athletic Associations of the State Universities are "not to be agencies of the State" can obviously have no greater import in determining how far freedom to criticize their operations or the operations of their managerial employees is protected by the First Amendment than the State definitions of the term "public official" that were held to be irrelevant in Rosenblatt v. Baer. The one denomination no less than the other was developed "for local administrative purposes, not the purposes of a national constitutional protection," with the result that it is "at best accidental" if the State-law standard should "reflect the purposes of New York Times" (383 U. S. at 84).

That this State terminology is wholly unrelated to the purpose of the privilege is very clear. The fact that the Athletic Association or, as it is often called, Athletic Board (e.g., R. 189, 807, 823), is exempted from State-imposed procedures governing expenditures, contracting and accounting (e.g., GA. CODE ANN. §§ 40-1805, -1808, -1902, -1906.1, -2001; see R. 875-876) does not detract from the fact that its sole function is to play a part in the management and government of the State University, subject to the ultimate responsibility and control of the President, the Chancellor and the Board of Regents (R. 189, 823, 832). The athletic program, the administration of which was governed by the Board, was the program of the University. The position of Director of Athletics, though the incumbent was chosen and paid in major part (see p. 36, supra) by the Association, was that of Director of Athletics of the University of Georgia.

The role of the Association as an organ of administration of the University has not, indeed, significantly changed since the Board of Regents and the State contended in this Court that "public education is a governmental function" and that "the holding of athletic contests is an integral part of the program of public education conducted by Georgia." Allen v. Regents of the University System, 304 U. S. 439, 449 (1938). The President of the University is Chairman of the Association and of its Executive Committee (R. 823, 832). The Comptroller and Treasurer of the University is Treasurer of the Association (R. 189, 868). A majority of the members of the Board are members of the faculty, as required by the Southeastern Athletic Conference,[13] to which Georgia belongs, and they are chosen by the President (R. 189, 595, 769, 808, 874-875). In short, nothing distinguishes the Athletic Association from any other entity responsible for the administration of the programs of the University except that it has a larger measure of financial autonomy and that there is a minority participation of alumni. To accord these differentia constitutional significance would trivialize the principle of New York Times. The considerations that preclude a State from avoiding the limitations of the Fourteenth Amendment by the delegation of its public functions are, we believe, even more plainly applicable here. Cf. Burton v. Wilmington

---

13. This requirement tends to comply with the first recommendation of the Report of the Special Committee on Athletic Policy of the American Council on Education, approved by the Executive Committee of the Council in 1952, that as "in all other educational activities, the control of athletics should be held absolutely and completely by those responsible for the administration and operation of the institution." See Council Action on Athletic Policy, THE EDUCATIONAL RECORD, vol. xxxiii, pp. 246, 249 (1952). A study by the Carnegie Foundation, published in 1929, listed Georgia as an institution in which "genuine faculty control" of the regulation of college athletics had been found. SAVAGE, AMERICAN COLLEGE ATHLETICS, p. 101 (Carnegie Bulletin No. 23).

Parking Authority, 365 U. S. 715 (1961); Evans v. Newton, 382 U. S. 296 (1966).

Third: In his original response to the petition for a writ of certiorari, respondent sought to draw strength from this Court's decision in the Allen case that State immunity to federal taxation did not extend to gate receipts for public admission to athletic contests of the University, since the exhibition of such contests is "a business having the incidents of similar enterprises usually prosecuted for private gain" (304 U. S. at 452). Response, p. 24. The District Court accorded weight to this submission in denying the petitioner's motion for new trial (R. 1124).

It is enough to point to Rosenblatt to answer this contention. The conduct of a public recreation area, charging admission fees, also involves a "business comparable in all essentials to those usually conducted by private owners" (304 U. S. at 451), yet no importance was attributed to that fact in considering if New York Times applied. The reason is entirely obvious. The fact that government undertakes enterprise similar to that in which non-governmental entities engage does not diminish, and at times may well enhance, the need for freedom of discussion of the way in which the public enterprise is run and of the honesty or the efficiency of those who have it in their charge. The policies that govern the extent of governmental tax immunity have no relationship at all to those that measure the extent of the protection conferred by the First Amendment.

Fourth: There is no greater merit in other distinctions the respondent seeks to draw between this case and Rosenblatt.

The suggestion (Further Response, p. 5) that there was no issue as to Butts' performance of his duties as Athletic Director prior to the instant publication is not true [14] and,

14. Burnett reported his story to the University authorities before he disclosed it to petitioner and it was being investigated by, inter alia, the President of the University, a member of the Georgia even if it were, would be irrelevant. What is decisive is the scope of his responsibility for supervising the entire athletic program of the University. If his position was "one which would invite public scrutiny and discussion of the person holding it" (383 U. S. at 87, n.), as we submit it plainly was, the privilege must necessarily apply to the first published criticism of his official conduct, no less than to the later publication of a criticism previously made.

Nor is there force in the submission that the criticism here involved "did not relate to his conduct of his duties as Athletic Director" (Further Response, pp. 6-7) because the Football Coach, not the Director, was responsible for formulating the team's plan and strategy. It was because he was Director that respondent had access to the team's secret practice sessions (see R. 297; p. 24, supra). It was as Director that he was responsible for scheduling the game with Alabama (p. 36, supra) and, perforce, for safeguarding its full integrity as a scholastic competition. It might as well have been contended in Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64 (1964), that the defendant's insinuations that the judges were subject to "racketeer influences" (379 U. S. at 66) did not relate to their official conduct since they were not authorized by their commissions to pervert the course of justice.

Fifth: It may be asked if our contention, that respondent as Director of Athletics was a public official for the purpose of the rule of New York Times, implies that every member of the faculty of a State University is in the same position. We do not blink the possibility that this may be the right conclusion, since, as we contend below, we think the privilege ought to apply to any statement challenged as a defamation if the First Amendment protects freedom of expression on the subject matter of the statement. See pp. 63-65, infra. On the other hand, we think it sound to point to possible distinctions that would justify reserving resolution of that issue in this case. For one thing, a member of the faculty is not as such charged with a supervisory or managerial responsibility to which the criteria laid down in Rosenblatt would easily apply. But more than this, freedom of teaching, research and scholarship is itself protected by the First Amendment. See Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U. S. 234, 250-251, 261-263 (1957). To the extent that a defamatory statement jeopardizes academic freedom in conducting such activity, it may be thought that liability unqualified by privilege pro tanto safeguards "values nurtured by the First and Fourteenth Amendments" and may thus avoid the "thrust of New York Times" (383 U. S. at 86). That proposition must be weighed against the argument per contra that the accommodation that resolves the "tension" (383 U. S. at 86) between First Amendment values and the social interest in protecting reputation is no less appropriate in dealing, in addition, with conflicting interests in the freedom of expression.

---

Athletic Association, the Chancellor of the University System, the Chairman of the Board of Regents of the University System, the Commissioner of the Southeastern Athletic Conference and the President of the University of Alabama. See pp. 19-24, supra.

We submit that a less subtle problem is presented by this case. The respondent was responsible for supervision of the University's athletic program. Neither that program nor its supervision involves modes of self-expression comprehended in the freedom that the First Amendment guarantees. But since the management of a State University is plainly a governmental enterprise, criticism of the operation of the program of athletics or of the quality or the integrity of its direction "is at the very center of the constitutionally protected area of free discussion" (383 U. S. at 85). The social "interest in preventing and redressing attacks upon reputation" must, accordingly, yield place to the "values nurtured by the First and Fourteenth Amendments" (383 U. S. at 86) to the extent required by the privilege of New York Times.

B. The Public Interest in the Subject Matter of the Publication Requires That the Privilege Apply.

The public interest in the quality and the integrity of the respondent's conduct as Director of Athletics does not derive only from the fact that Georgia is a State University, decisive as that fact is to accord the privilege of New York Times to statements critical of his discharge of his official duties. The integrity of college football is a matter about which the public has important and legitimate concern, whoever the participants, because it is a phase of higher education. This public interest in the subject matter of the publication suffices, we contend, to gain it the protection of the First Amendment and the privilege prescribed by New York Times.

First: "Criticism of government is at the very center of the constitutionally protected area of free discussion" (383 U. S. at 85) but it assuredly is clear that this is not the only subject on which freedom of expression is protected by the First Amendment. Cf., e.g., Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U. S. 88 (1940); Thomas v. Collins, 323 U. S. 516 (1945); Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Virginia, 377 U. S. 1 (1964); Kingsley International Pictures Corp. v. Regents, 360 U. S. 684 (1959); Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U. S. 184 (1964). It was, indeed, said by the Court in New York Times, and repeated in the subsequent decisions, that our "profound national commitment" is to "the principle that debate on public issues [emphasis supplied] should be uninhibited, robust and wide-open . . ." (376 U. S. at 270). We think that "public issues" must include, at the least, any subject of discussion as to which the public has important and legitimate concern.[15]

15. This has been the almost universal view of commentators on the New York Times decision. See, e.g., Kalven, The New York Times Case: A Note on the "Central Meaning of the First Amendment," 1964 SUP. CT. REV. 191, 221; Pedrick, Freedom of the Press and the Law of Libel: The Modern Revised Translation, 49 CORNELL L. Q. 581, 591-595 (1964); Bertelsman, Libel and Public Men, 52

Second: That this publication was addressed to a public issue, in the sense defined above, is wholly clear.

James Bryant Conant is not alone in the belief that the "strength of this republic is . . . intimately connected with the success or failure of our system of public education." EDUCATION IN A DIVIDED WORLD (1948) p. 1. As President Kennedy stated in his Special Message to the Congress proposing the measure that became the Higher Education Facilities Act of 1963 (77 Stat. 363), "from every point of view, education is of paramount concern to the national interest as well as to each individual." PUBLIC PAPERS OF THE PRESIDENTS OF THE UNITED STATES, 1963, p. 106. Because of the magnitude of that concern, Congress, as President Kennedy put it in an earlier message (id., 1962, p. 111), "has repeatedly recognized its responsibility to strengthen our educational system without weakening local responsibility," citing enactments reaching back to the Northwest Ordinance of 1787 and the Morrill Act of 1862.

To affirm public concern in education is, of course, to affirm such concern in all the problems it confronts, which never were of greater moment than they are in our time.

A. B. A. J. 657, 661 (1966); Note, The Scope of First Amendment Protection for Good-Faith Defamatory Error, 75 YALE L. J. 642, 645 (1966); Comment, Defamation of Public Officials—Free Speech and the New Constitutional Standard, 12 U. C. L. A. L. REV. 1420, 1446-1447 (1965). But cf. Note, New York Times Co. v. Sullivan—The Scope of a Privilege, 51 VA. L. REV. 106, 114 (1965).

Viewed in these terms, the First Amendment would be taken to incorporate the common law privilege of fair comment, as applied in those States which do not accept the limitation that statements of fact must be proved true. Cf. Coleman v. MacLennan, 78 Kan. 711, 723 (1908) (quoted in New York Times, 376 U. S. at 281-282): "This privilege extends to a great variety of subjects, and includes matters of public concern, public men, and candidates for office." See also, e.g., PROSSER, TORTS § 110 (3d ed. 1964); RESTATEMENT OF TORTS § 606 et seq. (1938); Hoeppner v. Dunkirk Printing Co., 254 N. Y. 95 (1930) (criticism of high school football coach). The scope and limits of the common law privilege are ably discussed by Judge Leventhal in Afro-American Publishing Co. v. Jaffe, 366 F. 2d 649 (D. C. Cir. 1966).

The maintenance of the integrity of the athletic programs of the colleges and universities that engage in intercollegiate competition does not pose the largest issue in the field of higher education but it has presented an important problem through the years. Its importance is attested by the Report of the Special Committee on Athletic Policy of the American Council on Education, composed of eleven Presidents or Chancellors under the chairmanship of John A. Hannah of Michigan State, which was unanimously approved by the Executive Committee of the Council in 1952. The Report (Council Action on Athletic Policy, THE EDUCATIONAL RECORD, vol. xxxiii, pp. 246-255) states, inter alia:

> American colleges and universities engage in intercollegiate athletics because of a deep conviction that when properly administered they make an important contribution to the total educational services of the institution. There is an increasingly widespread awareness, however, that athletics may become so severely infected with proselyting, subterfuge, and distorted purpose as to more than neutralize the benefits. Certainly the abuses and suspicion of abuse now associated with the conduct of intercollegiate athletics foster moral apathy and cynicism in our students—those young men and women who increasingly share responsibility for this country's strength and freedom.
>
> The urgency of the problem is even more apparent in the context of current external and internal threats to our society. In the last analysis, the strength of our free society depends not only upon armaments but also upon the integrity of our institutions and our people.
>
> This committee, after consulting competent authorities, has reluctantly reached the conclusion that in intercollegiate athletics as now conducted, despite the adherence by many institutions to the highest standards, serious violations not only of sound educational policies but also of good moral conduct are not in fact uncommon. Wherever these exist, they can only be injurious to athletics, to our schools and colleges, and especially to our youth.

The present situation has been brought about by external pressures and internal weaknesses evident during a considerable period. The rewards in money and publicity held out to winning teams, particularly in football and basketball, and the desire of alumni, civic bodies, and other groups to see the institutions in which they are interested reap such rewards, have had a powerful influence on many colleges and universities. The influence has been magnified when control of athletic policy has been permitted to slip from the hands of the faculty and central administration.[16]

Third: If, as we contend, the First Amendment protects freedom of discussion of the subject of the publication, we submit that the privilege of New York Times should be determined to apply.

In New York Times this Court held that a "defense for erroneous statements honestly made" is constitutionally required because allowance of the defense of truth alone "with the burden of proving it on the defendant, does not mean that only false speech will be deterred." "Under such a rule," as the Court said, "would-be critics of official conduct may be deterred from voicing their criticism, even though it is believed to be true and even though it is in fact true, because of doubt whether it can be proved in court or fear of the expense of having to do so" (376 U. S. at 278-279). The critic of non-governmental action obviously faces the same problem, leading to "self-censorship" no less severe if he must "guarantee the truth of all his factual assertions" and "do so on pain of libel judgments virtually unlimited in amount" (376 U. S. at 279). In the latter case, no less than in the former, if the criticism is protected by the First Amendment, the burden upon speech or publication must be taken to abridge the freedom the Amendment guarantees.

16. Cf. SAVAGE, op. cit. supra note 13, p. 32: "Whatever the reason, it is certain that the seriousness with which college athletics are nowadays taken has driven certain well-recognized abuses under cover, but at the same time has propagated and intensified them." See also, e.g., MILLER, THE TRUTH ABOUT BIG TIME FOOTBALL (1953) passim; Guthrie, No More Football for Us!, SAT. EV. POST, Oct. 13, 1951, p. 24.

A contrary result would involve holding, in effect, that freedom to criticize non-governmental action is protected by the Constitution only if the statements made can be proved to the satisfaction of a jury to be true. We submit that the Framers of the First Amendment were too well aware of the vicissitudes of jury action to attribute to them any such attenuated safeguard of the freedom they sought to secure.

This submission does not deny that, as the Court observed in Rosenblatt (383 U. S. at 86), society "has a pervasive and strong interest in preventing and redressing attacks upon reputation." It recognizes, rather, that the qualified privilege of New York Times itself embodies an accommodation of the conflicting interests in protecting reputation and protecting freedom of expression. The principle of the accommodation, limiting liability to utterances proved to be knowingly or recklessly false, is similar to that which elsewhere has been deemed essential to sustain a curb on speech or publication (e.g., Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494, 516 [1951]; Smith v. California, 361 U. S. 147 [1959]; cf. Wieman v. Updegraff, 344 U. S. 183 [1952]; Speiser v. Randall, 357 U. S. 513 [1958]), assimilating the criteria of libel law in this respect to those demanded by the Constitution in related fields. See New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. at 278-279. We see no reason why this same accommodation should not govern liability for statements that reflect on non-official persons, if the same conflicting interests are involved. It would be strange, indeed, if limitations that this Court has found appropriate to protect the congressional policy "to encourage free debate on issues dividing labor and management" (Linn v. United Plant Guard Workers, 383 U. S. 53, 62 [1966]) were not applied with equal vigor to protect the First Amendment policy of freedom of expression.

In a society in which the relationship between government and private enterprise assumes as many diverse forms as in our own, including the magnitude of private power and the extent of public subsidy, the freedom that the Constitution deems most vital for correction of abuses ought not to be circumscribed by artificial lines.

III.

Respondent's Argument That "Actual Malice Within New York Times Was Conclusively Proven" Is Both Legally Immaterial and Wholly Unsupported by the Record.

In the effort to avoid review and reversal of this enormous judgment, respondent argues that malice in the sense of New York Times was "conclusively proven". Further Response, p. 7; Response, p. 26. The argument is legally immaterial and wholly unsupported by the record.

First: The argument is legally immaterial because, respondent notwithstanding (Response, p. 33; Further Response, p. 9), the instructions to the jury did not call on it to make a finding that comports with the requirements of New York Times.

As we have said above (p. 34), the District Court charged that "actual malice encompasses the notion of ill will, spite, hatred and an intent to injure one" and "also denotes a wanton or reckless indifference or culpable negligence with regard to the rights of others" (R. 1026). It is too plain for argument that this instruction does not condition the punitive award on finding that a false statement was made "with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not" (New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 280) or make clear that "only those false statements made with the high degree of awareness of their probable falsity demanded by New York Times" (Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64, 74 [1964]) may be the basis of recovery. The charge, precisely like those held erroneous in Times, Garrison, Henry v. Collins, 380 U. S. 356 (1965) and Rosenblatt (383 U. S. at 83-84), allowed "recovery on a showing of intent to inflict harm, rather than intent to inflict harm through falsehood"[17] (380 U. S. at 357) or even short of this, a merely "negligent misstatement" (383 U. S. at 84). The grounds for reversal in the previous decisions are, accordingly, presented here.

By the same token, it is wholly immaterial that the District Court gave as a ground for the denial of the motion for new trial that "there was ample evidence from which a jury could have concluded that there was a reckless disregard of whether the article was false or not" (R. 1124-1125). The simple and decisive fact is that the question was, at most, for the decision of the jury under an appropriate instruction. It was not decided by the jury since no issue was submitted in these terms.

Second: There is no support for the contention that knowledge of falsity or reckless disregard was "conclusively proven" at the trial.

We note in limine that this is an entirely paradoxical submission since the trial court's ruling that there was a jury question on defendant's plea of truth despite the burden of persuasion placed on the defendant (R. 354-359) and its statement in the charge that there "has been a sharp conflict in the testimony in this case" (R. 1029) apply a fortiori if the plaintiff must establish falsity and reckless disregard. Indeed, the syllogism is not only valid with respect to the issue of truth, as to which Times would shift the burden to the plaintiff. It is also valid on this record with respect to reckless disregard, since the defendant's evidence of truth was, apart from small detail, included in the evidence that led the publisher to think the story true when it was published. How the same evidence that would have justified a jury verdict that the statement was essentially the truth could fail to justify the publisher's conviction of its truth, the respondent as yet has not explained.

17. That petitioner was well aware that the publication threatened harm to the respondent was, of course, readily admitted (R. 715, 770).

It is, in short, entirely plain that on the record as evaluated by the District Court at the trial a jury correctly instructed as to the burden of proving falsity and the required proof of malice could have reasonably found for the defendant. Indeed, the record in this case yields a graphic demonstration of the difference in defending libel actions between the criterion of liability enunciated at the trial and that prescribed by New York Times. Extra-judicial statements of reliable informants are inadmissible to prove the truth of their assertions and the jury cannot find for the defendant on the plea of truth without convicting the plaintiff of the misconduct the publication charged. Moreover, on the issue of punitive damages, the decision as to whether "actual malice" has been proved is made on the assumption that the publication was false, since the defendant did not persuade the jury of its truth.

For the reasons stated we believe reversal is required whether or not the evidence would have sustained a jury finding that the publication was malicious; and that the Court is not, therefore, obliged to make its own appraisal of the record. But were the evidence to be considered, we should strongly urge that far from the conclusive proof to which respondent has referred, it lacks entirely "the convincing clarity which the constitutional standard demands" (New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. at 285-286).

As we show in detail in the Statement (pp. 28-32, supra), petitioner in publishing the article relied essentially on Burnett's sworn statement as to what he had overheard and a number of circumstances tending to corroborate his story. Those circumstances were ascertained in the course of the Post's investigation prior to the publication, an investigation conducted by Frank Graham, an experienced sports writer, who subsequently wrote the article, and Furman Bisher, a sports editor of The Atlanta Journal, who had independently called the attention of the Post to Burnett's charges.

Among the corroborating circumstances were the facts that Burnett before talking to the Post, and at a time when he had no motive to falisfy, had reluctantly reported his charges to Coach Griffith and consented to Griffith's laying them before the University authorities, who had promptly initiated an investigation; that Milton Flack, whom Burnett claimed to have told about the conversation on the day that it occurred, confirmed that he had done so; that Burnett had voluntarily submitted to a lie detector test requested by the University authorities and passed; that the records of the Southern Bell Telephone Company confirmed the fact that a call had been made by Butts to Bryant on September 13, 1962; that Burnett claimed to have taken notes while he listened to the conversation; that the notes had been seen by Flack and Griffith; that the notes, together with Burnett's charges, were believed by Coach Griffith to be sufficiently important to report them to the University authorities; that on the occasion when Burnett saw Griffith, Griffith indicated that he found the notes revealing and that he had a suspicion that someone had been giving information to Alabama; that when Butts was called before the University authorities he refused to take a lie detector test and the next day submitted his resignation as Director of Athletics; that the Georgia-Alabama game was a fiasco for Georgia; that Furman Bisher, purporting to have talked to people at the University, called Graham on March 1 and reported statements that he claimed were made by Georgia player Babb, Georgia trainer Richwine, and Coach Griffith, all of which tended to support the proposition that the Alabama team was familiar with Georgia's plays and formations; that two weeks before the Post issue went on sale, the completed story was sent to Bisher by Graham and Bisher made no comments or suggestions.

On the basis of this information Clay Blair, Jr., the Post's then editor-in-chief, and Davis Thomas, its managing editor, whose testimony the respondent took by deposition, swore that they were satisfied of the truth of the assertions in the publication.

Against the foregoing circumstances of corroboration, the respondent points to the fact that no representative of the Post saw Burnett's notes before the article was published, efforts to obtain them from the University authorities proving unavailing; that the Post knew that at a meeting with the University authorities on February 21, 1963, Burnett was confronted with the fact that he had been convicted and placed on probation on a charge of cashing two checks totalling $45 against insufficient funds (a dereliction the respondent's counsel charitably asserts established that he was known "as a bad-check artist" [Response, p. 27]); that the Post did not interview John Carmichael, Burnett's office associate, to whom Burnett claimed he had reported the Butts-Bryant conversation immediately after overhearing it on September 13 (a report very substantially confirmed by Carmichael in his testimony at the trial), because it was known that Carmichael had opposed Burnett's disclosure and would not be cooperative; that the Post did not review the film of the Alabama-Georgia game, though its sports editor wished to do so; that neither Butts nor Bryant was interviewed in the Post's investigation; that some of the quotations of statements of Georgia players and football staff, given Graham by Furman Bisher, were used without interviewing the quoted parties, who denied at the trial that they had made them; that the Post did not interview any coach or member of the Alabama team; that seven days before the publication date of the story, the respondent's counsel sent a telegram and letter to the Post stating without specification that the proposed content of the article was false; that during the week before the publication the respondent's daughter telephoned Clay Blair and tearfully requested him to forego publication; and, finally, that a demand for a retraction was presented and ignored.

We submit that this evidence affords no sufficient basis for concluding that petitioner's agents published the Graham article knowing that its essential statements were false or with a "high degree of awareness of their probable falsity." The important statements were derived in every instance from informants on whose truthfulness and accuracy the Post editors had reason to and did rely.

As another panel of the court below has recently observed in reversing a libel judgment, a "reporter, without a 'high degree of awareness of their probable falsity,' may rely on statements made by a single source even though they reflect only one side of the story without fear of libel prosecution by a public official." New York Times Co. v. Connor, 365 F. 2d 567, 576 (5th Cir. 1966). See also Washington Post Co. v. Keogh, 365 F. 2d 965 (D. C. Cir. 1966). It may be argued that the petitioner's investigation was in some respects inadequate. But even if the argument should be sustained, we think it clear that the inedequacy claimed may point to negligence but nothing more.

Respondent's statement that "Curtis was informed of the falsity of the story" by his counsel's telegram and letter and his daughter's phone call (Response, p. 26) is, we think, entirely disingenuous. If a denial unaccompanied by information or a mere appeal for sympathy suffices to defeat the privilege of New York Times, the great principle of that decision would be nullified at once in application. The opinion happily makes clear that it was not envisaged that such nullification should prevail (376 U. S. at 286-288).

It remains to add that the respondent drew great strength before the jury, and seeks to draw strength here, from statements by Clay Blair, Jr., the Post's editor-in-chief, that he wished to change the image of the Post, to "restore the crusading spirit, the sophisticated muckraking, the expose in mass magazines" and that "the final yardstick" of this policy was that "we have about six lawsuits pending, meaning that we are hitting them where it hurts, with solid, meaningful journalism." He also described the issue containing the publication here involved, as "a step in the right direction," adding that with this issue "we have gone twenty-five per cent toward the goal of the magazine I envision" (pp. 32-33, supra).

This is admittedly language that invites inflammatory misconstruction. Read in connection with the evidence we have detailed, we do not think that it permits a finding that petitioner embarked on a policy of grave indifference to the truth and that the instant publication was a product of such reckless disregard. The "high degree of awareness" of the "probable falsity" of challenged statements demanded by the rule of New York Times calls, in our submission, for a judgment based upon the sources of the publication and their actual impact on the minds of those responsible for the derogatory statements made. Judged in these terms, we think the evidence makes clear this was an entirely honest publication, reflecting the conviction of the agents of the Post that Burnett was a credible informant, whose story was sufficiently confirmed to be believed.

IV.

The Award of Punitive Damages Violates the First and Fifth Amendments.

Whether or not the rule of liability applied in the District Court is consistent with the First Amendment, the verdict and the judgment in this cause are repugnant to the Constitution.

First: The jury verdict of $3,000,000 punitive damages for a publication causing "actual damages," including mental anguish and humiliation (R. 1024), assessed at $60,000, was not only "grossly excessive", as the District Court has found; it contravened the First Amendment and entailed a deprivation of due process. These points were made against the verdict by the motion for new trial (R. 36-37) and were, therefore, plainly open on appeal from the judgment.

We concede arguendo that an award of damages imposed as a deterrent to the defendant and to others and "to protect the community" (R. 1026) is not per se invalid in a civil case, as this Court said long ago in Day v. Woodworth, 13 How. 363, 370-371 (1851).[18] When such an award is used, however, as a means of regulating publication, it is clear that "the power to regulate must be so exercised as not, in attaining a permissible end, unduly to infringe the protected freedom." Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U. S. 296, 304 (1940). For that reason, even though a measure burdening the freedom of expression serves a valid end, it must be tested by "close analysis and critical judgment" (Speiser v. Randall, 357 U. S. 513, 520 [1958]) and "viewed in the light of less drastic means for achieving the same basic purpose." Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U. S. 479, 488 (1960). See also, e.g., Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U. S. 233 (1936); N. A. A. C. P. v. Alabama,

18. The classic statement of the contrary position is by Justice Foster in Fay v. Parker, 53 N. H. 342 (1872). The nineteenth century debate upon the issue is fully indicated by GREENLEAF, EVIDENCE (Lewis ed. 1896) § 253, n. 2, p. 294 et seq.; THEODORE SEDGWICK, MEASURE OF DAMAGES (8th ed. 1891) § 348 et seq.; FIELD, DAMAGES (1876) § 72 et seq. It is ironical that such awards appear to go back to the actions based on the general warrants issued by the Earl of Halifax, where the defendants were officials who could not have been expected to "protect the community" against themselves. The cases are summarized in SAYER, THE LAW OF DAMAGES (1792) p. 218 et seq.

For a modern analysis, see Morris, Punitive Damages in Tort Cases, 44 HARV. L. REV. 1173 (1931).

357 U. S. 449 (1958); Smith v. California, 361 U. S. 147, 150-151 (1959); Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U. S. 516 (1960); Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U. S. 51 (1965). As Mr. Justice Brandeis said long ago: "A police measure may be unconstitutional merely because the remedy, although effective as means of protection, is unduly harsh or oppressive." Whitney v. California, 274 U. S. 357, 377 (1927) (concurring opinion). Indeed, quite apart from the protection of the First Amendment, this Court has held that a penalty or money judgment deprives of property without due process if it is "so extravagant in amount as to outrun the bounds of reason and result in sheer oppression." Life & Casualty Co. v. McCray, 291 U. S. 566, 571 (1934).

Since the First and Fifth Amendments apply to all the agencies of government (N. A. A. C. P. v. Alabama, 357 U. S. 449, 463 [1958]; Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U. S. 58, 68 [1963]), a jury verdict must be tested by these standards, no less than a judicial or administrative action or an act of legislation.

So tested, we believe it clear that the $3,000,000 verdict, representing 65 per cent of the defendant's retained earnings (Pl. Ex. No. 22, R. 1053, 1054), was in violation of the Constitution. The verdict plainly was designed to put defendant out of business and was thus, as Judge Rives said below (R. 1296; 351 F. 2d at 728), equivalent to a prior restraint. Prior restraint or not, it takes no argument to show that such a penalty, imposed in addition to full compensation for all injury believed to be inflicted on the plaintiff and the mitigation of such injury involved in the mere fact of verdict, "unduly" infringed the "protected freedom" and inflicted "sheer oppression". The maximum penalty against a corporation for criminal libel is fixed by Georgia law at a fine of $1,000. Ga. Code Ann. §§ 26-2101, 27-2506. That legislative judgment as to the penalty necessary to protect the community provides, in our submission, the perspective for appraising the constitutional validity of this award.

This jury verdict, therefore, even more than that in New York Times, supplies what Mr. Justice Black, concurring in that judgment, called "dramatic proof . . . . that state libel laws threaten the very existence of an American press virile enough to publish unpopular views on public affairs . . ." (376 U. S. at 294). The only way that threat can be removed, short of according the absolute privilege this Court declined in Times to find embodied in the First Amendment, is to hold that a jury's compensatory verdict must bear a reasonable relationship to the amount of damage shown and that a permissible punitive additional award must be shaped by such objective factors as the fine imposable upon conviction of criminal libel, the reasonable costs of conducting the litigation (Day v. Woodward, 13 How. at 371; see also Afro-American Publishing Co. v. Jaffe, 366 F. 2d 649, 661-663 [D. C. Cir. 1966]) or, at most, a modest multiple of the actual damages sustained. The punitive verdict here did not comport with these or any other rational criteria and thus was tainted by a violation of the Constitution.

Second: If the verdict was, as we submit, unconstitutional, it was not saved by the remittitur required by the District Court. For even though the use of a remittitur may be too well established to be "reconsidered or disturbed at this late day," as this Court reluctantly declared in Dimick v. Schiedt, 293 U. S. 474, 485 (1935), it is no less established that a verdict based upon a jury's prejudice cannot be cured. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. S. M. Ry. v. Moquin, 283 U. S. 520, 521 (1931); National Surety Co. v. Jean, 61 F. 2d 197, 198 (6th Cir. 1932); Brabham v. Mississippi, 96 F. 2d 210 (5th Cir. 1938); Ford Motor Co. v. Mahone, 205 F. 2d 267 (4th Cir. 1953). A verdict violative of the Constitution surely is no less incurably defective, if, indeed, the jury's prejudice is not in such a case to be presumed.

The vice of such a verdict is shown plainly in this case. For when the trial court found the jury's verdict to be "grossly excessive", it did not ask itself what size verdict might comport with constitutional requirements and show a due regard for the importance of preserving freedom of the press. It asked, instead, what was the largest verdict "ever sustained for punitive damages by the Appellate Courts" and, finding that figure to be $175,000 (of which $100,000 was the largest sum awarded against any one defendant) in Reynolds v. Pegler, 223 F. 2d 429 (2d Cir. 1955), it expressed its "considered opinion that the maximum sum" that "should have been awarded . . . should be $400,000" (R. 74-76; 225 F. Supp. at 919-920). That the magnitude of the invalid jury verdict exerted a substantial influence upon the Court's determination is, therefore, undeniable. The Court's award was inescapably a "fruit" of the illegal action of the jury. Cf., e.g., Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U. S. 471, 484 (1963).

Third: Even if the judgment must be tested by the District Court's award, without regard to the invalid verdict of the jury, we contend that the punishment imposed is repugnant to the Constitution.

In assessing the sum of $400,000 as "the maximum" that "should have been awarded," the Court, as we have said, employed no standard other than its search for the highest punitive award that an appellate court had thus far sustained and, finding that statistic, more than doubled the top figure that it found. It neither sought nor used any objective standard of the kind we think essential when a punishment of this kind is imposed. Deeming the publication unprotected by the First Amendment, it, of course, took no account of the effect of the award, and of the threat of like awards in other cases, on the freedom the Amendment guarantees. The assessment was, therefore, entirely arbitrary and unprincipled. We submit that it offends the Constitution on this ground.

The offense is compounded by the size of the award. What this Court said of the $500,000 judgment rendered against The New York Times is no less applicable here:

"Whether or not a newspaper can survive a succession of such judgments, the pall of fear and timidity imposed upon those who would give voice to public criticism is an atmosphere in which the First Amendment freedoms cannot survive" (376 U. S. at 278).

CONCLUSION.

For the foregoing reasons, we respectfully submit that the judgment of the Court of Appeals should be reversed.

HERBERT WECHSLER,
PHILIP H. STRUBING,
Attorneys for Petitioner, Curtis Publishing Company.

PEPPER, HAMILTON & SCHEETZ,
KILPATRICK, CODY, ROGERS,
McCLATCHEY & REGENSTEIN,
Of Counsel.

APPENDIX A.

Constitutional and Statutory Provisions Involved.

CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES.

AMENDMENT I.

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

AMENDMENT V.

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation."

AMENDMENT XIV.

Section 1. "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

GEORGIA VERSUS ALABAMA

THE STORY OF A COLLEGE FOOTBALL FIX

A SHOCKING REPORT OF HOW WALLY BUTTS AND "BEAR" BRYANT RIGGED A GAME LAST FALL

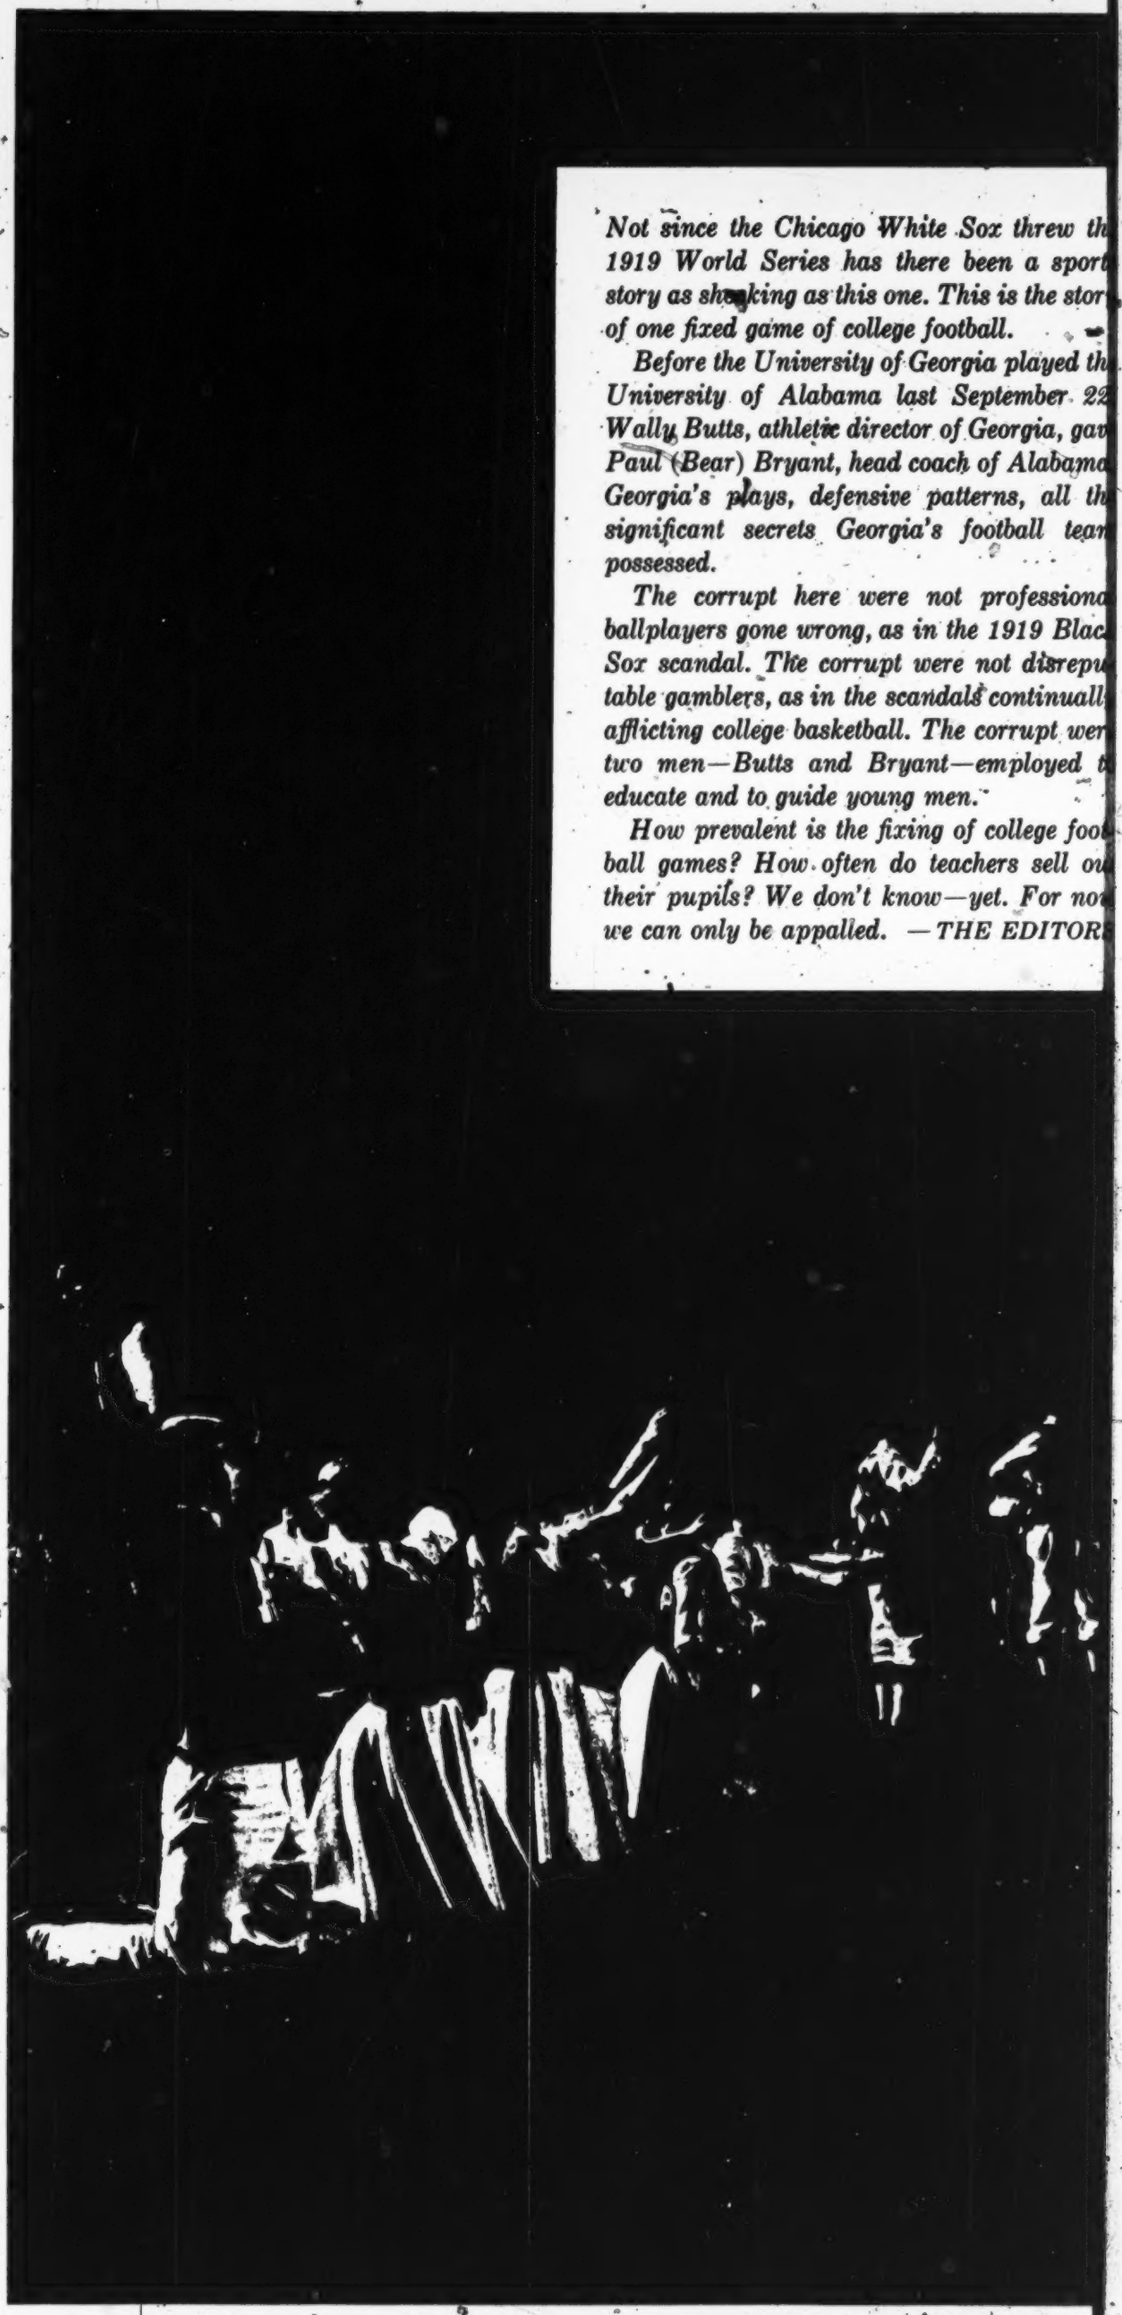
By FRANK GRAHAM JR.

Not since the Chicago White Sox threw th 1919 World Series has there been a sport story as shocking as this one. This is the stor of one fixed game of college football.

Before the University of Georgia played th University of Alabama last September 22 Wally Butts, athletic director of Georgia, gav Paul (Bear) Bryant, head coach of Alabama Georgia's plays, defensive patterns, all th significant secrets Georgia's football tea possessed.

The corrupt here were not professiona ballplayers gone wrong, as in the 1919 Blac Sox scandal. The corrupt were not disrepu table gamblers, as in the scandals continuall afflicting college basketball. The corrupt wer two men—Butts and Bryant—employed t educate and to guide young men.

How prevalent is the fixing of college foot ball games? How often do teachers sell ou their pupils? We don't know—yet. For no we can only be appalled. —THE EDITOR



On their knees, Alabama cheerleaders plead for touchdown. Team scored five.

On Friday morning, September 14, 1962, an insurance salesman in Atlanta, Georgia, named George Burnett picked up his telephone and dialed the number of a local public-relations firm. The number was Jackson 5-3536. The line was busy, but Burnett kept trying. On the fourth or fifth attempt he had just dialed the final number when he heard what he later described as "a series of harsh electronic sounds," then the voice of a telephone operator said:

"Coach Bryant is out on the field, but he'll come to the phone. Do you want to hold, Coach Butts, or shall we call you back?"

And then a man's voice: "I'll hold, operator."

Like most males over the age of four in Atlanta, George Burnett is a football fan. He realized that he had been hooked by accident into a long-distance circuit and that he was about to overhear a conversation between two of the colossi of Southern football. Paul (Bear) Bryant is the head coach and athletic director of the University of Alabama, and Wallace "Wally" Butts was for 22 years the head coach of the University of Georgia and, at the time of this conversation, the university's athletic director. Burnett ("I was curious, naturally") kept the phone to his ear. Through this almost incredible coincidence he was to make the most important interception in modern football history.

After a brief wait Burnett heard the operator say that Coach Bryant was on the phone and ready to speak to Coach Butts.

"Hello, Bear," Butts said.

"Hello, Wally. Do you have anything for me?"

As Burnett listened, Butts began to give Bryant detailed information about the plays and formations Georgia would use in its opening game eight days later. Georgia's opponent was to be Alabama.

Butts outlined Georgia's offensive plays for Bryant and told him how Georgia planned to defend against Alabama's attack. Butts mentioned both players and plays by name. Occasionally Bryant asked Butts about specific offensive or defensive maneuvers, and Butts either answered in detail or said, "I don't know about that. I'll have to find out."

"One question Bryant asked," Burnett recalled later, "was 'How about quick kicks?'. And Butts said, 'Don't worry about quick kicks. They don't have anyone who can do it.'

"Butts also said that Rakestraw [Georgia quarterback Larry Rakestraw] tipped off what he was going to do by the way he held his feet. If one foot was behind the other it meant he would drop back to pass. If they were together it meant he was setting himself to spin and hand off. And another thing he told Bryant was that Woodward [Brigham Woodward, a defensive back] committed himself fast on pass defense."

As the conversation ended, Bryant asked Butts if he would be at home on Sunday. Butts answered that he would.

"Fine," Bryant said. "I'll call you there Sunday."

Listening to this amazing conversation, Burnett began to make notes on a scratch pad he kept on his desk. Some of the names were strange to him—tackle Ray Rissmiller's name he jotted down as "Ricemiller," and end Mickey Babb's as "Baer"—and some of the jargon stranger still, but he recorded all that he heard. When the two men had hung up Burnett still sat at his desk, stunned, and a little bit frightened.

Suddenly he heard an operator's voice: "Have you completed your call, sir?"

Burnett started. "Yes, operator. By the way, can you give me the number I was connected with?"

The operator supplied him with a number in Tuscaloosa, Alabama, which he later identified as that of the University of Alabama. The extension was that of the athletic department. Burnett then dialed Jackson 5-3536—the number he originally wanted. This time the call went through normally, and he reached a close friend and former business associate named Milton Flack.

"Is Wally Butts in your office now, Milt?" Burnett asked.

"Well, he's in the back office—making a phone call, I think. Here he comes now."

"Don't mention that I asked about him," Burnett said hurriedly. "I'll talk to you later."

Through some curious electronic confusion, George Burnett, calling his friend Milt Flack, had hooked into the call Wally Butts was making from a rear office in Flack's suite. He was the third man, the odd man. But he was not out.

Putting the pieces together

In the next few hours Burnett tried to piece together what he knew of Georgia football. Butts, a native of Milledgeville, Georgia, had joined the university coaching staff as an assistant in 1938. A year later he was named head coach. For 20 years he was one of the most popular and successful coaches in the South. Then prominent University of Georgia alumni abruptly soured on him, and on January 6, 1961, he was replaced by a young assistant coach named Johnny Griffith. Butts, filed away in the position of Georgia's athletic director (which he had held along with his coaching job for some years), was outspokenly bitter about his removal from the field.

Burnett knew, too, that Butts recently had been involved in a disastrous speculation in Florida orange groves. Butts had lost over $70,000 because, as someone put it, "you couldn't grow cactus on that land." One of his partners in the deal was also an associate of Milt Flack at a public-relations firm called Communications International, the office Burnett had been trying to call when he hooked into the Butts-Bryant conversation.

That afternoon Burnett told Flack what he had overheard. Both of them, though only slightly acquainted with the high-spirited, gregarious Butts, liked him, and they decided to forget the whole thing. Burnett went home in the evening and stuffed his notes away in a bureau drawer. He felt a great sense of relief. The matter, as far as he was concerned, was closed.

Eight days later, on September 22, the Georgia team traveled to Birmingham to play Alabama before a crowd of 54,000 people at Legion Field. Alabama hardly needed any "inside" information to handle the outmanned Bulldogs. Bryant, one of the country's most efficient and most ruthless coaches—he likes his players to be mean, and once wrote that football games are won by "outmeaning" the other team—had built a powerhouse that was in the middle of a 26-game winning streak. Alabama was the defending national champion, combining a fast-charging and savage-tackling defense with an effective attack built around a sensational sophomore quarterback named Joe Namath. The Georgia team was composed chiefly of unsensational sophomores.

Various betting lines showed Alabama favored by from 14 to 17 points. If a man were to bet on Alabama he would want to be pretty sure that his team could win by more than 17 points, a very uncertain wager when two major colleges are opening the season together and supposedly have no reliable line on the other's strengths and weaknesses.

Bryant, before the game, certainly did not talk to the press like a man who was playing with a stacked deck.

"The only chance we've got against Georgia is by scratching and battling for our life," he said, managing to keep a straight face. "Put that down so you can look at it next week and see how right it is."

The game itself would have been enjoyed most by a man who gets kicks from attending executions. Coach Bryant (he neglected to wear a black hood) shapped every trap. The first time Rakestraw passed, Alabama intercepted. Then Alabama quickly scored on a 52-yard pass play of its own. The Georgia players, their moves analyzed and forecast like those of rats in a maze, took a frightful physical beating.

"The Georgia backfield never got out of its backfield," one spectator said afterward. And reporter Jesse Outlar wrote in Atlanta's Sunday Journal the following day: "Every time Rakestraw got the ball he was surrounded by Alabama's All-American center Lee Roy Jordan and his eager playmates."

Georgia made only 37 yards rushing, completed only 7 of 19 passes for 79 yards, and made its deepest penetration (to Alabama's 41-yard line) on the next to the last play of the game. Georgia could do nothing right, and Alabama nothing wrong. The final score was 35–0, the most lopsided score between the two teams since 1923.

It was a bitter defeat for Georgia's promising young team. The 38-year-old Johnny Griffith, who was beginning his second season as head coach, was stunned. Asked about the game by reporter Jim Minter, he said: "I figured Alabama was about three touchdowns better than we were. So that leaves about fifteen points we can explain only by saying we didn't play any football."

Quarterback Rakestraw came even closer to the truth. "They were just so quick and mobile," he told Minter. "They seemed to know every play we were going to run."

Later other members of the Georgia squad expressed their misgivings to Furman Bisher, sports editor of the Atlanta Journal. "The Alabama players taunted us," end Mickey Babb told him. "'You can't run Eighty-eight Pop [a key Georgia play] on us,' they'd yell. They knew just what we were going to run, and just what we called it."

And Sam Richwine, the squad's trainer, told Bisher: "They played just like they knew what we were going to do. And it seemed to me a lot like things were when they played us in 1961 too." (Alabama walloped Georgia in 1961 by a score of 32–6.)

Only one man in the Georgia camp did not despair that day. Asked by reporter

George Burnett, of Atlanta: He overheard critical long-distance call.

Wally Butts, former athletic d rector of Georgia: He gave awa Georgia plays, defense pattern

Head coach Paul (Bear) Brya of Alabama. He took plays for h defending national champion

UNITED STATES CODE TITLE 28.

§ 2106 Determination "The Supreme Court or any other court of appellate jurisdiction may affirm, modify, vacate, set aside or reverse any judgment, decree, or order of a court lawfully brought before it for review, and may remand the cause and direct the entry of such appropriate judgment, decree or order, or require such further proceedings to be had as may be just under the circumstances. June 25, 1948, c. 646, 62 Stat. 963.

FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE.

Rule 60(b).

Mistakes; Inadvertence; Excusable Neglect; Newly Discovered Evidence; Fraud, etc. "On motion and upon such terms as are just, the court may relieve a party or his legal representative from a final judgment, order, or proceeding for the following reasons: (1) mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect; (2) newly discovered evidence which by due diligence could not have been discovered in time to move for a new trial under Rule 59(b); (3) fraud (whether heretofore denominated intrinsic or extrinsic) misrepresentation, or other misconduct of an adverse party; (4) the judgment is void; (5) the judgment has been satisfied, released, or discharged, or a prior judgment upon which it is based has been reversed or otherwise vacated, or it is no longer equitable that the judgment should have prospective application; or (6) any other reason justifying relief from the operation of the judgment. The motion shall be made within a reasonable time, and for reasons (1), (2), and (3) not more than one year after the judgment, order, or proceeding was entered or taken. A motion under this subdivision (b) does not affect the finality of a judgment or suspend its operation. This rule does not limit the power of a court to entertain an independent action to relieve a party from a judgment, order or proceeding, or to grant relief to a defendant not actually personally notified as provided in Title 28, U. S. C., § 1655, or to set aside a judgment for fraud upon the court. Writs of coram nobis, coram vobis, audita querela, and bills of review and bills in the nature of a bill of review, are abolished, and the procedure for obtaining any relief from a judgment shall be by motion as prescribed in these rules or by an independent action. As amended Dec. 27, 1946, eff. March 19, 1948; Dec. 29, 1948, eff. Oct. 20, 1949."

GEORGIA CODE ANNOTATED.

§ 105-701.

LIBEL DEFINED; NECESSITY OF PUBLICATION.—A libel is a false and malicious defamation of another, expressed in print, or writing, or pictures, or signs, tending to injure the reputation of an individual, and exposing him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule. The publication of the libelous matter is essential to recovery.

§ 105-1801 (4488)

PLEA OF AUTHORITY UNDER LAW; EFFECT AS TO RIGHT TO OPEN AND CONCLUDE.—In every case of tort, if the defendant was authorized by law to do the act complained of, he may plead the same as a justification; by such plea he admits the act to be done, and shall be entitled to all the privileges of one holding the affirmative of the issue; but such plea shall not give to the defendant the right to open and conclude the argument before the jury, unless it shall be filed before the plaintiff submits any evidence to the jury trying the case (Acts 1888, p. 35).

§ 26-2101 (340 P. C.)

LIBEL DEFINED; PUNISHMENT.—A libel is a malicious defamation, expressed either by printing or writing, or signs, pictures or the like, tending to blacken the memory of one who is dead, or the honesty, virtue, integrity, or reputation of one who is alive and thereby expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule. Every person convicted of this offense shall be punished as for a misdemeanor. (Cobb. 812.)

§ 27-2506 (1065 P. C.)

MISDEMEANORS, HOW PUNISHED.—Except where otherwise provided, every crime declared to be a misdemeanor shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $1,000, confinement in the county or other jail not to exceed six months, to work on the public works in such public works camp or other appropriate institution under the jurisdiction of the State Board of Corrections not to exceed 12 months, any one or more of these punishments in the discretion of the trial judge. (Acts 1865-6, p. 233; 1878-9, p. 54; 1895, p. 64; 1908, p. 1119; 1956, pp. 161, 168; 1957, pp. 477, 482.)

§ 32-101.

CREATION OF BOARD OF REGENTS. CORPORATE NAME OF TRUSTEES OF UNIVERSITY OF GEORGIA CHANGED.—There is hereby constituted a department of the State Government of Georgia, to be known as the "Board of Regents of the University System of Georgia." The name of the corporation heretofore established and existing under the name and style, "Trustees of the University of Georgia," is hereby changed to "Regents of the University System of Georgia" (Acts 1931, pp. 7, 20).

§ 32-113.

GOVERNMENT OF UNIVERSITY OF GEORGIA.—The management and government of the University of Georgia, and all of its branches named in section 32-103 are vested in the Board of Regents (Acts 1931, pp. 7, 21).

32-152. Athletic Associations of University of Georgia and Georgia School of Technology Declared to Be Corporations.—The Athletic Associations of the University of Georgia and the Georgia School of Technology are hereby declared to be corporations, incorporated under charter issued by the superior court of the county in which said associations are located. (Acts 1949, p. 29.)

32-153. Associations as Not State Agencies; Financial Operation Rules and Regulations.—The Associations named are hereby declared, not to be agencies of the State and not subject to the limitations, restrictions and laws of general application imposed on State agencies by the Constitution of Georgia and the laws enacted by the General Assembly of Georgia in compliance with the Constitution of Georgia, and the Associations are authorized under their corporate charter issued by the superior court to make such rules and regulations for the financial operations of the Associations as they deem necessary: Provided, however, that this resolution shall not apply to any tax money appropriated by the State of Georgia. (Acts 1949, p. 29.)

32-154. Audit of Accounts of Associations Not Required of State Auditor.—The State Auditor of Georgia is not required to make an audit of the accounts of the Associations as is required of him in connection with the financial operations of State agencies. (Acts 1949, p. 29.)

remain in his job. On January 28 a report reached the newspapers that Butts had resigned. At first it was denied by Butts and the university. A few days later it was confirmed with the additional news—that Butts would remain as athletic director until June 1 so that he could qualify for certain pension benefits. Rumors flooded Atlanta. One of the wildest was that Butts was mysteriously and suddenly ill and had entered the state hospital at Athens. This was quickly scotched when Georgia University officials maintained that Butts merely went for the physical checkup required for his pension records. Shortly afterward he was seen in Atlanta at a Georgia Tech basketball game.

But if Butts was seen publicly, events involving him remained closely guarded secrets. Burnett was asked to come to the Atlanta office of M. Cook Barwick, an attorney representing the University of Georgia. There he met Dr. O. C. Aderhold, the university president. Burnett's story was carefully checked. He then agreed to take a lie-detector test, which was administered by polygraph expert Sidney McMain, in the Atlanta Federal building. Burnett passed the test to everybody's satisfaction.

Phone-company check

Next an official of the Southern Bell Telephone Company checked and found that a call had been made from the office of Communications International to the University of Alabama extension noted by Burnett on his scratch pad. This information corroborated Burnett's statement that the call had been made at about 10:25 in the morning and had lasted 15 or 16 minutes.

"I jotted down the time when the call was completed," Burnett said. "It was 10:40. This is an old navigator's habit, I guess. For instance, I know that I was shot down over Saint-Vith at exactly 10:21, because when the bombardier called 'Bombs away!' I looked at my watch and wrote down the time. A few seconds later we got hit."

University officials still nursed reservations about Burnett's story because of the fantastic coincidence that had enabled him to overhear Butts's call. Then, during one of the many conferences he attended in attorney Barwick's office in the Rhodes-Haverty Building, a second coincidence, equally odd, cleared the air. Barwick placed a call to Doctor Aderhold at the university. Suddenly, Barwick and Aderhold found themselves somehow braided into a four-way conversation with two unknown female voices. The two men burst into nervous laughter. Burnett's story gained a little more credence.

February 21 was a painful day for George Burnett. He was summoned once more to Barwick's office, because Bernie Moore, the commissioner of the Southeastern Conference, "wanted to ask some questions." On Burnett's arrival he found not only Moore but Doctor Aderhold, two members of the university's board of regents, and another man identified as Bill Hartman, a friend of Wally Butts.

From the start, Burnett sensed a mood of hostility in the air. The ball was carried by one of the members of the Georgia board of regents, who confronted Burnett with a report that he had been arrested two years before for writing bad checks and that he was still on probation when he overheard the conversation between Butts and Bryant.

"Is there anything else in your past you're trying to cover up?" the regents official demanded.

Burnett was frightened and angry. "I didn't realize that I was on trial," he said. He went on to say that he had nothing to hide, that he had given university officials permission to look into his background, and that he had taken a lie-detector test, signed an affidavit that his testimony was true and permitted his statements to be recorded on tape. His notes had been taken from him and placed by Barwick in the safety-deposit vault of an Atlanta bank.

"I was arrested on a bad-check charge," Burnett admitted. "I was way behind on my bills and two of the checks I wrote—one was for twenty-five dollars and the other for twenty dollars—bounced. I was fined one hundred dollars and put on probation for a year. I think that anybody who is fair will find I got into trouble because I've always had trouble handling my financial affairs and not because I acted with criminal intent."

Burnett was shaken by this meeting. He felt that he had been candid with the university but that he had also angered many friends of Wally Butts. He signed a paper at the officials' request which gave the university permission to have his war records opened and examined. He cared about his reputation. He was proud to have been a navigator.

"Doctor Aderhold was always very kind to me at those meetings," Burnett said later, "but I didn't like the attitude of some of the others. I began to feel that I'd be hurt when and if these people decided to make this mess public. That's when I went to my lawyer, and we agreed that I should tell my story to The Saturday Evening Post."

Now the net closed on Wally Butts. On February 23 the University of Georgia's athletic board met hastily in Atlanta and confronted Butts with Burnett's testimony. Challenged, Butts refused to take a lie-detector test. The next day's newspapers reported that he had submitted his resignation, effective immediately, "for purely personal and business purposes."

"I still think I'm able to coach a little," Butts told a reporter that day, "and I feel I can help a pro team."

The chances are that Wally Butts will never help any football team again. Bear Bryant may well follow him into oblivion—a special hell for that grim extrovert—for in a very real sense he betrayed the boys he was pledged to lead. The investigation by university and Southeastern Conference officials is continuing; motion pictures of other games are being scrutinized; where it will end no one so far can say. But careers will be ruined, that is sure. A great sport will be permanently damaged. For many people the bloom must pass forever from college football.

"I never had a chance, did I?" Coach Johnny Griffith said bitterly to a friend the other day. "I never had a chance."

When a fixer works against you, that's the way he likes it. THE END

Butts and Bryant meet as friends, exchange warm greetings before Georgia-Alabama game at Legion Field, Birmingham, Alabama, in 1

ORGIA VERSUS ALABAMA

THE ORY OF OLLEGE OTBALL FIX

A SHOCKING REPORT HOW WALLY BUTTS AND "BEAR" BRYANT RIGGED A GAME LAST FALL

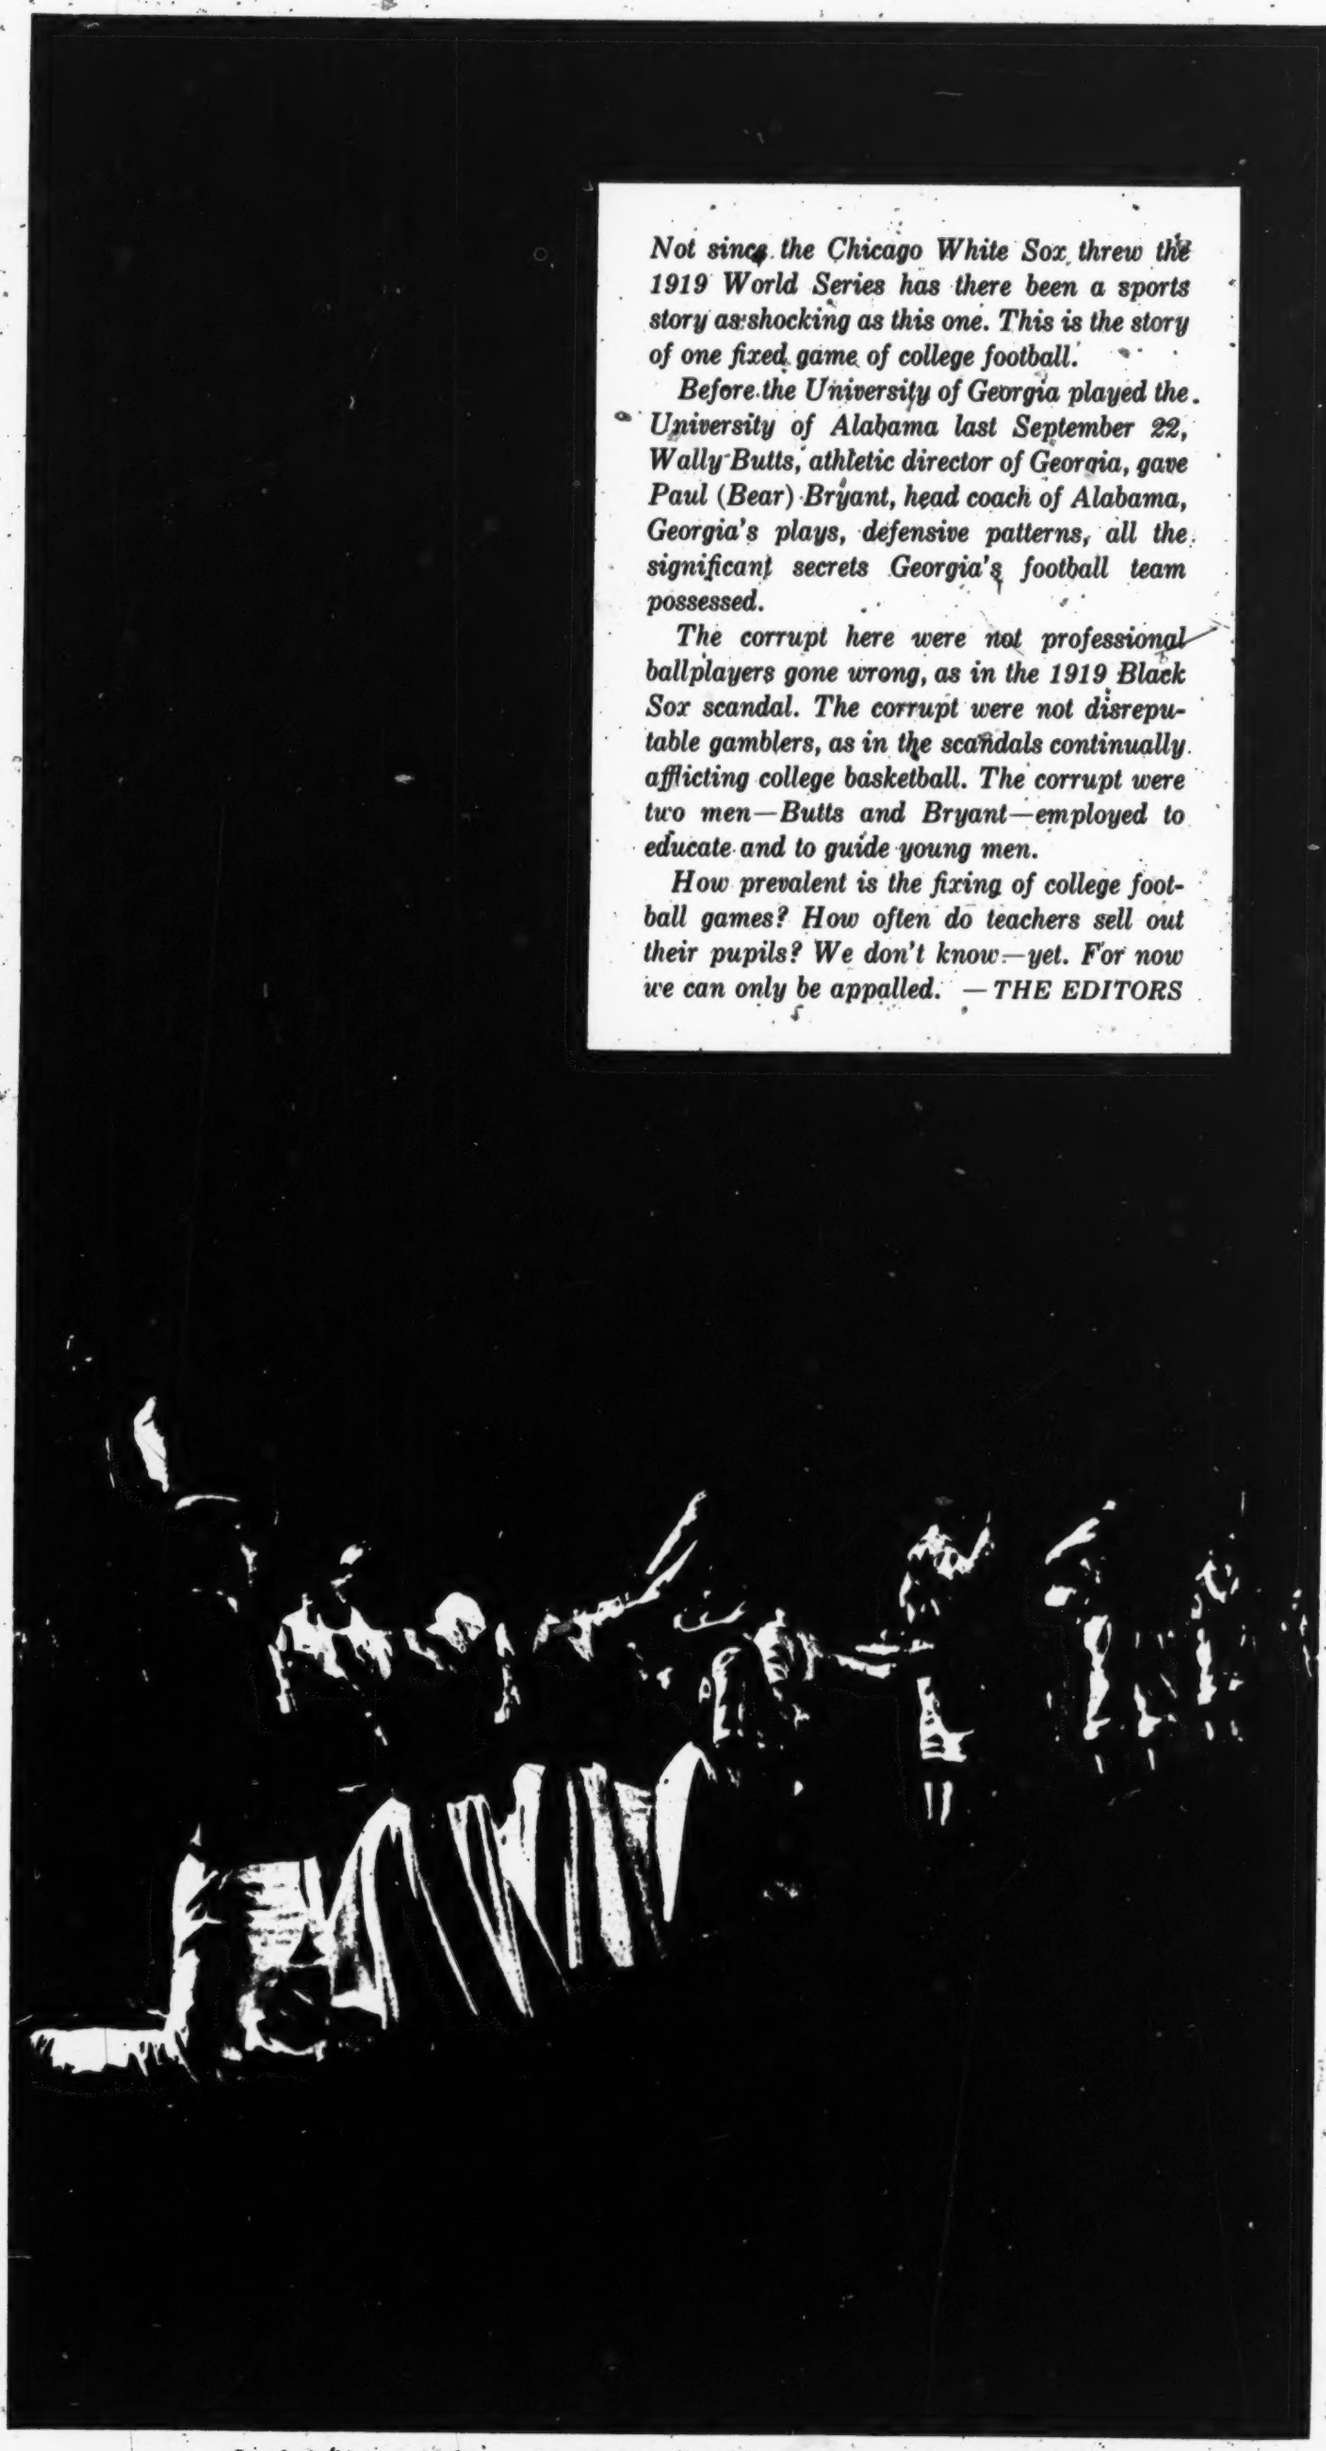
By FRANK GRAHAM JR.

Not since the Chicago White Sox threw the 1919 World Series has there been a sports story as shocking as this one. This is the story of one fixed game of college football.

Before the University of Georgia played the University of Alabama last September 22, Wally Butts, athletic director of Georgia, gave Paul (Bear) Bryant, head coach of Alabama, Georgia's plays, defensive patterns, all the significant secrets Georgia's football team possessed.

The corrupt here were not professional ballplayers gone wrong, as in the 1919 Black Sox scandal. The corrupt were not disreputable gamblers, as in the scandals continually afflicting college basketball. The corrupt were two men—Butts and Bryant—employed to educate and to guide young men.

How prevalent is the fixing of college football games? How often do teachers sell out their pupils? We don't know—yet. For now we can only be appalled. —THE EDITORS



On their knees, Alabama cheerleaders plead for touchdown. Team scored five.

, September 14,
e salesman in At-
George Burnett
e and dialed the blic-relations firm.
n 5-3536. The line kept trying. On the
he had just dialed
he heard what he ries of harsh elec-
he voice of a tele-

t on the field, but
e. Do you want to shall we call you voice: "I'll hold,

r the age of four in tt is a football fan.
d been hooked by istance circuit and verhear a conversa-
e colossi of South-ear) Bryant is the tic director of the ma, and Wallace
22 years the head
y of Georgia and,
versation, the uni-
or. Burnett ("I was kept the phone to almost incredible make the most im-in modern foot-

rnett heard the op-Bryant was on the
ak to Coach Butts.
s said.
you have anything

Butts began to give mation about the Georgia would use eight days later.
as to be Alabama.
gia's offensive plays
him how Georgia
inst Alabama's at-both players and nally Bryant asked fensive or defensive either answered in t know about that.

nt asked," Burnett
'How about quick aid, 'Don't worry
ey don't have any-

t Rakestraw [Geor-
Rakestraw] tipped to do by the way he oot was behind the uld drop back to ther it meant he was and hand off. And d Bryant was that Woodward, a de-ted himself fast on on ended, Bryant

uld be at home on red that he would.
"I'll call you there

zing conversation,
notes on a scratch desk. Some of the him—tackle Ray jotted down as Mickey Babb's as the jargon stranger
all that he heard.
d hung up Burnett

still sat at his desk, stunned, and a little bit frightened.

Suddenly he heard an operator's voice: "Have you completed your call, sir?"

Burnett started. "Yes, operator. By the way, can you give me the number I was connected with?"

The operator supplied him with a number in Tuscaloosa, Alabama, which he later identified as that of the University of Alabama. The extension was that of the athletic department. Burnett then dialed Jackson 5-3536—the number he originally wanted. This time the call went through normally, and he reached a close friend and former business associate named Milton Flack.

"Is Wally Butts in your office now, Milt?" Burnett asked.

"Well, he's in the back office—making a phone call, I think. Here he comes now."

"Don't mention that I asked about him," Burnett said hurriedly. "I'll talk to you later."

Through some curious electronic confusion, George Burnett, calling his friend Milt Flack, had hooked into the call Wally Butts was making from a rear office in Flack's suite. He was the third man, the odd man. But he was not out.

Putting the pieces together

In the next few hours Burnett tried to piece together what he knew of Georgia football. Butts, a native of Milledgeville, Georgia, had joined the university coaching staff as an assistant in 1938. A year later he was named head coach. For 20 years he was one of the most popular and successful coaches in the South. Then prominent University of Georgia alumni abruptly soured on him, and on January 6, 1961, he was replaced by a young assistant coach named Johnny Griffith. Butts, filed away in the position of Georgia's athletic director (which he had held along with his coaching job for some years), was outspokenly bitter about his removal from the field.

Burnett knew, too, that Butts recently had been involved in a disastrous speculation in Florida orange groves. Butts had lost over $70,000 because, as someone put it, "you couldn't grow cactus on that land." One of his partners in the deal was also an associate of Milt Flack at a public-relations firm called Communications International, the office Burnett had been trying to call when he hooked into the Butts-Bryant conversation.

That afternoon Burnett told Flack what he had overheard. Both of them, though only slightly acquainted with the high-spirited, gregarious Butts, liked him, and they decided to forget the whole thing. Burnett went home in the evening and stuffed his notes away in a bureau drawer. He felt a great sense of relief. The matter, as far as he was concerned, was closed.

Eight days later, on September 22, the Georgia team traveled to Birmingham to play Alabama before a crowd of $4,000 people at Legion Field. Alabama hardly needed any "inside" information to handle the outmanned Bulldogs. Bryant, one of the country's most efficient and most ruthless coaches—he likes his players to be mean, and once wrote that football games are won by "outmeaning" the other team—had built a powerhouse that was in the middle of a 26-game winning streak. Alabama was the defending national champion, combining a fast-charging and savage-tackling defense with an effective attack built around a sensational sophomore quarterback named Joe Namath. The Georgia team was composed chiefly of unsensational sophomores.

Various betting lines showed Alabama favored by from 14 to 17 points. If a man were to bet on Alabama he would want to be pretty sure that his team could win by more than 17 points, a very uncertain wager when two major colleges are opening the season together and supposedly have no reliable line on the other's strengths and weaknesses.

Bryant, before the game, certainly did not talk to the press like a man who was playing with a stacked deck.

"The only chance we've got against Georgia is by scratching and battling for our life," he said, managing to keep a straight face. "Put that down so you can look at it next week and see how right it is."

The game itself would have been enjoyed most by a man who gets kicks from attending executions. Coach Bryant (he neglected to wear a black hood) snapped every trap. The first time Rakestraw passed, Alabama intercepted. Then Alabama quickly scored on a 52-yard pass play of its own. The Georgia players, their moves analyzed and forecast like those of rats in a maze, took a frightful physical beating.

"The Georgia backfield never got out of its backfield," one spectator said afterward. And reporter Jesse Outlar wrote in Atlanta's Sunday Journal the following day: "Every time Rakestraw got the ball he was surrounded by Alabama's All-American center Lee Roy Jordan and his eager playmates."

Georgia made only 37 yards rushing, completed only 7 of 19 passes for 79 yards, and made its deepest penetration (to Alabama's 41-yard line) on the next to the last play of the game. Georgia could do nothing right, and Alabama nothing wrong. The final score was 35–0, the most lopsided score between the two teams since 1923.

It was a bitter defeat for Georgia's promising young team. The 38-year-old Johnny Griffith, who was beginning his second season as head coach, was stunned. Asked about the game by reporter Jim Minter, he said: "I figured Alabama was about three touchdowns better than we were. So that leaves about fifteen points we can explain only by saying we didn't play any football."

Quarterback Rakestraw came even closer to the truth. "They were just so quick and mobile," he told Minter. "They seemed to know every play we were going to run."

Later other members of the Georgia squad expressed their misgivings to Furman Bisher, sports editor of the Atlanta Journal. "The Alabama players taunted us," end Mickey Babb told him. "'You can't run Eighty-eight Pop [a key Georgia play] on us,' they'd yell. They knew just what we were going to run, and just what we called it."

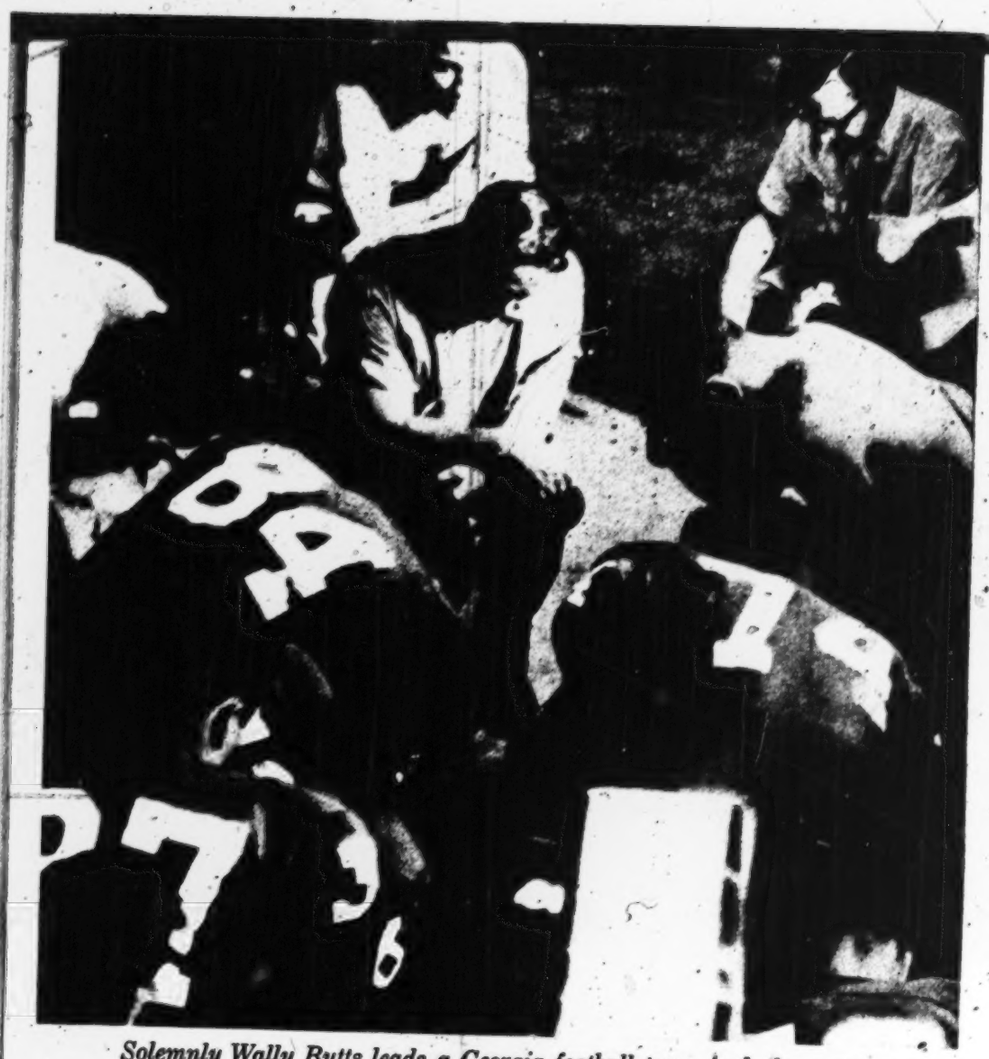
And Sam Richwine, the squad's trainer, told Bisher: "They played just like they knew what we were going to do. And it seemed to me a lot like things were when they played us in 1961 too." (Alabama walloped Georgia in 1961 by a score of 32–6.)

Only one man in the Georgia camp did not despair that day. Asked by reporter

George Burnett of Atlanta: He overheard critical long-distance call.

Wally Butts, former athletic director of Georgia: He gave away Georgia plays, defense patterns.

Head coach Paul (Bear) Bryant of Alabama. He took plays for his defending national champions.



Solemnly Wally Butts leads a Georgia football team in locker-room prayer.

Downcast coach Griffith slouches near bench as Georgia team is slaughtered.

John Logue about Georgia's disappointing performance, ex-coach Wally Butts nodded wisely and set him straight. "Potential is the word for what I saw," he said. "Unlimited potential."

The whole matter weighed heavily on George Burnett. He began to wonder if he had done the right thing when he had put the notes aside and kept his mouth shut. Now 41 years old, he was still struggling to support his large family. Among his five children were a couple of boys who played football. "How would I feel," Burnett asked himself, "if my boys were going out on the field to have their heads banged in by a stronger team, and then I discovered they'd been sold out?" He began to wake up at night and lie there in the dark, thinking about it.

In one sense Burnett knew it would be easiest to keep the notes in the drawer. While every citizen is encouraged to report a crime to authorities, the penalties against the man who talks are often more severe than those against the culprit. Burnett wasn't worried about physical retaliation. But there might be social and economic ones. Football is almost a religion in the South; the big-name coaches there are minor deities.

Butts no longer had his old-time stature, but many people were still intensely loyal to him (and he was a director of the small Atlanta insurance agency where Burnett worked). Bear Bryant was a national figure who had made impressive records at Texas A&M and Kentucky, and had more recently transformed Alabama from pushovers to national champions.

Burnett, protective toward his family, fearful of challenging deities, was troubled by a drive to do what was right. But what was right? To talk? To create furore, perhaps even national scandal? Or should he remain silent, ignoring wrong? That was a safe course, but one that might sit heavily on his conscience for all the rest of his days.

Living in his private misery, he thought about his past. Burnett himself had played high-school football in San Antonio, Texas, where he was born. During World War II he became a group navigator aboard a Martin B-26. On January 14, 1945, when his plane was shot down over Saint-Vith, Belgium, he was the only survivor. He lost part of his left hand, and spent the rest of the war in a German prison camp. Articulate and personable, he was now the division manager of the insurance agency.

On January 4 of this year he sat in his office with Bob Edwards, a longtime friend who was also an employee of the agency. Burnett knew that Edwards had played football with Johnny Griffith at South Georgia, a junior college.

"You know, Bob," Burnett said, after they had talked business for a while, "there's something that's been eating me up for a long while. I was going to tell you about it at the time, and then I decided to keep quiet. But I think you should know this, being a friend of Johnny Griffith."

After Edwards heard the story of the phone call, he asked if he could report it to Griffith. Burnett, still reluctant to get seriously involved, told Edwards to go ahead but to try to keep hi it. Powerful men in Georgi fended if Wally Butts w Burnett did not want to j own career just when thing ning to break nicely for hi

But like so many others, I that there is no such thing volvement. Griffith pressed and nervously Burnett agre dle of January he met with Griffith in the Georgia co Atlanta's Biltmore Hotel. S a general meeting of the Conference coaches was ta the Biltmore.

The Georgia-Alabama g forgotten by most of the athletic officials present. A of conversation was a late between Alabama and Geo which Bryant's long winni been broken.

Alabama, a five-point trailed 7–6 with only a littl minute to play. Then Alab first down on the Georgia line. Since Bryant had a co goal kicker, the classic st have been to pound away at Tech's line, keeping the ba goalposts and, on third or order a field-goal try. (Alab feated Georgia Tech on a las goal in 1961.) Instead, Bry back passed on first down. intercepted, and Georgia ball during the game's wa thus scoring last season's g

During the January conf Biltmore, Bryant was frequ about that first-down pass.

Away from the bars and t Griffith's room the talk Georgia-Alabama. Griffith li to Burnett's story, then re Suddenly he looked up.

"I didn't believe you until ute," he told Burnett. "But thing in your notes that possibly have dreamed up about our pass patterns. I t from Wally Butts when I b and I gave it a different na uses the old name for this pa man. Wally Butts."

Suspicions confirm

Griffith finished reading t asked Burnett if he could Burnett nodded.

"We knew somebody'd g to Alabama," Griffith tol maybe to a couple of oth played too. But we had no Wally Butts. You know, d half of the Alabama game kept coming to the sideline 'Coach, we been sold out backers are hollering out ou we're still calling the signal Griffith has since spoken when he had finished read notes, and Burnett and Edw "I don't think I moved fo thinking what I should do. T I didn't have any choice."

Griffith went to university them what he knew and would resign if Butts was Butts leads a Georgia football team in locker-room prayer.

Downcast coach Griffith slouches near bench as Georgia team is slaughtered.

John Logue about Georgia's disappointing performance, ex-coach Wally Butts nodded wisely and set him straight. "Potential is the word for what I saw," he said. "Unlimited potential."

The whole matter weighed heavily on George Burnett. He began to wonder if he had done the right thing when he had put the notes aside and kept his mouth shut. Now 41 years old, he was still struggling to support his large family. Among his five children were a couple of boys who played football. "How would I feel," Burnett asked himself, "if my boys were going out on the field to have their heads banged in by a stronger team, and then I discovered they'd been sold out?" He began to wake up at night and lie there in the dark, thinking about it.

In one sense Burnett knew it would be easiest to keep the notes in the drawer. While every citizen is encouraged to report a crime to authorities, the penalties against the man who talks are often more severe than those against the culprit. Burnett wasn't worried about physical retaliation. But there might be social and economic ones. Football is almost a religion in the South; the big-name coaches there are minor deities.

Butts no longer had his old-time stature, but many people were still intensely loyal to him (and he was a director of the small Atlanta insurance agency where Burnett worked). Bear Bryant was a national figure who had made impressive records at Texas A&M and Kentucky, and had more recently transformed Alabama from pushovers to national champions.

Burnett, protective toward his family, fearful of challenging deities, was troubled by a drive to do what was right. But what was right? To talk? To create furore, perhaps even national scandal? Or should he remain silent, ignoring wrong? That was a safe course, but one that might sit heavily on his conscience for all the rest of his days.

Living in his private misery, he thought about his past. Burnett himself had played high-school football in San Antonio, Texas, where he was born. During World War II he became a group navigator aboard a Martin B-26. On January 14, 1945, when his plane was shot down over Saint-Vith, Belgium, he was the only survivor. He lost part of his left hand, and spent the rest of the war in a German prison camp. Articulate and personable, he was now the division manager of the insurance agency.

On January 4 of this year he sat in his office with Bob Edwards, a longtime friend who was also an employee of the agency. Burnett knew that Edwards had played football with Johnny Griffith at South Georgia, a junior college.

"You know, Bob," Burnett said, after they had talked business for a while, "there's something that's been eating me up for a long while. I was going to tell you about it at the time, and then I decided to keep quiet. But I think you should know this, being a friend of Johnny Griffith."

After Edwards heard the story of the phone call, he asked if he could report it to Griffith. Burnett, still reluctant to get seriously involved, told Edwards to go ahead but to try to keep his name out of it. Powerful men in Georgia might be offended if Wally Butts was hurt, and Burnett did not want to jeopardize his own career just when things were beginning to break nicely for him.

But like so many others, Burnett found that there is no such thing as a little involvement. Griffith pressed to meet him, and nervously Burnett agreed. In the middle of January he met with Edwards and Griffith in the Georgia coach's room at Atlanta's Biltmore Hotel. Simultaneously a general meeting of the Southeastern Conference coaches was taking place at the Biltmore.

The Georgia-Alabama game had been forgotten by most of the coaches and athletic officials present. A popular topic of conversation was a late-season game between Alabama and Georgia Tech, in which Bryant's long winning streak had been broken.

Alabama, a five-point favorite, had trailed 7–6 with only a little more than a minute to play. Then Alabama made a first down on the Georgia Tech 14-yard line. Since Bryant had a competent field-goal kicker, the classic strategy would have been to pound away at the middle of Tech's line, keeping the ball between the goalposts and, on third or fourth down, order a field-goal try. (Alabama had defeated Georgia Tech on a last-minute field goal in 1961.) Instead, Bryant's quarterback passed on first down. The pass was intercepted, and Georgia Tech held the ball during the game's waning seconds, thus scoring last season's greatest upset.

During the January conference at the Biltmore, Bryant was frequently kidded about that first-down pass.

Away from the bars and the crowds, in Griffith's room the talk was only of Georgia-Alabama. Griffith listened grimly to Burnett's story, then read his notes. Suddenly he looked up.

"I didn't believe you until just this minute," he told Burnett. "But here's something in your notes that you couldn't possibly have dreamed up . . . this thing about our pass patterns. I took this over from Wally Butts when I became coach, and I gave it a different name. Nobody uses the old name for this pattern but one man. Wally Butts."

Suspicions confirmed

Griffith finished reading the notes, then asked Burnett if he could keep them. Burnett nodded.

"We knew somebody'd given our plays to Alabama," Griffith told him, "and maybe to a couple of other teams we played too. But we had no idea it was Wally Butts. You know, during the first half of the Alabama game my players kept coming to the sidelines and saying, 'Coach, we been sold out. Their linebackers are hollering out our plays while we're still calling the signals.'"

Griffith has since spoken of his feelings when he had finished reading Burnett's notes, and Burnett and Edwards had left. "I don't think I moved for an hour—thinking what I should do. Then I realized I didn't have any choice."

Griffith went to university officials, told them what he knew and said that he would resign if Butts was permitted to

...y Griffith of Georgia's beaten Bulldogs: "I never had a chance."

...ary 28 a report ...hat Butts had ...enied by Butts ...days later it was ...onal news—that ...thletic director ...uld qualify for ...umors flooded ...t was that Butts ...denly ill and had ...t Athens. This ...n Georgia Uni... ...ed that Butts ...ical checkup re... ...ecords. Shortly ...n Atlanta at a ...game.

...publicly, events ...closely guarded ...to come to the ...ok Barwick, an ...e University of ...r. O. C. Ader... ...dent. Burnett's ...cked. He then ...ctor test, which ...olygraph expert ...Atlanta Federal ...he test to every...

...check

...e Southern Bell ...cked and found ...e from the office ...rnational to the ...extension noted ...pad. This infor... ...rnett's statement ...made at about ...had lasted 15 or ...

...e when the call ...t said. "It was ...igator's habit, I ...now that I was ...With at exactly ...the bombardier ...looked at my ...the time. A few ...

...nursed reserva... ...y because of the ...at had enabled ...all. Then, during ...nces he attended ... office in the ...g, a second co... ...cleared the air. ...Doctor Aderhold ...ly, Barwick and ...elves somehow ...onversation with ...es. The two men ...hter. Burnett's ...credence.

...painful day for ...summoned once ... because Bernie ...r of the South... ...ted to ask some ...arrival he found ...ctor Aderhold, ...ersity's board of ...an identified as ... Wally Butts. ...sensed a mood ... ball was carried ... of the Georgia ...fronted Burnett with a report that he had been arrested two years before for writing bad checks and that he was still on probation when he overheard the conversation between Butts and Bryant.

"Is there anything else in your past you're trying to cover up?" the regents official demanded.

Burnett was frightened and angry. "I didn't realize that I was on trial," he said. He went on to say that he had nothing to hide, that he had given university officials permission to look into his background, and that he had taken a lie-detector test, signed an affidavit that his testimony was true and permitted his statements to be recorded on tape. His notes had been taken from him and placed by Barwick in the safety-deposit vault of an Atlanta bank.

"I was arrested on a bad-check charge," Burnett admitted. "I was way behind on my bills and two of the checks I wrote—one was for twenty-five dollars and the other for twenty dollars—bounced. I was fined one hundred dollars and put on probation for a year. I think that anybody who is fair will find I got into trouble because I've always had trouble handling my financial affairs and not because I acted with criminal intent."

Burnett was shaken by this meeting. He felt that he had been candid with the university but that he had also angered many friends of Wally Butts. He signed a paper at the officials' request which gave the university permission to have his war records opened and examined. He cared about his reputation. He was proud to have been a navigator.

"Doctor Aderhold was always very kind to me at those meetings," Burnett said later, "but I didn't like the attitude of some of the others. I began to feel that I'd be hurt when and if these people decided to make this mess public. That's when I went to my lawyer, and we agreed that I should tell my story to The Saturday Evening Post."

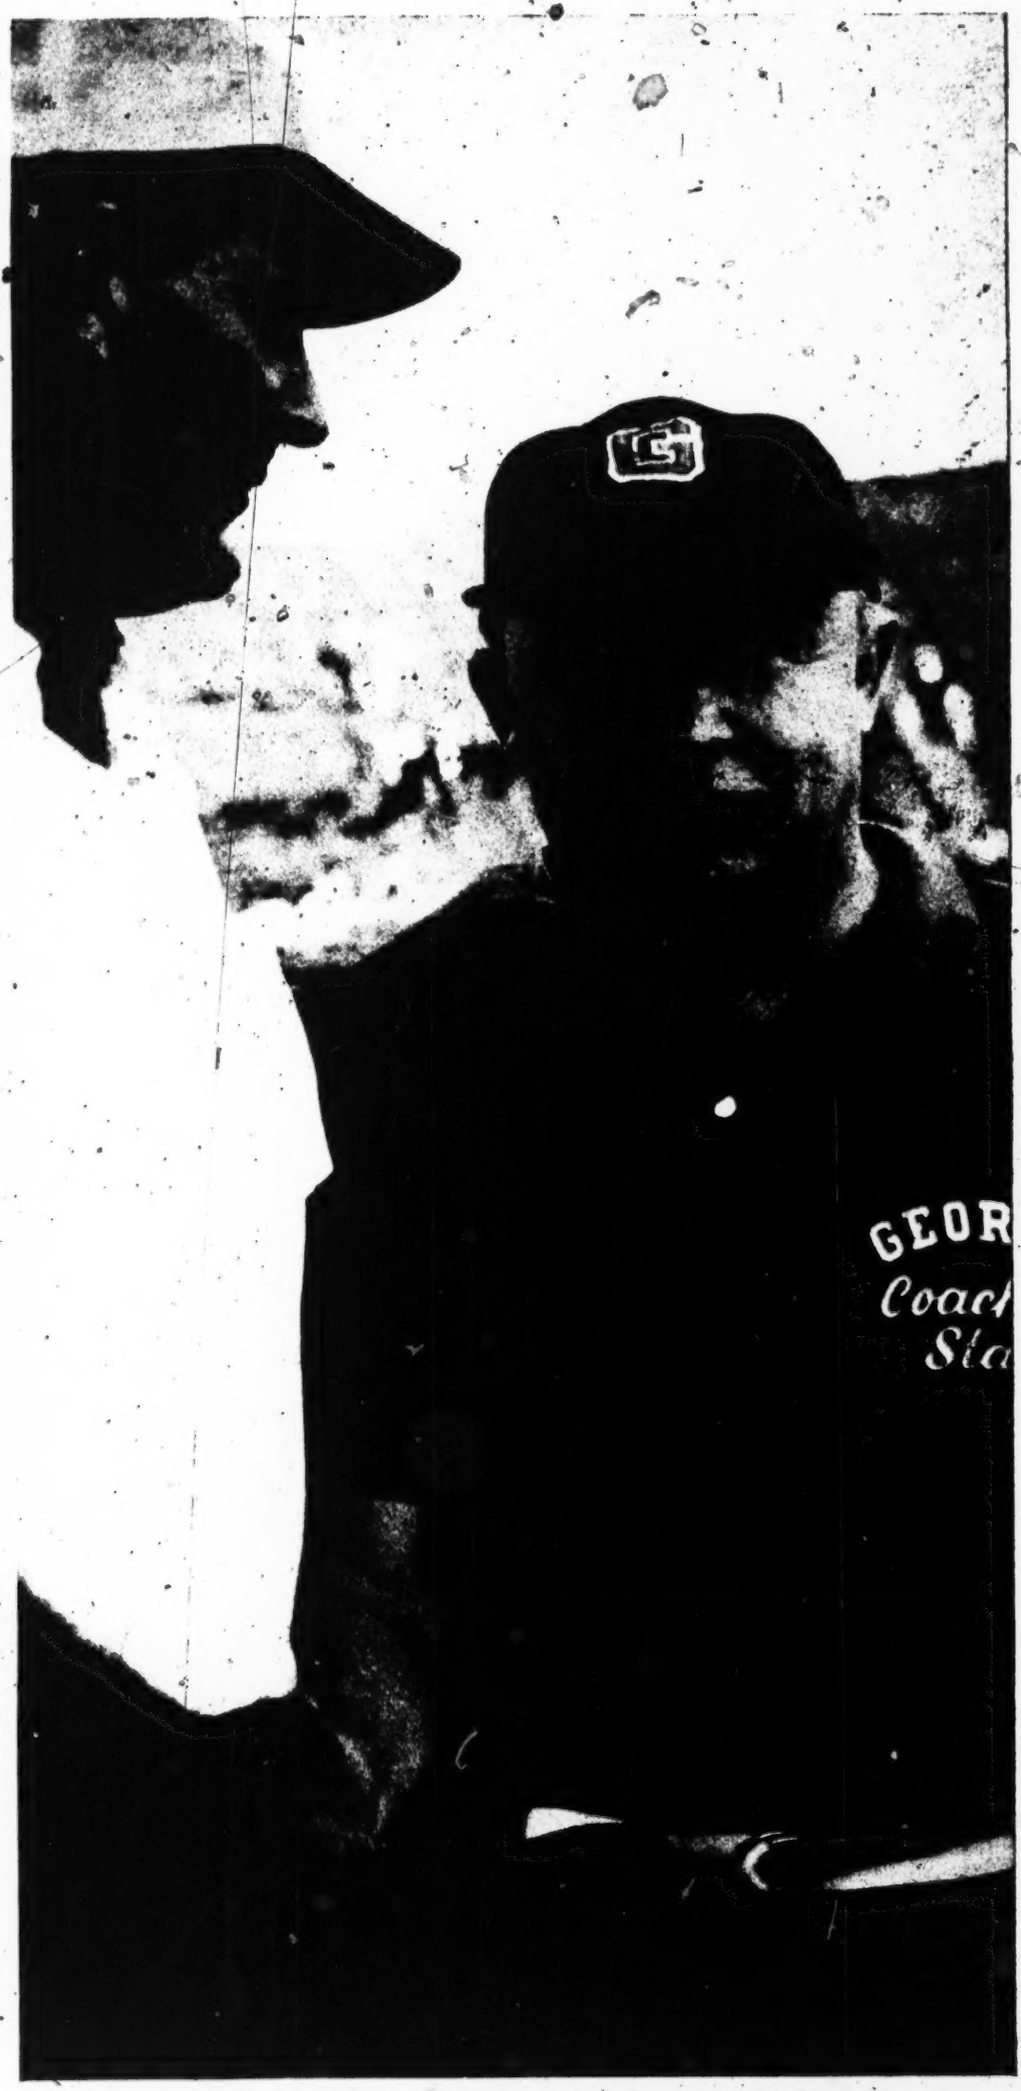
Now the net closed on Wally Butts. On February 23 the University of Georgia's athletic board met hastily in Atlanta and confronted Butts with Burnett's testimony. Challenged, Butts refused to take a lie-detector test. The next day's newspapers reported that he had submitted his resignation, effective immediately, "for purely personal and business purposes."

"I still think I'm able to coach a little," Butts told a reporter that day, "and I feel I can help a pro team."

The chances are that Wally Butts will never help any football team again. Bear Bryant may well follow him into oblivion—a special hell for that grim extrovert—for in a very real sense he betrayed the boys he was pledged to lead. The investigation by university and Southeastern Conference officials is continuing; motion pictures of other games are being scrutinized; where it will end no one so far can say. But careers will be ruined, that is sure. A great sport will be permanently damaged. For many people the bloom must pass forever from college football.

"I never had a chance, did I?" Coach Johnny Griffith said bitterly to a friend the other day. "I never had a chance."

When a fixer works against you, that's the way he likes it. THE END



Butts and Bryant meet as friends, exchange warm greetings before the Georgia-Alabama game at Legion Field, Birmingham, Alabama, in 1960.

JAN 4 1967
JOHN F. DAVIS, CLERK

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1966

No. 150

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,
Petitioner,

—against—

EDWIN A. WALKER,
Respondent.

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE COURT OF CIVIL APPEALS FOR THE SECOND SUPREME JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS OR, IN THE ALTERNATIVE, TO THE SUPREME COURT OF TEXAS

BRIEF FOR THE PETITIONER

WILLIAM P. ROGERS
LEO P. LARKIN, JR.
STANLEY GODOFSKY
200 Park Avenue
New York, New York 10017

ARTHUR MOYNIHAN
50 Rockefeller Plaza
New York, New York

J. A. GOOCH
SLOAN B. BLAIR
1800 First National Building
Fort Worth, Texas
Attorneys for Petitioner
The Associated Press

INDEX

	PAGE
CITATIONS TO OPINIONS BELOW	1
JURISDICTION	1
CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS AND STATUTES INVOLVED	2
QUESTIONS PRESENTED	3
STATEMENT OF THE CASE	5
SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT	30
ARGUMENT	31
POINT I
THE SULLIVAN DOCTRINE IS APPLICABLE TO THIS CASE AND PRECLUDES RECOVERY BY RESPONDENT	31
POINT II
THE AWARD OF $500,000 GENERAL DAMAGES IN THIS CASE ITSELF CONSTITUTES AN ABRIDGMENT OF CONSTITUTIONAL PROTECTION	47
POINT III
THE DEFENSE OF "FAIR COMMENT" AS CONSTRUED AND APPLIED BY THE COURTS BELOW IS SO LIMITED AS TO BE UNCONSTITUTIONAL	48
POINT IV
THE STATEMENTS COMPLAINED OF ARE TRUE, AND THE JURY'S CONTRARY FINDING AND CONSEQUENT AWARD CONSTITUTE A DENIAL OF DUE PROCESS	50
CONCLUSION	51
APPENDIX	1a

CASES CITED

PAGE

Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U. S. 58 48

Blackburn v. Alabama, 361 U. S. 199 50

Bond v. Floyd, U. S. , 87 S. Ct. 339 (not yet officially reported) 34, 36

Brian v. Harper, 144 La. 585, 80 So. 885 (1919) 44

Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U. S. 296 36

Coleman v. MacLennan, 78 Kan. 711, 98 Pac. 281 (1908) 49

Edwards v. South Carolina, 372 U. S. 229 50

Garner v. Louisiana, 368 U. S. 157 51

Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64 ..... 33, 36, 46

Gilberg v. Goffi, 21 App. Div. 2d 517, 251 N. Y. S. 2d 823 (2d Dep't 1964), aff'd, 15 N. Y. 2d 1023, 207 N. E. 2d 620, 260 N. Y. S. 2d 29 (1965) 38

Gugert v. New Orleans Independent Laundries, 181 So. 653 (La. Ct. App. 1938) (not officially reported) 44

Hartmann v. Time, 166 F. 2d 127 (3d Cir. 1948), cert. denied, 334 U. S. 838 45-46

Heeb v. Codifer & Bonnabel, 162 La. 139, 110 So. 178 (1926) 44

Marcus v. Search Warrant, 367 U. S. 717 48

Nagoya Associates, Inc. v. Esquire, Inc., 191 F. Supp 379 (S. D. N. Y. 1961) 46

New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254 .. 3, 27, 30, 32, 36, 44, 45, 48, 50

Pauling v. Globe-Democrat Publishing Company, 362 F. 2d 188 (8th Cir. 1966), app. pending 37-38

Pauling v. National Review, Inc., 49 Misc. 2d 975, 269 N. Y. S. 2d 11 (Sup. Ct. N. Y. Co. 1966), app. pend'g. 38

PAGE

Pauling v. News Syndicate Company, 335 F. 2d 659 (2d Cir. 1964), cert. denied, 379 U. S. 968 38
Pennekamp v. Florida, 328 U. S. 331 50
Robinson v. California, 370 U. S. 660 48
Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U. S. 75 .....33, 35, 46
Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U. S. 479 48
Shuttlesworth v. Birmingham, 382 U. S. 87 51
Spano v. New York, 360 U. S. 315 50
Speiser v. Randall, 357 U. S. 513 48
State v. Browne, 86 N. J. Super. 217, 206 A. 2d 591 (App. Div. 1965) 38
Thompson v. Louisville, 362 U. S. 199 51
Toepleman v. United States, 263 F. 2d 697 (4th Cir. 1959), cert. denied sub. nom. Cato Bros., Inc. v. United States, 359 U. S. 989 48
Trop v. Dulles, 356 U. S. 86 48
Universal C. I. T. Credit Corp. v. Jones, 47 So. 2d 359 (La. Ct. App. 1950) (not officially reported) 44
Walker v. Associated Press, Colo. , P. 2d (1966) 37, 41, 42
Walker v. Associated Press, La. App. , So. 2d (1966) 38, 42, 43, 44
Walker v. Courier-Journal and Louisville Times Co., 246 F. Supp. 231 (W. D. Ky. 1965), rev'd on other grounds, F. 2d (6th Cir. 1966) 37, 38, 43

AUTHORITIES

Berney, Libel and the First Amendment—A New Constitutional Privilege, 51 Va. L. Rev. 1 (1965) 38

Brennan, The Supreme Court and the Meiklejohn Interpretation of the First Amendment, 79 Harv. L. Rev. 1 (1965) 38

PAGE

Kalven, The New York Times Case: A Note on "The Central Meaning of the First Amendment", 1964 Sup. Ct. Rev. 191 38

Painter, Republication Problems in the Law of Defamation, 47 Va. L. Rev. 1131 (1961) 45

Pedrick, Freedom of the Press and the Law of Libel: The Modern Revised Translation, 49 Cornell L. Q. 581 (1964) 38

Prosser, Interstate Publication, 51 Mich. L. Rev. 959 (1953) 45

Comment, The Scope of First Amendment Protection for Good Faith Defamatory Error, 75 Yale L. J. 642 (1966) 38

19 Sw. L. J. 399 (1965) 38

16 Syracuse L. Rev. 132 (1964) 38

9 Vill. L. Rev. 534 (1964) 38

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS AND STATUTES CITED

U. S. Constitution, First Amendment 2, 4, 5, 32, 48

U. S. Constitution, Eighth Amendment 48

U. S. Constitution, Fourteenth Amendment § 1 ..... 2, 4, 5, 48, 51

28 U. S. C. Section 1257 (3) 2

Vernon's Texas Civil Statutes, Title 88, Article 5431 2

Vernon's Texas Civil Statutes, Title 88, Article 5432, subsections 4 and 5 3

Vernon's Texas Penal Code, Section 1270 48

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1966

No. 150

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,

Petitioner,

—against—

EDWIN A. WALKER,

Respondent.

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE COURT OF CIVIL APPEALS FOR THE SECOND SUPREME JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS OR, IN THE ALTERNATIVE, TO THE SUPREME COURT OF TEXAS

CITATIONS TO OPINIONS BELOW

The unreported opinion of the Trial Court, contained in a letter to counsel dated July 29, 1964, is printed in the Record, pp. 69-72.

The opinion of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals, dated July 30, 1965, reported at 393 S. W. 2d 671, is printed in the Record, pp. 1527-1551.

JURISDICTION

The judgment of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals was entered on July 30, 1965 (R. 1551).* An application for rehearing was denied on September 17, 1965 (R. 1552).

*All citations to "(R.)" are to the printed Transcript of the Record.

Petitioner's application to the Supreme Court of Texas for a writ of error was denied on February 9, 1966 (R. 1553). Petitioner's motion for a rehearing on its application for a writ of error was denied by the Supreme Court of Texas on March 23, 1966 (R. 1554).

The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under 28 U. S. C. Section 1257(3). This Court granted certiorari on October 10, 1966 (U. S. , 87 S. Ct. 40).

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS AND STATUTES INVOLVED

U. S. Constitution, Amendment I

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

U. S. Constitution, Amendment XIV, § 1.

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Vernon's Texas Civil Statutes, Article 5431

In any action for libel, in determining the extent and source of actual damage and in mitigation of exemplary or punitive damage, the defendant may give in evidence, if specially pleaded, all material facts and circumstances surrounding such claim of damage and the defense thereto, and also all facts and circumstances under which the libelous publication was made, and any public apology, correction or retraction made and published by him of the libel complained of, and may also give in evidence, if specially pleaded in mitigation of exemplary or punitive damage, the intention with which the libelous publication was made. The truth of the statement, or statements, in such publication shall be a defense to such action.

Vernon's Texas Civil Statutes, Article 5432, Subsections 4 and 5

The publication of the following matters by any newspaper or periodical shall be deemed privileged and shall not be made the basis of any action for libel.

* * *

4. A reasonable and fair comment or criticism of the official acts of public officials and of other matters of public concern published for general information.

5. The privilege provided under Sections 1, 2, 3, and 4, of this article shall extend to any first publication of such privileged matter by any newspaper or periodical, and to subsequent publications thereof by it when published as a matter of public concern for general information; but any re-publication of such privileged matter, after the same has ceased to be a matter of such public concern, shall not be deemed privileged, and may be made the basis of an action for libel upon proof that such matter had ceased to be of such public concern and that same was published with actual malice.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. Whether the doctrine enunciated by this Court in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, is limited to public officials or applies to other persons or circumstances:

A. Whether, consistent with the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Federal Constitution, state libel laws may be applied to news reports, made without actual malice, respecting events of profound political and social importance and national public interest, such as the enforcement by the United States Government of judgments of United States courts, and suppression of the riots resulting from the confrontation between Federal and State power in connection therewith which occurred at Oxford, Mississippi, on September 30, 1962, particularly at the behest of one who, like General Edwin A. Walker, wilfully, aggressively and defiantly thrust himself into the vortex of the controversy.

B. Whether, consistent with the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Federal Constitution, state libel laws may be applied to news reports made without actual malice concerning the public activities of persons like General Walker in connection with controversies of profound political and social importance and national public interest, such as those presented by the Oxford confrontation, where such persons are actively attempting to influence the outcome of such controversies and where such persons are, or are generally regarded as being, by virtue of their stature and activities, in a position significantly to influence the resolution of the issues thus presented.

2. Whether an award of general damages of $500,000 for the publication, without actual malice or any proof of pecuniary or other loss, of reports of newsworthy events is so oppressive that it inhibits freedom of expression to an extent which violates the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Federal Constitution.

3. Whether the defense of "fair comment," as construed and applied by the Texas courts in this case, is so limited as to violate the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Federal Constitution.

4. Whether the record in this case on the issues of "substantial truth" and "fair comment" is so lacking in evidentiary support for the judgment below that that judgment constitutes a denial of due process in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

On the night of September 30, 1962, there occurred in Oxford, Mississippi, a fateful confrontation between Federal and State power which arrested the attention of the entire nation, and which has become a milestone in the century-long battle for racial equality.

This confrontation was the culmination of events arising out of an attempt by a single Negro—James Meredith—to gain admission to the then all-white student body of the University of Mississippi and the attempt by the State of Mississippi and its highest elected officials to prevent such admission through invocation of the historically and judicially discredited doctrine of interposition (R. 564-565).*

The events surrounding this confrontation, now an important chapter in the nation's history, directly involved, at one time or another, the President of the United States (R. 598), the Justices of this Court (R. 537-538), the Judges of the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit and the Southern District of Mississippi (R. 541), the Attorney General of the United States (R. 543), the Governor and Lieutenant Governor of Mississippi (R. 542), the Trustees of the University of Mississippi (R. 539-540), the United States Army (R. 546-547), the Mississippi National Guard (R. 600), a massive force of United States Marshals (R. 282), the Mississippi State Highway Patrol (R. 223), and local law enforcement officials (R. 219-220).

---

Meredith* v. Fair, 199 F. Supp. 754 (S. D. Miss. 1961), aff'd. 298 F. 2d 696 (5th Cir. 1962); 202 F. Supp. 224 (S. D. Miss. 1962), motion denied 305 F. 2d 341 (1962), rev'd 305 F. 2d 343 (5th Cir. 1962), stay vacated 306 F. 2d 374 (5th Cir. 1962), cert. denied 371 U. S. 828, stay vacated 83 Sup. Ct. 10; 313 F. 2d 532 (5th Cir. 1962), 313 F. 2d 534 (5th Cir. 1962), cert. denied 372 U. S. 916.

A central figure in the confrontation was General Edwin A. Walker, Respondent here. General Walker—a former General Officer of the United States Army (R. 439-440), the commander of the troops at a similar confrontation in Little Rock in 1957 (R. 439), a man who had resigned his commission in order to be free to engage in political controversy (R. 519, 520) and who thereafter lectured widely on public issues (R. 521-523), a man who had but recently been a candidate for nomination for Governor of Texas (R. 527), a man who had achieved national status and was a self-admitted person of political prominence with an organized political following all his own named the "Friends of Walker" (R. 526)—deliberately and with as much fanfare as he could trumpet thrust himself into the very vortex of the confrontation at Oxford. Yet General Walker now seeks to collect an award of $500,000 in general damages (although he proved no actual damages at trial) because—according to the Texas state courts—the Petitioner, Associated Press, acting in good faith, reported in two respects inaccurately* General Walker's public activities on the occasion of that confrontation (R. 59-61; 69-72; 74-76; 1530-1532).

---

*The finding that the article was inaccurate is not supported by the evidence. To the contrary, the evidence affirmatively and conclusively establishes that the statements complained of were substantially true.

The news reports upon which this action is based were prepared by Petitioner* on the basis of information supplied to Petitioner by Van Savell, a local employee of Petitioner (R. 720-721).

The dispatches read in full text (Pl. Exh. 1-A, 1-B, R. 119-123):

> "October 2, 1962 'Walker, who Sunday night led a charge of students against federal marshals on the Ole Miss Campus, was arrested on four counts including insurrection against the United States.'
>
> "October 3, 1962 (Editors Note: Former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, a key figure in the weekend battling over admission of a Negro to the University of Mississippi, was eating dinner Sunday night when he says he was told there was a 'scene of considerable disturbance' on the University of Mississippi Campus. He went there. Here is the story of Van Savell, 21, Associated Press newsman, who was on the scene and saw what happened.)
>
> "By Van Savell: Oxford, Miss., October 3, 1962 (AP) 'Utilizing my youth to the fullest extent, I dressed as any college student would and easily milled among the several thousand rioters on the University of Mississippi Campus Sunday night.
>
> " 'This allowed me to follow the crowd—a few students and many outsiders—as they charged federal marshals surrounding the century old Lyceum Building. It also brought me into direct contact with former Army Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker,

*Petitioner is a nonprofit, membership corporation engaged in the gathering and dissemination of news to its membership, which consists of newspapers and broadcasting stations.

who is now under arrest on charges of inciting insurrection and seditious conspiracy.

" 'Walker first appeared in the riot area at 8:45 p.m., Sunday near the University Avenue entrance about 300 yds. from the Ole Miss Administration Building.

" 'He was nattily dressed in a black suit, tie and shoes and wore a light tan hat.

" 'The crowd welcomed Walker, although this was the man who commanded the 101st Airborne Division during the 1957 school integration riots at Little Rock, Arkansas.

" 'One unidentified man queried Walker as he approached the group. "General, will you lead us to the steps?"

" 'I observed Walker as he loosened his tie and shirt and nodded "Yes" without speaking. He then conferred with a group of about 15 persons who appeared to be the riot leaders.

" 'The crowd took full advantage of the near-by construction work. They broke new bricks into several pieces, took survey sticks and broken soft drink bottles.

" 'Walker assumed command of the crowd, which I estimated at 1,000 but was delayed for several minutes when a neatly dressed, portly man of about 45 approached the group. He conferred with Walker for several minutes and then joined a group near the front.

" 'Two men took Walker by the arms and they headed for the Lyceum and the federal marshals.

Throughout this time, I was less than six feet from Walker.

" 'This march toward tear gas and some 200 marshals was more effective than the previous attempts. Although Walker was unarmed, the crowd said this was the moral support they needed.

" 'We were met with a heavy barrage of tear gas about 75 yards from the Lyceum steps and went a few feet further when we had to turn back.

" 'Before doing so, many of the rioters hurled their weapons—the bricks, the bottles, rocks and wooden stakes—toward the clustered marshals.

" 'We fled the tear gas and the charging marshals —the crowd racing back to a Confederate soldier's statue near the grove entrance below the Lyceum.

" 'I went to a telephone. A few minutes later I returned and found Walker talking with several students. Shortly thereafter, Walker climbed halfway up the Confederate monument and addressed the crowd.

" 'I heard Walker say that Gov. Barnett had betrayed the People of Mississippi. "But don't let up now," he said, "you may lose this battle, but you will have been heard."

" 'He continued: "This is a dangerous situation. You must be prepared for possible death. If you are not, go home now."

" 'There were cheers. It was apparent that Walker had complete command over the group.

" 'By this time, it was nearly 11:00 p.m. and— I raced to the telephone again. Upon my return, Walker was calmly explaining the "New Frontier Government" to several bystanders. He remained away from the rioting throughout the next few hours, but advised on several tactics.

" 'One Ole Miss student queried the former General, "What can we use to make the tear gas bombs ineffective? Do you know of any way that we can attack and do some damage to those damn Marshals?"

" 'Walker suggested the use of sand to snuff out the tear gas.

" ' "This stuff works real well, but where can you get it?", he asked.

" 'At this time the rioters were using a University fire truck and fire extinguishers in an attempt to make the tear gas bombs ineffective.

" 'I left Walker and walked about 100 yards away where Molotov cocktails—gasoline, in bottles with a fuse—were being made.

" 'Again I left the area for a telephone. As I walked toward a Dormitory with George Bartsch of the Little Rock Associated Press Bureau, we were attacked by Marshals who mistook us for students. We were deluged by tear gas, manhandled, handcuffed and beaten with clubs during a 200 yard walk back to the Lyceum Building.

" 'Thanks to recognition from Chief Marshal James P. McShane, we were quickly released and given freedom in the Marshals' Headquarters.

" 'Within minutes rifle and shotgun fire erupted from the rioting crowd and two men—one a French > newsman—were killed. We considered ourselves lucky to have been arrested and glad to be behind closed, heavily guarded doors.'"

The only statements in the foregoing dispatches which were ultimately asserted to have been libelous of Walker were:

1. "Walker, who Sunday night led a charge of students against federal marshals on the Ole Miss Campus, . . ." (October 2, 1962 report); and
2. "Walker assumed command of the crowd . . ." (October 3, 1962 report).

As could reasonably be anticipated, the record presents considerable conflict as to what transpired on the campus at Ole Miss during the dark, bloody, riot-filled night of September 30, 1962. But even the testimony of General Walker and his witnesses, for whose credibility he has vouched, establishes beyond question and without reference to the testimony of the witnesses called by Petitioner that the conclusory statements of which Walker complains are substantially true and constitute fair comment upon his activities.

Underlying all of the events which transpired is the naggingly persistent question: Why was General Walker of Dallas, Texas at the campus of the University of Mississippi on the night of September 30, 1962?

The answer, we submit, may be found in General Walker's own words and actions at the time:

On September 26, 1962, over radio station KWKH at Shreveport, Louisiana, General Walker issued the following call to arms:

> "It is time to move. We have talked, listened and been pushed around far too much by the anti-> Christ Supreme Court. Rise to a stand beside Governor Ross Barnett at Jackson, Mississippi. Now is the time to be heard. Ten thousand strong from every state in the Union. Rally to the cause of freedom. The battle cry of the Republic. Barnett, Yes, Castro, No. Bring your flags, your tents, and your skillets. It is time. Now or never. The time is when and if the President of the United States commits or uses any troops, Federal or State, in Mississippi. The last time in such a situation I was on the wrong side. That was in Little Rock, Arkansas, in 1957, and 1958. This time I am out of uniform and I am on the right side and I will be there." (R. 545; Def. Ex. 7).

Walker reiterated his call the next morning in a television broadcast from Dallas, during which the following colloquy took place:

Unidentified Voice:

> "General, if forces go, will you lead this force?"

General Walker:

> "This is a cause for freedom. This is Americans, patriotic Americans from all over the nation. It is a movement for Freedom. And I will be there. Rise to a stand beside Governor Ross Barnett at Jackson, Mississippi. Now is the time to be heard. Thousands strong from every state in the Union. Rally to the cause of freedom." (R. 550).

The next evening, on September 28, 1962, General Walker took to the air from New Orleans (R. 559-560):

> "INTERVIEWER: Do you have plans, sir, for rallies, if and when the Federal troops are entered into Mississippi, of a certain point in the state where all your followers will then meet with you to protest the integration if it does come about?

"GENERAL WALKER: I intend to join the movement. There are thousands of people, I am sure, already in Mississippi—probably hundreds of thousands there—that are already standing beside their Governor Barnett. The best place to do this would, of course, be at the capitol or at Oxford, at the University, since that is where the issue is involved, and I am sure that that is where most of the movement will move to, to show the grass roots of movement in this issue."

On September 29, 1962, the day before the riots, and with full knowledge that Governor Barnett had then been held in contempt by the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit (R. 533-534) but was continuing his course of opposition to the admission of James Meredith (R. 583), Walker proceeded to Jackson, Mississippi, where he held yet another press and television conference and said:

"I am in Mississippi—beside Governor Ross Barnett.

"I call for a national protest against the conspiracy from within.

"Rally to the cause of Freedom in righteous indignation, violent vocal protest and bitter silence under the Flag of Mississippi at the use of Federal troops.

"This today is a disgrace to the Nation in 'Dire Peril'—a disgrace beyond the capacity of anyone except its enemies. This is the conspiracy of the > crucifixion by the anti-Christ conspirators of the Supreme Court in their denial of prayer and their betrayal of a nation." (R. 551; Def. Ex. 8).

The next day—September 30, 1962—General Walker arrived at Oxford, and, consistent with his stated purpose to "stand beside Governor Barnett," volunteered his services to the County Sheriff (R. 582). At the time he made this offer, he knew that the Sheriff was under the jurisdiction of the Governor; that the Governor had previously used the police forces of the state, including the Sheriff, to prevent the admission of Meredith to the University; and that the Governor had not since changed his position (R. 582-583).

Late on the afternoon of September 30, 1962, at the Ole Miss Motel in Oxford, General Walker held still another press conference, during which he once again urged defiance of the orders of the Courts and of the Federal Government:

> "As the forces of the New Frontier assemble to the north, let history be witness to the courage and determination that calls us to Oxford to support a courageous Governor. His lawful stand for state sovereignty is supported by thousands of people beyond the state borders now on their way to join you at Oxford." (R. 554-555).*

---

*The General has also admitted that, during the week preceding his expedition to Oxford, he "probably" made the following statement when asked if he recommended that his volunteers go armed:

> "The Administration has indicated that it will do whatever is necessary to enforce this unconstitutional action. I have stated that whatever is necessary to oppose that enforcement and stand behind Govenor Barnett should be done." (R. 575).

The General also admits that he "may" have said:

> "The decision for force will be made in Washington. Evidently it has not been made yet. When and if it is, it's their decision to make. We will move with the punches." (R. 575).

While eating dinner that evening in a restaurant in downtown Oxford, General Walker listened to President Kennedy's speech announcing that James Meredith was in residence on the campus of the University and calling upon the people of Mississippi to preserve law and order (R. 599-602). General Walker's reaction: "Nauseating, nauseating" (R. 603).

Promptly on learning that there was "trouble" on the campus, Walker hurried there (R. 470-471).

"Trouble" was, to say the least, an understatement. By the time the General arrived at the campus, violent, widespread rioting was in progress (R. 150, 155, 170, 179-180, 234-237, 314, 351). The riot, which was to rage throughout the night, resulted in the deaths of two persons and injuries to at least 50 others, the destruction of 16 automobiles, and the arrest of 160 rioters (R. 236, 645, 894, 895).

The crowd, which at times had the earmarks of a lynch mob (R. 213), engaged in an almost continuous series of furious physical attacks on the Federal marshals who were guarding the Lyceum, the school's administration building (R. 235-237). The marshals were attacked with sticks, bricks, bottles, stones, rocks, pieces of concrete benches and even "Molotov cocktails" (R. 147, 176, 285, 358, 401, 636, 858, 859) and were forced to defend themselves with tear gas. Gunfire eventually broke out (R. 353, 386, 402, 896, 897) and the campus, in the words of one of Walker's witnesses, became "a battlefield" (R. 215).

Later that evening, as the rioting and wild confusion intensified, the mob attempted to charge the marshals with a firetruck and then a bulldozer (R. 495-496).

It was into this melee that General Walker voluntarily thrust himself, as he had promised he would (R. 558). So anxious was General Walker to be present in an official capacity, if possible, that, even after he had seen for himself the catastrophic results of the defiance of the Federal Government, he requested a Deputy Sheriff, whom he met on the campus by chance, to deputize him on the spot (R. 238, 611).

Is it any wonder, in the light of his widely publicized and highly intemperate and inflammatory statements, that the rioting students believed Walker had come to assist them and hailed him as their leader: "We have a leader" . . . "General, will you lead us up to the steps?" . . . "Will you get us organized, will you lead us?" (R. 608, 609).*

And is it any wonder, when General Walker delivered a speech from the Confederate Monument to the assembled mob (R. 484) and offered expert advice on how to combat the tear gas with which the Federal marshals were then defending themselves (R. 632), that Van Savell concluded that Walker had indeed "assumed command of the crowd" which had so assiduously sought his leadership?

At the trial, General Walker purported to justify his speech as an attempt to calm the crowd (R. 485). Yet the General himself admits that when an Episcopalian minister, the Reverend Duncan Gray, pleaded with him to help stop the riot, he declined, telling Reverend Gray to his face that the minister's attitude made him ashamed to be an Episcopalian (R. 481).

General Walker also admits that, in his speech, he congratulated the students on their "protest" (R. 632), telling them they had a right to "protest" (R. 628), could continue to "protest" (R. 621), and should "stand by your Governor" (R. 631)—all this at a time when Walker well knew that the "protest" consisted of a series of violent physical attacks on the Federal marshals (R. 631). He also admits telling the rioters that Colonel Birdsong, head of the Mississippi Highway Patrol, had betrayed them—a sentiment clearly calculated to incite and inflame his audience. Walker even went so far as to absolve the mob from responsibility for the havoc they were then creating. He told them that Governor Barnett had not abandoned them (R. 623), thus creating an aura of legality for their actions under the so-called interposition doctrine; that the responsibility for the violence was "on the hands of the Federal Government" (R. 621); and that the forces carrying out the mandate of the Federal Court should have been sent to Cuba, not Oxford (R. 315, 336, 352, 485).

*It is conceded that General Walker was an object of attention (R. 313, 422, 477-478), and that, wherever he went, the crowds followed him and sought his advice (R. 285).

Respondent's own witnesses further testified that General Walker also said "Protest, protest, all you want to, you have a right to protest and they may run out of gas" (R. 284); that he urged the crowd to continue their protest at a time when they were throwing Molotov cocktails and setting cars on fire (R. 285-286); and that he said "You may not win but you will be heard" (R. 692) and "Help is on the way, thousands are coming" (R. 284).*

We need not speculate as to whether other portions of the speech deprecating violence were merely pro forma statements for the record or "aesopian" restatements of Walker's claim that responsibility for the violence rested with the Federal Government. Overall, at least, Walker's statements—even his version of them—could reasonably have been interpreted as a call to renewed and increased violence, and many of those present obviously considered them such.

By virtue of his status as a former United States Major General who had commanded the Federal troops at Little Rock and because of the inflammatory nature of his widely publicized statements in support of Governor Barnett, General Walker, simply by his presence on the campus, became a central figure to whom the rioters looked for leadership. For this reason, the delivery of a speech such as that which even General Walker concedes he made, whether treated separately or taken in conjunction with his admitted conduct before and afterwards, establishes, we believe, the substantial truth and fairness of the conclusion that Walker "assumed command" of the crowd.

*Presumably the "thousands" to whom Walker referred were those whom Walker himself had previously summoned to Oxford with their "flags, tents and skillets" to stand beside Governor Barnett.

The second statement on which the $500,000 jury verdict was predicated was the statement that "Walker . . . led a charge" against the marshals. The trial court defined the term "charge" to mean "A movement toward the marshals, or a group or body of people moving toward an objective", and the term "led" to mean "Activities by a person who directs, moves to action, or encourages in some action or movement" (R. 58).

Measured by these definitions and giving to General Walker the benefit of every reasonable inference, the evidence in this case plainly establishes that on more than one occasion General Walker led a charge.*

General Walker himself concedes that on at least two occasions during the evening he moved in a westerly direction from the area of the Confederate Monument toward the area of the flagpole (R. 478-479, 489-490). Since the Lyceum (where the Federal marshals were gathered) is west of the flagpole, it is obvious that on at least two occasions General Walker advanced toward the Federal marshals.

General Walker denied at trial (R. 490-491) that he was on either occasion "leading a charge", but here is what his own witnesses had to say on that subject:

---

*There are almost as many versions of the "charge" as there are witnesses. But this is to be expected in a situation where, as here, numerous witnesses attempt to recollect events which occurred in murky darkness, and in the midst of violence, bloodshed, tear gas and general confusion.

Talmage Witt, a Deputy Sheriff who was called by the Plaintiff and who was with Walker substantially all of the time Walker was on the campus (R. 284, 285), testified that Walker advanced toward the flagpole on two occasions. On the first occasion, prior to the speech, a small crowd followed him until they were dispersed by tear gas (R. 265-266).

The second occasion is succinctly described in Witt's written statement, which reads in relevant part (Def. Ex. 1, R. 282, 285):

> "After some in the crowd had asked Walker if he would lead them, he stepped down from the side of the monument and said: 'Keep protesting and see if we can get closer.' He then started towards the marshals and the crowd of at least a thousand by that time, followed him. This crowd was armed with sticks, rocks, coca cola bottles and other things, as I have heretofore stated. They seemed to have anything that they could get their hands on, and when they got close enough, they would throw towards the marshals. When the front of this crowd, which General Walker was with, got in about 200 feet of the marshals, they fired another blast of tear gas, and the crowd ran back, with General Walker with them. At all times during this, I was near or in sight of General Walker and stayed in sight of him until about 5 a.m. the next morning."

And further (ibid.):

> "On a number of occasions Walker would walk towards the marshals, or in that general direction, and whenever he did, a large crowd would fall in behind and follow him. In fact, wherever Walker went, the crowd followed. During the time after the first march towards the marshals with Walker in or near the lead, I heard different statements, many of which I cannot remember, but at one time, in talking with a group about the protest they were making, he said, 'good, good, keep it up.' I heard people asking how to snuff out or counteract the tear gas, and Walker told them to use water, and right after that they got a fire truck and hose and began to try to use that to stop the gas."

Charles May, another of Plaintiff's witnesses, testified that he saw Walker walking toward the flagpole with a crowd surrounding him (R. 819-820).

Danny Lee Hunter, who was called on behalf of the Plaintiff, testified that when Walker finished the speech at the Confederate Monument he exhorted his listeners: "Come on, let's go," or "Let's go up and see," and started walking toward the flagpole with practically the entire crowd—estimated at approximately 200 people—following him (R. 708-709).

Plaintiff's witness Edwin Leon Jackson testified that the General walked to the vicinity of the flagpole; that ten or fifteen people followed him; that twenty-five were with him; and that those in front of him were throwing rocks (R. 688-690).

Plaintiff's witness Henry Edwards testified that Walker approached the flagpole, accompanied by some fifty or sixty people (R. 429).

Plaintiff's witness Cecil Cox testified that Walker was in the middle of a group of about twenty-five or thirty people who walked up towards the marshals, some waving a flag of truce and demanding "we want that nigger" (R. 206, 208, 213). Following the speech at the Confederate Monument, Cox saw the General and fifteen or twenty others start toward the Lyceum building (R. 212).

Richard Harvey Sweat, another witness for the Plaintiff, testified that Walker walked toward the Lyceum building before his speech with students around him (R. 154-156) and that he walked toward the flagpole a second time after his speech with about fifteen people, including some who had missiles in their hands (R. 189-196).

Finally, there is the testimony of Alfred Kuettner, a reporter for United Press International. Kuettner's testimony is particularly significant because Respondent, at the trial, sought to contrast the alleged unfair treatment accorded to him by Petitioner with the supposed fair treatment accorded him by UPI (R. 1221-1223). Yet the UPI reporter, testifying for Plaintiff, said that Walker was "more than an interested observer" when he came onto the campus (R. 858); that he gave advice to the rioters and was the focal point of student activity (R. 859); and that he, Kuettner, personally saw Walker advance on the Lyceum with two men, one on each side of him (R. 846-847).

The inescapable conclusion which emerges from the welter of testimony is this: Whether Walker advanced toward the marshals with a small group or a large one, whether the mob was hurling missiles at the marshals or demanding "that nigger" under a flag of truce, whether the advance proceeded at slow march or double-time, it is beyond dispute, even on the testimony offered by the Plaintiff, that Walker, during the four to five hours he was on the campus (R. 225), did, in fact, lead at least two charges on the Federal marshals.

We have so far adverted only to the testimony of Respondent's witnesses, since even this evidence establishes conclusively that General Walker did indeed "assume command of the crowd" and "lead a charge." These conclusions are, however, not only corroborated but amplified by the testimony of Petitioner's witnesses.

That testimony discloses, for example, that General Walker not only agreed to lead the rioters in protesting (R. 1082), but also called upon them to "riot, riot" (R. 932). The evidence also discloses that, at a time when a violent, bloody riot was already in progress, General Walker told the students that "You can continue to protest until Meredith is not admitted" (R. 937). There was further testimony that General Walker exhorted the rioting students to "Give them protest, give them casualties" (R. 1136).

Petitioner's evidence further showed that the General repeatedly sought to incite and encourage the rioters by promising that they would receive reinforcements. For example, there was testimony that General Walker told the students to "keep it up all night," and, using pronouns which identified him with the rioters, said that "We have got more people coming" (R. 1059). There was testimony too, that the General told the rioters that the volunteers he had promised were "around town" and would be "available when they are needed" (R. 1134), and that "We can bring them in if we need them" (Id.). Defendant's witnesses also testified that General Walker told the students, "Stand fast, firm. There are thousands behind you. You will win in the end" (R. 1022).

Other testimony offered by Petitioner strongly confirms that General Walker in fact "assumed command" and "led a charge". Tom Gregory, a staff writer for the Meridian Star and a native of Mississippi, testified, for example, that a large group formed around the General with cries of "He's going up to the Marshals", "General Walker won't let the Marshals stop him" and "Gas won't stop General Walker", after which the General advanced toward the Lyceum Building "at a rather fast clip" with a crowd of about 200 following him (R. 1134-1135).

Doy Gorton, an Ole Miss student, testified that "General Walker went straight toward the Lyceum Building" while "the students and everybody around them started moving in behind General Walker", "yelling rebel yells and cursing and screaming", and that the crowd thereupon advanced, throwing rocks and bricks, until turned back by a volley of tear gas (R. 1097-1098).

Travis Buckley, an attorney from Louin, Mississippi, testified that, in response to cries of "Lead us on, General Walker" and "Be our leader", the General nodded and said "All right, all right, I will", and that the students then gathered around Walker and advanced about 250 yards towards the Lyceum, many of them throwing rocks (R. 1112-1113).

John Charles Hill, a student at Ole Miss, testified that, after the mob shouted "Tell us what to do" and "You are our leader", the General walked toward the Lyceum Building "at a steady pace", and the crowd "sort of fell in behind him" (R. 1059-1061).

The reporter Kingsby Kingsley, a native of Mississippi and an Ole Miss graduate not connected with the Associated Press, saw General Walker walk toward the Lyceum Building, wave his arms and motion to a large group of students to come with him (R. 1122, 1124).

General Walker's attitude toward the violence is reflected in the testimony of Tom Gregory, the Meridian Star staff reporter, who testified that the General called the riot "A splendid protest" and exhorted the crowd to "Give them protest, give them casualties." (R. 1136).

Finally, there is Gregory's contemporaneous report for the Meridian Star, which was written wholly independently of the Associated Press dispatches and at a time when Gregory had not discussed with Savell the events in question. This report, which was published in the Meridian Star on October 1, 1962, reads, in full text (Def. Ex. 29; R. 1138, 1490-92):

"WALKER CHARGES, THEN FALLS BACK

Outsiders Take Part In Campus Rioting

By TOM GREGORY

Star Staff Writer

OXFORD, Miss.—Into the mob walked Edwin C. Walker, former major general of the United States Army.

Around him swirled a whirlpool of humanity and human emotion. Two hundred yards away, a line of gas-masked, club and tear gas-armed federal marshals had turned the ancient Lyceum building into a federal fort.

'Now we have a leader,' screamed somebody. 'Rally to General Walker!'

Walker, wearing a Texas hat and a dark blue suit, walked toward the Lyceum, with perhaps 200 men following him.

'Tear gas won't stop him,' another person yelled. 'Follow General Walker.'

About 50 yards from the federal line, tear gas bombs began falling around the group.

General Edwin Walker (retired), who wouldn't retreat, did.

One of Many

The former Army officer was just one of the number of outsiders—how many will probably never be known—who egged and aided a hard core of Ole Miss students into a rock flinging, destructive riot that left two dead, 75 to 100 injured, at least 31 arrested and seriously damaged the reputation of a university.

I walked through that howling, passionately unthinking mob for more than four hours during the violence here last night. I saw the rock throwers and the agitators.

I stood under a Confederate flag hoisted on the flag pole before the stately Lyceum and watched students and outsiders rush the marshals' line, retreat before tear gas, regroup and charge again—all without any attempt at control.

Most of the rioters were students—although the number of Ole Miss men steadily decreased through the night. The number of outsiders—non-students—steadily increased.

Denim-trousered adults, and teenagers from nearby towns furnished the impetus that kept the college boys at their job of injury and destruction.

One Reference to Meredith

"Do you think they'll leave that nigger here now?" a young student asked nobody in particular shortly after the riot began. In each hand he held a brick.

That was the only direct reference to Negro James Meredith I heard after the rioting began.

Earlier the crowd had attacked at least two newsmen and destroyed a number of cameras and tape recorders, but during the height of the riot, they practically ignored writers taking notes. No cameramen dared take a picture once the situation got out of control.

I wore no identification and was dressed in a short-sleeved white shirt and tie. I was never questioned. Late in the evening, there were so many non-students that nobody questioned anybody who did not have a camera or recorder.

Only a few of the students—I would estimate 200—actually participated in the violence and destruction.

There were incidents of violence almost as soon as the newsmen started arriving on the campus about 7 p.m. But then, almost without warning, the marshals began firing tear gas into the crowd. After that it was a mob scene.

Walker Enters Scene

About an hour after the rioting started General Walker entered the scene.

After his abortive attempt to reach the marshals' line, he confined his activity to speech-making and watching. A crowd gathered around him at the edge of the grove and he finally said, 'All right, I'll speak to them.'

Just prior to that, an Episcopal priest, Rev. Duncan Gray, Jr., had tried to talk him into leaving and taking the crowd with him.

'They'll follow you,' Gray said.

But Walker stood at the foot of the old Confederate monument and began speaking.

He told the crowd there had been a 'sellout.' He said a representative of the governor's office had told him that Gov. Ross Barnett's orders were not to let the marshals on the campus.

After an impromptu whispered conference with a blue-coated follower, Walker said, that a member of the Highway Patrol had been responsible for the sellout.

Again there was a conference and Walker said:

'The name is Birdsong.'

Col. T. B. Birdsong is the head of the Highway Patrol and was in the car that led the first group of marshals to the campus during the afternoon.

Then, referring to the Episcopal priest who had asked him to leave:

'I am ashamed that I am an Episcopalian.'

At this point Rev. Gray appeared in front of the crowd and was forceably taken from the area by men who feared that he would be injured.

Later a group of students attempted to arrange a truce, but were unable to make the deal (it was: no rocks, no tear gas) because of shouts from the crowd that had inched toward the building. Among the truce-triers were members of the Ole Miss football squad.

One of the shouters was a fat, middle aged man who quite obviously was not a student.

'No truce! No truce!' he shouted.

There was no truce. After a while the troops arrived."

Notwithstanding the foregoing, the jury returned a verdict for Respondent for $500,000 in general damages and $300,000 in punitive damages (R. 62-63).

The definition of "malice" contained in the trial court's charge to the jury (R. 60, 61) was more favorable to General Walker than the definition of "actual malice" required by New York Times Co. v. Sullivan. Even so, the trial court found that there was no evidence of malice, set aside the jury's verdict so far as related to punitive damages and entered judgment in favor of Respondent for $500,000 (R. 78).*

*Upon the facts, the Texas courts were clearly correct in holding that there was no evidence to support a finding of malice. Moreover no reason was adduced at trial why Van Savell, a native of Mississippi (R. 719) formerly employed by the segregationist Jackson

An appeal to the Texas Court of Civil Appeals followed, where the judgment was affirmed per curiam (R. 1551, 393 S. W. 2d 671) (1965), and an application for rehearing was denied (R. 1552, 393 S. W. 2d 671) (1965).

An application for a writ of error was thereafter filed with, and duly denied by, the Supreme Court of Texas, the court finding no reversible error (R. 1553). An application for rehearing in the Supreme Court of Texas was also denied (R. 1554).

Petitioner's constitutional claims were uniformly rejected below. Since the Supreme Court of Texas rendered no opinion, we briefly advert, so far as relevant to the constitutional questions here presented, to the opinions of the trial court and the Texas Court of Civil Appeals.

The opinion of the trial court is set forth in a letter to counsel dated July 29, 1964, and poses the constitutional questions as follows (R. 72):

> "Since I have determined that there is no actual malice in this case, the question arises as to whether the rule of New York Times vs. Sullivan (which prohibits a public official recovering damages for libel when there is no actual malice) should apply to a public figure such as plaintiff. If it does, then the entire jury verdict must be set aside, and judgment entered for defendant."

Clarion-Ledger (R. 720), should have had any malice toward General Walker.

In an effort to create an issue of malice without supporting evidence, Respondent has engaged in captious attacks on peripheral details of the Van Savell story, such as the allegedly false statement that two men took General Walker by the arms during one of the charges. Even as to that detail, the evidence is conflicting (R. 269-271). But, even if the contrary testimony on such an inconsequential detail is accepted, no malice is established; similar conflicts occur among General Walker's own witnesses (Compare, e.g., R. 242 with R. 708), and such conflicts were obviously inevitable in the darkness and confusion of the Oxford riots.

In holding the Sullivan doctrine inapplicable, the trial court said (ibid.):

> "The evidence is undisputed that General Walker was a public figure at the time of the riot on the Old Miss Campus.
>
> "Freedom of the press is perhaps the most important protection against tyranny that we find in a free society. Without it, the public could not know whether one's right to speak, to worship his creator as he chooses or to enjoy a fair trial had been abridged. Americans everywhere depend on news media of all types to provide accurate information on the daily affairs of men and nations. This imposes a great duty and responsibility on the news gathering and distributing agencies of this country, and they should be protected to the extent necessary for them to properly function.
>
> "However, I see no compelling reasons of public policy requiring additional defenses to suits for libel. Truth alone should be an adequate defense. The Sullivan case is limited, and I feel it should be limited, in its application to public officials. It does not apply to this case."

The Texas Court of Civil Appeals affirmed, relying, as to the constitutional issues, solely on the authority of a thirty-seven year old law review article and some cases cited to support the proposition that the right of a citizen to defend his reputation "is zealously guarded". The Court said (R. 1542-1543):

> "We find no merit in appellant's contention that the reports, made without malice, are protected from the claim of libel by the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution.

* * *

"We find no application of the authorities cited by the appellant to the facts of this case."

Moreover, the Court held inapplicable the defenses of "substantial truth" and "fair comment", characterizing the latter defense as a "weak defense . . . subject to so many limitations that it is seldom completely applicable." (R. 1540).

The Supreme Court of Texas declined even to hear the case, finding no reversible error in any of the rulings below (R. 1553).

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The doctrine enunciated by this Court in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, should be extended to public men of political prominence, such as Respondent, who deliberately thrust themselves into the vortex of important public events. The essential policy behind Sullivan, that of protecting and promoting free and unfettered discussion of public issues and those who are in a position to influence the resolution of such issues, cannot be implemented by a privilege which extends only to "public officials". Many prominent public figures who hold no public office have the power, to a much greater extent than many "public officials", to influence public thinking on important political and social issues. The application of Sullivan is especially appropriate here, since General Walker deliberately and voluntarily participated centrally in the events at Oxford, Mississippi to such an extent that it would have been impossible to report the facts regarding that fateful confrontation between Federal and State power without describing the General's activities.

The award of $500,000 in general damages, with no proof of actual damages, is, in the circumstances of this case, itself so excessive as to be violative of the First and Fourteenth Amendments. If such awards are under such circumstances permitted to stand, free discussion of major public events will necessarily be substantially and unconstitutionally inhibited. The inhibiting effect is magnified where, as here, the complainant institutes suits in a large number of jurisdictions based on the same dispatches.

The Texas courts, in holding that the statements here complained of were not "fair comment", have so truncated the defense of fair comment as to render it meaningless, thus violating the First and Fourteenth Amendments. To exclude from the scope of the defense of fair comment the conclusory statements that Walker "assumed command" and "led a charge", on the ground that they were "statements of fact", is to impose an unconstitutional restriction upon discussion of public events.

Finally, the record in this case conclusively establishes that the statements here complained of were true or substantially true. The findings of falsity by the jury and the holdings to the same effect by the Texas courts are so totally unsupported by the evidence as to constitute a denial of due process.

ARGUMENT

POINT I

THE SULLIVAN DOCTRINE IS APPLICABLE TO THIS CASE AND PRECLUDES RECOVERY BY RESPONDENT

It plainly appears from the Record that the statements complained of by General Walker are either true or constitute fair comment upon facts which are essentially undisputed. Accordingly, it is possible for this Court to dispose of this case without reaching the broader Constitutional questions here presented (See Points III and IV, infra pp. 48-51).

Those Constitutional questions are, however, of such vital importance to protection of the freedoms of speech and press which are guaranteed by the First Amendment that we believe it appropriate to discuss them at the very outset.

In this connection, the fundamental question here presented is whether the doctrine enunciated by this Court in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, is applicable to Respondent, who, though not a "public official," is a self-proclaimed person of political prominence and influence who chose voluntarily, aggressively and defiantly to thrust himself into the very center of what was perhaps the most fateful confrontation between Federal and State power since the Civil War. We submit that the doctrine is applicable in the circumstances disclosed by this record.

The Texas courts held squarely that there was no evidence of "malice," actual or otherwise, present here. They nevertheless refused to apply the Sullivan doctrine on the sole ground that General Walker was not, at the time of the Oxford riots, a "public official". We submit, however, that the Sullivan doctrine cannot, consistent with the First Amendment, be so limited.

In Sullivan itself, this Court said that its holding was based upon a "profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open" (376 U. S. at 270) and that "freedom of expression upon public questions is secured by the First Amendment" (376 U. S. at 269).*

The controlling significance of this emphasis upon "public issues" and "public questions" has been confirmed by subsequent decisions of this Court.

---

*Except as otherwise indicated, the emphasis supplied to quotations from the language of this Court's opinions is our own.

Thus, in Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64, this Court said (pp. 74-75):

> "Truth may not be the subject of either civil or criminal sanctions where discussion of public affairs is concerned. And since '. . . erroneous statement is inevitable in free debate, and . . . it must be protected if the freedoms of expression are to have the "breathing space" that they "need . . . to survive" . . .,' 376 U. S. at 271-272, only those false statements made with the high degree of awareness of their probable falsity demanded by New York Times may be the subject of either civil or criminal sanctions. For speech concerning public affairs is more than self-expression; it is the essence of self-government."

More recently, in Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U. S. 75, this Court said (p. 85):

> "There is, first, a strong interest in debate on public issues, and, second, a strong interest in debate about those persons who are in a position significantly to influence the resolution of those issues."

And further (p. 86):

> "Society has a pervasive and strong interest in preventing and redressing attacks upon reputation. But in cases like the present, there is tension between this interest and the values nurtured by the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The thrust of New York Times is that when interests in public discussion are particularly strong, as they were in that case, the Constitution limits the protections afforded by the law of defamation."

Finally, as recently as December 5, 1966, in Bond v. Floyd, U. S. , 87 S. Ct. 339, 349 (not yet officially reported), this Court again emphasized:

> "The central commitment of the First Amendment, as summarized in the opinion of the Court in New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 270, 84 S. Ct. 710, 721, 11 L. Ed. 2d 686 (1964), is that 'debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open.'"

The basic issue here presented, therefore, is whether the profound national commitment to free and open discussion of public issues can or should be limited to discussions of the activities of "public officials" or whether such commitment must extend to matters of grave public interest and importance and to participants therein. Petitioner believes there can be no true freedom of discussion concerning such matters unless the Constitutional doctrines enunciated in Sullivan apply, at the very least, to voluntary participants in public controversies, particularly where, as here, such persons have assumed positions of leadership.

In a pluralistic society such as the United States, decisions of far-reaching political and social importance are continuously and significantly influenced by the views and activities of persons who, though public men, are not "public officials." Many persons—including General Walker—with myriad points of view on public issues have the ability far beyond the power of many "public officials" to influence public thinking on such issues. If the participation of such public men in affairs of pressing public importance and concern cannot be the subject of unfettered discussion and comment, then the process of decision, and dissemination of the facts and views necessary to formulate decision, must necessarily be inhibited to a degree utterly incompatible with that open discussion which rests at the heart of our system of government.

Specifically with respect to the case at bar, we ask: How can the story of Oxford be told without free and full discussion of the activities of General Walker? Any attempt to describe the events at Oxford without discussing the activities of this central figure would be not only frustrating, but futile.

It is of obvious national interest and significance when General Walker, a person of self-proclaimed national political prominence, a former General officer of the United States Army still addressed as "General" by Court and counsel, calls upon ten thousand of his fellow citizens from every state in the Union to "bring your flags, your tents and your skillets" to defy the executive and judicial power of the Federal Government and thereafter, when generally acknowledged by the mob to be its leader, plays an active role in a violent and bloody assault upon duly constituted officers of the Federal Government then performing their official duties. Such conduct is particularly ironic, and therefore particularly newsworthy, when that same person, while a public official, had been in his own words "on the wrong side" in a similar confrontation in Little Rock.

Indeed, one could scarcely imagine a factual situation which would fit more precisely the very question which this Court expressly left open in Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75, 86 (n. 12), namely:

> ". . . whether there are other bases for applying the New York Times standards—for example, that in a particular case the interests in reputation are relatively insubstantial, because the subject of discussion has thrust himself into the vortex of the discussion of a question of pressing public concern."

Not only did General Walker "thrust himself into the vortex" of the Oxford confrontation through widely publicized, intemperate statements and actions immediately preceding the bloody riots; he became, in effect, a catalyst for the tragic events which occurred there.

If the actions of every public official from the President of the United States and the Governor of Mississippi to the most junior United States Marshal or Mississippi Deputy Sheriff can freely be discussed and commented upon within the ambit of Sullivan, it would indeed be paradoxical to exclude from that discussion the actions and statements of General Walker who, voluntarily, and with as much publicity as he could muster, traveled from Texas to Mississippi to "stand beside Governor Ross Barnett" in the cause of diehard segregation.

It is no answer to the foregoing to assert, as does General Walker in this case, that the defense of "truth" is sufficient protection for one who seeks to report and comment upon the activities of such persons as Respondent. The basic fallacy of this contention has often been recognized by this Court, most recently in Bond v. Floyd, where the Court once again reiterated that "erroneous statements must be protected to give freedom of expression the breathing space it needs to survive . . . ." 87 S. Ct. at 349. Accord, Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64 at 74. See, also, Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U. S. 296 at 310.

As this Court said in Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, at 279:

> "Allowance of the defense of truth, with the burden of proving it on the defendant, does not mean that only false speech will be deterred. Even courts accepting this defense as an adequate safeguard have recognized the difficulties of adducing legal proofs that the alleged libel was true in all its factual particulars. * * * Under such a rule, would-be critics of official conduct may be deterred from voicing their criticism, even though it is believed to be true and > even though it is in fact true, because of doubt whether it can be proved in court or fear of the expense of having to do so. They tend to make only statements which 'steer far wider of the unlawful zone.' Speiser v. Randall, supra, 357 U. S., at 526. . . . The rule thus dampens the vigor and limits the variety of public debate. It is inconsistent with the First and Fourteenth Amendments."

Events, activities and decisions which become the subject of political controversy are often so complex that the whole truth concerning them can never fully be known or proved. And when, as here, the statements complained of are essentially conclusory in nature, the difficulty of establishing their "truth" is infinitely magnified. Particularly is this true in matters of public controversy involving highly emotional issues, where the dividing line between fact and comment is often difficult to draw.

The press will not be free, unfettered, or, in the case of smaller enterprises, even capable of survival* if the Sullivan doctrine is not extended to persons of political prominence such as General Walker and the "truth" of an article concerning such persons is to be determined by those strongly opposed to its thrust.

Overwhelmingly, the developing law in both state and lower Federal courts supports the extension of Sullivan to persons who, though not public officials, are prominent in the public arena and have taken part in the resolution of issues of public importance. See, e.g., Walker v. Associated Press, Colo. , P. 2d (1966); Walker

*For example, Hodding Carter, publisher of The Delta-Democrat Times, has personally been sued for slander by General Walker on the basis of remarks made about Walker and his cause in a speech made at the University of New Hampshire on October 11, 1962, as a part of that University's "Distinguished Lecture Series". Damages of $2,000,000.00 are sought. Edwin A. Walker v. Hodding Carter, Cause No. 6182, Circuit Court of Washington County, Mississippi.

v. Courier-Journal and Louisville Times Co., 246 F. Supp. 231 (W. D. Ky. 1965), rev'd on other grounds, F. 2d (6th Cir. 1966)*; Pauling v. Globe-Democrat Publishing Company, 362 F. 2d 188 (8th Cir. 1966), app. pend'g; Pauling v. News Syndicate Company, 335 F. 2d 659, 671 (2d Cir. 1964), cert. denied, 379 U. S. 968; Gilberg v. Goffi, 21 App. Div. 2d 517, 251 N. Y. S. 2d 823 (2d Dep't 1964), aff'd, 15 N. Y. 2d 1023, 207 N. E. 2d 620, 260 N. Y. S. 2d 29 (1965); State v. Browne, 86 N. J. Super. 217, 206 A. 2d 591, 598-599 (App. Div. 1965); Pauling v. National Review, 49 Misc. 2d 975, 269 N. Y. S. 2d 11 (Sup. Ct. N. Y. Co. 1966), *app. pend'g.

Of particular interest here are those cases in which the courts have applied the Sullivan doctrine to General Walker himself with respect to the very news reports complained of in this case. Thus, in Walker v. Courier-Journal and Louisville Times Co., 246 F. Supp. 231 (W. D. Ky. 1965), rev'd on other grounds, F. 2d (6th Cir. 1966), the District Court reached the "inescapable conclusion" that Sullivan applied, saying (246 F. Supp. at 233-234):

> "The Plaintiff, Walker, is of course not a 'public official' within the commonly accepted meaning of the words. However, he was, as he identifies himself in his own Complaint, a person of 'political

*For the convenience of the Court, the as yet unreported opinions of the Supreme Court of Colorado and of the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit are annexed hereto as an appendix.

See; also,* Brennan, The Supreme Court and the Meikeljohn Interpretation of the First Amendment, 79 Harv. L. Rev. 1 (1965); Pedrick, Freedom of the Press and the Law of Libel: The Modern Revised Translation, 49 Cornell L. Q. 581 (1964); Kalven, The New York Times Case: A Note on "The Central Meaning of the First Amendment", 1964 Sup. Ct. Rev. 191; Berney, Libel and the First Amendment—A New Constitutional Privilege, 51 Va. L. Rev. 1 (1965); Comment, The Scope of First Amendment Protection for Good Faith Defamatory Error, 75 Yale L. J. 642 (1966); 19 Sw. L. J. 399 (1965); 9 Vill. L. Rev. 534 (1964); 16 Syracuse L. Rev. 132 (1964).

Omitted from this discussion is Walker v. Associated Press, La. App. , So. 2d , (1966) app. pend'g, discussed below at pages 43-45.

prominence.' This Court takes judicial notice that Plaintiff Walker's public life is generally well known to the people of this Nation, that he was the subject of nationwide news reports while on duty as an Army General and also as a candidate for Governor of Texas, and that he has in the past made vigorous public announcements on matters of public concern. Plaintiff was, by his own choosing, present in Oxford, Mississippi, on the occasion of the turmoil after announcing on radio and television his intention to be present there and having called upon others to join with him there in support of his publicly stated position on the matters of public concern there in issue.

"Had not Plaintiff thereby become a 'public man'? Could he not have reasonably foreseen that his being a person of 'political prominence' his presence in Oxford would be taken cognizance of by the press? Had not Walker interwoven his personal status into that of a public one whereby he would become the subject of substantial press, radio and television news comment; thus magnifying the chance that his activities would be 'erroneously' reported? This Court so believes.

"I therefore reach the inescapable conclusion that the protective 'public official' doctrine of 'actual malice' announced in New York Times v. Sullivan is in common reason and should be applicable to a 'public man' as well, and that the Plaintiff, Walker, was such a 'public man' under the circumstances involved here. 'Public men are, as it were, public property.'"

And further (246 F. Supp. at 234):

". . . I am perhaps 'plowing new ground' in legal effect, but also with the accompanying conviction that not to do so would negate the spirit of the Times Opinion which I believe to be a '* * * profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust and wide open * * *.' Public debate cannot be 'uninhibited, robust and wide open' if the news media are compelled to stand legally in awe of error in reporting the words and actions of persons of national prominence and influence (not 'public officials') who are nevertheless voluntarily injecting themselves into matters of grave public concern attempting thereby through use of their leadership and influence, to mold public thought and opinion to their own way of thinking. If any person seeks the 'spotlight' of the stage of public prominence then he must be prepared to accept the errors of the searching beams of the glow thereof, for only in such rays can the public know what role he plays on the stage of public concern—often, regretfully, a stage torn in the turmoil of riot and civil disorder, whereon error in reported occurrence is more apt to become the rule rather than the exception.

"This is particularly so here where open riot and turmoil with accompanying destruction of property, injuries and death turned portions of the University of Mississippi campus into a strife beset no man's land through the dark hours of the night."

The District Court's holding that Sullivan applied was sustained by the Sixth Circuit, which said (Appendix, p. 12a):

"It is apparent, and Appellant alleges in his petition, that he is a person of political prominence, and is a person in a position significantly to influence the resolution of issues of national importance. It is also apparent that Appellant involved himself dramatically into the racial crises in Oxford, > Mississippi; that he 'thrust himself into the vortex of the discussion of a question of pressing public concern.' The motivating force of the Times decision compels its applicability here."

Walker v. Associated Press, Colo. , P. 2d (1966) was another of Respondent's many libel actions against Petitioner. The Supreme Court of Colorado held squarely and unanimously that Sullivan was applicable to General Walker upon the very facts involved in this case. The Colorado Court said (Appendix, p. 7a):

> "The problem is whether the rule announced in the New York Times Company case, where a public official was involved, applies with equal force to a public figure who has voluntarily thrust himself into the vortex of the public discussion of an issue which is of pressing public interest and concern. Plaintiff in the instant case is not a public official, but he admittedly is a public personage who did voluntarily go from his home in Texas to Mississippi at the time when James Meredith, a colored person, was being enrolled in the University of Mississippi, and under such circumstances he most certainly did thrust himself into the vortex of the discussion of a matter of great public concern.
>
> "We now hold that the rule of New York Times Company v. Sullivan, supra, applies to the instant controversy to the end that even though the news release be libelous per se, plaintiff still cannot recover unless he is able to show actual malice, as defined in the New York Times Company case, on the part of Associated Press."

The case before this Court represents one of the most serious—and to date successful—attacks ever made on freedom of the press. What is here at stake is nothing less than the fundamental right of news media to publish and disseminate, without fear or favor, good faith reports and comment concerning events of national significance and persons of political prominence who are involved or involve themselves in such events.

This is but one of at least fifteen cases brought by General Walker against the Associated Press, its members, or both, arising out of news reports identical to or substantially the same as those now before this Court. In those fifteen cases, Respondent seeks damages aggregating some $33,250,000.*

These cases were for the most part filed in forums in Southern or border states where it could reasonably be anticipated that juries would share the belief, widely held in the South, that the South's position in the segregation controversy had been grossly falsified and maliciously reported by national news media, and might therefore be influenced, in determining the issues of liability and damages, by the widespread regional feeling that "irresponsible outsiders" should be taught a lesson.

---

* I CASES NAMING ASSOCIATED PRESS AS A DEFENDANT

Name of case	Court in which filed and docket number	Damages demanded in complaint
Walker v. The Associated Press	District Court, Tarrant County, Texas, No. 16624	$2,000,000
Walker v. The Associated Press	Circuit Court of Duval County, Florida, Civil Action No. 64-246-L; removed to U. S. District Court, Middle District of Florida, No. 64-267-Civil-J	$2,000,000
Walker v. The Associated Press	Circuit Court of Pulaski County, Arkansas, No. 58859; removed to U. S. District Court, Eastern District of Arkansas, No. LR-65-C-178	$1,000,000
Walker v. Associated Press and Times-Picayune Publishing Corporation	District Court, Caddo Parish, Louisiana, Number 160,536	$2,250,000
Walker v. The Denver Post, Inc. and The Associated Press	District Court, City and County of Denver, Colorado, Civ. No. B66072	$1,000,000
Walker v. The Kansas City Star Company and The Associated Press	Circuit Court, Jackson County, Missouri, No. 133,768	$1,000,000

That this is what in fact occurred is demonstrated by this very case, in which the jury awarded some $300,000 in punitive damages on a record which the Texas courts thereafter held, as a matter of law, was wholly devoid of any evidence of malice and by the further award of some $500,000 in general damages, although not one penny of actual damages was established or even claimed.

In the only other case heretofore tried—that in the Louisiana state courts—the jury returned a verdict of $3,000,000, although Respondent himself had only sought damages of $2,250,000 and punitive damages are not allow-

Name of case	Court in which filed and docket number	Damages demanded in compliant
Walker v. Savell and The Associated Press	Circuit Court, Lafayette County, Mississippi, No. 7137; removed to U. S. District Court, Northern District of Mississippi, No. W-C-34-62; Subsequently dismissed as to Associated Press for lack of jurisdiction.	$2,000,000
II Cases Not Naming Associated Press as a Defendant
Walker v. Courier-Journal and Louisville Times Company, Inc. and WHAS, Inc.	U. S. District Court, Western District of Kentucky, Civil Action 4639	$2,000,000
Walker v. Times Publishing Company	Circuit Court, Pinellas County, Florida, No. 17,694-L	$2,000,000
Walker v. The Pulitzer Publishing Company	U. S. District Court, Eastern District of Missouri, Eastern Division, No. 63 C 361(1)	$2,000,000
Walker v. Atlanta Newspapers, Inc. and Ralph McGill	U. S. District Court, Northern District of Georgia, Civ. No. 8590	$10,000,000
Walker v. The Journal Company	U. S. District Court, Eastern District of Wisconsin, Civ. No. 64-C-270	$2,000,000
Walker v. The Journal Company	U. S. District Court, Eastern District of Wisconsin, Civ. No. 64-C-276	$2,000,000
Walker v. The Gazette Publishing Company, Inc.	Circuit Court, Pulaski County, Arkansas, Civ. No. 58857	$1,000,000
Walker v. Arkansas Democrat Company	Circuit Court, Pulaski County, Arkansas, Civil No. 58858	$1,000,000
	Total	$33,250,000

able in a civil action in Louisiana.* On appeal, although the judgment was reduced to $75,000, the Louisiana Court of Appeals held as a fact that actual malice had been established and thus avoided a determination as to the applicability of Sullivan.

These cases are striking examples of the effectiveness of the technique of converting the libel laws into weapons to punish those disseminating information about public controversies which arouse deep emotions—in this case the attempts by hard-core segregationists, in public office and out, to perpetuate a system of racial segregation which is patently unconstitutional.

The resultant threat to fundamental freedoms of speech and press is self-evident. As this Court said in Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 278, in speaking of a libel award against the New York Times in Alabama, also for half a million dollars:

> "Whether or not a newspaper can survive a succession of such judgments, the pall of fear and timidity imposed upon those who would give voice to public criticism is an atmosphere in which the First Amendment freedoms cannot survive."

If ever there was a case which, in the interest of free speech and the public good, requires the extension of the Sullivan doctrine, this is that case.

---

*See, e.g., Gugert v. New Orleans Independent Laundries, 181 So. 653 (La. Ct. App., 1938) (not officially reported); Heeb v. Codifer & Bonnabel, 162 La. 139, 110 So. 178 (1926); Brian v. Harper, 144 La. 585, 588, 80 So. 885, 886 (1919); Universal C. I. T. Credit Corp. v. Jones, 47 So. 2d 359 (La. Ct. App. 1950) (not officially reported).

Petitioner has applied to the Supreme Court of Louisiana for a writ of error.

This technique is not novel. It is patterned, apparently, on that adopted by Alabama and its officials in attempting to punish the New York Times for criticizing Alabama's conduct in the desegregation controversy (New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 278, 292).

In this, the first to be tried of the fifteen lawsuits brought by Respondent against Petitioner, its members or both, the Texas courts have all expressly held that Respondent failed to prove malice, actual or otherwise, and the record demonstrates beyond doubt that there could have been none. Yet, in the second of the suits to be tried, a Louisiana trial court and the Louisiana Court of Appeals, on precisely the same operative facts, have sustained a finding by a jury that Petitioner's publication was motivated by "actual malice". It may reasonably be anticipated that, in the remaining suits, Respondent will attempt again and again to circumvent any holding that Sullivan applies to him by urging in each of those cases that dissemination of the dispatches here involved was motivated by "actual malice".

We believe, therefore, that a holding which extends Sullivan to Respondent may neither fully resolve the constitutional issues presented by this and Walker's other suits, nor, as a practical matter, relieve Petitioner of the great expense and effort of defending, with whatever ultimate success, the many other actions now pending. This Court has already recognized, in Sullivan (376 U. S. 254, 279), that the "fear of the expense" of proving truth might deter publication and restrict discussion of questions of public importance. How much greater is the deterrent when it is magnified, as here, by a multiplicity of suits arising out of the same dispatches. The threat inherent in the pendency of these suits, and the burden of defense thus placed upon Petitioner is, we submit, as unconstitutionally inhibiting a restraint on free discussion as a single extravagant award. See, e.g., Painter, Republication Problems in the Law of Defamation, 47 Va. L. Rev. 1131, 1138 (1961); Prosser, Interstate Publication, 51 Mich. L. Rev. 959, 968-970 (1953); Hartmann v. Time, 166 F. 2d 127, 134 (3rd Cir.

1948), cert. denied, 334 U. S. 838; Nagoya Associates, Inc. v. Esquire, Inc., 191 F. Supp. 379, 382 (S. D. N. Y. 1961).*

General Walker's multi-state, multi-million dollar attack on Petitioner and its members is a striking illustration of the dangers which led a minority of this Court to question the efficacy of the actual malice qualification. As Mr. Justice Douglas said, in his concurring opinion in Garrison (379 U. S. 64 at 81):

> "If malice is all that is needed, inferences from facts as found by the jury will easily oblige."

Or in the words of Mr. Justice Black, in his concurring opinion in Rosenblatt (383 U. S. 75 at 95):

> "Half-million-dollar judgments for libel damages like those awarded against the New York Times will not be stopped by requirements that 'malice' be found, however that term is defined. Such a requirement is little protection against high emotions and deep prejudices which frequently pervade local communities where libel suits are tried. And this Court cannot and should not limit its protection against such press-destroying judgments by reviewing the evidence, findings, and court ruling only on a case-by-case basis."

For all these reasons, we ask this Court not only to hold that the Sullivan doctrine is applicable to Respondent, but, in fulfillment of its governing role in the administration of justice in cases involving constitutional issues, to rule, also, that Respondent, in failing to prove actual malice in this case, is hereafter precluded from unconstitutionally restricting free speech and press by raising the issue of actual malice in any of his other actions against Petitioner which are based on the same or substantially the same facts.

*Indeed, the expenses incurred by Petitioner and its members in defending Respondent's pending actions has already greatly exceeded the judgment in this case.

POINT II

THE AWARD OF $500,000 GENERAL DAMAGES IN THIS CASE ITSELF CONSTITUTES AN ABRIDGMENT OF CONSTITUTIONAL PROTECTION.

One of the most shocking features of this case is the inordinate and unconscionable size of the award—half a million dollars in "general" damages where no actual pecuniary or other damage was or could be shown.

The enormous award was plainly intended, not to compensate, but to punish and deter; to wreak vengeance on Petitioner for disseminating over its news service good faith reports of the Oxford riots and the related activities of General Walker, and to deter Associated Press, its member newspapers and other news media from gathering and disseminating news on the integration issue deemed unfavorable to the segregationist cause or critical of prevalent Southern views.

Permitted to stand, the award will indeed deter and perhaps entirely preclude news gathering and disseminating institutions from performing a function vital to any free society—the disclosure and discussion of controversial public issues and personalties. What newspaper, what magazine, what wire service would, as a practical matter, disseminate a report unfavorable to General Walker or any other controversial public or political figure if there were substantial risk of a judgment for half a million dollars? Or if that news medium could be forced to defend—perhaps successfully, but nevertheless at great cost and effort—libel suits, however specious, brought wherever the plaintiff believes he has found a forum friendly to himself or antagonistic to the news medium involved?

We respectfully submit that, in and of itself, the inexplicably high award for compensatory damages alleged to have been suffered in Texas alone presents a substantial constitutional question under the First and Fourteenth Amendments.* The repressive effect of such an award upon freedom of expression is so patent, the inhibiting effect upon the presentation of conflicting and controversial political argument and discussion so plain, the punishment for such a presentation so burdensome and oppressive that this Court should not, consistent with the First Amendment, permit its imposition. Cf. New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254; Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U. S. 58; Marcus v. Search Warrant, 367 U. S. 717; Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U. S. 479; Speiser v. Randall, 357 U. S. 513.

POINT III

THE DEFENSE OF "FAIR COMMENT" AS CONSTRUED AND APPLIED BY THE COURTS BELOW IS SO LIMITED AS TO BE UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

Petitioner contended throughout the proceedings below that the conclusory statements which were held libelous constituted "fair comment" on the activities of General Walker at Oxford. The Texas courts, however, held otherwise. In so holding, those courts so truncated the doctrine of fair comment as to leave it meaningless, and thus violated the First Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

The Texas Court of Civil Appeals rejected the fair comment defense on the ground that the statements that Walker "assumed command" and "led a charge" were not

*Although the judgment is civil in form, we believe an award which is two hundred and fifty times the maximum statutory fine for criminal libel (see Vernon's Texas Penal Code, § 1270) is, in the circumstances of this case, a classic case of "cruel and unusual punishment." The "cruel and unusual punishment" provisions of the Eighth Amendment, applicable to the states by virtue of the due process provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment (Robinson v. California, 370 U. S. 660) relate, by analogy at least, to civil actions and proceedings. Toepleman v. United States, 263 F. 2d 697, 700 (4th Cir. 1959), cert. denied sub nom. Cato Bros., Inc. v. United States, 359 U. S. 989; Cf. Trop v. Dulles, 356 U. S. 86.

"fair comment," but "statements of fact" (R. 1537). The danger of a holding based on so illusory a distinction has long been recognized. In Coleman v. MacLennan, 78 Kan. 711, 98 Pac. 281 (1908), the Court, after emphasizing the "insensible gradations" which often exist between comment and fact, said (98 Pac. at p. 291):

> "In keeping plain the distinction between comment and statements of fact, the courts of some of the states leave the law very much in the attitude of saying to the newspaper: 'You have full liberty of free discussion, provided, however, you say nothing that counts.'"

The dangers envisaged by the Kansas court could scarcely be better illustrated than by this case. The relevant facts as set forth above, despite some conflict as to the details, are essentially undisputed. If on the basis of those facts a news medium cannot make the comment in good faith that General Walker "assumed command of the crowd" and "led a charge" of students on the Federal marshals without risking a libel judgment of $500,000 then the freedoms of press and speech guaranteed by the Federal Constitution become illusory.

It is no answer to assert, as have the courts below, that a news medium need have no fears if it but accurately reports the "facts." In this case, there was no finding that any of the underlying facts set forth in the articles were false, but rather that Petitioner's conclusion or opinion of Walker's role, based on the facts contained in the articles and developed at trial, was not "fair comment." Obviously, any comment critical of Walker would not have been considered "fair" by a jury under all the circumstances of the trial.

Where, as here, the defense of "fair comment" is rejected by the Texas Court of Civil Appeals as a "weak defense . . . subject to so many limitations that it is seldom completely applicable" (R. 1540), and where, as here, such limitations are invoked to impose a liability of half a million dollars, it is obvious that the libel laws have been used to achieve a result which the Federal Constitution prohibits.

If this decision is permitted to stand, the only prudent course open to the press will be to refrain from commenting on events—however significant and newsworthy—where such comments may reflect unfavorably upon a participant in a public controversy arousing deep emotional responses which differ in the various regions of our country. For all practical purposes, the doctrine of fair comment would be of no avail and useless as a protection to news media involved in such controversies.

This Court has already indicated that there are Federal Constitutional boundaries limiting the extent to which the states can circumscribe the availability and applicability of the defense of "fair comment." See New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 292, n. 30. Petitioner submits that those boundaries have here been violated.

POINT IV

THE STATEMENTS COMPLAINED OF ARE TRUE, AND THE JURY'S CONTRARY FINDING AND CONSEQUENT AWARD CONSTITUTE A DENIAL OF DUE PROCESS.

When all is said and done, and apart from the other constitutional questions which permeate this case, the fact remains, as we observed at the very outset of this discussion, that there is no more support for the jury's finding of falsity than there was for its finding of malice.* To award half a million dollars where there is no evidence establishing the underlying cause of action is, of course, a denial of due process—indeed, one of the most obvious denials of due process that can be imagined. Shuttleworth v. Birmingham, 382 U. S. 87; Garner v. Louisiana, 368 U. S. 157; Thompson v. Louisville, 362 U. S. 199. We respectfully submit that this Court, as the ultimate guardian of the rights guaranteed by the Constitution, should correct this grave injustice by holding that the record establishes the truth or substantial truth of the publications complained of and that the jury's contrary finding and consequent award constitute a denial of due process in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment.

*It is, of course, firmly settled that this Court may examine independently the factual record to insure that principles of Federal constitutional law are correctly applied. New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 285; Edwards v. South Carolina, 372 U. S. 229, 235; Blackburn v. Alabama, 361 U. S. 199, 205, n. 5; Spano v. New York, 360 U. S. 315, 316. "Were it otherwise the constitutional limits of free expression in the Nation would vary with state lines." Pennekamp v. Florida, 328 U. S. 331, 335.

CONCLUSION

For each of the foregoing reasons, Petitioner asks this Court to reverse the judgments of the Texas courts upon the verdict with respect to special issues Nos. 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 7 and 9; to vacate the $500,000 award; to direct that the complaint herein be dismissed with prejudice; and to award costs to Petitioner.

Petitioner further requests that this Court expressly hold that Respondent is precluded from raising the issue of "actual malice" in any of his other actions against Petitioner which are based on the same or substantially the same facts.

Respectfully submitted,

WILLIAM P. ROGERS
LEO P. LARKIN, JR.
STANLEY GODOFSKY
200 Park Avenue
New York, New York 10017

ARTHUR MOYNIHAN
50 Rockefeller Plaza
New York, New York

J. A. GOOCH
SLOAN B. BLAIR
1800 First National Building
Fort Worth, Texas

Attorneys for Petitioner
The Associated Press

APPENDIX

Texts of Unreported Opinions

1. Walker v. Associated Press, Colo. , P. 2d (1966)

No. 21732

EDWIN A. WALKER,
Plaintiff in Error,

v.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,
Defendant in Error.

ERROR TO THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF DENVER

HON. SAUL PINCHICK, Judge

EN BANC

JUDGMENT AFFIRMED IN PART AND REVERSED IN PART

EARL J. HOWER,
CLYDE J. WATTS,
Attorneys for Plaintiff in Error.

WINNER, BERGE, MARTIN & CAMFIELD,
Attorneys for Defendant in Error.

MR. JUSTICE MCWILLIAMS DELIVERED THE OPINION OF THE COURT.

Edwin A. Walker, hereinafter referred to as the plaintiff, brought a libel action against the Associated Press, a

New York corporation, and the The Denver Post, Inc., a Colorado corporation. In this writ of error we are concerned only with plaintiff's three claims for relief against the one defendant, Associated Press.

After permitting the plaintiff to amend his complaint on several occasions, the trial court eventually granted a motion to dismiss filed by the Associated Press, and judgment of dismissal followed. It is this judgment of dismissal which the plaintiff now seeks to have reversed.

In order to better understand this matter it becomes necessary to analyze with some degree of particularity the several complaints, and amendments thereto, filed by the plaintiff. This action was commenced by the plaintiff on September 30, 1963 with the filing of a complaint. In his original complaint the plaintiff claimed to have been libeled in the following publications: (1) an editorial appearing in The Denver Post on October 1, 1962; (2) a news article appearing in The Denver Post on October 2, 1962; and (3) an Associated Press news release of October 3, 1962, which was forwarded by the Associated Press to the Denver Post.

Our examination of the original complaint leads us to conclude that by the words used in this complaint plaintiff intended to charge, and did charge, the Associated Press with only one allegedly libelous publication, i.e., its news release of October 3, 1962, and that it was The Denver Post which was said to have libeled plaintiff in its editorial of October 1, 1962 and in its news article of October 2, 1962. Be that as it may, in our view on November 14, 1963 plaintiff cleared up any possible doubt on this particular matter by quite definitely charging Associated Press with only one libelous publication, namely its news release of October 3, 1962.

Thereafter, on February 17, 1964, the trial court granted the motion to dismiss filed by Associated Press, and the plaintiff was granted time within which to file a second complaint. This the plaintiff did on March 11, 1964, in what he chose to denominate as an "Amended Complaint." This amended complaint contained what plaintiff labeled as counts one, two and three. Count one related to The Denver Post editorial of October 1, 1962, but in this pleading both The Denver Post and the Associated Press were charged with this particular publication.

Count two of the amended complaint related to The Denver Post news article of October 2, 1962, and again in this amended complaint both the Associated Press and The Denver Post were charged with this publication.

Count three of the amended complaint was directed solely against the Associated Press, and it concerned the press release of October 3, 1962.

To this amended complaint Associated Press again filed a motion to dismiss alleging, as to counts one and two, that "such alleged claims . . . did not accrue within one year prior to the filing of the amended complaint."

The trial court agreed with this contention of Associated Press, and dismissed these particular counts on the ground that they were barred by the one year statute of limitation. C. R. S. 1963, 87-1-2. In our handling of this writ of error we shall first concern ourselves with the propriety of this particular ruling, laying aside for a moment a consideration of the third count in the amended complaint.

Counsel apparently agree that if counts one and two represent "new" claims against Associated Press, then each is barred by the applicable statute of limitation. Plaintiff argues, however, that counts one and two are not really new claims, but on the contrary relate back to the original complaint. Being, then, merely an enlargement upon the averments in the original complaint, plaintiff urges that counts one and two are therefore not barred by the one year statute of limitation. See Platte Valley Motor Co. v. Wagner, 130 Colo. 365, 278 P. 2d 870; Smith v. La Forge, 170 Kans. 677, 228 P. 2d 509, and Doyle v. Okla. Press Pub. Co., 206 Okla. 254, 242 P. 2d 155.

Associated Press argues, to the contrary, that counts one and two represent new claims as to it, even though not to The Denver Post. In other words, it is pointed out that the Associated Press, as opposed to The Denver Post, was never charged with the publication of The Denver Post editorial of October 1, 1962 or The Denver Post news article of October 2, 1962 until March 11, 1964, the date when the amended complaint was filed.

In the original complaint it would appear that The Denver Post was charged with two libelous publications, i.e., its editorial of October 1, 1962 and its news article of October 2, 1962, and that the Associated Press was charged with only one libelous publication, i.e., its news release of October 3, 1962, which it is observed occurred subsequent to the dates of the allegedly libelous publications of The Denver Post.

If, however, there be doubt as to which defendant was charged with libelous publication, the matter in our mind was, as already mentioned, fully cleared up by the plaintiff himself when he filed his Amendment to Complaint on November 14, 1963. In that pleading it is quite evident that Associated Press is charged with only one libelous publication, namely its press release of October 3, 1962. Hence, when plaintiff in his Amended Complaint of March 11, 1964 avers that the Associated Press also published the allegedly libelous editorial and news article appearing in The Denver Post, he truly is setting forth "new" claims, "new" at least as to the one defendant, the Associated Press.

These three separate publications, of course, constitute separate and distinct claims. See Hartmann v. Time, Inc., 60 N. Y. S. 2d 209. Accordingly, we conclude that counts one and two in the amended complaint constitute "new" claims against the Associated Press, and not having been asserted against Associated Press within one year after the cause of action accrued, are now barred by the provision of C. R. S. 1963, 87-1-2. See Evans v. The Republican Publishing Company, 20 Colo. App. 281, 78 Pac. 311 and Spears Free Clinic v. Maier, 128 Colo. 263, 261 P. 2d 489.

We shall now proceed to a consideration of count three in the amended complaint. In all of his various pleadings the plaintiff alleged only general—as opposed to special—damages. And this was so even though he was given more than adequate opportunity by the trial court to amend his several complaints in this regard. However, he chose not to so do, and the trial court eventually dismissed count three of the amended complaint for this failure on the part of plaintiff to allege special damages. The reasoning of the trial court was that the allegedly libelous press release was only libelous per quod, and that in such event the plaintiff had to allege special damages, and the mere allegation of general damages was legally insufficient.

Plaintiff admits that he only alleged general damages, but contends that such is sufficient because, contrary to the determination made by the trial court, the news release—he claims—was libelous per se. So, this particular problem narrows down to a determination as to whether the press release of Associated Press under the date of October 3, 1962 is libelous per se, or per quod.

Plaintiff's overall position in this regard is that the Associated Press release of October 3, 1962 falsely charges him with the commission of a crime, namely a violation of 18 U. S. C. A. 111, which provides that he who "assaults, resists, opposes, intimidates or interferes" with, among other persons, a United States Marshal while engaging in the performance of his official duties shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than three years, or both.

Plaintiff and Associated Press agree that if the latter in its press release of October 3, 1962 falsely charged the plaintiff with the commission of a crime, then the publication is libelous per se. See Cinquanta v. Burdett, 154 Colo. 37, 388 P. 2d 779, 1 A. L. R. 3rd 840 and O'Cana v. Espinosa, 141 Colo. 371, 347 P. 2d 1118. Associated Press contends, however, that its press release of October 3, 1962 does not charge plaintiff with having committed a crime, and that it is only by innuendo that such could ever be "read into" this particular release.

Our study of this news release of October 3, 1962 leads us to the conclusion that this particular publication is libelous per se in that it does charge the plaintiff with the commission of a crime. At the very least this news release charges plaintiff with taking the "command" of a theretofore unorganized mob which was resisting and interfering with United States Marshals who were about their official business by "charging" them, by hurling "bricks, bottles, rocks and wooden stakes toward the clustered marshals." One can, of course, be charged with the commission of a crime even though it is not done in the exact language of the statute. From our reading of the news release plaintiff was clearly charged with resisting and interfering with U. S. Marshals who were about their official business, and was also charged with aiding and abetting others who were similarly engaged in various acts constituting resistance and interference. If the language used in this press release doesn't equate to "resistance" and "interference", then it would be difficult to know what would. Hence, we hold the press release in quesiton as libelous per se.

The Associated Press goes on to argue that even though its press release be deemed libelous per se, count three of the amended complaint is still subject to a motion to dismiss on the basis of New York Times Company v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 84 S. Ct. 710, 11 L. Ed. 2d 686, 95 A. L. R. 2d 1412. In our view of this matter the rule laid down in the New York Times case does have application to the instant controversy, but, as will be developed, such does not justify an outright dismissal of count three of the amended complaint on a motion to dismiss.

In the New York Times Company case the Supreme Court of the United States rather severely limited the right of public officials to recover for libelous newspaper articles by holding that the constitutional safeguards regarding freedom of speech and press require that a public official in a libel action against a critic of his official conduct must show actual malice on the part of such critic before the public official can make any recovery, and that such is true even though the statements are libelous per se.

The problem is whether the rule announced in the New York Times Company case, where a public official was involved, applies with equal force to a public figure who has voluntarily thrust himself into the vortex of the public discussion of an issue which is of pressing public interest and concern. Plaintiff in the instant case is not a public official, but he admittedly is a public personage who did voluntarily go from his home in Texas to Mississippi at the time when James Meredith, a colored person, was being enrolled in the University of Mississippi, and under such circumstances he most certainly did thrust himself into the vortex of the discussion of a matter of great public concern.

We now hold that the rule of New York Times Company v. Sullivan, supra, applies to the instant controversy to the end that even though the news release be libelous per se, plaintiff still cannot recover unless he is able to show actual malice, as defined in the New York Times Company case, on the part of Associated Press.

We recognize that there is authority from other jurisdictions which looks away from such a holding. See, e.g., Fignole v. The Curtis Publishing Company, 247 F. Supp. 595. But in our considered view the rationale of New York Times Company v. Sullivan, supra, clearly suggests that the rule announced therein should apply to one in the position of this plaintiff. And there is authority from other jurisdictions which supports our conclusion in this regard. Accordingly, we subscribe to the reasoning found, for example, in Walker v. Courier-Journal & Louisville Times Co., 246 F. Supp. 231. See, also, Pauling v. National Review, Inc., 269 N. Y. S. 2d 11; Pauling v. News Syndicate Company, Inc., 335 F. 2d 659 and Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U. S. 75, 86 S. Ct. 669, 15 L. Ed. 2d 597.

Even though the rule of New York Times Company v. Sullivan, supra, does have applicability to the instant matter, such determination does not justify a dismissal of count three of the amended complaint on a motion to dismiss. Plaintiff in count three of his amended complaint alleges that the Associated Press published its press release of October 3, 1962 with actual malice, and his pleading in this regard is, therefore, sufficient to bring him even within the narrow rule announced in New York Times Company v. Sullivan, supra.

Associated Press finally argues that plaintiff has made a judicial admission that the Associated Press acted without actual malice by amending his pleading so as to incorporate by reference plaintiff's libel action brought in Texas against the Associated Press, which action was apparently based on the same press release of October 3, 1962. See Associated Press v. Walker, Tex. App. , 393 S. W. 2d 671.

Without belaboring this point, we are of the view that the position of Associated Press in this regard is not well-taken and that this matter cannot be injected in this manner into the instant proceeding.

The judgments of dismissal as to counts one and two of the amended complaint are affirmed. The judgment of dismissal as to count three of the amended complaint is reversed and the cause is remanded with directions that further proceedings in connection therewith be consonant with the views herein expressed.

Mr. Chief Justice Sutton not participating.

2. Walker v. Courier-Journal and Louisville Times Co., F. 2d (6th Cir. 1966) rev'g. 246 F. Supp. 231 (W. D. Ky. 1965)

No. 16999

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS

FOR THE SIXTH CIRCUIT

EDWIN A. WALKER,
Plaintiff-Appellant,

v.

COURIER-JOURNAL AND LOUISVILLE TIMES COMPANY, INC. AND WHAS, INC., Defendants-Appellees.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Western District of Kentucky at Louisville.

Decided October 28, 1966.

Before: WEICK, Chief Judge, PHILLIPS and CELEBREZZE, Circuit Judges.

PER CURIAM: This is an appeal from an order sustaining a motion to dismiss a libel action instituted by Appellant, retired Major General Edwin Walker. In his complaint, Appellant alleged that the defendants Courier-Journal, Louisville Times Company and WHAS, Inc., falsely and maliciously reported that Appellant participated in riots in Oxford, Mississippi by leading a charge of brick throwing students against United States Marshals. The riots occurred as a result of the integration of white and negro students at the University of Mississippi. Appellant alleges in his complaint that he:

> ". . . was . . . a person of political prominence who had in public announcements vigorously asserted his adherence to accepted and constitutionally defined limitations upon the powers of the central government and to principles of separation of powers as between the central government and the several States."

On the basis of New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 83 S. Ct. 710, 11 L. Ed. 2d 686 (1964), the District Court dismissed Appellant's complaint. We agree with the District Court as to the applicability of New York Times. Applying the doctrine of New York Times, however, we disagree with the District Court in not giving an opportunity to Appellant to offer evidence to show malice.

The Supreme Court said in Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U. S. 75, 86 S. Ct. 669, 15 L. Ed. 2d 597 (1966):

> "The motivating force for the decision in New York Times was twofold. We expressed a profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open, and that [such debate] may well include vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials. (Citation omitted). There is, first, a strong interest in debate on public issues, and, second, a strong interest in debate about those persons who are in a position significantly to influence the resolution of those issues. Criticism of government is at the very center of the constitutionally protected area of free discussion. * * *

> "Society has a pervasive and strong interest in preventing and redressing attacks upon reputation. But in cases like the present, there is tension between this interest and the values nurtured by the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The thrust of New York Times is that when interests in public discussion are particularly strong, as they were in that case, the Constitution limits the protections afforded by the law of defamation."

In footnote 12, the Court said:

> "We are treating here only the element of public position, since that is all that has been argued and briefed. We intimate no view whatever whether there are other bases for applying the New York Times standards—for example that in a particular case the interests in reputation are relatively insubstantial, because the subject of discussion has thrust himself into the vortex of the discussion of a question of pressing public concern."

It is apparent, and Appellant alleges in his petition, that he is a person of political prominence, and is a person in a position significantly to influence the resolution of issues of national importance. It is also apparent that Appellant involved himself dramatically into the racial crises in Oxford, Mississippi; that he "thrust himself into the vortex of the discussion of a question of pressing public concern." The motivating force of the Times decision compels its applicability here. In a thorough analysis of the Times decision, and subsequent decisions, the Court, in Pauling v. Globe-Democrat Publishing Company, 362 F. 2d 188 (C.A. 8, 1966), applied the Times doctrine to Dr. Linus Pauling. There the alleged libel grew out of a controversy over Dr. Pauling's efforts to promote a nuclear test ban treaty.

However, there is no constitutional protection for a false statement "made with actual malice, that is with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not." New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 279-280.

Unlike New York Times v. Sullivan, supra, and Pauling v. Globe-Democrat Publishing Company, supra, Appellant was prevented from adducing proofs which could present a jury question on the issue of malice. Whether there was malice was a fact question placed in issue by the complaint, and no affidavits or depositions were filed which may have removed this issue from the case.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed and the case remanded for further consideration consistent with this opinion.

LIBRARY
SUPREME COURT, U. S.

FILED
JAN 9 1967
JOHN F. DAVIS, CLERK

No. 150

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1966.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,

Petitioner,

vs.

EDWIN A. WALKER,

Respondent.

BRIEF FOR THE TRIBUNE COMPANY AS AMICUS CURIAE.

HOWARD ELLIS,
KEITH MASTERS,
DON H. REUBEN,
LAWRENCE GUNNELS,
of KIRKLAND, ELLIS, HODSON,
CHAFFETZ & MASTERS,
130 E. Randolph Drive,
Chicago, Illinois,
Attorneys for the Tribune Company.

THE GUNTHORP-WARREN PRINTING COMPANY, CHICAGO

INDEX.

	PAGE
Preliminary Statement	1
Argument	4
Conclusion	12

CITATIONS.

Cases.

Associated Press v. United States, 326 U. S. 1	5
Bridges v. California, 314 U. S. 252	5
Broking v. Phoenix Newspapers, Inc., 76 Ariz. 334, 264 P. 2d 413	7
City of Chicago v. Tribune Co., 307 Ill. 596, 139 N. E. 86	7
Coleman v. MacLennan, 78 Kan. 711, 98 P. 281	5
Dilling v. Illinois Publ. Co., 340 Ill. App. 303, 91 N. E. 2d 635	7
Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64	6
Hoan v. Journal Co., 238 Wis. 311, 298 N. W. 228	7
Krebiozen Research Foundation v. Beacon Press, Inc., 334 Mass. 86, 134 N. E. 2d 1	7
Kulesza v. Chicago Daily News, Inc., 311 Ill. App. 117, 35 N. E. 2d 517	7
Lulay v. Peoria Journal-Star, Inc., 34 Ill. 2d 112, 214 N. E. 2d 746	7
New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254	2, 4, 5, 6, 7, 11
Parmelee v. Hearst Publ. Co., 341 Ill. App. 339, 93 N. E. 2d 512	7
Pauling v. News Syndicate Co., 335 F. 2d 659 (2d Cir.), cert. denied 379 U. S. 968	4

Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U. S. 75 6
Roth v. United States, 354 U. S. 476 5
Sciandra v. Lynett, 409 Pa. 595, 187 A. 2d 586 6
Stromberg v. California, 283 U. S. 359 5
Sweeny v. Patterson, 128 F. 2d 457 (D. C. Cir.) 6
Tanzer v. Crowley Publ. Corp., 240 App. Div. 203, 268 N. Y. S. 260 7
Whitney v. California, 274 U. S. 357 5

Constitutional Provisions.

U. S. Constitution, Amendment I 4, 5, 6, 7, 11, 12

Miscellaneous.

American Heritage, Vol. III, No. 1 (Dec. 1955) 9
Bertelsman, Libel and Public Men, 52 A. B. A. Journal 657 (1966) 7
Cromie, Dillinger—A Short and Violent Life (McGraw-Hill, 1962) 10
Eisenschiml, Why Was Lincoln Murdered? (Little, Brown & Co., 1937) 8
Kalven, The New York Times Case: A Note on "the Central Meaning of the First Amendment," 1964 Supreme Court Rev. 191 7
Lewis, Myths After Lincoln (Grosset & Dunlap, 1929) 9
Lord, Day of Infamy (Henry Holt & Co., 1957) 9
Prosser, Interstate Publication, 51 Mich. L. Rev. 959 (1953) 11
Comment, The Scope of First Amendment Protection for Good-Faith Defamatory Error, 75 Yale L. J. 642 (1966) 10

"The newspaper is the mood of a nation, a day-to-day record of life's pattern. The historian writes of events in relation to their sequel; the newspaper keeps pace with the pitch and roll of this planet as it spins through eternity. There is little time to look back, less to look forward. Yesterday is our history, tomorrow our horizon. We catch the fleeting moment, cast it into the impatient press and, before the ink is dry, it smells of mortality."—Cross, The People's Right to Know, p. 3 (Columbia Univ. Press, 1953) quoting from The Press, 1898-1948 (London, The Newspaper World, 1948).

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM 1966.

No. 150

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,

Petitioner,

vs.

EDWIN A. WALKER,

Respondent.

BRIEF FOR THE TRIBUNE COMPANY AS AMICUS CURIAE.

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT.

The Tribune Company publishes the Chicago Tribune, one of the nation's largest metropolitan daily and Sunday newspapers; the Tribune Company has been a member of the Associated Press since the formation of the Association. W. D. Maxwell, the Editor of the Tribune and the first vice president of the Tribune Company, served as one of the Association's directors for a three-year term. The Tribune Company has a long established policy and tradition of appearing, when appropriate, in litigations that threaten freedom of expression and communication. The Tribune Company last appeared in such a cause in this Court when it filed a brief as amicus curiae in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254.[1]

The several Walker litigations arise out of the respondent Walker's presence and activities at the riots that occurred at the University of Mississippi in Oxford in September, 1962; the violence occurred because of the matriculation of the University's first Negro student. The crisis in Mississippi lasted several days and was an event of national concern that received front page coverage for over a week. The respondent Walker traveled from Texas to Oxford for the pre-announced purpose of attending the disturbances and violence at the campus. The Associated Press extensively reported the Mississippi riots, sending at times almost hourly dispatches to its member newspapers. The Association also transmitted dispatches concerning the respondent's involvement in the disturbances and fighting; many newspaper members of the A.P. then published such accounts as a part of their overall news coverage.[2] The respondent Walker filed fifteen libel suits in ten states, naming the Associated Press in seven suits, and its newspaper members in eleven; the aggregate damages claimed in the suits were $33,250,000.

The instant case was the first of the respondent's libel actions to be tried before a jury. The Texas courts, al-

1. The Tribune Company's interest as amicus in this cause is more fully detailed in the affidavit of W. D. Maxwell, Editor of the Tribune; the affidavit is lodged in the Clerk's Office and is reproduced in the Appendix hereto.

2. The respondent is a highly publicized ex-Major General of the Army and was an unsuccessful candidate for Governor of Texas in 1962. The dispatches of which Walker complains were written and transmitted by an A. P. reporter at the scene of the riots, while the respondent Walker was still in Oxford; Walker claims that the dispatches falsely reported that he "led a charge of students" and "assumed command of the crowd."

though expressly finding that the Associated Press was not guilty of actual malice, sustained a verdict and judgment against the Associated Press of $500,000. The Tribune Company filed its appearance in this cause as amicus curiae after certiorari was granted to review the judgment of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals. The Tribune Company obtained the written consent of both the petitioner and respondent to appear here.[3]

3. True copies of the letters evidencing such consent have been lodged in the Clerk's Office.

ARGUMENT.

We believe that in light of respondent's past activities and public status, it is indisputable that he is subject to the First Amendment standards enunciated in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254. The decisive applicability of the New York Times doctrine to the peculiar facts of the instant case is plain, we submit, from the nature of respondent's army career, his previous involvement in politics and controversial events, and his presence and conduct at the University of Mississippi race riots. The petitioner's brief has fully argued this proposition and to avoid repetition, we fully endorse and adopt petitioner's New York Times argument.

However, as amicus curiae, we respectfully commend and urge that this Court ground a decision of reversal on a broader base than the doctrine of "public official" or "public figure". (See Pauling v. News Syndicate Co., 335 F. 2d 659 (2d Cir.), cert. denied 379 U. S. 968.) We urge the Court to recognize and hold that the First Amendment permits the reporting of current public events with impunity unless the report is both false and the product of actual malice. We think that such a holding is a necessary and logical augmentation of the First Amendment free speech and press authorities generally, and especially of the doctrine declared in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, supra.

The First Amendment clearly contemplates encouragement of reporting public events, as they happen, even if those reports are later shown to be less than completely accurate. A nation such as ours, founded upon the concept of enlightened popular thought and opinion within the framework of ordered liberty, must always be currently informed about the social upheavals of the day, their causes, their effects and the evils they perpetrate or seek to cure. As the Court declared in Bridges v. California, 314 U. S. 252, 268:

> "It must be recognized that public interest is much more likely to be kindled by a controversial event of the day than by a generalization, however penetrating, of the historian or scientist."

And, in Associated Press v. United States, 326 U. S. 1, 20, the Court strongly emphasized the necessity of securing "the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources." See also Stromberg v. California, 283 U. S. 359, 369; Whitney v. California, 274 U. S. 357, 375-76 (concurring opinion); Roth v. United States, 354 U. S. 476, 484.

Moreover, in the New York Times case this Court specifically recognized that the First Amendment embodies "a profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide open. . . ." (376 U. S. at 270) (emphasis added). The Court further recognized that "erroneous statement is inevitable in free debate, and . . . it must be protected if the freedoms of expression are to have the 'breathing space' that they 'need . . . to survive' . . ." (376 U. S. at 271-72). The New York Times decision also quoted and endorsed the early holding of the Kansas Supreme Court in Coleman v. MacLennan, 78 Kan. 711, 723, 98 P. 281:

> "In such a case the occasion gives rise to a privilege, qualified to this extent: any one claiming to be defamed by the communication must show actual malice or go remediless. This privilege extends to a great variety of subjects, and includes matters of public concern, public men, and candidates for office." (376 U. S. at 281-82) (emphasis added).

Subsequent to the New York Times decision, the Court declared in Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64, 74, that "[S]peech concerning public affairs is more than self-expression; it is the essence of self-government." (Emphasis added). And, in Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U. S. 75, 86, the Court explained and strengthened the holding of the New York Times case as follows:

> "There is, first, a strong interest in debate on public issues, and second, a strong interest in debate about those persons who are in a position significantly to influence the resolution of those issues."
>
> • • • • •
>
> "The thrust of New York Times is that when interests in public discussions are particularly strong, as they were in that case, the constitution limits the protection afforded by the law of defamation." (Emphasis added.)

Other courts, both before and after the New York Times case, have also clearly recognized and held that news reporting of public events and other matters of public concern are protected by the First Amendment. In Sweeny v. Patterson, 128 F. 2d 457, 458 (D. C. Cir.) Judge Edgerton so declared:

> "The protection of the public requires not merely discussion, but information . . . Errors of fact, particularly in regard to man's mental states and processes are inevitable . . . Whatever is added to the field of libel is taken from the field of free debate."[4]

So also, in Sciandra v. Lynett, 409 Pa. 595, 187 A. 2d 586, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court rejected a libel suit based on a claimed false news report of the infamous Appalachian meeting of crime syndicate overlords:

> "[T]o impose liability upon the defendant under the circumstances presented would render 'Freedom of the

---

4. The Sweeny case was cited with approval in New York Times, 376 U. S. at 272.

> Press' a lie, seriously impinge upon priceless constitutional guarantees and be a substantial deprivation of the public's right to know."

Similar declarations and analogous holdings are found in Krebiozen Research Foundation v. Beacon Press, Inc., 334 Mass. 86, 134 N. E. 2d 1, 7; Kulesza v. Chicago Daily News, Inc., 311 Ill. App. 117, 35 N. E. 2d 517; Tanzer v. Crowley Publ. Corp., 240 App. Div. 203, 268 N. Y. S. 620; Hoan v. Journal Co., 238 Wis. 311, 298 N. W. 228; Parmelee v. Hearst Publ. Co., 341 Ill. App. 339, 93 N. E. 2d 512; Dilling v. Illinois Publ. Co., 340 Ill. App. 303, 91 N. E. 2d 635; Broking v. Phoenix Newspapers, Inc., 76 Ariz. 334, 264 P. 2d 413; Lulay v. Peoria Journal-Star, Inc., 34 Ill. 2d 112, 214 N. E. 2d 746.[5]

We submit that if on-the-spot news reporting of current public events is to be fostered and encouraged, as contemplated by the First Amendment, publishers and news wire services must be protected from libel actions such as those instituted by the respondent. As history has shown, the civil libel action, with its lack of criminal law safeguards and unlimited general and punitive damages, is one of the most effective weapons to suppress and silence the press and other modes of communication and expression. (See City of Chicago v. Tribune Co., 307 Ill. 596, 607, 139 N. E. 86, 90, and the discussion thereof in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254 at 277-78.)

The appended affidavit of the Tribune's Editor, W. D. Maxwell, attests (and common experience tells) that the riot, the demonstration, the protest and other like manifestations of social disturbance are becoming an all too common

---

5. See, also, Comment, The Scope of First Amendment Protection for Good-Faith Defamatory Error, 75 Yale L. J. 642 (1966); Kalven, The New York Times Case: A Note on "the Central Meaning of the First Amendment," 1964 Supreme Court Rev. 191; Bertelsman, Libel and Public Men, 52 A. B. A. Journal 657 (1966).

part of the news of the day. Mr. Maxwell's affidavit also delineates that on-the-scene reports of such sudden and violent happenings, although the best news of the event available at the time, are not always completely accurate because of the very nature of the incident covered. Strife, violence and civil disruption typically involve split-second happenings accompanied by great chaos and confusion, so that even those directly on the scene are not completely informed of the true state of events and issue reports later determined to lack complete accuracy. Indeed, it is probable that the exact truth as to many such occurrences is never completely ascertained because of the fever-pitch excitement and the invariable tendency of eye-witnesses to see and hear things differently.

Historians have recorded numerous examples of inaccurate and conflicting reports emanating from the scenes of violent or turbulent events:

The Assassination of President Lincoln. In the tumultuous aftermath of Lincoln's shooting at Ford's Theatre on the evening of April 14, 1865, wire dispatches from Washington, the situs of the tragedy, were extremely confused, contradictory and erroneous; one dispatch reported that Lincoln "with several members of his cabinet" had been assassinated. Eisenschiml, Why Was Lincoln Murdered?, Chap. 8, pages 65-90 (Little, Brown & Co., 1937).[6] Other news reports

6. Otto Eisenschiml concludes his exhaustive study of the assassination with the following observation (page 438):

"A great deal of new evidence must be brought to light before students can write a definite answer to many questions that confront them in their research on Lincoln's death. Facts, facts and more facts are needed and should be unearthed. In the meantime, hasty inferences are dangerous and may turn out to be unjust. Seemingly perfect nets of circumstantial evidence have at times been torn apart by a single contradictory but incontrovertible fact. Well estab-stated that Secretary of State Sewar[illegible] Vice President Johnson had been killed along wi[illegible]oln. Still another dispatch reported that Lincol[illegible]een fired upon from the crowd as he was depar[illegible] Ford's Theatre, rather than in his loge during t[illegible] performance (Ibid.) (See also Lewis, Myths After Lincoln, pages 48-49 (Grosset & Dunlap, 1929).)

The Sinking of the Titanic. Immediately after the luxury liner Titanic sank, all of the New York newspapers (save for the Times) reported that on-the-scene observers said that all passengers on the doomed ship had survived, when in fact the vast majority perished. American Heritage, Vol. III, No. 1 (Dec., 1955).

The Attack on Pearl Harbor. During the week following the Japanese bombing of Pearl Harbor and Hickam Field on December 7, 1941, a plethora of false on-the-scene reports concerning the war's outbreak were widely disseminated: (1) that a task force at sea led by the Carrier Enterprise had been sunk by the Japanese; (2) that the Battleship Pennsylvania had captured two Japanese carriers and was towing them to Pearl Harbor; (3) that a large Japanese invasion fleet was rapidly approaching the northern coast of California; (4) that some Japanese advance troops had actually landed on California soil. Lord, Day of Infamy, pages 202-03 (Henry Holt & Co., 1957).

The Pursuit of John Dillinger, "Public Enemy No.

---

lished theories have been shattered because they could not be brought into harmony with a single important new revelation, just as the discovery of radium has destroyed the belief of science in the indestructibility of the atom and changed its ideas on the transmutation of elements.

"Pending future developments, the story of Lincoln's assassination remains, in many of its phases, an unsolved mystery."

1". When F. B. I. Agents pursued the notorious John Dillinger gang to a hunting lodge near Little Bohemia, Wisconsin in April, 1934, a fierce gun battle took place; the reports to the outside world were a welter of confusion and error. The reports are well summarized in Cromie, Dillinger—A Short and Violent Life, page 221 (McGraw-Hill, 1962):

> "The word out of Little Bohemia was confusing, to put it politely, in the hours between the opening volley and daylight, when the Federal agents moved in and captured six machine guns, twelve shotguns, five bulletproof vests and three young women.
>
> "J. Edgar Hoover announced at 2 a.m. in Washington that Dillinger was surrounded. At 3:30 came a flash from Mercer that posses would join battle with Dillinger and his gang within a matter of hours. Shortly thereafter a third report said that Dillinger had been seen at Antigo, heading toward Chicago. Not until 6 a.m. was it admitted officially that four of the gang 'may' have broken through the cordon."

The Selma, Alabama Civil Rights Demonstrations—March, 1965. At the time of the killing of the Reverend James Reeb (who went to Selma from Boston to support Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.'s voting crusade), the streets of Selma, according to some reports, were filled with violence and terror. Yet, one on-the-scene observer stated that, "In few cities anywhere are you as safe on the streets as you are in Selma today." (Lloyd Wendt, "Two Views of Selma—From Both Sides of 'Wall'," Chicago's American, Mar. 15, 1965, page 7, Col. 1.) The author of the cited article travelled to Selma to report the demonstrations first hand, and in the course of his reporting, discussed in graphic detail the difficulties of obtaining reliable information concerning the true state of events.

The above examples demonstrate that there is an unavoidable and inherent possibility of error in dispatches issued from the scenes of sudden, violent or tragic happenings. Thus, the publishing of such material exposes a newspaper or wire service to an inordinately greater risk of suit than is inherent in ordinary news reporting. And, only a moment's reflection confirms that there are few lawsuits more costly to defend than libel cases requiring the reconstruction of the true facts concerning a riot, a demonstration, a strike, an uprising or like social conflagration. Very few publishers can or will risk the reporting of such on-the-spot dispatches if plaintiffs such as Walker can later sue on the ground that events viewed in retrospect sustain a claim of libel. The expenses of litigating such claims are far too onerous for the average publisher to bear even once, let alone as a repeated expenditure.[7]

We plainly recognize that reversal of the judgment below on the ground that respondent is a public figure within New York Times Co. v. Sullivan would adequately relieve the petitioner of an unconstitutional judgment. But we submit that such a truncated holding will not encourage or protect future on-the-spot news reporting of events such as the Mississippi riots. The fortuitous circumstance that the respondent Walker is a well-known public figure will clearly not be present in many, if not most, future libel actions based upon current news reporting of riots, protests and other events of intense public concern.

Beyond cavil, if freedom from oppressive libel suits is to be contingent upon the nature and status of the plaintiff, rather that the event, the mandate of the First Amendment has not been fulfilled. Accordingly, we believe that a more definitive holding is necessary to ensure that current reporting of such events as the Mississippi riots is protected and encouraged—not thwarted by the fear of suffering enormous expense and perhaps even ruin by libel suits. Reporting of such events is, we submit, best fostered within the framework of the First Amendment, consonant with the rights of all concerned, by holding that on-the-spot news reports of such events are non-actionable—although later proved false—unless they are the product of actual malice. In sum, the doctrine of public officials should encompass not only the public figure but also the public event. And, we cannot envisage a more appropriate cause for the Court to acknowledge such a doctrine than the Mississippi riots, for if the First Amendment is to have its intended vitality it certainly must protect on-the-scene news reporting of an event of such national magnitude.

7. The publisher's expenses of litigation may be multiplied many fold if the plaintiff sees fit (as the respondent Walker did here) to file not one but numerous libel suits in different jurisdictions predicated on the same claim of factual error. See Prosser, Interstate Publication, 51 Mich. L. Rev. 959 (1953).

CONCLUSION.

We respectfully urge that the judgment below should be reversed on the ground that the petitioner was reporting without malice a current news event of immediate and significant public interest and concern.

Respectfully submitted,

HOWARD ELLIS,
KEITH MASTERS,
DON H. REUBEN,
LAWRENCE GUNNELS,
of KIRKLAND, ELLIS, HODSON,
CHAFFETZ & MASTERS,
130 E. Randolph Drive,
Chicago, Illinois,
Attorneys for the Tribune Company.

January 6, 1967.

APPENDIX.

AFFIDAVIT.

STATE OF ILLINOIS, }
COUNTY OF COOK. } ss.

W. D. MAXWELL, having been duly sworn on oath, deposes and says:

1. He is the First Vice-President of the Tribune Company, an Illinois corporation, and is the Editor of the Chicago Tribune. He has also served as a member of the Board of Directors of the Petitioner, the Associated Press, from 1958 to 1966; he is thus familiar with the services and functions of the Associated Press both as an editor and as one who has participated in its management.

2. The Tribune Company publishes one of the world's largest daily metropolitan newspapers, the Chicago Tribune; its presses, personnel and executive offices are all located in Chicago, Illinois, where the Tribune is published. Although the bulk of the Tribune's circulation is within the State of Illinois, the Tribune also has readership and subscribers in virtually every state of the union and in many foreign lands. The Chicago Tribune is a member of the Petitioner, the Associated Press, and has been a member since the inception of the Association in 1900.

3. The Tribune Company has a signal interest in this case not only because of its membership in the Associated Press, but also because of the Tribune Company's long-established practice and policy of at all times following, and at appropriate times participating in, litigation that concerns and jeopardizes freedom of the press [see, e.g., Near v. Minnesota, 283 U. S. 697; New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254; New York Times Co. v. Connor, 291 F. 2d 492 (5th Cir.)]. The instant litigation is one of fifteen separate libel actions brought by the Respondent Edwin A. Walker because of news coverage of Respondent's deliberate presence and role in the University of Mississippi riots in September, 1962; the suits are pending in 10 different states, name the Associated Press in 8 suits, and newspapers of general circulation in 11 suits. The total damages that have been sought by Respondent for news stories, dispatches and editorials concerning his activities at the University of Mississippi is $33,250,000.

4. The Tribune Company regards pendency of the suits instituted by the Respondent and the result below in this case as a substantial threat to free speech and press. Acts of violence, incidents of strife and riots have in recent years become a prominent and recurring part of the news of the day. These happenings must be reported by the press if the news is to be covered and the public is to be adequately informed about such events; the public cannot possibly make an intelligent or enlightened appraisal of such occurences or their underlying causes unless such news is currently and widely disseminated.

5. A riot, a lawless demonstration or almost any violent incident is invariably fraught with general confusion, events of split-second duration, and conflicting charges and countercharges; because of the dynamic nature of the events the facts are sometimes never precisely learned or, in the alternative, are determined much later. Accordingly, at times eyewitness news emanating from the scene of such happenings may be only partially correct although it is the best available report at the moment. If on-the-scene spot news reports cannot be published as received but must await ultimate confirmation hours or days later because of the fear of a subsequent libel claim, then the news will oftentimes not be printed. The cost of defending libel actions in such cases is much too heavy a burden for many of the country's newspapers as well as for the nation's wire services.

6. Affiant believes that true freedom of the press cannot endure unless the press can report, in depth and detail and without fear of economic reprisal, all the news of the day as received; and specifically such news as on-the-scene reports of a riot, a demonstration, or a violent social upheaval. Affiant believes on the basis of his experience as a newspaperman and editor that the press requires the freedom to publish such news in accordance with the same constitutional limits marked by this Court for the reporting of the activities and conduct of public officials. The "public official" standard, if applied to such events and participants, would permit publishing about such occurrences as they happen without fear of economic ruin from defending libel suits and yet would at the same time discourage publication of truly malicious falsehoods concerning such events.

Further affiant sayeth not.

/s/ W. D. MAXWELL,
W. D. MAXWELL,

SUBSCRIBED AND SWORN TO before me this fourth day of January, A.D., 1967.

/s/ DOLORES FIGIEL,
Notary Public.

[SEAL]

FEB 2 1967
JOHN F. DAVIS, CLERK

In the

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

OCTOBER TERM 1966

No. 150

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,
Petitioner,

VERSUS

EDWIN A. WALKER,
Respondent.

ANSWER TO AMICUS CURIAE BRIEF OF THE TRIBUNE COMPANY

CLYDE J. WATTS
Counsel for Respondent

Of Counsel:

WILLIAM ANDRESS, JR.
Fidelity Union Life Building
Dallas, Texas

WATTS, LOONEY, NICHOLS & JOHNSON
219 Couch Drive
Oklahoma City, Oklahoma 73102

January, 1967

UTTERBACK TYPESETTING CO., 13 SO. WALKER, OKLAHOMA CITY, PH. CE 5-0080

SUBJECT INDEX

	PAGE
Statement	1
Issues:
I. Should the Sullivan Rule of Freedom of the Press from liability for defamation by erroneous reports of facts, made without malice, be restricted to cases where such reports do not falsely accuse an individual citizen of the commission of a crime?	9
II. Should the Sullivan Rule be extended to encompass not only the "Public Figure," but also the "Public Event"?	9
Argument	10
Proposition One: Freedom of the Press under the First Amendment should not be extended to provide immunity from liability for false accusation of a crime	10
Proposition Two: The Sullivan Rule does not apply to a private citizen	16
Conclusion	29

AUTHORITIES

CASES:

Associated Press and Times-Picayune Publ. Corp. v. Walker (Ct. of App. La., 1966), — S.W.2d —	23
Associated Press v. Taft-Ingles Corp. (6 Cir. 1965), 340 F.2d 753	18
Associated Press v. U. S., 326 U.S. 1	2, 17, 29

INDEX CONTINUED

PAGE

Associated Press v. Walker (Civ. App. Tex., 1965), 393 S.W.2d 671 23

Brennan, The Supreme Court and the Meiklejohn Interpretation of the First Amendment, 79 Harvard L. Rev. 1, 19 (1965) 12

Clark v. Drew Pearson (U.S.D.C. Dist. of Col. 1965), 248 F.Supp. 188 26-27

Davila v. The Caller Times Publishing Co. (Ct. of App., Tex. 1958), 311 S.W.2d 945 13

Faulk v. Aware, Inc. (N.Y. 1964), 200 N.E.2d 372, 202 N.E.2d 372 (cert. den. 380 U.S. 916) 6, 24

Fignole v. Curtis Pub. Co. (D.C. N.Y. 1965), 247 F.Supp. 595 24

Houston Chronicle Publ. Co. v. Bowen (Ct. of App., Tex. 1915), 182 S.W. 61 13

Miranda v. State of Arizona, 86 Sup. Ct. Repr. 1602 (1966), — U.S. — 21

Moran v. Pittsburgh Des Moines Steel Co., 1948 (C.A. 3, Pa.), 116 F.2d 908, cert. den. 334 U.S. 846, 92 L.Ed. 1770, 68 S.Ct. 1516, 81 A.L.R.2d 332 17

New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 ..... 10, 13, 15, 20-21, 25

Pauling v. National Review, Inc., 269 N.Y.S.2d 11 23

Pauling v. News Syndicate Co., 335 F.2d 659, cert. den. 85 S.Ct. 662, 379 U.S. 968, 13 L.Ed. 561 ..... 23, 24

Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75 23

Shepherd v. Brewer (Mo. 1913), 154 S.W. 116 13

Time, Inc. v. Hill (Jan. 10, 1967), 35 L.W. 4108 ..... 8, 27, 28, 29

INDEX CONTINUED

PAGE

Walker v. Associated Press (Colo. 1966), — P.2d — 23

Walker v. Courier-Journal (D.C. Ky. 1965), 246 F. Supp 231 23, 24

STATUTES:

18 U.S.C. 111, 2383, 2384 11

MISCELLANEOUS:

Time Magazine, June 17, 1966, p. 62, "The 'Death' Blunder" 19

APPENDIX

Affidavit of Clyde J. Watts i-v

Complaint filed October 1, 1962, "on basis of information obtained from Van H. Cavell" Associated Press newsman vi-vii

Telegram from U. S. Director of Prisons, directing that Walker be committed to the U. S. Medical Center at Springfield, Missouri ix

Motion for Judicial Determination of Mental Competency x-xiii

Order Committing Defendant for Psychiatric Examination xiv-xv

Order to Show Cause xvi-xviii

News Release—Reference to Al Capone—Robert Stroud—also sexual deviates xix

No. 150

In the

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1966

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,
Petitioner,

VERSUS

EDWIN A. WALKER,
Respondent.

ANSWER TO AMICUS CURIAE BRIEF OF THE TRIBUNE COMPANY

By Amicus Curiae Brief herein, on behalf of the news media generally, the Chicago Tribune seeks, as an extension of its present First Amendment Freedom, the awesome power to DEFAME (even to accuse falsely) without LIABILITY—to MAKE (rather than report) the news without RESPONSIBILITY.

With issues that involve the life and death of our Constitutional System, the Walker case presents to this Honorable Court the responsibility for shaping the course of the Freedom, not only of the Press, but of the American Citizen for decades to come.

By Affidavit, W. D. Maxwell, Editor of the Chicago Tribune, represents to the Court an example of the difficulty which confronts AP in obtaining accuracy of "on the scene spot news" reports during the confusion of riots and disorder. In fairness, we must recognize their problem, and the vital interest of the public, which actually includes the Press, as well.

The Walker case is an example of oppressive impact of false news reporting that deserves most careful consideration by the highest Tribunal in our land, in developing constitutional guide lines that will protect both the Press and the citizen.

For simplicity of illustration, and as a tragic example of hasty and irresponsible news reporting, we respectfully present, by counter Affidavit, the reports and actions by which Walker was falsely accused of a felony, charged, arrested and committed for an indefinite term to a Federal Prison Hospital for criminal insane, as a direct and proximate result of a news report, which Affidavit contains orders and proceedings of the court responsible for his trial, and custody pending trial, as follows:

1) Associated Press falsely reported upon worldwide news wires that Walker had assumed command of the mob and led a charge against United States Marshals (R. 1224-1294).

2) A Federal Complaint was filed against Walker charging Insurrection, Assaulting U. S. Officers, Sedition and Seditious Conspiracy, which stated that it was filed "on the basis of information obtained from Van H. Savell," the cub reporter of Associated Press, who was solely responsible for the above false news report.

3) Walker was committed to custody of United States Marshal in Mississippi, for confinement in Mississippi.

4) Upon telegraph Order from United States Bureau of Prisons, and without Court Order, Walker was flown to the United States Prison Hospital at Springfield, Missouri, without being given an opportunity to make bail, fixed at $100,000.00.

5) The next day, without Notice, counsel or hearing, an Order was entered by the Mississippi Federal Court that Walker be transferred and committed to the Springfield Prison Hospital, where he had actually been taken on the previous day, which Order was entered upon Affidavit of Chief Psychiatrist of United States Bureau of Prisons, who had never seen him, but had "carefully examined news reports."

6) Walker was unable to get a hearing for Habeas Corpus before the Federal Court in Springfield in less than 11 days.

7) Associated Press consistently slanted the news to emphasize that Walker had commanded the mob and was probably crazy, thus fabricating of him a false public image as a lunatic and criminal.

It is the end of Justice that no one shall suffer wrong—a concept which guides the judgment of every Court in our land.

There can be no reasonable question that Respondent has suffered wrong, as a direct and proximate result of news report that he commanded a mob and led charges against United States Marshals. The facts above set forth, and with more detail in the attached Affidavit, provide a living specimen for the necessary judicial research and development to fix the final perimeter of the First Amendment Freedom of the Press along a fair and workable boundary between the public's Right to Know and the citizen's Right to Live in Freedom from possible tyranny of an overly powerful Press.

It has also been stated by an unknown legal scholar that, "From the crucible of adversary conflict before Courts of Justice and Law, will come the final Freedom contemplated by our Constitution."

Thus, in the instant case, the proper objective is to construe "Freedom of the Press" to permit reasonably accurate and timely reports of news vital to public knowledge, without subjecting citizens who may have become "public figures" to undue defamation and accusation.

The established rule under Sullivan, which would be both sound and just, if it excluded false accusation of crime, is that the Press is free from liability for defamation of a Public Official, without malice, which is defined as "knowingly false" or "in reckless disregard" for the truth.

The question arises in the Walker case as to whether this rule should be extended to "public figures"; and, so long as the "figure" is not directly accused of a crime, it would appear that the rule could be extended with logic and justice, provided that the Court should decide to abandon the reasoning that the superior position of the official compensates for the immunity of the Press.

Where a citizen is falsely accused of crime, however, which did not exist in Sullivan, it should not be an imposition upon the Press (and certainly not a restriction of its freedom) to bear a responsibility of more than "reckless disregard for the Truth."

In this very dangerous and sensitive area, any news merchant who gambles, even negligently, in the sale of news, with the liberty of a citizen should properly be required to prove, in Court, the Truth of the charge. If such a rule should slightly delay to the public immediate "on the spot" accusation of crime, as it is actually committed; the loss would be more in theory than in fact, since the Press could report, with immunity as soon as a criminal charge was filed against the suspect. In fact, if the newsman should report what he sees to proper authority a Complaint could be filed in a matter of hours, or less; but this short interval is critical to the party charged, to avoid the news report being the source of the charge, as in the Walker case.

If the attention of prosecuting authorities may be directed by false report to alleged facts constituting a crime, by a newsman, who seeks Constitutional immunity from responsibility, then the proponents of unpopular causes would be at the mercy of a hostile Press; and the "public debate," robust, uninhibited and "wide open" would be stifled before it was born.

During discovery proceedings in the Walker case, it was developed that Associated Press holds a daily conference of top management at its Headquarters in New York (R. 824). Simply as an illustration of the potential hazard of extending to the Press the power to defame and accuse with immunity, the capability would then exist to assign newsmen to a scheduled public demonstration, with orders to trail an individual, and tie him in with any violence that may erupt. Thereafter, his mere presence in the area would make him vulnerable to a news report that he was organizing and participating in the violence, and a report by the Press immune from liability could quickly trigger his arrest upon charge of inciting a riot.

Once the Constitutional Rule may be established, the capability of false accusation would exist at all echelons of the Press.

If, either upon a local or a national level, the newsman and the prosecutor should jointly select a victim, he would be helpless to avoid arrest and prosecution. He would be helpless to avoid disgrace if he were falsely accused of being a Communist.[1]

On the other hand, so long as the Press is financially responsible for damages sustained by one arrested as the result of a false news report, the danger of such invasion of individual freedom will be remote.

The requirement to prove knowing falsity or reckless disregard for the truth can be an overwhelming burden, where a powerful element of the news media is the adversary.

In effect, amicus curiae requests that this Honorable Court write "ground rules," under which its reporters may cover tumultous events, to provide reasonable and timely information to the public, with minimum liability upon the Press. By presenting both sides of the question, it is the sincere hope of counsel for Respondent to assist in formulation of a final rule that will be workable and fair to both the Press and public. We respectfully suggest the following:

---

[1] Faulk v. Aware, Inc. (N.Y. 1964), 200 N.E.2d 778, 202 N.E.2d 372 (cert. den. 380 U.S. 916).

1) Should not the final rule extend wider latitude in reporting collateral facts, but require even more care to avoid reporting of alleged facts that accuse even a public official of the commission of a crime . . . especially facts which would give the civil authority, state or federal, the duty of making criminal charges and arrest?

2) Should not newsmen, on the scene and in rewrite rooms, be ordered to withhold reports of commission of a crime until the facts have been evaluated by a prosecuting authority, or, in any event, until the facts have been verified by more than one newsman (preferably experienced)?

3) Should not newsmen be advised that their employer faces civil liability for reporting facts that result in criminal charges, unless the report is supported by evidence that would establish a defense of "TRUTH" in a civil proceeding?

4) Should not working newsmen be subject to more, rather than less, discipline in their investigation and reporting, especially where the liberty of individual citizens may be at stake?

5) With news representing a highly salable commodity, could the Courts accept a lesser warranty of quality than for other merchandise, such as drugs?[2]

---

[2] Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1: "No language in the Sherman Act or the summary judgment statute lends support to the suggestion. There is no single element in our traditional insistence upon an equally fair trial for every person from which any such discriminatory trial practice could stem. For equal—not unequal—justice under law is the goal of our society. Our legal system has not established different measures of proof for the trial of cases in which

(With words being the most lethal weapons known to modern man, when launched by a fantastic network of electronic communications, is not false news reporting more dangerous than adulterated food or drugs?)

6) Does the individual citizen have any real capability to "debate" with the news media, especially the Associated Press, or other national wire service?

7) Would not the news media, itself, suffer in terms of lost public confidence, if its financial responsibility is withdrawn as a guarantee for accuracy where its reports result in defamation or accusation of a private citizen?[3]

8) In comparison with its vast income from the sale of news, and advertising, has the news media really been restricted in reporting actual news to the extent that justice would require a revision of the law of defamation, which has reasonably protected the individual citizen from time of the invention of the printing

---

[2] (Continued)
equally intelligent and responsible defendants are charged with violating the same statutes. Member publishers of AP are engaged in business for profit exactly as are other business men who sell food, steel, aluminum, or anything else people need or want." Citing International News Service v. Associated Press, supra. "All are alike covered by the Sherman Act. The fact that the publisher handles news while others handle food does not, as we shall later point out, afford the publisher a peculiar constitutional sanctuary in which he can with impunity violate laws regulating his business practices."

[3] Time, Inc. v. Hill (Jan. 10, 1967), 35 L.W. 4108 at 4119 (concurring opinion, MR. JUSTICE BLACK):

"A constitutional doctrine which relieves the press of even this minimal responsibility in cases of this sort seems to me unnecessary and ultimately harmful to the permanent good health of the press itself. If the New York Times case has ushered in such a trend it will prove in its long-range impact to have done a disservice to the true values encompassed in the freedoms of speech and press."

press down through the present era of huge newspapers, wire services, magazines, radio and TV?

Against the above background of conflicting interests and aspirations between the Press and the individual citizen, we present the case of the Respondent, fervently hoping that collateral issues may not unduly influence or prejudice the final outcome.

ISSUES

I

SHOULD THE SULLIVAN RULE OF FREEDOM OF THE PRESS FROM LIABILITY FOR DEFAMATION BY ERRONEOUS REPORTS OF FACTS, MADE WITHOUT MALICE, BE RESTRICTED TO CASES WHERE SUCH REPORTS DO NOT FALSELY ACCUSE AN INDIVIDUAL CITIZEN OF THE COMMISSION OF A CRIME?

II

SHOULD THE SULLIVAN RULE BE EXTENDED TO ENCOMPASS NOT ONLY THE "PUBLIC FIGURE," BUT ALSO THE "PUBLIC EVENT"?

ARGUMENT

PROPOSITION ONE

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS UNDER THE FIRST AMENDMENT SHOULD NOT BE EXTENDED TO PROVIDE IMMUNITY FROM LIABILITY FOR FALSE ACCUSATION OF A CRIME.

Relying upon New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, and subsequent decisions of this Honorable Court, Amicus Curiae outlines a purported emergency in the reporting of riots, strife, violence and lawless demonstration, supported by Affidavit of its editor, and argues that the First Amendment should be construed, consonant with the rights of all concerned, to hold that "on-the-spot news reports of such events are non-actionable . . . although later proved false . . . unless they are the product of actual malice."

The Association Press Publication involved herein is quoted in full at pages 7-11 of Petitioner's Brief. The language specifically involved in the Constitutional question here presented includes the following:

> "October 2, 1962. 'Walker, who Sunday night led a charge of students against Federal Marshals . . . was arrested on four accounts including Insurection against the United States.' "
>
> "October 3, 1962. (Editor's Note: '* * * Here is the story of Van Savell, 21, Associated Press newsman, who was on the scene and saw what happened.)' "
>
> "It also brought me into direct contact with former Army Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, who is now under arrest on charges of inciting Insurrection and Seditious Conspiracy . . ."

". . . man queried Walker as he approached the group. 'General, will you lead us to the steps?' "

"I observed Walker as he loosened his tie and shirt and nodded 'Yes' without speaking."

"Walker assumed command of the crowd . . ."

"Two men took Walker by the arms and they headed for the . . . Federal Marshals. Throughout this time, I was less than six feet from Walker."

"This march toward tear gas and some 200 Marshals was more effective than the previous attempts" (R. 11-14).

The above is in conflict and contrast with the United Press report as follows:

"Students were waving the Confederate Flag during a lull in the rioting. Edwin A. Walker, former Maj. General who commanded troops at Little Rock, mounted a Confederate Statue and advised the students to cease their violence."

" 'This is not the proper route to Cuba,' Walker . . . said."

It is obvious that the above Associated Press news report accuses Walker of specific acts, for which he was subsequently charged by the United States Government with commission of crimes (18 U.S.C. 111, 2383, 2384).

In answer to questions presented by the Court under special issues, the trial jury held, by unanimous verdict, that:

1) The Associated Press statements that, "Walker . . . led a charge . . . against U. S. Marshals" and

"Walker assumed command of the crowd" were false.

2) The statements were not "fair comment."

3) The statements were not made in good faith.

Amicus Curiae seeks a judgment in this case that would wipe out the jury's verdict, and deprive Respondent of legal recourse for the wrong he has suffered, which argument is summarized by a statement at page 7 of its Brief, as follows:

> "We submit that if on-the-spot news reporting of current public events is to be fostered and encouraged, as contemplated by the First Amendment, publishers and news wire services must be protected from libel actions such as those instituted by the respondent."

The first question before the Court is whether Sullivan and subsequent decisions involving the First Amendment Freedom of the Press should change the law of Libel where the report is both false and an accusation of crime. Respondent contends that neither the facts, the rule, nor the reasoning of Sullivan and other cases should be construed as imposing upon the injured party the burden of proving bad faith of the publisher, when the defamation is so serious as to cause the arrest and imprisonment of the victim. The "First Amendment theory"[4] requires careful evaluation of

---

[4] "Of course, only time and more decisions, many more, can reveal the significance of New York Times and Garrison in the evolution of the First Amendment Theory."

—Brennan, The Supreme Court and the Meiklejohn Interpretation of the First Amendment, 79 Harvard L. Rev. 1, 19 (1965).

the impact upon the individual citizen, as well as the advantage to the Press, before so dangerous a power should be conferred with so little responsibility following its use.

Before Sullivan, there can be no doubt that a false accusation of a crime was malicious per se.[5]

In the instant case, the facts are conclusive that the statements found by the jury to be false were also "knowingly false," since, upon the face of the publication, it was represented that the Associated Press newsman was an eyewitness ("He was there." "Throughout this time, I was less than six feet from Walker.") From a range of six feet, Savell either saw these alleged criminal acts committed, or he did not. His report was either true or "knowingly false."

Under the undisputed evidence, there seems no reasonable question that the handling of the report by Associated Press was also in reckless disregard of the truth.[6]

These facts are far different from those in Sullivan,[7] where New York Times had published a paid advertisement, which contained general criticism, aimed at no particular individual, and charging, at most, mal administration in office by unidentified persons. There was no statement by which any employee of New York Times, the publisher,

---

[5] Davila v. The Caller Times Publishing Co. (Ct. of App., Tex. 1958), 311 S.W.2d 945; Houston Chronicle Publ. Co. v. Bowen (Ct. of App., Tex. 1915), 182 S.W. 61; Shepherd v. Brewer (Mo. 1913), 154 S.W. 116.

[6] See summary of testimony of AP newsman, Ben Thomas, Respondent's Answer Brief.

[7] New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (293).

reported that he had seen the plaintiff commit any criminal act. Liability in the state court was merely inferred from defendant's "irresponsibility" in printing the advertisement, when its own files had articles already published that would have demonstrated the falsity of the allegations in the advertisement. A review of the facts in Sullivan will reveal that the Court was not confronted with a case where an employee of the defendant, as a purported eye-witness, had falsely accused the plaintiff of committing a crime, as in the Walker case. Perhaps the most widely quoted language of the Opinion is the following:

> "Thus we consider this case against the bankground of a profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open, and * * *
>
> * * * * * * *
>
> "That erroneous statement is inevitable in free debate, and that it must be protected if the freedoms of expression are to have the 'breathing space' that they 'need to survive.'"

If the power of the Press is expanded to include false charges of crime against an individual citizen, the free "debate" encouraged by Sullivan would be so heavily weighted in favor of the Press that a private citizen, who does not own a newspaper, would be at such a disadvantage that he would abandon the unequal contest before it started. His "breathing space" would be surrounded with bars; and he would have no recourse, unless he could prove those persons[8] in the Associated Press organization having responsibility for publication of the report actually "knew" that it was false, or were acting in reckless disregard for the truth. If, as a result of false report of criminal acts, the individual should be in a Prison during the critical time, as was Walker, considerable difficulty might arise in securing evidence that the original publication was "known" by those responsible for its publication to have been false.

Amicus Curiae has cited no authority, nor have we discovered a decision holding that the First Amendment extends to the Press a Freedom to make direct and false accusation of crime; and, without direct precedent, it appears that this Court, deep within its own conscience, will balance the public's need to know through a Free Press against the right of the individual citizen to be free from the fear of false accusation, and will fix the boundary of the First Amendment Freedom of the Press so as to accomplish, as nearly as humanly possible, a result compatible with equal justice under the law.

It is respectfully submitted that the doctrine of the Sullivan case, which involved only comment, should not be extended to provide for the Press a Freedom to make false accusation of crime against individual citizens, which eventually could be expanded into a license to destroy.

---

[8] From Sullivan:

"The mere presence of the stories in the files does not, of course, establish that the Times 'knew' the advertisement was false, since the state of mind required for actual malice would have to be brought home to the persons in the Times organization having responsibility for the publication of the advertisement."

PROPOSITION TWO

THE SULLIVAN RULE DOES NOT APPLY TO A PRIVATE CITIZEN.

Amicus Curiae "commend and urge" this Court to "ground a decision of reversal on a broader base than the doctrine of 'public official' or 'public figure,' and to extend the First Amendment Freedom to permit the reporting of 'current public events with impunity unless the report is both false and the product of actual malice.'" Based upon the affidavit of its managing editor delineating the expediency of unrestricted reporting, Amicus Curiae argues:

> "Beyond cavil, if freedom from oppressive libel suits is to be contingent upon the nature and status of the plaintiff, rather than the event, the mandate of the First Amendment has not been fulfilled * * *. In sum, the doctrine of public officials should encompass not only the public figure but also the public event. And, we cannot envisage a more appropriate cause for the Court to acknowledge such a doctrine than the Mississippi riots, for if the First Amendment is to have its intended vitality it certainly must protect on-the-scene news reporting of an event of such national magnitude."

If the rights of the individual are to be ignored, such a rule would have one advantage—simplicity. The Press would be well-protected against liability for false reporting, unless the victim were able to establish that the report was "knowingly false" or "in reckless disregard for the truth," a most formidable obstacle, unless the Press has convicted itself, as in the instant case, where the false report of their young reporter was preceded by a "sales pitch," "Here is the story of Van Savell, 21, Associated Press Newsman, who was on the scene and saw what happened." —thus, leaving open only the question as to whether the purported eye-witness story was true or false.

It would appear that the news media, itself, would seek to establish higher, rather than lower standards of integrity and accuracy in its reporting. If accuracy is difficult to obtain under present conditions, it would be infinitely worse if those who gather and disseminate the news for profit are relieved of financial responsibility for damages caused by their product. Private industry spends millions for quality control. The Press might improve its product at far less cost.

In other fields of the law, the Courts have consistently imposed higher standards of product liability,[9] under concepts of both warranty and negligence, even to the extent of assuming negligence, under principles of Res Ipsa Loquitur, from the occurrence of an accident, and shifting the burden to the manufacturer and distributor to prove reasonable care. In this area, there have been judgments for shattered bodies, even higher than Libel judgments for shattered reputations; but no Court has yet established a protective rule of privilege to require an injured plaintiff to prove that the manufacturer either had knowledge of the defect or acted in reckless disregard of reasonable care.

It would seem that the potential harm to the public from false news may be even greater than from defective merchandise.

---

[9] See Associated Press v. U. S., 326 U.S. 1; Moran v. Pittsburgh Des Moines Steel Co., 1948 (C.A. 3, Pa.), 116 F.2d 908, cert. den. 334 U.S. 846, 92 L.Ed. 1770, 68 S.Ct. 1516; 81 A.L.R.2d 332.

Especially is this so with the monopolistic capability of the wire services,[10] and the fact that most metropolitan areas are under the sole control of a single newspaper, which is under management of a single ownership..

Over the years, basic concepts have developed, that have, so far, kept our "Ship of State" upon a fairly even course. These include:

1) Know the Truth, and the Truth shall keep you free.

2) Power corrupts. Absolute power corrupts absolutely.

Appalled by the impact of world turmoil and aggression, one of the great modern writers, the late Gill Robb Wilson, who became one of the spokesmen of the early Air Age, challenged his fellow Americans:

> "Once again, conflicting ideologies are locked in desperate rivalry for the key to human destiny."

Comparison of the Objectives, the Strategies and the Tactics of the two ideologies may reveal that the "KEY" is . . . INTEGRITY . . . of which the basic element is TRUTH.

Vital decisions under the one ideology are made by ruthless rulers, who use propaganda, with its components of deceit, fabrication and falsehood for human motivation. Its concepts of Justice are shaped solely for enhancement of the power of the ruling oligarchy . . . never by the rights of the individual.

---

[10] Associated Press v. Taft-Ingles Corp. (6 Cir. 1965), 340 F.2d 753, 766.

The other ideology preserves both Freedom and Justice upon a broad base of individual knowledge and is devoted to a concept of Equal Justice Under the Law. The indispensable element of true knowledge is timely and accurate information, for which the American citizen is completely dependent upon a highly organized system of gathering and disseminating news.

In its final plea (p. 12, Tribune Brief) Amicus Curiae submits this case, growing out of the Mississippi riots, as the most appropriate cause for the Courts to expand the First Amendment Freedom of the Press to protect "on-the-scene" news reports of such events. To do so would place judicial approval upon a performance by Associated Press that resulted in false imprisonment (as found by a Grand Jury and two Trial Juries) of one who must bear to his grave a false public image as a lunatic and Insurrectionist, as the result of a false charge by an inexperienced 21-year-old reporter, whose report was published by Associated Press, after notice to more experienced newsmen in the New Orleans re-write room that the cub reporter's telephone reports were hopelessly mixed up as to time and detail. Later, the principal actor in the Mississippi Drama, Meredith, was falsely reported by Associated Press as having been killed from ambush.[11]

In order to expand the "First Amendment Theory" into a blank check for the Press to defame and accuse with immunity, it would first be necessary to overhaul completely the Sullivan rule. In that case, the break from long established precedent was accomplished as a corollary of "Equal Justice Under Law," by extending to a private citizen the reciprocal right and privilege to criticize, with immunity, the conduct of public officials who, in turn, were protected against liability for defamation in the course of official statements, unless actual malice can be proved.[12]

---

[11] See Time Mazagine, June 17, 1966, p. 62, "The 'Death' Blunder."

---

[12] New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254:

"We are required in this case to determine for the first time the extent to which the constitutional protections for speech and press limit a State's power to avoid damages in a libel action brought by a public official against critics of his official conduct.

"We hold that the rule of law applied by the Alabama Courts is constitutionally deficient for failure to provide the safeguards for freedom of speech and of the press that are required by the First and Fourteenth Amendments in a libel action brought by a public official against critics of his official conduct.

"The question before us is whether this rule of law liability, as applied to an action brought by a public official against critics of his official conduct, abridges the freedom of speech and of the press that is guaranteed by the First and Fourteenth Amendments.

"The right of free public discussion of the stewardship of public officials was thus, in Madison's view, a fundamental principle of the American form of government.

"A rule compelling the critic of official conduct to guarantee the truth of all of his factual assertions . . . Under such a rule, would-be critics of official conduct may be deterred from voicing their criticism . . . The constitutional guarantees require, we think, a federal rule that prohibits a public official from recovering damages for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves that the statement was made with 'actual malice'—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not.

"Such a privilege for criticism of official conduct is appropriately analogous to the protection accorded a public official when he is sued for libel by a private citizen.

"It would give public servants an unjustified preference over the public they serve, if critics of official conduct did not have a fair

A continuation of the concept of protecting the individual citizen against official "overbearing" is well illustrated in Miranda v. State of Arizona[13] (U.S. Sup. June 13, 1966), 86 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1602.

It is obvious that the "overbearing," as condemned in Miranda was a product of official power. The Associated Press has even greater power, on a national level, and newspapers, including newspaper chains, have similar power on both national and local levels. Where public officials are ultimately subject to public opinion, the news media actually creates and controls public opinion, and will have no restraint if financial responsibility is removed.

If the conduct of Associated Press in the instant case is condoned and approved as a precedent for future Freedom of the Press, the right of the individual citizen to secure vindication and compensation for injury for defamation and accusation, as a question of fact for jury trial, will be equivalent of the immunity granted to the officials themselves . . . We hold today that the Constitution limits a State's power to award damages for libel in actions brought by public officials against critics of their official conduct. Since this is such an action, the rule requiring proof of actual malice is applicable.

---

12 (Continued)

13 Miranda v. State of Arizona, 86 Sup. Ct. Rpr. 1602 (1966), — U.S. —:

"• • • basic rights that are enshrined in our Constitution—that 'No person • • • shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself,' and that 'the accused shall • • • have the Assistance of Counsel'—rights which were put in jeopardy in that case through official overbearing. These precious rights were fixed in our Constitution only after centures of persecution and struggle. And in the words of Chief Justice Marshall, they were secured 'for ages to come • • • designed to approach immortality as nearly as human institutions can approach it.'" destroyed as a matter of law. Equal weight and consideration should be given to the duty and responsibility of the Press, as well as the Freedom of the Press. Without a legal duty and responsibility, clearly defined and recognized, Freedom of the Press can degenerate into oppression . . . can sink into license . . . to smear . . . to create false images . . . to slant news . . . to propagandize. Once the bars are down, and the cycle started, we can expect competition between different wire services, between different newspapers and between different types of news media for the most sensational and salable items of news. In such competition, the one least restrained by concepts of accuracy, integrity and responsibility would have a substantial competitive advantage over the other. The dividing line between fact and fiction will become more obscure, and the news media will be more inclined to make the news, rather than to report the news. Public confidence in all of them will deteriorate in direct proportion.

Amicus Curiae, upon the sole basis of expediency and freedom from financial responsibility in reporting on-the-scene news, seeks extension of the Sullivan rule beyond the public official to include the public "figure" and also the public "event." The "Equal Justice" concept for a private citizen to criticize the public official is not applicable in the instant case; and the requested constitutional Freedom of the Press to defame and accuse a private citizen with immunity must be based upon some other ground. We recognize that some lower courts have extended the rule to a "public figure who has voluntarily thrust himself into the vortex of public discussion of an issue which is of pressing public interest and concern.'[14]

The Colorado Supreme Court states:

> "We recognize that there is authority from other jurisdictions which looks away from such a holding. See, e.g., Fignole v. The Curtiss Publishing Co., 247 F. Supp 595. But in our considered view the rationale of New York Times Company v. Sullivan, supra, clearly suggests that the rule announced therein should apply to one in the position of this plaintiff."

And, now, with the parties in final confrontation before the ultimate judicial authority, the question arises, "What rationale?" Aside from the Equal Justice concept, Sullivan notes that the libel judgment was 1,000 times greater than the maximum fine in Alabama for criminal libel, and concludes:

> "Whether or not a newspaper can survive a succession of such judgments, the pall of fear and timidity imposed upon those who would give voice to public criticism is an atmosphere in which the First Amendment Freedoms cannot survive."

In this area the first question arises as to whether there is a First Amendment Freedom to publish false reports that

---

[14] Walker v. Associated Press (Colo. 1966), — P.2d —; Walker v. Courier-Journal, et al. (6 Cir. 1966), — F.2d — (reviewing 246 F. Supp. 231, W.D. Ky. 1965); Pauling v. National Review, Inc., 269 N.Y.S.2d 11; Pauling v. News Syndicate Co., Inc., 335 F.2d 659; Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75.

Other cases involving Walker in the lower courts are: Associated Press and Times-Picayune Publ. Corp. v. Walker (Ct. of App. La., 1966), — S.W.2d —; Associated Press v. Walker (Civ. App. Tex., 1965), 393 S.W.2d 671.

accuse a private citizen of a felony, and, next, whether such freedom in this very limited area would be necessary for survival of the Press. As to the instant case, there is no threat to the survival of Associated Press, whose annual operating budget exceeds $40,000,000.00. Its resources are further illustrated by comment at page 46 of Petitioner's Brief that Associated Press and its members had already incurred expenses in defending Respondent's actions far in excess of the judgment in this case. If Respondent could go equally outside the record, the comparison of his relatively poverty stricken budget in seeking vindication of the false charges against him would further emphasize the great disparity in power between the Press and individual members of the public, and the difficulty of proving "knowingly false" or "reckless disregard for the truth" by so powerful a defendant.

In a recent decision, Faulk v. Aware, Inc. (N.Y. 1964), 200 N.E.2d 778, 202 N.E.2d 372, an original verdict of $1,000,000 compensation and $1,250,000 punitive damages against a small publication and an individual was reduced to $400,000 compensatory and $150,000 punitive and certiorari was denied by this Honorable Court (380 U.S. 916, 1965). There the ruinous judgment issue was far more critical than in the instant case.

In Fignole v. Curtiss Pub. Co. (D.C. N.Y. 1965), 247 F.Supp. 595, the Court, after considering Sullivan and various other cases[15] and recognizing that "the law in this area is in a state of flux," held that a candidate for public office, although a "public figure" was entitled to maintain an action for libel, without proving actual malice, with language as follows:

---

[15] Pauling v. News Syndicate Co. (2 Cir. 1964), 335 F.2d 659, cert. den. 85 Sup. Ct. 662, 379 U.S. 968, 13 L.Ed. 561; Walker v. Courier-Journal (D.C. Ky. 1965), 246 F. Supp. 231.

> "At the moment, New York Times, which is the only decision binding upon me, does not foreclose this action. In order to grant this motion, it would be necessary to go farther than the Supreme Court has gone to date in holding that, in the absence of actual malice as defined in New York Times, the United States Constitution forbids a state to grant redress under its libel laws to a man who allegedly has been injured by a false defamatory statement.
>
> "I am less willing than was the court in Walker v. Courier-Journal, supra, to take this additional step. On the contrary, New York Times, to my mind, indicates that it should not be taken. The rationale of that decision appears to be that since a public official enjoys a privilege, either absolute or qualified, against liability for libelous statements which he makes in the course of his official duties, so a critic of a public official's conduct should possess an equal privilege.
>
> > 'It would give public servants an unjustified preference over the public they serve, if critics of official conduct did not have a fair equivalent of the immunity granted to the officials themselves.' (376 U.S. at 282-283, 84 S.Ct. 727).
>
> "If this is the basis of the New York Times rule, then there is no reason to grant immunity to critics of mere candidates for office or of public figures in general, for the candidates and the miscellaneous public figures possess no corresponding immunity for their own defamatory utterances. On the facts of the present case, therefore, and on the present state of the law, I hold that defendant is not entitled to a dismissal of the libel count."

A most scholarly analysis of the issue has been presented by District Judge Holtzoff in Clark v. Drew Pearson (U.S.D.C. Dist. of Col. 1965), 248 F.Supp. 188. The case involved a defamatory publication by columnist, Drew Pearson, wherein Pearson had written that the plaintiff, Clark, a Washington lawyer, had become friendly with a Congressman, after which the Congressman had reversed his position concerning opposition to the "Natural Gas Lobby," also represented by Clark. Plaintiff alleged that the Pearson article in effect charged him with the crime of endeavoring to bribe a Congressman. Among other defenses, defendant urged that plaintiff was a public figure, and that the libellous article related to matters of public interest. The Court held that the right to redress libel is a civil right and rejected defendant's argument, saying:

> "The arguments * * * included a plea for drastic changes in the law of libel, in a manner that would radically devitalize and impair the protection that it affords against defamatory publications. In view of this circumstance, it seems appropriate to make a few observations on the basic status of the law of libel in Anglo-American jurisprudence.
>
> "The common law sedulously guarantees to every indivdual various civil rights, such as the right of personal freedom, the right of personal safety, and the right of property. Another civil right safeguarded by the common law is the right to one's reputation. * * * (248 F.Supp. 190-191)

"The current trend in the law is to enhance and augment the protection of individual civil rights. No reason appears for making an exception as to the right to reputation. * * * Most civil actions relate only to money, while actions for libel or slander involve honor and reputation, which are to be considered on a higher level. . . ." (248 F. Supp. 191).

The latest expression by this Honorable Court in the area of First Amendment Freedom is Time, Inc. v. Hill (Jan. 10, 1967), 35 L.W. 4108, wherein it was recognized that a guarantee of freedom to the Press, "for the benefit of all of us" should preclude the saddling of the Press with the "impossible burden of verifying to a certainty the facts associated in a news article with the person's name, picture or portrait, particularly as related to non-defamatory matter."[16]

---

[16] Time, Inc. v. Hill (Jan. 10, 1967), 35 Law Week 4108:

"Erroneous statement is no less inevitable in such case than in the case of comment upon public affairs, and in both, if innocent or merely negligent, . . . it must be protected if the freedoms of expression are to have the 'breathing space' that they 'need to survive' . . ." New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, supra, at 271-272. As James Madison said, "Some degree of abuse is inseparable from the proper use of everything and in no instance is this more true than of the press." 4 Elliot's Debates on the Federal Constitution (1876), p. 571. "We create grave risk of serious impairment of the indispensable service of a free press in a free society if we saddle the press with the impossible burden of verifying to a certainty the facts associated in news articles with a person's name, picture or portrait, particularly as related to non-defamatory matter. Even negligence would be a most elusive standard, especially when the content of the speech itself affords no warning of prospective harm to another through falsity." (p. 4112)

(The question then arises as to the responsibility of the press where the content of the news report accuses a citizen of a felony. Would it be an unreasonable restriction of freedom to require reasonable care before risking the freedom of another by a report of questionable accuracy?)

Confronted with the legal problem as to whether the rule of Sullivan requiring malice would apply in a "privacy" case that did not involve a public official, the opinion of this Court reveals an almost classic laboratory experiment where legal scholars have accomplished a delicate balance of the scales of justice, and have obviously weighted each side with extensions and denials of rights and responsibilities, remedies and defenses. In arriving at the Conclusion that this invasion of privacy case should require Proof of Malice ("knowingly false" or "reckless disregard for the truth"), the Court recognized that it involved "non-defamatory matter," and further stated:

> "We find applicable here the standard of knowing or reckless falsehood not through blind application of New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, relating solely to libel actions by public officials, but only upon consideration of the factors which arise in the particular context of the application of the New York statute in cases involving private individuals. This is neither a libel action by a private individual nor a statutory action by a public official. Therefore, although the First Amendment principles pronounced in New York Times guide our conclusion, we reach that conclusion only by applying these principles in this discrete context. It therefore serves no purpose to distinguish the facts here from those in New York Times. Were this a libel action, the distinction which has been suggested between the relative opportunities of the public official and private individual to rebut defamatory charges might be germane. And the additional state interest in the protection of the individual against damage to his reputation would be involved."

From the above, it appears that this Court has such an awareness of the boundary between the "breathing space" of the Press and the "security area" of the people that it would be presumptuous for counsel to make further suggestion, particularly in view of the concurring and dissenting opinions in Time, Inc. v. Hill.

It is respectfully submitted that the Sullivan rule should not be extended to apply to a private citizen, even though he may be a "public figure" involved in a "public event."

CONCLUSION

Objective evaluation may reveal that the proposition presented to the Court by Amicus Curiae is not a "friendly" suggestion—that abandonment of the rule which keeps financial responsibility behind the product liability of the news merchant[17] may create a "Frankenstein" that will return to haunt not only the public, but also the news media itself.

There is a functional basis for balancing the power of public officials against the Freedom of the public to make good faith errors in public criticism of such officials, especially since the power of the public official is ultimately subject to public opinion. With the power of the news media and especially the wire services, devoted primarily to the making of public opinion, however, the same safeguard does not exist when the power of defamation and accusation is extended to the news media. In the rationale of Time, Inc., and particularly the concurring and dissenting opinions, it appears that the attention of this Honorable Court has been drawn to the necessity of increasing the responsibility of the Press from minimal requirements, where minor defamation is involved, to a progressively higher degree where the Press is gambling seriously with the reputation, and especially the Liberty, of citizens in the news.

---

[17] Associated Press v. U. S., 326 U.S. 1.

Respectfully submitted,

CLYDE J. WATTS
Counsel for Respondent

Of Counsel:

WILLIAM ANDRESS, JR.
Fidelity Union Life Building
Dallas, Texas

WATTS, LOONEY, NICHOLS & JOHNSON
219 Couch Drive
Oklahoma City, Oklahoma 73102

January, 1967

APPENDIX

AFFIDAVIT

STATE OF OKLAHOMA

SS

OKLAHOMA COUNTY

CLYDE J. WATTS, having been duly sworn, on oath states:

1) He is a practicing attorney in Oklahoma City, a member of the Bar of the Supreme Courts of the United States of America and the State of Oklahoma. He is counsel for Respondent, Edwin A. Walker, in the instant case, and also represented Edwin A. Walker in Case WC-29-62, U. S. District Court for the Northern District of Mississippi, "United States of America v. Edwin A. Walker," wherein Walker was charged with crimes as hereafter set forth.

2) On the night of September 30, 1962, Associated Press published on its World-wide news wires that "former Maj. Gen. Edwin Walker led a charge of about 1,000 students against the Marshals" (R. 1225, 1229, 1240).

3) On October 1, 1962, the U. S. Attorney at Oxford, Mississippi, filed a Complaint against Walker, "on the basis of information obtained from Van H. Savell" (Associated Press newsman), charging him with: 1) Insurrection, 2) Assaulting U. S. Officers, 3) Sedition, 4) Seditious conspiracy. (See Apx. vi-vii.)

4) On the same date, Walker was committed to the custody of the U. S. Marshal for the Northern District of Mississippi, who was ordered to commit him in a place of confinement within the Northern District of Mississippi. (See Apx. viii-ix.)

5) Within a few hours after this commitment for confinement in the Northern District of Mississippi, the U. S. Marshall received a telegram from the U. S. Director of Prisons, directing that Walker be committed to the U. S. Medical Center at Springfield, Missouri. (See Apx. ix.) Without a Court Order, and without a reasonable opportunity to make the $100,000.00 bail fixed by the U. S. Commissioner, Walker was placed upon a border patrol plane, without being told where he was being taken, and transported to Springfield, Missouri, where he was committed to the custody of the Warden of the U. S. Medical Center.

6) On October 2, 1962, the U. S. Attorney at Oxford, Miss., filed with the Federal Court a Motion for Judicial Determination of Mental Capacity (see Apx. x-xiii) with attached Affidavit by Dr. Charles E. Smith, Chief Psychiatrist of the Federal Bureau of Prisons, who had never seen Walker, stating that he had "examined carefully various news reports concerning General Walker's actions and behavior, including . . . news reports of his appearances on the University Campus during the past several days." "Some of his described behavior reflects . . . bizarre outbursts of the types often observed in indiivduals suffering with paranoid mental disorders . . . I believe his recent behavior may be indicative of an underlying mental disturbance."

7) On the same date, and pursuant to such motion, the U. S. District Judge at Oxford ordered Walker to be "transferred and committed" to the Medical Center for Federal Prisoners at Springfield, Mo., which Order was entered without notice to Walker, representation by counsel or a hearing, and at a time when Walker had already been transferred to Springfield. (Apx. xiv-xv.)

8) Walker's Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus in the U. S. District Court, filed October 3, 1962, could not receive a prompt hearing, under Order of the Court that Answer and Briefs should be filed by October 9, 1962 and the Respondent (Warden) was granted until October 14, 1962, to file answer and return certifying the true cause for detention of Walker (Apx. xvi-xviii). Time was allowed for filing of briefs. Meanwhile Walker was in Prison in Missouri, until released on bond by the Mississippi Court on October 6, 1962.

9) In addition to the original false report that Walker had assumed command of the mob and led a charge against U. S. Marshals, Associated Press proceeded to slant the news coverage concerning Walker as follows:

a) Extensive World-wide coverage was given to Walker's arrest and commitment to the mental hospital, including one feature story that Al Capone had once been an inmate and that many of the inmates were lunatics and sexual deviates (Apx. xix).

b) No coverage was given to the fact that Walker's rights had been violated, in transporting him to Springfield, without a Court Order, and without reasonable time to make bail, and subsequently committing him, without notice, counsel or hearing, upon the Affidavit of a psychiatrist who had never examined him or even seen him.

c) At a hearing before the Federal Court in Oxford on Oct. 21, 1962, extensive coverage was given on the national "A" wire of Associated Press, that government psychiatrists had questioned Walker's mentality (R. 1384). Report of the Court appointed Psychiatrist, including his statement that "Walker was functioning under the superior level of intelligence" was placed upon the "B" wire, with limited local circulation (R. 1373, 1419). The trial judge was misquoted by the AP as having indicated that the latter report expressed no opinion as to Walker's sanity (R. 1395).

d) After the Department of Justice dismissed its charges against Walker, the story was de-emphasized by an insertion that the charges could be re-filed at any time within five years (R. 1425-6).

10) Based upon extensive investigation of the actions of Associated Press newsmen in the handling of the Walker case, and the depositions and testimony of several high level executives of Associated Press, affiant takes issue with the conclusions in the Affidavit of Mr. W. D. Maxwell that more latitude for reporters of the News Service is required by the Constitution for "on the scene spot news reports," and that "true freedom of the Press cannot endure unless the Press can report, in depth and detail and without fear of economic reprisal, all the news of the day as received." Affiant would respectfully suggest to Mr. Maxwell, and to the news media, generally, that their newsmen should be trained and disciplined to avoid false charges of criminal acts against even "public figures." Associated Press Newsrooms should be instructed that Associated Press would be responsible for false reports of acts constituting the commission of a crime, at least until the alleged criminal is taken into custody. This should not delay the reporting of actual news more than a few hours at the most and would avoid the spectre of having a "public figure" arrested upon the public statement of a newsman, who may have "made the news," rather than reported the news.

11) It is also respectfully suggested that, if the news media is relieved from financial responsibility for defamation so serious as to cause arrest of the victim, news, as a very salable commodity, will become competitive upon the basis of relative sensationalism of the report, with the less spectacular true and accurate news becoming consistently less marketable. Removal of financial responsibility, as a guarantee for accuracy and integrity, would ultimately do do more harm than good to the news media, in terms of loss of public confidence.

12) It is finally respectfully suggested that, since riots and civil disorders present problems increasingly similar to war-time combat, the Wire Services could profitably copy the basic requirement that combat reconaissance patrols travel in pairs. Such a directive by Associated Press to its newsmen would have avoided the Walker debacle, and would have prevented confinement of an innocent man for six gruesome days and nights in a Prison Hospital for criminal insane, under maximum security and in solitary confinement. There must be a better way to provide "on the spot" news coverage than to eliminate, by Constitutional construction, what little restraint and discipline may exist among certain merchants of news.

_____

CLYDE J. WATTS

Subscribed and sworn to before me on January ____, 1967.

_____

Notary Public

My Commission Expires:

_____

[APPENDIX]

FILED IN EVIDENCE
IN SUIT NO. 160536
OCT 18 1965
(Name illegible)
Deputy Clerk

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE
NORTHERN DISTRICT OF MISSISSIPPI, WESTERN DIVISION

Commissioner's Docket No. 1
Case No. 61

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA	)	COMPLAINT for )	VIOLATION OF
v.	)	U. S. C. Title 18
EDWIN WALKER	)	Sections 111, 372, 2383,
	)	and 2384

BEFORE Omar D. Craig, Oxford, Mississippi.

The undersigned complainant being duly sworn states:

That on or about September 30, 1962, at Lafayette County, in the Northern District of Mississippi, Edwin Walker did forcibly assault, resist, oppose, impede, imtimidate, and interfere with United States marshals and persons employed to assist such marshals, the marshals being a class of persons designated in Section 1114, Title 18, United States Code, while engaged in the performance of their official duties, in violation of Section 111, Title 18, United States Code;

That said defendant and other persons unknown in the state of Mississippi, did conspire to prevent by force, intimidation, and threats United States Marshals from discharging their duties and to injure them in their person while engaged in the lawful discharge of the duties of their office, in violation of Section 372, Title 18, United States Code;

That said defendant did incite, assist, and engage in an insurrection against the authority of the United States and the laws thereof, in violation of Section 2383, Title 18, United States Code;

That said defendant and other persons unknown in the state of Mississippi, did conspire to and oppose by force the authority of the United States and by force to prevent, hinder, and delay the execution of the laws of the United States, in violation of Section 2384, Title 18, United States Code.

And the complaint states that this complaint is based on information and belief on the basis of information obtained from Van H. Savell.

/s/ H. M. RAY
United States Attorney

Sworn to before me, and subscribed in my presence, October 1, 1962.

/s/ Omar D. Craig
United States Commissioner

[APPENDIX]

FILED
This 8 day of Oct. 1962
— T. Robertson, Clerk
By Shirley S. Lumpkin
Deputy Clerk

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE
NORTHERN DISTRICT OF MISSISSIPPI
WESTERN DIVISION

Commissioner's Docket No. 1
Case No. 61

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA	)	FINAL COMMITMENT
v.	)	of
EDWIN WALKER	)	EDWIN WALKER

To: The United States Marshal of the Northern District Mississippi;

You are hereby commanded to take the custody of the above named defendant and to commit him with a certified copy of this commitment to the custodian of a place of confinement within the Northern District of Mississippi approved by the Attorney General of the United States where the defendant shall be received and safely kept until discharged in due course of law. The above named defendant was arrested upon the complaint of H. M. Ray, United States Attorney, charging that on or about 30 Sept., 1962, in the Northern District of Mississippi, the defendant did Assault, resist, and impede officers and employees of the United States, and conspire to impede and injure officers of the United States, insurrection, and seditious conspiracy, in violation of U.S.C. Title 18, Sections 111, 372, 2383, and 2384, and he, (having duly waived preliminary examination before me on Oct. 1, 1962), has been directed to furnish bond in the sum of One Hundred Thousand dollars ($100,000.00) for his appearance in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Mississippi at Oxford, Mississippi, in accordance with all orders and directions of the court relative to his appearance before the court, and he failed to do so.

/s/ Omar D. Craig
United States Commissioner

Dated: October 1, 1962

Omar D. Craig

TO WARDEN RUSSELL SETTLE FROM DIRECTOR

OCT. 2

HERE IS A COPY OF THE TELEGRAM FORWARDED LAST NIGHT TO JOHN H. PHILLIPS UNITED STATES MARSHAL POST OFFICE AND FEDERAL BUILDING OXFORD MISSISSIPPI QUOTE IN VIEW OF FACT THAT THERE IS NO AVAILABLE SUITABLE FACILITY FOR THE TEMPORARY DETENTION OF EDWIN A. WALKER ELSEWHERE THAN IN THE MEDICAL CENTER FOR FEDERAL PRISONERS AT SPRINGFIELD MISSOURI YOU ARE AUTHORIZED AND DIRECTED TO PROMPTLY COMMIT WALKER THERE PENDING FURTHER ACTION ACTION BY APPROO APPROPRIATE COURT JAMES V. BENNETT DIRECTOR UNQUOTE END ACA

WILLDEL MSG TU END ENDM

[APPENDIX]

—x—

FILED
2 October 1962
Claude F. Clayton
District Judge

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF MISSISSIPPI
WESTERN DIVISION

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA	)
v.	)	No. W-C-29-62
EDWIN A. WALKER	)

MOTION FOR JUDICIAL DETERMINATION OF MENTAL COMPETENCY

Comes now the United States of America by H. M. Ray, United States Attorney for the Northern District of Mississippi, and moves this Court for a judicial determination as to the mental competency of the defendant Edwin A. Walker under the provisions of Section 4244, Title 18, U. S. Code, and for grounds for this motion would respectfully show the following:

1) That on October 1, 1962, a complaint was filed with the United States Commissioner, Oxford, Mississippi, against this defendant charging him with—forcibly assaulting, resisting, opposing, impeding, intimidating, and interfering with United States Marshals and persons employed to assist such marshals, the marshals being a class of persons designated in Section 1114, Title 18, United States Code, while engaged in the performance of their official duties, in violation of Section 111, Title 18, United States Code;

conspiring, with other persons unknown in the State of Mississippi, to prevent by force, intimidation, and threats United States Marshals from discharging their duties and to injure them in their person while engaged in the lawful discharge of the duties of their office, in violation of Section 372, Title 18, United States Code; inciting, assisting, and engaging in an insurrection against the authority of the United States and the laws thereof, in violation of Section 2383, Title 18, United States Code;

conspiring to and opposing by force, with other persons unknown in the State of Mississippi, the authority of the United States and by force to prevent, hinder, and delay the execution of the laws of the United States, in violation of Section 2384, Title 18, United States Code; and that bond was fixed in the sum of $100,000.00;

2) That Dr. Charles E. Smith, Medical Director and Chief Psychiatrist of the Federal Prison Bureau, has informed James V. Bennett, Director of the Federal Bureau of Prisons, who in turn has informed the United States Attorney, by telegram, a copy of which is attached hereto as Exhibit "A", that there is probable cause to believe that the defendant is suffering from a mental disturbance;

3) That on the basis of the aforesaid information furnished concerning this defendant, the United States Attorney has reasonable cause and does believe that it is very likely that the defendant Edwin A. Walker may be presently insane or otherwise so mentally incompetent as to be unable to understand the proceedings against him or properly to assist in his own defense; that the Court should cause the defendant to be examined as to his mental condition; and that for the purpose of this examination the defendant should be committed to a suitable hospital or other facility to be designated by the Court.

Respectfully submitted,

/s/ H. M. Ray
H. M. Ray
United States Attorney

AFFIDAVIT

United States of America
Northern District of Mississippi

This day personally appeared before me, the undersigned authority, H. M. Ray, U. S. Attorney for the Northern District of Mississippi, who being by me first duly sworn according to law, upon his oath states that to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief, the matters and things set forth in the foregoing motion are true and correct as therein stated.

/s/ H. M. Ray
H. M. Ray
United States Attorney

Sworn to and subscribed before me this the 2nd day of October, 1962.

William T. Robertson, Clerk
By /s/ Katherine H. Butts
Deputy Clerk

(SEAL)

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the original thereof now in my office.
Attest 10-16-65
William T. Robertson, Clerk
By Gena S. Lamb, D.C.

October 2, 1962

Telegram to Mr. Hosea M. Ray, United States Attorney, Oxford, Mississippi

The following is a memorandum to me concerning Edwin A. Walker submitted by Dr. Charles E. Smith, Medical Director and Chief Psychiatrist of the Federal Prison Bureau: "I have carefully examined various news reports concerning General Walker's actions and behavior including his appearance before the Committee of the United States Senate on Armed Forces in April of this year and news reports of his appearances on the University Campus during the past several days STOP Some of his described behavior reflects sensitivity and essentially unpredictable and seemingly bizarre outbursts of the types often observed in individuals suffering with paranoid mental disorders. There are also indications in his medical history of functional and psychosomatic disorders which could be precursers of the more serious disorders which his present behavior suggests. From this and other information available to me I believe his recent behavior has been out of keeping with that of a person of his station, background, and training, and that as suggested it may be indicative of an underlying mental disturbance. Signed Charles E. Smith." The foregoing being forwarded to you in affidavit form by air mail.

James V. Bennett
Director of Prisons

Exhibit "A"

[APPENDIX]

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF MISSISSIPPI
WESTERN DIVISION

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA	)
v.	)	No. W-C-29-62
EDWIN A. WALKER	)

ORDER COMMITTING DEFENDANT FOR PSYCHIATRIC EXAMINATION

On a motion filed by the United States Attorney for a judicial determination of the mental compentency of the above-named defendant under the provisions of Section 4244, Title 18, United States Code, the Court advises that the motion is sufficient and should be sustained.

It is, therefore,

ORDERED:

That the defendant be transferred and committed to the Medical Center for Federal Prisoners, Springfield, Missouri, for psychiatric examination and there remain for such reasonable time for such examination as may be determined by the Center to be necessary or desirable for the completion of such examination;

That upon completion of said examination a report of the results thereof be transmitted to this Court;

That the Attorney General of the United States of America, upon receipt of a certified copy of this order, deliver defendant to said Center; and upon completion of said examination said Center notify the Attorney General of the United States or his duly authorized representatives and the United States Marshal for the Northern District of Mississippi; and upon receipt of the notice the Attorney General or his duly authorized representatives shall then return the defendant to the custody of the United States Marshal for the Northern District of Mississippi;

That for delivery of said defendant to the Medical Center for Federal Prisoners and subsequently returning said defendant to the jurisdiction of this Court, a certified copy of the order shall be full warrant and authority to the Attorney General of the United States or his duly authorized representatives and to the said United States Marshal.

This the 2nd day of October, 1962.

/s/ Claude F. Clayton
Claude F. Clayton
District Judge

(SEAL)

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the original thereof now in my office.
Attest 10-16-65
William T. Roberston, Clerk
By Gena S. Lamb, D.C.

FILED
OCT 4 1962
J. C. Truman, Clerk
By Axie Powell
Deputy Clerk

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE WESTERN DISTRICT OF MISSOURI
WESTERN DIVISION

EDWIN A. WALKER	)
Petitioner,	)
-vs-	)
DR. R. O. SETTLE, Warden of the United States Medical Center, Springfield, Missouri.	)	No. 14068-K.C.
Respondent.	)

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE

Petitioner has this day filed his petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus praying that this Court "take cognizance of the manner in which Petitioner is being restrained and denied his liberty by the Respondent; and that a writ be issued directing the Respondent to show cause why Petitioner should not be immediately released from custody and restored to his full liberty; that Petitioner be given an opportunity to make bail in a reasonable amount under the protection and supervision of this Honorable Court; that Petitioner have such further relief as may appear just and proper."

Petitioner alleges that he is being held "by virtue of an order issued by Omar D. Craig, United States Commissioner for the Northern District of Mississippi, Western Division, dated the 1st day of October 1962"; that he "was illegally transported from the Northern District of Mississippi to the Western District of Missouri by virtue of a telegram to John H. Phillips, U. S. Marshal, of Oxford, Mississippi, from James V. Bennett, Director of Prisons"; and that he is "further held by virtue of an order made by Claude F. Clayton, District Judge of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Mississippi," dated October 2, 1962. Petitioner's allegations concerning alleged violations of his Constitutional rights raise numerous questions that may not necessarily need to be determined simultaneously.

Specifically, Petitioner in Paragraph 4A(1) of his petition, alleges that his Constitutional rights have been violated in that he "has been and is being denied his right of bail."

On the other hand, Petitioner's allegations concerning the validity of the order of the U. S. Commissioner, the telegraphic direction from the Director of Federal Prisons to the Marshal in the Northern District of Mississippi, and the order of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Mississippi raise different and separable questions of law.

For that reason the Court orders that:

1. On or before Tuesday, October 9, 1962, Respondent shall make answer and file a return as to why Petitioner should not be given an opportunity to make bail.

2. Counsel for Respondent and counsel for Petitioner shall file simultaneous suggestions in support of their respective legal positions on or before Tuesday, October 9, 1962. The Court requests counsel for both parties to submit authorities on the question of:

(a) Whether any defendant is entitled to bail under circumstances which would assume the validity of the orders under which Petitioner is presently confined.

(b) Whether, assuming petitioner is entitled to bail, this Court or some other United States Court has jurisdiction to admit Petitioner to bail consistent with Rule 46 of the Rules of Criminal Procedure and Article VIII of the Constitution of the United States.

3. Respondent, within ten (10) days of this order, shall further file an answer and return certifying the true cause of the detention of Petitioner in accordance with Chapter 153 of the United States Code.

4. Counsel for Petitioner may file with the Court such suggestions in support of Petitioner's petition for writ of habeaus corpus at the earliest convenient time.

5. Counsel for Respondent shall file an answer brief within ten (10) days of the filing of the Petitioner's suggestions.

6. Thereafter, if counsel for Petitioner so desire, they may have an additional five (5) days in which to reply to Respondent's answer brief.

7. Counsel are directed to file the originals of all papers in the Western Division of this Court at Kansas City, Missouri, but that, in order that a copy of all papers filed be available in the Southern Division at Springfield, Missouri, copies of all papers be filed in the Southern Division at Springfield, Missouri.

8. The Court will set a date for hearing after all documents above required to be filed are in fact filed.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

/s/ (Name illegible)
Judge

Springfield, Missouri
October 4, 1962

A 21 NU

"Deputy Atty. Gen. Nicholas Katzenbach ordered Walker's arrest after the 53 year old Texan led one student charge against federal marshals on the U. of Miss. Campus and later appeared in the midst of rioting in downtown Oxford."

A 21 Page 2

* * * * * * *

"The Springfield Center known to some as the 'Country Club of Federal Prisons' is no stranger to celebrities. Al Capone was there once and Robert Stroud, the famed 'Birdman of Alcatraz' is one of the present inmates."

"Most of the prisoners in the center which takes in some 12-15 buildings at the South Side of the Southwest Missouri city nestled in the Ozark Mountains, are mental patients. A good many are sexual deviates also."

LIBRARY
SUPREME COURT, U. S.

IN THE

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

OCTOBER TERM, 1966.

No. 150.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,
Petitioner,

vs.

EDWIN A. WALKER,
Respondent.

On Writ of Certiorari to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Second Supreme Judicial District of Texas or, in the Alternative, to the Supreme Court of Texas.

BRIEF FOR THE RESPONDENT.

WILLIAM ANDRESS, JR.,
Fidelity Union Life Building,
Dallas, Texas 75201,
CLYDE J. WATTS,
[illegible],
Oklahoma City, Oklahoma 73102,
Attorneys for Respondent.

A. F. [illegible]

INDEX.

	Page
Constitutional provisions and statutes involved	1
Questions presented	3
Statement of the case	4
Summary of argument	27
Argument	28
I. The judgment against the Associated Press satisfied all constitutional requirements	28
A. The findings of the trial jury and the rulings of the Texas courts are in accord with New York Times v. Sullivan, even if it is extended to public figures	28
B. Under the Seventh Amendment this court cannot substitute its opinion of the evidence for that of the jury	31
II. Where AP's purported eye-witness report is found by the jury to be a fabricated falsehood, not made in good faith and not the honest opinion of the writer, then the report is knowingly false	34
III. The definition of "actual malice" under Texas law respecting punitive damages is more stringent than the definition of "actual malice" under the Sullivan decision of this court, and a ruling that there was insufficient proof of "actual malice" under Texas law to warrant punitive damages cannot be taken as compelling the conclusion that there was insufficient evidence under the Sullivan decision to warrant any recovery at all	36

IV. Under Texas law petitioner has waived its contentions that it still has a defense of fair comment 37

V. The New York Times privilege does not extend to defamatory statements about persons outside of government 38

VI. The trial court granted petitioner every possible benefit of its defense of "fair comment" 44

VII. The amount of the verdict does not violate petitioner's freedom of the press 45

Conclusion 48

Appendix—Map 51

Cases Cited.

Arnold v. Panhandle & S. F. R. Co., 373 U. S. 360, 1 L. ed. 2d 889, 77 S. Ct. 840 32

Associated Press v. Walker, 393 S. W. 2d 671 ..... 8, 9

Atlantic & Gulf Stevedores v. Ellerman Lines, 369 U. S. 355, 7 L. ed. 2d 798 (1962), 82 S. Ct. 1134 32

Cepeda, Orlando v. Cowles Magazines, 328 F. 2d 869 (CA 9, 1964) 41

Chicago B. & Q. R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 226, 41 L. ed. 979 (1897) 32

Clark v. Drew Pearson, 248 F. Supp. 188 (D. D. C. 1965) 41

Davis v. Etter & Curtis (Tex. Circ. App. no writ. history), 243 S. W. 603 13

Dempsey v. Time, Inc., 43 Misc. 2d 754, 252 N. Y. S. 2d 186, aff'd. mem. 254 N. Y. S. 2d 80 (1964) 41

Dick v. New York Life Insurance Co., 359 U. S. 437, 3 L. ed. 2d 935, 79 S. Ct. 921 32

Farmers Educ. and Co-op. Union v. WDAY, Inc., 360 U. S. 525, 3 L. ed. 1407 (1959) 33

Faulk v. Aware, Inc., 19 App. Div. 2d 464, 244 N. Y. S. 2d 259 (1963, aff'd. mem., 14 N. Y. 2d 899, 202 N. E. 2d 352, 252 N. Y. S. 2d 95 (1964), cert. denied, 380 U. S. 916 (1965) 40, 48

Fignole v. Curtis Publishing Co., 247 F. Supp. 595 (S. D. N. Y. 1965) 41, 42, 44

Gallick v. Baltimore & Ohio R. Co., 372 U. S. 100, 9 L. ed. 2d 618 (1963) 33

Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64, 13 L. ed. 2d 125 (1964) 37

Grant v. Marshall, 280 S. W. 2d 559, 154 T. 531 (Texas S. Ct. 1955) 38

Harper v. National Review, Inc., 33 U. S. L. Week 2341 (N. Y. S. Ct. December 22, 1964, aff'd., 263 N. Y. S. 2d 262) 41

Hogan v. New York Times, 313 F. 2d 354 (1963) 34

Lavender v. Kurn, 327 U. S. 645, 90 L. ed. 916 (1946) 32

Linn v. United Plant Guard Workers Local, 383 U. S. 53, 15 L. ed. 2d 582 (1966) 40

McCarver v. Corpus Christi, 284 S. W. 2d 142, 155 T. 153 (Texas S. Ct. 1956) 38

New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 84 S. Ct. 727 ..3, 27, 28, 29, 31, 32, 33, 34, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42

Pape v. Time, Inc., 354 F. 2d 558 (1965), cert. denied, 384 U. S. 909 33

Reynolds v. Pegler, 223 F. 2d 429 (1955), cert. denied, 350 U. S. 846 48

Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U. S. 75, 15 L. ed. 2d 597 ..... 37, 39, 40

Spahn, Warren v. Julian Messner, Inc., 250 N. Y. S. 2d 529, aff'd., 260 N. Y. S. 2d 451 (1965) 41

Time, Inc. v. Hill, U. S. Supreme Court, Jan. 9, 1967 49

United Press International v. Mohs, 381 S. W. 2d 104 (Texas Court of Civil Appeals, July 24, 1964) 31
United States of America v. Edwin Walker, United States District Court, Northern District of Mississippi, Western Division, Commissioner's Docket No. 1, Case No. 61 .....39, 46

Authorities.

Pedrick, Freedom of the Press and the Law of Libel: The Modern Revised Translation, 49 Cornell L. Q. 581, 597-600 (1964) 33
18 Vanderbilt Law Rev. 1429 (1965) 40

Constitutional Provisions and Statutes Cited.

U. S. Constitution, Seventh Amendment 1
Vernon's Texas Civil Statutes, Title 88, Article 5430..1, 38
Vernon's Texas Rules of Civil Procedure, Rule 274 .....2, 37, 44
Vernon's Texas Rules of Civil Procedure, Rule 279 .....2, 37, 38, 44

IN THE

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

OCTOBER TERM, 1966.

No. 150.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,
Petitioner,

vs.

EDWIN A. WALKER,
Respondent.

On Writ of Certiorari to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Second Supreme Judicial District of Texas or, in the Alternative, to the Supreme Court of Texas.

BRIEF FOR THE RESPONDENT.

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS AND STATUTES INVOLVED.

U. S. Constitution, Amendment VII.

"In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise reexamined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law."

Vernon's Texas Civil Statutes, Article 5430.

"A libel is a defamation expressed in printing or writing, or by signs and pictures, or drawings, tending to blacken the memory of the dead, or tending to injure the reputation of one who is alive, and thereby expose him to public hatred, contempt or ridicule, or financial injury, or to impeach the honesty, integrity, or virtue, or reputation of any one, or to publish the natural defects of any one and thereby expose such person to public hatred, ridicule, or financial injury."

Vernon's Texas Rules of Civil Procedure,
Rule 274. Objections and Requests.

"A party objecting to a charge must point out distinctly the matter to which he objects and the grounds of his objection. Any complaint as to an instruction, issue, definition or explanatory instruction, on account of any defect, omission, or fault in pleading, shall be deemed waived unless specifically included in the objections. . . ."

Vernon's Texas Rules of Civil Procedure,
Rule 279. Submission of Issues.

". . .

"Upon appeal all independent grounds of recovery or of defense not conclusively established under the evidence and upon which no issue is given or requested shall be deemed as waived; but where such ground of recovery or of defense consists of more than one issue, if one or more of the issues necessary to sustain such ground of recovery or of defense, and necessarily referable thereto, are submitted to and answered by the jury, and one or more of such issues are omitted, without such request, or objection, and there is evidence to support a finding thereon, the trial court, at the request of either party, may after notice and hearing and at any time before the judgment is rendered, make and file written findings on such omitted issue or issues in support of the judgment, but if no such written findings are made, such omitted issue or issues shall be deemed as found by the court in such manner as to support the judgment. A claim that the evidence was insufficient to warrant the submission of any issue may be made for the first time after verdict, regardless of whether the submission of such issue was requested by the complaining party."

QUESTIONS PRESENTED.

The questions framed by Petitioner are to some extent misleading because of the tendency of the authors of the Brief to engage in personalities not warranted by the particular issue presented. It does not contribute to the clarity of the argument in this case to deprecate the Respondent by using terminology such as "persons like General Walker", "one like General Walker" and "at the behest of one like General Walker".

1. Where there is evidence that a purported eye-witness account is not substantially true, and when the purported eye-witness account charges the plaintiff with having committed Federal felonies, can it be ruled that evidence of knowledge of falsity or reckless disregard of truth, as required by Times v. Sullivan, is lacking?

2. Does New York Times v. Sullivan, in definition of "actual malice", require more than knowledge of falsity or reckless disregard of truth?

3. Does the Texas definition of malice, as required to sustain a verdict for punitive damages, differ from the New York Times v. Sullivan definition of malice, as required to sustain any recovery for libel; and, if so, is the Texas definition the more stringent in the sense of requiring more?

4. Did Petitioner under Texas law waive its now asserted defense of no known falsity or no reckness disregard of the truth by failing to submit a special issue to the jury for its decision on these factual questions?

STATEMENT OF THE CASE.

As part of its reporting of events involved in the riot upon the campus of Mississippi University on the night of September 30, 1962, Petitioner published, over its world wide wire service, reports that Respondent had committed criminal acts . . . assuming command of a riotous mob and leading a charge against U. S. Marshals. These reports by a self-styled eye-witness, employee of Petitioner, were found by the jury to be false.

The defamatory reports, quoted in full in the Associated Press Brief (pp. 7-11), included the following sensational and dramatic statements:

> "October 2, 1962. 'Walker, who Sunday night led a charge of students against federal marshals on the Ole Miss Campus, was arrested on four counts including insurrection against the United States.'
>
> "October 3, 1962. (Editors Note: Former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, . . . was eating dinner Sunday night . . . was told there was a 'scene of considerable disturbance' on the University of Mississippi Campus. He went there. Here is the story of Van Savell, 21, Associated Press newsman, who was on the scene and saw what happened) (Emphasis added).
>
> "By Van Savell: Oxford, Miss., October 3, 1962 (AP) 'Utilizing my youth to the fullest extent, I dressed as any college student would and easily milled among the several thousand rioters on the University of Mississippi Campus Sunday night.
>
> "This allowed me to follow the crowd—a few students and many outsiders—as they charged federal marshals surrounding the century old Lyceum Building. It also brought me into direct contact with former Army Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, who is now under arrest on charges of inciting insurrection and seditious conspiracy.

"Walker first appeared in the riot area at 8:45 p. m., Sunday near the University Avenue entrance about 300 yds. from the Ole Miss Administration Building.

• • • • • • • •

"The crowd welcomed Walker, although this was the man who commanded the 101st Airborne Division during the 1957 school integration riots at Little Rock, Arkansas.

" 'One unidentified man queried Walker as he approached the group. "General, will you lead us to the steps?"

" 'I observed Walker as he loosened his tie and shirt and nodded "Yes" without speaking. He then conferred with a group of about 15 persons who appeared to be the riot leaders.

" 'The crowd took full advantage of the near-by construction work. They broke new bricks into several pieces, took survey sticks and broken soft drink bottles.

" 'Walker assumed command of the crowd, which I estimated at 1,000 but was delayed for several minutes when a neatly dressed, portly man of about 45 approached the group. He conferred with Walker for several minutes and then joined a group near the front.

" 'Two men took Walker by the arms and they headed for the Lyceum and the federal marshals. Throughout this time, I was less than six feet from Walker.

" 'This march toward tear gas and some 200 marshals was more effective than the previous attempts. Although Walker was unarmed, the crowd said this was the moral support they needed.

" 'We were met with a heavy barrage of tear gas about 75 yards from the Lyceum steps and went a few feet further when we had to turn back.

"'Before doing so, many of the rioters hurled their weapons—the bricks, the bottles, rocks and wooden stakes toward the clustered marshals.

"'We fled the tear gas and the charging marshals —the crowd racing back to a Confederate soldier's statute near the grove entrance below the Lyceum.

"'I went to a telephone. A few minutes later I returned and found Walker talking with several students. Shortly thereafter, Walker climbed half-way up the Confederate monument and addressed the crowd.

"'I heard Walker say that Gov. Barnett had betrayed the People of Mississippi. "But don't let up now," he said, "You may lose this battle, but you will have been heard."

• • • • • • •

"There were cheers. It was apparent that Walker had complete command over the group.

"'By this time, it was nearly 11:00 p. m. and I raced to the telephone again. Upon my return, Walker was calmly explaining the "New Frontier Government" to several bystanders. He remained away from the rioting throughout the next few hours, but advised on several tactics" (R. 11-25).

[The timing of the above reported charge . . . before the speech from the Monument . . . is in direct conflict with the first telephone report by Savell to the AP news room in New Orleans, which stated that the charge was after the speech on the monument.]

The above Associated Press report is in direct conflict with the United Press report (R. 1495-6), which included the following:

"UPI—A 66 Students were waving the Confederate flag during a lull in the rioting. Edwin A. Walker, former Maj. Gen. who commanded troops at Little Rock mounted a Confederate statue and advised the students to cease their violence."

" 'This is not the proper route to Cuba', Walker, who was wearing a big Texas hat said." "The crowd jeered."

"Later, Walker mounted the statue again and said: 'I want to compliment you all on the protest you make here tonight. You have a right to protest under the Constitution'."

The jury, in answer to questions under "Special Issues" held that the reports that "Walker assumed command of the crowd" and "led a charge of students against federal marshals" were not "substantially true", not "fair comment", and not "made in good faith?" (R. 59-62).

At pages 11 through 13 of its Brief, Petitioner asks the "naggingly persistent" question: "Why was General Walker, of Dallas, Texas, at the campus of the University of Mississippi?", and thereupon proceeds to answer its question with public statements of Respondent, which were offered to the jury in an obvious attempt to prejudice the jury's consideration of the evidence as to what General Walker actually did, after arriving on the campus.

The answer to Petitioner's nagging question had been given by Walker on cross-examination:

"Q. (by Mr. Gooch) Now, General, just what was your purpose in going to Mississippi?

"A. I thought it was absolutely wrong to use military forces, troops, American troops in a strictly civilian problem.

"Q. All right.

"Mr. Watts: Let him finish.

"A. And I wanted to see for myself exactly what happened. I wanted to know from first hand information. And I did not trust the press reporting of it in any form, since I had been at Little Rock and seen that exaggerated out of all proportions, and I intended to see for myself" (R. 561).

The answer was also given by the Texas Court of Civil Appeals:

> ". . . His [Walker's] presence there was not illegal or unlawful. He had the same right to come upon the campus and observe the activity as did the various members of the press who were there to observe and report." Associated Press v. Walker, 393 S. W. 2d 671, 675 (1965).

With the sole Constitutional question involving whether the Associated Press is to be immune from liability for falsely reporting that its newsman saw Walker commit several very serious crimes, it is hoped that principle of Equal Justice Under Law will keep the examination of the factual record upon an objective basis.

Petitioner claims that "beyond question" and "giving to General Walker the benefit of every reasonable inference, the evidence in this case plainly establishes" that General Walker led a charge and assumed command of the crowd. The summary of the evidence in support of the findings of the jury and the judgment of the trial court by the Texas Court of Civil Appeals, is just the opposite:

> "He (Walker) was not in the forefront, never in front of the crowd. He never hurled any rock, brick or other missile in the direction of the marshals or otherwise. He did not participate in the riot. He never directed or suggested that others do so. He issued no directions nor did he counsel or suggest to others that they charge the marshals or take any other offensive action toward them. The crowd was disorganized. It was a leaderless group. Groups were milling aimlessly. No one, including Walker, made any effort to assume leadership. Walker did not run. He never got out of a slow walk, described as strolling, ambling, or 'moseying' along. He never participated in the riot or violence in any manner. He made no effort to incite or move others to action or violence. When asked how to drive the marshals out, he said: 'You don't'." Associated Press v. Walker, 393 S. W. 2d 671, 675 (1965).

In order to conclude that Walker "assumed command" and "led a charge", completely overturning the jury's verdict, this Honorable Court must disregard evidence as follows:

(a) Walker (R. 434-670): Testified in great detail as to his every action on the campus; and, in answer to repeated questions as to whether he "led anybody" his answers were, "No, I certainly did not". His answers to extensive questions on direct, and piercing cross-examination, were consistently that he was on the campus only to observe and not to participate in the activities of the crowd. He refused requests of the students to "be our leader". He never got out of a walk during the entire night. In his language, "I never have had anything to do with the activities of the students toward the Marshals". When the Highway Patrol started to leave, the students became excited, with cries, "Barnett has sold us out". At this point, he agreed, for the first time, to speak, and advise the crowd that Barnett had not sold them out, that the Highway Patrol Chief, Birdsong, had let Meredith on the campus. He further advised them that "Nobody came to Mississippi for violence, no violence was intended." (At which time, the students began to "boo".) He further told them, "You can protest, you have a right to protest, but this is not the place for violence". (All of which was in accord with the United Press report.) After the speech, the crowd dispersed, and he moved slowly up near the flagpole in the center of the University Circle (R. 489). He specifically described the "sporadic" activity of the crowd at the times when Petitioner contends that "it is beyond dispute that Walker, did in fact, lead two charges"; and, when asked "Did you participate in any activities of the crowd", his answer was, "I certainly did not" (R. 493). In order to accept Petitioner's assertion that Walker, beyond dispute led two charges, this Honorable Court must assume that he deliberately lied, under oath, in the presence of the jury, and that the testimony of defendant's witnesses, which included neither Savell nor any other employee of Petitioner, "corroborated and amplified the conclusion that Walker did, in fact, lead a charge and assume command of the crowd, as argued at page 21 of its Brief, and this without hearing such witnesses, observing their demeanor, and feeling the impact of conflicts in their evidence.

(b) Gwinn Cole: Assistant Director, Miss. Highway Patrol, testified that there was no violence until the U. S. Marshals fired tear gas into the backs of the Highway Patrol, who were separating students from the Marshals, and into the face of the students; and that, thereafter, there was no "organized charge". but only sporadic activity, with small groups, not more than 7 or 8, coming out of the crowd and throwing missiles toward the Marshals, until the time he left at 9:50, which was coincident with the timing of Walker's speech from the Monument (R. 871-884).

(c) Louis Leman: A responsible young businessman of Houston, Texas, who was with Walker the entire evening, and testified, positively, that Walker, at no time, participated in the activity of the crowd, assumed command, or led a charge. He covered the speech on the Monument, and described Walker's actions, both before and after, including his refusal to "lead the students", and his demeanor, which included at no time any movement faster than a slow walk (R. 871-885).

(d) Cecil Holland: A reporter for the Washington Star, with 30 years experience. Testified that he was in the vicinity of the Campus Circle, and near the Marshals. He described sporadic activity of the crowd. He saw Walker at one time southwest of the Monument. He saw him lead no charge, or participate in any other activity of the crowd. In fairness, however, the witness did not testify that his visibility was such that he must necessarily have seen him (R. 360-397).

(e) Al Kuettner: Testified that he was United Press newsman, at a point east of the Monument on University Avenue as Walker was entering the Campus about 9:00 p. m. He saw him again on the Monument, and heard his speech. After hearing the speech, he reported, over the United Press Wire Service that, "during a lull in the rioting, General Edwin A. Walker mounted a Confederate Statue on the Campus and begged the students to avoid their violence." He also stated that Walker's speech was met with jeers (R. 831). He described the events involved in the riot, but saw Walker take no part therein. (Again, he was not keeping a constant watch; but it is significant that, if anything so sensational as a charge having been led by a former Major General in the United States Army had occurred, no such report appeared upon the wire service of United Press.) (R. 827-867). When he saw Walker come on the Campus, with two men abreast, it was when he first arrived, and the witness did not say that the other persons, ahead of him and behind him, appeared to be in his party (R. 827-829).

(f) Talmage Witt: A Deputy Sheriff of Pontotoc County, Mississippi, was with Walker practically all of the time involved. He testified positively that Walker took no part in any of the violence (R. 292). He also described Walker's activities, as walking slowly about the Campus, without leading the charges on the Marshals or participating in the activities of the crowd. He refuted a portion of a written statement that had been given to one of the AP counsel, at a time when that counsel was representing him in a legal matter, and testified, positively, under oath, that Walker never did lead a charge, or participate in any act of violence (R. 219-292).

(g) Other witnesses: Plaintiff offered the testimony of witnesses, Sweatt (R. 136), Cox (R. 204), May (R. 397), Hunter (R. 694), Carrington (R. 397), MacFarland (R. 401), Watkins (R. 407), McRae (R. 415), Snyder (R. 419), Edwards (R. 420), whose testimony completely accounted for all of the time that Walker was on the Campus, and effectively refuted defendant's contention that Savell was "substantially" telling the truth when he reported that he had seen Walker assume command of the crowd and lead a charge. Although the Savell report, and his testimony by deposition, fixed the time of the charge as before Walker's speech from the Monument, the witnesses all testified positively that Walker led no charge and had no command over the crowd, either before or after the speech.

Associated Press did not bring to Court its "eye-witness", Van Savell, so that the jury could compare, from the witness stand, his sincerity, demeanor, and candor with that of the respondent, Walker, as part of its necessary evaluation as to who was telling the truth. It is generally held that when a party fails to produce a witness who is under its control, that failure may be considered as evidence against it, and the jury may properly infer that he was not produced because his testimony would have been harmful, and that general rule prevails in Texas. Davis v. Etter & Curtis (Tex. Civ. App., no writ history), 243 S. W. 603.

Van Savell's news report is in irreconcilable conflict with the telephone report which the operator of the Associated Press news room in New Orleans, Ben Thomas, testified that Van Savell gave him. Thomas testified that he "was working the 'night re-write shift'" at New Orleans communicating with Associated Press newsmen at Oxford, Van Savell, Edmund Lebercon and Gavin Scott, also two Mississippi U. students, John Perkins and John Hall, who were AP correspondents, and James Boudier, AP photographer. The only newsman who reported that Walker was leading a charge was Savell, who was quoted by A. P. witness Thomas as follows (R. 123-128):

> "He said that Walker had climbed on the Confederate Monument and talked to the students, and said something to them about if they retreated and went home, they would be cowards, that they should stand up and fight.
>
> "And then he got down from the Monument and started walking toward the Marshals, and the students followed behind him, and he led the group of yelling, screaming, brick-throwing group with him as close to the Marshals as they could get, until they were turned back by tear gas" (R. 132).

He further testified that Savell said that the students seemed in agreement with Walker and ready to follow him, after the speech on the Monument, and that before the speech, there was only sporadic activity. When Walker entered the group, "it seemed more organized" (R. 132-133). The record further contained specific answers fixing the time of the first charge reported by Savell as after the speech, rather than before the speech, as follows:

> "Q. Now, he then reported to you on this occasion when he first reported that Walker had led the charge, that Walker had made a speech from the monument, and that that speech seemed to give the boys more organization. Then, after the speech, he led the charge?
>
> A. Yes, to the best of my knowledge.
>
> Q. He made this report to you about the speech and the charge in the same telephone conversation and not in two?
>
> A. In the same conversation" (R. 135).

Savell's report also conflicts with that of another of Petitioner's witnesses, the Reverend Duncan Gray (R. 719-795). The above conflict between the report of Savell and the testimony of Thomas and Gray probably explains the failure of Petitioner to produce Savell at the Texas trial. When he appeared at the Shreveport trial, the verdict in favor of Walker was much larger than at Fort Worth.*

Throughout its Brief, Petitioner makes frequent use of the terms "uncontradicted", "beyond dispute", etc., concerning the evidence. Respondent challenges every such use. The evidence was disputed but the preponderance of the evidence supports the jury verdict.

Petitioner insinuates (Brief, p. 21) that Walker led a mob "demanding that 'nigger' under a flag of truce."

---

* See Petitioner's Brief, p. 43.

There is absolutely no evidence to connect Walker with such a statement and this, again, is obviously offered for a prejudicial effect.

Notwithstanding Petitioner still tries to retry the evidence. On pages 18-21 of its Brief Petitioner relies on statements that "Walker advanced toward the flagpole on two occasions."

Keeping in mind that the University of Mississippi Plot Plan, attached to Vol. 3 of the Record and reproduced in the Appendix to Respondent's Brief, reflects that the flag pole near the center of the Circle is approximately 250 feet from the Lyceum Building, where the Marshals were standing, and that the Confederate Monument at the east end of the circle is about 550 feet from where the Marshals were standing, and that many witnesses* have further fixed that distance by sworn testimony, the numerous quotations by Petitioner of Respondent's witnesses as alleged proof that Walker led a charge when they saw Walker "walking toward the flag pole" is not significant. We invite the attention of the Court to check every reference to the Record in Pages 18-21 of Petitioner's Brief. Not one of them establishes that Walker either assumed command of a crowd or led a charge. (As a simple test of the veracity of the Associated Press report, it is respectfully suggested that had the report honestly stated that Walker was seen "walking toward the flag pole in the center of the Circle, some 250 feet east of the U. S. Marshals," there would certainly have been no resulting false arrest and imprisonment.)

Petitioner's slanted version of Walker's own testimony at Pages 15-17 of its Brief is more ingenious than ingenuous. They have built up as a violent prelude to

---

* Savell's Report fixes the distance from Lyceum to entrance of Campus as 300 yards. Petitioner's Brief, p. 8.

Walker's appearance on the campus isolated acts of violence (with which Walker admittedly had no connection), largely out of sequence and out of connotation, which occurred over a period of several hours, and compressed into a dramatized "conflagration", with the inference that Walker was a part of it all (R. 147, 176, 285, 385, 401, 636, 858, 859).

A far more reliable approach would be a careful review of the entire testimony of Cecil Holland, the highly responsible newspaper reporter for the Washington Star (R. 360-400), whose testimony is used out of context at Page 15 of Petitioner's Brief after "gun fire eventually broke out" (R. 353, 386, 402, 896). The entire testimony of this witness shows that the activity was sporadic ("I couldn't see any movements of people except small groups") (R. 365). He described a meeting with Walker (R. 372-374), which indicated no contact between Walker and the mob. It is obvious that, had so sensational an occurrence as Walker leading a 1,000 man charge taken place, this experienced newsman would certainly have known something about it, and reported it to his paper. In this connection, it is singular that the Associated Press did not bring even one U. S. Marshal to Court. (They were as conspicuous by their absence as were employees of Associated Press.) Had Walker, with his big white Texas hat, led a 1,000 man charge, an awesome thing to contemplate, one or more U. S. Marshals would certainly have appeared at the trial, or, perhaps before the Grand Jury.

Another typical example of the slanting of the testimony in Petitioner's Brief appears at Page 21, where the witness, Kuettner, is quoted as, "personally saw Walker advance on the Lyceum with two men on each side of him (R. 846-847). A review of the actual testimony of this witness will reveal that the witness was describing an incident when Walker first entered the campus,* separated in distance and time from the alleged charge.

> "Q. Now, when you first saw Gen. Walker, I believe you said it was about 9 o'clock, was he walking toward the Lyceum when you saw him?
> A. Yes, sir."

Respectfully directing the attention of the Court back to Record pages 828-830, this alleged movement dramatized in Petitioner's Brief as an "advance on the Lyceum with two men", occurred completely out of the riot area and 200 feet east of the Monument (R. 828).

Petitioner weaves selected quotations from its own witnesses (Brief, 22-28) into a fabric that would picture Walker leading "at least two charges". The most flagrant example of conflicting and incredible testimony in the entire record is the witness, Gregory, who is relied upon as placing Walker within twenty yards of the driveway that circles the Lyceum Building (R. 1135). The performance of this witness alone, could have convinced the jury that Petitioner's entire defense was fabricated. He related that he saw Walker about 9:00 when Van Savell came up and said "Gen. Walker's on the campus" (R. 1133).

He then relates continuous conversations with students and finally Rev. Duncan Gray (one of Petitioner's witnesses), and, "very shortly thereafter" (R. 1134) he saw a large group forming around Walker with cries, "he's going up to the Monument". (550 feet from the Lyceum) —"he's going up to the Marshals"—"Gen. Walker won't let the Marshals stop him, –gas– won't stop Gen. Walker"; after which he described Walker, striding at a fast clip in the direction of the Lyceum, with 200 men behind him, and, after they arrived within 20 yards of the driveway that circles the Lyceum Building, tear gas was fired and they all ran. This conflicts directly with the testimony of both Rev. Gray (who testified that he was in the area near the monument for a considerable time before Walker's speech, and that no generalized charge across the north side of the Circle took place during that period of time, and further testified that he had a conversation with Walker just southwest of the monument shortly before Walker's speech (R. 1033-1044). At the recess, Gregory was seen talking with counsel for Petitioner, contrary to the caution that he had received in open court (R. 1038-1040). He thereafter endeavored to change the timing of his testimony, in a most clumsy manner (R. 1138-1152). At the end of his cross-examination, it would have been impossible for the jury to believe the testimony of Gregory unless it completely rejected the testimony of both Rev. Gray and Savell.

---

* Approximately, 1200 feet east of Lyceum. See Mississippi U. Plot Plan in Appendix to this Brief.

Apparently, the jury elected to believe the testimony of Rev. Gray, that he was in the immediate area to the NW of the monument, which included the NE quadrant of the circle, from about 7:50 until Walker's speech on the monument (except for about 5 minutes when he went in the YMCA). He first talked with Walker a short distance SW of the monument and a few minutes before Walker's speech,* and again after the speech. From the time of his arrival, until after the speech, there was no charge formed up near the monument and which moved westward across the Circle. If there had been such a charge, he would have seen it (R. 1025-1054). He did not see Walker lead a charge (R. 1053).

We respectfully commend to the Court a careful comparison between the testimony of Rev. Gray with the testimony of Gregory and particularly with the news report of Savell. This will result in the inevitable conclusion that Savell's alleged 1,000 man charge before Walker's speech on the monument could not have occurred without physically running over Rev. Gray, who was in the same area at the same time and saw no charge.

* This is the time of the charge described by Gregory (R. 1135).

Of the four witnesses quoted on Page 23 of Petitioner's Brief as testifying that Walker led a charge, their testimony is in complete conflict as follows:

Doy Gorton (R. 1094-1108): Testified that Walker had stepped down from the Monument, after making a speech, and that a charge was started off with a "rebel yell" (R. 1104-5). (This is in conflict with the testimony of Savell that the charge was before the speech on the monument, and in conflict with the witness, Buckley, that the students were yelling, "lead us on, Gen. Walker, be our Leader", and Walker nodded his head and said, "Alright, alright, I will."

The witness Gorton testified that he did not hear the sensational statements attributed by Savell to Walker, namely: "don't let up now, you may lose this battle but you will have been heard", "you must be prepared for possible death. If you are not, go home now" (R. 1102).

Travis Buckley (R. 1109-1130): Testified that he heard Walker, in response to cries of "lead us on Gen. Walker, be our leader," say, "Alright, alright, I will", and started off toward the flag pole, all of which occurred after the speech on the monument. The last Buckley saw Walker was at a point 50 feet east of the flag pole (which would still be approximately 300 feet from the Marshals).

John Charles Hill (R. 1054-1077): A cub reporter for CBS, testified to substantially the same charge that Savell had related, also stated that he had a tape recording (not produced in evidence), and had made the same report to his superiors with CBS (which was not reported to the world by that news media).

Kingsby Kingsley (R. 1122-1125): The reference by Petitioner to the testimony of this witness (Brief p. 23) as supporting its report that Walker "led a charge" is very deceptive. The incident described by this witness was completely out of the area where the riot occurred. The witness testified that he "saw Gen. Walker walk toward the Lyceum Building, wave his arms and motion to a large group of students to come with him (R. 1122-24). The testimony of this witness, a reporter for the Memphis Commercial Appeal (who incidentally did not report to his paper that Walker had "led a charge") was in reference to the time when Walker first entered the Campus, some 600 feet (2 city blocks) from the Lyceum and before the riot occurred. This is typical of the type of evidence relied upon by Petitioner to establish that Walker "led a charge", and quoted, apparently for its sound rather than substance (Walker's actions at a point in front of the Journalism Building shown on the University Plot Plan at the end of this Brief as South of University Avenue, on Fraternity Row), could have no conceivable relationship with the leading of a charge. This mature reporter was in the area during the critical time that Savell claims to have seen Walker assume command of the mob, and although Kingsley was produced as a witness by the Associated Press, it is significant that he did not testify that he saw or reported to his paper, that Walker had conducted himself as described in the AP article.

FINDINGS IN THE COURTS BELOW.

This case, under Texas law, was presented to the jury under "Special Issues", preceded by Court "Definitions". These Definitions and Issues are as follows:

Definitions.

In answer to Special Issue No. 1 you are instructed that by the term "led" is meant activities by a person who directs, moves to action, or encourages in some action or movement, and that by the term "charge" is meant a movement toward the marshals, or a group or body of people moving toward an objective.

In answering the issues in this charge in which the term "substantially true" is used, you are instructed that in order for a statement to be "substantially true" it is not necessary that the exact facts or the most minute details of the plaintiff's activities be completely accurate. Mere inaccuracies not affecting the substance of the report of plaintiff's activities are immaterial. You are further instructed that in answering special issues in which the term "substantially true" is used that the publication must be considered as a whole, giving to all the words contained therein (except those hereinabove defined for you) their ordinary meaning as read and understood by the average reader.

In answering the issues in these instructions in which the term "fair comment" is used, you are instructed that the interest of the public requires that all acts and matters of a public nature, and of public concern published for general information may be freely published and discussed with reasonable comments thereon. You are further instructed that by said term is meant a statement which represents the honest opinion of the writer and constitutes reasonable inferences to be drawn from the attendant facts and circumstances whether literally true or not, or whether all reasonable persons would agree with the opinions or conclusions based thereon (Emphasis added).

Special Issue No. 1:

Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the statement "Walker, Who Sunday led a charge of students against Federal marshals on the Ole Miss campus" was substantially true?

Answer "Yes" or "No".

Answer: No.

Special Issue No. 2:

Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the statement "Walker, who Sunday led a charge of students against Federal marshals on the Ole Miss Campus", complained of by plaintiff, constitutes fair comment describing the plaintiff's activities on or about September 30, 1962, at the places described in the evidence and under the then attendant circumstances?

Answer "Yes" or "No".

Answer: No.

Special Issue No. 3:

Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the statement inquired about in special issue No. 1 was made in good faith in reference to a matter in which the defendant had a duty to report to its members and thence to the public?

Answer "Yes" or "No".

Answer: No.

Special Issue No. 4:

Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that in publishing the statement set forth in special issue No. 1 the defendant, Associated Press, was actuated by malice as that term is hereinafter defined?

In connection with the above issue, you are instructed that by the term "malice" is meant ill will, bad or evil motive, or that entire want of care which would raise the belief that the act or omission complained of was the result of a conscious indifference to the right or welfare of the person to be affected by it.

Answer "Yes" or "No".

Answer: Yes.

Special Issue No. 5:

Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the statement "Walker assumed command of the crowd" was substantially true?

Answer "Yes" or "No".

Answer: No.

Special Issue No. 6:

Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the statement "Walker assumed command of the crowd" complained of by plaintiff, constitutes fair comment describing plaintiff's activities on or about September 30, 1962, at the places described in the evidence and under the then attendant circumstances?

Answer "Yes" or "No".

Answer: No.

Special Issue No. 7:

Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the statement inquired about in special issue No. 5 was made in good faith in reference to a matter in which the defendant had a duty to report to its members and thence to the public?

Answer "Yes" or "No".

Answer: No.

Special Issue No. 8:

Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that in publishing the statement set forth in special issue No. 5 the defendant, Associated Press, was actuated by malice as that term is hereinafter defined?

In connection with the above issue, you are instructed that by the term "malice" is meant ill will, bad or evil motive, or that entire want of care which would raise the belief that the act or omission complained of was the result of a conscious indifference to the right or welfare of the person to be affected by it.

Answer "Yes" or "No".

Answer: Yes.

Special Issue No. 9:

Question: If you have answered either special issue No. 1 or special issue No. 5 "No", then answer:

What sum of money, if paid now in cash, do you find from a preponderance of the evidence would fairly and reasonably compensate the plaintiff for the damages, if any, sustained by him as a direct and proximate result of the statements inquired about in special issues Nos. 1 and 5?

In connection with this issue you are instructed that you may only award damages, if any, for statements, if any, inquired about herein which you have found to be false.

In connection with the foregoing issue you are instructed that you may take into consideration such damages, if any, to the reputation of the plaintiff and such mental anguish, if any, and humiliation, if any, and embarrassment, if any, which plaintiff may have sustained directly and proximately solely as a result of the statements hereinabove set forth, if you have found the same to be false.

Answer in dollars and cents, if any.

Answer: $500,000.00.

Special Issue No. 10:

If you have answered either special issue No. 4 or special issue No. 8 "yes", then answer:

Question: Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that this is a case in which exemplary damages should be awarded to plaintiff?

In connection with the above issue you are instructed that the term "Exemplary damages" as used herein means a sum of money awarded as a punishment for any malice, if any, you have found to exist in this case. "Exemplary damages", if any are allowed, are to be no part of the damages which may be allowed as compensation (if compensation has been allowed) but only in the nature of a penalty allowed by law at your discretion, and any amount which you find hereunder, if you see fit to make such a finding, should be reasonably proportionate to the actual damages, if any, you may allow plaintiff herein.

Answer "Yes" or "No".

Answer: Yes.

Special Issue No. 11:

If you have answered the above special issue No. 10 "Yes", and only in that event, then answer:

Question: From a preponderance of the evidence, what amount of money, if any, do you find should be awarded to plaintiff as exemplary damages?

Answer in dollars and cents, if any.

Answer: $300,000.00.

/s/ Charles J. Murray,
Judge Presiding.

Verdict of the Jury.

We, the jury, have answered the above and foregoing special issues, as herein indicated, and herewith return same into court as our verdict.

Waverly S. Johnson,
Foreman.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT.

There was ample evidence of known falsity or reckless disregard of whether the statement sued upon was false, as required by the New York Times case; hence even if the scope of the New York Times case should be extended to include not only public officers, but private persons participating in public affairs, the judgment below should be affirmed. Where a purported eye-witness account was shown to be fabricated (and is found by the jury to have been fabricated), then the report must be held to have been knowingly false.

The Texas definition of malice necessary to sustain a verdict for punitive damages is not the same as the definition of malice in the New York Times case necessary to sustain any verdict for libel; it is in fact more stringent, and the Texas courts, with all required deference to this Court's rule in the New York Times case, could find insufficient proof of malice to warrant punitive damages but sufficient proof of malice to warrant general damages; and it is the duty of this Court so to interpret the record.

The New York Times rule should not be extended to exclude private persons from redress for libel to the same extent as public officers. To so extend the rule will be substantially to discourage, rather than encourage, public participation in government, for the difficulties and expense of redress will become such that litigation, except for the very wealthy, will be almost impossible. The New York Times rule was designed to encourage free comment about public officials; the extension of the rule now sought by Petitioner will be to enfilade the private person who would utilize the freedom that the original Times doctrine extended.

ARGUMENT.

Point I.

The Judgment Against the Associated Press Satisfies All Constitutional Requirements.

A. The findings of the trial jury and the rulings of the Texas courts are in accord with New York Times v. Sullivan, even if it is extended to public figures.

The jury found in its answers to Special Issues 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 7 and 9 that the statements by the Associated Press that Walker "led a charge of students against Federal marshals" and "assumed command of the crowd" were not "substantially true", were not "fair comment", and were not "made in good faith." The jury's verdict of $500,000 for general damages was approved by the Texas trial and appellate courts after consideration of the decision of this Court in New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254.

Petitioner argues that since the trial judge held there was insufficient proof of "actual malice" to sustain the verdict of $300,000 for exemplary damages that the judgment for general damages is also defective. Petitioner makes the error of equating the malice required by the New York Times case with the malice necessary to justify exemplary or punitive damages under Texas law. They are not the same.

In New York Times this Court defined "actual malice" as a statement "with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not." See 376 U. S. 254 at 279-280.

Texas law imposes a more severe definition of malice where punitive damages are sought. The Texas requirement for punitive damages of a "conscious indifference to the welfare of the person to be affected" obviously goes far beyond the simple "reckless disregard of whether it was true or false" of New York Times. The trial court instructed the jury in this case:

> ". . . by the term 'malice' is meant ill will, bad or evil motive, or that entire want of care which would raise the belief that the act or omission complained of was the result of a conscious indifference to the right or welfare of the person to be affected by it" (Emphasis added) (R. 61).

The jury so found but the trial court and the Texas Court of Civil Appeals held that Walker "failed to prove malice as defined and that the trial court was correct in setting aside said findings." (Emphasis added.) See Associated Press v. Walker, 393 S. W. 2d 671 at 682-683, where this part of the opinion is under the heading "Exemplary Damages".

The Texas courts did not question the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict for general damages. Therefore, this Court should not be misled into thinking there was no proof of "'known falsity" or "reckless disregard of whether it was false or not" required by New York Times.

Known Falsity. The proof of "known falsity" includes:

The AP libelous story began with:

> "(Editor's Note . . . Here is the story of Van Savell, 21, Associated Press newsman, who was on the scene and saw what happened.)
>
> ". . .
>
> "Throughout this time he was less than six feet from Walker."

The jury found that Van Savell's statements, "Walker assumed command of the crowd" and "led a charge of students against Federal marshals" were: 1) False, 2) Not fair comment (defined as a "statement which represents the honest opinion of the writer", and 3) Not "made in good faith".

Clearly a report of what was seen less than six feet from the eye-witness when found by the jury to be false could not be other than knowingly false.

Reckless Disregard. The proof of "reckless disregard of whether it was false or not" includes:

1. Disregarding the United Press dispatch that "General Edwin A. Walker mounted a Confederate statue on the campus and begged the students to cease their violence" (R. 831, 1174).

2. Disregarding the fact that none of the hundreds of pictures taken and other wire service reports filed that night showed or referred to Walker as charging, running, throwing, assuming command of the crowd, or doing anything other than observing.

3. Sending out to the 8460 Associated Press subscribing newspapers, radio and television stations throughout the world the criminal charge that a retired Major General committed insurrection against his country, based solely on the contradictory reports filed by a newly-hired 21-year-old cub reporter.

4. Failing to check the Van Savell story with any of the other parties on the university campus such as the Federal marshals, the state highway patrol, with Leberon, Scott, Perkins, and Hall, the other AP correspondents on the scene, with Boudier, the AP photographer on the scene, or with Edwin Walker himself, to see if the criminal charges were accurate. (No Federal marshal or state highway patrolman or AP reporter or photographer on the campus that night testified for the AP.)

5. Disregarding the clear conflict, in Van Savell's two reports, the first by telephone to the New Orleans AP office saying that Walker led the charge after giving a speech on the Monument (R. 125-128, 132), the second in Van Savell's AP article saying that Walker led the charge before climbing the Monument and addressing the crowd (R. 11-14, 776-784).

It is sufficient that the trial court and the Texas appellate courts approved the findings supporting general damages, including that the Van Savell AP story that Walker "led a charge" and "assumed command of the crowd" were false, not fair comment and not published in good faith. United Press International v. Mohs, 381 S. W. 2d 104 (Texas Court of Civil Appeals, July 24, 1964), holds that "fabrication" of a "libelous story" will support verdicts for both general and exemplary damages.

B. Under the Seventh Amendment this Court cannot substitute its opinion of the evidence for that of the jury.

This Court has often said that the "Seventh Amendment is applicable to state cases coming here".*

> "Even if we were of opinion in view of the evidence, that the jury erred in finding that no property right, of substantial value in money, had been taken from the railroad company, by reason of the opening of a street across its right of way, we cannot on that ground, reexamine the final judgment of the state court. We are permitted only to inquire whether the trial court prescribed any rule of law for the guidance of the jury that was in absolute disregard of the company's right to just compensation." Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 226, 246, 41 L. Ed. 979, 988 (1897), cited with approval in New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. at 285.

* See New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 285, footnote 26.

This Court has recognized that it should not redetermine facts found by the jury and that "it is the Seventh Amendment that fashions 'the Federal policy favoring jury decisions of disputed fact questions.'" Atlantic & Gulf Stevedores v. Ellerman Lines, 369 U. S. 355, 360, 7 L. Ed. 2d 798, 804 (1962). "Only where there is a complete absence of probative facts to support the conclusion reached does a reversible error appear." Lavender v. Kurn, 327 U. S. 645, 653, 90 L. Ed. 916, 923 (1946).

Petitioner argues that the statements by the trial court that "there is no actual malice in this case" should compel this Court to vacate the general verdict "with respect to special issues Nos. 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, and 9." This argument ignores the Seventh Amendment.

> "Where there is a view of the case that makes the jury's answers to special interrogatories consistent, they must be resolved that way. For a search for one possible view of the case which will make the jury's finding inconsistent results in a collision with the Seventh Amendment. Arnold v. Panhandle & S. F. R. Co., 353 U. S. 360, 1 L. Ed. 2d 889, 77 S. Ct. 840. Cf. Dick v. New York Life Ins. Co., 359 U. S. 437, 446, 3 L. Ed. 2d 935, 942, 79 S. Ct. 921." Atlantic & Gulf Stevedores v. Ellerman Lines, 369 U. S. 355 at 364, 7. L. Ed. 798 at 807 (1962).
>
> "But it is the duty of the courts to attempt to harmonize the answers, if it is possible under a fair reading of them: 'Where there is a view of the case that makes the jury's answers to special interrogatories consistent, they must be resolved that way.' Atlantic & Gulf Stevedores, Inc. v. Ellerman Lines, Ltd., 369 U. S. 355, 364, 7 L. Ed. 2d 798, 807, 82 S. Ct. 1134." Gallick v. Baltimore & Ohio R. Co., 372 U. S. 100, 119, 9 L. Ed. 2d 618, 627 (1963).

The jury verdict for general damages is entirely consistent with the Federal rule in New York Times when the evidence of "known falsity" and "reckless disregard" is considered. The Seventh Amendment forbids taking a "possible view of the case" which would make the jury finding inconsistent with New York Times.

There is an important distinction between the standard of care required of a newspaper when it is serving as an important outlet for those who do not have publishing facilities and the care required of one who both originates and disseminates false criminal charges. Thus in New York Times, the Court was concerned with what "might shut off an important outlet for the promulgation of information and ideas by persons who do not themselves have access to publishing facilities—who wish to exercise their freedom of speech even though they are not members of the press." New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. at 266. Where the newspaper is merely serving as an outlet for an editorial advertisement or letters column, there is implied a less strict standard of liability. Cf. Farmers Educ. and Co-op. Union v. WDAY, Inc., 360 U. S. 525; 3 L. ed. 1407 (1959). See Pedrick, Freedom of the Press and the Law of Libel: The Modern Revised Translation, 49 Cornell L. Q. 581, 597-600 (1964). "The first amendment is concerned with protecting the free flow of information—not slipshod reportorial work." Id. at 600. In this Walker case, the AP is both originator and disseminator.

In Pape v. Time, Inc., 354 F. 2d 558, 561 (1965), cert. denied, 384 U. S. 909, the court held:

"We hold that a sufficient showing has been made so that a jury could find Time, Incorporated acted with reckless disregard as to whether or not the reworded statements, hereinbefore described, were true or false."

In Hogan v. New York Times, 313 F. 2d 354, 355-356 (1963), the court held that sufficient evidence existed to sustain the jury's verdict on "reckless disregard for the truth or falsity of the story, amounting to bad faith." There the Times relied "on a single telephone call to a reporter other than the author of the story." The court further held that "it is within the providence of the jury to determine if the precaution taken . . . was adequate." In the Walker case, the AP was far more reckless and did not rely on any telephone calls to other reporters or even to one of its five other employees who were on the university campus covering the riots. Any one of the five foregoing acts of "reckless disregard" would clearly justify the jury's verdict for general damages under the New York Times rule.

Point II.

Where AP's Purported Eye-Witness Report Is Found by the Jury to Be a Fabricated Falsehood, Not Made in Good Faith and Not the Honest Opinion of the Writer, Then the Report Is Knowingly False.

Either Walker came upon the University campus, conferred with riot leaders, assumed command of a 1,000-man mob and led them in a charge against U. S. Marshals around the Lyceum building as charged in Savell's report, or he came and acted only as an observer, as described by Walker's witnesses and by his own testimony.

Either Walker committed the acts as charged, or he did not. The jury found that he did not, and that Respondent's report to the contrary was not made in good faith and not fair comment (R. 59-61).

The trial court's instructions to the jury were generous to AP. The court instructed that in order for a statement to be "substantially true" it is not necessary that it "be completely accurate" (R. 59).

The court instructed that by fair comment "is meant a statement which represents the honest opinion of the writer and constitutes reasonable inferences to be drawn from the attendant facts and circumstances" (R. 59). Since the jury found that the AP statements about Walker were not "fair comment" (R. 59-61), the jury really found that in addition to being false that the statements were not the "honest opinion" of Van Savell. The jury also found that the statements were not "made in good faith" (R. 60-61). Such specific issue jury findings are equivalent to, if not stronger than, a finding that the Savell statements were "knowingly false."

Where, as here, the AP report, prepared by one who said "Throughout this time I was less than six feet from Walker" (R. 121), was found to be false, not "made in good faith" (R. 60-61), and not the honest opinion of the writer (R. 59-61), it can not be other than "knowingly false."

Point III.

The Definition of "Actual Malice" Under Texas Law Respecting Punitive Damages Is More Stringent Than the Definition of "Actual Malice" Under the Sullivan Decision of This Court, and a Ruling That There Was Insufficient Proof of "Actual Malice" Under Texas Law to Warrant Punitive Damages Cannot Be Taken as Compelling the Conclusion That There Was Insufficient Evidence Under the Sullivan Decision to Warrant Any Recovery at All.

The jury returned a verdict in favor of Respondent and against Petitioner for $500,000 in general damages and $300,000 in punitive damages (R. 62, 63). The trial court found that the evidence did not meet the Texas requirements of actual malice to sustain punitive damages (R. 60, 61), and set aside the punitive award, permitting the $500,000 verdict to stand (R. 78). The Texas Court of Civil Appeals sustained the trial court (393 S. W. 2d 671), and further review by the Texas Supreme Court was refused (R. 1553).

This, however, furnishes no basis for the application to this case of the doctrine of New York Times v. Sullivan. Petitioner itself concedes that the Texas definition of "actual malice" necessary to sustain punitive damages differs from the New York Times v. Sullivan definition of "actual malice" necessary to sustain any recovery at all (Brief, p. 27). Petitioner takes the position that the Texas definition is "more favorable" to Walker, the Respondent here, but a comparison of the two shows that the reverse is true:

> New York Times v. Sullivan (376 U. S. 279, 280)—
> " 'actual malice,'—that is, with knowledge that it [is] false or reckless disregard of whether it [is] false or not." (This Court itself affirmed this definition in Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64, 74, 1964, and in Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U. S. 75, 84, 1966.)

Texas (charge to jury in the case at bar; R. 60, 61)—"by the term 'malice' is meant ill will, bad or evil motive, or that entire want of care which would raise the belief that the act or omission complained of was the result of a conscious indifference to the right or welfare of the person to be affected by it."

Hence it is quite possible, and consistent with logic, that the Texas courts determined that Walker showed that the statement libelling him was made "with knowledge that it was false or reckless disregard of whether it was false or not" (the Sullivan decision on general damages) but failed to show that the statement was made as the result of ill will, or from bad or evil motive, or as a result of that entire want of care which would raise the belief that the statement was the result of a conscious indifference to the right or welfare of Walker, the person to be affected by it. The legal result would be, and is, a judgment impervious to attack under the New York Times v. Sullivan.

Point IV.

Under Texas Law Petitioner Has Waived Its Contentions That It Still Has a Defense of Fair Comment.

Petitioner did not request or submit a special issue to the jury incorporating Petitioner's theory of the "fair comment" defense now urged by Petitioner. Petitioner did not even specifically object to the two fair comment issues submitted by the trial court (No. 2, No. 6; R. 59-61). Under Texas Rules of Civil Procedure 274 and 279, Petitioner has waived its new contention that the jury was improperly instructed on fair comment. Under Rule 279 Petitioner has also waived its alleged defense of no proof of the "reckless disregard" required by New York Times because this is a "defense not conclusively established under the evidence and upon which no issue is [was] given or requested." Rule 279 says that under such circumstances, the defense "shall be deemed as waived." See: Grant v. Marshall, 280 S. W. 2d 559, 563, 154 T. 531 (Texas Supreme Ct. 1955); McCarver v. Corpus Christie, 284 S. W. 2d 142, 143, 155 T. 153 (Texas Supreme Ct. 1956).

Under Rule 279 the omitted issues which Petitioner failed to submit "shall be deemed as found by the Court in such manner as to support the judgment."

Point V.

The New York Times Privilege Does Not Extend to Defamatory Statements About Persons Outside of Government.

A civil libel is a defamation which exposes the victim to public hatred, contempt, ridicule, or financial injury. Vernon's Texas Civil Statutes, Article 5430. The jury found that the AP statements were false and the Texas courts found that they were defamatory per se. That these statements injured Walker and exposed him to hatred, contempt, and ridicule is beyond doubt.*

---

* A criminal complaint charging insurrection, assault of U. S. Marshals, etc., was filed against Walker in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Mississippi on Oct. 1, 1962, admittedly based upon "information obtained from Van H. Savell," the reporter who wrote the story which formed the basis of the libel suit at bar. On the strength of it, Walker was arrested, given no opportunity for bail, hearing or consultation with counsel, and without court order flown as a prisoner to a distant prison, and there stripped of his clothes, thrust into a criminal lunatic's cell and fed through a hole in

In New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, the Court repeatedly expressed the issue before it as one involving the constitutional protection, under the First Amendment, of attacks by the press on "public officials" in the performance of their "official" duties. See Id. at 256, 268, 279. The holding was likewise expressed. "We hold today that the Constitution delimits a State's power to award damages for libel in actions brought by public officials against critics of their official conduct." (Emphasis added.) Id. at 283.

In Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U. S. 75, 15 L. ed. 2d 597, Mr. Justice Stewart, in his concurring opinion, said:

"That Rule [New York Times] should not be applied except where a State's law of defamation has the door. Six days later he was released. United States of America v. Edwin Walker, United States District Court, Northern District of Mississippi, Western Division, Commissioner's Docket No. 1, Case No. 61, Complaint and Affidavit of H. M. Ray, United States Attorney; Commitment of Omar D. Craig, Oct. 1, 1962. Further exemplification of the damage that can be done by dishonest reporting of the news may be found in the distorted reporting by the Associated Press of the speech of Sen. Robert M. LaFollette, Sr., at St. Paul on September 21, 1917. The stenographic transcript showed that LaFollette actually said: "Now . . . we are in the midst of a war. For my own part I was not in favor of beginning the war. I don't mean to say we hadn't suffered grievances; we had—at the hands of Germany. . . ." The Associated Press reported that he had asserted: "We had no grievance against Germany." The falsity was wired by the AP to all its member newspapers. They printed it, and on the basis of it, LaFollette was called a traitor, and a motion was made to expel him from the Senate. But the AP refused to correct its story for eight months, even though confronted with proof of the wrong. See "The Wisconsin Story" (1958 Ed.), published by the Milwaukee Journal, p. 276. In 1966 the AP reported a murder after misunderstanding the words of an oral report and failing to verify its conclusion. The supposed victim had not been killed. See "The Death Blunder," Time, June 17, 1966, p. 62. The story concerned Meredith, whose efforts to enroll in "Ole Miss" resulted in the tumult mentioned in the instant record, in a later demonstration in Mississippi.

---

been unconstitutionally converted into a law of seditious libel. The First and Fourteenth Amendments have not stripped private citizens of all means of redress for injuries inflicted upon them by careless liars." (Emphasis added.) Id. at 93.

An intimation that the New York Times rule is not to extend to defamatory falsehood against private persons engaged in public controversies is seen in Linn v. United Plant Guard Workers Local, 383 U. S. 53, 15 L. ed. 2d 582 (1966), decided on the same day as Rosenblatt. Linn concerned libelous statements about an official of a corporation, made during a union organizing campaign. The issue was whether the National Labor Relations Act preempted recovery under state libel law. That labor organizing campaigns are of public interest is manifest. The Court applied the New York Times malice rule, but "by analogy, rather than under constitutional compulsion," Id. at 65, as would be required were the New York Times rule extended to persons who thrust themselves into the vortex of controversy.

Other intimations that the New York Times rule does not extend to defamatory falsehoods about public figures are found in the cases involving public figures who recovered large judgments for libel, after which petitions for certiorari to reverse these judgments were denied by this Court. Cf. Faulk v. Aware, Inc., 19 App. Div. 2d 464, 244 N. Y. S. 2d 259 (1963), aff'd mem. 14 N. Y. 2d 899, 202 N. E. 2d 352, 252 N. Y. S. 2d 95 (1964), cert. denied 380 U. S. 916 (1965) (the issue whether the successful plaintiff, a prominent radio and television personality and union official, was a "public figure" under New York Times, was extensively discussed in the briefs on petition for certiorari). Thus the rule in New York Times does not extend "to public figures outside the sphere of government." Note, 18 Vanderbilt Law Rev. 1429, 1444 (1965).

On page 38 of its brief, Petitioner cites cases involving Linus Pauling and Edwin Walker which said obiter dicta that the doctrine of New York Times should be extended to non-officials who participate in issues of public importance. It is submitted that the more logical reasoning is found in the cases which have declined to extend the New York Times doctrine to prominent non-officials, such as Clark v. Drew Pearson, 248 F. Supp. 188 (D. D. C. 1965); Fignole v. Curtis Publishing Co., 247 F. Supp. 595, S. D. N. Y. 1965); Harper v. National Review, Inc., 33 U. S. L. Week 2341 (N. Y. Sup. Ct., December 22, 1964), aff'd 263 N. Y. S. 2d 292; Warren Spahn v. Julian Messner, Inc., 250 N. Y. S. 2d 529, aff'd 260 N. Y. S. 2d 451 (1965); Jack Dempsey v. Time, Inc., 43 Misc. 2d 754, 252 N. Y. S. 2d 186, aff'd mem. 254 N. Y. S. 2d 80 (1964); Orlando Cepeda v. Cowles Magazines, 328 F. 2d 869 (C. A. 9, 1964).

In Clark v. Drew Pearson, 248 F. Supp. 188, Judge Holtzoff wrote a scholarly analysis of the law of libel as of the date of his opinion on December 20, 1965. His pertinent language is as follows:

> "The arguments . . . included a plea for drastic changes in the law of libel, in a manner that would radically devitalize and impair the protection that it affords against defamatory publications. In view of this circumstance, it seems appropriate to make a few observations on the basic status of the law of libel in Anglo-American jurisprudence.
>
> "The common law sedulously guarantees to every individual various civil rights, such as the right of personal freedom, the right of personal safety, and the right of property. Another civil right safeguarded by the common law is the right to one's reputation. Although it is more intangible and more imponderable than the others, it is equally fundamental and vital, and its protection is equally efficacious and vigorous . . .

"The current trend in the law is to enhance and augment the protection of individual civil rights. No reason appears for making an exception as to the right to reputation . . . most civil actions relate only to money, while actions for libel or slander involve honor and reputation, which are to be considered on a higher level. (248 F. Supp. at 190-191.)

* * * * * * * *

"Counsel for the defendants in this case urge the Court, however, to apply the principle of the Sullivan case to all public figures or public persons, including those in private life, and to abrogate the limitation to public officials. In effect, they seek to transform two specific exceptions carved out by a process of erosion into an extensive demolition and destruction of the law by an act of avulsion. This Court perceives no reason in principle or in justice for radically undermining the law of libel, in this manner, nor dies it find any precedents for doing so. The law of libel, as has been shown, is a vital and important aspect of the law of torts. It is one of the branches of law that safeguard individual civil rights. It should not be whittled away." (248 F. Supp. at 195).

We have quoted at length from Judge Holtzoff's opinion because it answers most of Petitioner's arguments. In addition it and the opinion of Judge McLean in the Fignole v. Curtis Publishing Co. case give the logic of why the just privilege conferred by New York Times should not be extended.

"The basic philosophy underlying the . . . [New York Times] case is that the privilege of every citizen, no matter how well informed he may or may not be, to cri[illegible] his government freely, should be safeguarded [illegible] Such a right is regarded as indispensable in [illegible]ular form of government . . . Manifestly this [illegible] has no logical application to criticisms or atta[illegible] on private individuals. The fact that some persons are better known than some others should not lead to any far-reaching distinction in their civil rights [to be secure in their reputations]. Consequently, there is no reasonable connection between a right to criticize one's Government and the right to disparage one's neighbors." (Emphasis added.) Clark v. Pearson, 248 F. Supp. 188, 195 (D. D. C. 1965).

"I am less willing than was the court in Walker v. Courier-Journal, supra, to take this additional step. On the contrary, New York Times, to my mind, indicates that it should not be taken. The rationale of that decision appears to be that since a public official enjoys a privilege, either absolute or qualified, against liability for libelous statements which he makes in the course of his official duties, so a critic of a public official's conduct should possess an equal privilege.

> 'It would give public servants an unjustified preference over the public they serve, if critics of official conduct did not have a fair equivalent of the immunity granted to the officials themselves.' (376 U. S. at 282-283, 84 S. Ct. at 727.)

"If this is the basis of the New York Times rule, then there is no reason to grant immunity to critics of mere candidates for office or of public figures in general, for the candidates and the miscellaneous public figures possess no corresponding immunity for their own defamatory utterances. On the facts of the present case, therefore, and on the present state of the law, I hold that defendant is not entitled to a dismissal of the libel count." Fignole v. Curtis Publishing Company, 247 F. Supp. 595 at 597 (S. D. N. Y. 1965).

Point VI.

The Trial Court Granted Petitioner Every Possible Benefit of Its Defense of "Fair Comment".

The trial court extended every consideration to Petitioner's defense of fair comment except to force the jury to believe it. The instructions given by the trial court on fair comment were so favorable to Associated Press that it did not specifically object to the fair comment issues submitted by the trial court, namely special issues Nos. 2 and 6 (R. 64-55, 59, 61), and waived its right to submit instructions embodying the definition of fair comment that it now wants this court to adopt (R. 54-57). Having gambled that the jury would find in accordance with the generally-favorable-to-defendant fair comment instructions given by the trial court, the Petitioner cannot now be heard to complain of alleged error. See Rules 274 and 279 of Vernon's Texas Rules of Civil Procedure. A party who fails to request or submit a definition of fair comment cannot allege error in the definition as submitted by the trial court.

It is submitted that the following fair comment instruction given by the court was if anything more than fair to the Associated Press:

> "In answering the issues in these instructions in which the term 'fair comment' is used, you are instructed that the interest of the public requires that all acts and matters of a public nature, and of public concern published for general information may be freely published and discussed with reasonable comments thereon. You are further instructed that by said term is meant a statement which represents the honest opinion of the writer and constitutes reasonable inferences to be drawn from the attendant facts and circumstances whether literally true or not, or whether all reasonable persons would agree with the opinions or conclusions based thereon" (R. 59).

When a jury answers special issues to the effect that the AP statements that Walker "led a charge of students against Federal marshals" and "assumed command of the crowd" were not the honest opinion of the writer and did not constitute a reasonable inference to be drawn from the attendant facts and circumstances, what Constitutional right of Free Speech of the Associated Press could conceivably be violated? Just as there is no Constitutional right of Free Speech to yell "Fire" in a crowded theatre, so there is no Constitutional right of Free Speech to falsely say that you saw a person committing a crime. Otherwise fair comment would become a loophole which would destroy the incentive for accurate, responsible reporting, especially when cherished reputations are involved.

Point VII.

The Amount of the Verdict Does Not Violate Petitioner's Freedom of the Press.

Petitioner's "shock" at the amount of the verdict in this case would suffer by comparison with the shock suffered by Respondent, who had gone in good faith to Mississippi to protest by his presence, as the former Military Commander of Federal troops in Little Rock, what he considered to be a misuse of military power. He was sincerely convinced (and the Cuban missile crisis three weeks later confirmed this) that Soviet power in Cuba was a greater threat to the security of the United States than Governor Ross Barnett. He found himself falsely accused around the world of crimes that he knew he had not committed; and in rapid sequence, found himself 1) arrested, 2) transported to another state without a Court Order, 3) committed to Federal Prison hospital for criminal insane, 4) all without notice, counsel, hearing, or opportunity to post bail, 5) upon an affidavit of a Government psychiatrist who had never seen him and who based his diagnosis on what he had read in the newspapers.*

Petitioner is a news merchant who sold for profit to its 4160 newspaper, radio and television subscribers in the United States and to its 4300 similar subscribers in 87 foreign countries a sensational story that a former Major General of the United States Army had assumed command of a mob and led a charge against the representatives of the Government he had sworn to defend. This attention-arresting story was distributed for profit by the AP to millions of readers of newspapers and even more millions of radio listeners and television viewers.

Petitioner was so anxious to merchandise its very salable but scandalous product that AP put it on the market

---

* Associated Press Exhibit 18 (R. 1487); also testimony of Dr. Charles E. Smith in U. S. v. Edwin Walker, Case No. 61 in U. S. D. C., Northern District of Mississippi, Western Division, dismissed Jan. 21, 1963 (R. 1425).

 On April 10, 1963, Lee Harvey Oswald "attempted to kill Major General Edwin A. Walker (Resigned U. S. Army) using a rifle he had ordered by mail one month previously under an assumed name". (Report of the Warren Commission, New York Times paperback edition, pp. 33, 39, 42, 113, 121, 170-175). Since Oswald had never met Walker, and had no known quarrel with him of any kind, it is a fair inference that the widespread without any testing, checking or research. Had Walker been found criminally insane by the Federal Court instead of "functioning currently at the superior level of intelligence" or had Walker been convicted of insurrection, etc., the gamble would have paid off and Petitioner would have felt that the profits it made justified the terrific risk it took. Unfortunately, the gamble failed. Like any other manufacturer of a defective product Petitioner must now face the consequences of its recklessness. In fairness, there should be some relation between the size and distribution of the "story" and the amount of damages where the story is false, not made in good faith, and does not represent the honest opinion of the writer.

Suppose, for example, that the Reverend Martin Luther King had been falsely charged by the Associated Press with a series of vicious crimes which resulted in his being arrested at the order of the U. S. Attorney General and thrown into a Federal prison for the criminally insane and Government psychiatrists had filed affidavits in Federal Court that Reverend King was insane. Under such circumstances, would anyone seriously contend, as the Associated Press now does, that the punishment is "so burdensome and oppressive that the Court should not, consistent with the First Amendment, permit its imposition"?

In libel, the financial standing of the wrongdoer is a factor to consider in assessing damages. On page 46 of its Brief, the Associated Press concedes that the expenses it defamatory reports about Walker, published by the AP, were a contributory factor to Oswald's attempt, a bare six months later, to murder Walker.

---

 As reported November 21, 1962 by Dr. Robert L. Stubblefield, the psychiatrist who was appointed by the Federal Court at Oxford, Mississippi to examine Walker (R. 1685).

has incurred in opposing relief for Edwin Walker "has already greatly exceeded the judgment in this case." Obviously because of the vast resources which Petitioner has hurled against Walker, his own expenses, while not of equal magnitude, are extremely heavy. The judgment of the Court below will not compensate Walker for very much more than his expenses, let alone for defaming him throughout his native state of Texas. For a fraction of the costs Petitioner claims to have expended resisting justice in this case, it could have paid the salary of a "back-up newsman" to check and double-check, before printing, the truth of defamatory reports of the type submitted by Van Savell. Compensation must be commensurate with the financial responsibility of the defendant and the enormity of the wrong it caused. Equal Justice Under Law requires that conservatives like Walker recover for wrongs to their reputation to the same extent that liberals are permitted to do so. Cf. Quentin Reynolds v. Westbrook Pegler, 223 F. 2d 429, cert. denied 350 U. S. 846, 100 L. Ed. 754 (1955); John Henry Faulk v. Aware, Inc., 14 N. Y. 2d 954, 202 N. E. 2d 372, cert. denied 380 U. S. 916, 13 L. Ed. 2d 801 (1965).

CONCLUSION.

Petitioner seeks to extend the First Amendment so as to reverse a judgment for a news report accusing Respondent of insurrection and assaulting Federal marshals, etc., which report the jury found was false, not fair comment, and not published in good faith. Unless this Court, remote from the trial and by a procedure without precedent under the Seventh Amendment, should re-weigh the evidence and reverse the jury's verdict, Petitioner's defamatory report must be considered as knowingly false or made with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not.

The creation of a rule of law to fit this case, that would insulate the press from responsibility for such defamation, will produce a "two-edged sword", so far as freedom of both speech and press under the First Amendment are concerned.

Such a new rule of law would discourage, not encourage, free speech for the vast majority of citizens who do not own a newspaper, magazine, radio or television station. These citizens will be most reluctant to discuss public issues and controversies because they could then be subjected to vicious and defamatory lies on the excuse that they had voluntarily injected themselves into the vortex of a question of public concern. Such a rule would discourage housewives from speaking out at PTA meetings and handicap our Government in obtaining the advice of distinguished private citizens of the stature of Bernard Baruch, Herbert Hoover, Admiral Hyman Rickover, etc.

The genius of American Constitutional Government is our system of checks and balances and our denial of special privileges to any class or group. "The press is not above the reach of the law" and "to immunize the press . . . would be no service to freedom of the press."* The Canons of Journalism (adopted 1923) state:

> "By every consideration of good faith a newspaper is constrained to be truthful. It is not to be excused for lack of thoroughness or accuracy within its control, or failure to obtain command of these essential qualities."

---

* Mr. Justice Fortas, dissenting in Time, Inc. v. Hill, No. 22, decided January 9, 1967.

 Article IV of the Canons of Journalism of the American Society of Newspaper Editors quoted in 2 United Nations Freedom of Information 213.

The press should not, and most of the press does not, demand a privilege to harm a private citizen through violation of its own canons of good faith, truthfulness and accuracy, and then escape liability. A manufacturer of false news should be as responsible as a manufacturer of any other defective product.

Petitioner had a fair trial under due process of law with all its Constitutional rights protected, and the judgment should not be disturbed.

Respectfully submitted,

WILLIAM ANDRESS, JR.,
Fidelity Union Life Building,
Dallas, Texas,

CLYDE J. WATTS,
219 Couch Drive,
Oklahoma City, Oklahoma,
Attorneys for Respondent.

J. F. SCHLAFLY,
First National Bank Building,
Alton, Illinois,
Of Counsel on the Brief.

INDEX

	Page
QUESTIONS PRESENTED	1
ADDITIONAL STATUTES INVOLVED	2
COUNTER-STATEMENT	2
Petitioner's Statement Fails To Set Out The Facts As to Waiver, The First Question Presented	2
Editorial Philosophy Of Petitioner At The Time It Published The Butts-Bryant Article	6
Curtis' Utter Disregard Of Whether The Article Was True Or False	11
The Trial	16
Curtis' Post-Trial Motions	29
The Court of Appeals Approved The District Court's Appraisal Of The Evidence	32
SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT	33
ARGUMENT	37
I. UNDER THE FACTS OF THIS CASE, PETITIONER WAIVED THE RIGHT TO CHALLENGE THE VERDICT AND JUDGMENT ON ANY OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL GROUNDS NOW ASSERTED	37
II. ASSUMING THE CONSTITUTIONAL DEFENSES WERE NOT WAIVED, NEW YORK TIMES V. SULLIVAN SHOULD NOT BE USED AS A BASIS FOR REVERSAL IN VIEW OF THE FACTS OF THIS CASE	46
1. Was Respondent A Public Official Within The Concept Of The Times Case?	51

INDEX (Continued)

Page

2. The Undisputed Evidence Shows Conclusively That Actual Malice Was Proved 56

3. If The Facts Of The Case Fall Within The Purview Of Times, Was The Jury Charge Insufficient In The Light Of That Decision? 64

4. Under The Facts Of This Case, Should Times Be Applied Retroactively To It? 67

III. UNDER THE FACTS OF THIS CASE THE AMOUNT OF PUNITIVE DAMAGES DID NOT CONSTITUTE AN ABRIDGMENT OF FREEDOM OF THE PRESS OR THE TAKING OF PROPERTY WITHOUT DUE PROCESS OF LAW 69

CONCLUSION 80

APPENDIX A 81

APPENDIX B 83

TABLE OF CASES CITED

	Page
Ackermann v. U. S., 340 U.S. 193 (1950)	34, 42
Allen v. Regents of University System of Georgia, 304 U.S. 439 (1938)	53
Atlantic & Gulf Stevedores, Inc. v. Ellerman Lines, Ltd., 369 U.S. 355 (1962)	58
Augusta Evening News v. Radford, 91 Ga. 494, 17 S.E. 612 (1893)	38
Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U.S. 642 (1952)	44
Berenyi v. Immigration Service, No. 66, October Term 1966 (January 23, 1967)	57
Cain v. State, 55 Ga. App. 376, 190 S.E. 371 (1937)	65
Caldwell v. Crowell-Collier Pub. Co., 161 F. 2d 333 (5th Cir. 1947)	44
Cauble v. Weimer, 101 Ga. App. 313, 113 S.E. 2d 641 (1960)	38
Clark v. Pearson, 248 F. Supp. 188 (DDC 1965)	73
Coleman v. MacLennan, 78 Kan. 711, 98 P. 281 (1908)	45, 72
Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964)	68
Foster v. Sikes, 202 Ga. 122, 42 S.E. 2d 441 (1947)	79
Gandia v. Pettingill, 222 U.S. 452 (1912)	44
Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64 (1964)	47
Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609 (1965)	68
Hamm v. Rock Hill, 379 U.S. 306 (1964)	45
Johnson v. New Jersey, 384 U.S. 719 (1966)	68

CASES (Continued)

	Page
Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458 (1938)	37
Kennedy v. Mid-Continent Telecasting, Inc., 394 P. 2d 400 (Kan. 1964)	45
Lavender v. Kurn, 327 U.S. 645 (1946)	58
Linkletter v. Walker, 381 U.S. 618 (1965)	68
Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)	68
Michel v. Louisiana, 350 U.S. 91 (1955)	42
Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)	68
New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1963)	3 passim
Palmer v. Hoffman, 318 U.S. 109 (1943)	58
Pape v. Time, Inc., 354 F. 2d 558 (7th Cir. 1965), cert. den., 384 U.S. 909 (1966)	63
Pearce v. Brower, 72 Ga. 243 (1884)	38
People v. Carlson, 26 N.Y.S. 2d 1003 (1941)	65
Reynolds v. Pegler, 233 F. 2d 429 (2nd Cir. 1955), cert. den., 350 U.S. 846 (1955)	79
Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75 (1966)	47
Selalise v. National Utility Service, Inc., 120 F. 2d 938 (5th Cir. 1941)	79
Sikes v. Foster, 74 Ga. App. 350, 39 S.E. 2d 585 (1946)	78
State v. Sealy, 253 N.C. 802, 117 S.E. 2d 793 (1961)	65
State v. Schriver, 275 S.W. 2d 304 (Mo. 1955)	65
State v. Tjaden, 69 N.W. 2d 272 (N.D. 1955)	65

CASES (Continued)

	Page
Strickland v. Cox, 101 Ga. 482, 28 S.E. 655 (1897)	73
Sweeney v. Schenectady Union Pub. Co., 122 F. 2d 288 (2nd Cir. 1941), aff'd by equally divided Court, 316 U.S. 642 (1942)	44
Tehan v. Shott, 382 U.S. 406 (1966)	68
Time, Inc. v. Hill, No. 22, October Term 1966 (Jan. 9, 1967)	47, 51
U.S. v. Alabama, 362 U.S. 602 (1960)	45
U.S. v. Chambers, 291 U.S. 217 (1934)	45
U.S. v. Sorrentino, 175 F. 2d 721 (3rd Cir. 1949), cert. den., 338 U.S. 868 (1949)	34, 42
U. S. v. The Schooner Peggy, 1 Cranch 103 (1801)	45
Vandenbark v. Owens-Illinois Glass Co., 311 U.S. 538 (1941)	45
Wardman-Justice Motors v. Petrie, 39 F. 2d 512 (D.C. Cir. 1930)	79
Wilson v. Sullivan, 81 Ga. 238, 7 S.E. 274 (1888)	38
Yakus v. U. S., 321 U.S. 414 (1944)	34, 42

STATUTES AND AUTHORITIES CITED

Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Rule 51	36, 39
Georgia Code Ann., §32-152	53
Georgia Code Ann., §32-153	53
Georgia Code Ann., §105-701	47
Georgia Code Ann., §105-709(6)	34, 38
Noel, Defamation of Public Officers and Candidates, 49 Colum. L. Rev. 875, 891 (1949)	73

IN THE
SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

OCTOBER TERM, 1966

No. 37

CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,
Petitioner,

versus

WALLACE BUTTS,
Respondent.

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States
Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit

BRIEF FOR RESPONDENT

Respondent accepts petitioner's recital of "Opinions Below" and "Jurisdiction."[1]

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

Respondent construes the questions presented to be as follows:

---

[1]Respondent will sometimes be referred to as Wallace Butts or Butts. Petitioner will sometimes be referred to as Curtis Publishing Company or Curtis.

I. Under the facts of this case, did petitioner waive the right to challenge the verdict and judgment on any of the constitutional grounds now asserted by its decision not to assert any such grounds at or before the long and expensive trial?

II. Assuming that Times v. Sullivan does apply and the constitutional defenses were not waived, did the undisputed evidence show conclusively that actual malice was proved?

III. Under the facts of this case, did the amount of punitive damages constitute an abridgement of freedom of the press or the taking of property without due process of law?

ADDITIONAL STATUTES INVOLVED

Additional statutory provisions involved are set forth in Appendix A.

COUNTERSTATEMENT

The questions to be decided must be determined upon the facts of this specific case. Petitioner's "Statement" is deficient in many respects.

Petitioner's Statement Fails To Set Out the Facts As to Waiver, The First Question Presented

Petitioner's "Statement" fails to set out the background against which it made its decision as to the strategy it would employ in the trial court in defending this case. That background is vital in determining the question of waiver involved in the first question presented. In considering the facts, the trial strategy chosen by petitioner should be kept in mind, to-wit, that it would defend this case squarely and solely on a plea of justification (truth) under which it would obtain the right to open and conclude the jury argument and that no other defense would be relied on. Only when that strategy failed did petitioner seek after the trial a constitutional ground of defense and turn hopefully to New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), as a means of escape.

In the early part of 1963 Paul Bryant, coach of the University of Alabama, filed suit against Curtis Publishing Company and Furman Bisher (Sports Editor of the Atlanta Journal) in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Alabama (Civil Action 63-2-W), claiming damages for libel in an article about him written by Furman Bisher and published by Curtis in its Saturday Evening Post.

On February 26, 1963, Curtis filed a motion to dismiss Bryant's action on various grounds, including the following (App. B, Exh. A):

> "(f) To subject this defendant to liability in the circumstances complained of would abridge the freedom of speech and of press in violation of the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, made applicable to the States by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

"(h) To subject this defendant to liability in the circumstances complained of would be repugnant to the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

"(i) The magazine article complained of is not libelous as a matter of law in that it is fair comment concerning a personality who is famous throughout the United States and abroad."

Curtis Publishing Company was represented in that action in Alabama by its general counsel, Pepper, Hamilton & Scheetz of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and by T. Eric Embry of Beddow, Embry & Beddow, Birmingham, Alabama.

The suit at bar brought by Wallace Butts against Curtis Publishing Company for libel published against him in Saturday Evening Post was filed March 25, 1963 (R. 14), almost exactly one month after Curtis had filed its constitutional defenses in the Bryant action. Curtis filed its answer to the Butts suit on April 10, 1963, and asserted no constitutional defenses whatsoever and chose to rely solely on the defense that the charges in the article complained of were true. (R. 20)

In the early part of April 1963 Coach Paul Bryant filed a second action in the United States District Court in Alabama against Curtis for libel, this one growing out of the charges against him in the Butts-Bryant article which forms the basis for the action here. To the second Bryant action Curtis filed on April 30, 1963, its motion to dismiss on the same constitutional grounds it had filed in the first Bryant action. (App. B, Exh. B)

The constitutional defenses to the second Bryant action were filed on behalf of Curtis by its same general counsel, Pepper, Hamilton & Scheetz, and T. Eric Embry of Beddow, Embry & Beddow.

In addition to being counsel for Curtis in the Bryant cases, T. Eric Embry and the firm of Beddow, Embry & Beddow, along with Herbert Wechsler of New York City, were also counsel for the New York Times Company in the Times v. Sullivan case in the Alabama state courts (see 144 So.2d 25) long before it reached this Court. The firm of Beddow, Embry & Beddow and Mr. Wechsler presented the petition for writ of certiorari to this Court in the Times case (on Nov. 21 1962) and saw the writ granted on January 7, 1963, several months prior to the trial of the Butts case.

Mr. Roderick Beddow, Jr., of Curtis' Birmingham counsel, was the individual who first brought the Butts-Bryant story to the attention of Curtis. (R. 368) Mr. Philip H. Strubing of the Philadelphia firm which is general counsel for Curtis apparently received the information from Beddow, for he first brought it to the attention of Post editors Thomas and Kahn. (R. 720)

In an affidavit executed in the instant case by Philip H. Strubing (R. 1340) he stated he is a member of the Philadelphia firm of Pepper, Hamilton & Scheetz, general counsel for Curtis, and that he participated actively with Mr. T. Eric Embry of the Birmingham law firm of Beddow, Embry & Beddow in the preparation of the case of Bryant v. Curtis in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Alabama and that he participated actively with Mr. Welborn B. Cody and other attorneys in the Atlanta law firm of Kilpatrick, Cody, Rogers, McClatchey & Regenstein, in the preparation of this (the Wallace Butts) case for trial. He further stated in said affidavit that Mr. T. Eric Embry and Mr. Roderick Beddow, Jr. attended the trial of the instant case in Atlanta, "but only as spectators."

Editorial Philosophy of Petitioner At The Time It Published The Butts-Bryant Article

Petitioner publishes several magazines, including Saturday Evening Post; its advertising revenue fell from $106 million in 1960 to $86 million in 1961 and to about $66 million in 1962, a loss of $40 million in two years, an alarming rate of $20 million a year. (R. 707-08) Clay Blair, Jr., Editor-in-Chief of the Post, testified that, since the entire advertising rate schedule was based on how large the Post's circulation was, he, as Editor-in-Chief, decided to "change the image" of the magazine (R. 711) so as to attract more readers and thereby improve the critical advertising revenue picture. Using the language of Mr. Blair himself, this "change" in "image" was to be founded upon a policy of "sophisticated muckraking" (R. 710, 712-714) — of conducting "the expose in the mass magazines" (R. 714) calculated to "provoke people, make them mad." (R. 715) When asked if he had been facetious when he boasted on a previous occasion that he would change the image of the Post from that which everyone had learned to admire and respect to that of a "sophisticated muckraker," Mr. Blair testified that he was "not being facetious," that he "meant it then" and "mean[s] it now." (R. 710-711)

Shortly after the "image" of the Saturday Evening Post was changed and it had embarked on its course of "sophisticated muckraking," petitioner, acting through Mr. Blair and his associate editors, purchased from one George Burnett, known by them to be a bad check artist then on probation (R. 689-92, 771-72), the Butts-Bryant story for which petitioner paid approximately $10,000.00 (R. 1041-46), and published the article here in question in its March 23, 1963, issue.

When asked how the Butts-Bryant story fitted his new image for the Post, Blair stated it was "a step in the right direction" and added, "we have gone 25 per cent toward the goal of the magazine that I envision." (R. 711)

On January 15, 1963, Mr. Blair had issued a memorandum to the staff of the Post congratulating them on the type of magazine being put out. The memorandum stated in part:

> "Your work has not gone unnoticed. We have many press clips commenting on the new vitality of the Post. Joe Culligan [President, Curtis Publishing Company] has been extremely flattering in his comments, as have the other directors of the Curtis Publishing Company. The final yardstick: we have about > six lawsuits pending, meaning that we are hitting them where it hurts, with solid, meaningful journalism." (R. 1040)

When questioned under oath about this memorandum and comments concerning it which had been published in Time Magazine on March 29, 1963, Mr. Blair stated that by his use of the statement "we are hitting them where it hurts," he meant, " 'Them' is the general phrase to refer to the whole United States of America." (R. 708-09) He stated that the lawsuits referred to in that memorandum were all libel suits. (R. 710)

The Butts-Bryant Article

Pursuant to its new "image" and its proclaimed new policy of "sophisticated muckraking," Curtis purchased the Butts-Bryant story from George Burnett on about February 21, 1963, for exclusive use in its Saturday Evening Post. The availability of the story had been brought to the attention of Curtis by Roderick Beddow, Jr., its Birmingham counsel then handling the defense of Curtis in the first libel action which had been filed by Coach Bryant several weeks earlier. (R. 368) The information had been relayed by attorney Philip H. Strubing to Davis Thomas and Roger Kahn, two of the Post editors (R. 720). On February 18 Thomas and Kahn engaged one Frank Graham, Jr., a freelance sports writer who apparently knew little about football, to write the story. (R. 362, 366-67) They instructed him to go to Atlanta and meet Curtis' counsel, Roderick Beddow of Birmingham, at the Heart of Atlanta Motel. They explained to him that Beddow was a Curtis lawyer handling the Bryant libel suit then pending against it in Birmingham. (R. 367)

Graham arrived in Atlanta on February 20 and met attorney Beddow at the designated motel, together with the latter's private investigator from Birmingham. (R. 368) Attorney Beddow arranged for Graham to meet George Burnett, the man who was supposed to have the Butts-Bryant story. (R. 368-69) Graham met Burnett the next day, February 21, in attorney Pierre Howard's office in Atlanta where it was agreed between Graham and Burnett's lawyer, Pierre Howart, that Curtis would pay Burnett $2,000.00 for an affidavit about the story and an additional $3,000.00 if the story appeared in print "and was a Post exclusive." (R. 369-71) The following day (February 22) Graham obtained an affidavit from George Burnett concerning the story, although Burnett told him "he couldn't remember anything definite about it . . . without his notes." (R. 390) Mr. Beddow and his private investigator then returned to Birmingham. (R. 375) Mr. Graham remained in Atlanta until Saturday morning when he returned to New York to write the Butts-Bryant article for the Post. (R. 379)

The article as written by Graham was published in the March 23, 1963, issue of the Post. It was entitled in bold black letters, "THE STORY OF A COLLEGE FOOTBALL FIX," with a sub-title reading, "A Shocking Report of How Wally Butts and Bear Bryant Rigged A Game Last Fall."

Superimposed on the first page of the article was an editorial written by "The Editors" of the Post which stated as follows:

> "Not since the Chicago White Sox threw the 1919 World Series has there been a sports story as shocking as this one. This is the story of one fixed game of college football.

"Before the University of Georgia played the University of Alabama last September 22, Wally Butts, athletic director of Georgia, gave Paul (Bear) Bryant, head coach of Alabama, Georgia's plays, defensive patterns, all the significant secrets Georgia's football team possessed.

"The corrupt here were not professional ballplayers gone wrong, as in the 1919 Black Sox scandal. The corrupt were not disreputable gamblers, as in the scandals continually afflicting college basketball. The corrupt were two men — Butts and Bryant — employed to educate and to guide young men.

"How prevalent is the fixing of college football games? How often do teachers sell out their pupils? We don't know — yet. For now we can only be appalled. —THE EDITORS" (R. 1071) (Emphasis in original)

The body of the article as published included, in part, the following charges against respondent:

(a) He was charged with being a "rigger" and "fixer" and with having "fixed" and "rigged" the 1962 Georgia-Alabama football game. (R. 1072)

(b) It is slyly insinuated that he rigged and fixed the game with Coach Bryant as a gam- bling device in order to restore his financial resources. (R. 1072, cols. 2, 3)

(d) He is charged with having betrayed the Georgia players by his alleged deception, "fixing" and "rigging," foulness and corruption, so that their moves were "analyzed and forecast like those of rats in a maze" and they "took a frightful physical beating." (R. 1072, col. 3)

(e) In the closing paragraph of the article, the term "fixer" is defined as one who never leaves open a "chance": "When a fixer works against you, that's the way he likes it." (R. 1074)

Curtis' Utter Disregard Of Whether The Article Was True or False

1. Before coming to Atlanta to buy the story from George Burnett, Frank Graham was informed that one John Carmichael was present with Burnett when the alleged telephone conversation was intercepted and that he may have overheard it. (R. 378-79) Graham was also aware that Burnett had been convicted of writing bad checks and was at that time on probation. (R. 689-92) Post Managing Editor Davis Thomas knew this also, and testified they knew there were possibly other instances of bad-check-writing by Burnett. Thomas acknowledged that he considered the act of writing bad checks essentially as "a lie." (R. 771-72) In spite of knowing this about George Burnett and that John Carmichael was present when the alleged telephone conversation was supposed to have been overheard by Burnett, Graham, with Thomas' approval, made no effort to contact or interview John Carmichael to verify Burnett's story. (R. 378-79, 771-72) Had Graham contacted John Carmichael he would have learned from him at the outset that Burnett's whole story was a fabrication. (See R. 636-44)

2. Before publishing the story in its March 23rd issue, petitioner was informed unequivocally by telegram and again by letter, each dated March 11, 1963, of the "absolute falsity of the charges" it was preparing to make in the proposed article. (R. 777-78) Said telegram and letter were ignored and went unanswered. No additional investigation was made. The story appeared as prepared.

3. Although the article states that Burnett "recorded all that he heard" in his notes (R. 1072, col. 1) (emphasis added), before publishing the story no representative of the Post even saw or read the notes which Burnett alleges he made during the course of the interdepted conversation (R. 772-73), preferring to rely upon the memory of one person as to the details of an alleged conversation he oveheard over five months previous and who told author Graham he was talking to him only from memory (R. 154) and "couldn't remember anything definite about it . . . without his notes." (R. 390). The notes contained no information that could possibly have been equated to a "fix." According to Coach Griffith, University of Georgia head football coach, a witness for petitioner, a "good number of those notes were inaccurate and didn't apply to anything that the University of Georgia had." (R. 281)[2]

---

[2]In fact, Georgia had no "80-8 pop" play, as asserted in the ar-

The most the notes showed was a reference to two formations (and not "plays" (R. 1071) as the Post wrote) which had been used by Georgia throughout the previous football season and which therefore would have been nothing new to Alabama or anyone else. (R. 237-39) Petitioner's witness, Georgia head coach Griffith, testified there "wasn't anything secret about those formations." (R. 239) As a matter of fact, one of the two formations used by Georgia in the game did surprise Alabama to such an extent that it was executed quite successfully four out of five times it was used. (R. 333)

4. Before publishing the story no effort was made by petitioner to view the game film although the Sports Editor of the Post, Roger Kahn, considered that to be necessary (R. 736), and Furman Bisher thought "it would have been a very good idea." (R. 779)[3]

5. No effort was made by petitioner to interview any member of the Alabama football team to see if any changes had been made in the team's offensive or defensive plans after the alleged telephone conversation, or for any other purpose. (R. 779)

---

ticle, or "29-0 series," as asserted in the notes. (R. 226, 279, 467, 569) Neither did Georgia have any play where the "onside guard pulls on sweep." (R. 470)

[3]Bisher, Sports Editor of the Atlanta Journal, was hired by Curtis for some undetermined function in connection with the story. (See R. 1043) The intimation in petitioner's brief (p. 31) that it relied on Bisher's failure to make any corrections in the article written by Graham is grossly misleading. Graham testified that he did not ask Bisher to make any corrections or suggestions, and in fact had sent the story to Bisher "for his files whenever the story was to be written in Atlanta, for the newspapers" (R. 384) — which it never was.

6. Neither author Graham nor any of the editors of the Post made any effort prior to publication to contact either Wallace Butts or Coach Paul Bryant for the purpose of verifying or negating any of the "facts" which they subsequently published in the article, or for any other purpose. (R. 677)

7. Curtis' Editor-in-Chief, Clay Blair, before publication brushed aside the tearful plea of Jean Butts Jones, a daughter of Wallace Butts, that the article not be published, that it was not true. (R. 717-18)

8. Curtis published the article knowing full well in in advance that it would "ruin Coach Butts' career" and would be "the death of Wally Butts in his chosen profession" (R. 693-94), and knowing all the time (at least one month before the issue of March 23) that he was hopeful "for [a] job with [the] pros." (R. 662) (The story itself stated: " 'I still think I'm able to coach a little,' Butts told a reporter that day [February 23], 'and I feel I can help a pro team.' The chances are Wally Butts will never help any football team again." (R. 1974, col. 2)) The testimony on this point was unequivocal:

(a) Frank Graham, the author of the article, testified by deposition as follows:

"Q. Now, in the third from last paragraph in the article you say: "The chances are that Wally Butts will never help any football team again.' Is that your language?"

"A. That is mine."

"Q. Is that your opinion?"

"A. That is my opinion."

"Q. You felt, and the Post felt, or Curtis Publishing Company felt, that when this article was published that was the death of Wally Butts in his chosen profession?"

"A. I would say that it would be very difficult for him ---

"Q. That is your opinion?"

"A. That is my opinion."

"Q. The next to the last sentence of that same paragraph you say: 'But careers will be ruined, that is sure.' Is that your language?"

"A. That is my language."

"Q. Whose career were you referring to?"

"A. To Wally Butts."

"Q. You knew and the Curtis Publishing Company knew that when that article was published it would ruin Coach Butts' career?"

"A. Yes, we did." (R. 693-94) (Emphasis added)

(b) Charles Davis Thomas, Managing Editor of the Post testified by deposition as follows:

"Q. Let me point out to you the statement in this story which says, and I read from Page 83 at the bottom of the second column: 'But careers will be ruined, that is sure.' So that you knew what was involved in this story before it was published? You knew that the careers of two men would be ruined as a result of the publication of the story, didn't you?"

"A. Yes."

(R. 770) (Emphasis added)

The Trial

The article appeared in the March 23, 1963, issue of Saturday Evening Post and on March 25 Wallace Butts filed suit against Curtis. (R. 14-19)

To the plaintiff's complaint, Curtis answered (R. 19-21) with three defenses: first, specific admissions or denials of the allegations of the complaint; second, that the statements in the article complained of were true; third, that the complaint failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted.

At pretrial hearings counsel for Curtis insisted that its second defense was a valid plea of justification and that it therefore had the burden of proof in the case and was entitled to have the opening and concluding arguments.[4] The trial court so ruled, and that order was followed in the trial of the case which began on August 5, 1963. The verdict was rendered two weeks later on August 20, 1963.

In its presentation of evidence, petitioner at no time put up as a witness the author of its article or any of its editors who had made additions to the article af-

---

[4]Pretrial Conf., June 3, 1963. Page 8: "MR. CODY: Whether it's justification or the truth whatever distinction you make between the pleas, the defendant has the burden on that anyway." "MR. CODY: I will concede that that puts the burden on me." Page 10: "THE COURT: No. I was just — I didn't know that question was to come up. I just thought it was already a plea of justification."
"MR. CODY: I don't think there is any difference between a plea of truth and of justification. I think one means the other. The cases so hold."
"MR. CODY: Your Honor, I interpret this as a plea of justification. I think the court in its pretrial order can say that." (Emphasis added) ter it was submitted by the author or otherwise worked on the story, although petitioner had present in the courtroom during the trial its Editor-in-Chief, Clay Blair, its Executive Editor, Don A. Schanche, and its Managing Editor, Davis Thomas. (225 F. Supp. at 919) Neither did petitioner put up as a witness Furman Bisher, Sports Editor of the Atlanta Journal, who was available in Atlanta and to whom petitioner had paid $1,000.00 for his connection with the article. Neither did petitioner put up as a witness Milton Flack or attorney Pierre Howard, both of whom were available in Atlanta and to whom petitioner had paid sums of money for their connections with the article.

Petitioner, although pleading truth as a defense, neither produced Mr. Graham as a witness at the trial nor gave any reason for his absence. Therefore respondent was denied open confrontation in court with the very writer of the article as to the truth of what he had written and the sources from which he had obtained it. Respondent had to resort at the trial to the use of a deposition he had previously taken of Mr. Graham in New York, where Graham resides, in order to bring to the jury any testimony by the author of the article. The same was true as to petitioner's Sports Editor, Roger Kahn, who handled the editing of the article after it was written.

As its principal witnesses petitioner put up George Burnett and head coach Johnny Griffith of the University of Georgia. George Burnett was known by the petitioner to have a record of conviction for writing bad checks and to be on probation at the time he claimed to have listened in on the conversation. (R. 689-92) He testified concerning what he claimed to have heard while listening in on a telephone conversation between respondent and Coach Bryant on September 13, 1962.[5] (R. 128-38) Burnett is quoted in the article as stating that all he heard is contained in the notes he claims he made. (R. 1072, col. 1) As will be hereinafter shown, Burnett testified that he had not told the author of the article many things quoted in the article as having been said by him.

Petitioner's other principal witness, head coach Johnny Griffith of the University of Georgia, stated that if information concerning two formations had been given to the University of Alabama it would, "to some extent, limit the preparation that was necessary on the part of Alabama," that is, "it would eliminate them making preparation and spending time on the practice field to prepare against any of the possibilities of formations that we had shown to try to stop." (R. 228) As will be shown later, Coach Griffith further testified that he had not given Furman Bisher or anyone else various statements attributed to him in the story.

Assistant Coaches Frank Inman and Leroy Pearce of the University of Georgia, witnesses for petitioner, were questioned at length as to technicalities about football. Coach Inman testified that certain information in the Burnett notes in his opinion could have been helpful. (R. 288)

Both of the principals charged in the article with having "fixed" and "rigged" the game, namely, Wallace Butts, and Coach Paul Bryant, testified at the

---

[5]The story asserts that this call was made on September 14, 1962. There is no evidence to support this.

trial. They both stated they had no independent recollection of any specific telephone conversation they had had throughout the many years they have known each other, but stated that throughout those years they had discussed football in general by telephone many times. (R. 424-27, 485-86) They both emphatically denied the charges made against them in the article published by the petitioner and stated that there was never any conversation between them having as its purpose or effect the "fixing" or "rigging" of any football game. (R. 426-30, 487, 514, 601)

Coach Bryant testified in effect that the notes claimed to have been made by Burnett meant absolutely nothing, stating, "those notes, as far as I am concerned, would not help me one iota. As a matter of fact, all it would do is get me confused." (R. 428) Coach Bryant stated, on the other hand, that the only thing that would be useful to a coach would be his opponent's "game plan." This would include the "field position" tendencies of the team: "what this team is going to do over here on the hash mark, because they will be on the hash mark sixty-seven per cent of the time"; "both offensively and defensively . . . , what they are going to do on first down, because it is a guessing game on first down"; "what they are going to do" on the "five to seven plays in this area here between the 20's, five to seven plays that [are] going to determine the game"; and, more broadly, what the team will do or tend to do in a given down-yardage situation, such as third down and long yardage, third down and medium yardage, etc. (R. 428-29) "[T]he kind of stuff we have been talking about [the Burnett notes] is not the game plan." (R. 428)

Coach Bryant testified that he frequently talked with various football coaches all over the country, often discussing football. In fact on the very day the call in question is alleged to have taken place, he talked by phone with Coach Darrell Royal of Texas for 37 minutes. (R. 424)

When asked whether he and Wallace Butts "threw," "fixed" or "rigged" the outcome of the Georgia-Alabama game as charged by the Saturday Evening Post, Coach Bryant replied, "absolutely not, and if we did we ought to go to jail, and anybody that had anything to do with this ought to go to jail, because we didn't. Taking their money is not good enough." (R. 430) Coach Bryant also testified that during September of 1962 he undoubtedly had reasons to talk with Coach Butts by telephone and in person about such matters as game schedules, problems involving game tickets, matters relating to team work-outs and other matters concerning football in general; he testified that he had talked with Coach Butts several times during that period about enforcement policies of certain rules because of Coach Butts' connection with the rule-making body of college football. (R. 424-27, 485-86) Coach Bryant stated that he knew he had talked with Coach Butts about football in general,

> "because that is my business; that is my hobby; and I just talk to him in general about football. I know I have talked to him about our football. I know I have talked to him about his football, particularly his passing game, because he is the greatest passing coach this area has even known, and most of us, what little we know about passing, we learned it from him." (R. 426-27)

Coach Bryant stated further:

"I have talked a whole lot with different coaches. I used to talk a lot to Coach Dodd here at Georgia Tech. I used to talk a lot with Coach Woodruff down in Florida, and I probably shouldn't say this, but Coach Woodruff is longer winded on the phone than Coach Butts is. You get him on there, and you are going to miss dinner." (R. 427)

The Alabama team was named National Champion of college football in 1962 (R. 427), as well as the previous year. (R. 442)

Respondent Butts testified that he knew he had talked by telephone at times with Coach Bryant about the enforcement policies of certain new rules, that he had talked at length with him about such matters with the hope that it would prevent serious injuries to players in football, but that he had no way of recalling any specific dates on which such conversations took place. (R. 485)

Charlie Trippi, former All-American football player at the University of Georgia, former professional player, chief offensive coach at Georgia at the time of the Georgia-Alabama game involved, and at the time of the trial a professional coach, testified that the notes claimed to have been made by Burnett were baseless, did not indicate "any tendencies," and that if he had received them as a coach the first thing he would have done would have been to tear them up. (R. 546-47) He stated that as offensive coach for the University of Georgia in the 1962 Georgia-Alabama game* he saw nothing indicating that Alabama knew anything about what Georgia was going to do in that game and that the only thing he saw was "that Alabama blocked, tackled and ran harder than we did." (R. 549) He further stated that based upon his experience as a college football player and coach, as well as a professional football player and coach, the outcome of a college football game "definitely" cannot be "pre-arranged, fixed or rigged without the participation of the players, or some of the players, themselves." (R. 549-50). Trippi further testified:

> "I have studied these notes, and I believe I expressed my opinion of these notes when they first were announced; and I still contend there's nothing in here to substantiate anything of value in football planning." (R. 550)

He even stated:

> "We give more information to the press every week to promote the game than is being expressed in these notes right here." (R. 550) (Emphasis added)

Leroy Jordan, All-American linebacker and captain of the University of Alabama in the 1962 Georgia-Alabama game and at the time of the trial a member of the Dallas Cowboys professional football team (R.

---

*As such Trippi called ninety percent of the plays used by Georgia in that game from the press box. (R. 545) Georgia's defense coach, Gregory, called all of Georgia's defensive formations from the side line. (R. 465)

534, 536), testified as a witness for respondent. He stated that in his opinion an opposing coach's knowledge of the formations that were going to be employed by a team would be of no value to the coach, because it is "when he is going to run a play" that is important, e.g., the "tendencies of a team on third down," and this information is established from "scouting reports and films." (R. 538-39) With reference to the Burnett notes which were examined by Leroy Jordan during his testimony, he stated that there was nothing contained therein which the University of Alabama specialized in defensively in preparation for its game with the University of Georgia. (R. 540-41) He was asked whether in his opinion as a football player "the outcome of a football game can be rigged or fixed without participation of the football players themselves in it." He stated, "No, sir. It couldn't be done." (R. 541) He testified further that in his opinion there is no "way that two coaches could rig or fix the outcome of a football game without the players' knowledge." (R. 541)

Jimmy Sharp, who played on the first team for Alabama in the game, testified that he heard no player on Alabama's team call out any such thing as "you can't run '80-8 pop' on us" during the game, as was asserted in the article. (R. 442) He also testified that no fundamental changes were made in the Alabama defensive plans between the alleged telephone call and the game (R. 441) and in fact that during the game the players on the Alabama team were greatly surprised by a formation (one of the two mentioned in Burnett's notes) used by the University of Georgia. (R. 438) In speaking of this formation which was used successfully against them in that game four of five times, Sharp stated, "we hadn't anticipated it, and we could not make the necessary adjustments." (R. 439) He said the first time Georgia employed this formation the Alabama defensive reaction "was just mass confusion, because we hadn't worked in practice on the [necessary] adjustment." (R. 439) Sharp further testified that the other formation alluded to in the Burnett notes had been anticipated by Alabama because it was utilized 109 times (out of a total of 113 plays run) in Georgia's spring game in 1962. (R. 440)

Charles Pell, who played first team tackle on the Alabama team in the game, testified that from September 1 until the game against Georgia on September 22 there were no significant changes made in the defenses that Alabama prepared to use in the game, although sometime prior to that and as a result of a scouting report the Alabama coaching staff had devised a special defense for the formation Georgia had used 109 times in its 1962 spring game. (R. 447) He also testified that during that period between September 1 and September 22 the University of Alabama did not concentrate on any particular two formations or any particular three formations (R. 451); he stated further that in his opinion for Alabama to have known Georgia's formations and plays in advance would be of no advantage without also knowing "almost a thousand other things," some of which the witness described in detail. (R. 452-53) Pell also testified that in his opinion as a football player a football game cannot be rigged or fixed without the individual players knowing about it and participating in it. (R. 454)

Robert Williamson (R. 554), Mickey Babb (R. 560) and Brigham Woodward (R. 573), varsity players for the University of Georgia in the 1962 Georgia-Alabama game, testified at the trial. Woodward testified that Georgia players in that game did not take a "frightful physical beating" as claimed in the article. (R. 575) Williamson, who played right guard on the first team for Georgia in the game, testified that there was "not a thing" done or said by the Alabama players during the game which indicated that they knew what Georgia was going to do. (R. 556) He further corroborated Woodward by saying that the statement in the article that the Georgia players took a frightful physical beating in that game was not true. (R. 556-57) Mickey Babb, right end on the Georgia team, corroborated Woodward and Williamson's testimony that the Georgia players did not take a frightful physical beating (R. 563) and stated that as a player in that game he did not feel that their moves were being analyzed by the Alabama team. (R. 563) He specifically denied having told Furman Bisher, as claimed in the article, that the Alabama players had taunted them by yelling out "you can't run eighty-eight pop on us." (R. 564)

William C. Hartman, Jr., former Assistant Coach of the University of Georgia and former professional football player with the Washington Redskins and at the time of the trial a businessman, testified. (R. 737) In addition to detailed testimony given by him concerning football technicalities, he testified that in his opinion the information contained in the Burnett notes would not be of any assistance at all to the University of Alabama in preparing for its game with the University of Georgia, that the information concerned nothing more than basic "T" formations, and that the University of Alabama and everyone else "in the United States" had those formations in their own offenses. (R. 745-56) He stated that the University of Alabama must have previously seen several movies of Georgia games showing the same information. (R. 746)

John Carmichael was called by respondent as a witness at the trial. (R. 616) Petitioner and its writer Frank Graham had known that Carmichael had first-hand knowledge about the alleged telephone call but they had not questioned him about it before writing and publishing the article. Carmichael testified that on the morning Burnett claims he overheard a conversation between respondent and Coach Bryant, he, Carmichael, arrived at the office which he shared with Burnett and found Burnett at Carmichael's desk (R. 618); that shortly thereafter Burnett showed him some notes scribbled on pieces of paper which Burnett claimed he had written while listening in on a long distance telephone conversation. (R. 620) Carmichael testified that on that occasion Burnett told him that the two coaches were merely talking about "football in general." (R. 622) Burnett asked him whether he thought they should bet anything on the approaching game; Carmichael responded by asking Burnett if he knew who he would bet on and if there "was anything said to lead you to believe that there would be some favorite in the game." Burnett's answer was "no." (R. 622) During his testimony John Carmichael was shown the notes which Burnett had previously testified were the notes he had made in listening in on the conversation; Carmichael was asked whether those were the same notes Burnett had shown him immediately following the alleged telephone conversation in September 1962. Carmichael's reply was "no, sir; these are not the same notes that Mr. Burnett handed me." (R. 643-44) (Emphasis added)

Dr. Frank A. Rose, President of the University of Alabama, former President of Transylvania College, Lexington, Kentucky, and a former minister of a church at Danville, Kentucky, also testified (R. 917) He testified at length as to his conversation with Coach Bryant concerning the charges against Coach Bryant as related in petitioner's article and explained the contents of a letter he wrote Dr. O. C. Aderhold of the University of Georgia concerning this matter,[7] as well as his lack of knowledge of the technicalities of present day football (R. 922) which resulted in his misuse of certain terminology in this letter. (R. 924-26, 932-34) Dr. Rose also testified that Coach Bryant had told him (when Coach Bryant was asked whether what Coach Butts had told him about rule interpretations, or anything else that was said, could have affected the outcome of the game) that "he received no specific information or any specific knowledge that would affect the score or the outcome of the ball game between the University of Alabama and the University of Georgia," (R. 926) and that the same information had been given to a meeting of coaches of the Southeastern Conference by Coach Butts when he spoke to them. (R. 926-27)

---

[7]Petitioner (Brief, pp. 22-23) attempts to lead the Court to believe that in investigating and writing the story it relied on Dr. Rose's March 6 letter to Dr. Aderhold. The fact is that petitioner was not aware of the letter until long after it published the article. (See R. 855-56)

In addition to those heretofore mentioned, other direct quotations used in the article were denied under oath by the parties alleged to have been quoted:

(1) Graham wrote that Burnett had told him that Georgia quarterback Larry Rakestraw placed his feet in a certain position while on offense, thereby tipping off the defensive team as to whether the Georgia play would be a run or a pass. (This, would have been vital information for an opponent (R. 266), as petitioner was aware. (R. 776)) But Burnett denied under oath that he had told Graham any such thing. (R. 175) Georgia's head coach, Johnny Griffith, who was in a better position than anyone else to know whether in fact Rakestraw did this with his feet, testified that it was not true. (R. 266)

(2) Sam Richwine, the Georgia trainer, specifically and categorically denied the quotation in the article attributed to him to the effect that Alabama knew Georgia's plays. (R. 570)

(3) In its article petitioner wrote that Georgia Coach Griffith had stated: "We knew somebody had given our plays to Alabama . . . and maybe to a couple of other teams we played too. But we had no idea that it was Wally Butts." Coach Griffith testified emphatically that he had said no such thing. (R. 268-69)

(4) The article states that "Griffith went to University officials, told them what he knew and said that he would resign if Butts was permitted to remain on his job." Coach Griffith categorically denied having done or said that. (R. 269)

(5) The article quotes Coach Griffith as saying, "You know, during the first half of the Alabama game my players kept coming to the sideline and saying, 'Coach, we been sold out.' " Coach Griffith at the trial denied that. (R. 269)

(6) The article attributes the following direct quotation to Coach Griffith: " 'I never had a chance did I?' Coach Johnny Griffith said bitterly to a friend the other day. 'I never had a chance.' " Coach Griffith denied under oath having said that to anybody. (R. 270)

Petitioner called several witnesses from the University of Georgia in an effort to impeach the testimony of respondent. Petitioner had admitted in its pleadings in this case that respondent enjoyed a national reputation (R. 19-21) in his chosen profession before the article was published, and thereafter petitioner admitted that respondent's reputation would be ruined as the result of its article. (R. 693-94, 770) In short, petitioner had accomplished what it set out to do.

Curtis' Post-Trial Motions

Following the two week trial and the jury's verdict of $3,060,000 for respondent on August 20, 1963 (reduced by remittur to $460,000), Curtis, having failed in its trial strategy of relying on its sole defense of proving the truth of the article, embarked upon a series of post-trial motions. It filed a motion for new trial (R. 36) and a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict (R. 67) on August 29, a motion for new trial based on newly discovered evidence on February 28, 1964 (R. 1090), and finally an extraordinary motion for new trial on March 23, 1964. Certain First, Fifth, and Fourteenth Amendment claims were raised in the August 29, 1963, motion for new trial. (R. 36-38) The First Amendment claim now insisted on was raised in the March 23, 1964, extraordinary motion. (R. 1115)

To the new evidence motion respondent filed a response stating in part: (R. 1113)

> "[The] purported significance attached by defendant to this so-called 'recently discovered evidence' cannot be reconciled with defendant's action in paying Paul Bryant $300,000, tax free, to dismiss his libel suit growing out of this identical Saturday Evening Post article when at that very time defendant had all of this 'recently discovered evidence' in its possession."

In overruling Curtis' motions for new trial the District Court gave its appraisal of the evidence and stated in part as follows:

> "The article charged Butts with being corrupt and with betraying his players, and that the players were forced into the game like 'rats in a maze' and 'took a frightful physical beating'. The article charged, in an italicized editorial, Butts, along with Coach Bryant, with being a participant in the greatest and most shocking sports scandal since that of the Chicago White Sox in the 1919 World Series. In the same editorial Butts was relegated to a status worse than that of 'disreputable gamblers', and a corrupt person who, employed to 'educate and guide the young men', betrays or sells out his pupils." (225 F. Supp. at 917)

"Curtis Publishing Company based its defense on certain notes taken by one George Burnett who made such notes to a telephone conversation alleged to have been overhead between Coach Bear Bryant, of the University of Alabama, and Butts, as Athletic Director of the University of Georgia, on a morning in September, a few days prior to the Alabama-Georgia game. By some mechanical defect, Burnett was connected by telephone to the conversation. These rough notes were kept by Burnett and revealed to Head Coach Johnny Griffith, of the University of Georgia, in late December, 1962, or early January, 1963. Curtis paid Burnett consideration for the story after the same was brought to its attention by Curtis' Birmingham, Alabama lawyers, who were defending Curtis in a libel suit brought by Coach Bryant because of another article in the Saturday Evening Post.

"The evidence presented showed that Frank Graham, Jr., the author of the article, and Davis Thomas, Senior Editor of the Saturday Evening Post, knew that Burnett had been convicted of 'bad check writing.' No representative of the Post looked at the notes before the article was published. According to Coach Griffith of Georgia, defendant's witness, 'a good number of Burnett's notes were incorrect and didn't even apply to anything Georgia had.' No effort was made by the Post to view the actual game film, although the Sports Editor of the Post, one Roger Kahn, considered that necessary." (255 F. Supp. at 918)

"The article was clearly defamatory and extremely so. The Saturday Evening Post had a circulation in excess of 6 million copies per issue. It claims readers of 22 million. Butts was unquestionably one of the leading figures in the national football picture. The jury was warranted in concluding from the foregoing incidents and the persistent and continuing attitude of the officers and agents of the defendant that there was a wanton or reckless indifference of plaintiff's rights. The guilt of the defendant was so clearly established by the evidence in the case so as to have left the jury no choice but to find the defendant liable." (225 F. Supp. at 919)

The Court of Appeals Approved The District Court's Appraisal Of The Evidence

In affirming the trial court on Curtis' appeal, the Court of Appeals stated:

"This is no ordinary libel case. The publication of the article by the Post, in the face of several specific appeals that it refrain from doing so, was part and parcel of a general policy of callousness, which recognized from the start that Butts' career would be ruined. The trial judge's appraisal of the evidence, with which we are in complete accord, was that it was sufficiently strong to justify the jury in concluding that what the Post did was done with reckless disregard of whether the article was false or not.

"The case was fully developed during extensive pre-trials, and in a jury trial lasting two weeks. The record itself comprises 1613 pages. We have given full consideration to the entire record, as well as to the more than 650 pages of briefs submitted by both parties, the numerous authorities cited therein, and the oral arguments of counsel. We think that Curtis has had its day in court. It apparently thought so too until the jury verdict was returned. This is attested by the fact that practically all of its present complaints were not even raised until after the trial.

"Believing and so finding that the trial was fair, and that the judgment of the trial court was correct and proper in all respects, it is Affirmed." (351 F. 2d at 719-20) (Emphasis added)

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

I.

Under the facts of this case, petitioner waived the right to challenge the verdict and judgment on any of the constitutional grounds now asserted by electing not to urge any constitutional grounds of defense before or during the long and expensive trial.

That Curtis knew of the constitutional defenses and intentionally omitted them in this case as a part of its deliberate timed strategy is established by (1) the fact that its general counsel—who also appeared in this case—urged these defenses in the two companion libel suits pending against it in Alabama, (2) the fact that it pleaded the "public man" defense in the Alabama cases but omitted it in this case, although it is plainly provided for under Georgia law (Ga. Code Ann. 105-709(6)), (3) the intimate knowledge of its Alabama counsel of the proceedings in the Times case by virtue of their representation of the New York Times Company, and (4) its failure to object to the charge as required by Fed. R. Civ. P. 51.

Respondent suggests that the reason for their trial strategy is that Curtis hoped to get a favorable decision in Georgia which would discredit Bryant or realized it must establish the truth of its career-destroying charges or have its own reputation impaired or simply wanted the important right to open and conclude the arguments to the jury.

The Court of Appeals was correct in holding that Curtis obviously decided to rely solely on its plea of truth in this case for its own reasons of trial strategy and thereby waived its right to raise additional defenses on appeal. Yakus v. U.S., 321 U.S. 414, 444 (1944); U.S. v. Sorrentino, 175 F. 2d 721 (3rd Cir. 1949), cert. den., 338 U.S. 868 (1949); Ackermann v. U.S., 340 U.S. 193 (1950). The limitations expressed in Times were not new and a like rule had existed for many years in federal and state courts in cases involving public officials.

The cases cited by petitioner are inapposite here. Petitioner is not entitled to be relieved of its deliberate decision omitting all constitutional defenses and to subject respondent to the time and expense of a new trial. Curtis has had its day in court.

II.

Assuming the constitutional defenses were not waived, New York Times should not be used as a basis for reversal in view of the facts of this case.

The trial court correctly held that respondent was not a public official within the meaning of Times, but rather was an employee of a separate business entity. Therefore, Times could in no event be applicable.

The subject of the libelous article was not a "public issue" so as to justify its false treatment. One may not escape responsibility for that which he publishes by creating the "public issue" upon which he comments.

In this case, as distinguished from the Times case, there was overwhelming proof of actual malice. The evidence established that Curtis had deliberately chosen a policy of "sophisticated muckraking," of "provoking people, making them mad," and measured its success by the number of libel suits against it. It intentionally ignored warnings received well in advance of publication that the story was false and made no effort to check the truth of the information it had obtained.

It would be useless to require another trial in view of the overwhelming evidence of malice, this Court having held that if actual malice is proven, a libeller ceases to enjoy constitutional protection.

The trial court's charge in respect to malice was adequate and met the standards set out in Times. No objections were made by Curtis to the court's charge in respect to malice as required by Fed. R. Civ. P. 51.

Even if Times is held applicable, the facts fully warrant the refusal by this Court to give it retroactive application in this case.

III.

Under the facts of this case the amount of punitive damages did not constitute an abridgment of freedom of the press or the taking of property without due process of law. Curtis carelessly published the sensational article here involved, knowing it would ruin respondent. Whether it did so for the purpose of discrediting Bryant or to improve its circulation, or both, is unimportant. If for the former reason alone, it is clearly not entitled to protection. If it were done for profit, it was a "libeller for profit" and not entitled to the same protection under the Federal Constitution against punitive damages as is the responsibly and objectively informative segment of the press.

Curtis having requested the trial judge, in open court, to reduce the size of the verdict, it cannot complain of the trial judge having done so. Curtis in its desire to profit from libel deliberately sought to squeeze from respondent his "breathing space . . . to survive" and cannot now complain that the $400,000 award of punitive damages deprives it of that "breathing space." Especially is this true considering the fact that prior to any trial Curtis paid Coach Bryant $300,000 for a dismissal of his companion suit. There is no law in Georgia or enunciation of the federal courts that requires the existence of any relationship between compensatory and punitive damages, although the ratio here of $60,000-$400,000 is entirely reasonable.

ARGUMENT

I.

UNDER THE FACTS OF THIS CASE, PETITIONER WAIVED THE RIGHT TO CHALLENGE THE VERDICT AND JUDGMENT ON ANY OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL GROUNDS NOW ASSERTED.

In Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 464 (1938) "waiver" was defined as the "intentional relinquishment . . . of a known right or privilege." In determining whether the right is known, the Court expressed the need to examine the "particular facts and circumstances" of the case.

It is elementary that a litigant who claims a constitutional or other right or defense must assert that right or defense at an appropriate time in a litigation in order to rely on it on appeal. It is also elementary that any defense attorney must determine the trial strategy best suited to protect his client's interest, and circumstances may be present which require abandoning an available defense as not fitting in with his over-all plan. Such circumstances were present in this case from the beginning, and petitioner quite deliberately evolved a trial strategy which excluded any number of available defenses (including the constitutional defenses here urged) and depended entirely on the defense of truth or "justification."

That such a trial strategy, excluding constitutional defenses, was evolved and done so knowingly and intentionally within the sense of Zerbst, is the only reasonable conclusion which can be drawn from the following facts:

(1) There were pending against petitioner at the time two libel suits brought by Coach Bryant, one of them arising out of the same Post story. In both of these suits petitioner, through its general counsel who was also leading the defense of the case at bar, had specifically invoked First and Fourteenth Amendment defenses at the initial pleading stage. (App. B) No such defenses were raised in the Butts case.

(2) In both of these Bryant cases petitioner also specifically pleaded the "public man" defense. No such defense was invoked by petitioner here, even though a Georgia statute has for many years provided a privilege, conditioned on the absence of actual malice, to publications commenting "upon the acts of public men in their public capacity. . . ." Ga. Code Ann. 105-709(6) (App. A) This statutory privilege has been construed to grant a complete defense to such publications, even though the publications may have been false. See Pearce v. Brower, 72 Ga. 243 (1884); Wilson v. Sullivan, 81 Ga. 238, 7 S. E. 274 (1888); Augusta Evening News v. Radford, 91 Ga. 494, 17 S. E. 612 (1893).[8]

(3) Petitioner, through its counsel, was fully in-

[8]Petitioner's suggestion (Brief, p. 50 n. 12) that more recent decisions of the Georgia appellate courts require that truth be established in order to take advantage of the privilege ignores the fact that the older decisions of the Georgia Supreme Court control. See, e.g., Cauble v. Weimer, 101 Ga. App. 313, 113 S.E. 2d 641 (1960).

formed of the proceedings in the Times case [illegible] the very beginning of that litigation in the Alaba[illegible]tate courts, including the constitutional defenses [illegible] as the Court of Appeals so graphically related ([illegible] 2d at 709-13).

(4) Petitioner made no objection to the court's charge on any constitutional grounds as required by Fed. R. Civ. P. 51, again demonstrating its intention not to rely on any constitutional defenses.

While Curtis asserts strongly it had no knowledge of any constitutional rights until this Court's decision in Times (March 9, 1964), this is refuted by its first motion for a new trial, filed August 29, 1963 immediately after the trial, in which it claims the verdict for punitive damages could not be sustained without violating the First, Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. (R. 36-38)

It is inconceivable that Curtis and its general counsel should not have kept abreast of the law of libel. Curtis published not only the Post, but other magazines of large nationwide circulation. The Post was embarking on a new campaign to change the magazine's image through "sophisticated muckraking" which already had attracted a number of libel suits against Curtis. That it did keep abreast of the law of libel and was familiar with constitutional grounds is clear from its use of constitutional defenses in the two Bryant suits in Alabama and the constitutional grounds urged in its first motion for a new trial in this case, long before Times. (R. 36-38)

It is up to Curtis to explain why it chose the strategy

it did. However three questions do immediately come to mind:

(1) Was it part and parcel of its strategy to defend the suits brought by Coach Bryant in Alabama with Curtis hoping to get a favorable jury verdict in Georgia, thereby discrediting Bryant?

(2) Having made these charges which it knew would destroy Butts' career, did Curtis decide that the only defense open to it was to seek to establish the truth, this being necessary to preserve its reputation as a national magazine? Any other defense would have indicated to the public that Curtis had no confidence in the charges that it made on the one hand or, having destroyed Butts it would assume the attitude that it could not care less and defend on constitutional grounds.

(3) Was it for the purpose of obtaining the valuable right to open and conclude the arguments to the jury?

This strategy having been unsuccessful, Curtis now asks the Court to give it a second chance or as the District Court called it, "a second bite at the cake."[9] It was against this background that the Court of Appeals held these defenses to have been belatedly raised:

---

[9]During the hearing on the first motion or new trial, petitioner's counsel offered a unique thesis which was characterized by the trial judge as the "two bites at the cake" theory. Bite one comes when the "error" is made; counsel for the aggrieved party may object and either have the error corrected or the record perfected. But if he feels that his client is sure to win the jury verdict, he will consciously fail to object. If he loses this gamble, i.e., if his client loses the jury verdict, he may nevertheless have bite two by convincing a federal appellate court that it should grant a new trial in the face of counsel's conscious decision not to object to the "error." Transcript of Proceedings, Hearing on First Motion for New Trial, Dec. 10, 1963, p. 17-18: ("MR. CODY: 'You never can tell how it affects — you can't tell how it affects the trial of a case until it

"We think that Curtis has had its day in Court. It apparently thought so too until the jury verdict was returned." 351 F. 2d at 720. (Emphasis added)

The Court of Appeals in the second of its two opinions, after considering the affidavits filed in support of the petition for rehearing and the questions of law involved, reached the following conclusion relative to petitioner's choice of trial strategy (351 F. 2d at 735):

> "Whatever may have been the reasons for invoking the First Amendment claim in the Alabama suits while remaining silent in Georgia, Curtis cannot sustain the proposition that it was unaware that a defendant in a libel action might assert the constitutional claim as a defense. Counsel for Butts make a persuasive suggestion that Curtis elected to defend this case on its plea of justification, rather than raise the jurisdictional, constitutional and other affirmative defenses[6] it had raised in the Alabama Bryant cases, in order to get the right to open and close the arguments."

"[6]These would include the conditional privilege recognized by § 105-709 (6) of the Georgia Code concerning published statements relating to the 'acts of public men in their public capacity.' See Note 20, 376 U.S. 254 at 280. . . ."

---

is over, and the —.' THE COURT: 'Well, under that theory, you get two bites at the cake.' MR. CODY: 'That's possible; that is exactly what the courts have said.'"). It is submitted that this manipulation of the spirit of federal procedure should not be sanctioned. A successful party to a verdict should not have to be the loser in the other party's wager with the jury and courts.

The doctrine of waiver, as applicable to the facts of this case, is classically stated by this Court in Yakus v. U.S., 321 U.S. 414, 444 (1944) as follows:

> "No procedural principle is more familiar to this Court than that a constitutional right may be forfeited in criminal as well as civil cases by the failure to make timely assertion of the right before a tribunal having jurisdiction to determine it. [Citing cases]. Courts may for that reason refuse to consider a constitutional objection even though a like objection had previously been sustained in a case in which it was properly taken. [Citing cases]."

Eleven years later this Court reaffirmed its ruling in Yakus and found waiver of a constitutional right in a case involving capital punishment. Michel v. Louisiana, 350 U.S. 91, 99 (1955)

The waiver cases cited by petitioner are distinguishable because here petitioner deliberately chose, as a matter of strategy, to waive the constitutional grounds asserted in Times. Courts have long recognized that counsel may choose not to use certain defenses for strategic purposes and such choice will amount to an intentional relinquishment of a known right. U. S. V. Sorrentino, 175 F. 2d 721 (3rd Cir. 1949), cert. den., 338 U.S. 868 (1949).

In Ackermann v. U.S., 340 U.S. 193, 198 (1950), the Court held:

> "His choice was a risk, but calculated and deliberate and such as follows a free choice.

> Petitioner cannot be relieved of such a choice because hindsight seems to indicate to him that his decision . . . was probably wrong, considering the outcome of the Keilbar Case. There must be an end to litigation someday, and free, calculated, deliberate choices are not to be relieved from." (Emphasis added)

It is of further interest to note that even Judge Rives, who dissented from the decision of the Court of Appeals relative to waiver, felt that the issue of waiver was a "debatable" one. (351 F. 2d at 726). Respondent respectfully submits that issue should be here decided in his favor as it was below.

Quite apart from the specific facts found by the Court of Appeals to constitute waiver in this case, we submit that defense counsel in any other libel case tried prior to Times would have had every reason and opportunity to include the constitutional claim in his defense if he had chosen. An analysis of Times, in proper historical context, shows that it made no fundamental change of law but merely gave sanction to a long-standing rule of state law and federal constitutional law as enunciated by courts and supported by scholars.

The Times case did not create the First Amendment. In that decision, this Court emphasized that the "general proposition that freedom of expression upon public questions is secured by the First Amendment has long been settled by our decisions." 376 U.S. at 269.

This Court held in a libel case over fifty years ago that since the plaintiff was a "public officer [U.S. Attorney] in whose course of action connected with his office the citizens of Porto Rico had a serious interest . . ., anything bearing on such action was a legitimate subject and comment . . . at least in the absence of express malice. . . ." Gandia v. Pettingill, 222 U.S. 452, 457 (1912). Gandia stands for the proposition that a qualified privilege has long existed under federal law in libel cases where the plaintiff is a "public official."

The identical constitutional issue now insisted on was raised twenty-six years ago in Sweeney v. Schenectady Union Pub. Co., 122 F. 2d 288 (2nd Cir. 1941), aff'd by equally divided Court, 316 U.S. 642 (1942). Twenty years ago the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals applied this specific defense in Caldwell v. Crowell-Collier Pub. Co., 161 F. 2d 333, 336 (5th Cir. 1947). The argument offered by counsel for that defendant (Crowell-Collier) was that since the publication in question "related to a public officer," it was privileged. The Court of Appeals apparently accepted this contention as a sound statement of law, holding that the privilege had been avoided by an allegation in the complaint that the publisher was guilty of "malice in fact."

An indication of what was to come in Times is found in Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U.S. 642 (1952). In upholding a group libel statute, Mr. Justice Frankfurter, speaking for the Court, stated that he was not dealing with a statute outlawing defamation of political parties. He noted that quite different problems would be raised by such a statute because "political parties, like public men, are, as it were, public property." (Emphasis added) Id. at 263 n. 18.

This Court in Times recognized that a "like rule" has existed for many years in state courts. It stated at page 280, "an oft-cited statement of a like rule, which has been adopted by a number of state courts, is found in the Kansas case of Coleman v. MacLennan, 78 Kan. 711, 98 P. 281 (1908)." In a footnote at that point in its decision this Court cited eleven decisions from ten different states[10] as well as six scholarly works. The Kansas Supreme Court has since stated that Times requires no change in the law of that state since the principles of Times have long been the law. Kennedy v. Mid-Continent Telecasting, Inc., 394 P. 2d 400 (Kan. 1964).

It is obvious from Times itself, Gandia, Sweeney, Caldwell, Coleman, the Georgia statute and cases, and the decisions from ten different states cited in the footnote at page 280 of this Court's decision in Times, as well as the six scholarly works there cited, that the defenses there discussed have long been recognized as being available to a defendant in a libel suit.

The decisions cited by petitioner for the proposition that this Court may apply any fundamental change in the law pending appeal are inapposite here. Those cases involve the effect of an intervening treaty in U.S. v. The Schooner Peggy, 1 Cranch 103 (1801); applicability of state law under the rules of decision statute in Vandenbark v. Owen-Illinois Glass Co., 311 U.S. 538 (1941); enactment of the Eighteenth Amendment repealing prohibition in U.S. v. Chambers, 291 U.S. 217 (1934); enactment of a statute in U.S. v. Alabama, 362 U.S. 602 (1960); enactment of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 in Hamm v. Rock Hill, 379 U.S. 306 (1964). We are not here concerned with such a change in the law; Times v. Sullivan merely gave renewed constitutional sanction to a long recognized legal principle.

---

[10] A complete assemblage of authorities, it is submitted, would have included the Georgia statute and decisions on the "public man" defense.

In addition, we submit that it is one thing to say that a change in the law may be taken advantage of by a litigant into whose chosen theory of the case the change fits without disrupting the premises of the litigation, but an entirely different thing to allow a litigant to try his case on one studied theory and then on appeal abandon this theory (or theories) and attempt to get a second chance at the jury on a quite different theory made available (or simply discovered by counsel) in the interim. There must be an end to litigation, and none of the cases cited by petitioner proposes that a litigant be allowed to proceed through pleading and the trial as many times as he chooses or as there may be innovations—real or supposed—in the body of all law. We cannot imagine this Court encouraging any such notion of piecemeal, hindsight litigation, yet it is precisely this that is being urged by petitioner and upon which its entire case stands.

We submit that petitioner should not now be relieved of its deliberate decision not to invoke any constitutional defenses.

II.

ASSUMING THE CONSTITUTIONAL DEFENSES WERE NOT WAIVED, NEW YORK TIMES V. SULLIVAN SHOULD NOT BE USED AS A BASIS FOR REVERSAL IN VIEW OF THE FACTS OF THIS CASE.

In Georgia, civil libel is a false and malicious defamation in print which exposes the victim to public hatred, contempt or ridicule and which tends to injure him in his reputation. (Ga. Code Ann. § 105-701. See App. A) In finding for respondent in this case, the jury found the charges against him in petitioner's magazine article to be false. That these charges injured respondent's reputation and exposed him to public hatred, contempt and ridicule is beyond doubt.

Since this case was tried before a jury in August 1963, ending in a verdict and judgment in favor of respondent, this Court has handed down several decisions interpreting the constitutional right of free speech and free press in the area of libel and, in one instance, the right-of-privacy. These are New York Times Company v. Sullivan (March 9, 1964); Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64 (November 23, 1964); Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75 (February 21, 1966); and Time, Inc. v. Hill, No. 22, October Term 1966 (January 9, 1967).

In these cases (the first three of which petitioner relies upon) the Court has discussed the question of limitations imposed by the free speech guarantees of the First Amendment at some length, viz., fifteen opinions covering approximately 145 pages. We submit that there is a wide divergence between the factual situations in those cases and the one now under consideration.

The opinions of the Court in those cases emphasize the necessity for freedom of discussion where public issues are involved, saying that the press must have "breathing space" in order to survive and that the First Amendment embodies "a profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open, and that it may well include vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials." 376 U.S. at 270.

In Times the plaintiff claimed to have been libeled in an advertisement appearing in a Sunday edition of the paper published by that company. A judgment was recovered in favor of the plaintiff. This Court reversed that judgment, holding that a state's power to award damages for libel in actions brought by public officials against critics of their official conduct is limited by the First Amendment and that factual error or content defamatory of an official's reputation, or both, are insufficient to support an award of damages for false statements unless actual malice, that is, knowledge that the statements were false or made in reckless disregard of their truth or falsity, is proved. The Court went on to hold that the case was not submitted to the jury under these restrictions and therefore the verdict and judgment offended the First Amendment.

The facts in the Times case more resemble those in the Rosenblatt case than those in the one under review. In both cases the plaintiffs had considerable difficulty in proving that the publications referred to them at all, for they were not named. Neither publication was a conscious destruction of the plaintiff's career, acknowledged to be "his death in his chosen profession," as in this case. The plaintiff in Times was the Commissioner of Public Affairs of Montgomery, Alabama, elected by the people and very properly classified as a public official, whereas the plaintiff in this case was an athletic director.

The Garrison case involved a conviction for criminal defamation, under Louisiana statutes, of a district attorney who criticized the judicial conduct of eight judges of the criminal district court. The Court held that the restrictions on state power as to civil libel statutes set out in Times also limit state power to impose criminal sanctions for criticism of the official conduct of these public officials.

In Garrison the Court commented on the use of calculated falsehood (and this is quoted by Mr. Justice Brennan in Time, Inc. v. Hill) as follows:

> "The use of the calculated falsehood . . . would put a different cast on the constitutional question. Although honest utterance, even if inaccurate, may further the fruitful exercise of the right of free speech, it does not follow that the lie, knowingly and deliberately published . . . should enjoy a like immunity. . . . For the use of the known lie as a tool is at once at odds with premises of democratic government and with the orderly manner in which economic, social, or political change is to be effected. Calculated falsehood falls into that class of utterances which 'are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality. . . .' Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568, 572. Hence, the knowingly false statement and the false statement made with reckless disregard of the truth, do not enjoy constitutional protection." 379 U.S. at 75.

One important factor involved in the Garrison case was that the Louisiana statute authorized recovery where the remarks were true but uttered with actual malice. This was held unconstitutional, and this point is not present in the instant case.

The Rosenblatt case involved charges made against a former supervisor of a county recreation area which —he claimed—referred to him and constituted libel. The Court reversed the verdict and judgment and sent the case back for retrial, directing the trial court first to determine whether plaintiff Baer was a public official within the meaning of Times, and if it found that he was, to charge the jury in terms of the actual malice of Times.

In Rosenblatt there had been no finding by the trial court of whether Baer was such a public official. But in the case at bar, at the instance of petitioner's third motion for new trial (R. 1115), the trial court specifically found that respondent Butts was not a public official. 242 F. Supp. at 393-95. This is a compelling difference between the present case and Rosenblatt. In addition, unlike Rosenblatt, no existing "public issue" was being commented on in the libelous publication here, since there was at that time no suggestion about any corrupt dealings between Butts and Bryant. We submit that a publisher should not be allowed to escape liability by creating a public issue through the use of untrue statements and then to comment on that issue with impunity. Petitioner had itself created the issue here, and it is only logical to conclude that its purpose (aside from using a sensational story to sell more copies of its magazine) was to thwart Coach Bryant in his effort to obtain redress against petitioner for prior articles. The charges made by petitioner cannot properly be described as a debate of a governmental operation or an attack on a public official entitled to special protection by our Constitution.

Time, Inc. v. Hill did not involve libel but an action under the New York right-of-privacy statute. The Court held that the limitations set out in Times are applicable to certain cases arising under the New York statute even where the plaintiff is not a public official. It expressly disclaimed that its ruling should be taken as applying to libel cases, such as the one at bar.

This brings us to the specific questions here involved.

1. Was respondent a public official within the concept of Times?

2. If Times applies, does not the undisputed evidence show that actual malice was proved?

3. If the facts of the case fall within the purview of Times, was the jury charge insufficient in the light of that decision?

4. Under the facts of this case, should Times be applied retroactively to it?

1.

Was Respondent A Public Official Within The Concept Of The Times Case?

Petitioner argues that respondent must be regarded as a "public official" under the criteria laid down in Rosenblatt. Petitioner recognizes that this Court did not definitely hold that the constitutional standard of proof must apply if the publication in that case involved implied dishonesty in the financial management of the Belknap County Recreation Area, but argues that the Court's disposition of that case suggests that this must be so. Petitioner presents a lengthy argument in an effort to sustain its contentions and then goes on to assert that, in view of the conclusion for which it argues, the respondent here must have been a "public official" and the constitutional privilege of necessity has application in this case.

In Rosenblatt, this Court sent the case back with instructions that upon retrial the trial court should first determine if Baer was a "public official" to whom the constitutional privilege applied. In this case, the trial court has considered this particular question on petitioner's third motion for a new trial (R. 1115) and determined that respondent was not such a public official. As the District Court held on this point:

> "Plaintiff Butts was Director of Athletics at the University. The Athletic Director, along with the various coaches in the Athletic Department, were employed by the separate incorporated athletic associations. However, the defendant seeks by this motion to extend the category of 'public officials' to one employed as agent by the University of Georgia Athletic Department. Even if plaintiff was a professor or instructor at the University, and not an agent of a separate governmental corporation carrying on 'a business comparable in all essentials to those usually conducted by private owners'

> he would not be a public official or officer. Under Georgia law, the position of a teacher or instructor in a State or public educational institution is not that of a public officer or official, but he is merely an employee thereof. Regents of the University System of Georgia v. Blanton, 49 Ga. App. 602(4), 176 S.E. 673; Board of Education of Doerun v. Bacon, 22 Ga. App. 62, 95 S.E. 753." 242 F. Supp. at 394.

Thus the question has already been determined and, we submit, correctly so. Respondent was employed by the Athletic Association (a separate, non-governmental entity, Ga. Code Ann. §§32-152, 32-153) to supervise the sports program of the University of Georgia. This Court described the supervision of that program as the exercise of a proprietary rather than a governmental function. It held in Allen v. Regents of University System of Georgia, 304 U.S. 439, 452 (1938):

> "The important fact is that the State, in order to raise funds for public purposes, has embarked in a business having the incidents of similar enterprises usually prosecuted for private gain . . .
>
> ". . . however essential a system of public education to the existence of the State, the conduct of exhibitions for admissions paid by the public is not such a function of state government as to be free from the burden of a . . . tax laid on . . . admissions . . ."

Since, therefore, respondent was not a "public official" as envisioned by Times (and this has been judicially determined by the trial court), this action is based upon a purely private defamation. And, as noted in the concurring opinion of Justices Goldberg and Douglas, the Times holding does not apply to libel of private individuals (376 U.S. at 301-02):

> "Purely private defamation has little to do with the political ends of a self-governing society. The imposition of liability for private defamation does not abridge the freedom of public speech. . . ."

If there is no limit to the concept of public official as used in Times, there seems no reason to be concerned with such a question and this Court may as well hold that the constitutional privilege announced in Times is applicable to all suits for libel under state defamation laws, regardless of the status of the plaintiffs. We submit this Court has not gone so far and we cannot envision it doing so.

In an attempt to avoid the facts as to respondent's status and the holding of the trial court on this point, petitioner asks the Court to extend the Times rule to situations where a "public issue" is involved. Petitioner argues that college football is of such importance that anything connected with it must be classified as a "public issue", as to which the discussion and debate "should be uninhibited, robust and wide-open."

We do not deny that college football is of interest to a great many people. In fact, we would assume that in selecting the material for its magazines—as a purely commercial decision—petitioner would endeavor to select only that which it thinks would be of "public interest", either before the article is published or as a result of it being published. But we do not believe that this Court has elevated to a position of constitutional sanctuary every subject which "sells" magazines.

The absurdity of petitioner's argument in the context of this specific publication is apparent. There was, for example, no discussion of the role of football in college life, whether good or bad, no discussion of the question of its importance or over-emphasis. The article was a plain, unadulterated attack on the integrity of two individuals, Butts and Bryant. (We have already indicated as a probable reason for petitioner's enthusiasm in publishing the story its existing legal troubles with Bryant.) We do not believe that the Constitution guarantees the right to make false accusations and then to escape responsibility by asserting that the general public is interested in college football.

At any rate, there was no "public issue", even of the kind petitioner suggests, until this story was published. Yet, while Curtis' editors charged respondent with giving to Coach Bryant "Georgia's plays, defensive patterns, all the significant secrets Georgia's football team possessed," now petitioner unabashedly concedes (Brief, p. 27):

> "There was no evidence, however, that related Alabama's strategy or performance in the game to specific information in the Burnett notes and there was some to the effect that Alabama did not take advantage in its play of points that the notes revealed."

The only "public issue" in this case was the validity of the charges made in the article itself, and that "issue" was put to rest five months later when the jury returned its verdict.

2.

The Undisputed Evidence Shows Conclusively That Actual Malice Was Proved

Even if it should be held that respondent was a "public official" or that college football is a "public issue" and that the Times rule should be extended so as to apply here, we submit that its application would immediately terminate when the evidence is reviewed. Petitioner argues illogically that the fact that "actual malice within New York Times was conclusively proven is . . . legally immaterial." (Brief, p. 42, 65). But this Court obviously disagrees when it emphatically states, as it did in Garrison:

> "the knowingly false statement and the false statement made with reckless disregard of the truth, do not enjoy constitutional protection." (379 U.S. 175) (Emphasis added)

We say, therefore, that if actual malice was proven (as it was) the case should end since the article would "not enjoy constitutional protection."

We invite the Court's attention to the fact that the District Court and the Court of Appeals have reviewed the evidence and have each concluded that the article was published at least with a reckless disregard of the truth."[11] We feel that these concurrent findings of fact by two courts below should bring this case within the "two-court" rule discussed in Berenyi v. Immigration Service, No. 66, October Term 1966 (January 23, 1967) that:

> "This Court . . . 'cannot undertake to review concurrent findings of fact by two courts below in the absence of a very obvious and exceptional showing of error.' E.g., Graver Tank & Mfg. Co. v. Linde Air Products Co., 336 U.S. 271, 275. . . .
>
> "The policy underlying the 'two-court' rule is obvious. This Court possesses no empirical expertise to set against the careful and reasonable conclusions of lower courts on purely factual issues. When, as here, resolution of the disputed factual issues turns largely on an assessment of the relative credibility of witnesses whose testimonial demeanor was observed only by the trial court, the rule has particular force."

Both courts below found that the article was libelous per se under state law. This Court will not set aside [11] "In the trial of this case, there was ample evidence from which a jury could have concluded that there was a reckless disregard by defendant of whether the article was false or not. See the court's ruling on defendant's motion for a new trial dated January 14, 1964. Butts v. Curtis Publishing Co., 225 F. Supp. 916." 242 F. Supp. at 395. "The trial judge's appraisal of the evidence, with which we are in complete accord, was that it was sufficiently strong to justify the jury in concluding that what the Post did was done with reckless disregard of whether the article was false or not." 351 F. 2d at 719-20.

---

the ruling of lower federal courts applying state law in diversity suits except on a plain showing of error. Palmer v. Hoffman, 318 U.S. 109 (1943). On the issue of truth, the jury found for the respondent. This is a traditional element of the state right, in no way changed by the Times decision. Since truth was properly put to the jury as an absolute defense this Court will not determine that fact, for an evidentiary basis is apparent in the record. Lavender v. Kurn, 327 U.S. 645 (1946); Atlantic & Gulf Stevedores, Inc. v. Ellerman Lines, Ltd., 369 U.S. 355 (1962).

On the other hand, should the Court feel it necessary "to undertake independent examination of factual issues when constitutional claims may depend on their resolution" and review the evidence in this case, we respectfully offer the following in support of our contention that actual malice was proved:

(1) Curtis was informed of the falsity of the story eleven days prior to publication of the story as a result of the telegram, letter, and telephone call. (R. 16-17, 20, 717-18, 777-78).

(2) Although there was adequate time in which to do so, no investigation or any other action was carried out as a result of these communications. (R. 717-18, 777-78).

(3) Prior to the publication of the story, Curtis' advertising revenues had been falling drastically. (R. 707-08). In order to bolster these revenues Editor-in-Chief Blair undertook four months before publication of this story to "change the image" of the magazine. (R. 711). He initiated a policy of "sophisticated muck-raking," of "expose in the mass magazines." (R. 712-14). The new image was intended "to provoke people, make them mad." (R. 714-15). Blair testified that he "was not being facetious," that he "meant it then [November 1962]" and "mean[s] it now [May 1963]." (R. 710-11).

(4) Only two months prior to publication of this story, Curtis' Blair wrote a memorandum to his personnel complimenting them on their work under the new editorial policy and outlining "the final yardstick: we have about six lawsuits pending, meaning that we are hitting them where it hurts, with solid, meaningful journalism." (R. 1040). Blair later testified that the "them" who were being hit was everyone in the United States and that the law suits were all libel suits. (R. 708-10).

(5) Editor Blair later considered the Butts issue as bringing the magazine "25 per cent toward the goal of the magazine that I envision." (R. 711).

(6) The sole source of the story was one George Burnett, a man known to Graham from the beginning as a bad-check artist. (R. 689-92). Managing Editor Thomas, who also knew of Burnett's bad-check record, considered such a person to be a liar. (R. 771-72).

(7) Neither author Graham nor anyone else with Curtis made any attempt to talk to John Carmichael, who was known to Graham to have been with Burnett when the latter allegedly overheard the telephone conversation. (R. 378-79, 771-72). By performing this easy task, Graham would have learned at the outset that the whole story was a fabrication. (See R. 636-44). Managing Editor Thomas admitted that "a responsible journalist" should rely on something more than the mere word of Burnett. (R. 772).

(8) Although the story as written relied heavily on the supposed existence and contents of some notes which Burnett allegedly made of the telephone conversation, no Curtis representative ever saw or read the notes (R. 772-73), notwithstanding the fact that Burnett told Graham that he needed the notes to refresh his memory (R. 154) and that he "couldn't remember anything definite about it . . . without his notes." (R. 390). When the notes were finally analyzed, they turned out to be largely nonsensical. (See R. 281).

(9) Before publishing the story, Curtis made no effort to view the game film, although Sports Editor Kahn considered that to be necessary (R. 736) and the collaborator, Furman Bisher, thought "it would have been a very good idea." (R. 779).

(10) No effort was made to interview any member or coach of the Alabama team in order to determine whether any changes had been made in the game plans. (R. 779).

(11) The patently outrageous story was never submitted to anyone familiar with the sport of football in order to get a knowledgeable reaction.

(12) Neither principal mentioned in the story was ever contacted before publication.

(13) After such a shockingly shoddy "investigation", Curtis published the story with full knowledge that it would ruin the career of Wallace Butts and would result in "the death of Wally Butts in his chosen profession." (R. 693).

(14) Furthermore, certain direct quotations which were inserted in the article for the sole purpose of lending truth to the charges were denied under oath by the parties alleged to have been quoted.

(a) Graham wrote that Burnett had told him that Georgia quarterback Rakestraw placed his feet in a certain position while on offense, thereby tipping off the defensive team as to whether the forthcoming Georgia play would be a run or a pass. (This, of course, would have been vital information for an opponent. (R. 266)) Petitioner was aware of the importance of this information and put it in its article to convince the readers of the truth of its indictment of Wallace Butts. (R. 776). But Burnett denied under oath that he had told Graham any such thing. (R. 175). Georgia's head coach, Johnny Griffith, a witness for petitioner, who was in a better position than anyone else to know whether in fact Rakestraw did this with his feet, testified that it was not true. (R. 266).

(b) Mickey Babb, University of Georgia all-conference end, specifically denied the quotation in the article attributed to him that the Alabama team knew the Georgia formations and plays. (R. 564). Babb was quoted in the article as saying the Alabama players knew Georgia's key play (described in the article as "eighty-eight pop") and knew when Georgia would use it. Babb testified Georgia had no "eighty-eight pop" play. (R. 564). This was confirmed by Coach Johnny Griffith. (R. 279).

(c) Sam Richwine, Georgia trainer, specifically and categorically denied the quotation in the article attributed to him to the effect that Alabama knew Georgia's plays. (R. 570).

(d) In its article petitioner wrote that Georgia Coach Griffith had stated: "We knew somebody had given our plays to Alabama . . . and maybe to a couple of other teams we played too. But we had no idea that it was Wally Butts." Coach Griffith, appearing as a witness for petitioner, testified emphatically that he had said no such thing. (R. 268-69).

(e) The article states that "Griffith went to University officials, told them what he knew and said that he would resign if Butts was permitted to remain on his job." At the trial Coach Griffith categorically denied having done or said that. (R. 269).

(f) The article quotes Coach Griffith as saying, "You know, during the first half of the Alabama game my players kept coming to the sideline and saying, 'Coach, we been sold out.'" Coach Griffith at the trial denied that. (R. 269).

(g) The article attributes the following direct quotation to Coach Griffith: "'I never had a chance did I?' Coach Johnny Griffith said bitterly to a friend the other day. 'I never had a chance.'" Coach Griffith denied under oath having said that to anybody. (R. 270)

(15) There was no immediate urgency to put this story on the news stands. The alleged incident occurred six months earlier. Petitioner had an exclusive on the story from Burnett. Publication could have waited until at least the minimum standards of investigation had been met. In view of the gravity of the charges, the harm and the certainty of its occurrence, the standard of recklessness required no less.

That reckless disregard of a much lesser degree than proved here is proscribed was confirmed by the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit in Pape v. Time, Inc., 354 F. 2d 558, 560-61 (1965), cert. den., 384 U.S. 909 (1966), wherein it was stated:

> "As stated in our previous decision— . . . Time took the risk, when it reworded parts of the Commission Report, that it might go too far. . . .' We noted that Time had departed from fidelity to the Commission's Report in order to make the article more interesting and readable for its audience. . . . As we put it (318 F. 2d at page 655)—'It is our opinion that a jury could read the Time article as stating that the Report said Pape and his follow (sic) officers did what the Commission Report merely said the Monroe complaint alleged they did.'

> "We hold that a sufficient showing has been made so that a jury could find Time, Incorporated acted with reckless disregard as to whether or not the reworded statements, hereinbefore described, were true or false."

Respondent submits that since both the District Court and the Court of Appeals have held unequivocally that actual malice was proved in the instant case, nothing would be accomplished by remanding the case for further consideration in light of Times.

3.

If The Facts Of The Case Fall Within The Purview Of Times, Was The Jury Charge Insufficient In The Light Of That Decision?

There is no fatal difference between the definition of malice in Times and that charged by the trial court. The latter, in its charge relative to punitive damages, told the jury (R. 1026):

> "Where it is established that the defendant was inspired by actual malice in the publication of the defamatory matter, the jury, in its discretion, may, but is not required to, award punitive damages. As previously stated to you, actual malice encompasses the notion of ill will, spite, hatred and an intent to injure one. Malice also denotes a wanton or reckless indifference or culpable negligence with regard to the rights of others. . . . The plaintiff charges that the column was written and published both with actual malice and in utter and wanton dis> regard of his rights . . . Whether actual malice or wanton and reckless indifference has been established must be determined from all of the evidence in the case."

In the Times case the Court held that a statement is made with actual malice when it is made "with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not." It did not announie that malice can be established only by proving that the publisher knew without any doubt that the charges it planned to make were false.

Although not in the exact language of the test set forth in Times, certainly it cannot be said that the jury in this case did not get the message expressed in the charge. Lest the Court be concerned about the use of the term "culpable negligence" in the charge, we point out that the concept denoted thereby is one of criminal law, with all of the attendant requisites of conscious conduct and narrowness of meaning. The term means—at the least—reckless or wanton misconduct.[12]

---

[12]See language in Cain v. State, 55 Ga. App. 376, 190 S.E. 371, 374 (1937) that "the words 'criminal negligence' are synonymous with the words 'culpable negligence'. . . Culpable negligence rests on the assumption that he knew the probable consequences but was intentionally, recklessly . . ., or wantonly indifferent to the results."; and see following cases where the term "culpable negligence" is regarded as connoting, at the least, reckless or wanton conduct: State v. Sealy, 253 N.C. 802, 117 S.E. 2d 793 (1961) ("intentional, wilful or wanton"); People v. Carlson, 26 N.Y.S. 2d 1003 (1941) ("wanton disregard"); State v. Schriver, 275 S.W. 2d 304 (Mo. 1955) ("reckless or wanton", "utter indifference"); State v. Tjaden, 69 N.W. 2d 272 (N.D. 1955) ("utter disregard"). It is universally held that "culpable negligence" is quite distinct from the concept of "simple negligence" as is applied in ordinary civil cases (and as was found by the Court in Times to be insufficient.)

In the case now before this Court, considered in its full perspective, we submit even if the exact words used by this Court in Times in defining actual malice had been used, the verdict would have been the same. (As the trial court said: "The guilt of the defendant was so clearly established by the evidence in the case so as to have left the jury no choice but to find the defendant liable." (R. 73)).

A cursory view of the record here will show that respondent's prime contention throughout the trial was that the story was published with no real investigation of its truth prior to publication, thereby demonstrating petitioner's utter disregard for the truth or falsity of its categorical statement of guilt. It will be seen that;

(a) Petitioner refused to interview any member of the Georgia coaching staff — the purported "victims" — to obtain their first-hand impression of the alleged "fix," "rig" and "sell-out." Yet, when questioned, petitioner's witness, Head Coach Griffith, stated that the only benefit Bryant could have obtained from the "information" was a shortening of his practice time; petitioner's witness, Pearce (first assistant coach to Griffith), when questioned, stated that he had seen nothing that related Alabama's strategy or performance in the game to the information in the Burnett notes.

(b) No one familiar with football terminology was consulted to give an interpretation of Burnett's information — this was author Graham's first football story.

(c) As "impartial" field investigators, petitioner hired its own counsel (Beddow) and its co-defendant (Bisher) in the initial Alabama litigation with Bryant.

(d) No effort was made to review the game films which later were viewed by the jury which decided they in no way substantiated the charges.

(e) Petitioner made no effort to determine the truth of the story after being warned that it was untrue before publication.

The above enunciated failures (and many others) of petitioner showing beyond any question that the story was published without any meaningful investigation as to truth or falsity were repeatedly emphasized to the jury by respondent. The jury's action showed that it agreed. The fact that the trial court did not use the exact technical language of Times was not important and would not be important at a retrial. The jury understood the message, just as would any other twelve people who had these inexcusable failures of petitioner impressed upon them every day for over two weeks.

4.

Under The Facts Of This Case, Should Times Be Applied Retroactively To It?

Even if this Court should be of the opinion that if this case had been tried subsequently to the date of the decision in Times the limits expressed in that case would apply to it, the facts here involved nevertheless fully warrant this Court in holding that it will not give retroactive application to Times in this case.

The question of making new constitutional interpretations retroactive has been recently dealt with by this Court in Johnson v. N. J., 384 U.S. 719 (1966). The Court there held that two landmark decisions[13] announcing constitutional rights of persons accused of crime should not be applied retroactively to cases tried before the decision dates, even where appeals were pending on such dates and the judgments had not become final.

In reaching its decision against retrospective application, the Court noted that it had the right to confine rules promulgated concerning constitutional claims to subsequently tried cases " 'where the exigencies of the situation require such an application.' " 384 U.S. at 726-27. Mr. Chief Justice Warren commented, "to reiterate what was said in Linkletter [v. Walker], we do not disparage a constitutional guarantee in any manner by declining to apply it retroactively." 384 U.S. at 728. The Court noted that retroactive application would seriously disrupt the administration of the criminal laws and found no persuasive reason to do so.[14]

In the instant case, a comparable situation is presented, for the case was tried before the Court's decision in Times. The Court noted in both Escobedo and

---

[13] Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964), and Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966).

[14] Other cases of interest on this point are Linkletter v. Walker, 381 U.S. 618 (1965), holding that no distinction is to be drawn between civil and criminal litigation in determining whether a case is to be applied retroactively and that the exclusionary rule in Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961), should not be given retroactive effect; and Tehan v. Shott, 382 U.S. 406 (1966), holding that the doctrine of Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609 (1965), should not be applied retroactively.

Miranda that its decisions had been foreshadowed by earlier cases. This was equally true of its decision in Times, as this Court pointed out in its opinion. There are no special considerations requiring that Times be applied retroactively here. On the contrary, where a person's career has been intentionally destroyed by libel, there is a special consideration that he should not be denied redress as a result of constitutional interpretations made subsequent to the trial, delaying indefinitely any relief he can hope to obtain. If a person convicted of murder prior to Escobedo and Miranda (as in Johnson) may not obtain the benefit of the constitutional right interpreted in those decisions, then we submit petitioner is not entitled to a new trial because of the subsequent decisions.

III.

UNDER THE FACTS OF THIS CASE THE AMOUNT OF PUNITIVE DAMAGES DID NOT CONSTITUTE AN ABRIDGEMENT OF FREEDOM OF THE PRESS OR THE TAKING OF PROPERTY WITHOUT DUE PROCESS OF LAW

Petitioner's third Question Presented (Brief p. 2), to which this section of its brief relates, is specifically framed in terms of "the circumstances" of this case. Applying petitioner's premise of examining this question "in the circumstances" of this case, respondent shows:

First: As stated by the Court of Appeals in its decision:

> "This is no ordinary libel case. A publication of the article by the Post . . . was part and parcel of a general policy of callousness, which recognized from the start that Butts' career would be ruined." (351 F. 2d at p. 719)

Petitioner concedes "arguendo" (p. 72) "that an award of damages imposed as a deterrent to the defendant and to others and 'to protect the community' (R. 1026) is not per se invalid in a civil case."

Examined "in the circumstances" of this case ("petitioner's general policy of callousness") and in light of petitioner's above quoted concession, the judgment for punitive damages ($400,000) is not invalid on any constitutional basis.

Was not the judgment imposed as a valid deterrent to petitioner, deterring it from a repetition of the offense and warning others not to commit a like offense, neither of which purposes petitioner claims to be invalid. The judgment was in no sense to be used as an attempt to regulate publication or to infringe protected freedom of the press.

Was not this judgment for punitive damages also imposed "to protect the community," a purpose which petitioner concedes is not invalid? Is not the community in which this case was tried—and, indeed, the national community—entitled to such protection as hopefully could be obtained by the assessment of the judgment?

Petitioner argues that the verdict here was grossly excessive and "was designed to put defendant out of business." That, respondent says, is pure melodrama and is intended by petitioner to draw the court's attention away from its own defamatory article, "The Story Of A College Football Fix," which was admittedly designed to put respondent out of business. Petitioner admitted (R. 693-94) it "knew when the article was published it would ruin Coach Butts' career." It was also admitted that "when the article was published that was the death of Wally Butts in his chosen profession." (R. 693-94) The article itself stated: "But careers will be ruined that is sure." By admittedly "ruining the career of Wally Butts" and admittedly "killing him in his chosen profession" did not petitioner flagrantly deprive Wally Butts of his property without due process of law in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment?

It strikes respondent that petitioner would urge this Court to substitute the laws of economics in place of "... the Constitution's concern for the essential values represented by 'our respect for the inviolability of the human personality and of the right of each individual "to a private enclave where he may lead a private life. . . ."' That privilege, like the guarantees of the Fourth Amendment, stands as a protection of quite different constitutional values—values reflecting the concern of our society for the right of each individual to be let alone." Tehan v. Shott, 382 U.S. 406, 416 (1966) (Emphasis added).

We recognize the constitutional provisions which guarantee freedom of the press and do not suggest that this right be circumscribed. But freedom of the press does not include a license to publish untruthful and defamatory charges against another who has no means of retaliation except through the processes of the law, the cost of which can be prohibitive. Those who enjoy the freedom of the press must recognize that it includes a corresponding obligation and responsibility to print only that which is true and not that which falsely and maliciously holds individuals up to public hatred, scorn and ridicule.

The most valuable possession of the journalistic profession is unquestionably the constitutional provisions which protect its right to a free press. The most valuable possession of an individual is his good reputation and good character. Loss of career, health, reputation of any man in his declining years cannot be measured by a few dollars—nor in fact by many. The true injury of a libel such as this one is the inescapable legacy of shame falling upon all who follow in blood and name.

> "[A] good name is rather to be chosen than great riches. . . . A good reputation honestly earned is not only one of the most satisfying sources of a man's own contentment, but from a commercial standpoint it is one of the most productive kinds of capital he can possess. Therefore it ought to find guarantees of protection in the fundamental law along with those which guard the liberty of the press, and such is indeed the case." Coleman v. MacLennan, 78 Kan. 711, 721, 98 Pac. 281, 284-85 (1908); See

Clark v. Pearson, 248 F. Supp. 188, 191 (D.D.C. 1965).

As the Court so aptly said in Tehan, quoting Linkletter, "the ruptured privacy . . . cannot be restored." 382 U.S. at 416.

The courts have kept in mind that "a good reputation is one of man's choicest treasures and that its uncompensated loss through false charges should be required only where it is clear that the public good requires this sacrifice." Noel, Defamation of Public Officers and Candidates, 49 Colum. L. Rev. 875, 891 (1949).

The proof in this case conclusively shows that this "Story Of A College Football Fix" was an integral part of the new editorial philosophy adopted by petitioner to ameliorate the dramatic decline in its revenues. Petitioner felt that hitting people "where it hurt" and thereby inviting widely publicized libel suits would inure to its financial advantage. Historically, this type of libeller has been classified as a "libeller for profit." Strickland v. Cox, 101 Ga. 482, 495, 28 S.E. 655 (1897). Certainly this type of libeller is not representative of the "American press" referred to by Mr. Justice Black in Times as being "virile enough to publish unpopular views on public affairs and bold enough to criticize the conduct of public officials." 376 U.S. at 294

It is our position that our Constitution, laws and courts were not and are not designed for the protection of irresponsible libellers who are concerned only with the character assassination of their victims.

Second: Petitioner argues that the jury's verdict was unconstitutional and therefore could not be saved by the remittitur required by the District Court.

To that line of argument the Court of Appeals pointed out (351 F. 2d at 718):

> "Georgia prescribes that '(t)he measure of . . . punitive damages is to be fixed by the enlightened conscience of an impartial jury.' What the 'enlightened conscience' of one impartial jury might consider to be fair may not satisfy another impartial jury with an equally enlightened conscience. A wide variance in the amounts of such awards is inescapably inherent in any submission of the issue of punitive damages. . . .
>
> "The trial judge had the duty of determining whether as a matter of law (a) any allowance for punitive damages could be made, and (b) what the maximum would be. As to, (a) the trial court not only expressed the opinion that the article was extremely defamatory, and that the jury had no choice other than to find Curtis liable, but he also thought that there was 'ample evidence from which a jury could have concluded that there was reckless disregard by defendant of whether the article was false or not.' Upon determining (b) he had then to decide whether to grant a new trial or require a remittitur as to the excess. The latter is a permissible course and does not infringe upon the Seventh Amendment's guaranty of a jury trial. In making his determination as to (b), he pursued the correct standard of keeping the verdict 'within reasonable bounds considering the purpose to be achieved as well as the corporate defendant's wanton or reckless indifference to the plaintiff's rights.' Obviously, in deciding the matter the judge had to pick a dollar figure beyond which the law would not go. He selected the sum of $400,000 as the maximum which the law would accept to deter Curtis from repeating the trespass or to compensate the wounded feelings of Butts. Although the reduction required, and the sum remaining, were each substantial, there was ample basis for the trial court's judgment."

Petitioner argues further that the remittitur required by the District Court was "inescapably a 'fruit' of the illegal action of the jury." (Brief, p. 75) Petitioner made the same point in its brief to the Court of Appeals. This entire position is diametrically contrary to the position taken by petitioner in oral arguments before the District Court on its motion for new trial, at which time the subject of the District Court's right to order a remittitur was discussed at length by the trial judge and counsel for petitioner.

As noted in respondent's Court of Appeals brief, at the time petitioner filed its designation of parts of the record to be printed, respondent did not know that petitioner intended to argue that the District Court did not have the authority to require the remittitur and, therefore, did not designate that portion of the transcript containing statements in open court by petitioner's counsel which not only agreed that the trial judge had this authority but even told the court that it would be his "responsibility and . . . duty . . . to write it down to the point where it does meet with your own conscience." At page 171 of respondent's brief in the Court of Appeals, he set forth direct quotations from statements made by petitioner's leading counsel at the hearing:

> "I understand Your Honor perfectly . . . [I]f in your own conscience you feel that this verdict is excessive, then in that situation you have the right and, as Judge Hutcheson said, the duty to change that verdict. . . . [I]f that verdict is excessive, you have the responsibility and the duty, to use the lawyers' expression, to write it down to the point where it does meet with your own conscience."

In view of the position taken by petitioner in open court and petitioner having obtained the reduction it was seeking from the District Court (which at the time was questioning its right to order a remittitur), the contention here made by petitioner should receive the same treatment given it by the Court of Appeals as hereinabove quoted.

Third: Petitioner argued in its petition for certiorari and argues again here that the amount of the remittitur is repugnant to the Constitution, that it impinges far too heavily and arbitrarily upon the freedom of the press to preserve the "breathing space" required by the First Amendment freedom "to survive" and that the assessment was "arbitrary and unprincipled."

If the award of $400,000 in this case "impinges" as petitioner complains, how does petitioner explain its voluntary payment of $300,000 to Coach Bryant without even a trial in this same matter? (R. 1113) How did that payment affect petitioner's "breathing space . . . to survive"? Obviously petitioner did not consider that its $300,000 payment to Coach Bryant would "put defendant out of business" or would affect its breathing space to survive. What about the effect of petitioner's malicious libel upon respondent's breathing space to survive and its effect of putting Wally Butts out of business?

Is the Constitution to be construed and applied so as to safeguard only the breathing space to survive and the financial well-being of that portion of the public press represented by petitioner and not to safeguard and protect those same interest of an individual who is subjected to such a malicious, libelous attack?

At this point we respectfully ask the Court to refer again to the editorial written by "The Editors" of the Post and superimposed on the picture on the first page of the article. (R. 1071) That editorial was not written by the author of the article but was written and signed by "The Editors" of the Post. It expressed the venom of petitioner's editors—presumably all of them. There, the editors did not raise the question of whether Wallace Butts had "fixed" and "rigged" the game; the editors stated unequivocally as a fact that he had "fixed" and "rigged" the game. The editors said Wallace Butts was corrupt. They labeled him a "fixer" and a "rigger." They tried him in absentia. They found him guilty and then sentenced him for the remaining days of his life to public hate, scorn, ridicule and oblivion with, in their own words, a "ruined career."

Petitioner seeks to relate the judgment for punitive damages here to what this Court said of the $500,000 judgment rendered in the Times case. There is no analogy whatsoever between the scurrilous attack made against respondent in the editorial written by the editors of the Post and the language used in the advertisement which formed the basis of the action in the Times case. The advertisement in the Times case and the statements therein were not directed at any particular person; its attacks were directed at "the police." Here respondent is named repeatedly in the article, his picture is used and he is categorized as being "corrupt." In the Times case, the New York Times was acting in the capacity of an impartial public forum, a medium for the expression of ideas by "a movement whose existence and objectives are matters of the highest public interest and concern." 376 U.S. at p. 266. In the present case, Curtis published an article originating from within its own ranks pursuant to a self-advancing policy of "sophisticated muckraking" intended to "provoke people" and "make them mad" by "hitting them where it hurts," in order to increase circulation and advertising revenues. As a result of the Butts-Bryant article Curtis considered itself "25 percent" of the way to its new image as a "sophisticated muckraker." In Times, the court was concerned about foreclosing "an important outlet for the promulgation of information and ideas by persons who do not themselves have access to publishing facilities — who wish to exercise their freedom of speech even though they are not members of the press." 376 U.S. at p. 266.

Petitioner argues that an award of punitive damages must bear a reasonable relationship to the allowance of actual damages. It has always been the law in Georgia that nominal damages will support punitive damages and that no relationship is required. Sikes v. Fos- ter, 74 Ga. App. 350, 39 S.E. 2d (1946), and reverse title, 202 Ga. 122, 42 S.E. 2d 441 (1947) In the federal courts, punitive damages need not bear any relationship to actual damages. In Selalise v. National Utility Service, Inc., 120 F. 2d 938 (5th Cir., 1941) it was said:

> "In Florida, as in the Federal courts, the giving of punitive damages is not dependent upon, nor must it bear any relation to, the allowance of actual damages." (Emphasis added)

In Wardman-Justice Motors v. Petrie, 39 F. 2d 512, 516 (D.C. Cir. 1930) the court stated:

> "In many states the rule prevails that actual damages must be established as a basis for the assessment of punitive damages, but this is not the Federal rule nor the rule applied in this district."

Attention is also called to the case of Reynolds v. Pegler, 233 F. 2d 429 (2nd Cir. 1955), cert. den., 350 U.S. 846 (1955), which upheld an award of $1.00 compensatory damages and $175,000 punitive damages, a ratio of one hundred seventy-five thousand to one.

CONCLUSION

The Court of Appeals stated in its decision rendered in this case July 16, 1965:

> "We think that Curtis has had its day in Court. It apparently thought so too until the jury verdict was returned." 351 F. 2d at 719.

For the reasons which prompted the Court of Appeals to that conclusion and for all the foregoing reasons, the judgment in this case should be affirmed, or, in the alternative, the writ should be dismissed.

WILLIAM H. SCHRODER
ALLEN E. LOCKERMAN
ROBERT S. SAMS
MILTON A. CARLTON, JR.
Attorneys for Respondent
Wallace Butts

Of Counsel:
Troutman, Sams, Schroder & Lockerman
1600 William-Oliver Building
Atlanta, Georgia 30303

APPENDIX A

STATUTORY PROVISIONS INVOLVED

FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE
RULE 51

INSTRUCTIONS TO JURY: OBJECTION. "At the close of the evidence or at such earlier time during the trial as the court reasonably directs, any party may file written requests that the court instruct the jury on the law as set forth in the requests. The court shall inform counsel of its proposed action upon the requests prior to their arguments to the jury, but the court shall instruct the jury after the arguments are completed. No party may assign as error the giving or the failure to give an instruction unless he objects thereto before the jury retires to consider its verdict, stating distinctly the matter to which he objects and the grounds of his objection. Opportunity shall be given to make the objection out of the hearing of the jury."

GEORGIA CODE ANNOTATED.

§ 32-152.

ATHLETIC ASSOCIATIONS OF UNIVERSITY OF GEORGIA AND GEORGIA SCHOOL OF TECHNOLOGY DECLARED TO BE CORPORATIONS. — "The Athletic Associations of the University of Georgia and the Georgia School of Technology are hereby declared to be corporations, incorporated under charter issued by the superior court of the county in which said associations are located. (Acts 1949, p. 29.)"

§ 32-153.

ASSOCIATIONS AS NOT STATE AGENCIES: FINANCIAL OPERATION RULES AND REGULATIONS. — "The Associations named are hereby declared not to be agencies of the State and not subject to the limitations, restrictions and laws of general application imposed on State agencies by the Constitution of Georgia and the laws enacted by the General Assembly of Georgia in compliance with the Constitution of Georgia, and the Associations are authorized under their corporate charter issued by the superior court to make such rules and regulations for the financial operations of the Associations as they deem necessary: Provided, however, that this resolution shall not apply to any tax money appropriated by the State of Georgia. (Acts 1949, p. 29.)"

§ 105-701.

LIBEL DEFINED; NECESSITY OF PUBLICATION. — "A libel is a false and malicious defamation of another, expressed in print, or writing, or pictures, or signs, tending to injure the reputation of an individual, and exposing him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule. The publication of the libelous matter is essential to recovery."

§ 105-709.

PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS. — "The following are deemed privileged communications: . . .

"6. Comments upon the acts of public men in their public capacity and with reference thereto."

APPENDIX B

EXHIBIT "A"

Filed: Feb. 26, 1963

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF ALABAMA
WESTERN DIVISION

PAUL BRYANT,

Plaintiff,

versus Civil Action No. 63-2-W

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,
A Corporation, and
FURMAN BISHER,

Defendants.

MOTION OF DEFENDANT,
THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,
A Corporation, TO DISMISS

Comes the defendant, The Curtis Publishing Company, a Corporation, and moves the Court as follows:

1. To dismiss this action because the complaint fails to state a claim against this defendant upon which relief can be granted.

2. To dismiss the action inasmuch as the same is brought improperly in the Western Division of the Northern District of Alabama.

3. To dismiss this action because the complaint fails to state a claim against this defendant upon which relief can be granted in the following particulars, separately and severally:

(a) For that the magazine article complained of is not libelous as a matter of law.

(b) The magazine article complained of is not libelous per se and there is no allegation of special damages.

(c) Part of the magazine article complained of and relied upon as libelous is not of and concerning the plaintiff.

(d) Part of the magazine article complained of and relied upon as libelous is alleged out of the context of the entire magazine article which is not libelous as a matter of law.

(e) To subject this defendant to liability in the circumstances complained of would impose an unreasonable burden upon interstate commerce in violation of Article 1, Section 8 of the Constitution of the United States.

(f) To subject this defendant to liability in the circumstances complained of would abridge the freedom of speech and of press in violation of the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, made applicable to the States by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

(g) To subject this defendant to liability in the circumstances complained of would be repugnant to Article 1, Section 6 of the Constitution of the State of Alabama in denying to this defendant due process of law.

(h) To subject this defendant to liability in the circumstances complained of would be repugnant to the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

(i) The magazine article complained of is not libelous as a matter of law in that it is fair comment concerning a personality who is famous throughout the United States and abroad.

PEPPER, HAMILTON &
SCHEETZ
BEDDOW, EMBRY & BEDDOW
BY T. ERIC EMBRY
T. Eric Embry,
Attorneys for
The Curtis Publishing
Company, A Corporation

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE

I hereby certify that I have served a copy of the above and foregoing Motion on Messrs. Pritchard, McCall and Jones, Attorneys for Plaintiffs in this cause, by mailing a copy of same to them at their office at the Frank Nelson Building, Birmingham, Alabama, United States postage prepaid.

This 26th day of February, 1963.

(Signed) T. ERIC EMBRY
Of Counsel

EXHIBIT "B"

Filed: Apr. 30, 1963

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF ALABAMA
SOUTHERN DIVISION

PAUL BRYANT,

Plaintiff,

versus Civil Action No. 63-166

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,
A Corporation,

Defendant.

MOTION OF DEFENDANT,
THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,
A Corporation, TO DISMISS

Comes the defendant, The Curtis Publishing Company, a corporation, and moves the Court as follows:

1. To dismiss this action because the complaint fails to state a claim against this defendant upon which relief can be granted.

2. To dismiss this action because the complaint fails to state a claim against this defendant upon which relief can be granted in the following particulars, separately and severally:

(a) For that the magazine article complained of is not libelous as a matter of law.

(a) The magazine article complained of is not libelous per se and there is no allegation of special damages.

(c) Part of the magazine article complained of and relied upon as libelous is not of and concerning the plaintiff.

(d) Part of the magazine article complained of and relied upon as libelous is alleged out of the context of the entire magazine article which is not libelous as a matter of law.

(e) To subject this defendant to liability in the circumstances complained of would impose an unreasonable burden upon interstate commerce in violation of Article 1, Section 8 of the Constitution of the United States.

(f) To subject this defendant to liability in the circumstances complained of would abridge the freedom of speech and of press in violation of the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, made applicable to the States by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

(g) To subject this defendant to liability in the circumstances complained of would be repugnant to Article 1, Section 6 of the Constitution of the State of Alabama in denying to this defendant due process of law.

(h) To subject this defendant to liability in the circumstances complained of would be repugnant to the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

(i) The magazine article complained of is not libelous as a matter of law in that it is fair comment concerning a personality who is famous throughout the United States and abroad.

PEPPER, HAMILTON & SCHEETZ
BEDDOW, EMBRY & BEDDOW
BY T. ERIC EMBRY
T. Eric Embry,
Attorneys for
The Curtis Publishing Company, A Corporation

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE

I hereby certify that I have served a copy of the above and foregoing Motion on Messrs. Pritchard, McCall and Jones, Attorneys for Plaintiff in this cause, by mailing a copy of same to them at their office at the Frank Nelson Building, Birmingham, Alabama, United States postage prepaid.

This the 30th day of April, 1963.

(Signed) T. ERIC EMBRY
Of Counsel

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE

I do hereby certify that I am of counsel for Respondent in the above styled case and I have this day served a copy of the within and foregoing Brief for Respondent, by mailing, in the United States Mail, a copy of same to Petitioner's attorneys of record, HERBERT WECHSLER, ESQ., 435 West 116th Street, New York, New York 10027; PHILIP H. STRUBING, ESQ., PEPPER, HAMILTON & SCHEETZ, 123 South Broad Street, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania 19109 and KILPATRICK, CODY, ROGERS, McCLATCHEY & REGENSTEIN, 1045 Hurt Building, Atlanta, Georgia 30303, in envelopes properly addressed and with sufficient pre-paid postage thereon, pursuant to Supreme Court Rule 33.

This ____ day of February, 1967.

_____
Of Counsel for Respondent

FILED
FEB 17 1967
JOHN F. DAVIS, CLERK

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1966

No. 150

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,
Petitioner,

—against—

EDWIN A. WALKER,
Respondent.

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE COURT OF CIVIL APPEALS FOR THE SECOND SUPREME JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS OR, IN THE ALTERNATIVE, TO THE SUPREME COURT OF TEXAS

REPLY BRIEF FOR THE PETITIONER

WILLIAM P. ROGERS
LEO P. LARKIN, JR.
STANLEY GODOFSKY
200 Park Avenue
New York, New York 10017

ARTHUR MOYNIHAN
50 Rockefeller Plaza
New York, New York

J. A. GOOCH
SLOAN B. BLAIR
1800 First National Building
Fort Worth, Texas

Attorneys for Petitioner
The Associated Press

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1966

No. 150

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS,

Petitioner,

—against—

EDWIN A. WALKER,

Respondent.

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE COURT OF CIVIL APPEALS FOR THE SECOND SUPREME JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS OR, IN THE ALTERNATIVE, TO THE SUPREME COURT OF TEXAS

REPLY BRIEF FOR THE PETTTIONER

Since Respondent has elected to fragment his argument into two briefs, one in response to Petitioner's brief and the other in response to the amicus brief of The Tribune Company, Petitioner will here respond to both.

I.

In his briefs, particularly the brief in response to the amicus brief of The Tribune Company, Respondent attempts to create the impression that he was arrested and charged with a felony and suffered various other humiliations as a direct and proximate result of the news reports here involved (Respondent's Answer to Amicus Curiae Brief, pp. 2-3, 11, 14-15; Respondent's Brief, pp. 38-39, 46-47).

Nothing could be further from the fact.

The documents annexed to General Walker's answer to The Tribune Company's amicus brief disclose on their face that Walker was arrested on October 1, 1962 (Respondent's Answer to Amicus Curiae Brief, Appendix, pp. i, viii-ix). The dispatches here complained of are dated, respectively, October 2 and October 3, 1962 (R. 11). Each dispatch states expressly that General Walker had already been arrested (R. 11, 12). It is therefore obvious that the arrest occurred before the dispatches were written, much less published.

II.

At pages 40 and 41 of his brief, Respondent has cited a number of cases which he claims militate against the extension of Sullivan to public figures. Two of these cases, Clark v. Drew Pearson, 248 F. Supp.188 (D. D. C. 1965), and Fignole v. Curtis Publishing Co., 247 F. Supp. 595 (S. D. N. Y. 1965), are based upon the theory of reciprocity of official privilege with respect to public officials. But this Court made it clear, in *Rosenblatt, that the rationale of its decision in Sullivan did not rest upon any theory of reciprocity of official privilege. Moreover, as this record so clearly establishes, General Walker was able to obtain publicity for his opinions and his version of the facts far exceeding that which was available to the public officials involved in Sullivan, Garrison, Henry and Rosenblatt.

The other cases cited by the Respondent are clearly distinguishable on their facts or totally inapposite.

Rosenblatt* v. Baer, 383 U. S. 75, 84, n. 10.

III.

General Walker has argued (Respondent's Brief, p. 36) that the definition of "actual malice" under Texas law is more stringent than under Sullivan, and that the findings by the Texas courts of no "actual malice" do not, therefore, necessarily preclude a finding of "actual malice" within the meaning of Sullivan. A reading of the charge given by the trial court here discloses, however, that the Texas definition of malice is more favorable to Walker than the "actual malice" test prescribed by Sullivan (R. 60). Cf. Henry v. Collins, 380 U. S. 356, 357. In any event, Walker's argument ignores the fact that the Texas courts expressly found that there was in this record no evidence of "actual malice" as defined by this Court in Sullivan. The trial court said (R. 72):

> "Since I have determined that there is no actual malice in this case, the question arises as to whether the rule of New York Times v. Sullivan . . . should apply to a public figure such as plaintiff. If it does, then the entire jury verdict must be set aside . . ."

The Texas Court of Civil Appeals affirmed the trial court's judgment in this, as in all other respects (R. 1551), and Walker's conditional application for a writ of error on the malice point was denied by the Texas Supreme Court (R. 1553).

IV.

Even apart from the findings of the Texas courts, Respondent's contention that Van Savell deliberately lied is implausible on its face, because Savell had no motive to defame General Walker. Van Savell, despite his youth, was an experienced reporter (R. 720-721, 750). He was a Southerner, born and bred in Mississippi (R. 719-720). He had previously worked for the Jackson Clarion-Ledger (R. 720), a paper whose segregationist views were well known. There is not the slightest suggestion that Savell had any personal animosity toward General Walker, or any reason to portray the General unfairly. And in the light of the inflammatory statements and speeches made by General Walker before he arrived at the Oxford campus, there was nothing in the content of the dispatches which would have suggested to the Associated Press that the activities attributed by Savell to General Walker did not, in fact, occur.

Finally, General Walker suggests no reason why the Associated Press—a non-profit mutual cooperative association composed of hundreds of members throughout the United States, representing a wide range of opinion on all issues, including integration—would deliberately lie about him. There is not the slightest evidence that the Associated Press did not in this instance live up to its well-deserved reputation for impartiality and fairness in reporting the news.

V.

Respondent's claim that Petitioner "waived" its defense of fair comment is wholly unsupported by the record. In fact, Petitioner raised the fair comment defense at every stage of this case: in its answer (R. 29-30); in its motion for an instructed verdict at the close of Respondent's evidence (R. 42, 44, 45); in its motion for an instructed verdict at the close of all the evidence (R. 49-52); in its exceptions to the charge of the court (R. 54); in its motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict (R. 64-67); and in its motion for a new trial (R. 83-86, 90), as well as on appeal to the Texas Court of Civil Appeals (Appellant's Brief, pp. 3-4, 65-73) and on application for writ of error to the Supreme Court of Texas (Application for Writ of Error, pp. 5, 86-95).

CONCLUSION

For each of the reasons assigned herein and in our principal brief, we respectfully submit that the relief requested by Petitioner should be granted.

Respectfully submitted,

WILLIAM P. ROGERS
LEO P. LARKIN, JR.
STANLEY GODOFSKY
200 Park Avenue
New York, New York 10017

ARTHUR MOYNIHAN
50 Rockefeller Plaza
New York, New York

J. A. GOOCH
SLOAN B. BLAIR
1800 First National Building
Fort Worth, Texas

Attorneys for Petitioner
The Associated Press

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

Nos. 37 AND 150.—OCTOBER TERM, 1966.

Curtis Publishing Co., Petitioner, 37 v. Wallace Butts.	On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.
The Associated Press, Petitioner, 150 v. Edwin A. Walker.	On Writ of Certiorari to the Court of Civil Appeals of Texas.

[June 12, 1967.]

MR. JUSTICE HARLAN announced the judgments of the Court and delivered an opinion in which MR. JUSTICE CLARK, MR. JUSTICE STEWART, and MR. JUSTICE FORTAS join.*

In New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 279–280, this Court held that "[t]he constitutional guarantees [of freedom of speech and press] require . . . a federal rule that prohibits a public official from recovering damages for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves that the statement was made with 'actual malice'—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not." We brought these two cases here, 385 U. S. 811, 385 U. S. 812, to consider the impact of that decision on libel actions instituted by persons who are not public officials, but who are "public figures" and involved in issues in which the public has a justified and important interest. The sweep of the New York Times rule in libel actions brought under state law was a question expressly reserved in that case, 376 U. S. 283, n. 23, and while that question has been involved in later cases, Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64; Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U. S. 75; Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U. S. 374, it has not been fully settled.

*Five members of the Court, while concurring in the result reached in No. 150, would rest decision on grounds other than those stated in this opinion. See separate opinions of THE CHIEF JUSTICE (post, p. —), of MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN (post, p. —), and of MR. JUSTICE BLACK (post, p. —).

The matter has, however, been passed on by a considerable number of state and lower federal courts and has produced a sharp division of opinion as to whether the New York Times rule should apply only in actions brought by public officials or whether it has a longer reach. Compare, e. g., Pearson v. Fairbanks Publishing Co., 413 P. 2d 711 (Alaska), with Clark v. Pearson, 248 F. Supp. 188.[1] The resolution of the uncertainty in this area of libel actions requires, at bottom, some further exploration and clarification of the relationship between libel law and the freedom of speech and press, lest the "New York Times Rule" become a talisman which gives the press

[1] See also Afro-American Publishing Co. v. Jaffe, 366 F. 2d 649, — U. S. App. D. C. —; Washington Post Co. v. Keogh, 365 F. 2d 965, — U. S. App. D. C. —; Pauling v. Globe Democrat Publishing Co., 362 F. 2d 188; Pape v. Time, Inc., 354 F. 2d 558; Pauling v. News Syndicate Co., Inc., 335 F. 2d 659; Fignole v. Curtis Publishing Co., 247 F. Supp. 595; Walker v. Courier-Journal & Louisville Times Co., 246 F. Supp. 231; United Medical Labs v. CBS, Inc., 228 F. Supp. 735; Klahr v. Winterble, 4 Ariz. App. 158, 418 P. 2d 404; Walker v. Associated Press, 417 P. 2d 486 (Colorado); Powell v. Monitor Publishing Co., Inc., 107 N. H. 83, 217 A. 2d 196; Eadie v. Pole, 191 N. J. Super. 504, 221 A. 2d 547; State v. Browne, 86 N. J. Super. 217, 206 A. 2d 591; People v. Mager, 25 App. Div. 2d 363, 269 N. Y. S. 2d 848; Gilberg v. Goffi, 21 App. Div. 2d 517, 251 N. Y. S. 2d 823; Krutech v. Schimmel, 50 Misc. 2d 1052, 272 N. Y. S. 2d 261; Cabin v. Community Newspapers, Inc., 50 Misc. 2d 574, 270 N. Y. S. 2d 913; Pauling v. National Review, 49 Misc. 2d 975, 269 N. Y. S. 2d 11; Block v. Benton, 44 Misc. 2d 1053, 255 N. Y. S. 2d 767; Fegley v. Morthimer, 204 Pa. Super. 54, 202 A. 2d 125; Tucker v. Kilgore, 388 S. W. 2d 112 (Ky.).

constitutionally adequate protection only in a limited field, or, what would be equally unfortunate, one which goes far to immunize the press from having to make just reparation for the infliction of needless injury upon honor and reputation through false publication. These two libel actions, although they arise out of quite different sets of circumstances, provide that opportunity. We think they are best treated together in one opinion.

I.

No. 37, Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, stems from an article published in petitioner's Saturday Evening Post which accused respondent of conspiring to "fix" a football game between the University of Georgia and the University of Alabama, played in 1962. At the time of the article, Butts was the athletic director of the University of Georgia and had overall responsibility for the administration of its athletic program. Georgia is a state university, but Butts was employed by the Georgia Athletic Association, a private corporation, rather than by the State itself.[2] Butts had previously served as head football coach of the University and was a well-known and respected figure in coaching ranks. He had maintained an interest in coaching and was negotiating for a position with a professional team at the time of publication.

The article was entitled "The Story of a College Football Fix" and prefaced by a note from the editors stating: "Not since the Chicago White Sox threw the 1919 World Series has there been a sports story as shocking as this one. . . . Before the University of Georgia played the [2] In Allen v. Regents of the University System of Georgia, 304 U. S. 439, this Court described the Athletic Association as a body carrying on "a business comparable in all essentials to those usually conducted by private owners." Id., at 451. Section 32–153 of the Georgia Code specifically provides that athletic associations are not to be considered agencies of the State.

University of Alabama . . . Wally Butts . . . gave [to its coach] . . . Georgia's plays, defensive patterns, all the significant secrets Georgia's football team possessed." The text revealed that one George Burnett, an Atlanta insurance salesman, had accidentally overheard, because of electronic error, a telephone conversation between Butts and the head coach of the University of Alabama, Paul Bryant, which took place approximately one week prior to the game. Burnett was said to have listened while "Butts outlined Georgia's offensive plays . . . and told . . . how Georgia planned to defend . . . . Butts mentioned both players and plays by name." The readers were told that Burnett had made notes of the conversation, and specific examples of the divulged secrets were set out.

The article went on to discuss the game and the players' reaction to the game, concluding that "[t]he Georgia players, their moves analyzed, and forecast like those of rats in a maze, took a frightful physical beating," and said that the players, and other sideline observers, were aware that Alabama was privy to Georgia's secrets. It set out the series of events commencing with Burnett's later presentation of his notes to the Georgia head coach, Johnny Griffith, and culminating in Butt's resignation from the University's athletic affairs, for health and business reasons. The article's conclusion made clear its expected impact:

> "The chances are that Wally Butts will never help any football team again. . . . The investigation by university and Southeastern Conference officials is continuing; motion pictures of other games are being scrutinized; where it will end no one so far can say. But careers will be ruined, that is sure."

Butts brought this diversity libel action in the federal courts in Georgia seeking $5,000,000 compensatory and $5,000,000 punitive damages. The complaint was filed, and the trial completed, before this Court handed down its decision in New York Times, and the only defense raised by petitioner Curtis was one of substantial truth. No constitutional defenses were interposed although Curtis' counsel were aware of the progress of the New York Times case, and although general constitutional defenses had been raised by Curtis in a libel action instituted by the Alabama coach who was a state employee.

Evidence at trial was directed both to the truth of the article and to its preparation. The latter point was put in issue by the claim for punitive damages which required a finding of "malice" under Georgia law. The evidence showed that Burnett had indeed overheard a conversation between Butts and the Alabama coach, but the content of that conversation was hotly disputed. It was Butts' contention that the conversation had been general football talk and that nothing Burnett had overheard would have been of any particular value to an opposing coach. Expert witnesses supported Butts by analyzing Burnett's notes and the films of the game itself. The Saturday Evening Post's version of the game and of the players' remarks about the game was severely contradicted.

The evidence on the preparation of the article, on which we shall focus in more detail later, cast serious doubt on the adequacy of the investigation underlying the article. It was Butts' contention that the magazine had departed greatly from the standards of good investigation and reporting and that this was especially reprehensible, amounting to reckless and wanton conduct, in light of the devastating nature of the article's assertions.

The jury was instructed that in order for the defense of truth to be sustained it was "necessary that the truth be substantially portrayed in those parts of the article which libel the plaintiff." The "sting of the libel" was said to be "the charge that the plaintiff rigged and fixed the 1962 Georgia-Alabama game by giving Coach Bryant [of Alabama] information which was calculated to or could have affected the outcome of the game." The jury was also instructed that it could award punitive damages "to deter the wrong-doer from repeating the trespass" in an amount within its sole discretion if it found that actual malice had been proved.[3]

The jury returned a verdict for $60,000 in general damages and for $3,000,000 punitive damages. The trial court reduced the total to $460,000 by remittitur. Soon thereafter we handed down our decision in New York Times and Curtis immediately brought it to the attention of the trial court by a motion for new trial. The trial judge rejected Curtis' motion on two grounds. He first held that New York Times was inapplicable because Butts was not a public official. He also held that "there was ample evidence from which a jury could have concluded that there was reckless disregard by defendant of whether the article was false or not."

Curtis appealed to the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit which affirmed the judgment of the District Court by a two-to-one vote. The majority there did not reach the merits of petitioner's constitutional claim, holding that Curtis had "clearly waived any right it may have had to challenge the verdict and judgment on any of the constitutional grounds asserted in Times," 351 F. 2d 702, 713, on the basis of Michel v. Louisiana, 350 U. S. 91. It found Curtis chargeable with knowledge of the [3] Actual malice was defined by the charge as encompassing "the notion of ill will, spite, hatred and an intent to injure one. Malice also denotes a wanton or reckless indifference or culpable negligence with regard to the rights of others." The jury was told that whether "actual malice or wanton or reckless indifference has been established must be determined from all of the evidence in the case." The trial court then directed the jury's attention to the circumstances of preparation. The impact of the charge is considered in more detail at pp. 23–25, infra.

constitutional limitations on libel law at the time it filed its pleadings below because of its "interlocking battery of able and distinguished attorneys" some of whom were involved in the New York Times litigation. This holding rendered the compensatory damage decision purely one of state law and no error was found in its application. Turning to the punitive damage award, the majority upheld it as stemming from the "enlightened conscience" of the jury as adjusted by the lawful action of the trial judge. It was in "complete accord" with the trial court's determination that the evidence justified the finding "that what the Post did was done with reckless disregard of whether the article was false or not." 351 F. 2d, at 719.

Judge Rives dissented, arguing that the record did not support a finding of knowing waiver of constitutional defenses. He concluded that the New York Times rule was applicable because Butts was involved in activities of great interest to the public. He would have reversed because "the jury might well have understood the district court's charge to allow recovery on a showing of intent to inflict harm or even the culpably negligent infliction of harm, rather than the intent to inflict harm through falsehood . . . ." 351 F. 2d, at 723.

Rehearing was denied, 351 F. 2d 733, and we granted certiorari, as indicated above. For reasons given below, we would affirm.

II.

No. 150, Associated Press v. Walker, arose out of the distribution of a news dispatch giving an eyewitness account of events on the campus of the University of Mississippi on the night of September 30, 1962, when a massive riot erupted because of federal efforts to enforce a court decree ordering the enrollment of a Negro, James Meredith, as a student in the University. The dispatch stated that respondent Walker, who was present on the campus, had taken command of the violent crowd and had personally led a charge against federal marshals sent there to effectuate the court's decree and to assist in preserving order. It also described Walker as encouraging rioters to use violence and giving them technical advice on combating the effects of tear gas..

Walker was a private citizen at the time of the riot and publication. He had pursued a long and honorable career in the United States Army before resigning to engage in political activity, and had, in fact, been in command of the federal troops during the school segregation confrontation at Little Rock, Arkansas, in 1957. He was acutely interested in the issue of physical federal intervention, and had made a number of strong statements against such action which had received wide publicity. Walker had his own following, the "Friends of Walker," and could fairly be deemed a man of some political prominence.

Walker initiated this libel action in the state courts of Texas, seeking a total of $2,000,000 in compensatory and punitive damages. Associated Press raised both the defense of truth and constitutional defenses. At trial both sides attempted to reconstruct the stormy events on the campus of the University of Mississippi. Walker admitted his presence on the campus and conceded that he had spoken to a group of students. He claimed, however, that he had counseled restraint and peaceful protest, and exercised no control whatever over the crowd which had rejected his plea. He denied categorically taking part in any charge against the federal marshals.

There was little evidence relating to the preparation of the news dispatch. It was clear, however, that the author of this dispatch, Van Savell, was actually present during the events described and had reported them almost immediately to the Associated Press office in Atlanta. A discrepancy was shown between an oral account given the office and a later written dispatch, but it related solely to whether Walker had spoken to the group before or after approaching the marshals. No other showing of improper preparation was attempted, nor was there any evidence of personal prejudice or incompetency on the part of Savell or the Associated Press.

The jury was instructed that an award of compensatory damages could be made if the dispatch was not substantially true,[4] and that punitive damages could be added if the article was actuated by "ill will, bad or evil motive, or that entire want of care which would raise the belief that the act or omission complained of was the result of a conscious indifference to the right or welfare of the person to be affected by it."

A verdict of $500,000 compensatory damages and $300,000 punitive damages was returned. The trial judge, however, found that there was "no evidence to support the jury's answers that there was actual malice" and refused to enter the punitive award. He concluded that the failure further to investigate the minor discrepancy between the oral and written versions of the incident could not be construed as that entire want of care which would amount to a conscious indifference [sic] to the rights of plaintiff. Negligence, it may have been; malice, it was not. Moreover, the mere fact that AP permitted a young reporter to cover the story of the riot is not evidence of malice." The trial judge also noted that this lack of "malice" would require a verdict for the Associated Press if New York Times were applicable. But he rejected its applicability since there were "no compelling reasons of public policy requiring additional defenses to suits for libel. Truth alone should be an adequate defense."

---

[4] Two particular statements were at issue, the remark that "Walker assumed command of the crowd," and the accusation that Walker led a charge against the marshals.

Both sides appealed and the Texas Court of Civil Appeals affirmed both the award of compensatory damages and the striking of punitive damages. It stated without elaboration that New York Times was inapplicable. As to the punitive damage award, the plea for reinstatement was refused because "[i]n view of all the surrounding circumstances, the rapid and confused occurrence of events on the occasion in question, and in light of all the evidence, we hold that appellee failed to prove malice . . . ." 393 S. W. 2d 671, 683.

The Supreme Court of Texas denied a writ of error, and we granted certiorari, as already indicated. For reasons given below, we would reverse.

III:

Before we reach the constitutional arguments put forward by the respective petitioners, we must first determine whether Curtis has waived its right to assert such arguments by failing to assert them before trial. As our dispositions of Rosenblatt v. Baer, supra, and other cases involving constitutional questions indicate,[5] the mere failure to interpose such a defense prior to the announcement of a decision which might support it cannot prevent a litigant from later invoking such a ground. Of course it is equally clear that even constitutional objections may be waived by a failure to raise them at a proper time, Michel v. Louisiana, supra, at 99,[6] but an effective waiver must, as was said in Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U. S. 458, 464, be one of a "known right or privilege."

Butts makes two arguments in support of his contention that Curtis' failure to raise constitutional defenses amounted to a knowing waiver. The first is that the [5] See Teham v. Shott, 382 U. S. 406, 409, n. 3; Linkletter v. Walker, 381 U. S. 618, 622–629; Griffin v. California, 380 U. S. 609; White v. Maryland, 373 U. S. 59.

[6] See also Ackermann v. United States, 340 U. S. 193, 198.

general state of the law at the time of this trial was such that Curtis should, in the words of the Fifth Circuit majority, have seen "the handwriting on the wall." 351 F. 2d 734. We cannot accept this contention. Although our decision in New York Times did draw upon earlier precedents in state law, e. g., Coleman v. MacLennan, 78 Kan. 711, 98 P. 281, and there were intimations in a prior opinion and the extra-judicial comments of one Justice,[7] that some applications of libel law might be in conflict with the guarantees of free speech and press, there was strong precedent indicating that civil libel actions were immune from general constitutional scrutiny.[8] Given the state of the law prior to our decision in New York Times, we do not think it unreasonable for a lawyer trying a case of this kind, where the plaintiff was not even a public official under state law, to have looked solely to the defenses provided by state libel law. Nor do we think that the previous grant of certiorari in New York Times alone indicates a different conclusion. The questions presented for review there were premised on [7] In Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U. S. 250, the Court had upheld an Illinois group-libel statute but the majority had warned that "'While this Court sits' it retains and exercises authority to nullify action which encroaches on freedom of utterance under the guise of punishing libel." Id., at 263–264. There were also four vigorous dissenters to the holding in that case. An article appearing in the June 1962 NYU Law Review had quoted MR. JUSTICE BLACK as believing that "there should be no libel or defamation law in the United States . . . ." Cahn, Justice Black and First Amendment "Absolutes"; A Public Interview, 7 N. Y. U. L. Rev. 549, 557.

---

[8] In Robertson v. Baldwin, 165 U. S. 275, 281, the Court said: "Thus the freedom of speech and of the press (art. 1) does not permit the publication of libels, blasphemous or indecent articles, or other publications injurious to public morals or private reputation . . . ." That sentiment was repeated in a number of cases including Beauharnais v. Illinois, supra, n. 7. See Near v. Minnesota, 283 U. S. 697, 715; Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U. S. 568.

Sullivan's status as an elected public official, and elected officials traditionally have been subject to special rules of libel law.[9]

Butts' second contention is that whatever defenses might reasonably have been apparent to the average lawyer, some of Curtis' trial attorneys were involved in the New York Times litigation and thus should have been especially alert to constitutional contentions. This was the argument which swayed the Court of Appeals, but we do not find it convincing.

First, as a general matter, we think it inadvisable to determine whether a "right or privilege" is "known" by relying on information outside the record concerning the special legal knowledge of particular attorneys. Second, even a lawyer fully cognizant of the record and briefs in the New York Times litigation might reasonably have expected the resolution of that case to have no impact on this litigation, since the arguments advanced there depended so heavily on the analogy to seditious libel. We think that it was our eventual resolution of New York Times, rather than its facts and the arguments presented by counsel, which brought out the constitutional question here. We would not hold that Curtis waived a "known right" before it was aware of the New York Times decision. It is agreed that Curtis' presentation of the constitutional issue after our decision in New York Times was prompt.

Our rejection of Butts' arguments is supported by factors which point to the justice of that conclusion. See Hormel v. Helvering, 312 U. S. 552, 556–557. Curtis' constitutional points were raised early enough so that this Court has had the benefit of some ventilation of them by the courts below. The resolution of the merits of Curtis' contentions by the District Court makes it evident that Butts was not prejudiced by the time at which Curtis raised its argument, for it cannot be asserted that an earlier interposition would have resulted in any different proceedings below.[10] Finally the constitutional protection which Butts contends that Curtis has waived safeguards a freedom which is the "matrix, the indispensable condition, of nearly every other form of freedom." Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U. S. 319, 327. Where the ultimate effect of sustaining a claim of waiver might be an imposition on that valued freedom, we are unwilling to find waiver in circumstances which fall short of being clear and compelling. Cf. New York Times Co. v. Connor, 365 F. 2d 567, 572.

[9] See, e. g., Sweeney v. Patterson, 128 F. 2d 457, 76 U. S. App. D. C. 23; Hendrix v. Mobile Register, 202 Ala. 616, 81 So. 558.

IV.

We thus turn to a consideration, on the merits, of the constitutional claims raised by Curtis in Butts and by the Associated Press in Walker. Powerful arguments are brought to bear for the extension of the New York Times rule in both cases. In Butts it is contended that the facts are on all fours with those of Rosenblatt v. Baer, supra, since Butts was charged with the important responsibility of managing the athletic affairs of a state university. It is argued that while the Athletic Association is financially independent from the State and Butts was not technically a state employee, as was Baer, his role in state administration was so significant that this technical distinction from Rosenblatt should be ignored. Even if this factor is to be given some weight, we are told that the public interest in education in general, and in the conduct of the athletic affairs of educational institutions in particular, justifies constitutional protection of discussion of persons involved in it equivalent to the protection afforded discussion of public officials.

[10] Even after our decision in New York Times was before him, the trial judge held it inapplicable. It is almost certain that he would have rebuffed any effort to interpose general constitutional defenses at the time of trial. See Note, Waiver of a Previously Unrecognized Defense: Must Lawyers Be Seers? 114 U. Pa. L. Rev. 451.

A similar argument is raised in the Walker case where the important public interest in being informed about the events and personalities involved in the Mississippi riot is pressed. In that case we are also urged to recognize that Walker's claims to the protection of libel laws are limited since he thrust himself into the "vortex" of the controversy.

We are urged by the respondents, Butts and Walker, to recognize society's "pervasive and strong interest in preventing and redressing attacks upon reputation," and the "important social values which underlie the law of defamation." Rosenblatt v. Baer, supra, at 86. It is pointed out that the publicity in these instances was not directed at employees of government and that these cases cannot be analogized to seditious libel prosecutions. Id., at 92 (STEWART, J., concurring). We are told that "[t]he rule that permits satisfaction of the deep-seated need for vindication of honor is not a mere historic relic, but promotes the law's civilizing function of providing an acceptable substitute for violence in the settlement of disputes," Afro-American Pub. Co. v. Jaffe, 366 F. 2d 649, 660, — U. S. App. D. C. —, —, and that:

> "Newspapers, magazines and broadcasting companies are businesses conducted for profit and often make very large ones. Like other enterprises that inflict damage in the course of performing service highly useful to the public . . . they must pay the freight; and injured persons should not be relegated [to remedies which] make collection of their claims difficult or impossible unless strong policy considerations demand." Buckley v. New York Post Corp., 373 F. 2d 175, 182.

We fully recognize the force of these competing considerations and the fact that an accommodation between them is necessary not only in these cases, but in all libel actions arising from a publication concerning public issues. In Time, Inc. v. Hill, supra, at 388, we held that "[t]he guarantees for speech and press are not the preserve of political expression or comment upon public affairs . . . ." and affirmed that freedom of discussion "must embrace all issues about which information is needed or appropriate to enable the members of society to cope with the exigencies of their period." Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U. S. 88, 102. This carries out the intent of the founders who felt that a free press would advance "truth, science, morality and arts in general" as well as responsible government. Address to the People of Quebec, 1 Journals of the Continental Cong. 108. From the point of view of deciding whether a constitutional interest of free speech and press is properly involved in the resolution of a libel question a rational distinction "cannot be founded on the assumption that criticism of private citizens who seek to lead in the determination of . . . policy will be less important to the public interest than will criticism of government officials." Pauling v. Globe Democrat Pub. Co., 362 F. 2d 188, 196.

On the other hand, to take the rule found appropriate in New York Times to resolve the "tension" between the particular constitutional interest there involved and the interests of personal reputation and press responsibility, Rosenblatt v. Baer, supra, at 86, as being applicable throughout the realm of the broader constitutional interest, would be to attribute to this aspect of New York Times an unintended inexorability at the threshold of this new constitutional development. In Time, Inc. v. Hill, supra, at 390, we counseled against "blind application of New York Times Co. v. Sullivan" and considered

"the factors which arise in the particular context." Here we must undertake a parallel evaluation.[11]

The modern history of the guarantee of freedom of speech and press mainly has been one of a search for the outer limits of that right. From the fountainhead opinions of Justices Holmes and Brandeis in Schenck, Abrams, and Whitney,[12] which considered the problem when the disruptive effects of speech might strip the protection from the speaker, to our recent decision in Adderley v. Florida, 385 U. S. 39, where we found the freedom of speech not to include a freedom to trespass, the Court's primary concern has been to determine the extent of the right and the surrounding safeguards necessary to give it "breathing space." NAACP v. Button, 371 U. S. 415, 433. That concern has perhaps omitted from searching consideration the "real problem" of defining or delimiting the right itself. See Freund, Mr. Justice Black and the Judicial Function, 14 U. C. L. A. L. Rev. 467, 471.

It is significant that the guarantee of freedom of speech and press falls between the religious guarantees and the guarantee of the right to petition for redress of grievances in the text of the First Amendment, the principles of which are carried to the States by the Fourteenth Amendment. It partakes of the nature of both, for it is as much a guarantee to individuals of their personal right to make their thoughts public and put them before the community, see Holt, Of the Liberty of the Press, in Nelson, Freedom of the Press from Hamilton to the Warren Court 18–19, as it is a social necessity required for the "maintenance of our political system and an open society." Time, Inc. v. Hill, supra, at 389. It is because of the personal nature of this right that we have rejected all manner of prior restraint on publication, Near v. Minnesota ex rel. Olson, 283 U. S. 697, despite strong arguments that if the material was unprotected the time of suppression was immaterial. Pound, Equitable Relief Again Defamation and Injuries to Personality, 29 Harv. L. Rev. 640. The dissemination of the individual's opinions on matters of public interest is for us, in the historic words of the Declaration of Independence, an "inalienable right" that "governments are instituted among men to secure." History shows us that the Founders were not always convinced that unlimited discussion of public issues would be "for the benefit of all of us" [13] but that they firmly adhered to the proposition that the "true liberty of the press" permitted "every man to publish his opinions." Respublica v. Oswald, 1 Dall. 319 (Pa.).

---

[11] The majority opinion in Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U. S. 374, was limited to the consideration of nondefamatory matter. Id., at 391.

[12] Schenck v. United States, 249 U. S. 47 (Holmes, J.); Abrams v. United States, 250 U. S. 616, 624 (Holmes, J., dissenting); Whitney v. California, 274 U. S. 357, 372 (Brandeis, J., concurring).

The fact that dissemination of information and opinion on questions of public concern is ordinarily a legitimate, protected and indeed cherished activity does not mean, however, that one may in all respects carry on that activity exempt from sanctions designed to safeguard the legitimate interests of others. A business "is not immune from regulation because it is an agency of the press. The publisher of a newspaper has no special immunity from the application of general laws. He has no special privilege to invade the rights and liberties of others." Associated Press v. N. L. R. B., 301 U. S. 103, 132–133. Federal Securities regulation,[14] mail fraud statutes,[15] and common-law actions for deceit and misrepresentation [16] are only some examples of our under-

[13] See Levy, Legacy of Suppression. The phrase is from the Court's opinion in Time, Inc. v. Hill, supra, at 389.

[14] E. g., 15 U. S. C. § 77k (penalizing negligent misstatement).

[15] 18 U. S. C. § 1341.

[16] See Traylor Engineering & Mfg. Co. v. National Container Corp., 6 Del. 143, 70 A. 2d 9; Restatement, Torts § 525 (deceit); Nash v. Minnesota Title Ins. & Trust Co., 163 Mass. 574, 40 N. E. 1039 (negligent misrepresentation).

standing that the right to communicate information of public interest is not "unconditional." See Note, Freedom of Expression in a Commercial Context, 78 Harv. L. Rev. 1191. However, as our decision in New York Times makes explicit, while protected activity may in some respects be subjected to sanctions, it is not open to all forms of regulation. The guarantees of freedom of speech and press were not designed to prevent "the censorship of the press merely, but any action of the government by means of which it might prevent such free and general discussion of public matters as seems absolutely essential . . . ." 2 Cooley, Constitutional Limitations (8th ed.) 886. Our touchstones are that acceptable limitations must not affect "the impartial distribution of news" and ideas, Associated Press v. N. L. R. B., supra, at 133, nor because of their history or impact constitute a special burden on the press, Grosjean v. American Press Co., Inc., 297 U. S. 233, nor deprive our free society of the stimulating benefit of varied ideas because their purveyors fear physical or economic retribution solely because of what they choose to think and publish.

The history of libel law leaves little doubt that it originated in soil entirely different from that which nurtured these constitutional values. Early libel was primarily a criminal remedy, the function of which was to make punishable any writing which tended to bring into disrepute the state, established religion, or any individual likely to be provoked to a breach of the peace because of the words. Truth was no defense in such actions and while a proof of truth might prevent recovery in a civil action, this limitation is more readily explained as a manifestation of judicial reluctance to enrich an undeserving plaintiff than by the supposition that the defendant was protected by the truth of the publication. The same truthful statement might be the basis of a criminal libel action. See Commonwealth v. Clap, 4 Tyng 163 (Mass.); see generally Veeder, The History and Theory of the Law of Defamation, 3 Col. L. Rev. 546.

The law of libel has, of course, changed substantially since the early days of the Republic, and this change is "the direct consequence of the friction between it . . . and the highly cherished right of free speech." State v. Browne, 86 N. J. Super. 217, 228, 206 A. 2d 591, 597. The emphasis has shifted from criminal to civil remedies, from the protection of absolute social values to the safeguarding of valid personal interests. Truth has become an absolute defense in almost all cases,[17] and privileges designed to foster free communication are almost universally recognized.[18] But the basic theory of libel has not changed, and words defamatory of another, are still placed "in the same class with the use of explosives or the keeping of dangerous animals." Prosser Torts § 108, at 792. Thus some antithesis between freedom of speech and press and libel actions persists, for libel remains premised on the content of speech and limits the freedom of the publisher to express certain sentiments, at least without guaranteeing legal proof of their substantial accuracy.

While the truth of the underlying facts might be said to mark the line between publications which are of significant social value and those which might be suppressed without serious social harm and thus resolve the antithesis on a neutral ground, we have rejected, in prior cases involving materials and persons commanding justified and important public interest, the argument that a [17] See 1 Harper & James, The Law of Torts § 5.20.

[18] Some privileges such as the one pertaining to reports of judicial proceedings are recognized as absolute. Others, such as the fair-comment privilege are recognized only as conditional privileges and may be vitiated by proof of actual malice. See generally, Prosser, The Law of Torts §§ 109, 110.

finding of falsity alone should strip protections from the publisher. New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, supra, at 272. We have recognized that "putting to the pre-existing prejudices of a jury the determination of what is 'true' may effectively institute a system of censorship," and "the inevitability of some error in the situation presented in free debate," Time, Inc. v. Hill, supra, at 406. (Opinion of this writer.)

Our resolution of New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, in the context of the numerous statutes and cases which allow ideologically neutral, and generally applicable regulatory measures to be applied to publication, makes clear, however, that neither the interests of the publisher nor those of society necessarily preclude a damage award based on improper conduct which creates a false publication. It is the conduct element, therefore, on which we must principally focus if we are successfully to resolve the antithesis between civil libel actions and the freedom of speech and press. Impositions based on misconduct can be neutral with respect to content of the speech involved, free of historical taint, and adjusted to strike a fair balance between the interests of the community in free circulation of information and those of individuals in seeking recompense for harm done by the circulation of defamatory falsehood.

In New York Times we were adjudicating in an area which lay close to seditious libel, and history dictated extreme caution in imposing liability. The plaintiff in that case was an official whose position in government was such "that the public [had] an independent interest in the qualifications and performance of the person who [held] it." Rosenblatt v. Baer, supra, at 86. Such officials usually enjoy a privilege against libel actions for their utterances, see, e. g., Barr v. Matteo, 360 U. S. 564, and there were analogous considerations involved in New York Times, supra, at 282. Thus we invoked "the hypothesis that speech can rebut speech, propaganda will answer propaganda, free debate of ideas will result in the wisest governmental policies," Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494, 503, and limited recovery to those cases where "calculated falsehood" placed the publisher "at odds with the premises of democratic government and with the orderly manner in which economic, social, or political change is to be effected." Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64, 75. That is to say, such officials were permitted to recover in libel only when they could prove that the publication involved was deliberately falsified, or published recklessly despite the publisher's awareness of probable falsity. Investigatory failures alone were held insufficient to satisfy this standard. See New York Times, at 286–288, 292; Garrison v. Louisiana, supra, at 73–75, 79.

In the cases we decide today none of the particular considerations involved in New York Times is present. These actions cannot be analogized to prosecutions for seditious libel. Neither plaintiff has any position in government which would permit a recovery by him to be viewed as a vindication of governmental policy. Neither was entitled to a special privilege protecting his utterances against accountability in libel. We are prompted, therefore, to seek guidance from the rules of liability which prevail in our society with respect to compensation of persons injured by the improper performance of a legitimate activity by another. Under these rules, a departure from the kind of care society may expect from a reasonable man performing such activity leaves the actor open to a judicial shifting of loss. In defining these rules, and especially in formulating the standards for determining the degree of care to be expected in the circumstances, courts have consistently given much attention to the importance of defendants' activities. Prosser, The Law of Torts § 31, at 151. The courts have also, especially in libel cases, investigated the plaintiff's position to determine whether he has a legitimate call upon the court for protection in light of his prior activities and means of self-defense. See Brewer v. Hearst Publishing Co., 185 F. 2d 846; Flanagan v. Nicholson Publishing Co., 137 La. 587, 68 So. 964. We note that the public interest in the circulation of the materials here involved, and the publisher's interest in circulating them, is not less than that involved in New York Times. And both Butts and Walker commanded a substantial amount of independent public interest at the time of the publications; both, in our opinion, would have been labeled "public figures" under ordinary tort rules. See Spahn v. Julian Messner, Inc., 18 N. Y. 2d 324, 221 N. E. 2d 543, remanded on other grounds, — U. S. —. Butts may have attained that status by position alone and Walker by his purposeful activity amounting to a thrusting of his personality into the "vortex" of an important public controversy, but both commanded sufficient continuing public interest and had sufficient access to the means of counterargument to be able "to expose through discussion the falsehood and fallacies" of the defamatory statements. Whitney v. California, 274 U. S. 357, 377 (Brandeis, J., dissenting).

These similarities and differences between libel actions involving persons who are public officials and libel actions involving those circumstanced as were Butts and Walker, viewed in light of the principles of liability which are of general applicability in our society, lead us to the conclusion that libel actions of the present kind cannot be left entirely to state libel laws, unlimited by any overriding constitutional safeguard, but that the rigorous federal requirements of New York Times are not the only appropriate accommodation of the conflicting interests at stake. We consider and would hold that a "public figure" who is not a public official may also recover damages for a defamatory falsehood whose substance makes substantial danger to reputation apparent, on a showing of highly unreasonable conduct constituting an extreme departure from the standards of investigation and reporting ordinarily adhered to by responsible publishers. Cf. Sulzberger, Responsibility and Freedom in Nelson, Freedom of the Press from Hamilton to the Warren Court, 409, 412.

Nothing in this opinion is meant to affect the holdings in New York Times and its progeny, including our recent decision in Time, Inc. v. Hill.[19]

V.

Having set forth the standard by which we believe the constitutionality of the damage awards in these cases must be judged, we turn now, as the Court did in New York Times, to the question whether the evidence and findings below meet that standard. We find the standard satisfied in No. 37, Butts, and not satisfied by either the evidence or the findings in No. 150, Walker.

The Butts jury was instructed, in considering punitive damages, to assess "the reliability, the nature of the sources of the defendant's information, its acceptance or rejection of the sources, and its care in checking upon assertions." These considerations were said to be relevant to a determination whether defendant had proceeded with "wanton and reckless indifference." In this light we consider that the jury must have decided that the investigation undertaken by the Saturday Evening Post, upon which much evidence and argument was centered,[20] was grossly inadequate in the circumstances. The [19] Nor does anything we have said touch, in any way, libel or other tort actions not involving public figures or matters of public interest.

[20] Counsel for Butts continually pressed upon the jury in argument that the defendant had failed to exercise a minimum of care. He did not seriously contend that the Saturday Evening Post was impact of a jury instruction "is not to be ascertained by merely considering isolated statements but by taking into view all the instructions given and the tendencies of proof in the case to which they could possibly be applied." Seaboard Air Line Ry. v. Padgett, 236 U. S. 668, 672.

This jury finding was found to be supported by the evidence by the trial judge and the majority in the Fifth Circuit. Given the extended history of the case, the amount of the evidence pointing to serious deficiencies in investigatory procedure, and the severe harm inflicted on Butts, we would not feel justified in ordering a retrial of the compensatory damage issue, either on the theory that this aspect of the case was submitted to the jury only under the issue of "truth,"[21] or on the very slim possibility that the jury finding regarding punitive damages might have been based on Curtis' attitude toward Butts rather than on Curtis' conduct.

The evidence showed that the Butts story was in no sense "hot news" and the editors of the magazine recognized the need for a thorough investigation of the serious actuated by pre-existing animosity toward Butts. Arguing that the misquotations which were shown to be present were proof of malice he stated: "I say that is not fair journalism; I say that is not true, careful reporting." After reviewing the failure of Curtis to interview Carmichael (see p. 25, infra) or to check the game films, he asked the jury: "Again, is that good reporting? Is that what the field or the profession of journalism owes you and owes me . . . when it is getting ready to write an article which it knows and which it states therein that it is going to ruin us . . . ." The gist of Butts' contention on "actual malice" was that Curtis had been anxious to publish an exposé and had thus wantonly and recklessly seized on a questionable affidavit from Burnett. It is this theory which we feel that the jury must have accepted in awarding punitive damages.

---

[21] It is inconceivable that the jury might have treated the "investigatory" evidence differently if it had been presented with respect to compensatory damages rather than with regard to punitive damages.

charges. Elementary precautions were, nevertheless, ignored. The Saturday Evening Post knew that Burnett had been placed on probation in connection with bad check charges, but proceeded to publish the story on the basis of his affidavit without substantial independent support. Burnett's notes were not even viewed by any of the magazine's personnel prior to publication. John Carmichael who was supposed to have been with Burnett when the phone call was overheard was not interviewed. No attempt was made to screen the films of the game to see if Burnett's information was accurate, and no attempt was made to find out whether Alabama had adjusted its plans after the alleged divulgence of information.

The Post writer assigned to the story was not a football expert and no attempt was made to check the story with someone knowledgeable in the sport. At trial such experts indicated that the information in the Burnett notes was either such that it would be evident to any opposing coach from game films regularly exchanged or valueless. Those assisting the Post writer in his investigation were already deeply involved in another libel action, based on a different article, brought against Curtis Publishing Co. by the Alabama coach and unlikely to be the source of a complete and objective investigation. The Saturday Evening Post was anxious to change its image by instituting a policy of "sophisticated muckraking," and the pressure to produce a successful exposé might have induced a stretching of standards. In short, the evidence is ample to support a finding of highly unreasonable conduct constituting an extreme departure from the standards of investigation and reporting ordinarily adhered to by responsible publishers.

The situation in Walker is considerably different. There the trial court found the evidence insufficient to support more than a finding of even ordinary negligence and the Court of Civil Appeals supported the trial court's view of the evidence. Ordinarily we would, under the governing constitutional standard, reverse the decision below on the concurrent findings rule. Graver Tank & Mfg. Co. v. Linde Air Products Co., 336 U. S. 271, 275. But, as in New York Times, we think it better to face for ourselves the question whether there is sufficient evidence to support the finding we would require.

In contrast to the Butts article, the dispatch which concerns us in Walker was news which required immediate dissemination. The Associated Press received the information from a correspondent who was present at the scene of the events and gave every indication of being trustworthy and competent. His dispatches in this instance, with one minor exception, were internally consistent and would not have seemed unreasonable to one familiar with General Walker's prior publicized statements on the underlying controversy.[22] Considering the necessity for rapid dissemination, nothing in this series of events gives the slightest hint of a severe departure from accepted publishing standards. We therefore conclude that General Walker should not be entitled to damages from the Associated Press.

---

[22] On September 26, 1962, Walker had made a statement on radio station KWKH at Shreveport, Louisiana, urging people to "[r]ise to a stand beside Governor Ross Barnett at Jackson, Mississippi." He contended that the people had "talked, listened and been pushed around far too much . . . ." He promised that he would "be there," on "the right side." The next morning in a television appearance in Dallas he repeated the same sentiments, and he set out his views once again from New Orleans on the evening of September 28, 1962. On September 29, 1962, Walker arrived in Jackson, Mississippi, and held another press and television conference in which he called for "violent vocal protest." On the afternoon of September 30, 1962, Walker held a final press conference at which he again urged defiance of court orders and federal power.

VI.

We come finally to Curtis' contention that whether or not it can be required to compensate Butts for any injury it may have caused him, it cannot be subjected to an assessment for punitive damages limited only by the "enlightened conscience" of the community. Curtis recognizes that the Constitution presents no general bar to the assessment of punitive damages in a civil case, Day v. Woodworth, 13 How. 363, 370–371, but contends that an unlimited punitive award against a magazine publisher constitutes an effective prior restraint by giving the jury the power to destroy the publisher's business. We cannot accept this reasoning. Publishers like Curtis engage in a wide variety of activities which may lead to tort suits where punitive damages are a possibility. To exempt a publisher, because of the nature of his calling, from an imposition generally exacted from other members of the community, would be to extend a protection not required by the constitutional guarantee. Associated Press v. N. L. R. B., supra. We think the constitutional guarantee of freedom of speech and press is adequately served by judicial control over excessive jury verdicts, manifested in this instance by the trial court's remittitur, and by the general rule that a verdict based on jury prejudice cannot be sustained even when punitive damages are warranted. See, e. g., Minneapolis, St. P. & S. S. M. Ry. v. Moquin, 283 U. S. 520, 521.

Despite this conclusion, it might be argued that an award of punitive damages cannot be justified constitutionally by the same degree of misconduct required to support a compensatory award. The usual rule in libel actions, and other state-created tort actions, is that a higher degree of fault is necessary to sustain a punitive imposition than a compensatory award. And it might be asserted that the need to compensate the injured plaintiff is not relevant to the issue of punitive damages in libel since an award of general damages compensates for any possible pecuniary and intangible harm. Thus the argument would be that the strong speech and press interest in publishing material on public issues, which we have recognized as parallel to the interest in publishing political criticism present in New York Times, must be served by a limitation on punitive damages restricting them to cases of "actual malice" as defined in New York Times and Garrison v. Louisiana, supra. We find the force of any such argument quite insufficient to overcome the compelling contrary considerations, and there is, moreover, nothing in any of our past cases which suggests that compensatory and punitive damages are subject to different constitutional standards of misconduct.

Where a publisher's departure from standards of press responsibility is severe enough to strip from him the constitutional protection our decision acknowledges, we think it entirely proper for the State to act not only for the protection of the individual injured but to safeguard all those similarly situated against like abuse. Moreover, punitive damages require a finding of "ill will" under general libel law and it is not unjust that a publisher be forced to pay for the "venting of his spleen" in a manner which does not meet even the minimum standards required for constitutional protection. Especially in those cases where circumstances outside the publication itself reduce its impact sufficiently to make a compensatory imposition an inordinately light burden, punitive damages serve a wholly legitimate purpose in the protection of individual reputation. We would hold, therefore, that misconduct sufficient to justify the award of compensatory damages also justifies the imposition of a punitive award, subject of course to the limitation that such award is not demonstrated to be founded on the mere prejudice of the jury. As we have already noted (supra, pp. 23–25) the case on punitive damages was put to the jury under instructions which satisfied the constitutional test we would apply in cases of this kind, and the evidence amply supported the jury's findings.[23]

The judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in No. 37 is affirmed. The judgment of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals in No. 150 is reversed and the case is remanded to that court for further proceedings not inconsistent wtih the opinions that have been filed herein by THE CHIEF JUSTICE, MR. JUSTICE BLACK, and MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN.

It is so ordered.

---

[23] It should also be noted that prior to publication the Saturday Evening Post had been notified both by Butts and his daughter that the material about to be printed was false. Despite these warnings, and the fact that no member of the staff had ever even seen Burnett's crucial notes, no further efforts at investigation were undertaken prior to publication. It might indeed be argued that this conduct would have sufficed, under proper instructions, to satisfy even the "actual malice" standard of New York Times, the notice to the Saturday Evening Post being considered as furnishing the necessary "mental element." New York Times, supra, at 287.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

Nos. 37 AND 150.—OCTOBER TERM, 1966.

Curtis Publishing Co., Petitioner, 37 v. Wallace Butts.	On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.
The Associated Press, Petitioner, 150 v. Edwin A. Walker.	On Writ of Certiorari to the Court of Civil Appeals of Texas.

[June 12, 1967.]

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE WARREN, concurring in the result.

While I agree with the results announced by MR. JUSTICE HARLAN in both of these cases, I find myself in disagreement with his stated reasons for reaching those results. Our difference stems from his departure from the teaching of New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254 (1964), to which we both subscribed only three years ago.

I.

In the New York Times case, we held that a State cannot, consistently with the First and Fourteenth Amendments, award damages to a "public official" for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless the verdict is based on proof of "actual malice"—that is, proof that the defamatory statement was made "with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not." 376 U. S., at 280. The present cases involve not "public officials," but "public figures" whose views and actions with respect to public issues and events are often of as much concern to the citizen as the attitudes and behavior of "public officials" with respect to the same issues and events.

All of us agree that the basic considerations underlying the First Amendment require that some limitations be placed on the application of state libel laws to "public figures" as well as "public officials." Similarly, the seven members of the Court who deem it necessary to pass upon the question agree that the respondents in these cases are "public figures" for First Amendment purposes. Having reached this point, however, MR. JUSTICE HARLAN'S opinion departs from the standard of New York Times and substitutes in cases involving "public figures" a standard that is based on "highly unreasonable conduct" and is phrased in terms of "extreme departure from the standards of investigation and reporting ordinarily adhered to by responsible publishers" (ante, p. ——). I cannot believe that a standard which is based on such an unusual and uncertain formulation could either guide a jury of layment or afford the protection for speech and debate that is fundamental to our society and guaranteed by the First Amendment.

To me, differentiation between "public figures" and "public officials" and adoption of separate standards of proof for each has no basis in law, logic, or First Amendment policy. Increasingly in this country, the distinctions between governmental and private sectors are blurred. Since the depression of the 1930's and World War II there has been a rapid fusion of economic and political power, a merging of science, industry, and government, and a high degree of interaction between the intellectual, governmental, and business worlds. Depression, war, international tensions, national and international markets, and the surging growth of science and technology have precipitated national and international problems that demand national and international solutions. While these trends and events have occasioned a consolidation of governmental power, power has also become much more organized in what we have commonly considered to be the private sector. In many situations, policy determinations which traditionally were channeled through formal political institutions are now originated and implemented through a complex array of boards, committees, commissions, corporations, and associations, some only loosely connected with the Government. This blending of positions and power has also occured in the case of individuals so that many who do not hold public office at the moment are nevertheless intimately involved in the resolution of important public questions or, by reason of their fame, shape events in areas of concern to society at large.

Viewed in this context then, it is plain that although they are not subject to the restraints of the political process, "public figures," like "public officials," often play an influential role in ordering society. And surely as a class these "public figures" have as ready access as "public officials" to mass media of communication, both to influence policy and to counter criticism of their views and activities. Our citizenry has a legitimate and substantial interest in the conduct of such persons, and freedom of the press to engage in uninhibited debate about their involvement in public issues and events is as crucial as it is in the case of "public officials." The fact that they are not amenable to the restraints of the political process only underscores the legitimate and substantial nature of the interest, since it means that public opinion may be the only instrument by which society can attempt to influence their conduct.

I therefore adhere to the New York Times standard in the case of "public figures" as well as "public officials." It is a manageable standard, readily stated and understood, which also balances to a proper degree the legitimate interests traditionally protected by the law of defamation. Its definition of "actual malice" is not so restrictive that recovery is limited to situations where there is "knowing falsehood" on the part of the publisher of false and defamatory matter. "Reckless disregard" for the truth or falsity, measured by the conduct of the publisher, will also expose him to liability for publishing false material which is injurious to reputation. More significantly, however, the New York Times standard is an important safeguard for the rights of the press and public to inform and be informed on matters of legitimate interest. Evenly applied to cases involving "public men"—whether they be "public officials" or "public figures"—it will afford the necessary insulation for the fundamental interests which the First Amendment was designed to protect.

II.

I have no difficulty in concluding that No. 150, The Associated Press v. Walker, must be reversed since it is in clear conflict with New York Times. The constitutional defenses were properly raised and preserved by the petitioner. The trial judge expressly ruled that no showing of malice in any sense had been made, and he reversed an award of punitive damages for that reason. The seven members of this Court who reach the question agree with that conclusion, and all agree that the courts below erred in holding the First Amendment inapplicable. Under any reasoning, General Walker was a public man in whose public conduct society and the press had a legitimate and substantial interest.

III.

But No. 37, Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, presents an entirely different situation. There, no First Amendment defenses were raised by the petitioner until after the trial. Because of this failure and because the case was tried before our decision in New York Times, the trial judge did not instruct the jury in terms of the precise formulation we adopted. In connection with the issue of punitive damages, however, the trial judge did give an "actual malice" instruction which invoked the elements we later held necessary in New York Times. He instructed the jury that it would have to find "actual malice" before awarding punitive damages, and he continued by defining "actual malice" as denoting "wanton or reckless indifference or culpable negligence with regard to the rights of others" and as including notions of "ill will, spite, hatred and an intent to injure one." Under the Georgia law of defamation which governed the case, the jury was also specifically required to find that the defamatory statements were false before it could award any damages, and it was so instructed. With the jury's attention thus focussed on this threshold requirement of falsity, the references in the instructions to wanton or reckless indifference and culpable negligence most probably resulted in a verdict based on the requirement of reckless disregard for the truth of which we spoke in New York Times.[1] Although the "actual malice" instructions were not also given in connection with the compensatory damage issue, it is difficult to conceive of how petitioner could have been prejudiced by that failure in view of the fact that the jury, guided by "actual malice" instructions, awarded $3,000,000 in punitive damages.[2]

---

[1] We held unconstitutional in Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64 (1964), a criminal defamation statute which authorized conviction on proof that a defamatory statement had been motivated by ill will. The statute did not require that the defamatory statement be false to sustain such a conviction.

[2] In the New York Times case, "actual malice" instructions were given in connection with punitive damages. However, we noted: "While Alabama law apparently requires proof of actual malice for an award of punitive damages, where general damages are concerned malice is presumed. Such a presumption is inconsistent with the Unquestionably, in cases tried after our decision in New York Times we should require strict compliance with the standard we established. We should not, however, be so inflexible in judging cases tried prior thereto, especially when as here the trial judge—unaided by advice or objections from counsel—recognized the essential principle and conformed with it to a substantial degree. Moreover, after the New York Times rule was brought to the trial judge's attention in a post-trial motion, he reviewed the record in light of that precise standard and held that the jury verdict should not be disturbed since "there was ample evidence from which a jury could have concluded that there was reckless disregard by the [petitioner] of whether the article was false or not."

An additional factor leads me to the conclusion that we should not insist on the financial and emotional expenses of a retrial here merely because the trial judge's instructions were not given in the precise terms of the present constitutional standard.[3] That factor, to which I briefly adverted above, was the choice of the petitioner in this case to raise only truth as a defense and to omit in its pleadings and at the trial any reference to possible First Amendment defenses or even to the conditional privilege provided by Georgia law for "comments upon the acts of public men in their public capacity and with federal rule. . . . Since the trial judge did not instruct the jury to differentiate between general and punitive damages, it may be that the verdict was wholly an award of one or the other. But it is impossible to know, in view of the general verdict returned. Because of this uncertainty, the judgment must be reversed and the case remanded." 376 U. S., at 283–284. (Emphasis added.)

---

The jury in the present case was required to separate compensatory and punitive damages.

[3] Cf. Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U. S. 374, 411 (1967) (concurring opinion of MR. JUSTICE FORTAS).

reference thereto."[4] I use the word "choice" in this connection, because the facts lead me, as they did the Court of Appeals, to the firm conclusion that the omissions were deliberate. Although this trial occurred before our decision in New York Times, we had granted certiorari to review that case even before the complaint here was filed.[5] The Alabama law firm which had represented the New York Times in the state courts was involved in the trial of this case. Lead counsel in the cases conferred periodically, and one of the members of the Alabama law firm referred to above sat at the counsel table throughout this trial. The same Alabama law firm was retained to represent petitioner in a lawsuit filed by Coach Paul Bryant, who was also libeled by the magazine article here in question. First Amendment defenses were raised both at the trial of the New York Times case and by the pleadings in the Bryant lawsuit which was settled for a substantial sum of money. But counsel

---

[4] Ga. Code Ann. § 105–709 (6) provides:

"Privileged communications.—The following are deemed privileged communications:

. . . . . .

"6. Comments upon the acts of public men in their public capacity and with reference thereto."

This privilege is qualified by Ga. Code Ann. § 105–710, which provides:

"Malicious use of privilege.—In every case of privileged communications, if the privilege is used merely as a cloak for venting private malice, and not bona fide in promotion of the object for which the privilege is granted, the party defamed shall have a right of action."

[5] Certiorari was granted in New York Times v. Sullivan on January 7, 1963. 371 U. S. 946. The complaint in this case was filed approximately 2½ months later, on March 25, 1963. Counsel here could not have anticipated the precise standard we announced in New York Times. In the Bryant lawsuit and, of course, in the New York Times case itself counsel did, however, raise general First Amendment defenses. No reference whatever to the First Amendment was made by defense counsel in the trial of this case.

did not raise such defenses here. Given the importance of this case to petitioner and the interplay between overlapping counsel aligned on the same sides of related lawsuits, I can only conclude that tactical or public relations considerations explain the failure here to defend on First Amendment grounds.

IV.

Satisfied, as I am, that under the circumstances of the Butts case no retrial should be ordered merely because of the instructions, I turn now to the final duty which this Court has when violations of fundamental constitutional principles are alleged. We must review the evidence to ascertain whether the judgment can stand consistently with those principles. New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 285 (1964); Speiser v. Randall, 357 U. S. 513, 525 (1958).

The petitioner in this case is a major factor in the publishing business. Among its publications is the Saturday Evening Post which published the defamatory falsehoods here in question. Apparently because of declining advertising revenues, an editorial decision was made to "change the image" of the Saturday Evening Post with the hope that circulation and advertising revenues would thereby be increased. The starting point for this change of image was an announcement that the magazine would embark upon a program of "sophisticated muckraking,"[6] designed to "provoke people, make them mad."

[6] Webster's New International Dictionary (2d ed., unabr.), p. 1606, reports the source of the term "muckrake" as follows:

"On April 14, 1906, President Roosevelt delivered a speech in which he used the term muckrake in attacking the practice of making sweeping and unjust charges of corruption against public men and corporations . . . ."

Roget's International Thesaurus § 934 (3) lists the following as synonyms: muckrake; throw mud at; throw or fling dirt at; drag through the mud; bespatter.

Shortly thereafter, and as an apparent implementation of the new policy, the Saturday Evening Post purchased the rights to the article which formed the subject matter of this case. The slipshod and sketchy investigatory techniques employed to check the veracity of the source and the inferences to be drawn from the few facts believed to be true are detailed at length in the opinion of MR. JUSTICE HARLAN. Suffice it to say that little investigative effort was expended initially, and no additional inquiries were made even after the editors were notified by respondent and his daughter that the account to be published was absolutely untrue. Instead, the Saturday Evening Post proceeded on its reckless course with full knowledge of the harm that would likely result from publication of the article. This knowledge was signaled by the statements at the conclusion of the article that "Wally Butts will never help any football team again" and "careers will be ruined, that is sure."

I am satisfied that the evidence here discloses that degree of reckless disregard for the truth of which we spoke in New York Times and Garrison. Freedom of the press under the First Amendment does not include absolute license to destroy lives or careers.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

Nos. 37 AND 150.—OCTOBER TERM, 1966.

37	Curtis Publishing Co., Petitioner, v. Wallace Butts.	On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.
150	The Associated Press, Petitioner, v. Edwin A. Walker.	On Writ of Certiorari to the Court of Civil Appeals of Texas.

[June 12, 1967.]

MR. JUSTICE BLACK, with whom MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS joins, concurring in No. 150, and dissenting in No. 37.

I concur in reversal of the judgment in No. 150, The Associated Press v. Walker, based on the grounds and reasons stated in Parts I and II of THE CHIEF JUSTICE's opinion. I do this, however, as in Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U. S. 374, 398, "in order for the Court to be able at this time to agree on an opinion in this important case based on the prevailing constitutional doctrine expressed in New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254. [THE CHIEF JUSTICE's] . . . opinion decides the case in accordance with this doctrine, to which the majority adhere. In agreeing to . . . [that] opinion, I do not recede from any of the views I have previously expressed about the much wider press and speech freedoms I think the First and Fourteenth Amendments were designed to grant to the people of the Nation. See, e. g., New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U. S., at 293 (concurring opinion); Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U. S. 75, 94 (concurring and dissenting opinion)."

I would reverse the judgment in No. 37 for the reasons given in my concurring opinion in New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 293, and my concurring and dissenting opinion in Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U. S. 75, 94, but wish to add a few words.

These cases illustrate, I think, the accuracy of my prior predictions that the New York Times constitutional rule concerning libel is wholly inadequate to save the press from being destroyed by libel judgments. Here the Court reverses the case of Associated Press v. Walker, but affirms the judgment of Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts. The main reason for this quite contradictory action, so far as I can determine, is that the Court looks at the facts in both cases as though it were a jury and reaches the conclusion that the Saturday Evening Post, in writing about Butts, was so abusive that its article is more of a libel at the constitutional level than is the one by the Associated Press. That seems a strange way to erect a constitutional standard for libel cases. If this precedent is followed, it means that we must in all libel cases hereafter weigh the facts and hold that all papers and magazines guilty of gross writing or reporting are constitutionally liable, while they are not if the quality of the reporting is approved by a majority of us. In the final analysis, what we do in these circumstances is to review the factual questions in cases decided by juries—a review which is a flat violation of the Seventh Amendment.

It strikes me that the Court is getting itself in the same quagmire in the field of libel in which it is now helplessly struggling in the field of obscenity. No one, including this Court, can know what is and what is not constitutionally obscene or libelous under this Court's rulings. Today the Court will not give the First Amendment its natural and obvious meaning by holding that a law which seriously menaces the very life of press freedom violates the First Amendment. In fact, the Court is suggesting various experimental expedients in libel cases, all of which boil down to a determination of how offensive to this Court a particular libel judgment may be, either because of its immense size or because the Court does not like the way an alleged libelee was treated. Again I suggest (see Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U. S. 374, 399) that we are rapidly but surely getting ourselves in the dilemma we found ourselves in when we were compelled to overrule the ill-starred case of Betts v. Brady, 316 U. S. 455,* in order that the state courts of the country might be able to determine with some degree of certainty when an indigent person was entitled to the benefit of a lawyer and avoid the spawning of hundreds of habeas corpus cases that finally raised questions that a lawyer could and would have raised at the trial.

I think it is time for this Court to abandon New York Times v. Sullivan and adopt the rule to the effect that the First Amendment was intended to leave the press free from the harassment of libel judgments.

Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U. S. 335.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

Nos. 37 AND 150.—OCTOBER TERM, 1966.

Curtis Publishing Co., Petitioner, 37 v. Wallace Butts.	On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.
The Associated Press, Petitioner, 150 v. Edwin A. Walker.	On Writ of Certiorari to the Court of Civil Appeals of Texas.

[June 12, 1967.]

MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN, with whom MR. JUSTICE WHITE joins, concurring in No. 150, and dissenting in No. 37.

I join Parts I and II of the opinion of THE CHIEF JUSTICE and the disposition in No. 150, Associated Press v. Walker.

In No. 37, Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, insofar as THE CHIEF JUSTICE's opinion demonstrates that the evidence unmistakably would support a judgment for Butts under the New York Times standard, I agree. I would, however, remand for a new trial since the charge to the jury did not comport with that standard.[1] The charge on compensatory damages directed that the jury find liability on a finding of mere falsehood. And the trial court stated that punitive damages might be awarded on a finding of "actual malice" which it defined to encompass "the notion of ill will, spite, hatred and an intent to injure one," and also to denote "a wanton or reckless indifference or culpable negligence with regard to the rights of others." The court detailed some factors the jury could consider in applying this standard. It said, for example, that "a publication may be so extravagant in its denunciation and so vituperative in its character as to justify an inference of malice," and that "proof that the plaintiff did demand a retraction but that the defendant failed to retract the article may be considered by you on the question of punitive damages." But "[d]ebate on public issues will not be uninhibited if the speaker must run the risk that it will be proved in court that he spoke out of hatred; even if he did speak out of hatred, utterances honestly believed contribute to the free interchange of ideas and the ascertainment of truth." Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U. S. 64, 73. The "good motives" of the publisher can be no more relevant in the context of "public men" than in the context of criticism of "public officials." See Garrison, supra. The court added that the Post could show in mitigation of punitive damages that "it in good faith relied upon matters which had come to its attention." This makes crystal clear that the standard announced authorized the jury to award punitive damages even though it found that the Post had in good faith relied on matters which had come to its attention. The charge undoubtedly fails to comport with New York Times.[2]

[1] For the reasons expressed in the opinion of MR. JUSTICE HARLAN I agree that petitioner did not waive his contentions under New York Times.

That the evidence might support a verdict under New York Times cannot justify our taking from the jury the function of determining, under proper instructions, whether the New York Times standard has been

[2] The statement by the trial court that "malice also denotes a wanton or reckless indifference or culpable negligence with regard to the rights of others" could reasonably have been regarded by the jury to relate not to the truth or falsity of the matter, but to the Post's attitude toward Butt's reputation, akin to the spite and ill will in which terms the court had just defined "malice." See Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U. S. 374, 396, n. 12.

met. The extent of this Court's role in reviewing the facts, in a case such as this, is to ascertain whether there is evidence by which a jury could reasonably find liability under the constitutionally required instructions. See New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 284–292; Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U. S. 374, 391–394. When, as in this case, such evidence appears, the proper disposition in this federal case is to reverse and remand with direction of a new trial. See Time, Inc. v. Hill, supra.